8. A specification that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings of the trial court, and which states the findings objected to, and that they are not supported by the evidence, is sufficient, when the statement recites that it contains all the evidence in the case.

9. Where certain defendants propose amendments to the statement, and the record does not show that they were not adopted, the failure to give notice to them of the time and place of the settlement of the statement on motion for a new trial is harmless error.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Lake county; R. W. Crump, Judge.

Action to quiet title by the Standard Quicksilver Company, a corporation, against Annie Habishaw and others. From a judgment in favor of defendants, and from an order denying a motion for new trial, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

A. H. Ricketts, for appellant. W. T. Baggett, Dan Jones, T. J. Sheridan, Denson & De Haven, and R. J. Hudson, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. Action to quiet title. The case was tried before the court, findings filed, and judgment entered for defendants. Plaintiff made a motion for a new trial, and this appeal is from the order denying the motion.

The complaint alleges that the plaintiff is the owner, and seised in fee and entitled to the possession, of lots numbered 1 and 2, the S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ and the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$, of section 23, township 10 N., range 7 W., M. D. M., in Lake county; that defendants are in possession thereof and claim some interest therein adverse to plaintiff. The answer disclaims any interest in or to any portion of the premises except that part known as the "Bullion Quicksilver Mining Claim," which claim is described in the answer by metes and bounds. The answer denies that plaintiff is the owner or entitled to the possession of the said Bullion quicksilver mining claim, or any part thereof, and admits that defendants are in possession thereof under claim of title. The answer further alleges that the cause of action, as to the mining claim, is barred by the provisions of sections 318 and 319 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and that defendants have procured title thereto by continuous adverse possession for more than nine years prior to the commencement of the action. The court found that the plaintiff was not at the time of the commencement of the action, nor at any other time, the owner or in the possession, or entitled to the possession, of the lands claimed in the answer, and that the defendants are, and were at all times named therein, the owners and entitled to the possession thereof. It further found that as to the lands claimed by defendants the plaintiff's cause of action was and is barred by the statute of limitations, and that defendants have procured title by adverse possession, as set forth in their answer. These findings are challenged as being without support in the evidence.

It appears from the evidence that on the 10th day of February, 1881, under the provisions of the act of congress of May 20, 1862, entitled "An act to secure homesteads to actual settlers on the public domain," and the acts supplemental thereto, the United States issued to one Edward J. Bradford its patent for the lands described in the complaint; that the title to said premises passed by mesne conveyances from said Bradford to plaintiff. It is conceded by defendants that the record title apparently passed out of the government to the plaintiff, but it is claimed that the land described in the answer was and is mineral land, and chiefly valuable for its minerals, and that for this reason the land department had no right to dispose of it, and that no title passed out of the government by the patent. It is provided in the Revised Statutes of the United States that "in all cases lands valuable for minerals shall be reserved from sale, except as otherwise expressly directed by law." Rev. St. U. S. § 2318. There is no provision of law for disposing of lands chiefly valuable for minerals to homestead settlers. But the question as to whether the land was mining land, or valuable for minerals, within the meaning of the terms, was one of fact, and which it was the peculiar province of the land department of the United States to determine before the patent was issued. As said by this court in Wormouth v. Gardner, 112 Cal. 510, 44 Pac. 807: "It is an established rule of law that upon the issuance of a patent by the United States the decision of the land department upon all the facts necessary to the issuance of such patent is, in the absence of fraud, mistake, or imposition, conclusive." It was said in Cowell v. Lammers (C. C.) 21 Fed. 206: "There must be some point of time when the character of the land must be finally determined, and, for the interest of all concerned, there can be no better point to determine this question than at the time of issuing the patent." The rule has been thoroughly discussed and adopted by this court in bank, after a full review of the authorities, in Gale v. Best, 78 Cal. 235, 20 Pac. 550, in which it is said: "The rule is well settled by numerous decisions of the supreme court of the United States that, when a law of congress provides for the disposal and patenting of certain public lands upon the ascertainment of certain facts, the proper officers of the land department of the general government have jurisdiction to inquire into and determine those facts, that the issuance of a patent is an official declaration that such facts have been found in favor of the patentee, and that in such a case the patent is conclusive in a court of law, and cannot be attacked collaterally.

* * * Our opinion is that where a patent issues for public land, under a law which provides for its disposal as agricultural land, either to a railroad company or to pre-emption or homestead claimants, and there is no reservation in the law, except a general one of mineral lands, and no reservation at all in the patent, then the patent must be considered as a conclusive determination by the government that the land is agricultural; and afterwards, in an action in a court of law, it is not competent to reopen the question of the character of the land. The opposite view would render the titles to a large region of California now rapidly filling up with agricultural settlers unstable, insecure, and almost worthless. It would affect, also, those holding through patents under the pre-emption and homestead laws, for mineral lands are exempted from the provisions of those laws. The theory of that view is that, if the land previously patented as agricultural can at any time be shown to be in fact mineral, then the title to it never passed from the United States, but it always remained a part of the public domain. * * * Such, in our opinion, is not the law." That case has been approved and followed in Dreyfus v. Badger, 108 Cal. 66, 41 Pac. 279, and in Klauber v. Higgins, 117 Cal. 458, 49 Pac. 466. Those cases follow the rule laid down by the supreme court of the United States in numerous cases, among which are Steel v. Refining Co., 106 U. S. 447, 1 Sup. Ct. 389, 27 L. Ed. 226; Wright v. Roseberry, 121 U. S. 488, 7 Sup. Ct. 985, 30 L. Ed. 1039; Davis v. Wiebold, 139 U. S. 529, 11 Sup. Ct. 628, 35 L. Ed. 238; Burfenning v. Railroad Co., 163 U. S. 323, 16 Sup. Ct. 1018, 41 L. Ed. 175.

In this case the defendants have not attempted to connect themselves with the paramount source of title. They had no rights that could in any way be affected at the time the patent was issued, and it was therefore no concern of theirs as to whether or not the land was properly disposed of by the agents of the United States. The rule is well established that in such case a patent cannot be collaterally attacked. Doll v. Meador, 16 Cal. 325; Durfee v. Plaisted, 38 Cal. 83; Refining Co. v. Kemp, 104 U. S. 647, 26 L. Ed. 875; Sparks v. Pierce, 115 U. S. 413, 6 Sup. Ct. 102, 29 L. Ed. 428. In the latter case the rule is thus stated: "To entitle a party to relief against a patent of the government, he must show a better right to the land than the patentee,—such as in law should have been respected by the officers of the land department, and, being respected, would have given him the patent. It is not sufficient to show that the patentee ought not to have received the patent. It must affirmatively appear that the claimant was entitled to it, and that, in consequence of erroneous rulings of those officers on the facts existing, it was denied to him." While the rule is that a patent of the United States cannot be collaterally impeached, there runs through the decisions a well-known exception,—that if the department had no jurisdiction to dispose of the lands (that is, if a patent be absolutely void upon its face, or were issued without authority, or were prohibited by statute, or if the lands had been reserved from sale or dedicated to special purposes) the patent may be collaterally impeached; that is, it may be shown by any one to be void. It is claimed by defendants that the lands described in the patent in this case contained "known mines," and that the patent was, therefore, as to such mines, void, so that they can attack it collaterally. We have examined the cases cited, and do not think they support the contention of defendants. Among the principal cases relied upon is Burfenning v. Railway Co., 163 U. S. 322, 16 Sup. Ct. 1018, 41 L. Ed. 175. That case turned upon the point that the lands patented under the homestead laws to claimant were within the limits of the incorporated city of Minneapolis, and, as the patent to such lands was expressly forbidden by statute, the patent was void. The decision is not in conflict with the rule we have stated. On the contrary, the court says: "It has undoubtedly been affirmed over and over again that, in the administration of the public-land system of the United States, questions of fact are for the consideration and judgment of the land department, and that its judgment thereon is final. Whether, for instance, a certain tract is swamp land or not, mineral land or not, presents a question of fact not resting on record, dependent upon oral testimony; and it cannot be doubted that the decision of the land department one way or the other in reference to these questions is conclusive, and not open to re-litigation in the courts, except in those cases of fraud which permit any determination to be re-examined." In Reynolds v. Mining Co., 116 U. S. 687, 6 Sup. Ct. 601, 29 L. Ed. 774, plaintiff relied upon a patent for a placer mine; and the contested vein was within the lines of its superficial area, extended perpendicularly. The statute on which the patent was issued declared that it should not confer any right to veins known to exist within it at the time the grant was made, unless it was included in the application for a patent. The opinion proceeded on the theory that the patentees obtained the patent with the knowledge on their part of the lode or vein, and with the intention of procuring title thereto in violation of the statute. The other cases cited are easily distinguished from the one at bar. Conceding the law to be that, if an applicant for a patent under the homestead laws knew at the date of his application and patent of valuable minerals in the land, his patent would convey no title to such mineral lands, the evidence in this case does not show such facts. The rule is that the mine must not only be known, but known to be valuable, at the date of the patent. Richards v. Dower, 81 Cal. 51, 22 Pac. 304; Deffeback v. Hawke, 115 U. S. 392, 6 Sup. Ct. 95, 29 L. Ed. 423. It is said in Colorado Coal & Iron Co. v. U. S., 123 U. S. 327, 8 Sup. Ct. 131, 31 L. Ed. 182, that no lands have been held to be "known mines" unless at the time the rights of the purchaser accrued there was upon the ground an actual and opened mine, which had been worked or was capable of being worked; and in the opinion it is said: "We hold, therefore, that, to constitute the exemption contemplated by the pre-emption act under the head of 'known mines,' there should be upon the land ascertained coal deposits of such an extent and value as to make the land more valuable to be worked as a coal mine under the conditions existing at the time than for merely agricultural purposes." The court, in finding 4, found the facts to be such as to bring this case within the rule of the above cases, except it is not found that the patentee of the lands knew of any such mines. The finding is that at the time of the issuance of the patent, and prior thereto, the lands "were known to be valuable mineral lands, and were known to be valuable for mining purposes, and were known to contain valuable cinnabar ledges, and were known to be more valuable for mining than for agricultural purposes, and that upon said land there existed known mines of value, and were profitably held, possessed, worked, and mined as such." This finding is not supported by the evidence. The appellant has pointed out all the particular portions of the evidence bearing upon the finding, and it is not necessary to examine it in detail here. It shows that from 1874 to 1881 a prospect hole or shaft was sunk to a depth of about 70 feet,—an average of about 10 feet a year; that an open cut and tunnel about 100 feet in length, with its end or face some 15 or 10 feet in depth from the surface, were run, and a small cut, 10 or 15 feet in length and about 5 or 6 feet wide, was run, and a small shaft or hole was sunk to a depth of about 10 feet to the end of this cut; that this work was done as annual assessment work, and was easily done and at no great expense; that the 70-foot shaft developed a streak of cinnabar ore varying in width, according to the statement of different witnesses, from 2 inches to 3 feet wide, of an average value of $2\frac{1}{2}$ to 5 per cent. The evidence entirely fails to show that the mine was valuable or that it would pay for working it. There were some two or three of these mining claims,—one called the "Kingston," and one the "Cliff Arch," and one the "Great Eastern." It does not appear that these defendants, or either of them, were in any way connected with said attempted mining; neither does it appear that the parties then connected with the mining operations continued them, or conveyed their interests in any way to defendants. We may presume that they abandoned operations. Defendants' counsel have attempted to point out evidence to sustain the finding, but it is not sufficient. The witness Dunham testified: "I believe that it would be profitable to mine. I can go that far, and that is as far as I can go, because I cannot go inside of the mountain, any more than anybody else." The witness Nickerson testified that when he knew the mine or shaft "there was mineral in sight and in the croppings. It was in the croppings, but there was no body of ore exposed,—no large body." This witness further said that he had a conversation with Bradford, the patentee, after he had entered the land, and that in the conversation Bradford said "he considered the land more valuable for agricultural than mineral; * * * that the company had not developed any large body of mineral." The witness Smith testified "that he saw quicksilver in the shaft. It was a stratum of ore a foot or two wide, which could be traced from the top to the bottom of the shaft. They were taking out ore and throwing it on the dump there, and waste rock." The witness Rocca testified: "I saw cinnabar on the northwest corner of the shaft. * * * There was only that streak, you know; and that streak would vary from two or three inches to a foot from the top down to the bottom, as far as I went. * * * For mining, I should think it worth prospecting, and I think it is worth something."

We have thus noticed all the evidence pointed out by defendants in support of their claim of "known mines." No evidence was adduced showing the production of any cinnabar of commercial value in any amount sufficient to make the mines valuable, or showing the product per ton. It is not enough that shafts were sunk in the ground, and signs of mineral found. Neither is it sufficient that there may have been some indications by outcroppings on the surface. The mineral must be clearly found, and be in such quantities and of such value as to show that the land was valuable for mining purposes at the date of the patent. Richards v. Dower, 81 Cal. 54, 22 Pac. 204; Iron Silver Min. Co. v. Mike & Starr Gold & Silver Min. Co., 143 U. S. 404, 12 Sup. Ct. 543, 36 L. Ed. 201. In the language of Judge Field in the Eureka Case, 4 Sawy. 320, Fed. Cas. No. 4,548: "A patent of the United States for land, whether agricultural or mineral, is something upon which its holder can rely for peace and security in his possessions. In its potency it is ironclad against all mere speculative inferences."

It is claimed by defendants that they have procured title to the lands described in their answer by adverse possession; and the court so found, but the evidence does not sustain the finding. It is not necessary to decide as to whether or not a notice of location of a mine made by defendants as trespassers upon the lands of plaintiff, and filed for record by them in the recorder's office, is a written instrument, within the meaning of Code Civ. Proc. § 322. The language of the Code is, "entered into the possession of the property under claim of title * * * founding such claim upon a written instrument, as being a conveyance of the property in question." To comply with the above provision, the defendants must have entered into possession under the "notice of location," and the notice must have purported, at least, to be a conveyance of the property. But the claim of adverse possession must fail, for the reason that defendants have not proven that they, or their predecessors and grantors, have paid all the taxes which have been levied or assessed upon the land. Id. § 325. The complaint describes the lands as being in section 23, township 10 N., range 7 W. The assessments and receipts offered in evidence by defendants are to the "Bullion Quicksilver Mining Co.," and of the "Bullion Quicksilver Mining Claim. Sec. 22, Twp. 10 N., R. 7 W." The receipts do not describe any land, and they clearly show that the payments and assessments were on a claim in section 22. It is not sufficient that defendants thought or supposed they were paying taxes on lands in section 23. Reynolds v. Williard, 80 Cal. 608, 22 Pac. 262. The evidence further shows that the lands described in the complaint were assessed to plaintiff by correct description, and the taxes paid, for each of the years during the time defendants claim to have been in adverse possession. Carpenter v. Lewis, 119 Cal. 18, 50 Pac. 925. While the payment of the taxes by the plaintiff added nothing to its title, it excludes any presumption that the taxes were assessed to or paid by defendants. Baldwin v. Temple, 101 Cal. 402, 35 Pac. 1008.

The specifications as to the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the findings were sufficient. The particular findings objected to are pointed out, and attention is called by the plaintiff to its claim that neither of these findings is supported by the evidence. The purpose of the statute in requiring such specifications is, as has been frequently said, that the opposing party may propose amendments to the statement, and thus cause it to contain all the evidence in support of the decision which he may deem pertinent or relevant thereto; but where, as in the present case, the statement recites that it "contains all the testimony which was offered by either party and admitted in the case," the respondent has no ground for saying that, if the particulars had been more specifically pointed out, he might have caused it to appear that there was additional evidence in support of the decision. The object of requiring any specification is to give notice to the opposing party of the grounds relied on for setting aside the decision; but if, under the notice which is given, the respondent has accomplished all which could have been accomplished under any notice, he is not in a position to object to any defect in the notice.

The claim that defendants Hudson and Parsons had no notice of the time and place of settlement of the statement on motion for a new trial is not without merit. They proposed amendments to the proposed statement, and the record fails to show that the said amendments were not all adopted. If so, no harm could have resulted from want of notice. It further appears that they had notice, for they appeared and filed objections to the statement being settled and signed by the judge, for the reason that plaintiff had not used diligence in "presenting, obtaining the settlement of, engrossing, or filing the said statement." These objections were heard and argued in court on the 11th day of May, 1898, and the statement was not settled and allowed until the 24th of May, 1898. If defendants had any valid objections to the settlement of the statement, they should have presented them all at the same time. The order is reversed.

GRADE et al. v. MARIPOSA COUNTY.

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 28, 1901.)
TAXATION—NEGLECT TO FILE STATEMENT—ARBITRARY ASSESSMENT.

In an action to recover taxes paid by plaintiff under protest, findings that plaintiff forwarded its statement of taxes to the assessor by mail, properly addressed, but that the assessor never received the statement so forwarded, show that plaintiff "neglected" to furnish to the assessor the statement of property subject to taxation, under Pol. Code, § 3629, providing for an arbitrary assessment where taxpayer "neglects or refuses" to furnish such statement; the prima facie presumption that a letter mailed was received, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, being overcome by direct evidence of the assessor that he never received it.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Mariposa county; John M. Corcoran, Judge.

Action by W. A. Grade and others against the county of Mariposa. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

J. J. Trabucco, Dist. Atty., for appellants.
J. B. Curtin, for respondents.

GAROUTTE, J. This action was brought to recover taxes paid by plaintiffs under protest. The county of Mariposa appeals from the judgment rendered. These taxes were paid upon an arbitrary assessment made by the assessor, and it is conceded by plaintiffs that the only point involved in this appeal rests upon the fact as to whether or not they neglected or refused to furnish the assessor the statement of real and personal property provided for by section 3629, Pol. Code. The findings of fact made by the trial court upon the point involved are directly in line with the evidence, and are to the effect that plaintiffs, by their attorney, who lived in an adjoining county, forwarded the statement to the assessor of Mariposa county by United States mail, properly addressed, with postage paid, but that said assessor never received the statement so forwarded. Upon these facts we are clear that plaintiffs neglected to furnish to the assessor the statement required by law. While section 1963 of the Code of Civil Procedure declares the presumption to be "that a letter duly directed and mailed was received in the regular course of the mail," still that presumption is one of fact, and not conclusive, but disputable. When the statement was forwarded, as indicated by the finding, a prima facie case of compliance with the law was made out. But it was only prima facie, and was completely overthrown by the evidence of the assessor to the effect that he never received it. Plaintiffs' acts, coupled with the presumption of fact declared by the law, in the absence of other evidence, would justify a finding in their favor. But here the court cannot indulge in the presumption that the statement was received, for the finding is directly to the contrary. If the assessor did not receive the statement, then plaintiffs neglected to furnish it. It necessarily follows from these views that plaintiffs neglected to furnish the statement demanded by the statute, and for that reason it was the duty of the assessor, under the law, to enter an arbitrary assessment against them. For the foregoing reasons, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

SISKIYOU COUNTY BANK v. HOYT et al.

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 28, 1901.)
ACTIONS—FAILURE TO PROSECUTE—DISMISSAL—APPEARANCE—SUFFICIENCY—ORAL STATEMENTS.

1. Code Civ. Proc. § 581, subd. 7, as amended in 1897, declares that an action shall be dismissed unless the summons be served within three years from the commencement of the action, but that all actions may be prosecuted if appearance be made by defendant within three years, the same as if summons had been served; and section 1014 declares that a defendant appears when he answers, demurs, or gives written notice of his appearance. Held, that where a summons was not served within three years from the commencement of the action, but before the expiration of the three years defendant had stated plaintiff need not serve any papers, as it could take judgment in the case at any time, the action was properly dismissed; the statements of defendant not amounting to an appearance, nor to a power of attorney to confess judgment.

tion, but that an appearance within three years shall waive the failure to serve the summons. Held, that where, in a suit to foreclose a mortgage, there was no service of summons nor appearance by the mortgagor for three years, the fact that a junior mortgagee appeared by demurring to the complaint within the three years did not prevent the dismissal of the action; the mortgagee not being prejudiced by the dismissal of the action as to said defendant, and not complaining.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Siskiyou county; J. S. Beard, Judge.

Suit by the Siskiyou County Bank against Perry Hoyt and others. From a judgment dismissing the action, and from an order denying plaintiff's motion to vacate the judgment of dismissal, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Gillis & Tapscott, for appellant. Warren & Taylor and Wm. B. Haskell, for respondents.

HAYNES, C. Appeal from an order and judgment dismissing the action, and from an order denying appellant's motion to vacate the judgment of dismissal. Appellant, the Siskiyou County Bank, commenced an action against Perry Hoyt and Elizabeth Hoyt on October 5, 1895, to foreclose a mortgage executed by them to the bank on October 6, 1891. A summons was issued one day before the expiration of a year after the filing of the complaint, but the summons not having been served within three years after the commencement of the action, and no appearance having been made, Elizabeth Hoyt, one of the defendants, moved the court to dismiss the action. After the notice of motion to dismiss was served, but before it was heard, the summons was served on respondent, the service being made on April 26, 1900. The motion was heard April 28th, and judgment dismissing the action was entered May 4, 1900. Appellant filed a very long affidavit in opposition to the motion, showing the origin of the debt, and most unusual indulgence to respondents; that the delay and failure to serve the summons was at their earnest solicitation; that before the expiration of the time limited by the statute for the service of the summons the propriety of serving it was suggested by the bank, but at the solicitation of respondents it was not served, "as they then stated that the bank need not serve any further papers upon them; that it could at any time take judgment in said case."

Subdivision 7, § 581, Code Civ. Proc., as amended in 1897, is as follows: "(7) And no action heretofore or hereafter commenced shall be further prosecuted, and no further proceedings shall be had therein, and all actions heretofore or hereafter commenced shall be dismissed by the court in which the same shall have been commenced, on its own motion, or on motion of any party interested therein, whether named in the complaint as a party or not, unless summons shall have been issued within one year; and all such actions shall be in like manner dismissed, unless the summons shall be served and return thereon made within three years after the commencement of said action. But all such actions may be prosecuted if appearance has been made by the defendant or defendants within said three years, in the same manner as if summons had been issued and served." St. 1897, p. 98. This subdivision, as originally enacted in 1889, was substantially the same. St. 1889, p. 398.

The verbal authority to enter judgment, above recited, was not an appearance in the action, nor a power of attorney to confess judgment. It could not take the place of an answer upon the judgment roll, so as to dispense with the summons and return as part thereof. Section 406, Code Civ. Proc., provides that, "at any time within the year after complaint is filed, the defendant may, in writing, or by appearing and answering, waive the issuing of summons"; and section 1014 provides that "a defendant appears in an action when he answers, demurs, or gives the plaintiff written notice of his appearance, or when an attorney gives notice of appearance for him." Cooper v. Gordon, 125 Cal. 296, 57 Pac. 1006, cited by appellant, does not sustain its contention. In that case there were repeated stipulations in writing that the plaintiff could have judgment entered at any time for a sum stated. This was held to be an appearance to the action, and, when filed, became an answer admitting the cause of action alleged. It should also be noticed that in that case the first stipulation was made the next day after suit was commenced. In Modoc Land & Live-Stock Co. v. Superior Court of Modoc Co., 128 Cal. 255, 60 Pac. 848, the summons was issued in due time, and served by the sheriff within the time limited by section 581, Code Civ. Proc., and with his return indorsed thereon was delivered to plaintiff's counsel before the expiration of three years after the commencement of the action, but it was not delivered to the clerk or filed until a few days after the expiration of the time limited by the statute for the service and return. It was held that the court below had no jurisdiction to proceed with the cause, and a peremptory writ of prohibition was granted. In White v. Superior Court, 126 Cal. 245, 58 Pac. 450, the superior court was prohibited from issuing an alias summons. This case also furnishes a reply to appellant's contention that respondents are estopped by their promises and urgent solicitations from asking a dismissal of the action. "From a moral point of view," the court said, speaking of petitioner's conduct, "it is wholly indefensible. * * * But it remains true that he is only claiming what the law commands, and his case is no worse than that of any debtor who pleads the statute of limitations against a just demand." The action of the court in this case in dismissal of the action is also conclusively sustained by Vrooman v. Li Po Tai, 113 Cal. 302, 45 Pac. 470, and Peck v. Agnew, 126 Cal.

607, 59 Pac. 125. It appears from the record that before the dismissal of the action one of the several other defendants, namely, the Bank of Sonoma County, filed a demurrer to the complaint, and thereby entered an appearance. The only allegation of the complaint as to the Bank of Sonoma County is that it has or claims some interest in the mortgaged premises, but that it is subsequent and inferior to plaintiff's lien. While an action ought not to be dismissed as against a defendant who has appeared, and would be prejudiced by a dismissal (Peck v. Agnew, 126 Cal. 607, 59 Pac. 125), appellant is not prejudiced by the dismissal of the action as to said defendant, and it is not complaining. The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, C.; SMITH, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

MORTGAGES—ASSIGNMENT—SUIT BY ASSIGNEE —OBJECTION—WAIVER—ATTORNEY'S FEES.

1. A mortgagee assigned the notes and mortgage, and authorized the assignees to collect the mortgage debt, and provided that they should hold the proceeds in trust. Held, that it was not necessary for the assignees to set up in their complaint to foreclose the mortgage the facts creating the trust in order to sue in their own names.

2. Where defendant went to trial without objecting that the complaint did not present the issue of plaintiff's right to recover attorney's fees, the complaint, though inartificially drawn in that respect, must be considered sufficient, after verdict, to present the issue.

3. Where a mortgage stipulated that on default the mortgagee might foreclose, and include in said foreclosure a reasonable counsel fee, it was error to include the amount recovered as attorney's fees in the mortgage lien, since as to them plaintiff was only entitled to a personal judgment.

HARRISON, J. Action for the foreclosure of a mortgage. The appellants executed a mortgage upon certain real property to secure the payment of certain promissory notes, which were set forth therein, and thereafter the mortgagee executed to the plaintiffs herein an instrument by which he assigned to them "those certain mortgages and credits more particularly described as follows, to wit: * * * Also a mortgage from O. H. Jones, dated October 24, 1892, there being now due thereunder about $630 and interest from that date till the present time at the rate of ten per cent. per annum; also all other moneys now due to me from any source whatever,—said mortgages and debts or credits to be collected, and the proceeds to be held in trust" (naming the purposes of the trust, and giving directions to the trustees). Judgment was rendered herein in favor of the plaintiffs for the amount due upon the promissory note, and a foreclosure and sale of the mortgaged lands. The defendants have appealed therefrom and from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

The appellants urge in support of their appeal that as, under the assignment, the plaintiffs are made the trustees of an express trust, they could bring the action only in their representative capacity, and should have set up in their complaint the facts creating the trust, and were not entitled to a judgment in favor of themselves individually. Their contention in this respect cannot, however, be sustained. By the terms of the assignment the mortgages and debts were transferred to the plaintiffs, "to be collected, and the proceeds to be held in trust." The legal title thereto was, therefore, vested in the plaintiffs, and the beneficiaries under the trust had no interest except in the proceeds of the collection. A payment by the defendants to the plaintiffs without suit would have exonerated them from all liability to the beneficiaries, and they will be equally exonerated by a satisfaction of the judgment herein. "A trustee to whom a chose in action has been transferred for collection is, in contemplation of law, so far the owner that he may sue on it in his own name." Toby v. Railroad Co., 98 Cal. 497, 33 Pac. 550. Where the legal title to the property is vested in the trustee, it is unnecessary to state in his complaint the facts by which he acquired it. Dambmann v. White, 48 Cal. 439; Giselman v. Starr, 106 Cal. 651, 40 Pac. 8; Bliss, Code Pl. § 262; Pom. Code Rem. § 132. The evidence was sufficient to justify the finding of the court that the note and mortgage had been assigned to the plaintiffs, and that the payment of the note was secured by the mortgage.

The court erred, however, in holding that the payment of the attorney's fees allowed for the foreclosure is secured by the mortgage. The clause in the mortgage relating thereto is identical with that presented in Klokke v. Escaiblier, 124 Cal. 297, 56 Pac. 1113, wherein it was held that under this clause the mortgage secured only the payments therein specified, and did not extend to the attorney's fees. The complaint, as amended, sufficiently presented an issue upon the right of the plaintiff to recover attorney's fees, and the amount thereof, although it is somewhat inartificial, and, if demurred to, might have been subjected to amendment; but, as the parties have tried the cause without any objection of this nature, it must be held, "after verdict," that the issue was sufficiently presented. The court should, however, have limited their recovery to a personal judgment against the appellants. For this error the cause is remanded to the superior court, with directions to modify its judgment by excluding from the amount for the payment of which the mortgaged lands shall be sold the sum allowed for attorney's fees, and including that sum in the amount for which a personal judgment shall be entered against the defendants, and, as so modified, the judgment and the order denying a new trial will stand affirmed.

SHERIFFS AND CONSTABLES—LIABILITY FOR FAILURE TO EXECUTE WRIT OF ATTACHMENT—BOND TO FORMER SHERIFF—JUSTIFICATION—STATUTES.

In 1894 plaintiff secured an attachment, and delivered it to the sheriff to levy, but the sheriff accepted a bond from the debtor, and did not make the levy. In 1897, while the action was pending, after an appeal and reversal, wherein an appeal bond had been filed, plaintiff secured another writ, and delivered it to the defendant, who was then the sheriff, but defendant refused to make the levy. The debtor became insolvent before rendition of judgment, and plaintiff was unable to collect the entire amount of his claim on the attachment bond given to the former sheriff. Code Civ. Proc. § 671, provides that a judgment or lien by attachment ceases on the execution of an appeal bond on appeal from the judgment. Held, in an action for failure to levy the second writ, that the debtor's bond given to prevent levy under the first writ was not superseded or destroyed by the execution of the appeal bond, and hence the defendant was justified in refusing to make the levy, under Code Civ. Proc. § 540, requiring the sheriff to attach property under a writ unless the debtor gave him security in an amount equal to the value of the property to be attached.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Waldo M. York, Judge.

Action by E. S. Ayers against John Burr, sheriff, and others. From a judgment in favor of the plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

D. P. Hatch, for appellants. J. L. Murphy (N. C. Burch, of counsel), for appellee.

PER CURIAM. Action by plaintiff against the sheriff of Los Angeles county and his official bondsmen for neglect of duty in refusing to serve a writ of attachment in an action by the present plaintiff against one Thomas. Plaintiff had judgment, from which defendants appeal.

In the action (Ayres v. Thomas, 47 Pac. 1013), which was commenced October 24, 1894, a writ of attachment was duly issued by the clerk on proper affidavit. To prevent the service of the writ, Thomas gave a bond on October 25, 1894, with two sureties, as provided in section 540, Code Civ. Proc. This bond was in the usual form, reciting the pendency of the action, issuance of a writ of attachment, etc., and provided that the undersigned, "in consideration of the premises, and to prevent the levy of said attachment, do hereby jointly and severally undertake * * * and promise to the effect that, if the plaintiff shall recover judgment in said action, we will pay to the plaintiff upon demand the amount of said judgment," etc.; and the court found that the sheriff "accepted said undertaking, and returned said writ of attachment unserved, except by the taking of said undertaking, and that he proceeded no further." It was further found that thereafter Ayres obtained judgment against Thomas, who appealed to this court, giving the statutory stay bond; the judgment was reversed here, and the cause remanded for a new trial; that thereafter, and while the action was pending in the lower court, and before its determination, to wit, on September 7, 1897, plaintiff moved the court to require defendant Thomas to give a new undertaking in place of the former bond given to prevent an attachment, on the ground that the sureties on the former bond were insufficient, and on September 14, 1897, the court denied the motion "upon the ground that there was no provision of law authorizing the giving of new sureties or a new bond in such a case"; that on September 15, 1897, plaintiff filed an affidavit for an attachment and an undertaking with the clerk of the court in due form, who thereupon "duly and regularly issued a writ of attachment in said cause, * * * and delivered the same to the defendant John Burr," the then sheriff, "and that said sheriff was directed by said writ to attach and safely keep all the property of said Thomas"; that defendant Thomas then had sufficient property on which levy could have been made; "that the sheriff refused to serve the writ, and returned the same unserved, * * * and in said return assigned as the reason for his failure to attach and safely keep the property of said defendant that said defendant had given to John C. Cline, his predecessor in the office of the sheriff of said county, an undertaking to prevent attachment." The court also found that on September 15, 1897, and prior thereto, one of the sureties on said last-mentioned bond had become insolvent, and the other surety had but $1,000, which could be reached by execution, but said sureties were solvent when the bond was given; that plaintiff obtained judgment against Thomas November 5, 1897, from which no appeal was taken; and that at that time Thomas had become insolvent, and plaintiff was unable to enforce his judgment against either Thomas or the said sureties except as to the $1,000 enforceable against one of said sureties, and except as to $50 collected from Thomas. As conclusions of law the court found that the writ of attachment delivered to the sheriff September 15, 1897, was good and valid, and that it was the duty of the sheriff, Burr, to serve the same, and that he and his bondsmen are liable for the failure of Sheriff Burr to execute the said writ.

There is a finding, numbered 13, to the effect that when the second writ was placed in the hands of the sheriff he did not know of the insolvency of the sureties on the bond given to prevent attachment, and also that no application was ever made to the court for the second writ, issued September 15. This finding was made and filed June 2, 1899, and the findings in the case were signed by the court, and judgment entered thereon May 27, 1899. This finding cannot be considered. Los Angeles Co. v. Lankershim, 100 Cal. 525, 35 Pac. 153, 556. The stipulation is not sufficient to warrant our holding that both parties agreed that it should be treated as part of the findings in the case. The stipulation merely amounts to an agreement that the court made the finding, and that it forms part of the record. We have found no statutory provision expressly governing the case in hand. Nowhere is there any express provision as to the effect of the appeal and the giving of a stay bond on the bond given to prevent the service of the attachment. Section 671, Code Civ. Proc., speaking of the lien of the judgment, provides, among other things: "The lien continues for five years, unless the enforcement of the judgment be stayed on appeal by the execution of a sufficient undertaking as provided in this Code, in which case the lien of the judgment and any lien by virtue of an attachment that has been issued and levied in the action ceases." Section 942, Code Civ. Proc., provides for the giving of a stay bond, the condition of which is that, "if the judgment * * * be affirmed, * * * the appellant will pay the amount directed to be paid by the judgment," etc. Appellants' contention is that the stay bond had no effect whatever on the bond given to prevent attachment; that this latter bond is an express contract to pay any judgment that may be recovered by Ayres against Thomas, provided Ayres will not take Thomas' property under writ of attachment; that the judgment referred to in the section is the final judgment in the case, regardless of any appeal that may be taken in the course of the litigation. As to section 671, appellants' position is that there never was any lien by attachment. A bond was given to prevent attachment, and this, of course, means that the bond was given before any levy was made, and therefore there was no lien, and the section does not apply. It is urged that the just and consistent position is that the bond given to prevent attachment is not destroyed by the appeal; that the statute (section 671) cannot be extended beyond its terms, which do not include the bond in question.

Appellants' second proposition is that the sheriff had a right to refuse to execute the second writ, because in his office was record evidence of the fact that a bond had been given, as required by statute, to prevent an attachment, and that, so far as he knew, the bond was good, and in full force. Respondent contends that it is immaterial whether or not the stay bond on appeal had the effect to destroy the bond given to prevent attachment. His position is that the second writ, as it came to the sheriff, was regular on its face; that plaintiff had a right to have it issue, and, if not, the sheriff could not question plaintiff's right to it; that, admitting there was in his office the bond given to his predecessor, it was the latter's personal property, and did not protect his successor in office. Respondent relies on section 4187, Pol. Code, which provides as follows: "A sheriff or other ministerial officer is justified in the execution of, and must execute all process and orders regular on their face and issued by competent authority, whatever may be the defect in the proceeding upon which they were issued." We think that the bond given to prevent the attachment was not destroyed or affected by the appeal. This bond was not given alone as personal protection to the sheriff, but was given for the benefit of the parties to the action,—as to the defendant Thomas, to protect his property from attachment; and as to the plaintiff as security for the payment of the judgment that might be finally rendered in the case. Pending the appeal it could not be enforced; but we cannot see that, because the statute provides that execution is stayed on the judgment, and that certain mentioned liens existing at the time the appeal is taken cease, it must follow that the bond given to prevent attachment should be disturbed. Certainly, the statute does not so provide, and we cannot add to its terms. It is true that the sheriff is required to serve all writs and other process coming to him which are regular on their face, as claimed by respondent, and he would ordinarily find complete justification for making service in the section of the Political Code above cited. But, if it be conceded that the clerk had authority to issue the second writ of attachment, the sheriff cannot be held liable for refusing to execute it if he was justified under the attachment law in doing so. Section 537, Code Civ. Proc., provides that "the plaintiff, at the time of issuing the summons, or at any time afterward, may have the property of the defendant attached, for the satisfaction of any judgment that may be recovered, unless the defendant give security to pay such judgment, as in this chapter provided." Section 538, Code Civ. Proc., provides that "the clerk of the court must issue the writ of attachment, upon receiving an affidavit" setting forth certain facts. Section 540, Code Civ. Proc., provides that "the writ must be directed to the sheriff of any county in which property of such defendant may be, and must require him to attach property * * * unless the defendant give him security sufficient to satisfy such demand, beside costs, or in an amount equal to the value of the property which has been or is about to be attached; in which case to take such undertaking." The purpose of the bond is to prevent any attachment of defendant's property, and that object would be entirely thwarted if the sheriff were bound under the section of the Political Code to execute either the original writ or any other writ which the clerk might assume to issue at the instance of plaintiff. We do not see how plaintiff could have made the requisite affidavit when he took out the second writ, inasmuch as he had security by the bond given the sheriff. But, waiving that matter, the statute seems plainly to provide that the plaintiff may have the defendants' property attached "unless the defendant give security to pay such judgment," which means that he cannot have the property attached if the security be given. The bond to prevent the attachment was the required security. The statute may be defective in not providing for such a situation as we have here, but the remedy is with the legislature, and not with the courts. Proceedings by attachment are of statutory creation purely, and the statute is to be strictly construed. In our opinion, the sheriff was justified in refusing to execute the writ, and hence neither is he nor are his bondsmen liable in this action. The judgment is reversed, with directions to dismiss the action.

(Supreme Court of California. March 1, 1901.)
CORPORATIONS — NOTES — RECORDS — AUTHORITY OF DIRECTORS — PRESUMPTION — EVIDENCE—RETAINING CONSIDERATION.

1. Where a note of a corporation is signed by the proper officers and sealed with the seal of the corporation, it is prima facie evidence of the authority of the officers, and of its due execution by them.

2. Where, in a suit on a note of a corporation, defendant claimed that it was not properly executed, because one of the directors was not notified and was not present at the meeting at which it was authorized, but the resolution of the board of directors showing the nature of the transaction in which the note was given, authorizing the same, was in evidence, and recited the absence of the director, in the absence of evidence to the contrary it would be presumed that proper notice was given.

3. In a suit on the note of a corporation, defendant claimed the same not to have been properly executed, in that at the meeting at which it was authorized one of the directors was not present, and was not notified thereof. It appeared from the record of the meeting that the director was absent, and one of the directors testified that on the day of the meeting the payee had agreed to loan a sum to the defendant, and that the meeting took place thereafter. Another witness testified that no opportunity was given the payee to notify any director, but it appeared that the absent director had a desk in the room adjoining where the meeting was held, and the parties had been engaged in negotiating the matter for four or five days. Held, that the evidence was not sufficient to overcome the presumption that the absent director was notified; there being no testimony on the part of the president or the absent director.

4. Under Civ. Code, § 2307, declaring that authority may be conferred by a subsequent ratification, a corporation retaining the consideration for a note is liable thereon, though at the meeting at which it was authorized a director was not present or notified; it appearing that he and the other directors owned all the stock, and that he must have subsequently had notice of the transaction.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by Edwin J. Mills against the Boyle Mining Company. There was judgment in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Naphtaly, Freidernich & Ackerman, for appellant. T. M. Osmont and F. J. French, for respondent.

SMITH, C. The suit was brought by the plaintiff, as assignee of Gonsales, to recover the sum of $14,066.91 and interest, alleged to be due on a promissory note made to the latter by the defendant. The answer denies the execution of the note, and also alleges a lack or failure of consideration to the extent of $4,000. The judgment was in favor of the plaintiff for the balance due on the note, after a rebate of something less than $4,000 allowed by the court. The appeal is from an order denying the defendant's motion for a new trial. The ground of the motion was alleged insufficiency of the evidence to justify the finding that the note was duly executed; the specific objection being that one of the directors was not present at the meeting at which the note was authorized, or notified of the meeting. The finding on this point was, I think, justified by the evidence. The note, signed by the proper officers, and with the seal of the corporation attached, was itself prima facie evidence of the authority of the officers, and of its due execution by them. Underhill v. Improvement Co., 93 Cal. 314, 28 Pac. 1049; Burnett v. Lyford, 93 Cal. 117, 28 Pac. 855; Lighter Co. v. Simpson, 77 Cal. 290, 19 Pac. 426; Schallard v. Navigation Co., 70 Cal. 146, 11 Pac. 590. The resolution of the board of directors, showing the nature of the transaction and authorizing the execution of the note, was also in evidence. In this, indeed, the absence of one of the directors (Mr. Barney) is recited; but, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, it will be presumed that proper notice was given. Investment Co. v. Woodworth, 124 Cal. 172, 56 Pac. 891, and cases cited. The evidence introduced by the defendant to overcome this presumption was by no means conclusive. Boyle, one of the directors, testified that on the day of the meeting Gonsales had agreed to loan $4,000 to the defendant, and that the meeting took place immediately thereafter, only a few minutes intervening. And Osborne, Jr., testified to the same effect, and also that "no opportunity was given to Mr. Gonsales to notify any director." But non constat that Barney, who had a desk in the president's room, which adjoined the room where the meeting was held, was not then notified by the president, or that previous notice had not been given either by the president or Gonsales. Boyle's testimony would, indeed, seem to imply that the meeting was determined on only upon the agreement of Gonsales to make the loan. But the parties had been engaged in negotiating this and other matters for four or five days, and the meeting during all this period was in contemplation; for on another occasion, at which Osborne, Sr., the president, was present, Gonsales agreed to loan the money, and Osborne said he would call a meeting. The testimony of Boyle and Osborne, Jr., does not negative the presumption of notice; and in the absence of testimony from Osborne, Sr., and from Barney himself, who of all men was most competent to speak on the subject, the court was right in disregarding it, or at least we cannot say it was wrong.

There are other grounds, also, on which the decision of the court must be upheld. The consideration for the note, including the $4,000 borrowed at the time, was received by the defendant. The directors conducting the business were the owners of all the stock of the corporation, except possibly one share transferred to Barney to qualify him as director. Under these circumstances, the point is made that his presence was unnecessary, and that his absence did not affect the validity of the action of the board. But, without passing on this question, it is to be presumed, from the fact that the transaction appears fully in the books of the corporation, that Barney subsequently acquired notice of it. The case is then presented of a corporation receiving and retaining the consideration of a contract, with full knowledge on the part of all interested, which must operate as a ratification of the authority of its agents. Civ. Code, § 2307; Phillips v. Lumber Co. (Cal.) 62 Pac. 749. The order appealed from should therefore be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C; GRAY, C.

him interest on the amount from the time of its appropriation to his final settlement, since prior to such settlement he had no right to commissions.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Sonoma county; S. K. Dougherty, Judge.

Final settlement of the accounts of James Taylor Rogers and one Hardin as executors of the estate of J. W. Carter, deceased. From an order dividing the commissions equally between the executors, James Taylor Rogers appeals. Affirmed.

Thomas Rutledge, for appellant. Schlotterback & Lea, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This appeal is taken by the executor from an order settling his account. He was a joint executor with one Hardin, and upon the settlement of their final account he was allowed one-half of the commissions to which executors are entitled by the law. He now claims that he did nearly all of the work in the administration of the estate, and for that reason was entitled to a greater share of commissions than his co-executor. Some four years prior to the settlement of the final account he appropriated about $1,000 of the money of the estate, claiming it to be his commissions as executor. Upon the settlement of his accounts the trial court charged him interest upon this amount. This action of the trial court is also alleged to be error.

The appellant's first claim is to the effect that he had a contract with his co-executor and the devisees whereby he was to receive all the commissions allowed to the executors. There is some evidence upon both sides of this claim, but the court holds the matter to be one of no importance. What particular contracts may have been entered into between these parties as to the apportionment of the executors' commissions is a matter which should be heard in another forum. The hearing of a final account by the probate department of the court is not the place to settle disputes of this character. These parties are not entitled to litigate a question of that kind upon the hearing of the settlement of a final account. The existence of that character of contract, or its validity after being made, are matters of no interest to the estate, and must be heard and determined at some other time, and in some other proceeding. While the commissions of the co-executors need not necessarily be equal (Hope v. Jones, 24 Cal. 89), still it would only be in exceptional cases that this court would disturb the decision of the probate court in matters of this character. The law declares the commissions should be apportioned to each executor in proportion to the labor he has performed, and in the present case this apportionment is based upon an implied finding of fact which the court will not disturb. The apportionment made inferentially declares as a fact that there was no substantial difference in the amount of services performed by each of these two executors, and the evidence is fairly conflicting upon that point.

The executor was properly charged with interest upon the sum he appropriated as his commissions. He was not entitled to his commissions until the settlement of his final account. In re Rose's Estate, 80 Cal. 180, 22 Pac. 86. This money belonging to the estate was appropriated by him to his own use, and under these circumstances he was properly charged with interest upon the amount. For the foregoing reasons the order and decree are affirmed.

COSTS—REPORTER'S FEES—ORDER OF COURT —VERIFIED MEMORANDUM—PRESUMPTION.

1. Where an item is included in the verified memorandum of costs, properly filed, it is prima facie correct, and the burden is upon one disputing its correctness to show that it was improper.

2. Where an item of costs was included in the verified memorandum of costs filed by interveners, and defendants moved to strike it out on the ground that it was for transcribing the evidence for the use of interveners, and that no order was ever made authorizing the same, and on appeal from an order denying the motion it appeared that only one copy of the evidence was ordered, and it did not appear from the record that the item was not for such copy, and there was nothing to show that the charge was for testimony for interveners without an order, the presumption that the order, being included in the verified memorandum, was correct, was not overcome.

3. Where costs for transcribing the evidence were incurred under an order of the court, the fact that it afterwards appeared that the judge was not qualified to try the cause did not render the costs an improper charge.

Action by Albert Meyer against the city of San Diego and others, R. Nicholls and others intervening. From an order denying a motion to strike a certain sum from an item of interveners' memorandum of costs, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

See 53 Pac. 434, 1128; 62 Pac. 211.

H. E. Doolittle, for appellants. Works & Works, for appellee.

PER CURIAM. In the memorandum of costs filed by interveners is the item, "To reporter's fees, $114.87." Defendants made a motion to strike from this item $92.37 upon the ground that the amount was for reporter's fees for transcribing the evidence for the use of interveners, and that no order was ever made by the court authorizing the evidence to be transcribed. The court made an order denying the motion, and this appeal is from the order. It is conceded that, if the transcript was ordered by the court, the item was a proper charge. Being included in the verified memorandum of costs, properly filed, it is prima facie correct; and the burden is upon the moving party to show that the charge is not a legal and proper one. In support of their motion, appellants offered the affidavit of their attorney, which stated that the amount was paid the "reporter for transcribing the evidence taken in the said case upon the trial thereof * * * for the use of said interveners." In the bill of exceptions it appears that the attorneys all desired the evidence transcribed by the reporter, and, after some conversation as to how the costs should be apportioned, the judge of the court remarked, "Yes, the testimony will have to be transcribed." Thereupon the attorney for appellants, addressing the court, said, "If the court please, I would like to know for my own satisfaction exactly what is going to be included in this item of costs." The judge answered, "The reporter's fees and the transcript." The attorney for appellants said, "And the transcript of the evidence?" The judge answered: "Yes, sir. I will order one transcript. The court must have a transcript of this evidence." The above is all that appears to have been said by the judge of the court as to ordering the evidence transcribed. It appears from the conversation of counsel at the time the order was made that it was understood that only one copy was ordered by the judge. It does not clearly appear from the record that only one copy was ordered, but, conceding that the order was for one copy only, it does not appear that the item was not for such copy. There is not a word in the affidavit or the bill of exceptions to show or tending to show that the charge was for testimony transcribed for interveners without any order of court. If such was the case, the appellants should have made it clearly appear. The presumption in the lower court was in favor of the memorandum as filed. The presumption here is in favor of the order of the lower court. It is urged by appellants that the order for transcribing the notes was made by Judge Torrance, and that this court afterwards held that he was not qualified to try the case, and hence the order was void, and the item thereof not a proper charge. If this were a valid reason for rejecting the item, appellants could have availed themselves of it as to the reporter's per diem witness fees and other items in the cost bill. If costs are incurred in good faith, they are none the less a proper charge because the judge is afterwards found to be disqualified. The party who recovers is not to lose costs that he necessarily incurred because they were incurred under a void order. The judge at the time thought he was qualified to try the case. It was contended by appellants that he was qualified, and only after a trial and appeal to this court was it determined as a matter of law that he was disqualified. Costs are often incurred in the trial of cases where the jury disagrees, or in which a new trial is granted, or the verdict set aside as being void for some reason; in all of which cases the prevailing party recovers his costs finally. Witnesses are often procured at heavy expense, and their testimony, for some reason, is not needed, or becomes immaterial, yet the party who is put to the expense, and incurs it in good faith, may recover it as part of his costs. The order is affirmed.

VENDOR AND PURCHASER—WATER POWER—
SALE—REPRESENTATION—OPINION.

1. The vendor of a water power stated to the purchaser that by putting in new appliances a certain horse power could be developed, but he said nothing as to the amount of water in the stream. Plaintiff contended that, the amount of water in the stream being less than the amount which, by mathematical calculation, would give the horse power stated by defendant, he had misrepresented the amount of water. Held, that defendant referred not to the theoretical horse power, but to the efficient, the amount of which depends on the apparatus employed, and hence there was no misrepresentation.

2. Where the vendor of a water power stated that a certain horse power could be developed from the stream, and the amount of water was in fact less than that given by a mathematical calculation based on the horse power stated by defendant, and the purchaser sued to cancel notes given in the purchase on the ground that defendant had misrepresented the amount of water, a nonsuit was proper, since plaintiff should have made his own calculation, it not appearing that defendant pretended to be an hydraulic expert.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by Charles R. Lloyd against Peter Kehl and others. From a judgment in favor of defendants, and from an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. S. Goodfellow and Myrick & Deering, for appellant. Page, McCutchen, Harding & Knight, for respondents.

McFARLAND, J. This action was brought to recover judgment for the cancellation of certain promissory notes made by plaintiff to defendant Kehl, and for the delivery by said defendant to plaintiff of certain shares of stock given to secure said notes, and for damages for certain alleged wrongs. The action is founded on alleged false representations made to plaintiff by defendant Kehl as to certain water rights sold to the latter by the former, the sale being the consideration of the notes. The answer denies the material averments of the complaint, and in a cross complaint Kehl prays judgment against plaintiff for the amount due on the notes. The court below granted a nonsuit, and instructed the jury to find a verdict for defendant for the amount of the notes, and judgment was entered accordingly. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment and from an order of the court denying a new trial. The above rulings were upon the ground that the misrepresentations relied on were of mere matters of opinion, and not of facts; were mere speculations as to what might be developed in the future, as to which the means of knowledge were open to the plaintiff. If the court was right in these views, the nonsuit and the instruction to find for the defendant were both correct; and the question thus presented is the only one discussed by counsel, and the only one that need be considered.

The main features of the case are these: On and long prior to September 2, 1892, respondent Kehl was and has been the owner of the right to the use of the water of a natural stream called "Warm Creek," which he had used through a ditch to operate a flour mill. On that day Kehl entered into a written agreement with the plaintiff, Lloyd, and one Cartwright, in which it was recited that the parties were desirous of incorporating an electric company for the purpose of furnishing electricity to the city of San Bernardino, and that Lloyd and Cartwright were desirous of purchasing the said water rights (together with certain other property) for the purposes of the said electric company; and it was covenanted that Kehl should sell to Lloyd and Cartwright all of the water rights for $20,000; $5,000 to be taken in stock of said company, and three payments of $5,000 each, to be made in one, two, and three years. It is averred in the complaint that at the time this contract was made Kehl represented that power could be furnished by said water to the extent of 65 effective horse power; that, after the electric works had been partly constructed, it was discovered that said representation was false, and that not more than 45 horse power could be supplied; that plaintiff then refused to pay any part of said $15,000 to be paid in money, and Kehl brought suit to recover the first payment; that a compromise was then effected, and a new contract was made on March 3, 1894, between Kehl, party of the first part, Lloyd, party of the second part, and the electric company, which had been incorporated, as contemplated, as party of the third part; Cartwright having dropped out of the business. By this contract the former contract of September 2, 1892, was modified in several particulars, the most important one being that Kehl should take his pay for the water rights in a certain amount of the stock of the electric company, and a certain note or bond of a corporation called the Riverside Water Company. It is averred that the plaintiff was induced to enter into this contract by a false representation of Kehl that there was a certain amount of water in said stream. It was also averred that afterwards, on April 18, 1895, another contract was made between

Kehl and appellant by which Kehl surrendered his stock in the electric company, and appellant gave him, instead thereof, his four promissory notes, which are the subjects of this action. It is averred in the complaint that plaintiff was induced to make each of these contracts by false representations of respondent Kehl as to the water rights; so that between September 2, 1892, and April 19, 1895, appellant, according to his claim, was decoyed three times into purchasing rights by false representations concerning them made by respondent Kehl. There is no evidence, and no contention by appellant, that Kehl made any false representations as to the amount of water flowing in Warm creek. In his opening brief, appellant says: "There was no evidence to sustain the allegations of the complaint that defendant had represented the quantity of water in Warm creek to be twenty-five hundred miners' inches, or any other measured quantity. The representations proven were as to the amount of horse power." The representations relied on can be fairly presented by a few quotations from the testimony of appellant's three main witnesses, Porter, Cartwright, and appellant himself. Before the making of the first contract of September 2, 1892, Porter went from San Bernardino to San Francisco at the instance, as he says, of Kehl, and made to Lloyd and Cartwright the representations which he says Kehl had made to him. These representations were, in the language of Porter, as follows: "Mr. Kehl told me that there was a forty-five horse power there developed, and by deepening the tail-race and the wheel pit there would be sixty-five horse power; and by building a flume and taking up all the horse power there was there, there would be 180 or 185 horse power. * * * These representations, which Mr. Kehl made to me, I made to Mr. Lloyd." Having stated that Lloyd and Cartwright agreed to go downtown and talk with Mr. Kehl about the matter, he says as follows: "These gentlemen did go to San Bernardino, and see Mr. Kehl. I think it was in the month of August, 1892. I was present in the conversations between Mr. Kehl and Mr. Lloyd in regard to this horse power, a number of times. My recollection is that Mr. Kehl made the same representations in regard to the water power to Mr. Lloyd that were made to me,—that they were reiterated in the conversations between himself and Mr. Lloyd." The witness further testified, referring to Lloyd's visit to San Bernardino in August, 1892, "I know that Mr. Lloyd saw the property down there,—the mill, the water, and the dam." Cartwright testified, as to the representations about the water power, as follows: "Mr. Porter represented that this power was capable of being developed to something like 175 horse power. That, as it stood at that time, it developed some 45 horse power, and could be increased to 65 horse power by some changes which he specified, and which I recollect were gone into before in the testimony given here." He also said: "I do not think the amount of water was discussed at any time. The whole proposition turned on the horse power. I was not familiar with measuring water at all, and I don't remember that it was talked of." The following extracts from the testimony of the appellant, Lloyd, fairly show what his testimony was as to the misrepresentations. "Mr. Porter did make representations to me as to the quantity of water power that was there, and as to the quantity of horse power that could be developed by the water that was there. He told me that there was at that time 45 horse power, and that we could probably make that out to run the city lights, which would be about 60 lights, in case that we got the contract; and that, if it was not enough, by digging a tail race, and lowering the turbine wheel, which Mr. Kehl had, we could get 65 horse power. I asked him if Mr. Kehl had told him so, and he said 'Yes.'" The witness also said: "Mr. Porter also said that if we wanted to increase the business by building a flume, at an expense, I think, of about $8,000 or $10,000, 180 or 185 horse power could be developed; anyway from 175 to 185 horse power. Mr. Kehl corroborated the statements to Mr. Porter. He said that there was a 45 horse power running there at that time. It was the same 45 horse power that I had myself used about 12 years ago. That by deepening the tail race and lowering the wheel pit, it could be made into a 65 horse power. It was part of the whole scheme to build this flume to increase the elevation of the water by building this flume to increase the fall of it, and to save the amount of water that went into the ground by seepage and evaporation. We were to build a cement ditch and a flume at a cost of probably $10,000. Mr. Kehl then said that the building of this ditch and flume would develop 175 horse power." He also said: "My chief cause of complaint against Mr. Kehl is that he misrepresented the amount of power that could be developed by that flume and the new wheel." Again, he says: "In these conversations had between Mr. Porter, Cartwright, Mr. Kehl, and myself, it was represented by Mr. Kehl that 175 horse power could be developed from the stream as it then stood by means of the flume and the new water wheel." He then testified that with the new flume, the new wheel, and other new appliances, not more than from 90 to 100 horse power was developed.

There is a great deal of other testimony relied on by respondent, to the effect that appellant had leased all of Kehl's water rights in the creek several years before the contract was made, and knew their character and extent; that he was perfectly familiar with the property before he entered into the first contract of 1892; and that before the making of the last contract of 1895 he had been informed by his agent at San Bernardino that the amount of horse power represented by Kehl could not be developed. There was also other evidence in the case, upon which the respondent makes other points, which we do not deem necessary to consider. The questions arising out of the distinction between representations of matters of opinion and representations of matters of fact have been very fully and learnedly argued by counsel on both sides. There is not much difficulty as to the general principles of law which govern these questions, and, instead of entering into a discussion as to these principles, we have thought it best to simply state the representations which were made in the case at bar, and to determine whether or not they are sufficient to sustain this action; and we are of the opinion that these representations are of mere matters of opinion, upon which appellant should not have relied, and that they do not sustain his present action. It is clear that there was no misrepresentation as to the amount of water running in the stream. The situation was simply this: Kehl, by means of a certain ditch, had been for years diverting to his mill the water of a certain stream with which both parties were familiar; and he said to appellant that, by building a new flume and ditch, and using a new wheel, and certain other new appliances, and thus increasing the fall, etc., there could be developed from the water in the stream—about the quantity of which there was no misrepresentation or misunderstanding—a certain amount of horse power. This was a mere speculative opinion, not actionable under the most extreme authorities to be found on this subject. Appellant introduced the expert witnesses, Cartwright and Bowie, who testified that, the quantity of water in the stream and its fall being given, the number of horse power which it will furnish can be calculated, and that, going backward, the horse power being given, the amount of water in the stream can be calculated; and upon this statement appellant seeks to base the colorable theory that, when Kehl mentioned the horse power that could be developed, he must be held to have stated with certainty the amount of water in the stream, and that the amount of water shown by such calculation was largely in excess of the actual water in the stream; ergo, he misrepresented the amount of water. Now, in the first place, the calculation of the experts was only of the theoretical horse power, not the efficient horse power. The "efficient" horse power was what Kehl was speaking of, and, to quote, for brevity, from respondent's brief, "the effective horse power depends upon the friction of the flume or of the pipe, its grade, the loss by seepage or evaporation, the efficiency of the water wheel, the way in which it is placed, the character of the discharge, and, as Mr. Cartwright himself said, 'a hundred and one other different things.'" In the second place, if this was a matter of pure mathematics, appellant should have relied on his own calculations, and not upon those of Kehl. There is no evidence that the latter pretended to be an hydraulic expert. And, lastly, there never was any question of the fact of the amount of water in any stream, nor any pretense that appellant was deceived as to that fact by any misrepresentation of Kehl. Under the evidence the nonsuit was properly granted. The above views cover substantially, we think, all the positions taken by appellant which need consideration. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

EJECTMENT — ADVERSE POSSESSION — EVIDENCE — SUFFICIENCY — SPECIFICATION OF ERRORS — PRELIMINARY QUESTION — FAILURE TO SHOW RELEVANCY — DEBTS OF DECEASED PERSON — SALE OF PROPERTY — PROBATE COURT — JURISDICTION — PETITION FOR SALE — SUFFICIENCY.

1. B. took possession of the lot in controversy in 1858, and it continued in possession of his successive grantees until 1874, when it was sold to plaintiff's intestate under a probate order, to pay debts of a subsequently deceased grantee. In 1874 defendant fenced the north part of the lot, but recognized plaintiff's title to the remainder, and defendant's possession subsequent to that date was not such as would affect plaintiff's ownership. Held, that the title of plaintiff's intestate deraigned from B.'s adverse possession was unimpeachable.

2. Where the record contained no specification of error to the effect that plaintiff's derangement of title in ejectment was defective because of an outstanding trust deed, error based on that ground will not be considered on appeal.

3. Defendant contended on appeal that plaintiff's derangement of title in ejectment was defective because of an outstanding trust deed executed by M. The record contained a recital that plaintiff introduced a reconveyance, wherein all the interest which had been conveyed by the deed of trust executed by M. was reconveyed. The date of the reconveyance was 18 years prior to the action of ejectment. Held, that the evidence did not show any outstanding title available against plaintiff at the time of the commencement of the action.

4. Where plaintiff in ejectment did not claim that a certain judgment affected defendant's title, and the judgment was not introduced in evidence, it was not error to exclude a satisfaction of the judgment, since there was no necessity of showing that the judgment was satisfied.

5. Defendant claimed property by adverse possession, and after showing that C., a brother of the witness, pastured a cow on the premises in controversy for 12 years, asked if the witness knew by whose permission C. kept his cow on the premises, but did not show what dates were covered by the 12 years referred to, or that the permission to pasture the cow was given by defendant, or by any one whose rights defendant claimed. Held, that the question was properly excluded, as defendant failed to show the relevancy of the offered testimony.

6. Defendant in ejectment claimed the property in controversy by adverse possession, and the court excluded the question whether witness ever heard C., who pastured a cow on the premises, say, while the witness and C. were on the premises, that C. kept the lot for himself, or was occupying it by permission of another. Subsequently the witness testified that he did not know that he was ever on the lot with C., and that he did not think he was. Held, that the exclusion of the question was not prejudicial to defendant, since it was merely preliminary, and the subsequent testimony of the witness showed that any further inquiry would not have developed anything favorable to defendant.

7. Where plaintiff in ejectment claimed title under a sale made by order of the probate court to pay the debts of a deceased person, the objection that the petition for the sale was defective, in that it failed to state the condition of the property, cannot be raised for the first time on appeal.

8. Code Civ. Proc. § 1543, provides that if the court is satisfied, after a full hearing on the petition to sell the property of a deceased person for the payment of debts, that a sale of the whole or some portion of the real estate is necessary, an order may be made to sell the whole or so much of it as the court shall adjudge necessary or beneficial. A petition for the sale of real estate to pay the debts of a deceased person alleged that a lot belonging to deceased on V. avenue was in the adverse possession of R., and that it was not advisable to offer it for sale, but that it was necessary to sell the greater portion of deceased's real estate to pay his debts, and concluded with a prayer for the sale of the whole of said real estate, or such parts thereof as the court should deem necessary, and that such further order be made as is meet in the premises. Held, that the probate court had jurisdiction, under the general prayer, to order a sale of the lot.

9. A petition for the sale of the property of a deceased person alleged that it was necessary to sell the greater portion of deceased's real estate, but that in view of the fact that his lot on V. avenue was in the adverse possession of another, which would affect its value, it would be advisable to sell the other property, and prayed that the whole of such real estate, other than the lot on V. avenue, or so much thereof as the court should deem necessary, be sold, and that such other and further order be made as is meet in the premises. Defendant, in ejectment for the lot on V. avenue, attacked plaintiff's title under the petition, on the ground that it showed on its face that it was to sell other real estate, and not the lot in question. Held, that the petition was sufficient to authorize a sale of the lot on V. avenue as against a collateral attack.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Charles W. Slack, Judge.

Action by Clara Baum, administratrix of the estate of Julius Baum, deceased, against Edward Roper and others. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

T. M. Osmont and John B. Mhoon, for appellants. Edward B. Taylor, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an action in ejectment. The case was tried before the court without a jury. The plaintiff had judgment, from which, and from an order denying them a new trial, the defendants appeal. The subject of the suit is a lot on the southeast corner of Turk street and Van Ness avenue, in the city of San Francisco, and fronting 50 feet on said avenue, and 109 feet on said street.

1. The appellants' first contention is to the effect that the evidence does not justify the finding of the court that the plaintiff was the owner of the lot in controversy. The title claimed by each of the parties depends, in part at least, upon adverse possession. The plaintiff claims that her deceased husband, Julius Baum (who was the original plaintiff in this suit), was the grantee of the lot in controversy at a probate sale in the matter of the estate of Robert Muhlendorff. The executor's deed to Baum under this sale bears date January 22, 1874. It is further claimed by plaintiff that the title of Muhlendorff had its origin in an adverse possession of one Beideman, beginning as early as 1858, and continued by him and successive grantees down to the time of the said conveyance to Baum. The evidence is claimed particularly to be insufficient in respect to this adverse possession. We have examined the evidence in this particular, and find that, while there is much conflict, yet the conclusion reached by the trial court in this respect is not without evidence to support it. Beideman's possession as early as 1858 is shown by the testimony of the witness McGlone, who worked for Beideman, and looked after his fences inclosing the land in controversy. Beideman had the lot, with other lands, inclosed with a fence when McGlone went to reside on the block, of which said lot was a part, in 1858. McGlone resided on that block, near the middle of it, in Beideman's house, for two and a half years thereafter, and testifies, in substance, that Beideman was in the occupation of the lot in controversy, and that it was within his inclosure, during that period. The witness P. D. Dunn moved to a place on Turk street just west of the lot in controversy in 1860, and lived there for 18 years thereafter. When he moved out there, the Beideman fences inclosed said lot. The testimony of several other witnesses tends strongly to show that these fences erected by Beideman were maintained and continued to inclose the said lot down to a date long after the said probate sale to Baum, and that there was no change in the fences from 1858 until after such sale. In 1874 or in 1876, or some time thereafter (the evidence being in conflict as to the date), a fence was run diagonally through the lot in controversy by defendant or under his direction, and since the erection of that fence he has claimed, as we understand the evidence, that portion of the lot to the north of this diagonal fence; but, treating the probate sale to Baum as valid (as we shall presently show it to be), the evidence as to possession of the premises subsequent thereto is not of a character to show title in defendant by adverse possession or in any way to affect the finding as to ownership. We deem it unnecessary to quote at length the evidence on this question of adverse possession, or to attempt to analyze it to any extent. The record on appeal illustrates the wisdom of the rule which leaves the decision of questions of fact with the trial court, for from it we learn that the witnesses, in defining boundaries, showing the location of the lot in question, where fences were located, and in testifying as to the possession of the premises, used a map or maps in a way perfectly intelligible to the trial judge, no doubt, but from which we can derive no aid whatever, as the matter is presented in said record. So far as we can see, therefore, the court was warranted in the conclusion reached as to the adverse possession of Baum's predecessors, and, the probate sale to Baum being valid, the finding of title in him was justified.

2. Appellants contend that there is a fatal flaw in plaintiff's deraignment of title by reason of the evidence showing an outstanding title by virtue of a trust deed of the premises given by Muhlendorff and another to Burr and Dean. There are two good reasons why this point is not available to appellants—First, there is no specification directed to this point as a matter in regard to which the evidence is insufficient; second, the evidence shows that the trust deed was given to secure the payment of a debt, and the record before us contains the following recital: "Plaintiff then offered in evidence a deed of reconveyance dated August 12, 1874, and acknowledged August 21, 1874, wherein all the interest which had been conveyed by the aforesaid deed of trust of Muhlendorff and Weck to Burr and Dean was reconveyed. * * * Said deed was thereupon read in evidence." This reconveyance took place, it seems, 18 years before the commencement of this action. The deed last referred to is not before us; but we cannot see on the record, as above quoted, how it can now be said that there was any outstanding title on account of the making of the trust deed that would be available as against the plaintiff at the time of the commencement of this action.

3. There was no error in excluding evidence of satisfaction of judgment in the case of Reed against Buckelew et al. It was not contended by plaintiff that said judgment affected defendants' title adversely; indeed, the judgment was not in evidence; nor was it offered in evidence. What necessity, then, could there be to show that it was satisfied? Appellants contend that it was relevant to show Roper's good faith, but Roper's rights in the land depended, not upon his good faith, but upon the adverse possession of himself and his predecessors in occupation, to whose rights he had succeeded.

4. After showing by the testimony of William Culligan, brother of John Culligan, deceased, that the latter had been in the habit of pasturing his cow on the lot in controversy for a period of 12 or 13 years, the defendants asked said William the following question: "Did you know how John Culligan happened to put his cow there,—by whose permission?"

An objection to this question was sustained, and defendants claim this was error. At the time this question was asked it had not been shown what dates were covered by the 12 or 13 year period during which the cow was kept on the lot, nor was any offer made to show any dates in connection with the question. The question was also merely preliminary,—could have been answered by "Yes" or "No,"—and no effort or offer seems to have been made to follow it up. The witness was not asked to state by whose permission the cow was placed on the premises, nor was any offer made to prove that the cow was placed there by permission of defendants, or by permission of any one to whose rights they claimed to have succeeded. We can see no error in the ruling of the court.

5. The court sustained an objection to a question asked by defendants of William Culligan, which question reads as follows: "Mr. Culligan, did you ever hear your brother John Culligan, while he occupied that lot, and upon the premises, say anything as to whether or not he was occupying the lot for himself or claiming it for himself or keeping it by permission of another?" Here, again, a question, merely preliminary, was asked with no attempt to follow it up, and in this instance the subsequent answers of the witness show conclusively that any attempt to pursue the inquiry further would have been ineffectual, for the witness subsequently testifies, "Do not know that I was ever on this lot with my brother John; do not think I was;" and when asked if, when on the lot or alongside the lot, he ever heard any conversation between Roper and his brother "touching their relations to each other, and as to whether or not Mr. Culligan, your brother, held under Mr. Roper," he answered, "I don't remember, sir." In view of these answers of the witness, it is not necessary for us here to determine whether the declarations of a party in occupation of premises, not made against his interest, as to how he holds the same, come within the rule rejecting hearsay evidence.

6. An objection is urged to the petition for a sale of the real estate in the Muhlendorff estate, to the effect that said petition was insufficient to give the probate court jurisdiction to make the order of sale under which Baum claimed title. The petition describes all the property of the estate, and shows the real estate to consist of four parcels, three of them being in the Potrero, and their condition is described in said petition as "unimproved and unproductive." As to the lot in controversy, the petition alleges that it "is improved, and about one-half of it is in the adverse possession of one Reay, who claims title to said portion of said lot. In said condition it was appraised at and is worth the sum of five thousand dollars." Also "that it is necessary to sell the greater portion of the real estate of deceased for the purpose of paying the debts against the estate and the expenses of administration, and that in view of the possession of the lot on Van Ness avenue hereinbefore described being partly held adversely by another, and the value thereof being thereby affected, it would be advisable to sell all the lots on the Potrero hereinbefore described, rather than the lot on Van Ness avenue." The petition concluded with a prayer for a sale of "the whole of the said real estate situated on the Potrero of San Francisco, or so much or such parts thereof as this court shall deem necessary; that such sale may be made at private sale; and that such other and further order be made as is meet in the premises." The objection made by appellant at the trial to this petition was based upon the following grounds only: "First. That it does not appear from any evidence before the court that the lot in question was any part of the estate of said Muhlendorff, deceased. Second. On the ground that the petition on its face is to sell other real estate, and not the lot in question. Third. That any proceedings which might be taken by the probate court in the matter of the sale of real estate upon said petition would be without jurisdiction, for the reason that the statute requires that an administrator or executor, in order to sell real estate in the probate court, must proceed by petition to sell that particular real estate." There was no objection made to the petition on the ground that it failed to state the condition of the property, and therefore no such objection can be considered on this appeal, but the petition must be treated as containing a proper statement as to such condition. The only ground of objection made to the petition at the trial that appellant presents for our consideration is the second one quoted above. We think the probate court had jurisdiction to order the sale of the Van Ness avenue property under the general prayer "that such other and further order be made as is meet in the premises." Indeed, it would seem, from the statute in force at the time the sale in question was had, that the court is not controlled as to its order of sale by the desire of the executor, or by his prayer, or by the representations contained in the petition. All that is necessary in the petition is that it shall state the jurisdictional facts required by the statute, and then, "if the court is satisfied, after a full hearing upon the petition, and an examination of the proofs and allegations of the parties interested, that a sale of the whole or some portion of the real estate is necessary, for any of the causes mentioned in this article, or if such sale be assented to by all the persons interested, an order must be made to sell the whole or so much and such parts of the real estate described in the petition as the court shall judge necessary or beneficial." Bel. Prob. (3d Ed.) § 1543, p. 139; Code Civ. Proc. § 1543. The attack on the petition here is collateral and not direct, and the petition must be held sufficient as against the objection here considered. Dennis v. Winter, 63 Cal. 16. The petition being sufficient, it will be presumed, from the orders and notices which the record shows to have been placed in evidence, that the order of sale was valid.

7. The fifth and seventh defenses, as set up in the answer, are disposed of by the finding directed to the various statutes of limitation pleaded in the answer by the numbers of the sections of the Code in which they were respectively contained. The other points made on behalf of appellants are immaterial. The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 27, 1901.)
CONTRACTS — CONSTRUCTION — APPEARANCE
— VAGUENESS — PLEADING — COMPLAINT ON CONTRACT — SUFFICIENCY — EVIDENCE — TRIAL
— REMARKS OF COUNSEL — APPEAL.

1. Where a contract provided that, in consideration of plaintiff's assisting a distributing agent of defendants in making a success of their line of cigars in the distributor's territory, plaintiff was to receive a certain commission on all sales, the arrangement to remain in force so long as the goods found a ready sale, the contract was not void for uncertainty on the ground that it was not possible to determine what was meant by "assisting to make a success."

2. Where a contract provided that, in consideration of plaintiff assisting defendants' distributing agent in making a success of defendants' line of cigars in the territory allowed the agent by his contract with defendants, plaintiff should be paid a certain commission on all sales made by the agent, the complaint in an action on the contract to recover commissions was not insufficient because it did not set out the contract between defendants and the distributing agent, it not appearing from the complaint that such contract was a written one, and it not being necessary to plaintiff's recovery that the terms of the contract should be shown.

3. In June, 1894, defendants employed plaintiff to assist their distributing agent in making a success of their line of cigars for a commission on all sales. In an action on the contract for commissions, a verdict in favor of plaintiff was reduced by the court. Beginning with August, 1894, defendants had made statements to plaintiff of sales and of commissions due him, continuing to and including January, 1895, and the commissions were paid save as to December and January, and the statements showed a greater amount due than was embraced in the verdict as reduced, though there was evidence tending to show that such statement was in excess of the actual sales, representing consignments to the agent, and defendants claimed expenses should be deducted from the proceeds of sales; but it appeared from the statements that defendants must have understood the contract to have provided for commissions on gross sales. Held, that the evidence would have supported a larger verdict than the verdict as reduced, and hence defendants were not prejudiced thereby.

4. Where defendants contended that plaintiff's counsel improperly referred to an effort of compromise between the parties, but the statement did not contain the language used, and nothing appeared from which the appellate court could know the extent of the alleged irregularity, and it appearing that the court instructed the jury not to consider any evidence relating to compromise, the judgment would not be disturbed.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by Henry Sutliff against E. Seidenberg and others. There was a judgment in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Henry U. Brandenstein, for appellants. Naphtaly, Friedenrich & Ackerman, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Plaintiff, assignee of Charles J. Simon, brought the action against defendants for services rendered and commissions earned by said Simon under the following contract: "San Francisco, June 16th, 1894. In consideration of Mr. Charles J. Simon assisting our distributing agents, Messrs. Adelsdorfer & Brandenstein, to make a success of our line of cigars in San Francisco and other territories allowed as per contract with Adelsdorfer & Brandenstein, and for all services necessary to represent our interest, we agree to pay Mr. Simon five (5) per cent. commission on all sales made in California and above-mentioned territories sold by Messrs. Adelsdorfer & Brandenstein, or any future house we may select. This arrangement to remain in force as long as our goods find ready sale on this coast. Commissions to be paid monthly. [Signed] E. Seidenberg, Stiefel & Co." Defendants interposed a general demurrer to the complaint, which was overruled, and they answered, admitting the execution of the contract, but denied that Simon had rendered any service under it, or complied with its terms. They also alleged a modification of the contract in January, 1895, and also that they discharged Simon in May, 1895. The cause was tried by a jury, and plaintiff had a verdict for $1,236.81. On hearing the motion for a new trial, the court made an order overruling the motion on condition that the plaintiff remitted the sum of $517.25 from the amount of the verdict. This was done by plaintiff, and defendants appeal from the order alone.

1. The point chiefly relied on by appellants is raised by the demurrer, and also by an exception to the ruling of the court in admitting the contract in evidence when offered by plaintiff. It is claimed that the contract is void for uncertainty, in this: that there is no certain promise on Simon's part to assist Adelsdorfer & Brandenstein "to make a success of defendants' line of goods"; that it is not possible to determine what is meant by "assisting to make a success"; that the word "success" is itself too indefinite to give certainty to the contract; that the contract set out refers to another contract, which is not stated. "Where a contract has but a single object, and such object is * * * so vaguely expressed as to be wholly unascertainable, the entire contract is void." Civ. Code, § 1598. We must give the contract such an interpretation as will make it "operative, definite, reasonable, and capable of being carried into effect, if it can be done without violating the intention of the parties" (Id. § 1643); and we must give to the words of the contract the meaning as used in their ordinary and popular sense (Id. § 1644). If the terms used are ambiguous or uncertain, the promise must be interpreted in the sense in which the promisor believed, at the time of making it, that the promisee understood it. Id. § 1649. A contract may be explained by reference to the circumstance under which it was made and the matter to which it relates. Id. § 1647. Read in the light of these rules, the contract seems to us quite intelligible and certain. Defendants were doing business as cigar manufacturers in New York City, and desired to make a market for their goods in California. Adelsdorfer & Brandenstein, who were merchants in San Francisco, were made their distributing agents, and Simon was to assist them in introducing the goods to the public. Defendants not only spoke in the contract of making their line of cigars a success, but they further explained their meaning in the clause, "and for all services necessary to represent our interest we agree to pay," etc., and by the clause, "this agreement to remain in force as long as our goods find ready sale on this coast." Whatever of uncertainty there may be in the meaning of the clause "to make our line of cigars a success in San Francisco" seems to be cleared up, at least sufficiently as against a general demurrer, by the subsequent clauses. There is no appeal from the judgment, and the only question is whether the complaint states a cause of action sufficient to sustain the judgment. We cannot say that the contract is so "vaguely expressed as to be wholly unascertainable," and we must hold that the general demurrer was rightly overruled, and the testimony offered properly admitted.

2. The complaint did not fail to state a cause of action because it failed to set out the contract with Adelsdorfer & Brandenstein, referred to in the contract. In the cases cited by defendants it was held that, where a party relies in his complaint upon a contract in writing, and it affirmatively appears that all the terms of the contract are not set forth in hæc verba, nor stated in their legal effect, but that a portion which may be material has been omitted, the complaint is insufficient. It was so held in Gilmore v. Insurance Co., 55 Cal. 123, cited by defendants. Here the complaint does not show that the contract referred to in plaintiff's contract was in writing (it may have been oral), nor does it appear that it was necessary to plaintiff's recovery that the terms of the Adelsdorfer & Brandenstein contract should be set out or shown. So far as this latter contract concerned plaintiff, it was to limit the territory in which plaintiff was to give his services.

3. The evidence sustains the verdict as reduced by the court. The contract was made in June, 1894. Beginning with August, 1894, defendants made statements in writing to plaintiff of sales and commissions due him, continuing to and including January, 1895. The commissions were paid except as to December and January, which were not paid. The statements for these months showed a greater amount due than was embraced in the verdict as reduced. This evidence, coming from defendants themselves, carried with it strong implication, not to speak of plaintiff's testimony, of services rendered, as well as the compensation earned. There was evidence tending to show that these statements were in excess of actual sales, and represented consignments to Adelsdorfer & Brandenstein, rather than sales. But this was an issue which the jury determined, and their verdict finds support in the evidence. Defendants claimed, and sought to show by evidence, that they expended much money through Adelsdorfer & Brandenstein in making the sales, and that the expenses of sales should be deducted and commissions allowed on net proceeds. But the court—rightly, we think—held that plaintiff was entitled to commissions on gross sales, and defendants show by their statements to plaintiff that they must have so understood the contract. The issue as to whether plaintiff was discharged in May becomes immaterial in view of the reduced verdict which limited recovery to commissions earned previous to May. Upon this issue it may be said also that the evidence was conflicting.

4. Error is claimed because counsel for plaintiff, in addressing the jury, referred to a certain effort to compromise the claim for $1,000 by an agent of defendants. The error is assigned as "the references made by David Friedenrich, counsel for plaintiff, in his opening and in his closing argument to the jury, to the offer of compromise made by the defendants to Charles J. Simon." The statement does not contain the language used, and nothing appears from which we can know the extent or character of the alleged irregularity. Besides, the court instructed the jury that they were not to consider the evidence relating to an offer of compromise.

5. Defendants submit certain affidavits in support of their motion on the ground of surprise. We infer from their brief that no great reliance is placed on this point. However, we have examined the affidavits, and fail to find in them any ground for the relief asked. We have also carefully read the instructions asked by defendants and refused by the court, and the instructions as given, and discover no error. The order is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. WALKER. (Cr. 533.)¹

CRIMINAL LAW—APPEAL—LIMITATION—TRIAL—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—JUDGMENT—OBJECTIONS—WAIVER—MOTION IN ARREST.

1. Pen. Code, § 1248, requiring five days' notice of motion to dismiss appeals in criminal cases, has no application to such appeals brought after the time limited by section 1239, as the objection to such appeal is jurisdictional.

2. Where defendant moved to vacate a judgment and correct the minutes on the ground that they incorrectly stated that before sentence the defendant was informed of the nature of the charge and of the verdict, and asked if he had any cause why judgment should not be pronounced, an order refusing the motions could not imply a finding that the minutes were correct, in view of a statement in the bill of exceptions settled by the judge in which he found facts substantially negating the facts recited in the minutes.

3. Pen. Code, § 1200, requiring that, before sentencing a defendant, he must be informed of the nature of the charge against him, and of his plea, and the verdict thereon, and be asked if he has any cause why judgment should not be pronounced, is mandatory, and a failure to comply therewith deprives the defendant of substantial rights.

4. Where, before sentence, the court called defendant, whereon his counsel, without waiting, moved for a new trial, and after denial of which sentence was pronounced, such action was not a waiver of defendant's right to be informed of the nature of the charge, plea, and verdict, and to be asked if there was any reason why judgment should not be pronounced.

5. Where defendant moved to vacate a judgment and correct the minutes on the ground that they incorrectly stated that before sentence defendant was informed of the nature of the charge, plea, and verdict, and asked if there was any reason why judgment should not be pronounced against him, an appeal would lie from orders refusing the motions, as they affected substantial rights, and could not have been reviewed on appeal from the judgment.

6. No appeal lies from an order denying a motion in arrest of judgment, but it can be reviewed only on appeal from the judgment.

7. Where defendant was sentenced without being informed of the nature of the charge against him, or the plea and verdict, or asked if there was any reason why judgment should not be pronounced, he was not entitled to be discharged on motion.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; W. T. Wallace, Judge.

Order dismissing appeal (61 Pac. 800) affirmed, and cause remanded.

Geo. D. Collins, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Ford, for respondent.

BEATTY, C. J. The defendant, having been convicted of the crime of embezzlement, appeals from the judgment of the superior court and from five separate orders made after judgment. The several notices of appeal were served more than a year after the rendition of the judgment, and the question arises whether we have any jurisdiction of the appeal therefrom. In civil cases it seems to have been settled that this court is without jurisdiction to determine an appeal taken or attempted after the expiration of the time prescribed by the statute, Fairchild

v. Daten, 38 Cal. 286; Langan v. Langan, 89 Cal. 195, 26 Pac. 764. But it is contended that the same conclusion does not follow in criminal cases. The language of the Penal Code, however, is on this point quite as mandatory as that of the Code of Civil Procedure: "An appeal from a judgment must be taken within one year after its rendition and from an order within sixty days after it is made." Pen. Code, § 1239. In People v. Varnum, 53 Cal. 630, this court held that an appeal taken from an order in a criminal case more than 60 days after it was made must be dismissed, and for the same reason an appeal attempted from a judgment more than a year after its rendition must be dismissed. If the legislature can limit the time within which appeals in criminal cases must be taken, it seems very clear that such limit has been fixed by the above-quoted section 1239. But appellant contends that the apparent force of the language there used is materially qualified by the provisions of section 1248: "If the appeal is irregular in any substantial particular, but not otherwise, the appellate court may, on any day, on motion of the respondent, upon five days' notice, accompanied with copies of the papers upon which the motion is founded, order it to be dismissed." According to appellant's construction of this section no appeal can be dismissed in a criminal case for any irregularity except upon five days' notice; and, as there has been no motion to dismiss this appeal, he contends that it must be decided (as it was argued and submitted) upon its merits. This conclusion would probably follow if the objection to the appeal was not jurisdictional; but we can see no ground upon which a distinction in this respect can be made between civil and criminal cases, and upon the authority of the decisions above cited we feel constrained to hold that the appeal from the judgment herein cannot be considered.

The appeals from the orders after judgment were taken in time, and must be decided on their merits. The most important of these orders were those overruling the motions of the defendant to vacate the judgment and to correct the minutes of the court reciting the proceedings taken at the time the sentence was pronounced. The judgment, as entered in the minutes of the trial, contains a recital to the effect that, when the defendant was brought into court for sentence, he was duly informed of the nature of the charge against him, of his plea, and the verdict, and was asked if he had any cause to show why judgment should not be pronounced against him. By his motion to amend the defendant sought to have these minutes so corrected as to show that he was not informed before or at the time of the rendition of the judgment, either by the court or by the clerk, of the nature of the charge against him, and of his plea, and was not asked whether he had any cause to show why judgment should not be pronounced against him.

Necessarily, the motion to vacate the judgment was involved in the fate of the motion to correct the minutes, and both were denied. It is contended on behalf of the people that the orders of the court imply a finding that the minutes of the trial were correct, and, since there is some evidence (in the minutes themselves) to support such finding, the order must be affirmed on that ground. But there can be no implication of a finding that the minutes were correct in view of the statements contained in the bill of exceptions settled by the judge, which show that he found the facts substantially in accordance with the affidavit of the defendant and the official reporter's notes of the proceedings, and that what actually took place was this: The judge simply called the name George Walker, whereupon his counsel, without waiting for more, moved for a new trial, which, after argument, was denied by the court upon a pretty full review of the evidence in the case. At the conclusion of this review the judge immediately pronounced sentence. These facts being shown by the bill of exceptions, we conclude that the superior court did not deny the motion to correct the minutes because the judge found them literally true, but because he held that they stated the legal effect of what actually occurred. The question is therefore presented whether any substantial right of the defendant was infringed by pronouncing sentence without clearly informing him of the nature of the charge, etc., and asking him if he had any cause to show why judgment should not be pronounced.

In felony cases the defendant must be present when the judgment is rendered, and when he appears for judgment "he must be informed by the court, or by the clerk under his direction, of the nature of the charge against him, and of his plea, and the verdict, if any, thereon, and must be asked whether he has any legal cause to show why judgment should not be pronounced against him." Pen. Code, § 1200. These provisions are mandatory, and a substantial compliance therewith is essential, for they affect important rights of the defendant, who, when thus called upon, may show either that he is insane, or that there are grounds for a new trial or for arrest of judgment. If a sentence is pronounced without a substantial compliance with these requirements, and the clerk enters up a judgment upon a stereotyped form showing full compliance, certainly the court has power to correct its minutes upon a proper application, and it ought to do so; and more especially because the mistake can be easily and speedily corrected by simply setting aside the judgment as entered, and then proceeding regularly in the arraignment of the defendant, who, if he shows no good cause why judgment should not be pronounced, may be duly and properly sentenced. We presume that course would have been followed in this case if the judge who decided the motions had not been of the opinion that the action of defendant's counsel in moving for a new trial before arraignment amounted to a waiver. We think that the decision of the case really turns upon this point: Was there a waiver of the arraignment? It has been decided here that a defendant, when arraigned to plead, may waive a copy of the indictment by asking time to plead, before a copy has been delivered; and it is said that he may waive other formal steps prescribed by the statute. People v. Lightner, 49 Cal. 228. In that case, however, the indictment had been read to the defendant, and the clerk had stated that a copy would be completed, and handed to the defendant's counsel, which was done before he was called upon to plead. Under these circumstances it was held that the court properly entered a plea of not guilty upon the refusal of the defendant to interpose any plea. That case is, therefore, scarcely a precedent for this. There every substantial requirement of the statute was complied with, while here several such were wholly omitted; and we do not find that it has been held in any case that a waiver of any substantial right of a defendant can be implied from the acts of his counsel. We think the motions to correct the minutes and vacate the judgment should have been sustained.

No question has been raised by counsel for the people as to the right of appeal from these orders, but the question suggests itself, and has been considered. We think the orders were appealable. They were made after final judgment. They affected substantial rights of the defendant, and the errors to which the motions were directed could not have been reviewed on appeal from the judgment. An appeal from the judgment would have brought up only such bills of exceptions as the statute allows. These are all specifically defined and enumerated in sections 1170-1173 of the Penal Code, and only one of them applies to a case in which the judgment falsely recites that the defendant has been properly arraigned for sentence. The only possible means by which he can save an exception to an order of this character is by making a motion after judgment to correct the minutes and vacate the judgment, based upon a showing of the facts; in which case he can have an exception to the order denying his motion, if it is denied, under subdivision 5 of section 1172 of the Penal Code, which permits an exception to the action of the court "in making or refusing to make an order after judgment affecting any substantial right of the parties." Ordinarily, of course, where a party may appeal from a judgment or order, he must appeal direct, and is not allowed to move to set aside, and then appeal from the order denying his motion. But this is only a rule of practice, and it does not apply when the case is such that a direct appeal would afford no relief by reason of the impossibility of securing a record showing the error complained of. Pignaz v. Burnett, 119 Cal. 162, 51 Pac. 48, and cases cited. If a defendant were sentenced in his absence, and without any pretense of arraignment, the proceeding would be virtually ex parte, and the right to move to vacate would be clear. It is equally clear that a false or erroneous entry in the minutes of the court, made in the absence of the defendant, by which his substantial rights are injuriously affected, is, upon the same grounds, the subject of a motion to amend or correct, and the orders made upon such motions are the subject of exception under the provision of the statute above quoted. Under that provision, and under that alone, can a record be secured in such cases, upon which the errors of the trial court may be reviewed. We are satisfied upon these grounds that the appeals lie. The other appeals need no especial consideration. The motion in arrest of judgment was not in order until the judgment, as entered, was set aside; and the order upon that motion, when properly and regularly made, can only be reviewed on appeal from the judgment. If, upon the arraignment of the defendant herein ordered, he renews his motion in arrest, or makes other appropriate motions, and if they are overruled, the various orders of the court may be reviewed upon an appeal from the judgment then pronounced. The motion to discharge the defendant was properly denied, and the order vacating the stay of proceedings is of no consequence, in view of the right of the defendant, if again sentenced, to apply for a certificate of probable cause for any new appeal he may decide to prosecute. The orders denying the motions to correct the minutes and vacate the judgment are reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the superior court to arraign the defendant for judgment, and to proceed thereupon as it may be advised.

Ex parte WALKER. (Cr. 674.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 8, 1901)
HABEAS CORPUS—CONVICTION—DEFECTIVE JUDGMENT.

Where defendant, after commitment, for embezzlement, was duly tried and convicted, but the judgment entered was defective, he will not be discharged on habeas corpus, since the sheriff is justified in holding him under the original commitment and the subsequent proceedings prior to judgment.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; W. T. Wallace, Judge.

Habeas corpus by George Walker for discharge after conviction. Denied.

Geo. D. Collins, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Ford, for respondent.

BEATTY, C. J. This is a proceeding by habeas corpus in behalf of the defendant in the case of People v. Walker (just decided) 64 Pac. 133. The facts developed at the hearing in this case differ in some particulars from those shown by the record in the appeal. In his petition the prisoner alleged that he was unlawfully detained in the custody of the sheriff of San Francisco upon the sole authority of a so-called "judgment of conviction," a copy of which was set out, and, as set out, is so defective as to be scarcely intelligible. The facts, as disclosed at the hearing, are that the prisoner was held to answer by one of the police judges of San Francisco on a charge of embezzlement. Thereafter an information accusing him of that offense was duly filed by the district attorney, upon which he was tried and convicted. The clerk of the superior court then proceeded to enter the judgment according to the practice which seems to have obtained in that office. There was, it appears, a set of rubber stamps, from one of which the clerk would print a blank on a page of the minute book, and then fill it out with the proper names, dates, and other particulars. In this case the impression made by the stamp was very defective, being illegible in places, and the blanks also were not properly filled out; the result being a judgment so maimed and defective as to be in itself meaningless. If, therefore, it had been true that the sheriff held the petitioner without other authority than this defective record, it would, perhaps, have been necessary to order his discharge. But the sheriff is justified in holding the prisoner under the original commitment by the police judge and the subsequent proceedings in the superior court prior to judgment. If no judgment has been entered, the simple result is that one should be entered when duly rendered, and when entered it will dispose of the question of petitioner's lawful custody. In pursuance of the order which we have just made in the appeal case, remanding the cause to the superior court, orders can now be made which will result either in the discharge of the petitioner, or his detention pending other proceedings, or his commitment to the state prison. In the meantime he is held to the custody of the sheriff.

Action by D. B. McDonald against Cornelius M. Lee and others. From an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Appeal dismissed.

G. H. Perry, for appellants. Haven & Haven, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Motion to dismiss the appeal upon the ground that it was taken after the time allowed by law. The judgment appealed from was entered February 26, 1900, and the order denying a new trial was entered in the minutes of the court November 16, 1900. The notice of appeal therefrom was filed January 16, 1901, more than six months after the entry of the judgment, and more than 60 days after the entry of the order. The appellants seek to sustain the appeal by showing that the notice of appeal was served upon the respondent in San Francisco, on the 15th day of January, and deposited in the post office at San Francisco on the same day, directed to the clerk of the superior court of Alameda county, where it was filed the next day. Section 940, Code Civ. Proc., declares that an appeal is taken by filing the notice with the clerk, and serving a similar notice upon the adverse party. Section 1013, Code Civ. Proc., provides that, where service is made by mail, if the adverse party may exercise a right within a certain number of days after such service, the time within which such right may be exercised is extended one day for every 25 miles of the distance between the place of deposit and the place of address. This section, however, does not authorize any extension of the time within which a paper may be filed, or within which the service of a paper may be made upon the adverse party. The motion is granted, and the appeal is dismissed.

MORTGAGES—FORECLOSURE—LIMITATION—ESTOPPEL.

A foreclosure suit was based on the liability specified in the mortgage, and not on a new promise to pay the debt, made before it became barred by the limitation, and before a judgment lien on the premises was created. A demurrer by the judgment creditor was sustained on the ground that the debt was barred, and, plaintiff declining to amend, judgment dismissing the action was entered, after which the creditor, relying on the allegations of the complaint, purchased the property on execution sale under the judgment, without notice of any renewal. Held, in a subsequent suit to foreclose the mortgage, in which plaintiff relied on a new promise, that he was estopped from maintaining the action.

APPEAL—FILING NOTICE—TIME.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1013, provides that, where service is made by mail, if the adverse party may exercise a right within a certain number of days after such service, the time within which such right may be exercised is extended one day for each 25 miles of distance between the place of deposit and place of address. Held, that the statute does not extend the time limited for filing a notice of appeal served by mail.

Action by George A. Newhall against A. T. Hatch and others. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying a new trial, defendant Sherman, Clay & Co. appeals. Reversed.

F. A. Berlin, for appellant. E. W. McGraw and Craig & Craig, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. The facts can best be stated historically, with such reference to the pleadings as may be necessary. On November 3, 1892, defendant Hatch and wife mortgaged to the plaintiff certain real estate situated in Alameda county. The instruments constituting the mortgage consisted of a deed in form absolute, executed by Hatch and wife, and a defeasance executed by Newhall, the body of which, after reciting the deed, was as follows: "And whereas, said deed is absolute in form, yet in fact is intended as security for the payment of the sum of $4,000 loaned by said Newhall to said A. T. Hatch: Now this defeasance witnesseth that the said George A. Newhall, for himself, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, hereby binds himself and agrees to reconvey the hereinabove mentioned and described property unto the said A. T. Hatch, his heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns, at any time upon the payment to him of said sum of $4,000.00 and his demand for a deed to said property." On April 21, 1896, Sherman, Clay & Co., the appellant herein, obtained a judgment against said A. T. Hatch in the superior court of Alameda county for the sum of $47,792.25, which was then docketed, and became a lien on said mortgaged premises. On February 3, 1897, Newhall commenced an action to foreclose his said mortgage lien, and made Hatch and wife, Dalton, the assignee of Hatch in insolvency, and Sherman, Clay & Co. defendants, alleging as to the latter that it had, or claimed to have, some lien thereon, but which was subsequent and subject to said lien of the plaintiff. In said first action the complaint set out the defeasance hereinbefore quoted, and alleged: "That no part of said sum of $4,000 has been paid, nor has any interest thereon been paid, but the whole thereof, with interest from November 3, 1892, is now due and owing by said Hatch to the plaintiff herein." Sherman, Clay & Co. demurred to said complaint, and, among other grounds, specified that the cause of action was barred by the provisions of section 337 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Said demurrer was sustained, and, the plaintiff declining to amend, judgment that his action be dismissed as to Sherman, Clay & Co. was entered on April 27, 1897, and from that judgment Newhall appealed, and this court affirmed the judgment. Newhall v. Sherman, 124 Cal. 509, 57 Pac. 387. After said judgment was entered against Newhall in the superior court, Sherman, Clay & Co. took out execution upon its judgment against Hatch, and on July 22, 1897, the sheriff sold said premises to said Sherman, Clay & Co., and, no redemption having been made, it received the deed of the sheriff therefor on July 28, 1898, and recorded it August 5, 1898. Thereafter, on June 27, 1899, said Newhall commenced the present action to foreclose his said mortgage upon the same premises, and again made the corporation known as Sherman, Clay & Co. a party defendant. The making of the deed and defeasance was alleged as before, but it was also alleged as follows: "That thereafter, on September 20, 1895, and long prior to the accruing of the claim of Sherman, Clay & Co., hereinafter mentioned, the said defendant A. T. Hatch made and subscribed in writing a new promise to pay the indebtedness secured by said mortgage, which new promise is in the words and figures following, to wit: 'San Francisco, September 20, 1895. $50,000. One day after date, without grace, I promise to pay to the order of George A. Newhall, fifty thousand dollars, for value received, with interest at 7 per cent. per annum from date until paid; both principal and interest payable only in United States gold coin. A. T. Hatch.' And plaintiff alleges that the $4,000 secured by the mortgage aforesaid was a portion of the $50,000 agreed to be paid by said Hatch by the promissory note aforesaid; that no part of said sum of $4,000 has been paid, nor has any interest thereon been paid, but the whole thereof, with interest from September 20, 1895, is now due and owing by said Hatch to the plaintiff herein." The complaint further alleged that Sherman, Clay & Co. claimed some interest or lien upon the premises arising out of a judgment obtained and docketed against Hatch in the superior court of Alameda county on April 21, 1896, for the sum of $47,792.25, but that the same was subsequent and subordinate to said mortgage. Sherman, Clay & Co. demurred to said complaint for want of facts, also that the alleged cause of action is barred by certain specified provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure, and also demurred severally on the grounds of ambiguity, uncertainty, and that the complaint is unintelligible, and, these demurrers having been overruled, answered, and put in issue all the material allegations of the complaint, and alleged the recovery of said judgment against Hatch, the sale of the premises described in the complaint on July 22, 1897, upon execution issued upon said judgment, that it became the purchaser and received a certificate of purchase, that the property sold was not redeemed, and on July 28, 1898, the sheriff executed and delivered a deed to said corporation therefor. Said defendant corporation also pleaded the former judgment of the superior court, and its affirmance in this court. A trial was had upon said issues, and the court found the facts as hereinbefore recited, and further found that the only question considered or decided in said first action was that plaintiff's cause of action appeared to be barred by section 337 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and that that was the only question considered by the supreme court; that at the commencement of this action Sherman, Clay & Co. was the owner of the property described in the complaint, subject to plaintiff's said mortgage, and that said former judgment is not a bar to this action; "that in this action an issue is presented as to a new promise made by Hatch before the mortgage aforesaid became barred to pay the debt thereby secured, which issue was not presented in said former action, and was not therein adjudicated." To these findings was added a conclusion of law that plaintiff have judgment of foreclosure, and from said judgment, and from an order denying its motion for a new trial, said defendant Sherman, Clay & Co. appeals.

Respondent contends that "the $50,000 note given by Hatch to plaintiff in 1895 kept the mortgage alive." As between Hatch and Newhall, the mortgagor and mortgagee, that proposition is conceded. It was decided in Southern Pac. Co. v. Prosser, 122 Cal. 413, 55 Pac. 145, cited by respondent, that a promise to pay the debt, made before it became barred by the statute of limitations, interrupted the running of the statute as to the debt, and kept alive the mortgage security. But this conclusion was carefully restricted by the qualifying words, "as between the parties." That case, therefore, does not decide the question here presented. In Wood v. Goodfellow, 43 Cal. 185, where it was claimed that the absence of the mortgagor from the state suspended the running of the statute of limitations, this court said: "So long as he [the mortgagor] retained the equity of redemption, and no other rights had intervened by reason of subsequent liens or incumbrances, he had the power by written stipulation under the statute to extend the time within which the debt should not be barred, or he might suspend the running of the statute by his absence from the state. So long as his rights only were to be affected, it was within his power to suspend the operation of the statute either by a written stipulation or by absenting himself from the state. But this court has repeatedly decided that, as against subsequent incumbrancers, or a subsequent holder of the equity of redemption, the mortgagor has no power, by stipulation, to prolong the time of payment, or in any manner increase the burdens on the mortgaged premises." See, also, the cases there cited. So, in Bank v. Brooks, 126 Cal. 198, 200, 59 Pac. 302, 303, it was said: "The first mortgagee could not renew the note, and thereby extend the statute of limitations so as to affect the second mortgagee. He may take advantage of the statute of limitations, although the debtor does not,—citing Lord v. Morris, 18 Cal. 482; McCarthy v. White, 21 Cal. 495, 82 Am. Dec. 754; Barber v. Babel, 36 Cal. 11; Sichel v. Carrillo, 42 Cal. 493; Wood v. Goodfellow, 43 Cal. 185." See, also, Watt v. Wright, 66 Cal.

202, 205, 5 Pac. 91." In the case at bar, however, the new note or new promise was made on September 20, 1895, while the lien of the judgment of Sherman, Clay & Co. was not created until April 21, 1896, and at the time of said renewal the cause of action upon the liability specified in the defeasance and alleged by Newhall in his first suit was not barred by the statute. But his first suit was not commenced until February 3, 1897, and that suit, as we have seen, was based upon the liability shown by the deed and defeasance, and not upon the new promise set up in the present action. At the time the first action was brought, Sherman, Clay & Co. had only a judgment lien upon the premises described in Newhall's mortgage, and by the judgment in that action it was declared that as against said lien the plaintiff's mortgage had ceased to exist. After the rights of the parties had thus been adjudicated, and long before the present action was brought, and without notice of said renewal, Sherman, Clay & Co. bought said premises at execution sale under its judgment against Hatch, and, no redemption having been made, received the sheriff's deed therefor on July 28, 1898, nearly a year before the present action was brought. No stronger assurance could have been given by Newhall to Sherman, Clay & Co. that neither the mortgage executed November 3, 1892, to secure the $4,000 money loaned, nor the time of payment thereof, had been in any manner changed, renewed, or prolonged, than was given by his verified complaint in the first action, and his refusal to amend after the finding and judgment of the court that the mortgage he held was barred by the statute of limitations as against the judgment lien of Sherman, Clay & Co., set up in its answer. The new promise upon which Newhall now relies was known to him at the time his first action was brought; and if, by error of judgment, he relied, on his first action, upon the original promise, he should at least have informed Sherman, Clay & Co. of the fact of the renewal, and not have stood by with closed mouth, and permitted that corporation to purchase the property in reliance upon the representation, solemnly given in a judicial proceeding, of facts which on their face conclusively showed that his mortgage lien had expired, and that Sherman, Clay & Co. might safely purchase.

It is not necessary to discuss or decide the question whether the judgment rendered upon demurrer to the complaint in the former action, upon the ground that the mortgage lien was barred by the statute of limitations as against Sherman, Clay & Co., may be pleaded by that corporation as a technical bar to a new action to determine the priority of lien, the new action having alleged a new promise by the mortgagor, made before the first action was brought; since, if it is not a technical bar, the facts show an estoppel in pais, if not an estoppel by record. As already stated, at the time the first action was brought and determined by the judgment in the superior court, Sherman, Clay & Co. had only a judgment lien upon the premises described in Newhall's mortgage; but, relying upon the allegations of plaintiff in his first complaint, which, in effect, negated any renewal of the mortgage lien prior to the commencement of that action, Sherman, Clay & Co. purchased the premises discharged of any lien which may then have existed in favor of Newhall as against the mortgagor. The plaintiff knew of the renewal; the defendant Sherman, Clay & Co. did not, and had no means of knowing it. Even if said defendant had known of the execution of the $50,000 note made in 1895, that instrument would not have given any information that it included the $4,000 secured by said mortgage, or that it was a renewal of that or any other debt owing by Hatch to the plaintiff. Nor are there any controlling equities in favor of the plaintiff. The $4,000 secured by the mortgage in question was not loaned on the security of that mortgage. As shown by the testimony of the plaintiff, it was part of and included in a note for $50,000 made by Hatch to the plaintiff a year or more before the mortgage was given, and this mortgage was additional or collateral security for the amount thereof. The property was sold to appellant upon its bid of $3,000, and respondent suggests that, for anything the record shows, it may be worth a million; but the presumption from the record is that it brought its full market value.

There is no conflict in the evidence. The findings of fact are full, but there are mixed with them certain conclusions of law, as we have seen,—as that appellant is the owner of the lands described in the complaint, "but subject to the plaintiff's mortgage." Eliminating these legal conclusions, the findings do not support the judgment, but require a judgment for the defendant Sherman, Clay & Co. I advise that the judgment and order be reversed, with directions to the court below to correct his conclusion of law, and enter judgment upon the findings for the appellant.

We concur: GRAY, C.; CHIPMAN, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order are reversed, with directions to the court below to correct his conclusion of law, and enter judgment upon the findings for the appellant.

OWEN v. POMONA LAND & WATER CO.
(L. A. 637.)

1901.)

VENDOR AND PURCHASER—RESCISSION—FAILURE OF CONSIDERATION.

Defendant contracted to convey to plaintiff certain lands and shares in an irrigation company, which entitled him to a certain amount of water. There was no guaranty that the supply of water would be permanent. Plaintiff knew the supply of water and its source. Plaintiff received the stock, and entered and continued in possession of the land for several years, when the water supply partially failed. Held not to authorize a rescission by plaintiff, under Civ. Code, § 1689, subd. 4, authorizing the rescission of a contract if the consideration fails in any material respect, since the plaintiff received all he contracted for.

In bank. From a judgment of the court in bank (63 Pac. 850) reversing a judgment in department (61 Pac. 472) affirming a judgment in favor of plaintiff, plaintiff petitions for a rehearing. Denied.

BEATTY, C. J. Response to petition for rehearing: In his petition for a rehearing respondent insists that, although he may have had no right to rescind by reason of the delay in perfecting the title to the land, he did have a clear right to rescind on account of the failure of the water supply; and he claims that he had this right under subdivision 4 of section 1689 of the Civil Code, notwithstanding the absence of any bad faith or fault on the part of the defendant. It is true that under that provision of the Code a party to a contract may rescind if the consideration, before it is rendered to him, fails in a material respect, from any cause. But does that provision apply to the kind of rescission decreed in this case? The respondent never offered to rescind, except upon condition that he should be paid for his improvements, and such was the decree. The offer and the decree were, as we understand, alike based upon some imputation of actual or constructive fraud on the part of the defendant in contracting to convey land to which it had no title. Eliminate this feature of the case, and how does it stand? The plaintiff was to have, along with the land, certain shares of stock in an irrigation company, representing 2,032 inches of water. He knew what the company was, what its supply of water was, and what was the source of supply. When he commenced his improvements he knew as well as the defendant could have known whether the supply would be permanent. There was no guaranty that it should be permanent, and no such representation, or, if there was, it was a mere expression of opinion. The plaintiff then made permanent improvements, because of his own belief that the water supply would not fail. If there had been no difficulty about the title, and the payments had been completed, and the conveyance made in January, 1894, as the contract provided, the defendant would have got all he contracted for on his own construction of the agreement as to the water stock; but when the water failed in 1896 he would have had no right to rescind, with or without compensation for his improvement, and we see no reason why, in the case as it is, he should be allowed to throw upon the defendant the unfortunate consequences of his own mistaken judgment in a matter as to which he was uninfluenced by any fraud, actual or constructive, of the defendant. Rehearing denied.

BERLIN v. EUREKA LODGE, NO. 9, K. P.

(Supreme Court of California. March 21, 1901.)

INSURANCE — FRATERNAL SOCIETIES — SICK BENEFITS — BY-LAWS — CHANGE — RETROACTIVE OPERATION — SUITS AT LAW — CONDITIONS PRECEDENT.

1. Where a member of a fraternal insurance society had been paid $10 per week for more than 100 weeks, as provided by the by-laws thereof, and the society amended the by-laws so as to give sick members "$10 per week for the first 50 weeks; for the following 50 weeks, $5 per week; and thereafter, $3 per week,"—such amendment had no retroactive effect as to such member, who would therefore be entitled to weekly benefits as though he had not previously been sick.

2. Where a member of a fraternal insurance society died pending an appeal to the highest tribunal thereof, the appeal should have been decided on its merits, there being no authority in the by-laws for dismissal, and hence such dismissal would authorize the member's representatives to seek relief in a court of law.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Frank H. Dunne, Judge.

Action by Caroline Berlin, administratrix of the estate of William A. Berlin, against Eureka Lodge, No. 9, Knights of Pythias, an association. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Davis Louderback, for appellant. Q. F. Meldon, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an action to recover from a subordinate lodge of the Knights of Pythias an amount represented by an accrual of weekly sick benefits. The action is brought by the administratrix of the estate of William A. Berlin, deceased. Berlin was a member of the order, and entitled to weekly sick benefits by reason of certain by-laws. For a great many months he had been paid these sick benefits. Thereafter, and while he was still sick and entitled to benefits under the aforesaid by-laws, the lodge amended those laws, and provided that weekly sick benefits should be paid to members as follows: "For the first fifty weeks of disability, ten dollars per week; for the following fifty weeks of such disability, five dollars per week; and thereafter, during the continuation of such disability, three dollars per week." Berlin having been paid $10 per week under the old by-law for more than 100 weeks, it is now claimed by appellant that he was not entitled to $10 per week under the amended by-law for the first 50 weeks of his sickness, and $5 per week for the next succeeding 50 weeks of his sickness, but that in fact he was only entitled to $3 per week from the date of the passage of the amended law. There was no attempt upon the part of the lodge to give this amended by-law a retroactive effect, even conceding that it could be done. Hence it seems that when the amended by-law went into effect it had the same force upon Berlin as upon any other member of the order. The by-law having no retroactive effect, it is an immaterial matter that he had been sick prior to its adoption, and he stood in the same position to it as if he had been taken sick upon the day of its adoption.

In view of the decision of this court in Robinson v. Lodge, 117 Cal. 370, 49 Pac. 170, the law of this state may be deemed settled to the effect that a member of a subordinate lodge, deeming himself aggrieved by the action of the lodge, must exhaust all the remedies provided by its laws for the redress of his grievances before he may appeal to courts of law. And, secondly, it may be deemed settled law by the same decision that a member of a lodge, by subscribing to the by-laws, may waive his right to sue in the courts of law for the redress of his grievances; and, if such member brings an action in a court of law, it is a defense thereto if he has agreed within the order to look solely to its tribunals for the redress of those grievances, and those tribunals have decided against him upon the merits of his case. In the present case, Berlin sought relief in the tribunals of the order, and, while his appeal was pending before its highest tribunal, he died. Thereafter that tribunal dismissed his appeal upon the ground that Berlin was then dead, and "there is no party in interest or beneficiary before us, and no revivor has been had." We find nothing in the laws of the order prescribing a procedure for the substitution of a new party in case of the death of the party appellant, and the appellate tribunal had no right to dismiss Berlin's appeal upon the ground set forth. It should have decided the appeal upon its merits, regardless of his death. Certainly so, in the absence of some express law of the order authorizing a dismissal of the proceeding.

If this, the highest tribunal of the order, had decided the appeal upon its merits adversely to Berlin's claim, possibly in view of the Robinson Case, supra, its decision would have barred a recovery in this action. But the dismissal upon the grounds stated was, in substance, a refusal to hear the appeal upon its merits; and Berlin's legal representatives had the right, under those circumstances, to come to a court of law for relief. Berlin was only bound to abide by the decision of the tribunals of the order if those tribunals decided his case upon its merits. Under the laws of the order, they were required to so decide it, and, if they refused, of necessity his only relief was an appeal to the courts. Dismissing his appeal for the reasons stated was not authorized, and he, having taken the appeal in good faith seeking to test the merits therein involved, thereby exhausted all the remedies furnished by the laws of the order, and, there being no final decision against him upon the merits, his representative was justified in bringing this action.

There are a great many points made by appellant upon which reliance is placed in order to reverse this judgment. They are of a most technical character, and, upon a careful examination of them, we find them too technical to interfere with the substantial administration of justice.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment and order are affirmed.

GREEN et al. v. SOUTHERN PAC. CO. (L. A. 810.)¹

RAILROADS — ACCIDENT AT CROSSING — CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

Plaintiff's intestate was killed by a collision on a railway crossing. Intestate was familiar with the crossing, and knew that the train was due at about the time he attempted to cross. The whistle was sounded on approaching the crossing, and the bell was ringing continuously. Defendant's right of way, to within 12 feet of the track, was planted in corn, which was about 9 feet high, and obstructed the view until within 12 feet from the crossing. Intestate was driving his wagon rapidly, and from his position in the wagon could have seen the approaching train, and, if he had looked and listened before going on the track, he could have avoided the collision. Held, that he was guilty of such contributory negligence as precluded recovery.

Action by Mary Green and others against the Southern Pacific Company. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Reversed.

R. B. Canfield, for appellant. Murphy & Gottschalk, for respondents.

HARRISON, J. On September 2, 1895, George N. Green was struck by a locomotive of the defendant, and instantly killed. His widow and children have brought the present action to recover damages therefor, alleging that his death was caused by reason of the negligence of the defendant. The case was tried by a jury, and a verdict given in favor of the plaintiffs for the sum of $9,000. The defendant has appealed directly from the judgment, presenting the grounds of its appeal in a bill of exceptions.

At the time of his death, Mr. Green was 70 years of age, and in good health and the enjoyment of his faculties. He had resided in Santa Paula for several years, and on that morning started in an express wagon, with a team of horses, to go to some land of his which was about three miles east of Santa Paula, to get a load of wood. In going there he went for about two miles along the county road, which runs near to the railroad, and at its intersection with the Brock road turned southerly into the Brock road, and was driving along this road, when the regular morning passenger train of the defendant, coming from the east, struck and killed him. The train was running at a speed of about 40 miles an hour, and was due at Santa Paula at 1 minute after 11 o'clock. It was 2 minutes before 11 when the accident occurred. The track of the defendant for a distance of upwards of 2,000 feet east of this crossing is straight, and is substantially upon a level with the adjacent ground, varying less than a foot therefrom for several hundred feet. Eighty rods east of the crossing is a whistling post, and from that point to the crossing the grade falls 11.2 feet, so that trains of cars are easily moved thereon without the aid of steam. The intersection of the Brock road with the county road is about 3 feet higher than at the crossing of the railroad, and is 180 feet northerly therefrom. The general surface of the ground slopes to the south, with about the same grade. The right of way of the defendant between the crossing and the whistling post is 100 feet in width, and, with the consent of the defendant, a portion of this right of way had been planted in corn, which at the time of the accident had an average height of about 9 feet. Between the north rail of the track and the south line of the corn there was, however, a space of 12 feet, but to one driving along the Brock road any view of an approaching train would be obstructed by the corn until he had got within 12 feet of the crossing. There was also an orchard on the east side of the Brock road, just south of its intersection with the county road, whose trees were about 9 feet in height. It appears without any substantial conflict in the evidence that the whistle upon the locomotive was sounded and the bell rung, as required by section 486, Civ. Code. The engineer testified, as did the fireman, that he gave the regular crossing whistle—two long and two short blasts—at the whistling post, and that the bell was ringing continuously. The locomotive had an automatic bell ringer, and he testified that it was started half a mile back, and was ringing until the train came to a stop at the crossing. Each of the witnesses who was asked thereon testified that they heard the whistle; and, although some of them did not hear the bell, their failure to hear it was sufficiently accounted for. It was shown that there was a strong west wind blowing that morning, and with one exception the witnesses were all west of the Brock road, and some distance from the railroad. Mrs. Welchman, who lived between the Brock road and the whistling post, and about 100 yards north of the railroad, testified that she heard the whistle and heard the bell ringing as the train was passing her house. Other witnesses heard both the bell and the whistle. Mrs. Trotter testified that she heard the bell after the collision; thus confirming the testimony of the engineer. Mrs. Tinder testified that she heard the bell, and then she heard the whistle. In view of this testimony, the fact that two of the passengers on the train did not hear it is not entitled to any consideration. It appears that their attention was not directed to it, and the noise of the train might readily have prevented them from hearing it. Upon the evidence on this point no sensible or impartial person could fail to find that the bell was rung and the whistle sounded, and, in the absence of any express finding to the contrary, it must be assumed that the jury so considered the evidence. The plaintiffs, therefore, failed to show any negligence on the part of the defendant in giving notice of the approach of the train; and it cannot be held, under any of the circumstances shown herein, that the running of a passenger train through a sparsely-settled country, at the rate of 40 miles an hour, is, as matter of law, negligence.

The plaintiffs, however, contend that the defendant was guilty of negligence in permitting the view of its track and approaching train to be obstructed by the corn which was growing there. The claim that such negligence was wanton cannot be sustained. On the other hand, the defendant contends that, even if this be conceded to be negligence, it was not the proximate cause of the death of Mr. Green; and that it was shown by the evidence that his own negligence was not only contributory thereto, but was the real cause of his death. The only eyewitnesses of the accident were the engineer and the fireman upon the locomotive and Mrs. Trotter. The engineer and the fireman testified that when the train was about 30 or 40 feet from the crossing they saw the heads of the horses, which were then about 10 or 12 feet from the outermost rail, and "they appeared to be coming pretty fast." Mrs. Trotter was at her home upon the Brock road, about 1,000 feet south of the crossing, and testified that her attention was drawn by hearing the whistle; "and when I looked the team was just leaving the main county road, and had turned down towards the track, and was coming pretty fast. All at once he jerked the team around to the right, the northwest side of the fence, and the car just swept by quicker than I could tell it." She further said: "When I first saw the team coming from the main county road down there, why it was coming pretty fast, and then in an instant, when the train came through the cattle guard, the team was right upon the track, and he was trying to rein the horses around to the right apparently." And upon her cross-examination she said: "When I first saw Mr. Green on this occasion in his wagon, he had turned from the main county road to come down to the Brock road, and was coming down from the county road this way. His team was coming pretty fast when I saw him, and that was when I stepped out to get a bucket,—coming fast; but he got near just before the train come, and right at the track apparently he jerked his horses around this way, I believe to the right. It was just as he got to the track I saw him pull around the team. His horses ran fast before he got there." It is the settled rule in this state that contributory negligence is a defense to be affirmatively established by the defendant, unless it is shown or can be inferred from the evidence given in support of the plaintiff's case. Robinson v. Railroad Co., 48 Cal. 426. It is also well settled that, while contributory negligence is a question of fact to be determined by the jury, yet, when the facts are undisputed, the question is one of law for the court (Glasscock v. Railroad Co., 73 Cal. 137, 14 Pac. 518); and if the evidence thereon is without conflict, and of such a character that the only conclusion to be reasonably drawn therefrom is in favor of its existence, the court may grant a nonsuit at the close of the testimony, or may direct a verdict for the defendant (Davis v. Railroad Co., 105 Cal. 131, 38 Pac. 647; Herbert v. Southern Pac. Co., 121 Cal. 227, 53 Pac. 651). It was said in the case last cited: "The cases arising from injuries suffered at railroad crossings have been so numerous, and upon certain points there has been such absolute accord, that what will constitute ordinary care in such a case has been precisely defined, and, if any element is wanting, the courts will hold as matter of law that the plaintiff has been guilty of negligence. And, when injury results which might have been avoided by the use of proper care, the plaintiff cannot recover, although the defendant has also been guilty of negligence." Under the evidence which was before the court it must be held, in view of the principles thus declared, that the deceased was guilty of contributory negligence, and that the court should have granted the defendant's motion, at the close of the testimony, for a nonsuit. It is very clear that if Mr. Green, at any time after he had entered upon the Brock road, had taken the precautions which any prudent man would have taken, he would have learned that the train was approaching, and thus have avoided the danger. One of the witnesses was working that morning in a field near the intersection of the Brock road with the county road, and heard the whistle at the whistling post, and saw the top of the train. The place at which he was working was shown to be five feet higher than the railroad crossing, and nearly two feet higher than the intersection of the Brock road with the county road. At the time the whistle sounded, Mrs. Trotter testified that Green had just turned into the Brock road. He was sitting upon the seat of his wagon, which it was shown brought his eye to a point seven feet and four inches above the ground, so that he had practically the same opportunity for seeing the train as had the witness who was working upon the ground. It was the regular time for the train to be at that point, and it was shown that this train had been running upon this schedule for several months. Green had resided in Santa Paula for several years, and his occupation—the transfer business—was such that it must be assumed that he knew the time at which the train would reach Santa Paula. He had frequently driven over that route, and was familiar with the location of the track and the extent to which its view was obstructed by the corn. His wagon was equipped with a brake, and the horses he was driving were accustomed to the cars. If he had stopped when he reached the turn in the road, he would have heard the whistle, and, if he had looked, he would have seen the approaching cars. In Herbert's Case, supra, it was said: "The railroad track of a steam railway must itself be regarded as a sign of danger, and one intending to cross must avail himself of every opportunity to look and listen for approaching trains. What he must do in such a case will depend upon circumstances. If the view of the track is obstructed, he should take greater pains to listen. If, taking these precautions, he would have seen or heard the approaching train, the very fact of injury will raise a presumption that he did not take the required precautions." The noise caused by the rumble of his empty wagon was an additional reason for caution, and his knowledge that the track was hidden by the corn was a reason for his taking more than ordinary precautions against meeting the train. Instead of taking any precautions, the testimony of all who saw him is that he was driving at a rapid gait towards the crossing. The only inference to be drawn from his conduct in view of his knowledge of the surroundings is that he was attempting to get across the track before the cars should come along. If such be the case, it can only be regarded as recklessness. Hager v. Southern Pac. Co., 98 Cal. 309, 33 Pac. 119. The judgment is reversed.

Intervener. S. F. 1,843).

APPEAL—ADVERSE PARTIES—NOTICE OF APPEAL—DISMISSAL.

Where, in an action on notes executed by one defendant, judgment is entered against the defendants for the amount due, and that an intervener, who claims an interest in one of the notes, has no interest therein, the appeal of the intervener would not be dismissed because defendants are not served with notice of the appeal, since a reversal of the judgment as between the plaintiff and intervener would not affect the defendants, and they are not, therefore, adverse parties to the intervener on such appeal.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by Henry Mohr against Kate C. Byrne and others (H. I. Kowalsky, intervener). From a judgment for plaintiff, the intervener appeals. Motion to dismiss the appeal denied.

W. A. Kirkwood and W. C. Sheperd, for plaintiff. W. H. H. Hart and Wilson & Wilson, for defendants. H. I. Kowalsky, for intervener.

HARRISON, J. Motion to dismiss the appeal of the intervener for failure to serve all of the adverse parties. The plaintiff brought this action to recover from the defendant Kate C. Byrne the amount due upon certain promissory notes executed by her, and that the defendant Florence Blythe Hinckley be directed to pay the said judgment out of certain moneys owing by her to said Byrne. Issues were joined upon this complaint by the defendants Hinckley and Byrne, and a complaint in intervention was filed by the appellant, Kowalsky. Judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant Hinckley for the amount found due on the notes, and, in case he should be unable to collect the same from her, that he recover the same from the defendant Byrne, and that the intervener take nothing by the action. From this judgment the intervener appealed. His appeal, so far as it affects the defendant Byrne, was dismissed December 31, 1900, upon the ground that he had not served her with the notice of his appeal. 63 Pac. 341. The defendant Hinckley now moves to dismiss his appeal upon the ground that the defendant Byrne was an adverse party, and his failure to serve her has taken away the jurisdiction of this court to hear the appeal.

The "adverse party" who is to be served with the notice of appeal is one whose interest in the subject-matter of the appeal will be affected by the reversal or modification of the judgment or order appealed from. Whether the parties to an action are adverse to each other is to be determined from the record (Harper v. Hildreth, 99 Cal. 265, 33 Pac. 1103), and the record herein fails to show that upon the appeal of the intervener the interest of the defendant Byrne is adverse to that of the defendant Hinckley, or that his appeal cannot be determined without affecting her interest. By his complaint in intervention he seeks to have it determined that, as against the plaintiff, he is entitled to a certain interest in one of the notes set forth in the complaint, and upon that issue the court found against his claim. He does not seek relief against any other party to the action, and his controversy with the plaintiff can be determined without the presence of the defendant Byrne. The judgment against him can be reversed or modified without affecting her rights or changing the judgment against her. The motion is denied.

The suit was brought to recover of the defendant liquidated damages amounting to $1,300, alleged to be due under the provisions of section 629 of the Civil Code, for refusal to furnish gas to the plaintiff. The judgment was for the defendant, and the plaintiff appeals. The provision of the Code in question is that, "upon the application in writing of the owner or occupant of any building or premises distant not more than one hundred feet from any main of the corporation * * * the corporation must supply gas as required for such building or premises," etc.; and, further, that "if, for the space of ten days after such application, the corporation refuses or neglects to supply the gas required, it must pay to the applicant the sum of fifty dollars as liquidated damages, and five dollars a day as liquidated damages for every day such refusal or neglect continues thereafter." The case as presented by the findings is as follows: The defendant is a corporation engaged in supplying the city of Sacramento with gas, and the plaintiff is an occupant of premises within 100 feet of one of its mains. September 22, 1898, the plaintiff served on the defendant a written notice, which (omitting date, address, and signature) was as follows: "You will please immediately supply me with gas for the premises occupied by me," etc. (describing them). The defendant, in reply, within 10 days thereafter "notified plaintiff that it would supply plaintiff with gas for said building and, premises if plaintiff would furnish a meter, or agree to pay defendant fifty cents per month as rent for a meter"; and "plaintiff refused to furnish a meter, or to pay said rent to the defendant." The rent demanded was found by the court to be "fair and equitable," representing the monthly cost of the meter to the defendant for care, labor, interest on investment, etc. But it is found that the defendant had no rule requiring payment of rent for meters, nor did it charge its other customers therefor. The defendant, it seems, had, prior to September 8, 1898, been supplying plaintiff with gas; but the plaintiff, during the year preceding that date, had used electrical lights mainly, and almost exclusively, and the total amount of gas used on the premises amounted only to the value of $1.75; and the defendant on that date had removed the meter, thereby depriving the plaintiff of gas. It is found, in a passage following the statement of the above facts and the written notice, that "said gas" was and is necessary for the plaintiff's use on the premises in question; but, unless this expression be construed as referring to the gas used prior to September 8, 1898, it does not appear how much or what gas was needed.

There can be no doubt, I think, of the right of gas companies ordinarily to charge rent for meters. Civ. Code, § 632; Sheward v. Water Co., 90 Cal. 641, 27 Pac. 439. But the point is made by the appellant that in charging him with such rent when other consumers were not required to pay it "the defendant arbitrarily discriminated against the plaintiff." But I do not think this is the case. Ordinarily, compensation for the meter is received from the return for the gas consumed. But here the value of the gas consumed during the year preceding the removal of the meter was not equal to a sixth part of the annual expense of the meter. The plaintiff's written demand did not specify, even in a general way, the amount of gas required, or even that he required more gas than he had been in the habit of using (Andrews v. Power Co. [City Ct. N. Y.] 51 N. Y. Supp. 872), and the defendant was quite justified in supposing that he required no more (Code Civ. Proc. § 1963; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 41). A "state of mind once proved to exist is presumed to remain such until the contrary appears." 1 Greenl. Ev. § 42. The case, therefore, stands as though the plaintiff's demand had been simply for the restoration of the status quo; i. e. for the use of the quantity of gas he had been using. The plaintiff's case was, therefore, altogether exceptional, and, we may assume, unique; for there is neither finding nor allegation that there were any others in the same category, and, if none, then there was no discrimination. But, if there were any such, it devolved on the plaintiff to allege and to prove it; for, to render one liable for a penalty, every material fact necessary to bring the case within the statute must be affirmatively shown. Conly v. Clay, 90 Hun, 20, 35 N. Y. Supp. 521; Village of Hardwick v. Vermont Telephone & Telegraph Co. (Vt.) 40 Atl. 169. The defendant was justified, then, in notifying the plaintiff that he would be charged with rent for the meter if supplied by the company, and the plaintiff's refusal to agree to this was its sufficient justification in refusing to furnish gas. I advise that the judgment be affirmed.

PEOPLE v. BIRD. (Cr. 692.)

CRIMINAL LAW—PRELIMINARY EXAMINATION—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

1. Under Pen. Code, § 686, providing that a defendant shall have the right to confront the witnesses against him, except where the charge has been preliminarily examined by a committing magistrate, and the testimony taken down in the presence of defendant, the prosecution cannot introduce the testimony of a deceased witness, which was taken on a former trial of the case.

2. An accused may waive the right of confronting his witnesses secured by Pen. Code, § 686, and hence may introduce in evidence the testimony of a deceased witness, whether the testimony was given at the preliminary examination or on a former trial.

3. Where irrelevant evidence, prejudicial to accused, is admitted on assurance of the prosecutor to connect it with the case, and he fails to do so, it is proper for the court to strike it out, and instruct the jury to disregard it.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; John L. Campbell, Judge.

R. A. Bird was convicted of forgery, and he appeals. Reversed.

R. A. Bird, in pro. per. Atty. Gen. Ford, for the People.

HENSHAW, J. This is an appeal from a judgment of conviction of the crime of forgery. The facts sufficient for an understanding of the matters of law here presented for consideration will be found in the former appeal of People v. Bird, 124 Cal. 33, 56 Pac. 639. Upon the trial of this cause, a witness (Grove), the teller of the bank who had paid the money on the check presented by defendant, was admitted to be dead. He had testified at the preliminary examination of defendant and upon two trials of this case. The prosecution offered, and there was admitted in evidence, the testimony of the deceased witness given upon the preliminary examination. The defendant then, in various ways and by different offers, sought to introduce in evidence the testimony of Grove given at the former trials of this case, and the evidence was excluded. Some objection is here made by respondent to the sufficiency of the form of these offers, but the objections are too technical to justify consideration in so important a matter; for it is plain that the rulings of the court went, not to the form of the objection, but to the single proposition that the testimony of the deceased witness, given upon former trials, was under no circumstances admissible, and that only the testimony that such a witness had given upon preliminary examination was admissible. At common law the testimony of a witness, given upon a former trial of a cause between the same parties, was admissible for or against either party, upon showing that he was dead or without the jurisdiction of the court. Such was the undoubted rule of evidence at common law, and before the adoption of the Codes it was sanctioned and employed in this state. People v. Murphy, 45 Cal. 137; Same v. Devine, 46 Cal. 46; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 1631, and note; 1 Bish. Cr. Proc. § 527. In Mattox v. U. S., 156 U. S. 237, 15 Sup. Ct. 337, 39 L. Ed. 409, the question is learnedly considered and elaborately treated, the cases are reviewed, and it is declared that authority is overwhelming in favor of the admissibility of such testimony for or against the defendant, when the defendant was present, either at the examination of the deceased witness before a committing magistrate, or at the former trial, with an opportunity for a cross-examination afforded him. Upon the adoption of our Codes, it was provided by section 1870 of the Code of Civil Procedure (subdivision 8) that the testimony of a witness deceased or out of the jurisdiction, or unable to testify, given in a former action between the same parties relating to the same matter, is admissible; and, as the rules of evidence in civil actions are applicable also to criminal actions, except as otherwise provided in the Code (section 1102, Pen. Code), the same rule obtains in this state, unless changed by positive enactments. There has been by section 686 of the Penal Code a restriction placed upon, and a narrowing of, this common-law rule of evidence. Under the title of the "Rights of Defendant in a Criminal Action," it is provided that a defendant shall have the right of confrontation of the witnesses against him, saving in those cases where the charge has been preliminarily examined by a committing magistrate, the testimony taken down by question and answer in the presence of the defendant, who either in person or by counsel has cross-examined, or had an opportunity to cross-examine, the witness, or where the testimony of a witness, who is unable to give security for his appearance, has been taken conditionally in like manner in the presence of the defendant. It is here to be noted that the section is declarative of the rights of a defendant, and, in so defining those rights, limits the evidence, and the mode and manner of its production and introduction, which may be employed against him. In effect, therefore, and as our decisions hold, it deprives the prosecution of the right which theretofore it enjoyed of introducing against a defendant the evidence of a deceased or absent witness, unless taken before a committing magistrate, or by deposition in the mode prescribed. It forbids the introduction of the testimony of such witness, absent or deceased, which may have been given upon a former trial of the cause. Why the legislature should have so modified the common-law rule, we need not now stop to inquire. Sufficient to say that it is quite plain that it has done so. People v. Oiler, 66 Cal. 101, 4 Pac. 1066; Same v. Chin Hane, 108 Cal. 597, 41 Pac. 697; Same v. Sierp, 116 Cal. 251, 48 Pac. 88; Same v. Cady, 117 Cal. 10, 48 Pac. 908; Same v. Plyler, 126 Cal. 382, 58 Pac. 904.

But, upon the other hand, there is in this no restriction upon the rights of a defendant. The rule as to him is the same as it was before the adoption of the Codes, and as it stood at common law. He may waive his right of confrontation, if he so desires, and introduce in evidence the testimony of such dead or absent witnesses, whether that testimony was given at the preliminary examination or upon a former trial of the cause.

The refusal of the court to admit the testimony of George Francis and of C. C. Corum, given upon the former trial of the cause, was, for the reasons above stated, also prejudicial error. The offer was not alone to prove the testimony by the recollection of the official reporter, reinforced by his stenographic notes, but included as well an offer to prove it by the official transcript of those notes on file in the court.

No other of appellant's specifications seems to require particular mention, saving one, where the court admitted evidence clearly prejudicial to defendant concerning his presence with, and relations to, a certain woman, under a general assurance of the prosecution to connect it with the case. Upon the failure so to do, the court properly struck out the evidence, and instructed the jury to disregard it. The practice, however, is one not to be commended; for there is inevitably some impression made and effect left upon the minds of the jurors. The judgment appealed from is therefore reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

(Supreme Court of California. March 12, 1901.)

APPEAL BOND—FILING—RECORD—CERTIFICATION.

Code Civ. Proc. § 940, provides that an appeal is ineffectual unless, within five days after notice thereof, an undertaking be filed, or a deposit of money be made. Sections 950 to 953 require copies of the notice, judgment roll, and other papers to be furnished the appellate court, accompanied with a certificate of the clerk or attorneys "that an undertaking on appeal in due form has been properly filed or a stipulation of the parties waiving an undertaking." Held, that a reference in the transcript in the clerk's certificate to the record, that "an undertaking in due form of law is on file in my office," was insufficient to show that an "undertaking on appeal" was filed in due time.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Luis Obispo county; E. P. Unangst, Judge.

Action by the Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Company of California against John Edgar. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Dismissed.

Graves & Graves, for appellant. Fox & Gray, for respondent.

COOPER, C. Respondent asks that the appeal herein be dismissed because the transcript fails to show that an undertaking on appeal in due form was properly filed. Respondent's brief was served and filed in September, 1899. Appellant has not suggested any diminution of the record, or offered to supply any proof as to the filing of an undertaking. The Code of Civil Procedure provides (section 940) that "the appeal is ineffectual for any purpose unless within five days after service of the notice of appeal an undertaking be filed, or a deposit of money be made with the clerk as herein-after provided, or the undertaking be waived by the adverse party in writing." Sections 950-952 provide that copies of the notice of appeal, judgment roll, statement, bill of exceptions, and other papers must be furnished the appellate court; and in section 953 it is provided that the copies so furnished must be certified by the clerk or the attorneys to be correct, "and must be accompanied with a certificate of the clerk or attorneys that an undertaking on appeal in due form has been properly filed or a stipulation of the parties waiving an undertaking." The language of the Code is unambiguous, and it has been held that the transcript must show that an undertaking has been filed in due time. Franklin v. Reiner, 8 Cal. 341; Wakeman v. Coleman, 28 Cal. 59; Railroad Co. v. Anderson, 77 Cal. 297, 19 Pac. 517.

In this case the only reference to any undertaking in the transcript is in the clerk's certificate to the record. After certifying that the copies of the complaint, demurrer, order overruling demurrer, answer, answer to counterclaim, judgment, bill of exceptions, and notice of appeal are true and correct, the certificate states: "I further certify that an undertaking in due form of law is on file in my office." This is clearly insufficient. It does not appear that it refers to an undertaking on appeal, nor that it was properly filed, neither does it show the date of filing. While we would not, in all cases, require the exact language of the Code to be followed in the certificate, yet it must appear that an undertaking on appeal has been properly filed. If the certificate does not so state, it might show the date of filing the undertaking or a copy of the undertaking. It must appear, however, that such an undertaking has been filed either "properly" or of a date that shows it was in due time. The appeal should be dismissed.

et al. (L. A. 771.)¹

INJUNCTION—IRRIGATION CANAL—CONVEYANCE—DEED—RESERVATION—REPAIRS—AGREEMENT—CONSTRUCTION.

A conveyance of a canal by deed reserved a perpetual right of way to carry 350 inches of water, subject to the vendor's payment of such proportion of the entire expense of maintaining and repairing such canal as the 350 inches should bear to the entire amount of water from time to time being carried through such canal. Held, that the vendor's successors were not obliged to pay the expenses specified in the reservation as a condition precedent to have their water flow through the canal, the right thereby given being one of reimbursement merely.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Riverside county; J. W. Ballard, Judge.

Injunction by J. W. Smith and others against the Stearns Ranchos Company and others. From an order granting the injunction with leave to defendants under conditions to have the same vacated, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

See 61 Pac. 662.

John G. North and Purington & Adair, for appellants. E. W. McGraw, for respondents.

VAN DYKE, J. This was a suit for an injunction to restrain the defendants from stopping the flow of plaintiffs' water in the North Riverside & Jurupa Canal, or depriving the plaintiffs of the enjoyment of their easement therein. A temporary injunction was granted as prayed for, and after the trial the injunction was made permanent, "provided, however, that said defendant I. D. Rogers may, at any time he may desire, make out and present to each and every of said plaintiffs herein a statement, claim, or bill for and on account of their proportion of the expense of the maintenance and repair of said canal during the times hereinbefore mentioned, eliminating therefrom the charge above-named of $135 for abstracting; and that thereafter the said defendant I. D. Rogers may apply to this court to have this decree vacated and set aside as to the injunction hereinbefore granted; and upon sufficient showing to this court that such statement, claim, or bill eliminating said charge for said abstracting has been so made out and presented to plaintiffs, then said defendant I. D. Rogers shall be entitled to have this decree, so far as it grants an injunction against said defendant, vacated and set aside." The plaintiffs appeal from the judgment so made and entered. On February 5, 1890, the North Riverside Land & Water Company, a corporation, party of the first part, then the owner of the canal or irrigating ditch referred to in this case, conveyed the same by deed of that date to the Stearns Ranchos Company, a corporation, party of the second part, which deed contained the following reservation: "Hereby especially reserving, however, the perpetual right of way to carry through such canal the three hundred and fifty inches of water, being same 350 inches of water reserved by first party in its conveyance of other water to second party by indenture dated March 23, 1888, * * * subject, however, to the first party's paying the proportion of the entire expense of maintaining and repairing such canal that 350 inches of water sustains and bears to the entire amount of water from time to time being carried through such canal." In Rogers v. Irrigating Co. (L. A. 772) 64 Pac. 95, we had occasion to consider this grant, and the reservation in said conveyance above quoted, and to determine what expenses or services were or might be included within the terms "maintaining and repairing such canal." The plaintiffs and appellants, 52 in number, are grantees and successors of the North Riverside Land & Water Company, and the defendant and respondent I. D. Rogers is the lessee of the Stearns Ranchos Company, and in the management and possession of said canal or irrigating ditch. The water in question, which it is sought to restrain the defendant from shutting off or interfering with, belongs to the several plaintiffs and appellants, and not to the owner of the canal, or the lessee of such owner; and it is contended on the part of appellants that their right to have such water flow through said canal is not dependent upon the condition precedent that they should pay the proportion of the expenses specified in the reservation referred to, but that the meaning is that the party to whom such right is reserved agrees or covenants to pay such proportion of the entire expense. We think the contention of the appellants must be sustained. It cannot be determined in advance what the expense of maintaining and repairing the canal will be, nor can the whole amount of water carried in the canal at any particular time be determined in advance; and by the right reserved in said grant it is only agreed to pay the proportion of the entire expense "that 350 inches of water sustains and bears to the entire amount of water from time to time being carried through such canal." There may be a wide difference of opinion between the owner of the canal and the owner of the portion of water entitled to have it carried therein in reference to the expenses of maintaining and repairing the canal. There is nothing in the language of the reservation from which it can be inferred that the parties to the deed intended that the owner of the canal should, in such case, be the sole judge of what should constitute maintaining and repairing, or the amount thereof. In this case, for instance, the defendant Rogers, in his claim for maintaining and repairing the canal, overcharged to the extent of $135, which was disallowed by the court. The right of the appellants to have their water carried through the canal under the terms of the reservation in question is an easement, and constitutes property. It would not do to give the owner or the manager of the canal the power to deprive the owner of the water of the right to have the same conveyed therein, unless he should submit to paying such expenses for maintaining and repairing as the company or its lessee might see fit to charge. The cases referred to by respondents' counsel of water companies or gas companies possessing the power to shut off water or gas for nonpayment of rates have no application here. In such cases the rate of water or gas is previously ascertained and fixed. Here, as already stated, the proportion of the expenses to be paid is not fixed, and, in the nature of things, cannot be fixed, in advance. Besides, water and gas companies own the water or gas, as the case may be, supplied to the customer, and should not be compelled to part with their property without being paid therefor. Here the owner of the canal does not own the water, and when it flows down to the owner thereof the canal company parts with no property. The right of the Stearns Ranchos Company under the terms of the reservation is simply to be reimbursed for the expenses of maintaining and repairing the canal, by the parties having an easement therein, in the proportions stated in the said reservation. The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

THOMASON et al. v. CARROLL et ux. (S. F. 2,392.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—STREET IMPROVEMENTS—PROTEST BY PROPERTY OWNERS—SUFFICIENCY OF PROTEST.

1. St. 1891, p. 196, § 3, provides that the owners of a majority of the frontage of property on a proposed street improvement may make a written objection to the same, and that such objection shall be a bar for six months to any further proceedings. Held, that such objection not only suspends the right of the board of supervisors to make the improvements, but precludes its subsequent construction after the expiration of six months without a republication of notice of intention.

2. Under St. 1891, p. 196, § 3, providing that the owners of a majority of the frontage of property on a proposed street improvement may file a written objection thereto with the clerk of the city council, who shall indorse the date of filing thereon, and it shall then be a bar to any further proceedings for six months, a protest duly filed is not insufficient because the indorsement of filing thereon is not signed by the clerk; hence he is not required to certify thereon.

3. Under St. 1891, p. 196, § 3, providing that a proposed street improvement may be suspended on the filing of objections, by a majority of the owners of property fronting thereon, within 10 days from the expiration of the time of publication of notice of intention, such protest is not invalid, as prematurely filed, because it is filed before the last day of the publication.

4. Where an erroneous finding is not made the basis of judgment rendered, it is harmless error.

5. The right to protest, under St. 1891, p. 196, § 3, providing that the owners of a majority of the frontage of property on a street improvement may protest against such proposed municipal improvement, which shall suspend proceedings thereon for six months, is not affected by later provisions in the section, providing that the council may, under certain circumstances, disregard such objections.

Commissioners' decision. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Edward A. Belcher, Judge.

Action by E. R. Thomason and another against John J. Carroll and wife to enforce the lien of a street-improvement assessment. From a judgment in favor of the defendants, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, the plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

J. C. Bates, for appellants. H. N. & Jabish Clement and D. H. Whittemore, for respondents.

CHIPMAN, C. Action to foreclose a street-assessment lien. Defendants had judgment, from which, and from the order denying motion for new trial, plaintiffs appeal.

It was admitted at the trial that the assessment, warrant, diagram, and certificate were all in due form, and that they constituted a prima facie case for plaintiffs, who are assignees of one C. F. Cormack, the contractor. The work ordered was for paving and laying granite curbs on Guerrero street, between Eighteenth and Nineteenth streets, in the city and county of San Francisco; the total frontage of the work being 1,040 feet. It was alleged in the answer "that the owners of the major portion of the frontage of the lots fronting on said proposed work filed with the clerk of said board [the supervisors] written objections to the same within 10 days after the expiration of the time of the publication and posting of the notice of the passage of the resolution of the board, declaring their intention to order said work, and said owners never petitioned to have said work done," and that the board never acquired jurisdiction to order said work. The court found the above allegations of the answer to be true, and this finding is challenged. On May 15, 1893, more than six months after the protest was filed, the board ordered the work done without republication and posting of a resolution of intention, as required by section 3, Act March 31, 1891 (St. 1891, p. 196). Such order was invalid, if there was a valid protest filed. Improvement Co. v. Babcock, 123 Cal. 205, 55 Pac. 762; Paving Co. v. Reynolds (Cal.) 62 Pac. 212. Appellants contend that the board had authority to order the work, because (1) the protest was not filed in time, and (2) it was not indorsed by the clerk. Defendants produced from the office of the clerk of the board and offered in evidence a document, with certain indorsements thereon. The document was a protest addressed to the board, dated San Francisco, October —, 1892, and purported to be signed by the owners of 658½ feet of the frontage, being more than one-half of the frontage on Guerrero street proposed to be improved. The protest had thereon the following indorsements: "Protest. Property owners. Against paving Guerrero St. between 18th and 19th streets, 638½ feet." "Oct. 10-92, S. C. recom. & Int. 7,721." By rubber stamp indorsed as follows: "Majority protest, which, under the law, stops further proceedings for 6 months. Oct. 27, 1892." Further indorsed as follows: "Clerk's Office. Filed Oct. 24, 1892. San Francisco. Board of Supervisors, No. 27." "Protest. Guerrero street between 18th and 19th Sts. Dated Oct. 24, 1892."

Plaintiffs objected to the evidence on the grounds: (1) That there is no evidence that the above document "was ever filed or officially indorsed by the clerk, or any one," and therefore it "did not amount to a protest, under section 3 of the street law, or have the effect to stop or bar further or any proceedings, for six months or any time"; (2) there was no evidence of the genuineness of the signatures to the protest, or of any ownership of any lots fronting on the work. The objections were overruled, and plaintiffs excepted. The second ground of objection is not now urged. The only resolution of intention was adopted October 10, 1892, and was regularly posted October 14th, and regularly published, daily, the first insertion being October 17 and the last October 24, 1892.

The report of the street committee, and the action of the board thereon, appeared from the minutes of the board of October 24, 1892, as follows: "Petitions, protests, etc., were presented, received, and referred, as follows: * * * To the committee on streets, wharves, grades, and public squares, * * * protests: * * * Guerrero street, between Eighteenth and Nineteenth streets." The minutes of October 31, 1892, were read, showing as follows: "The committee on streets, * * * by Supervisor Taber, presented a report, which was received, read, and, on motion, adopted as the action of the board on the matters contained therein." The committee on streets filed their report October 31, 1892, and the minutes relating thereto read as follows: "The following protests against performance of street work, each representing a majority of the property liable for the cost of the work thereof, bar for six months any further proceedings in relation thereto, to wit: * * * Against paving, etc., Guerrero street, between 18th and 19th streets." Plaintiffs objected to this evidence, on the ground that the board did no more than "to adopt the legal opinion of the committee as to the effect of the protest, if legally and officially filed and indorsed as provided by section 3 of the general street law." The objection was overruled, and plaintiffs excepted. The foregoing constituted all the evidence in the case.

1. It is urged that the evidence fails to show any filing of a protest because the indorsements appearing on the document are not authenticated by the clerk's signature. The contention seems to be that it was the duty of the clerk to authenticate the indorsements, failing in which the evidence was inadmissible, and proved nothing if admitted. The statute provides that the owners of a majority of the frontage of the property fronting on the proposed work "may make a written objection to the same within ten days after the expiration of the time of the publication and posting of said notice, (notice of street work), which objection shall be delivered to the clerk of the city council, who shall indorse thereon the date of its reception by him, and such objections so delivered and indorsed shall be a bar for six months to any further proceedings in relation to the doing of said work or making said improvement, unless the owners of the majority of the frontage, as aforesaid, shall meanwhile petition for the same." St. 1891, p. 196, § 3. The statute does not require the clerk to do more than indorse on the protest the date of its reception by him. He is not required to authenticate his indorsement by any certificate. If the protest were in fact filed with the clerk, his failure to indorse the date when received would not defeat its object; for the fact could be proved as any other fact, by proper evidence. When the document was deposited with the clerk for filing or indorsement, it was, in contemplation of law, filed with the board. Tregambo v. Mining Co., 57 Cal. 501. In Rauer v. Lowe, 107 Cal. 229, 40 Pac. 337, and Warren v. Ferguson, 108 Cal. 535, 41 Pac. 417, cited by appellants, the engineer had failed to make the certificate required by the statute. But, as we have seen, no such certificate is required of the clerk. In the present case the protest was produced from the records of the board in their official custody, and showed the indorsements as above stated, and it appeared by the minutes of the board that the protest was filed October 24, 1892. We think this made sufficient proof of the facts.

2. It is also contended that the protest was prematurely filed, and was therefore ineffectual to accomplish any purpose. The point made is that the posting and publication of the "notice of street work" must have been completed, after which 10 days are given within which to file the protest. If filed after said 10 days, it is claimed to be too late, and, if before, it is too soon. The resolution was passed October 10th, was posted October 14th, and the first publication was October 17th and continued daily to and including October 24th, on which latter day the protest was filed. Section 3 of the act requires the notice "to be published for six days." It was held in Warren v. Russell (Cal.) 62 Pac. 75, that the protest, not having been filed within the 10 days prescribed by the street law, was too late to give jurisdiction in the premises to the board of supervisors. We think, however, that the statute is intended to prescribe the time within which the protest shall be filed, or, in other words, beyond which it cannot be made, and that the protest may be filed at any time after publication has been made, although not yet completed. The object of the law is to apprise the owners of the lots by the notice of the contemplated improvement, and we can see no reason for holding that the lot owners may not file their objections as soon as the notice is published. There was an obvious purpose in limiting the time beyond which the owners could not object, but we can see no reason for providing that a protest must not be made until the notice has run the six full days, and we do not think the law should receive the construction contended for by appellants. The situation is not unlike that of a person holding a claim against an estate. He is required by the Code to present his claim within the time fixed by the notice to creditors (Code Civ. Proc. § 1453); but he may present it before notice to creditors is published (Janin v. Browne, 59 Cal. 37). In the case here the board received the protest on October 24th, and referred it to the street committee, and that committee acted upon it. The owners would not be heard to say they filed the protest too soon, nor can the board now be heard to dispute the binding force of their act.

3. Finding 4 recites the bringing of an action by plaintiffs' assignor against these defendants to foreclose his lien for the work mentioned in the complaint. That issue was joined, and a trial had, resulting in a judgment in favor of defendants, based upon certain irregularities in the assessment, diagram, and warrant. It is urged, and is true, that there is no evidence to support this finding. The complaint said nothing about such an action being brought, and the answer referred to it only by way of an admission, but the warrant described purported to issue December 7, 1893, while the warrant in the present action is alleged to have issued November 4, 1896, although the work was apparently the same in both instances. The answer does not purport to plead the judgment in bar, and we cannot see why mention was made of the former action either in the answer or in the finding referred to. So far as appears, however, the finding was not made, and could not have been made, the ground for the judgment, and hence there was no injury done to plaintiff by the finding.

4. It is claimed that a majority protest does not stop proceedings where the work is for only one block. Section 3, supra, reads that "the owners of a majority of the property, * * * where the same is for one block or more, may make written objections," etc. The right to protest is not affected by the later provisions in the section, where it is provided that the council may, under certain circumstances, disregard the objections. When a protest is duly filed, the council obtains jurisdiction to order the work by passing upon the legality of the protest. Section 3, supra, provides that "at the expiration of twenty days after the expiration of the time of said publication, * * * if no written objection to the work therein described has been delivered as aforesaid, by the owners of a majority of the frontage, * * * or if any written objection purporting to be signed by the owners of a majority of the frontage is disallowed by said council, * * * the city council shall be deemed to have acquired jurisdiction to order any of the work to be done," etc. In the case here the board declared the protest to be a bar, without which action it would have been their duty, under the act, to fix a time to hear the protest. Having treated the objections as a bar, there was no necessity for giving the owners a hearing. It is advised that the judgment and order be affirmed.

HOFFMAN v. KEETON et al. (S. F. 1,783.)

PLEADING—SUIT IN FICTITIOUS NAME—STATE OF LIMITATIONS—PARTY AB INITIO—ORDER TO AMEND—NO ACTUAL AMENDMENT—NAME IN PUBLIC RECORDS.

1. Where suit was commenced against John Doe, and later the court made an order reciting that the true name of John Doe was B. Sinsheimer, and directing that the latter name be inserted in the complaint in lieu of the former, but the change was not actually made, the order of the court was a sufficient amendment.

2. Where a person was sued by the name of John Doe, and his real name was thereafter substituted in the complaint, but not before the statute of limitations had run against the claim, recovery could nevertheless be had, since the defendant was a party to the action from its commencement.

3. The objection to a recovery against a person sued in the first instance in the name of John Doe, that the plaintiffs might have learned his right name by looking up public records, would not be entertained.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Monterey county; N. A. Dorn, Judge.

Action by Christian Hoffman against Charles Keeton, B. Sinsheimer, and others. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant B. Sinsheimer appeals. Affirmed.

S. F. Geil and Wilcoxon & Bouldin, for appellant. Frank M. Stone, for respondent.

SMITH, C. This is an appeal from a judgment foreclosing a mortgage. The appeal is by the defendant Sinsheimer, to whom, subsequently to the execution of the mortgage, and before the commencement of the suit, an undivided half of the mortgaged premises was conveyed by the mortgagors, the defendants Keeton. The mortgage and the note secured by it were executed January 1, 1891, and became due two years after date. The suit was commenced December 28, 1896, against the defendants Keeton and fictitious defendants John Doe, etc. But by an order made April 13, 1897, reciting that "the true name of John Doe [was] in fact B. Sinsheimer," it was directed that the latter name be inserted in the complaint in lieu of the former. The complaint, it seems, was not actually amended. The defendant Sinsheimer was duly served, and filed his answer, setting up that his name was not John Doe, and that the action was barred by the provisions of section 337, Code Civ. Proc. The court found against him on the latter issue, and judgment was entered accordingly. The points made for reversal are: First, that there is nothing in the complaint to show that appellant was a party to the action, and, consequently, that as to him the judgment is in fact void; and, secondly, that the action was barred as to him by said section.

1. With regard to the first point, the order of the court directing the amendment was in itself a sufficient amendment; and the finding of the court "that the court, by said order, inserted the name of B. Sinsheimer in the complaint," and the recital of the decree to the same effect, are correct. Kittle v. Bellegarde, 86 Cal. 563, 25 Pac. 55. It would have been more regular to have made the amendment in the complaint, but the error, if any, is immaterial (Code Civ. Proc. § 475), and, being merely clerical, may be corrected by the court below at any time (Baldwin v. Bornheimer, 48 Cal. 436). The case of McKinlay v. Tuttle, 42 Cal. 570, has no application. In that case there was no order substituting the names of the defendants Castro for the fictitious names used, or to connect them with the cause of action. Kittle v. Bellegarde, 86 Cal. 563, 25 Pac. 55. See, also, Baldwin v. Bornheimer, supra, where, instead of reversing the judgment, as in McKinlay v. Tuttle, the court below was directed to make the amendment, and the judgment, as amended, was affirmed.

2. The claim that the action was barred by the statute is based on the assumption that the defendant Sinsheimer became party only at the date of the order substituting his name for that of John Doe, which was more than four years after the note and mortgage became due. But this assumption is incorrect. He was sued by the name of John Doe, and "was a party to the action from its commencement." Farris v. Merritt, 63 Cal. 119. There is nothing to show that the plaintiff knew the true name of the fictitious defendant sued, nor can the objection that he might have learned by searching the records be entertained. Irving v. Carpentier, 70 Cal. 25, 27, 11 Pac. 891. The case of Rosencrantz v. Rogers, 40 Cal. 489, has no application. There the appeal was from an order of the lower court dismissing the case as to certain defendants served on grounds there appearing. Here the ruling of the lower court was in favor of the plaintiff, and there is nothing to show that there was error or irregularity. The judgment appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: COOPER, C.; CHIPMAN, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. LEM DEO. (Cr. 659.)

CRIMINAL LAW—MURDER—GRAND JURY—WITNESSES—INTERPLEADER—INDICTMENT—MOTION TO SET ASIDE—DYING STATEMENT—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS—FLIGHT.

1. The defendant, indicted for murder, moved to set aside the indictment under Pen. Code, § 995, providing that an indictment must be set aside when a person is present during the session of the grand jury, when the charge embraced in the indictment is under consideration, except as provided in section 925, which specifies the judge, the district attorney, a stenographer, the members of the grand jury, and witnesses actually under examination. Two of the main witnesses against defendant were Chinese, who could not speak English, and an interpreter was called in. Held, that the interpreter was a witness, within the definitions of Code Civ. Proc. § 1878, declaring that a witness is a person whose declaration under oath is received as evidence for any purpose; and section 2005, providing that an oral examination is one where the testimony is heard from the lips of the witness; since, under section 1884, the interpreter must be sworn, and he states under oath to the jury what the other witness said; and Pen. Code, § 1102, provides that the rules of evidence in civil actions are applicable also to criminal actions, except as otherwise provided; hence the interpreter was properly before the grand jury.

2. Where a man was wounded through the vital parts of the body, and grew continually weaker until he died, five or six hours afterwards, and stated that he expected to die, and that he was not going to live, his dying declaration was sufficiently shown to have been made under a sense of impending death.

3. Where, on a trial for murder, defendant requests an instruction which assumes that the main case of the prosecution rests on circumstantial evidence, when in fact the main proof is direct testimony of eyewitnesses, the instruction should be refused.

4. Where the court instructed as to the flight of a person immediately after "the crime has been committed with which he knows he is charged," an objection to the next sentence of the charge, that it leaves out the proposition of the knowledge of the defendant "either of the fact of the killing of the deceased, or that he (the defendant) was accused of the same," should be overruled; the whole instruction being clearly based on that condition.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Yuba county; E. A. Davis, Judge.

Lem Deo was convicted of murder in the first degree, and appeals. Affirmed.

W. H. Carlin and W. S. Johnson, for appellant. Tirey L. Ford, Atty. Gen., for the People.

McFARLAND, J. The appellant was convicted of murder in the first degree, and sentenced to life imprisonment, and he appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial.

1. The main point made by appellant for a reversal is that the court erred in denying his motion to set aside the indictment, made under section 995 of the Penal Code, upon the ground that a person not mentioned in section 925 of said Code was permitted to be present during the session of the grand jury when the charge against appellant was under consideration. The person alluded to was one Wong Ock, and the facts touching the matter are these: When the grand jury was about to take up the charge against appellant, it was discovered that two of the main witnesses to be examined were Chinese, and could not speak or understand the English language; whereupon the said Wong Ock, also a Chinese, but who understood and could speak both Chinese and English, was subpoenaed and sworn as an interpreter. During the examination of said two witnesses, which occupied about one-half hour, Wong Ock was present and acted as such interpreter; and as soon as said examination was concluded he left, and was not again present, and was not present during any of the deliberations of the grand jury concerning said charge. The court did not err in denying the motion on the ground above stated. Waiving the absurdity of the proposition that the legislature intended that a grand jury should be precluded from inquiring into a public offense where the investigation made necessary the hearing of the testimony of witnesses who spoke only a foreign language, it is evident that the word "witnesses" used in section 925 includes interpreters. The provisions of the Codes make the proposition sufficiently clear. The law of evidence is the same in criminal as in civil cases, except as otherwise provided in the Penal Code. Pen. Code, § 1102. A witness is described in Code Civ. Proc. § 1878, as follows: "A witness is a person whose declaration under oath is received as evidence for any purpose, whether such declaration be made on oral examination, or by deposition or affidavit;" and section 2005 provides that an oral examination is one where the testimony is heard "by the jury or tribunal from the lips of the witness." An interpreter "must be sworn." Id. § 1884. He states under oath to the jury what the other witness said, and this is testimony, —as clearly such as the statement of any ordinary witness who testifies to the declaration or admissions of another person. In 17 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) p. 30, it is said: "An interpreter, whether in the trial of a case in court, or as interpreter of a witness giving his deposition, must give his testimony under oath. In either case he is a witness, and there is every reason for saying that the general rules which govern the testimony of other witnesses apply to him" (citing cases); and that "an interpreter is a witness distinguished from the person whose testimony he interprets"; and again, on page 31: "The testimony of an interpreter, like the testimony of any other witness, may be impeached. His testimony goes to the jury under those rules of law by which the testimony of all witnesses is weighed." The authorities cited support these quotations from the text. Can there be any doubt that perjury could be assigned where an interpreter had knowingly and feloniously sworn falsely as to what the other witness had said? Therefore, what essential of the definition of a witness does an interpreter lack? That he is a witness, and that what he says under oath is testimony, is strikingly illustrated by the case of Scheerer v. Harber, 36 Ind. 536. In that case it was sought to show that the plaintiff had made contradictory statements at a former trial. This was sought to be done by a witness named Smith, who was present at the first trial. But it appeared that the plaintiff was a German, who did not understand English, and had been examined through an interpreter, and it thus appeared that Smith was swearing as to what the interpreter said. It was held that this could not be done, at least without accounting for the absence of the interpreter. The court, having said that an interpreter appointed by the court "is not thus made the agent of the party whose testimony is to be interpreted," proceeds as follows: "The interpreter, on the trial of the cause before the justice, we may assume was duly sworn, because the law required that he should be sworn. He translated what the appellant testified to in the German language into English, and in the latter language delivered it to the justice and the jury. To this extent the interpreter was a witness, and the case falls clearly within the rule that regulates the introduction of evidence of what a witness testified to on a former trial. The rule is, that such evidence is inadmissible unless the witness be dead, out of the jurisdiction, or is insane or sick, and unable to testify, or has been summoned, but appears to have been kept away by the adverse party. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 163. There was no reason whatever shown why the interpreter could not be produced, and therefore there was no foundation laid for the introduction of evidence of what he swore to on the former trial; in other words, of the interpretation he gave of the plaintiff's evidence on that trial. The evidence therefore was incompetent, and should have been stricken out on the motion of the appellant, which seems to have been made as soon as it was ascertained that the witness Smith was testifying to what the interpreter said, instead of what the appellant said." The same ruling was made by this court in People v. Lee Fat, 54 Cal. 527, where the opinion in the above case of Schearer v. Harber is quoted from, and also in People v. Ah Yute, 56 Cal. 119. Under the above views, it is not necessary to inquire whether the re-enactment of section 925 in 1897 repeals, by implication, the statute of March 23, 1872 (St. 1871-72, p. 540), which expressly authorizes the district attorney to have an interpreter before the grand jury.

2. The court did not err in admitting the dying declaration of the deceased, Hoey Goon. He was wounded through the vital parts of the body. He grew continuously weaker from the time of the wounds until he died, about five or six hours afterwards. The physicians in attendance told him, or tried to tell him, through two interpreters, Loy and Mix, that he was going to die. Loy told him, "The doctors cannot do nothing for you; you haven't got no pulse." Mix, in answer to the question, "Well, did the doctors tell you to tell him he was going to die?" said, "The doctor told me the way he was wounded it is fatal." Loy testified: "He told me he was going to die. He said the shot in his leg did not hurt him much, but that he was going to die right there from the shot through his body;" and said that "he expected to die," and that he "was not going to live." Mix testified that deceased said to him, "The way I am wounded, there is no hope for me." There was other evidence, and, although the witnesses now and then used a word not quite so strong to the point of immediate dissolution as those above quoted, yet, taking all the evidence together, and considering all the attending circumstances, it was sufficiently shown that the deceased made the dying declaration under a sense of impending death.

3. The third instruction asked by appellant was properly refused. It assumes that the main case of the prosecution rested upon circumstantial evidence, which was not the fact. The main proof of the prosecution was the direct testimony of eyewitnesses, who testified that they saw the appellant shoot the deceased. Moreover, the substance of the instruction was given in other parts of the charge, and particularly in appellant's instruction No. 5.

4. Appellant complains of the instructions of the court upon the subject of "flight." Appellant's counsel deals with one sentence of the charge by itself, and contends that it leaves out the proposition of the knowledge of the defendant "either of the fact of the killing of the deceased, or that he (the defendant) was accused of the same." But the whole of the instruction must be considered, and the sentence immediately preceding the one objected to speaks of the flight of a person immediately after "the crime has been committed with which he knows he is charged," and the whole instruction is clearly based on this condition. Perhaps it would have been better in the beginning to have held that no instruction about flight should be given at all, and that the significance that should be attached to the fact of flight should be left entirely to the jury upon the arguments of counsel; but it is too late to hold that instructions on that subject are erroneous, for such instructions have been frequently approved. Moreover, the instruction as given in the case at bar was not prejudicial to appellant. The four points above noticed are the only ones made by appellant. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

BLOCK v. KEARNEY. (S. F. 1,780.)

FORCIBLE ENTRY AND DETAINER — JUDGMENTS — MOTION TO SET ASIDE — AFFIDAVIT OF MERITS — SUMMONS — ERROR — PROOF OF SERVICE — COURT — PENALTY — DAMAGES — APPEAL AND ERROR.

1. Where on a motion to set aside a judgment there is no affidavit of merits, the ground of mistake and excusable neglect cannot be considered.

2. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 475, providing that the court must disregard any error or defect which does not affect the substantial rights of the parties, the fact that a summons in unlawful detainer alleges that plaintiff seeks to recover the amount claimed "in U. S. gold coin," while the complaint prays only for an ordinary money judgment, is not ground for setting aside a judgment entered in accordance with the prayer of the complaint, since the error is immaterial and could not harm the defendant.

3. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 410, providing that, when a summons in unlawful detainer is served by a person other than the sheriff, it must be returned with an affidavit of service by such person, it is not necessary that it should appear that the party making the service did so at the request of the plaintiff or his attorneys.

4. Where a judgment in unlawful detainer purports to have been rendered in open court, it cannot be attacked by an affidavit of counsel that it was in fact rendered in the judge's chambers, adjoining the court room; the door being open between the rooms.

5. Where, in an action of unlawful detainer, plaintiff has recovered by way of penalty three times the amount of rent due, it would not be proper to also allow him damages for a frivolous appeal.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by Leo Block against Peter A. Kearney. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order refusing to set aside the judgment, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

R. M. F. Soto (N. Hamilton, of counsel), for appellant. Edmund Tausky and Wallace A. Wise, for respondent.

SMITH, C. Appeals from a judgment for the plaintiff in a suit for unlawful detainer, and from an order refusing to set aside the judgment. One of the grounds of the motion to set aside the judgment is mistake and excusable neglect, etc.; but as there is no affidavit of merits, this ground cannot be considered. The other grounds, which are equally involved in the appeal from the judgment, are (1) the insufficiency of the summons; and (2) of the proof of service; and (3) that the judgment was not rendered in open court. None of these grounds can be sustained.

1. The only objection to the summons that need be considered is that it states, in referring to the relief sought, that the plaintiff seeks to recover the amount claimed "in U. S. gold coin," whereas the complaint prays only for an ordinary money judgment. This was doubtless erroneous, but the error was corrected by the complaint, which was attached, and the judgment was rendered in accordance with the prayer of the complaint. The error was immaterial, and could not have harmed the defendant. Code Civ. Proc. § 475.

2. As to the proof of service, the objection is that it does not appear "that the party making the service did so at the request of the plaintiff or his attorneys." But it was unnecessary that it should do so. Code Civ. Proc. § 410.

3. The judgment purports to have been rendered in open court; but it is stated in the affidavit of plaintiff's counsel, in the bill of exceptions, that it was in fact rendered in the judge's chambers, adjoining the court room,—the door being open between the rooms. I do not think, however, that the judgment can be attacked in this way. Nor is there any reason why the court may not hold its sessions, when it has been so ordered, in any room of the court house, or elsewhere, provided it conforms to the requirements of the law. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 73, 142, 144.

The respondent asks that damages may be allowed for frivolous appeal. But as he has already recovered, by way of penalty, three times the amount of rent due, we do not think it would be proper to grant such relief. The judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: COOPER, C.; CHIPMAN, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order are affirmed.

In re TOMPKINS. (S. F. 1,742.)

WILL—ADVANCEMENT—TESTATRIX'S INTENTION—EXTRINSIC EVIDENCE—RELEASE OF INDEBTEDNESS.

Where a will bequeathed all the residuary estate of the testatrix in equal shares to her children, but provided that amounts of money formerly loaned to two of them should be deducted, as advancements, from their distributive portions, an instrument, executed prior to the making of the will, releasing them from all liability to the testatrix for the loans in question, is not admissible to show the intention of the testatrix, since such prior release could not affect her right to make such disposition of her property as she saw fit.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; John Ellsworth, Judge.

Judicial settlement of the estate of Eliza Tompkins, deceased. From a final decree excluding Albert and Ira Tompkins from any share in the estate, they appeal. Affirmed.

Reed & Nusbaumer, for appellants. Metcalf & Metcalf and Wm. R. Davis, for respondents.

HARRISON, J. In the ninth paragraph of her will the testatrix disposed of the residue of her estate to her six children (naming them), share and share alike, and at the close of this paragraph made the following statement: "I declare that I have heretofore loaned to my son Albert Tompkins the sum and amount of $4,000, to my son Ira Tompkins the sum and amount of $4,000, and to my son William C. Tompkins the sum and amount of $1,000, upon all of which amounts I have and do remit interest; but I hereby will and direct that the respective amounts aforesaid, or whatever may be yet owing and unpaid by my said sons to me at the time of my death, be respectively deducted from the respective distributive portions to which they would otherwise be entitled, and my estate have due credit therefor." William C. Tompkins, named therein, died before the testatrix. Upon the hearing of the application for distribution, the attorney for the above-named Albert and Ira Tompkins offered in their behalf the following instrument, which had been received by them from the testatrix in 1886: "My Dear Sons Albert and Ira: As I understand it, the question you now submit to me is one of honor, more than law. Therefore I waive all technicalities, and undertake to answer it upon the strict rules of equity. It is and always has been my purpose and desire to have the children share alike in the property. I have concluded, after carefully reviewing the matter, that inasmuch as the $7,000 taken from the avails of the North Troy property in 1873, and at the time of your father's death, charged to Tompkins Bros., was used, together with your efforts, to secure to all the heirs father's life insurance, and my title to said real estate, that it should be charged to all the heirs jointly, instead of being assumed by you two alone. And inasmuch as I gave to each of the other children $1,000 at the time of father's death, and inasmuch as the agreement now held by me, in which you promise to pay me $5,000 and the note of $3,000, making a total of $8,000, is really the old $7,000.00. And in consideration of the interest paid me on said $8,000, that I will cancel both said agreement and note, and do hereby so cancel them, and up to this date do hereby pass you a receipt in full of all demands or claims due me. May 14, '86. Eliza A. Tompkins. Witness: S. Foster." Upon the objection of one of the other children, the court excluded this instrument from evidence, and, in its decree of distribution, excluded the said Albert and Ira from any share of the estate. From this decree they have appealed.

It is contended by the appellants that the court erred in refusing to admit in evidence the above letter from the testatrix; that this instrument was one of the "circumstances" under which the will was made, and should have been considered by the court in ascertaining her intention in the above-quoted clause of her will; that the effect of the instrument was to release the appellants from all liability to her for the money she had loaned them, and therefore the amounts of these loans should not have been deducted from the portion of her estate to which they would otherwise have been entitled. If it should be conceded that this instrument would have been a defense to any action thereafter brought by Mrs. Tompkins for a recovery of the money thus loaned, it does not follow that it is available to qualify the language of the will. There is no inconsistency on her part in releasing her sons from their obligation to repay the money thus loaned to them, and afterwards determining that the amounts so loaned should be treated as an "advancement," and declaring in her will that they should be deducted from the distributive portion of her estate to which they would otherwise be entitled. The instrument of release was executed in 1886, and, whatever motive may have then prompted her to give it, she was not thereby precluded from making in 1892 such testamentary disposition of her property as she desired; and if she deemed it just or proper, for the purpose of bestowing upon each of her children an equal portion of her property, that the amounts received by these sons should be deducted from their shares, she was at liberty to express such purpose in her will, and, if so expressed, it is the duty of the court to carry it into effect. Whether such was her intention must be determined from the terms of the will itself. The will must be interpreted by the language which she has used therein, and cannot be affected by an instrument made by her several years previous, and to which she makes no reference. The circumstances under which the will is made are to be taken into view only when there is an uncertainty "arising upon the face of the will," and only for the purpose of ascertaining "from the words of the will" the intention of the testator. Civ. Code, § 1318. Even if it could be shown that her execution of the document of 1886 had escaped her memory, it would merely result that the purpose or motive for directing the deduction was produced by a mistake or oversight, and would constitute no reason for disregarding the language of her will. "It is incompetent to show by any extrinsic evidence that the testator has, by his own mistake or that of some other person, given a legacy of less value or of a different character from that which he in fact actually meant to give." Underh. Wills, § 912. See, also, Harrison v. Haskins, 2 Pat. & H. 388; Rop. Leg. 1461 (8). In Re Aird's Estate, 12 Ch. Div. 291, the testator recited in his will that he had advanced £4,000 sterling to each of his sons, and directed that said sums, or so much as should not have been repaid at the time of his death, should be considered as an advancement and deducted from his share of the estate. It was shown that this recital was erroneous, and that he had in fact advanced to one of his sons only about £3,000 sterling, and it was sought to charge his share with only the amount actually advanced. The court, however, held that he was bound by the recital, and that the direction to deduct the £4,000 sterling must be observed, saying: "If the testator was in error in the view in which he was proceeding, it appears to me that the error is binding on those who benefit under his will."

In the above clause quoted from her will, the testatrix, after declaring that she had previously "loaned" to each of the appellants the sum of $4,000, expressly directs that her estate "shall have due credit therefor," and that "these amounts" shall be respectively deducted from the shares to which the appellants would otherwise be entitled, thus making the sums loaned to them a part of the corpus of her estate, which she had declared in a previous portion of the same paragraph should be equally divided between her children. Her declaration remitting the interest on the amounts loaned implies that in her mind the obligation of her sons for the loans had not been removed, even though such obligation was not enforceable against them; and the use of the phrase, "I do remit interest," shows that in her mind this obligation existed at the time she executed the will. The parenthetic clause, "or whatever may be yet owing and unpaid by my said sons to me at the time of my death," also implies that in the mind of the testatrix these amounts were then owing and unpaid, and that some portion thereof might be paid between the date of her will and the time of her death, but that, if any amount thereof should be "unpaid" at the time of her death, it should be deducted from their distributive shares. The term "owing" does not necessarily imply an enforceable obligation, and in this case must be read as explained by its associate, "unpaid." It is a fundamental rule of construction that the words of a will are to receive an interpretation which will give to every expression some effect, rather than one which will render any of the expressions inoperative. Civ. Code, § 1325. The testatrix must have intended that this clause in her will should have some effect in the distribution of her estate, and the only purpose deducible from its language is that she intended thereby that the shares of the appellants should be diminished by reason of these loans. It would render the entire clause inoperative if it should be held that its provisions could be defeated by an inference to be drawn from an instrument executed many years previously, and to which the will makes no reference. The judgment is affirmed.

SEARS v. TUOLUMNE COUNTY. (Sac. 714.)

FRANCHISES—TOLL BRIDGE—DEDICATION—ABANDONMENT—COMPENSATION.

In 1879 the supervisors of defendant county authorized plaintiff and others to maintain a toll bridge for 20 years. Plaintiff bought the interests of the others, and maintained the bridge, collecting toll till in 1891, when it was destroyed by fire, leaving only the piers and abutments. The land at the bridge crossing belonged to the general government. In 1897 the defendant laid out a highway which included this crossing, and built a new bridge on the old piers and abutments. No compensation was awarded to plaintiff and he sued for the value of the piers, abutments, and approaches. Held, under Pol. Code, § 2618, which declares that public highways are roads and bridges laid out or erected as such by the public, or, if laid out and erected by others, dedicated or abandoned to the public; and section 2619, providing that, whenever the franchise for any toll bridge has expired by limitation or nonuser, the bridge becomes a free public highway, and no claim shall be valid against the public for right of way, or for the land or material comprising such bridge,—that plaintiff, having failed to rebuild the bridge from 1891 to 1897, when his franchise would expire in two more years, had abandoned the bridge to the public, and was not entitled to any compensation therefor.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Tuolumne county; G. W. Nicol, Judge.

Action by J. F. Sears against Tuolumne county. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. P. O'Brien, for appellant. F. P. Otis, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Action for the value of certain bridge piers and abutments alleged to have been taken from plaintiff by defendant, and used in the construction of a new bridge thereon. Defendant had judgment on motion for nonsuit, from which plaintiff appeals.

On March 9, 1879, the board of supervisors of Tuolumne county authorized one Starbird, one Smith, and plaintiff to maintain a toll bridge for the period of 20 years at a point on Tuolumne river known as "Ward's Ferry," and fixed the annual license at $40. On March 19, 1887, Starbird's interest in the right and franchise was sold at sheriff's sale under a judgment of court to Smith and Sears. By mesne conveyances Smith's interest was conveyed to plaintiff December 20, 1890, and at the commencement of the action he owned whatever right remained in the bridge. The consent of the supervisors to these transfers was not asked or given. No consent was given to the grantees of Starbird to collect toll on the bridge. They made no report to the board of the cost of erecting or equipping the bridge or repairs made thereon during any year or the amount of tolls collected, or the cash value of the bridge, or the annual cost of conducting the same, and never filed any bond. The public had the unrestricted use of the bridge on payment of tolls. On February 1, 1891, the bridge was burned, leaving only the piers and abutments in question, and was never rebuilt by plaintiff. On July 24, 1897, the board, on proper petition, appointed viewers to lay out as a public highway a certain road between the termini of which, and as a part of the proposed highway, was the site of plaintiff's bridge. The viewers made no estimate for damages by reason of using the said piers, nor did the board award any damages therefor, nor declare the bridge a highway. The only mention in the viewers' report of the bridge is in the column of remarks, stating that they "have interviewed Mr. Sears, who claims a right of way to certain abutments where the old Ward's Ferry Bridge formerly stood, and claims $1,500 damages for the use of those abutments, but claims a roadway of fifty feet on the approach on each side, which we believe to have been built by private subscription, and not his property. We believe the said abutments proper to be worth about $300." Plaintiff paid the taxes assessed against the bridge after 1891. The land at the bridge crossing belonged to the general government. It is admitted by defendant that the new bridge was built in November, 1897, on the piers and abutments as alleged in the complaint, and that no condemnation proceedings were commenced to condemn the old bridge, or any part thereof, or any of the materials used in its construction. Plaintiff duly presented his claim to the board, which was rejected, and on September 10, 1898, the action was brought.

Appellant claims that his property was taken without due process of law, and the county is liable therefor in damages. The grounds of the motion for nonsuit were that plaintiff had no property right in the piers or abutments; that plaintiff has never received a franchise, nor any assignment of a franchise, from his associates; that he has lost any right he may have had by not rebuilding the bridge; that the franchise has expired by limitation, and plaintiff has no right whatever. The statutory provisions under which the bridge was constructed are found in Pol. Code, § 2843 et seq. The franchise was applied for under these provisions. The order of the board of supervisors recites that the petitioners had constructed a toll bridge at the point named, and had filed their bond, and had conformed to the statute; and it was ordered that the applicants, plaintiff and his associates, "are hereby authorized to maintain a public toll bridge * * * for the period of twenty years," fixing the license tax at $40 for the year 1879, from April 1st, which was paid thereafter yearly until the bridge burned down. When the franchise was granted, section 2618, Pol. Code, declared, as now, that "in all counties of this state public highways are roads, streets, lanes, courts, places, trails, and bridges, laid out or erected as such by the public, or if laid out and erected by others, dedicated or abandoned to the public." We think it clear that the bridge became a public highway. The public were invited to use it, and the only restriction or condition attached to the use by the public was the payment of the toll which was authorized to be collected by the franchise. The franchise was granted for no other purpose than to enable the builders to maintain the bridge as a public highway. "In dedication no particular formality is necessary. It is not affected by the statute of frauds. It may be made either with or without writing, by any act of the owner; such as throwing open his land to public travel, * * * or an acquiescence in the use of his land for a highway." Harding v. Jasper, 14 Cal. 643. The use of the bridge was continued from 1879, the owners paying the annual license each year of use by the public until 1891, when its further use was made impossible by fire. The fact that a toll was charged did not affect the question of intended dedication, nor did it take away the public character of the bridge as a highway. Elliott, Roads & S. §§ 3, 28, 69; People v. Davidson, 79 Cal. 166, 21 Pac. 538. Section 2619, Pol. Code, as originally adopted, reads as follows: "Roads laid out and recorded as highways, by order of the board of supervisors, and all roads used as such for a period of five years, are highways. Whenever any corporation owning a toll bridge or a turnpike, plank, or common wagon road is dissolved or discontinues the road or bridge, or has expired by limitation, the bridge or road becomes a highway." This section was amended in 1874 (Amendments 1873-74, p. 116), but not to affect Tuolumne county. In 1883 (St. 1883, p. 6) the section was again amended to read as we now have it, to wit: "Whenever the franchise for any toll-bridge * * * has expired by limitation on non-user, such bridge * * * becomes a free public highway; and no claim shall be valid against the public for right of way, or for the land or material comprising such bridge." Respondent relies upon the provisions of the section as they now are as conclusive of the rights of plaintiff; citing People v. Davidson, 79 Cal. 166, 21 Pac. 538; McMullin v. Leitch, 83 Cal. 239, 23 Pac. 294; and Blood v. Woods, 95 Cal. 78, 30 Pac. 129. But when plaintiff and his associates built their bridge, and obtained a franchise to charge tolls for its use by the public, the statute imposed no such condition as was enacted after their rights had attached, and appellant claims that this section cannot be given a retroactive effect, and, therefore, does not apply. People v. Davidson, supra, was the case of a toll road constructed in 1861 upon land title to which defendant subsequently acquired. The road was constructed and maintained at defendant's expense for the purpose of using it as a toll road. In 1878 he applied to the board of auditors of El Dorado county to fix the rates of toll, and an order was duly made fixing the rates to be charged, and they were thereafter collected from all persons using this road. No other order was made until in 1886 the board of supervisors of the county passed an order rescinding the aforesaid order of the board of auditors. Defendant had paid taxes on the road for 25 years. It was held: (1) That defendant had dedicated his road to a public use, and that it was to be regarded as a public easement, and not as private property. (2) That when the franchise expired, as it did by revoking the order of the auditors, the road became a free public highway, and defendant was not entitled to recover anything as compensation for his land and improvements. In that case the franchise was not given for any definite period, and was held to have expired by limitation, within the meaning of section 2619, Pol. Code, when the franchise was revoked. In the present case the franchise had not expired by limitation, but, if it expired by nonuser, or was lost by abandonment, the same consequences must follow, regardless of the provisions of section 2619. Mr. Elliott says in his work on Roads and Streets that "a toll bridge erected under legislative grant for the use of the public for ordinary travel is in so far a highway that upon its abandonment by the owners the public may claim the right to maintain and use it if the local authorities so elect." The case cited in support of the text is State v. Lawrence Bridge Co., 22 Kan. 438, which was an action to determine the right of the builders of a toll bridge to retain the property as their own after the termination of the charter, and it was held that, when the right to take tolls ceased, the right of the public to use the bridge free from any burden of tolls attaches, without any right on the part of the builders to remove the structure or destroy the highway.

The question here, then, is whether ceasing to use the remnants of the bridge from February, 1891, to November, 1897, taking no steps to rebuild, and manifesting no intention ever to rebuild, constitute acts of abandonment to the public. We think the circumstances show an abandonment by plaintiff, and that it would be unreasonable to hold that he could keep the public from occupying the piers and abutments until his franchise expired by limitation in face of the fact that he has for so long a time done nothing to restore the bridge, and did not, at the time the county appropriated the property, express any intention to rebuild. It is clear upon authority and upon reason that, had his franchise expired by limitation, plaintiff would have had no claim for compensation for his bridge. His franchise expired in 1899, and it is not reasonable to assume that he would have rebuilt after 1897 in order to enjoy tolls for so short a period.

Plaintiff's contention that he had a property interest, which, under the constitution, could not be taken from him without just compensation, cannot be maintained. As was said in People v. Davidson: "It is not a case where private property is sought to be taken for public use without just compensation. In some of the states compensation is made to toll-road owners upon the expiration of their franchises, but in those states it is expressly provided by law that such compensation shall be made. In this state there is no such provision, and section 2619, Pol. Code, expressly declares to the contrary." Plaintiff's compensation was to be derived from tolls levied by public authority. As was said in Com. v. Wilkinson, 16 Pick. 175, 26 Am. Dec. 654, "The cost of construction and maintenance is reimbursed by a toll levied by public authority for this purpose." When plaintiff dedicated this bridge to the public on condition that he might charge such toll for 20 years as should be fixed by public authority each year, he, in effect, said: "When my franchise expires, or when I cease to maintain the bridge, or abandon it as a toll bridge, the public shall have the free use thereof without compensation to me." It was said in the Massachusetts case: "We think a turnpike is a public highway, established by public authority for public use, and is to be regarded as a public easement, and not as private property." As already intimated, there is no difference between a toll road and a toll bridge, and the same principles must control in both cases. The judgment is affirmed.

(Sac. 595).¹

RAILROADS—RIGHT OF WAY—LIMITATIONS AND PRESCRIPTION—FORMS OF ACTION.

1. A railroad right of way is such a public use as to prevent the running of limitations or the acquisition of adverse title thereto by prescription.

2. There being but one form of common-law action in California, the substance of the action determines its character, and it is immaterial to the right of a railroad to recover possession of a part of its right of way, claimed adversely, that the proceeding is called "ejectment."

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Placer county; J. E. Prewett, Judge.

Action by the Southern Pacific Company against J. W. Hyatt and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

John M. Fulweiler, Fred B. Lake, and Wm. Singer, for appellant. Tuttle & Wright and Tabor & Tabor, for respondents.

VAN DYKE, J. The questions involved in this appeal are: (1) Whether a railroad right of way is such a public use as to prevent the running of the statute of limitations, or the acquisition of an adverse title thereto by prescription. (2) In case of intrusion upon such right of way, is ejectment the proper remedy?

Respondents entered upon and occupied, for more than five years prior to the commencement of the action, a portion of the right of way in Placer county granted to the Central Pacific Railroad Company by act of congress of July 1, 1862 (12 Stat. 489). The court finds that prior to 1867 the predecessor of the plaintiff constructed its line of railroad over said right of way, and plaintiff and its predecessor have ever since maintained its railroad over said right of way; that the defendant Hyatt has been in the open, notorious, and exclusive possession and occupancy of the property described in the complaint for more than five years previous to the commencement of the action, and has paid taxes thereon, and defendant Savage was the tenant of said Hyatt, but that plaintiff during said time has also paid all taxes levied and assessed upon said right of way. The court below held, as a conclusion of law from the facts found, that the plaintiff is not entitled to recover possession of the premises in question, and from the judgment in favor of defendants the plaintiff appeals.

1. The questions involved are not new, but have been passed upon frequently in the courts of the United States, and in this state and other states. In Railroad Co. v. Caldwell, 31 Cal. 371, this court says: "Whether the use of the property taken for the purposes of the railroad is a public use, within the meaning of the constitution, or the contrary, is involved in the question presented for consideration. But on this subject there is no room for controversy at this time, if respect is to be paid to the adjudications of the highest courts of the land. Railroads are esteemed as public highways, constructed for the advantage of the public,"—citing several authorities from other states. In Moran v. Ross, 79 Cal. 159, 21 Pac. 547, it is said: "Railways are a species of public highways, and as such have uniformly been held to be public improvements, to which the right of eminent domain attached, although they may be considered as private corporations or individuals, and operated for the emoluments to be derived therefrom by the operators,"—citing Mills, Em. Dom. § 14; Wood, Ry. Law, § 226; and other cases. Southern Pac. Co. v. Burr, 86 Cal. 279, 24 Pac. 1032, was an action like this, to recover possession of about five acres of land situated in Placer county, within and forming a part of the right of way granted to the Central Pacific Railroad Company by the act of congress referred to; citing from section 2 of that act, wherein the right of way is granted to the Central Pacific Railroad Company of California for the construction of said railroad through the public lands, the plaintiff in that case, as in this, being the successor in interest of said grantee. The defendant in that case was the successor in interest of the party to whom a patent to the quarter section embracing the disputed premises was issued by the United States in December, 1880, and as such he claimed title in fee. The defendant had the land inclosed, and the plaintiff offered to allow him to maintain his inclosure, and use the land, on condition that he would accept a lease thereof, and pay a nominal rent, which he accepted; but at the expiration of the term of one year he refused to renew it, claiming the land as his own. After commenting upon some other cases, the court says: "Here there was a special grant of a right of way two hundred feet in width on each side of the road. This grant is a conclusive legislative determination of the reasonable and necessary quantity of land to be dedicated to this public use, and it necessarily involves a right of possession in the grantee, and is inconsistent with any adverse possession of any part of the land embraced within the grant. It is true, the strip of land now actually occupied by the roadbed and telegraph line may be only a small part of the four hundred feet granted, but this fact is of no consequence. The company may at some time want to use more land for side tracks or other purposes, and it is entitled to have the land clear and unobstructed whenever it shall have occasion to do so." In Olcott v. Supervisors, 83 U. S. 678, 21 L. Ed. 382, the United States supreme court says: "That railroads, though constructed by private corporations and owned by them, are public highways, has been the doctrine of nearly all the courts ever since such conveniences for passage and transportation have had any existence. Very early the question arose whether a state's right of eminent domain could be exercised by a private corporation created for the purpose of constructing a railroad. Clearly, it could not, unless taking land for such a purpose by such an agency is taking land for public use. The right of eminent domain nowhere justifies taking property for private use. Yet it is a doctrine universally accepted that a state legislature may authorize a private corporation to take land for the construction of such a road, making compensation to the owner. What else does this doctrine mean if not that building a railroad, though it be built by a private corporation, is an act done for a public use? And the reason why the use has always been held a public one is that such a road is a highway, whether made by the government itself or by the agency of corporate bodies, or even by individuals when they obtain the power to construct it from legislative grant. It would be useless to cite the numerous decisions to this effect which have been made in the state courts. * * * It is said that railroads are not public highways per se; that they are only declared such by the decisions of the courts; and that they have been declared public only with respect to the power of eminent domain. This is a mistake. In their very nature they are public highways. It needed no decision of courts to make them such. True, they must be used in their peculiar manner, and under certain restrictions, but they are facilities for passage and transportation afforded to the public, of which the public has a right to avail itself. As well might it be said a turnpike is a highway, only because declared such by judicial decision. A railroad built by a state no one claims would be anything else than a public highway, justifying taxation for its construction and maintenance, though it could be no more open to public use than is a road built and owned by a corporation; yet it is the purpose and the uses of a work which determine its character." In Venable v. Railway Co., 112 Mo. 103, 20 S. W. 493, 18 L. R. A. 68, it was held that a conveyance to a railroad company of a right of way through the grantor's land is a dedication to the public. In the court opinion it is said: "There can be no doubt from the text books and adjudications that, where a railroad is empowered, as in the present instance, to condemn land for a public use, it occupies in all respects the same footing as any other corporation or quasi corporation, municipal or otherwise, or governmental agency, when exercising similar authority, to obtain land for a market place, for a street, highway, jail, or court house." In Railroad Co. v. Baldwin, 103 U. S. 426, 26 L. Ed. 578, the court had under consideration the congressional railroad right of way grant above referred to. "The right of way for the whole distance of the proposed route was a very important part of the aid given. If the company could be compelled to purchase its way over any section that might be occupied in advance of its location, very serious obstacles would be often imposed to the progress of the road. For any loss of lands by settlement or reservation other lands are given, but for the loss of the right of way by these means no compensation is provided, nor could any be given by the substitution of another route. The uncertainty as to the ultimate location of the line of the road is recognized throughout the act, and where any qualification is intended in the operation of the grant of lands from this circumstance it is designated. Had a similar qualification upon the absolute grant of the right of way been intended, it can hardly be doubted that it would have been expressed. The fact that none is expressed is conclusive that none exists. * * * We are of opinion, therefore, that all persons acquiring any portion of the public lands, after the passage of the act in question, took the same subject to the right of way conferred by it for the proposed road." Jones on Easements lays down the rule that the prescriptive right to a passageway along the track or right of way of a railroad cannot be acquired by the public, or by individuals, while the railroad is constantly using a single track over such right of way. The construction and operation of one track on its location is an assertion of right to the entire width of its right of way. The presence of one track, constantly in use, is a definite badge of ownership, and the only practical assertion of title that can be made. If the public has used paths by the side of the railroad track for any length of time, the use must be considered as permissive, and not adverse; citing a long list of authorities from different states. Jones, Easem. p. 232, §§ 2, 81. Individuals may intrude upon or obstruct the public thoroughfare, but cannot acquire title by prescription to such lands. Orena v. City of Santa Barbara, 91 Cal. 631, 28 Pac. 268; Hoadley v. City and County of San Francisco, 50 Cal. 265; City of Visalia v. Jacob, 65 Cal. 435, 4 Pac. 433; People v. Pope, 53 Cal. 450; City and County of San Francisco v. Bradbury, 92 Cal. 414, 28 Pac. 803; Archer v. Salinas City, 93 Cal. 51, 28 Pac. 839, 16 L. R. A. 145.

2. Respondents' counsel contend that, "if the appellant can maintain the present action [ejectment] at all, then the plea of the bar of the statute is good." And he cites in support of this contention Allen v. McKay, 120 Cal. 332, 52 Pac. 828, wherein it is claimed the court held that, if the title to the lands in question was such as to found thereon an action to recover the possession of the same, such title may be lost by adverse possession. That was an action to recover possession of a tract of land in Humboldt county covered by the waters of Humboldt Bay, and the court says: "If the land in controversy was not private property, plaintiffs had no title. If it was private property, there certainly could be an adverse occupancy of it for the statutory period." The difference between that and this is that the contest there was in reference to the ownership and possession of private property. Here, as already shown, the premises in question were granted for, and dedicated to, a public use. There is but one form of civil action in this state. The substance of the action determines its character. Being entitled to the possession of the premises in question as a part of the railroad right of way under the congressional grant for the purposes therein specified, and the defendants having intruded thereupon and withholding the same, the plaintiff has a right to recover the possession thereof by any appropriate action; and whether that action be called "ejectment," or by any other name, is quite immaterial. Railroad Co. v. Benity, 5 Sawy. 118, Fed. Cas. No. 2,551, was an action in ejectment by the railroad company against the defendant therein for a portion of the railroad right of way acquired under the grant in question. The court there says: "If the plaintiff is entitled to actual possession of the land for the purpose of effecting the object in view when the right of way was granted, it can recover such possession in some judicial proceeding. The mere form of the action has ceased to be of any importance in this court. There is now but one form of all common-law actions. * * * We think this complaint does state a good case. It may be admitted that for the obstruction of a mere easement the recovery of the possession of the land itself would not be the proper remedy. But, in order that the plaintiff in the case at bar may make such use of the land as the grantor intended it should under the grant of a right of way, it becomes necessary to take and keep an actual possession of the land." Southern Pac. Co. v. Burr, supra, was also an action at law to recover possession of a portion of the railroad right of way in question. As already shown, the court held that that action was not only maintainable, but that the statute of limitation did not run against the right of the plaintiff therein. City of Visalia v. Jacob, supra, was also an action of ejectment, and the court in passing says: "An action of ejectment may be maintained by a municipal corporation for the recovery of the possession of a street wrongfully possessed by an individual, whether the corporation owns the fee or the adjoining proprietor retains it. In the latter case the right of a municipality to regulate the public use, and, for that purpose, to possess, use, and control the property, is treated by the court as a legal, and not merely an equitable, right,"—citing authorities; and adding: "But it does not follow that such an action is barred by an adverse possession for a statutory period;" and referring to City and County of San Francisco v. Calderwood, 31 Cal. 589, where it seems to have been held that ejectment would be barred, the court says: "But in that case it was found that the 'slip' had never been dedicated to the public use,"—referring, as against that case, to Hoadley v. City and County of San Francisco and People v. Pope, supra. City and County of San Francisco v. Bradbury, supra, was ejectment to recover the possession of an engine lot reserved to the city under the Van Ness ordinance. See, also, the later case of City and County of San Francisco v. Grote, 120 Cal. 60, 52 Pac. 127, 41 L. R. A. 335. For the reasons stated, the judgment must be reversed; and it is so ordered.

WATERS AND WATER COURSES—SUBTERRANEAN STREAM—DIVERSION THEREOF—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY—APPEAL.

1. A subterranean stream passed under the land of plaintiff, and came to the surface on lower land, and defendant constructed a ditch diverting the stream from its natural course at a point below plaintiff's land, the head of the ditch being much lower than the bed of the stream at such point, and than plaintiff's land. Plaintiff's evidence showed that the water table commenced to sink immediately after the construction of the ditch, and had continued to sink away, and injured his wells, grass, and trees. Defendant's evidence showed that there had been a series of dry years since the construction of the ditch, which had produced the same effect throughout the locality. Evidence as to the effect of the ditch beyond a distance of 400 feet, was contradictory. Held to sustain a finding that the ditch had not injured plaintiff, or affected his water supply, in an action for the diversion of such water.

2. A finding of the trial court will only be disturbed on appeal where there is no substantial evidence in its support.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Lucien Shaw, Judge.

Action by Grace E. Yarwood (Louis Michaud and others, interveners) against the West Los Angeles Water Company and others. From a judgment in favor of the defendants and an order denying a motion for a new trial, plaintiff and interveners appeal. Affirmed.

Lynn Helm, for appellants. Freeman & Bates and Borden & Carhart, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. The plaintiff and the interveners appeal from an order denying them a new trial. The plaintiff Yarwood and three several intervening plaintiffs each in a several complaint allege ownership of one or more lots of the "Rancho Providencia and Scott tract as resurveyed," etc., situated in Los Angeles county. In their several complaints said plaintiffs further allege that a certain stream or wash flows in a natural channel and water course on the surface and under ground "adjacent and contiguous to and in" the several lots and premises belonging to each of said plaintiffs, which water, if allowed to flow in its natural course, would supply the necessities of plaintiffs; that plaintiffs are entitled to the use of said waters for domestic and irrigation purposes; that at all times since the 1st day of July, 1895, the said defendants have wrongfully and unlawfully interfered with the use of the water to which plaintiffs were entitled as aforesaid, and have wrongfully diverted and abstracted and deprived plaintiffs of large portions of said waters, so that said plaintiffs have not sufficient water for their purposes as aforesaid; that defendants threaten, and, unless restrained from so doing, will continue, to so wrongfully and unlawfully divert said water, and deprive plaintiffs of the use thereof, to their permanent and irreparable damage and injury; that defendants claim an interest in said water and a right to interfere with, abstract, and divert the same, and deprive plaintiffs thereof, but said claim is without any right, etc.; that by means of said wrongful acts of defendants plaintiffs have been injured, and their crops, orchards, and trees have been destroyed and damaged,—each plaintiff setting out the specific sum in which he or she has been so damaged. Plaintiffs pray that they may have judgment that they are entitled to the rights of riparian owners upon said stream, and to the use of the water therein "undefiled and undiminished" for their necessary domestic purposes and for purposes of irrigation; and that defendants have not had, and do not have, the right to interfere therewith, or to abstract, develop, or divert any of the water flowing therein, to the damage of plaintiffs; and that defendants be enjoined from further interference with the rights of said plaintiffs in said stream, and from developing the water thereof, against the rights of plaintiffs; and that plaintiffs may have judgment for damages in the sums set out in their several complaints.

In answer to the said several complaints the defendants deny the existence of any natural stream or water course upon the premises or lots belonging to plaintiffs, or either of them. Defendants also deny that they have interfered with said stream or water course in any way; and, further, they deny that plaintiffs, or either of them, or any of their lands, have been injured by any act or acts of defendants whatever. A trial was had without a jury, and on the evidence taken the finding of the court as to the natural water course was favorable to plaintiffs. Said finding reads as follows: "That at all the times in the complaint and in the several complaints in intervention herein there was a natural stream or water course running in, through, and under the said lands of the said complainants herein, which stream ran under ground through said lands and below said lands to a point about eight hundred feet east of the eastern line of the lands of the intervenor Michaud, being the point at which the ditch hereinafter mentioned, made by the defendants, terminated; and at said point a portion of the water of said stream rose to the surface, and ran above ground; and from that point to the Los Angeles river the said stream ran partly above the ground and partly under ground, the surface stream increasing in size from the point of its rise above mentioned to the eastern line of lot 44 of the subdivision of the Rancho Providencia and Scott tract, at which line it attained such a size as to be a constant stream running sixty inches of flowing water, miners' measurement; and, when not diverted by artificial means, said surface and subterranean stream has ever since continued to flow to the Los Angeles river in a southeasterly direction from said lot 44 over and through lots 55, 56, and 66 of said subdivision. That said stream is a branch of the stream known as 'Big Tejuanga Creek,' and separates from the channel of said creek above lot 20 of said subdivision. Said creek continues from said point of separation southeasterly, in a separate channel, through the lands of the intervenor, Clark, and over the southwestern part of the lands of the plaintiff and of the intervenor Michaud into said river."

The development works of the defendants on account of which plaintiffs claim damages are described in the findings as follows: "That on the 10th day of September, 1895, the defendants John A. Pirtle, George Hanna, George W. Hooper, and William N. Monroe began an excavation at the eastern line of said lot 44 for the purpose of intercepting and diverting the waters of said first described stream, and carrying the same over a line of hills several miles from these lands, to be there sold for use on other lands situated without the valley and watershed wherein said stream rises and flows. In pursuance of said purpose said defendants made a ditch along the channel of said stream as the same appeared on the surface, extending from said line of lot 44 up the stream northwesterly with the meanderings thereof a distance of 2,540 feet, the depth thereof at the beginning being about 2 feet, and at the upper end about 20 feet below the natural surface of the ground. In the bottom of said ditch the defendants laid a flume 6 feet wide, and open at top and bottom. Said defendants continued the construction of said ditch and flume until November 18, 1895, and at that time transferred all their rights and claims thereto to the defendant the West Los Angeles Water Company, and said company continued said work, and completed the same on December 15, 1895. By means of said ditch and flume said defendant West Los Angeles Water Company has, ever since the completion thereof, continuously diverted, and still continues to divert, from said stream or water course the water flowing continuously at the rate of 8 cubic feet per second, or 400 inches miners' measurement, and have carried the same out of the valley aforesaid." The evidence shows that the excavation made by defendants is on their own land, and entirely below all the lands of plaintiffs on the stream referred to, and is nearly a mile in length. The nearest point of said excavation to any of said lands is the head or upper end thereof, which is about 500 feet from the nearest point on the Michaud tract. The court also finds that "said defendants have not interfered with the water of said stream; and said diversion has not diminished the volume of said stream above the said ditch, nor affected it in any way in its course through the lands of the plaintiff and intervenors, or either of them, nor caused any injury or damage to them or either of them."

Appellants' attack on the order appealed from is directed mainly against the finding last quoted. It is strongly urged that this finding is contrary to the evidence. If this contention is well founded, the order should be reversed. On the other hand, if the finding is not contrary to the evidence, the order must be affirmed, for it can make no difference to plaintiffs whether defendants are making an unlawful or improper use of the waters or not, so long as plaintiffs' rights are not interfered with, and they are in no way injured. The question, then, is, was the trial court warranted in making said last finding? The land of plaintiffs is situated in a valley, is of an even, nearly level, character, and extends for nearly a mile up the stream above the head of defendants' excavation or ditch. It slopes gently down stream, and its surface is all the way from about 18 feet to 40 feet above the bottom of the ditch at its head. Plaintiffs gave evidence tending to show that immediately after the construction of this ditch the water table began to sink away in plaintiffs' lands, and that it had been sinking away constantly since (except after heavy rains) down to the time of the trial in March, 1897. This lowering of the water level or table was first noticed in wells, and then the alfalfa and the orchard trees showed signs of perishing, and some did perish, for lack of moisture, as the witnesses stated. It is argued on the part of plaintiffs that this failure of water in the wells and of moisture in the earth, rendering the land unfit for raising crops that had theretofore flourished thereon, was the direct and inevitable result of constructing the ditch in question. On the other hand, the defendants introduced evidence tending to show that there had been a series of dry years in Los Angeles county, and that in 1895, 1896, and in 1897 the water had sunk away in the wells generally, and the crops had been affected and the water table in moist lands had been lowered generally throughout that section of country, as a result of a decrease in the usual rainfall. An engineer bored experimental wells, some 33 in number, in the vicinity of the head of defendants' ditch, at various distances and in varying directions therefrom, and from these wells he constructed a profile of the water table in the vicinity of said ditch, and gave it as his opinion that the water table could not be affected by the ditch at a distance of more than 400 feet therefrom. This opinion was concurred in by another engineer on behalf of defendants, and disputed by others on behalf of plaintiffs. The evidence as to these experimental wells and the profiles drawn therefrom was placed before the trial court. It should be kept in mind that the burden of proof was upon plaintiffs to show to the satisfaction of the court that the subterranean stream through their premises had been interfered with to their injury by defendants. The question of fact was, from its very nature, difficult, and hard to determine. The evidence was of the circumstantial or inferential kind, much of it vague and uncertain. Certainly, the trial court was in a better position than this court can be to determine these questions of fact. This court is warranted in interfering with the decision of the trial court as to a question of fact only when there is no substantial evidence to support the finding. We see no reason to interfere with the findings of the trial court, and, as they are decisive of the case, the order appealed from should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

McNAMARA et al. v. OAKLAND BUILDING & LOAN ASS'N. (S. F. 1,824.)

MORTGAGES—FORECLOSURE—LIS PENDENS—HOMESTEAD—PRIORITY—RE-STRAINING SALE.

Where plaintiff's husband executed a mortgage in which she did not join, she cannot set up a homestead in the premises after order of judgment for the mortgagee in foreclosure proceedings, to which she was not a party, but in which a lis pendens had been filed, and claim priority for it over the judgment of foreclosure.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; S. P. Hall, Judge.

Action by Annie F. McNamara and another against the Oakland Building & Loan Association. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

R. Clark, for appellants. John Yule (John M. Postoy, of counsel), for respondent.

CHIPMAN, C. Action to restrain the sale of certain land under decree of foreclosure. Defendant had judgment, from which, and from the order denying motion for new trial, this appeal is taken.

Plaintiffs are husband and wife. J. M. McNamara, being the owner of the land in question, executed a mortgage thereof to defendant's assignor, in which his wife did not join; and, McNamara failing to pay the debt secured thereby, defendant, assignee of the note and mortgage, brought its action to foreclose, but did not make Mrs. McNamara a party defendant. Lis pendens was duly filed. The cause was tried, and judgment ordered for plaintiff in the foreclosure action, whereupon, and before judgment was entered, Mrs. McNamara filed a homestead on the premises. Judgment of foreclosure was shortly thereafter duly entered, and, plaintiff in that action being about to cause the sale of the premises, this action was brought by Mrs. McNamara, joining her husband as a party plaintiff. It appeared that the mortgage in question "was acknowledged before one Thomas W. Jeffries, a notary public, who was at the time he took such acknowledgment a member of the co-partnership firm of Jeffries & White, which firm then owned ten shares of stock of said corporation, defendant; J. M. McNamara also owned stock therein at the time he acknowledged said mortgage before said Jeffries; and that said corporation was a mutual corporation." The court found that the mortgage was duly and regularly executed and acknowledged. Appellants make the point that this finding is not supported by the evidence.

The principal question presented by appellants is, was Jeffries disqualified to take the acknowledgment? Appellants rely on Lee v. Murphy, 119 Cal. 364, 51 Pac. 549, 955. The view we have taken of the case makes it unnecessary to decide whether the notary was disqualified. The case of Roach v. Water Co., 74 Cal. 263, 15 Pac. 776, was an action in ejectment brought by plaintiffs to recover possession of a piece of land alleged to constitute a part of their homestead. The defendant had in that action commenced proceedings to condemn a right of way over the land of plaintiff William Roach for a public purpose, and duly filed notice of lis pendens, after which Rufina, wife of William, filed a declaration of homestead on the land in question. Thereafter judgment of condemnation was duly rendered on a stipulation entered into between the parties to the action. Rufina was not a party to the suit, and, although William stipulated that he and his wife would execute a deed of the right of way on payment of a certain sum, which was paid into court subject to the order of William, the record does not show that Rufina was in any way bound by the stipulation. It was urged on her behalf that she was not a purchaser or incumbrancer, within the meaning of section 409, Code Civ. Proc., which provides, with reference to notices of lis pendens, that "from the time of filing such record only shall a purchaser or encumbrancer of the property affected thereby be deemed to have constructive notice of the pendency of the action." The court decided that the statute applies to condemnation proceedings, and that "the word 'purchaser' must receive a liberal construction, and be held to include those who have acquired a homestead interest in the property." Appellant contends that Roach v. Water Co. is not in point, and, if it is, that Lee v. Murphy, supra, overrules it. We think the case is in point, and has not been overruled. In Lee v. Murphy the homestead was declared before the foreclosure suit was begun, and the defense was made by the husband and wife as parties to the action to foreclose the mortgage. In Richardson v. White, 18 Cal. 103, the court stated with some fullness the office of a lis pendens. As to the rule of the statute, it was said to be as if it read, "The commencement of a suit and the filing of a notice of it are constructive notice to all the world of the action, and purchasers or assignees, afterwards becoming such, are mere volunteers and bound by the judgment." It is not important whether Mrs. McNamara acquired some right or title by her homestead declaration; for the question is not whether she has any right to the property, but whether that right has not already been adjudged against her. Id. The object of the notice is to give the opportunity of defense to any one acquiring subsequent rights. "Another object of the statute was to give notice in this way of litigation, that third persons might not purchase except advisedly." Id. A purchaser pendente lite, and after the statutory notice of the pendency of the action, is not a necessary party to the suit. Horn v. Jones, 28 Cal. 195. In an action against a corporation to foreclose a mortgage purporting to have been executed by it, where a lis pendens is filed, and a decree is given enforcing the mortgage, a party who buys the mortgaged property pendente lite at sheriff's sale, made on a judgment which does not enforce a lien older than the lis pendens, is estopped from saying that the mortgage was not the act of the corporation. Id. When the plaintiff has filed his notice, he need not concern himself with persons acquiring subsequent rights to the property. All such persons take with notice, and must appear in the action and assert their rights, or they will be estopped by the judgment, and cannot afterwards question its validity. In the present case Mrs. McNamara had constructive notice that the property was mortgaged as early as in 1880. She had like notice that an action was pending to foreclose the mortgage, and, after the court had tried the cause and rendered a decision, she sought to defeat the action by impressing the mortgaged premises with the homestead character; and she now claims that this homestead has priority over the judgment of foreclosure, and asks to have that judgment declared void. We think she cannot be heard to do this. The judgment and order should be affirmed.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order are affirmed.

MCDUGALD v. HULET et al. (Sac. 866.)¹

LANDLORD AND TENANT—GUARANTY—SURETYSHIP—COUNTERCLAIM—PLEADING—AMENDMENT—LIMITATION OF ACTION—ESTOPPEL.

1. Where one of two guarantors of rent sued the landlord and his co-guarantor, praying that the amount of rent due be determined, that plaintiff be decreed only a surety, and that his co-guarantor pay the amount due, and the landlord, in his answer, set forth the facts out of which the guaranty arose, and sought a decree as to the rent due, and a judgment therefor against plaintiff, it was error for the trial court to hold that the amount of rent due was not the subject of a counterclaim; both parties being before the court, and both asking a finding as to the amount of rent due, and the guaranty being joint and several.

2. Where plaintiff allowed the trial court to pass on an issue raised by defendant's plea of counterclaim without objecting that the matter relied on was not a proper subject of counterclaim, plaintiff was estopped from making the objection on appeal; the statute of limitations having run against the counterclaim since the commencement of the suit.

3. The character and sufficiency of a pleading is to be determined, not by what it is denominated by the pleader, but by the facts which it sets up.

4. Where a case is tried without objection on the part of plaintiff that the pleadings are not such as to support a counterclaim of defendant, such objection cannot be raised for the first time on appeal.

5. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 438, declaring that a defendant may set up a counterclaim existing at the commencement of the action, the filing of a complaint suspends the running of the statute of limitations as to a counterclaim arising out of the transaction set forth in the complaint.

6. Where at the time defendant filed his counterclaim an independent action for the same cause of action as that relied on as a counterclaim was pending, but the same was dismissed before trial of the action in which the counterclaim was interposed, there was no action pending to prevent defendant's relying on the counterclaim.

7. Where one of two guarantors of rent sued the landlord and his co-guarantor, praying that the amount of rent be determined, that plaintiff be held as surety on the guaranty, and that the co-guarantor pay the amount due, and defendant sought a judgment against plaintiff for the rent, and during the trial the landlord asked permission to file an amended answer containing a copy of a note executed by plaintiff to the landlord,—the offer to file the amended answer being accompanied by an affidavit which showed the note was made for rent due, and that the landlord did not know until the trial that the note could be litigated in the action, and had not informed his counsel of the note when the answer was filed,—it was error not to permit defendant to amend.

8. Error of the trial court in refusing to allow defendant to amend his answer is cured by the subsequent reception of evidence and a finding on the matter to which the amendment was directed.

9. It cannot be contended that a finding is not within the issues where no objection is made to the evidence in support of the finding at the trial.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county; Edw. I. Jones, Judge.

Suit by Carrie B. McDougald, as administratrix of the estate of J. D. McDougald, deceased, against H. C. Hulet and others. From a judgment denying plaintiff relief as to the matters alleged in the complaint, and denying defendant Louise E. Boggs any judgment on the facts found, said defendant appeals. Reversed.

Jos. A. Louttit and Louttit & Middlecoff, for appellant. J. G. Swinnerton, Budd & Thompson, Dudley & Buck, and Geo. D. Dudley, for respondent.

COOPER, C. This appeal is from the judgment. The findings are not attacked, and the only question that need be decided is as to whether or not appellant is entitled to judgment for the amount found to be due from the plaintiff. The case has been here before. McDougald v. Development Co., 117 Cal. 88, 48 Pac. 1021. And the facts are there very clearly and fully stated. In this opinion, in speaking of plaintiff, reference is made to plaintiff's intestate; and, in speaking of Boggs, reference is made to John Boggs, deceased, of whose will appellant is executrix. The Argonaut Land-Development Company, a corporation, on the 1st day of May, 1890, owned a certain tract of land in San Joaquin county, near Stockton, which it desired to sell for $140,000. Boggs was at said time the owner of 12,000 acres of land in Colusa county. An agreement was made between said corporation and said Boggs whereby the corporation conveyed to Boggs its land near Stockton, and Boggs conveyed to the corporation his land in Colusa county, and also paid the corporation $44,000 additional in payment for the lands so conveyed by the corporation. It was a condition of the sale and exchange that the corporation should furnish to Boggs a tenant for the lands conveyed to him, who would rent the said lands for five years at an annual rental of $12,000; the rent to be guarantied to Boggs by suitable guarantors. The tenant was furnished, and plaintiff and defendant Hulet, who was the president of the corporation, signed a written guaranty for the payment of the rent by the tenant, which guaranty was accepted by Boggs, and the tenant entered into possession in pursuance of the contract and guaranty. The tenant became indebted to Boggs in a large amount for rent, which has never been paid. This action was brought by plaintiff against Boggs, Hulet, the corporation, and its directors Fairbrother, Spect, Wilhoit, Hulet, and Foss, for the purpose of having it adjudged and decreed as to the amount due and unpaid to Boggs under the lease, and that the corporation and Fairbrother, Spect, Wilhoit, Hulet, and Foss are the principals, and bound to defendant Boggs for the amount so found to be due him, and that plaintiff is only surety for said amount. It was further sought to have judgment that the defendants other than Boggs pay to defendant Boggs the amount of unpaid rent so found to be due him, and that plaintiff should be entitled to receive and recover from the defendants other than Boggs all sums of money he might pay and all losses he might sustain by reason of his contract of guaranty, and that he be held harmless from all claims, demands, or losses that might arise by reason of said guaranty. After the cause was remanded to the court below, the action was dismissed by plaintiff as to the corporation and all the other defendants except Boggs and Hulet. The action, after such dismissal, was against plaintiff's co-guarantor alone, so far as any relief was claimed. The court, after filing findings, ordered judgment that plaintiff take nothing and that Boggs take nothing; thus denying to plaintiff any relief as to the matters alleged in the complaint and found by the court, and denying Boggs any judgment on the facts found. The plaintiff has not appealed. Appellant, as administratrix, has appealed from the judgment on the judgment roll. It will therefore be necessary to consider only the question as to appellant's rights upon the findings. The action was evidently brought under section 1050, Code Civ. Proc., which provides that an action may be brought by one person "against two or more persons for the purpose of compelling one to satisfy a debt due to the other for which plaintiff is bound as a surety." The plaintiff in this case did not deny his liability to Boggs upon the written guaranty, but he sought to have it adjudged that defendant Hulet was the principal, and that he be directed, as such principal, to pay defendant Boggs. The prayer of the complaint asked to have it determined as to the whole amount due at the time of the commencement of the action, or that might pending the action become due and unpaid, by virtue of the contract of guaranty which plaintiff had signed, and that the court adjudge that defendants other than Boggs pay to Boggs the amount so found due and unpaid on the said guaranty. The prayer of the complaint further asks that it be decreed that plaintiff is only surety upon the guaranty, and that plaintiff recover of defendants all "sums of money he may pay and compensation for all losses he may sustain by reason of said contract of guaranty." The prayer also asks for general relief.

The contract of guaranty, concerning which the suit was brought, is as follows: "In consideration of the execution of the foregoing lease by the lessor, John Boggs, the undersigned jointly and severally undertake and promise to and with said John Boggs that they will, and they do hereby, guaranty the payment of the rent therein reserved on the part of the said lessee, to be paid, and the performance of the covenants and conditions therein contained of the said lessee to be kept and performed, and covenant and agree, in case default on the part of the said lessee, they will pay said rent and keep and perform said conditions and covenants; and they hereby respectively waive any notice of such default until the same shall have continued for sixty days. In witness whereof, they have hereunto set their hands and seals this 20th day of May, 1890. [Signed] J. D. McDougald. H. C. Hulet." The plaintiff having thus put in issue the question as to the amount due Boggs upon the guaranty, and asked for a judgment as to who should pay it, the defendant Boggs in his answer set forth the facts in full concerning the transaction by what is separately denominated a "cross complaint," and also by what is separately denominated a "counterclaim." He set forth the contract of guaranty, the amount of rent that had become due to him under it, and the payments thereon, and asked for a judgment against plaintiff upon the guaranty for the amount that might be found due him. No demurrer appears to have been interposed to the answer or to the cross complaint or counterclaim. The answer set forth the same guaranty, arising out of the same transaction, as that set forth in the complaint. The complaint sought to have a decree as to the amount of rent due Boggs, and Boggs by his answer sought the same thing. We must presume upon this appeal that the issues were all considered upon the trial as properly pleaded, and that evidence was offered and such issues litigated by the parties. The court found directly upon the issue as to the amount due Boggs, and we must presume such finding was based upon evidence, as the finding is not questioned. The finding is as follows: "That there is now due, owing, and unpaid to the successors of defendant Boggs from William D. McLaren for rent of said property mentioned the following sums, to wit: $2,827, with interest thereon at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum from the 1st day of March, 1892; $6,000 with interest thereon at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum from the 1st day of September, 1892; and $6,000, with interest thereon from the 1st day of March, 1893, at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum."

Although the complaint set forth the transactions, and asked to have the court find the amount due Boggs, and the defendant Boggs alleged the amount due under the guaranty which was the subject of the complaint, and the issue as to the amount due was litigated and found by the court, yet the court declined to render any judgment for appellant, for the alleged reason that the amount due was not the subject of a counterclaim. In this we think the court erred. It took a view of the matter which was entirely too narrow. Both parties were before the court, and both asking to have the court find the amount due Boggs. Boggs had been made a party and brought into court at the request of plaintiff. He asked in his answer for the amount due him by the terms of plaintiff's guaranty, which was joint and several. Plaintiff could not have prevented the recovery by Boggs in an independent suit. Why should he in this? We do not think it necessary to go into any nice distinctions as to the name given to the answer. Plaintiff, by bringing the defendant Boggs into court and asking the court to find the amount due, and by allowing the court to pass upon the issue as though properly made, is estopped from now claiming that the matter was not the subject of a counterclaim. He will not be allowed to thus lull his adversary into repose until his claim is barred by the statute, and then raise a point which is lethal. It is not what a pleading is called, but the facts which it sets up, that determines its character. Its character and sufficiency will be determined by the court from the facts alleged in it. Holmes v. Richet, 56 Cal. 307; Gregory v. Bovier, 77 Cal. 123, 19 Pac. 232; Meeker v. Dalton, 75 Cal. 154, 16 Pac. 764. Particularly is this so here, after the case has been tried in the lower court, and no objection made to the pleadings. The party, having tried the case in the court below upon the theory that the pleadings are sufficient, cannot for the first time raise the question here. The plaintiff brought the suit asking relief in the court as a court of equity. In such case, where the court has once obtained jurisdiction, it will decide the whole case, and will not permit litigation by piecemeal. Whitehead v. Sweet, 126 Cal. 76, 58 Pac. 376; Watson v. Sutro, 86 Cal. 528, 24 Pac. 172, 25 Pac. 64.

The court found that appellant, as executrix of the last will and testament of John Boggs, deceased, within proper time duly presented the claim for said amount so found due to the plaintiff, as administratrix of the estate of J. D. McDougald, deceased, and that it was rejected. It is said that the court found that the cause of action set forth in the cross complaint was barred by section 337 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The court did so find as a conclusion, but the other findings show that it was not barred. The facts were fully set up in other parts of the answer, independent of what was named the "cross complaint." The record here does not inform us when the action was commenced, nor when the first answer was filed. The amended complaint was filed January 9, 1895, and the amended answer January 18, 1898. The filing of the complaint suspended the running of the statute of limitations as to the matters arising out of the transaction set forth therein. Code Civ. Proc. § 438; Perkins v. Lumber Co., 120 Cal. 27, 52 Pac. 118. The matter set forth in the answer, whether it is called an "answer," a "counterclaim," or a "cross complaint," arose upon contract, and existed at the commencement of the action. It is claimed that the findings show that an independent action was commenced by John Boggs on the 14th day of April, 1896, and was pending when the answer and cross complaint were filed. It is so found, but it is also found that the said last-named action was dismissed May 23, 1899. This was before the trial, and hence the plea of "action pending" was disposed of.

During the trial the defendant Boggs asked permission of the court to file a second amended answer. This answer contained a copy of a joint and several promissory note dated November 4, 1891, for $4,781.34, due one day after date, with interest from date at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum, executed by plaintiff, as one of the makers, to Boggs. It alleged that Boggs was still the owner and holder thereof, and that it had not been paid, nor any part thereof. The offer to file the amended answer was accompanied by the uncontradicted affidavit of Boggs, which showed that the note was made and executed for rent due and unpaid under the lease and guaranty, as part of the transaction set forth in the complaint. The affidavit further set forth that Boggs did not know till the time of the trial that the note could be litigated in the present action, and had not informed his counsel concerning it at the time the first amended answer was filed. The court refused to permit the defendant Boggs to amend his answer in the respects named, and in this the court abused its discretion. The facts, if true, were of vital importance to Boggs. The case had not terminated. If the plaintiff had been surprised by the offered amendment, the court could and should have granted a continuance, upon just terms, so as to fully protect the rights of plaintiff. It seems to be the opinion of many trial judges that amendments should seldom be allowed pending the trial. Why not in all proper cases? The object of the trial is to settle and dispose of the issues and all matters connected with the case in the one action. If the facts in this case set up in the second amended answer were true, then Boggs was entitled to relief. If they were not true, every opportunity should have been given to plaintiff to so convince the court. The rule has been often stated here that during the trial the court, in furtherance of justice, should allow amendments liberally, in order to mold and direct its proceedings so as to dispose of cases upon their substantial merits and without unreasonable delay, regarding mere technicalities as obstacles to be avoided, rather than as principles to which effect is to be given in derogation of substantial right. Roland v. Kreyenhagen, 18 Cal. 455; Burns v. Scoffey, 98 Cal. 277, 33 Pac. 86.

Although in this case the court erred in refusing to allow the amendment, the error was cured by the court receiving evidence and finding upon the very matter to which the amendment was directed. The court found: "On the 4th day of November, 1891, plaintiff J. D. McDougald, defendant H. C. Hulet, and one W. D. McLaren made their promissory note in the words and figures following, to wit: '$4,748.34. Stockton, Nov. 4, 1891. One day after date, without grace, we, or either of us, promise to pay to the order of John Boggs four thousand seven hundred and forty-eight and thirty-four one-hundredths dollars, for value received, with interest from date at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum until paid. Principal and interest payable in U. S. gold coin at ——. And in case suit is instituted to collect this note, or any portion thereof, we promise to pay such additional sum as the court may adjudge reasonable, as attorney's fees in said suit. W. D. McLaren. J. D. McDougald. H. C. Hulet,'—and then and there delivered said note to defendant John Boggs, who is still the owner and holder thereof. That no part of the principal sum mentioned in said note has been paid, and no part of the interest due thereon has been paid, and the whole of said principal sum of $4,748.34, with interest thereon at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum from November 4, 1891, is now due, owing, and unpaid from said plaintiff J. D. McDougald to this defendant, John Boggs. That defendant Boggs has employed attorneys to collect the amount due upon said note, and the sum of $500 is a reasonable attorney's fee for such service." The plaintiff has not appealed or moved for a new trial. The findings are therefore binding upon the plaintiff. Gay v. Moss, 34 Cal. 126. The complaint asked to have the court find the amount due to Boggs. The amended answer on file alleged that default was made in the payment of all the rent which became due under the lease. But, conceding that the pleadings were not sufficient to justify the admission of evidence of the promissory note, it does not appear that any objection was made to such evidence. We must presume that the evidence was received without objection, and that it sustains the findings. It cannot be contended that a finding is not within the issues, if no objection was made to the evidence in support of the finding at the trial. Horton v. Dominguez, 68 Cal. 642, 10 Pac. 186; Moore v. Campbell, 72 Cal. 253, 13 Pac. 689.

MURRAY v. ETCHEPARE. (L. A. 648.)

FORECLOSURE—RECEIVERS—LEAVE OF COURT.

An answer in foreclosure by the mortgagor stated that a receiver had been appointed in another action in the same court, and that he had possession of the property, but it did not show that the rights of the parties in that action or the right of the receiver would be injuriously affected by a decree of foreclosure. The decree itself provided that it should not affect the rights and interests of the receiver. Held, that the mortgagor could not be injured by the decree, though plaintiff had not procured an order of court authorizing an action against the receiver.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Lucien Shaw, Judge.

Foreclosure by Elizabeth Murray against Laurent Etchepare and others. From a decree for plaintiff, defendant Etchepare, appeals. Affirmed.

H. H. Appel, for appellant. Dunnigan & Dunnigan, Horace Bell, and Geo. H. Smith, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, C. Foreclosure. Plaintiff had judgment on the verified pleadings, from which defendant Etchepare alone appeals. The complaint is in the ordinary form for foreclosure of a certain mortgage executed by defendant Etchepare on February 12, 1895, to secure the payment of a certain promissory note made by him to plaintiff on that date. Mrs. Leonis and Wilkerson were made parties defendant, as claiming some interest in the mortgaged property. It is not necessary to consider whether the facts in Mrs. Leonis' separate answer are well pleaded and constitute a defense to the action, for the reason that she does not appeal. Etchepare in his separate answer alleges ownership of the land, and does not deny the execution of the note and mortgage. His defense is that in an action wherein Mrs. Leonis is plaintiff and he is defendant, commenced, before the foreclosure proceedings were begun, in the superior court of Los Angeles county (the same court in which the foreclosure action was commenced), the court made an order appointing a receiver of all the property involved in this action, and said property went into possession of said receiver, who was then the acting and qualified receiver, and is now acting as such in said action; that the court in the said action (Leonis against Etchepare), before the commencement of this present action, "duly made an order requiring and authorizing the said receiver to pay off and discharge plaintiff's mortgage, and said order has not been rescinded or set aside," all of which, it is alleged, was well known to plaintiff when she brought this action; that "plaintiff did not procure any order from the superior court authorizing said plaintiff to commence an action against the receiver, who is made a party defendant herein." It is prayed that the court require the receiver to pay off the mortgage, and "that for that purpose the said receiver be authorized to borrow the amount," and that plaintiff's action be dismissed. The judgment recites that the receiver, defendant Wilkerson, disclaimed any interest in the mortgaged premises, and averred that his interest was such only as was given him by the order of his appointment as receiver, and the judgment provided "that the judgment and decree herein shall in no wise affect his rights and interests as such receiver." The receiver does not appeal.

We can discover no prejudicial error in the judgment. It is true that a receiver is an officer of the court, acting under its direction, and that it is contrary to the established doctrine of courts of equity to permit him to be made a party defendant to litigation, unless by consent of the court appointing him. The rule is established for the protection of receivers against unnecessary litigation, and because in most cases ample relief can be obtained by application on motion to the court making the appointment. High, Rec. § 254. In the present case, however, it was provided by the decree that whatever rights the receiver has in the subject of the action should be reserved to him; and no injury, therefore, is shown by appellant. Nothing appears in the answer of Etchepare or in the recitals of the judgment with reference to the receiver showing that injury can come to appellant by the enforcement of the decree. The answer states that a receiver has been appointed in another action, and that he has possession of the property; but it is not made to appear that the rights of the parties in that action or the rights of the receiver will be injuriously affected by the decree in the present action, and, as we have seen, the decree specially reserves all rights of the receiver. The judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: COOPER, C.; GRAY, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is affirmed.

ADAMS v. ATHERTON et al. (L. A. 798).¹
(Supreme Court of California. March 11, 1901.)

GIFTS—CAUSA MORTIS—SUIT TO REVOKE—DEATH OF DONOR.

Civ. Code, § 1151, provides that a gift in view of death may be revoked by the giver at any time. A person made a gift causa mortis to defendant, and before her death she brought an action to revoke the gift, but died before trial. Held, that the commencement and prosecution of the action was sufficient to revoke the gift, though it did not proceed to judgment on account of the death of the donor.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Walter Van Dyke, Judge.

Action by Emily J. Adams, executrix of the last will of Mary Jane Calder, deceased, against Emma M. Atherton, a minor, and F. J. Holbrook, her guardian, to revoke a gift causa mortis. From a judgment sustaining the gift as to a part of the property, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Will D. Gould and James H. Blanchard, for appellant. L. H. Washburn, T. D. Reymert, and R. J. Adcock, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. Suit to revoke a gift causa mortis. The plaintiff appeals from the judgment upon the judgment roll. The property which is involved in the action, and which was the subject of the gift, consisted of a note and mortgage of the value of $900, and household furniture and some jewelry, watches, wearing apparel, etc., of the value of $400; constituting together all the property of the donor, Mary Jane Calder. The donee was the defendant Emma M. Atherton, a niece of the donor, of the age of about 15 years, who had lived with her said aunt from infancy. The donor was a widow without children. On May 5, 1898, during her last illness, and in view of death, Mrs. Calder executed an assignment of said note and mortgage and a bill of sale of the other property to her said niece. These instruments were taken charge of by the attorney who prepared them for her, and were by him delivered to the guardian of the person and estate of the niece, by whom they were recorded in the office of the county recorder. This action to revoke said gifts and to cancel said assignment of the note and mortgage and said bill of sale was commenced by the donor, Mrs. Calder, on July 16, 1898. Prior to the commencement of the action she executed a will disposing of the whole of her property for the benefit of her niece. This will was executed on July 8th, and is set out in full in the answer. After her death said will was duly probated, and the present plaintiff, having been duly appointed and qualified as executrix of said will, was substituted as plaintiff herein, and filed an amended complaint. The fifth, sixth, and seventh findings are as follows: "(5) That on the 5th day of May, 1898, and during her last illness, and in view of death, the said Mary Jane Calder made a gift of all her property to the defendant Emma M. Atherton. Said property is described in paragraph 3 of the plaintiff's amended complaint. And said Mary Jane Calder was of sound and disposing mind at the time she made said gift. (6) That on or about the 30th day of June, 1898, said Mary Jane Calder was removed from her home to the Christian Hospital, a charitable institution in Los Angeles city, California, and thereafter, on or about the 5th day of July, 1898, she was taken from the said hospital to the county hospital of Los Angeles county. That thereafter, on the 8th day of July, 1898, and while a patient at said county hospital, she made her last will and testament, hereinbefore mentioned. (7) That said Mary Jane Calder did, in her lifetime, revoke said gift as to all of the property described in the plaintiff's amended complaint, except as to the note and mortgage, and that she did not revoke that portion of the gift." As conclusions of law the court found that said gift made on May 5, 1898, was a gift causa mortis, and was revoked by the donor in her lifetime as to the property described in the bill of sale, but that the donor did not revoke said gift as to said note and mortgage; and judgment was entered accordingly, each party to pay their own costs. The appeal is from that part of the judgment confirming the gift as to the note and mortgage, and from that part refusing costs to the plaintiff.

That the commencement and prosecution of this action was a revocation of the whole of the gift, including the property described in the bill of sale, would appear to be beyond question. The Code does not prescribe any particular procedure to accomplish a revocation of a gift causa mortis. It simply declares that "a gift in view of death may be revoked by the giver at any time" (Civ. Code, § 1151), and we can conceive of no more emphatic announcement of an intention to revoke the gift and retake possession and control of the property the subject of the gift than that here pursued. It is not essential to a revocation that the donor should again acquire the actual possession. If it were so, a revocation could in many cases be defeated. A subsequent will, if it expresses an intention to revoke the gift, will accomplish the revocation, under our Code. See Civ. Code, § 1152. The intention of the donor to revoke both gifts (if we may call them two) is here manifested by the same act, and at the same time, and in the same manner, and, if effectual to revoke the gift as to one part, must be equally so as to the other. The defendants, the donee and her guardian, appeared and demurred to the complaint before the death of the donor, so that, even if knowledge on the part of the donee of the revocation before the death of the donor were essential, such knowledge was communicated by the service of the summons and complaint. To such action the answer stated no facts sufficient to constitute a defense, and, if such action could effect a revocation as to a part of the property, it must operate as a revocation of the gift as to the whole of it. It is not necessarily the judgment in the action which operates as a revocation, but the intention to revoke, manifested by bringing and prosecuting the action, is quite sufficient for that purpose. There is neither allegation nor finding that there was any gift of the note and mortgage after the date of the original gift on May 5th, nor after the defendant's appearance to this action. We must, therefore, regard the finding that Mary Jane Calder did not revoke the gift of the note and mortgage as an erroneous conclusion of law that should be disregarded; and that portion of the judgment relating to said note and mortgage is reversed, with directions to the court below to enter judgment for the plaintiff canceling the assignment of said note and mortgage and said bill of sale, and that all said property be delivered by the defendants to the plaintiff, as executrix of the last will and testament of said Mary Jane Calder, deceased; and it is so ordered.

LYNCH v. LYNCH et al. (Sac. 816.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 14, 1901.)

DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION—COLLATERALS —WHOLE AND HALF BLOOD.

Civ. Code, § 1386, par. 5, declares that if a decedent leave a husband or wife, and neither issue, father, mother, brother, nor sister, the whole estate shall pass to the husband or wife. Paragraph 2 provides that, if there be no father or mother, one-half goes in equal shares to the brothers and sisters, and to the children of any deceased brother or sister by representation. Held, that where a decedent left surviving him a widow, brothers, and sisters of the half blood, and children of a sister of the full blood, a contention that the widow was entitled to the whole estate under paragraph 5, on the ground that the half brothers and sisters were not entitled to share because decedent left no kindred of the full blood in the same degree, and that the children could not inherit because the decedent left no brother or sister of the whole blood, was not well taken; the statute intending no distinction between brothers and sisters of the whole and half blood.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Solano county; A. J. Buckles, Judge.

Suit by Mary Lynch against John Lynch and others. From a decree in favor of defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

P. F. Dunne, for appellant. Louis F. Dunand and H. H. McPike, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. The estate of P. C. Lynch, an intestate, was distributed to the widow, Mary Lynch, appellant here, fifteen-twentieths, as survivor of the community and statutory heir at law, and the remaining five-twentieths to certain collateral distributees, to wit, two brothers and one sister, all of the half blood, and to two sets of children, being the children of a deceased brother of the full blood and the children of a deceased sister of the full blood. The question is, are these collaterals entitled to take any part of the estate as against the widow, who claims it all?

Appellant rests her title to distribution of the whole estate upon paragraph 5, § 1386, Civ. Code, which reads: "If the decedent leave a surviving husband or wife, and neither issue, father, mother, brother, nor sister, the whole estate goes to the surviving husband or wife." Paragraph 2 of the same section provides that, if the decedent leave no issue, the estate goes, one half to the surviving husband or wife, and the other half to the decedent's father and mother, in equal shares, and, if either be dead, the whole of said half goes to the other; "if there be no father or mother, then one-half goes in equal shares to the brothers and sisters of the decedent, and to the children of any deceased brother or sister by right of representation." Appellant's contention is that the half-brothers and half-sister are not entitled because the decedent left no kindred of the whole blood in the same degree, and that the nephews or nieces cannot inherit because the decedent left no brother or sister of the whole blood. Reliance is placed upon the decision in Re Ingram, 78 Cal. 586, 21 Pac. 435, where it is claimed "the question was considered and settled." In that case the intestate left a surviving husband, but no issue, and no father or mother, brother or sister. There were living, however, at her death certain children of a deceased sister who claimed to be entitled as distributees. The court said that paragraph 5 of section 1386, supra, "is too clear to present any difficulty of construction whatever"; and necessarily so, for the facts exactly fitted the statutory provision. In the opinion it was said: "Paragraph 2 in said section refers to the case where there is a surviving brother or sister, and provides that in such case, if there be also children of the deceased brother or sister, they shall take their parent's share by right of representation." We do not understand the question now here as necessarily raised in the Ingram Case. The language of the opinion may possibly bear the construction sought to be placed upon it, but we do not think it was intended to be so understood. The provision of the statute seems plainly to mean as it reads, that "if there be no father or mother [which is the case here], then one-half goes in equal shares to the brothers and sisters of the decedent, and to the children of any deceased brother or sister," etc. It does not say, nor does it mean, as is contended, that unless there are brothers and sisters of the full blood the children of a deceased brother of the full blood cannot inherit.

It seems to us that the only possible question is whether the section includes the brothers and sisters of the half blood. The statute makes no distinction between brothers or sisters of the half blood and those of the whole blood. The well-established rule in this country is that where the term "brothers" or "sisters" is used without limitation it includes half-brothers and half-sisters. In the case of Cliver v. Sanders, 8 Ohio St. 501, the court said: "The English canon, which excluded the half blood from inheriting real estate, did not do so on the ground that half-brothers of an ancestor were not his brothers, but because they were not presumptively of the blood of the first feudatory or purchaser from whom the estate was originally derived. * * * Half-brothers of the ancestor are included in, and designated by, 'brothers,' wherever that term is used without limitation." This is the rule of the civil law, and has been generally adopted in this country. Gardner v. Collins, 3 Mason, 398, Fed. Cas. No. 5,223; Id., 2 Pet. 58, 7 L. Ed. 347; Pearson v. Grice, 6 La. Ann. 232; Sheffield v. Lovering, 12 Mass. 490; Rowley v. Stray, 32 Mich. 70; Clark v. Sprague, 5 Blackf. 412; Clay v. Cousins, 1 T. B. Mon. 75; Marlow v. King, 17 Tex. 177. The law of England recognizes brothers of the whole and half blood to be of kin in the degree of brothers, although by that law kinsmen of the whole blood inherit to the exclusion of the half blood. Crooke v. Watt, 2 Vern. 124.

Appellant contends that her view as to the contingent element in the statutory heirship of children, as depending upon the existence of brothers and sisters of the decedent, applies particularly to the situation of kindred of the half blood; citing section 1394, Civ. Code, which provides that "kindred of the half blood inherit equally with those of the whole blood in the same degree," unless the inheritance comes to the intestate in a way not important in the present case. But for the qualification found in section 1394, unimportant here, brothers and sisters of the half blood would have rights of inheritance, under section 1386, in all respects equal with those of brothers and sisters of the whole blood, the law recognizing no distinction in their right to inherit. The rights of the half brothers and sisters of the intestate are conferred upon them by section 1386, and in fact are but limited by section 1394 in the particular not involved in this case. The decree is affirmed.

PEOPLE ex rel. HICKS v. STEWART. (L. A. 747.)¹

ELECTIONS—CANVASSING BOARD—RETURNS.

Under Pol. Code, § 1280, providing that if, at the time of the meeting of the supervisors to canvass election "returns," all the returns have not been received, the canvass must be postponed from day to day until all the returns are received, or until six postponements have been made, the supervisors have no authority at the first meeting to send for the duplicate list of voters, tally list, and list attached thereto, and retained by the inspector of a precinct, and use them in the canvass in place of a missing return.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Barbara county; W. S. Day, Judge.

Suit by the people, on the relation of Thomas H. Hicks, against Nat Stewart. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Atty. Gen. Ford, B. F. Thomas, J. W. Taggart, S. E. Crow, and H. C. Booth, for appellant. Canfield & Harbuck, for respondent.

SMITH, C. Appeal from a judgment for the defendant on demurrer to the complaint. The suit was brought to determine the right of the defendant to the office of sheriff of Santa Barbara county, which, it is alleged, he had usurped, and to establish the right of the relator to the same office. Code Civ. Proc. § 805. Briefly stated, the case as alleged is as follows: The relator and the defendant were candidates for the office in question at the election held therefor on November 8, 1898. The canvass of the returns was made by the board of supervisors November 14, 1898 (the first Monday following the election). When the board met on that day, the returns from one precinct of the county (the Cold Springs precinct) had not been received. But "the duplicate list of voters, tally list, and list attached thereto kept and retained by the inspector of said board of said precinct, as required by section 1262 of the Political Code, were sent for"; and the tally list, after being identified by the inspector, was used in the canvass in place of the missing return. The votes shown by this list (15 for the defendant, and 14 for the relator) were counted for the candidates, respectively, and a tie was thus produced. On the face of the returns, exclusive of this list, as was found by the board, there was a majority of one for the relator. As the result of the canvass, the board declared there was no choice of candidate, and on the next day, under the provisions of section 1067 of the Political Code (November 15th), ordered a special election. At this election the defendant was elected and qualified, which is the usurpation complained of. The relator was at this time the incumbent under an appointment by the supervisors of date January 7, 1895, to fill a vacancy. The case, so far as the defendant's right is concerned, turns on the validity of the order of the board and of the election held thereunder, and this in turn on the validity of the canvass. On this state of facts the order calling a special election and the election held under the order were, I think, void. People v. Mathewson, 47 Cal. 442; Same v. Harvey, 58 Cal. 338. The authority of the board of supervisors to call a special election depended upon its substantial compliance with the provisions of the law,—that is to say, upon a canvass of the returns as provided by Pol. Code, §§ 1278, 1280, et seq., with result appearing therefrom that there was no choice of candidates. Id. §§ 1066, 1067. The "returns" referred to in these provisions are "the sealed packages containing the register, lists, papers, and ballots" prescribed by sections 1261 and 1263 of the Political Code, which "in section 1263 of the Political Code are spoken of as 'returns.'" Carlson v. Burt, 111 Cal. 131, 43 Pac. 583. In performing this function the board had no authority to proceed with the canvass until the missing returns had been received, or until the lapse of time prescribed by the law. Pol. Code, § 1280. Its duties were merely ministerial. Calaveras Co. v. Brockway, 30 Cal. 337, 338, and People v. Van Slyck, 4 Cow. 297, there cited; Paine, Elect. §§ 606, 607, 611, 615. It was forbidden to act, if the returns were not all in, until the lapse of six days. Id. § 309. Nor, assuming its power to canvass the returns, had it any authority to consider anything but the returns before it. It had no judicial powers. Bright, Elect. Cas. 303, 304. The duties of canvassers are simply "to add and ascertain by calculation the number of votes given for any office." Paine, Elect. § 606. They were not authorized to decide "in any other mode than by an examination of the returns made to them according to law. They are not required or authorized to hear witnesses or weigh evidence. They have no power to send for persons or papers." Id. § 609. They "have no power to canvass, as election returns, any papers not duly authenticated in the mode prescribed by law. An attempted canvass, in which the result declared was based on papers not thus authenticated, may be treated as a nullity by the party injured" (in this case the state). Id. § 614. The precise question was determined in Pacheco v. Beck, 52 Cal. 7 et seq. There it was held that the secretary of state, in canvassing the returns as required by section 1346 of the Political Code, could not look beyond the abstract of the record of the board of supervisors entered in the proceedings of the board as required by section 1282 of the Political Code, and certified by the clerk as required by section 1344, though it was shown by other certificates of the clerk, and by the allegations of the petition, that the result of the election declared by the board, and originally entered in the minutes, was altered by the clerk without authority before the minutes were signed. The secretary, in the proceeding involved in that case, acted in the same capacity as the board of supervisors in the proceedings here involved, and the case here therefore comes within the decision of that case. It follows that the demurrer should have been overruled. There being no demurrer to the cause of action alleged in favor of the relator, the question as to its validity does not seem to be presented on this appeal, and it will be unnecessary to pass on it. Code Civ. Proc. § 53. The judgment should be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to overrule the demurrer to the complaint.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; CHIPMAN, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to overrule the demurrer to the complaint.

PEOPLE v. BOTKIN. (Cr. 832.)

CRIMINAL LAW—CRIME—POWER TO PUNISH—JURISDICTION—MURDER—LOCALITY OF OFFENSE.

1. The legislature has power to declare that a crime committed in part within the state shall be punishable under the laws of the state.

2. If A., in California, prepares and sends a poisonous article to B., in Delaware, with murderous intent, and the article causes B.'s death in the latter state, such acts constitute the crime of murder committed in part in California, and are within the meaning of Pen. Code, art. 27, subd. 1, declaring that "all persons who commit, in whole or in part, any crime within this state," are "liable to punishment under the laws of this state"; and A. is triable and punishable under the laws of California, as if the crime had been committed entirely within that state.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Carroll Cook, Judge.

Cordelia Botkin was convicted of murder, and appeals. Reversed.

Frank McGowan, George A. Knight, Charles J. Heggerty, and Knight & Heggerty, for appellant. Tirey L. Ford, Atty. Gen., and Henry A. Melvin, for the People.

GAROUTTE, J. Defendant has been convicted of the crime of murder, and prosecutes this appeal. The charge of the court, given to the jury upon the law, contained declarations which were held to be unsound, and constitute reversible error, in People v. Vereneseneckockockhoff, 129 Cal. 497, 58 Pac.

156, 62 Pac. 111. In view of the decision in that case, the attorney general concedes that the judgment should be reversed, and the cause remanded to the trial court for further proceedings. But defendant claims that she is not triable at all by the courts of this state, and this contention should now be passed upon; for, if maintainable, a second trial becomes a useless expenditure of money, time, and labor, and necessarily should not be had. For the purposes of testing this claim of lack of jurisdiction in the courts of California to try defendant, the facts of this case may be deemed as follows: Defendant, in the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, sent by the United States mail to Elizabeth Dunning, of Dover, Del., a box of poisoned candy, with intent that said Elizabeth Dunning should eat of the candy, and her death be caused thereby. The candy was received by the party to whom addressed, she partook thereof, and her death was the result. Upon these facts, may the defendant be charged and tried for the crime of murder in the courts of the state of California? We do not find it necessary to declare what the true rule may be at common law, upon this state of facts; for, in our opinion, the statute of this state is broad enough to cover a case of the kind here disclosed. There can be no question but that the legislature of this state had the power to declare that the acts here pictured constitute the crime of murder in this state, and we now hold that the legislative body has made that declaration. Section 27 of the Penal Code reads as follows: "The following persons are liable to punishment under the laws of this state: (1) All persons who commit, in whole or in part, any crime within this state. (2) All who commit larceny or robbery out of this state, and bring to, or are found with the property stolen, in this state. (3) All who, being out of this state, cause or aid, advise or encourage, another person to commit a crime within this state, and are afterwards found therein." Subdivision 1 covers the facts of this case. The acts of defendant constituted murder, and a part of those acts were done by her in this state. Preparing and sending the poisoned candy to Elizabeth Dunning, coupled with a murderous intent, constituted an attempt to commit murder; and defendant could have been prosecuted in this state for that crime if for any reason the candy had failed to fulfill its deadly mission. That being so,—those acts being sufficient, standing alone, to constitute a crime, and those acts resulting in the death of the person sought to be killed,—nothing is plainer than that the crime of murder was in part committed within this state. The murder being committed in part in this state, the section of the law quoted declares that persons committing murder under those circumstances "are liable to punishment under the laws of this state." The language quoted can have but one meaning, and that is: A person committing a murder in part in this state is punishable under the laws of this state, the same as though the murder was wholly committed in this state. Counsel for defendant insist that this section only contemplates offenses committed by persons who at the time are without the state. This construction is not sound; for, as to subdivision 1, it is not at all plain that a person without the state could commit in whole a crime within the state. Again, if the crime in whole is committed within the state by a person without the state, such a person could not be punished under the laws of this state; for the state has not possession of his body, and there appears to be no law by which it may secure that possession. Indeed, all the subdivisions of the section necessarily contemplate a case where the person is or comes within the state. If the framers of the section had intended by subdivision 1 to cover the case of persons only who were without the state when the acts were committed which constitute the crime, they would have inserted in the section the contingency found in the remaining subdivisions, which subdivisions contemplate a return to the state of the person committing the crime. It is plain that the section was intended to embrace all persons punishable under the laws of the state of California. The defendant, having committed a murder in part in the state of California, is punishable under the laws of the state, exactly in the same way, in the same courts, and under the same procedure as if the crime was committed entirely within the state. For the foregoing reasons, the judgment and orders are reversed, and the cause remanded.

EMINENT DOMAIN—MUNICIPAL CORPORATION — CONDEMNATION — ALLEYS — PLEADING — OBJECTIONS—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. Complaint by a city, in condemning realty for an alley, under Act March 6, 1889, § 18 (St. 1889, p. 70), which conforms to the requirements of Code Civ. Proc. § 1244, relating to eminent domain, and prescribing what the complaint must contain, is not demurrable on the ground that plaintiff only asked for an easement or right of way, and set out no express grant, implied reservation, or user for any length of time.

2. In a condemnation of realty for an alley, a complaint which definitely describes the land, and asserts the purpose to be to acquire an easement or right of way for a public use by the extension of an alley through the land described, is not demurrable on the ground of ambiguity and uncertainty.

3. A denial in an answer to a complaint in condemning land for an alley that complainant was at all times mentioned a municipal corporation organized under the laws of California is not sufficient to put in issue such allegation of the complaint.

4. In condemning land for an alley, a mere denial of the city's right to lay out the alley raises no issue of fact.

5. In condemning realty for an alley, an answer alleging that the right of way was sought for the convenience of the adjoining landowners, and not for the public benefit, and that other land could be taken, presents no material issue, since a city in condemning land for an alley need only prove that the taking of the property sought to be condemned was necessary for alley purposes.

6. In condemning realty for an alley, a contention that the city had no right to condemn the land, because one of its trustees signed the petition which was presented to the board, is untenable, where it is not alleged that such trustee's vote was essential to the hearing.

7. In condemning land for an alley, an objection that the board of trustees failed to acquire jurisdiction because there was no hearing of the objections cannot be maintained, where defendant had an opportunity and did state his reasons for objecting to the board, though he was afterwards excluded from the room, so that the board might pass on the objections privately.

8. Under Act March 6, 1889, § 18 (St. 1889, p. 70), relating to the condemnation of realty, and declaring that resolutions ordering the work to be done shall be conclusive evidence of the necessity in condemning realty for an alley, the court may properly instruct the jury that the resolution ordering the alley opened was conclusive proof of the necessity for opening of the way, and they were only to determine whether it was necessary for the city to take a strip of 10 feet, and, if the whole of such strip was not necessary, then to find how much of it was necessary for the alley.

9. Where a city condemns realty for an alley, the owner is entitled to receive an amount equal to that for which the strip could be sold in the open market.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Orange county; J. W. Ballard, Judge.

Action by the city of Santa Ana against J. H. Brunner to condemn realty for an alley. From a judgment for plaintiff, from an order striking portion of defendant's answer, from the final order of condemnation, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

McKelvey & Bowes, for appellant. W. F. Heathman, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, C. Action to condemn a strip of land as and for an alley. Certain issues were tried by a jury, and plaintiff had the verdict, and judgment was entered accordingly. The appeal is from the judgment, from an order striking out certain portions of defendant's answer, and from the final order of condemnation, and from the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial. A general demurrer to the complaint was filed, and also a demurrer on the ground of ambiguity and uncertainty, and appellant now urges that the demurrer should have been sustained.

1. The complaint is laid under the provisions of section 18, Act March 6, 1889 (St. 1889, p. 70), and agreeably to the requirements of the Code of Civil Procedure relating to eminent domain, and prescribing, in section 1244 thereof, what the complaint must contain. The objection urged in support of the general demurrer is that "the plaintiff only asks for an easement or right of way"; that no express grant or implied reservation is set out, or user for any length of time, and no servitude is shown,—citing Civ. Code, § 801; Carey v. Rae, 58 Cal. 162. Appellant misconceives the source of plaintiff's right. It does not spring from an express grant, or from an implied reservation, or from user for a time sufficient to create a prescriptive right, as was the case in Carey v. Rae, which was a controversy between contiguous owners of land. That case has no application. The right here is derived from the statute, and is given in the interest of the general public. So far as we can see, the complaint states a cause of action, and, except as to the objections above noted, appellant makes no point on this ground of demurrer.

2. The other grounds of demurrer are equally untenable. It plainly appears from the complaint that the purpose of the action is to condemn a strip of land, definitely described, for a definite purpose, to wit: "To acquire an easement or right of way over and along the land hereinafter described for a public use, to wit, the opening and extension of an alley through," etc., "as and for an alley, and that all the said land necessary to be taken, condemned, and acquired as and for said alley, as provided by law, under the right of eminent domain." It was not necessary "to show some previous right of plaintiff for an easement over the land of defendant," as appellant erroneously supposes should have been done, and as was the case of Carey v. Rae, supra, and it did fully appear in the complaint by what right plaintiff claimed the easement. We find no support for appellant's objections on the ground of ambiguity and uncertainty.

3. The first 10 paragraphs of the answer, and also the Exhibits A and B of the answer, were stricken out on plaintiff's motion, and this is alleged as error. It was alleged in the verified complaint that "plaintiff is and was, at the times hereinafter mentioned, a municipal corporation of the fifth class, organized and existing under the laws of the state of California," etc.; citing the particular acts. Paragraph 1 of the answer "denies that the plaintiff was, at all times herein (i. e. in the answer) mentioned, a municipal corporation of the fifth class, organized and existing under the laws of the state of California." This denial is not sufficient to put in issue, if such issue was material, the allegations of the complaint, and it was not error to strike it out. Paragraph 2 denies that plaintiff has the right and power to lay out any street or alley, etc. This raises no issue of fact. Paragraph 3 denies "that it is necessary for the plaintiff to condemn an casement over the land of the defendant for an alley," etc., and alleges that the right of way is sought "for the convenience of adjoining landowners and no others, and not for the public benefit." An alley in a city or town is declared to be a public use (Code Civ. Proc. § 1238; see, also, section 1, Acts 1889, supra), and no inquiry on that subject can be made in this action; and when a city or town decides, by appropriate proceedings, that an alley is desirable, and institutes condemnation proceedings for a right of way therefor, it is only required to prove that the taking of the property sought to be condemned is necessary for the purposes of an alley (City of Pasadena v. Stimson, 91 Cal. 238, 27 Pac. 604; City of Santa Ana v. Harlin, 99 Cal. 538, 34 Pac. 224). Without following the paragraphs seriatim, the points may be covered by stating that the allegation and denial of tender to defendant by plaintiff of a certain sum as compensation was unnecessary, and raised no issue essential in the case. City of Pasadena v. Stimson, supra. The motive of plaintiff in bringing the action charged in the answer, i. e. that it was for private purposes, and that other land could be taken instead of the land described, presented no material issue in the present action. It is alleged that the trustees had no right to take action upon the proposition of condemning defendant's land, because one of the city trustees, George A. Edgar, signed the petition which was presented to the board; that said Edgar was disqualified from acting as a trustee, but did in fact vote and act at the hearing of the petition. Waiving the question whether this fact is any defense where the act of the board, as here, was legislative and political, and not judicial (Brown v. Board, 124 Cal. 274, 57 Pac. 82), it is not alleged that Edgar's vote was essential at the hearing. The board consists of five trustees, a majority of whom constitute a quorum. Municipal Corporation Act, § 761; St. 1883, p. 93.

In paragraphs 9 and 10 it is alleged that defendant filed an objection with the trustees to the opening of the alley, which is attached to the answer as Exhibit B; that said objections were to have been heard on a certain day, at which time defendant and his counsel appeared before the board, "and before said hearing had terminated, and before said board had adjourned, the defendant was ordered by said board to leave the room where said hearing was being held, and that the hearing of said objections was continued after defendant was so ordered to leave the room; that the defendant and his counsel were not ordered to leave for any conduct on their part interfering with said board, but that said board might pass upon said objections privately." It is alleged that the board did in fact pass on the objections at a private meeting, and not at a public meeting. Exhibit B gave, as reasons for objecting to the alley, (1) that public convenience did not require it; (2) that it was for the convenience of certain lot owners, and not for the public; and (3) that the taking of the land will be taking the property of one person for the benefit of another, and not for the public benefit. These objections would not seem to call for any extended hearing to fully inform the board of whatever force they were entitled to. But, aside from this, it does appear that defendant and his counsel had a hearing of some duration. They appeared "where said hearing was being held" and they state that it was continued. It is not stated that there was no hearing, or that appellant had no opportunity to and did not state his reasons for objecting. It does not appear but that when ordered from the room he had already fully presented the evidence in support of his objections.

If it be admitted that we can in this action inquire into the conduct of the board in passing upon appellant's objections, we do not think he has made such showing as would form a basis for the inquiry. Appellant's point that the board failed to acquire jurisdiction because there was no hearing of his objections cannot be maintained; for, according to his own showing, there was a hearing, although cut short for some reason not explained. See Brown v. Board, supra. We cannot discover that appellant was in any wise injured by the order of the court. Every material issue was before the court on the pleadings after the objectionable paragraphs of the answer were stricken out.

4. Appellant claims that the court erroneously instructed the jury in stating that the resolution passed by the board ordering the alleyway opened "is conclusive proof upon the question of the necessity for opening such alleyway, and it is only necessary for you to find whether it was necessary that plaintiff take said strip of 10 feet, * * * and, if the whole is not necessary, then how much of it is necessary for the purpose of such alley." Section 18 of the act of 1889 declares that "the resolution and ordinance ordering said work to be done shall be conclusive evidence of such necessity." The instruction was quite as favorable to defendant as the law would permit, for it left the jury to determine the width of the strip, and as to the necessity for taking some part of the land the board had already conclusively determined.

5. The court instructed the jury, as to the question of value, that "the real test is, what would the strip sell for in the market on that day for cash, after reasonable time taken by the owner to make the sale?" The court also said that "the defendant is entitled to receive for this strip an amount equal to that for which it could have been sold * * * in the open market." It is complained that this was error, because a strip of land of that width, "by itself, would be of no value on the market." Appellant suggests no other or better rule for measuring the damages than that given in the instructions, and we know of none. City of Santa Ana v. Harlin, 99 Cal. 538, 34 Pac. 224. We discover no prejudicial error in the record, and therefore advise that the judgment and orders be affirmed.

We concur: GRAY, C.; COOPER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and orders are affirmed.

SCHOMBERG v. WALKER. (S. F. 1,811.)
(Supreme Court of California. March 14, 1901.)

LIBEL—PUBLICATION—JUSTIFICATION—TRUTH—MALICE—OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS—CRITICISM—EVIDENCE—DAMAGES—TRIAL.

1. A publication headed "Ring" charged that the board of trustees, of which plaintiff was a member, "had the 'wring' in the nose of the taxpayers last Monday night in a most contemptible, illegal, and unjust manner, and unworthy of citizens elected to look after the best interest of our little town"; and that the board awarded a contract to a bidder on Monday at 9 p. m., and that the contractor's materials were at the depot by Tuesday evening, and that it was impossible to get them there between the times stated; and asking the board to explain this unjust and discriminating action. Held that, in the absence of justification, the publication was libelous, under Civ. Code, § 45, defining "libel" as a false and unprivileged publication, which exposes a person to hatred, contempt, ridicule, or obloquy, or which causes him to be shunned or avoided, or which has a tendency to injure him in his business.

2. A plea that the article was true was not supported merely by evidence of the fact of the award of the contract.

3. As the unfairness of the publication appeared on its face, and there was evidence of malice in its republication and otherwise, and no evidence of truth beyond the admitted fact of the award to the person named, a plea of privilege could not be sustained, under Civ. Code, § 47, subd. 4, declaring privileged a "fair and true report, without malice," of official proceedings.

4. Where defendant understood the injurious effect and intent of the article, and did not attempt to discover its truth, but subsequently republished it, asserting it to be true, he was not justified, under Civ. Code, § 47, subd. 3, declaring privileged a communication without malice, to a person interested, by one interested or standing in such relation as to afford a reasonable presumption that the communication was innocent.

5. It was error to admit testimony that plaintiff's standing and reputation were not in fact deleteriously affected by such libel.

6. In an action for libel, it was not error to refuse to instruct that, on a plea of justification and failure of proof to sustain it, plaintiff was entitled to exemplary damages, as the question of damages was for the jury.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; W. G. Lorigan, Judge.

Action by Henry Schomberg against W. S. Walker for libel. From a judgment for defendant, and from an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Will M. Beggs and W. C. Kennedy, for appellant. Wm. P. Veuve, for respondent.

SMITH, C. Appeal from a judgment for the defendant and from an order denying a new trial. The suit was for libel published in the defendant's newspaper, reflecting on the plaintiff as one of the board of trustees of the town of Los Gatos. The article complained of is as follows: "Ring! Ring! Ring! Mr. Editor: With permission to encroach on your valuable space, I would state to the taxpayers of Los Gatos there are many kinds of rings. The most interesting to the recipient, I presume, is the engagement ring, especially so if it be a diamond. Then there is the marriage ring, and rings worn in the nose, and in many other ways. Now, I think the board of trustees had the 'wring' in the nose of the taxpayers last Monday night in a most contemptible, illegal, and unjust manner, and unworthy of a body of citizens elected to look after the best interest of our little town. The facts are these: The town clerk advertised for bids to build a certain culvert, the bids to be in at the town hall by five o'clock on Monday last. The august 'wringers' met, and awarded the contract to the lowest bidder about 9 p. m. on Monday night. The material for the said culvert was at the Los Gatos depot by 5 o'clock a. m. Tuesday. Now, this looks as if the 'wring' was well twisted; as Mr. Sylvester, the contractor, must have known long before the board met that the contract was his, as it was impossible after 9 p. m. on Monday night to order the lumber, load it on the car, and get it here next morning by 5 o'clock. Can our city 'wringers' explain this unjust and discriminating action to the people of Los Gatos? If a reasonable explanation is not forthcoming, I will add my mite with others to prevent the payment of any bill contracted so illegally. Justice."

It is alleged in the complaint that the article was published of and concerning the plaintiff (Code Civ. Proc. § 460), and that this was the case appears from the fact that, of the five trustees constituting the board, only three, including the plaintiff, participated in the award of the contract. It is claimed by the appellant that the article published is libelous per se, and that, in the absence of justification, he was entitled to a verdict for at least nominal damages. If so, he is now entitled to a reversal. Lick v. Owen, 47 Cal. 257; Taylor v. Hearst, 107 Cal. 272, 40 Pac. 392. The question involved, then, is whether the publication is or is not a libel per se.

The definition of "libel" in our Code is taken from Field's Civ. Code N. Y. § 29, and is but a statement of the common-law rule as given in the cases there cited. 2 Kent. Comm. 17; Stone v. Cooper, 2 Denio, 293; Cooper v. Greeley, 1 Denio, 347; Steele v. Southwick, 9 Johns. 214. The effect of these and other cases is thus stated, almost in the language of the Code, by Mr. Odgers: "In cases of libel, any words will be presumed defamatory which expose the plaintiff to hatred, contempt, ridicule, or obloquy, which tend to injure him in his profession or trade, or to cause him to be shunned or avoided by his neighbors." Odgers, Lib. & Sland. 21; O'Brien v. Clement, 15 Mees. & W. 435; Cropp v. Tilney, 3 Salk. 226; Villers v. Monsley, 2 Wils. 403. There is indeed an apparent difference between the Code definition and the older definitions in the use by the former of words "false and unprivileged" as descriptive of a libelous publication; but this language does not materially change the rule. The burden of proving the truth of the libel or the privilege claimed still lies on the defendant, as at common law. Newell, Defam. 771, 772; Odgers, Lib. & Sland. 169; O'Brien v. Clement, 15 Mees. & W. 435. The difference is therefore merely verbal. According to the old definition, a libel may be justified by proving its truth or that it is privileged. Under the Code definition, the publication, if it can be thus justified, is not a libel. Under either point of view, therefore, it will be necessary to consider separately the question as to the general character of the publication and the question as to its justification.

1. The first question to be considered, therefore, is, whether, in the absence of justification or privilege, the publication complained of is in itself a libel, and this I think must be determined affirmatively. Where there is a statutory definition, it has been said by this court: "Language which is fairly included in such definition is libelous per se. It is only when the libelous meaning of the publication is covert—not apparent on the face of the language used—that averment and proof of special damage is required." Our Code defines "libel" as follows: "Libel is a false and unprivileged publication by writing, pictures, effigy or other representation to the eye, which exposes any person to hatred, contempt, ridicule or obloquy, or which causes him to be shunned or avoided, or which has a tendency to injure him in his occupation." Civ. Code, § 45. This definition is very broad, and includes almost any language which upon its face has a natural tendency to injure a man's reputation either generally or with respect to his occupation. Tonini v. Cevasco, 114 Cal. 271, 272, 46 Pac. 103. In the case cited the gist of the libel was, in effect, that the plaintiff had "been discharged from the firm of G. B. Cevasco & Co. for conduct not irreprehensible." The case here is much stronger, and the observation of the court (page 273, 114 Cal., and page 105, 46 Pac.), with the authorities cited, must be held equally applicable here. "It cannot be justly said that the language does not import anything of a defamatory character concerning the plaintiff." See Bettner v. Holt, 70 Cal. 270, 11 Pac. 713; Lick v. Owen, 47 Cal. 252; Edwards v. Society, 99 Cal. 431, 34 Pac. 128, 37 Am. St. Rep. 70; Fitch v. De Young, 66 Cal. 330, 5 Pac. 364.

that there be a direct and specific allegation of improper conduct, as in a pleading. The charge may be either expressly stated or implied, and in the latter case the implication may be either apparent from the language used, or of such a character as to require the statement and proof of extrinsic facts (inducement, colloquium, and innuendo) to show its meaning. In the last case, proper allegations and proofs of the facts necessary to make the meaning of the language apparent will be required. Otherwise, whether the charge be directly made or merely implied, the publication, without averment, colloquium, or innuendo, will in itself constitute a libel. "The construction which it behooves a court of justice to put on a publication which is alleged to be libelous is to be derived as well from the expressions used as from the whole scope and apparent object of the writer." Cooper v. Greeley, 1 Denio, 358. Thus, in the case cited, the charge was not "made in an open and direct manner," "but [it was said by the court] an imputation made in that form is not the less actionable." So, in the case of Steele v. Southwick, 9 Johns. 214, where the charge was not direct, it was said: "If the words do not import perjury in the legal sense, they hold the plaintiff up to contempt and ridicule," etc. "In this view, the words are actionable, for a writing published maliciously, with a view to expose a person to contempt and ridicule, is undoubtedly actionable; and what is said to this effect by the judges of the common bench in Villers v. Monsley, 2 Wils. 403, is founded in law, justice, and sound policy. * * * To allow the press to be the vehicle of malicious ridicule of private character would soon deprave the moral taste of the community, and render the state of society miserable and barbarous."

The libel charged in this case not only expressly avers that the trustees referred to, of whom the plaintiff was one, had in some way treated the citizens in a manner "most contemptible, illegal, and unjust, * * * and unworthy of a body of citizens elected to look after the best interests of [the] town," and that their action was "unjust and discriminating," but it charges them by implication, as plainly as though it were directly alleged, with constituting or being members of a "ring"; by which, as used in the context, must be understood, according to the most obvious and familiar sense of the term, a combination for illegal or otherwise improper purposes (Edwards v. Society, 99 Cal. 435, 436, 34 Pac. 128); and also, specifically, with being guilty of a corrupt combination with the successful bidder. There can be no doubt, therefore, of the libelous character of the publication.

2. Two affirmative defenses are set up in the answer, which may be conveniently referred to as a plea of justification and a plea of privilege. The former is to the effect that the article is "a true and fair report" of the proceedings referred to, published "without malice." Civ. Code, § 47, subd. 4. The latter consists of the single allegation "that the said publication was and is true." But, beyond the admitted fact that the award of contract and the proceedings connected therewith were correctly stated, no evidence was offered to prove the truth of the charges made. The plea of justification must therefore be regarded as unsupported by the evidence. And for the same and other reasons the plea of privilege must also be so regarded; for not only was there no attempt to prove the truth of the so-called "report," but its unfairness clearly appears on the face of the publication; and there was evidence, in the republication of the libel and otherwise, of express malice. Civ. Code, § 47, subd. 4; Odgers, Lib. & Sland. 272; Chubb v. Westley, 6 Car. & P. 436; Newell, Defam. 349, 350, and cases cited. The defendant's case is therefore not aided by either of his pleas.

It was, however, competent for the defendant to show under the general issue that the alleged libel was privileged, or, as otherwise expressed, that "it was published on some lawful occasion." O'Brien v. Clement, 15 Mees. & W. 437. It remains, therefore, to be considered whether, on the evidence, such a claim can be maintained. The theory of the defense on this point is that the proceedings referred to in the article were correctly reported, and that the rest of the publication was merely a comment upon them, which the writer, as a citizen, had a right to make, and the defendant to publish. The privilege thus claimed, if it can be sustained at all, must, it would seem, rest upon the provisions of subdivision 3 of section 47 and section 48 of the Civil Code, as none of the other provisions of the former section can apply to the case. But these provisions would seem to include within their intent the familiar doctrine of the right of the citizen "to comment on matters of public interest and general concern" (Odgers, Lib. & Sland. 34, 38, 89); for the writer of a communication commenting on such matters, as well as each member of the community to whom it is addressed, comes within the description of "a person interested therein," and it cannot be supposed it was the intention to alter the law in this respect. But the right of the citizen to comment on the proceedings of public officers is limited by the condition that "he does so fairly and with honest purpose," and that the line be observed "where defamation commences [and] true criticism ends." Odgers, Lib. & Sland. 34, 36; Newell, Defam. 564, 567, 569. The case, therefore, does not come within the privilege claimed; for here there was ample and uncontradicted proof of express malice. The defendant, as he himself testified, understood the injurious effect and intent of the article, and yet made no inquiry, in advance of publication, either of the writer or others, as to the truth of the charges made. The facts stated in the article were not of a character to excite even a suspicion of improper conduct on the part of the trustees. The proceedings were regular, and the only additional fact was the arrival of certain materials on the next morning. But this is explained by the testimony of Lyndon, by whom they were ordered. The successful bidder, Syverson, had no connection with them, and it is not even asserted, directly, that they had been ordered by him. There was nothing in the fact, either as it was or as it was supposed to be, to justify the grossly vituperative epithets applied to the trustees. The defendant made no subsequent inquiry as to the justice of the charges, or, if he did, failed to retract them. On the contrary, after full time for examination and reflection, he republished the libel with injurious comments, and again, in his answer, reiterated the libel and asserted its truth. Odgers, Lib. & Sland. 178. From these facts, the inference of actual malice is irresistible.

Other points made by the appellant are that the court erred in allowing defendant's witnesses to testify, over his objections, that the plaintiff's standing and reputation in the community were in fact not deleteriously affected by the libel, and that the court erred in refusing to instruct the jury, at his request, that upon a plea of justification, and failure of proof to sustain it, the plaintiff would be "entitled to exemplary damages." The admission of the testimony objected to was erroneous. Titus v. Sumner, 44 N. Y. 266; Herrick v. Lapham, 10 Johns. 281. The instruction was rightly refused. The question of damages, and whether they should be exemplary or otherwise, was for the jury. Childers v. Publishing Co., 105 Cal. 285, 38 Pac. 903. I advise that the judgment and order appealed from be reversed, and the cause remanded for new trial.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; COOPER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are reversed, and the cause remanded for new trial.

SOUTHERN PAC. R. CO. v. CHOATE.

(Supreme Court of California. March 20, 1901.)

VENDOR AND PURCHASER—LAND CONTRACTS
RESCISSION—PUBLIC LANDS—PATENTS.

1. Where the purchaser under a land contract waited nearly seven years after the contract was executed, and four years after the patent had issued to the vendor, before objecting to the latter's title, or the invalidity of the patent, and made no offer to restore possession, or to put the vendor in statu quo, he was not in position to rescind.

2. Conceding that land included in a grant was claimed by others, and hence did not pass, on its being subsequently decided that it did not belong to the adverse claimants it became a part of the public domain, and congress had power to confirm the title to it to the grantee by patent.

3. Under Act Cong. March 2, 1896, providing that no patent to any lands held by a bona fide purchaser shall be annulled, but that "the right and title of such purchaser is hereby confirmed," a bona fide purchaser under a land contract cannot resist enforcement for the vendor's defect of title in that at the time of the grant to the vendor the lands involved were claimed by others, and did not pass by the grant, and that, consequently, patents issued thereafter were without authority, and void; since the statute cured any defect or invalidity in the patent.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; J. L. Campbell, Judge.

Action by the Southern Pacific Railway Company against Bertha Choate. There was a judgment for defendant on one count of the complaint, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Wm. Singer, Jr., and H. V. Reardon, for appellants. Shirley C. Ward, for respondent.

VAN DYKE, J. The action is for the balance of the unpaid purchase price for certain tracts of land in San Bernardino county, and to foreclose the right of the defendant therein. The complaint contains two counts, each declaring upon a separate contract for a separate tract of land. Judgment went for the plaintiff as to the first count, and in favor of the defendant as to the second. The appeal is taken from the latter part of said judgment.

The finding of the court on which the portion of the judgment in favor of the defendant was entered recites that from the agreed written statement of facts introduced in evidence the plaintiff was not on the 18th of May, 1891, and has not been since, and is not now, the owner of the land described in said contract set forth in the second count, and that plaintiff has not done or performed all the things required of it by the terms and conditions of said contract, in this: that it has not at any time been able to furnish to defendant a good or marketable title to the tract of land described in said agreement. The agreed statement of facts referred to, as shown in the record, states that the lands described in the second cause of action were, at the time of the grant by congress to the plaintiff under the act of March 3, 1871, claimed by the owners of the Jurupa Rancho (a confirmed Mexican grant by specific boundaries) to be within the boundaries of said rancho according to a survey which had then been made by a deputy United States surveyor, but that such survey was never finally approved by the United States government, and upon the 13th day of May, 1876, was rejected and set aside; that by a new survey of the northern boundary of said rancho in 1878, finally approved and patent issued thereon in May, 1879, the lands described in said second cause of action were not included within the boundaries of such rancho as finally surveyed and patented. The judgment entered in favor of the defendant on the findings was that she recover from the plaintiff the sum of money paid on the contract of purchase, and that upon the repayment of said money by the plaintiff, with legal interest thereon, the plaintiff have judgment against said defendant and all parties claiming by, through, or under her, forever barring and foreclosing them from any right to purchase the lands described in the contract set forth in the second count of the amended complaint. As appears from the argument contained in respondent's brief, the court below rendered judgment in favor of the defendant upon the second count on the ground that the land in question, having been claimed as a part of a former Mexican grant, was sub judice at the date of the act of congress, and therefore did not pass by said grant to the railroad company, and that the patent issued thereafter, under the decisions of the supreme court of the United States, issued without authority of law, and was, therefore, void. But it is recited in the stipulation referred to that such contract was made between the plaintiff and defendant with the full knowledge on the part of the defendant of all the matters and things hereinbefore stipulated to be facts, and in the contract between the plaintiff and defendant "it is further agreed that the party of the second part will never deny that the tracts herein described, or any part of them, are a part of said grant, and will do no act to hinder, delay, or impede the obtaining of patent for them by the party of the first part; and that she will not obtain or hold possession of all or any of them adversely to said party of the first part." The contract in question was entered into May 18, 1891, at which time one-fifth of the purchase price was paid by the defendant to the plaintiff, and the remaining portion was made payable on or before May 18, 1896. By the terms of said contract the said defendant was entitled to the possession of the land therein agreed to be conveyed. The patent was issued to the plaintiff August 15, 1894. The defendant paid annual interest on the deferred payments under the terms of her contract of purchase up to May, 1894, and this action was commenced in March, 1898; and in answer to the amended complaint, filed April 29, 1898, the defendant first makes objection to the title on the part of the plaintiff, and demands a return of that portion of the purchase money already paid on the contract.

The defendant has not brought herself within the rule in reference to the right of rescission. Rescission, when not effected by consent, can be accomplished only by use on the part of the party rescinding of reasonable diligence to comply with the following rules:

First, he must rescind promptly on discovering the facts which entitle him to rescind; second, he must restore, or offer to restore, to the other party, everything of value which he has received from him under the contract. Civ. Code, § 1691. In this case it was nearly seven years after the contract was executed, and four years after the patent had issued to the plaintiff, before objection was made to the title by defendant; and no offer appears to have been made to restore possession, or to put the plaintiff in statu quo. After the approval of the last survey of the Jurupa Rancho, and the issuance of a patent thereon, the land in question became a part of the public domain; and, if not included in the grant to the railroad, as contended by respondent, was clearly subject to the disposal of congress. Congress had the absolute power either to confirm the title of the land to the railroad company, or to donate it to the company, or to dispose of it in any manner it saw proper. March 3, 1891, congress passed an act limiting the time within which suit should be brought to set aside patents issued under like circumstances as this to the plaintiff company, and again, March 2, 1896, passed another statute on the same subject. In U. S. v. Railroad Co., 165 U. S. 463, 17 Sup. Ct. 368, 41 L. Ed. 789, the supreme court of the United States had occasion to consider these several acts of congress. In the opinion the court says: "Thus, in the act of 1891, it provided that suits to vacate and annul patents theretofore issued should only be brought within five years, and that as to patents thereafter to be issued such suits should only be brought within six years after the date of issue. Under the benign influence of this statute it would matter not what the mistake or error of the land department was, what the frauds and misrepresentations of the patentee were, the patent would become conclusive as a transfer of the title, providing only that the land was public land of the United States, and open to sale and conveyance through the land department. The act of 1896 extended the time for the bringing of suits for patents theretofore issued for five years from the passage of that act. It is true that these appellees cannot avail themselves of these limitations, because this suit was commenced before the expiration of the time prescribed, and we only refer to them as showing the purpose of congress to uphold titles arising under certification or patent by providing that after a certain time the government, the grantor therein, should not be heard to question them. But limitation was not the only protection given. The act of 1896, which extended the period of limitation, followed such extension with this proviso: 'But no patent to any lands held by a bona fide purchaser shall be vacated or annulled, but the right and title of such purchaser is hereby confirmed.' It is true, this act was passed after the commencement of this suit,—indeed, after the decision by the court of appeals,—but it is none the less an act to be considered. There can be no question of the power of congress to terminate, by appropriate legislation, any suit brought to assert simply the rights of the government. * * * We are of the opinion that congress intended by the sentence we have quoted from the act of 1896 to confirm the title which in this case passed by certification to the state. It not only declares that no patents to any lands held by a bona fide purchaser shall be vacated or annulled, but it confirms the right and title of such purchasers. Given a bona fide purchaser, his right and title is confirmed, and no suit can be maintained at the instance of the government to disturb it." Again: "These being the provisions of the act of 1887, the act of 1896, confirming the right and title of a bona fide purchaser, and providing that the patent to his lands should not be vacated or annulled, must be held to include one who, if not in the fullest sense a 'bona fide purchaser,' has nevertheless purchased in good faith from the railroad company. * * * Our conclusion is that these acts operate to confirm the title to every purchaser from a railroad company of lands certified or patented to or for its benefit, notwithstanding any mere errors or irregularities in the proceedings of the land department, and notwithstanding the fact that the lands so certified or patented were, by the true construction of the land grants, although within the limits of the grants, excepted from their operation, providing that he purchased in good faith, paid value for the lands, and providing, also, that the lands were 'public lands,' in the statutory sense of the term, and free from individual or other claims." It does not lie in the mouth of the defendant to say that she is not a bona fide purchaser from the plaintiff railroad company; and, besides, her acts under the purchase, as already recited, are inconsistent with any other theory than that she was a bona fide purchaser. This being the case, the act of congress referred to, as construed by the supreme court of the United States, cured any defect, or even invalidity, in the patent or title of the plaintiff, and inured to the defendant a perfect title upon obtaining a deed from the plaintiff in accordance with her contract of purchase. The portion of the judgment appealed from is reversed, and cause remanded for further proceedings in accordance with this opinion.

WILLS—MENTAL CAPACITY—PRESUMPTION—EVIDENCE—WITNESSES—PHYSICIAN—ATTORNEY—UNDUE INFLUENCE—JURY—CHARGE.

1. Where, on an appeal from an order denying a new trial after a verdict that the testator was of sound and disposing mind, contestant concedes that the testimony of the witnesses for proponent "is, in substance and effect, that testator had sufficient strength of mind and vigor of body to indicate his wishes to his attorney at great length, and with absolute precision of detail," the verdict is conclusive of that question, since any testimony to the contrary would simply raise a conflict of evidence.

2. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1881, providing that a physician cannot be examined as a witness in a civil action without the consent of his patient as to any information acquired in attending the patient, a physician called as a witness by the contestants of the patient's will cannot answer questions based on information gained while attending the testator, tending to show that his patient had not mental capacity to make a will at the time a codicil was executed, though he acted as scrivener in drawing the original will.

3. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1881, providing that without the consent of his client an attorney cannot be examined as to any communication made by the client to him in the course of professional employment, an attorney who drew a will may be examined and testify for the proponents of the will concerning his conversations with the testator preparatory to drawing the will, and instructions be received therefor, since from the fact of his employment to draw the will the consent of his client to do whatever may be necessary to establish the integrity of the will and make it effectual is implied.

4. Where, three days after a will was executed, a codicil was added, naming three executors, evidence by contestants that two of the executors so named had sought to obtain from the attending physician, during such interval, management of the estate, and that after the execution of the codicil one of such executors had stated that the reason the codicil was made was that they wanted some one there, rather than at another city, to manage the estate, had no tendency to show undue influence, in the absence of any evidence that either of such executors had any interview with the testator, or ever spoke to him, or to any one for him, with reference to the codicil or disposition of his property.

5. In a will contest, the court, after explaining the issues, and the right of a testator to dispose of his property according to his own desires, charged that the jury were not at liberty to consider the character of the provisions, but were solely to determine whether it was his will. Held, that such charge was not objectionable as an argumentative instruction by the court in support of the validity of the will, but properly confined the deliberation of the jury to the evidence, which alone could be considered by them.

6. In a contest as to the mental capacity of a testator, the court charged that a man might be in a state of extreme bodily or mental weakness and disease, and yet possess sufficient understanding to direct how his property should be disposed of. Held, that the charge was not an instruction that the testator might be competent to make a will though at the very point of mental extinction or dissolution, since the word "extreme" was not used in a superlative meaning, but in the sense of "grievous," "excessive," or "far advanced."

7. The trial court charged that a testator was presumed to be of sound mind at the time of the execution of his will, until the contrary was proven, and that he who alleged unsoundness must prove it. The testator signed a will, and three days afterwards declared it to be as he wanted it, and added a codicil appointing executors. Held, that the charge was not rendered erroneous by the fact that the jury found that he was of unsound mind at the time the original will was executed, but that he was mentally competent when the codicil was executed, since the charge was proper when given.

8. A request, by the contestants of a will, to charge that, if the jury found the testator of unsound mind at the time of executing the original will, the presumption was that he was of unsound mind three days thereafter, when executing a codicil, should be refused where the request ignored evidence from which the jury might find that the condition on the first occasion was temporary.

9. The court charged that "the testimony of a witness who has solemnly subscribed to a will as an attesting witness, and afterwards endeavors to overthrow it, should be closely scrutinized." Held that, though the instruction was open to objection, it was not sufficient to justify a reversal, as it merely told the jury to do something which they would evidently do without being instructed.

10. Where there is no evidence which would justify a finding that undue influence was exercised in procuring the execution of a will, such issue should not be submitted to the jury, since the presumption of undue influence is not raised by proof of interest and opportunity alone.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Colusa county; H. M. Alberty, Judge.

Application for the revocation of the probate of the will of Henry C. Nelson, deceased. From a judgment denying the application and affirming the probate, and from an order denying a new trial, contestant appeals. Affirmed.

See 60 Pac. 772.

E. T. Crane and Ernest Weyand (A. A. Moore, Crittenden Thornton, and E. A. Bridgford, of counsel), for appellants. Platt & Bayne, H. A. Powell, and Edwin Swinford, for respondents.

HARRISON, J. The last will and testament of the above-named decedent, bearing date October 17, 1897, and a codicil thereto, bearing date October 20, 1897, were admitted to probate, and letters testamentary thereon issued, November 29, 1897. In October, 1898, the appellants herein filed a petition for the revocation of this probate upon the grounds that at the respective dates of the instruments the deceased was not of sound and disposing mind, and that the said instruments, and each of them, were made under the duress and undue influence of certain parties benefited thereby. Issues were joined upon this petition, and those relating to the competency of the deceased were submitted to a jury, who rendered a verdict that the deceased was not of a sound and disposing mind at the time of making the will on the 17th day of October, and that he was of sound and disposing mind at the time of making the codicil on the 20th day of October. These verdicts were approved by the court, and it also found that neither the will of October 17th nor the codicil of October 20th was executed under duress or undue influence on the part of or on behalf of any one. The court thereupon rendered its judgment denying the petition of the contestants and affirming the probate previously made. A motion for a new trial, made by the contestants, was denied by the court, and the contestants have appealed.

The decedent was a resident of Colusa county, and at the time of the execution of the will and codicil was 79 years of age. In 1896 he suffered a stroke of apoplexy, and was thereafter enfeebled in body. In September, 1897, he went to San Francisco for the purpose of receiving medical treatment, and took rooms at the Langham Hotel, where he immediately placed himself under the care of Dr. Galvan, and remained under his medical treatment until his death, October 31st. During the night of October 16th his condition became worse, and on the morning of the 17th an attorney was summoned to his room for the purpose of drawing his will. After receiving certain information from Dr. Galvan, the attorney dictated to him the will of that date, which the doctor then wrote down and read to the testator. The testator indicated his approval thereof, and Dr. Galvan wrote his name upon the paper, and, with the testator touching the pen, made a cross, near which the doctor wrote the words "his mark." The doctor then wrote out the attestation clause, as dictated by the attorney, and it was signed by the witnesses. October 20th, Mr. James W. Goad came from Colusa, in response to a telegram to that effect, for the purpose of seeing Mr. Nelson. Mr. Goad was an attorney at law, and had been consulted by Nelson about drawing his will before the latter came to San Francisco. He went to the Langham Hotel, and was shown by Dr. Galvan the will of October 17th. Upon seeing Mr. Nelson, the latter said to him that the will made the proper disposition of his property, but that he desired to have Mr. Goad as one of his executors, and wished him to change it in that respect. He also named Mr. Smith and Mr. Jones as persons who he also wished to be his executors. Mr. Goad thereupon prepared the codicil of October 20th, and, after reading it to Nelson, the latter said that it was all right, and, upon being propped up in bed, told Mr. Goad to write his name to it. Goad thereupon wrote Nelson's name to the codicil, and gave him a pen with which to make his mark. Nelson took the pen, and, after making a cross near his name, wrote what purported to be his own name underneath the other. Upon Goad's inquiry as to whom he wished as witnesses, he named Goad himself, but, upon Goad's mentioning that, as he was named as executor, he had better name some one else, he named Dr. Gray and Mr. Murphy, who were present in the room, and they thereupon signed as witnesses thereto.

1. The verdict of the jury that the decedent was of sound and disposing mind at the time of his execution of the codicil, on October 20th, was given upon a consideration of conflicting evidence, and is, therefore, not open to review upon this appeal. Counsel for appellants state in their brief that the testimony of the witnesses for the respondents is, in substance and effect, "that Nelson had sufficient strength of mind and vigor of body to indicate his wishes to Goad at great length, and with absolute precision of detail; that those wishes were indicated without prompting or suggestion, and that he was the complete master of the situation." Any testimony to the contrary of this would only raise a conflict of evidence, upon which the verdict of the jury was conclusive.

2. Dr. Galvan was called as a witness for the contestants, and was asked certain questions tending to show that the testator had not the mental capacity to make a will. He testified that the information he had upon these matters was acquired by him from the decedent, and from observing him while he was in attendance upon him for the purpose of prescribing for him as his physician; and upon the objection of the proponents of the will that under the provisions of the fourth subdivision of section 1881, Code Civ. Proc., the witness was incompetent to give this testimony, his answers to the questions were excluded. Under the authority of In re Flint's Estate, 100 Cal. 391, 34 Pac. 863, and In re Redfield's Estate, 116 Cal. 637, 48 Pac. 794, this ruling was correct. The proponents afterwards called as a witness Mr. Goad, who had drawn the codicil of October 20th, and, against the objection of the contestants that he was incompetent, under section 1881, the court permitted him to testify concerning his interview and conversation with Nelson preparatory to drawing the codicil, and the instructions which he received from Nelson therefor. The appellants do not seriously contend that Goad was incompetent to give testimony respecting these matters, but they say that the ruling of the court upon the testimony of the two witnesses was contradictory and inconsistent; that, if the testimony of Goad was admissible, that of Galvan should also have been received. The grounds, however, upon which the court made its rulings in regard to the competency of the two witnesses are not the same, and the rules by which Galvan's testimony was excluded are inapplicable to the testimony of Goad. The communication, as well as the relation between the attorney and his client, ceases to be confidential when it is clearly manifest that it is the intention of the client that the communication should be disclosed if any occasion therefor should be presented. The consent of the client to such disclosure, which is provided for in section 1881, may be implied as well as express; and by requesting his attorney to draw his will the client impliedly asks him to do and say whatever may at any time and place be requisite for the purpose of establishing the integrity of the will. Goad had prepared the codicil under the directions of the testator, and by employing him as his attorney for this purpose the testator had waived the protection of the statute, and released the attorney from the obligation of secrecy as fully as when the attorney becomes a subscribing witness to the will. The client thereby makes the attorney the medium through whom the right which he seeks to create may be established. There was no such relation between Dr. Galvan and Nelson. The information which the doctor had acquired from Nelson was for the purpose of prescribing for him as his physician, and could be used by him for only that purpose. It had no connection with the preparation of the codicil, and Dr. Galvan was as much precluded from disclosing it upon the issues respecting the same as if he had known nothing about the codicil. The information which a physician acquires from his patient for the purpose of prescribing for him is given for the benefit of the patient alone, and not for the purpose of creating a right in others, nor does it carry with it any implied request to disclose the same in behalf of others in matters with which it is totally disconnected. The argument of the appellants that, inasmuch as Dr. Galvan prepared the will of October 17th under the direction of Nelson, his incompetency was thereby removed as fully as was that of Goad, loses its force in view of the fact that the jury found in favor of the contestants upon that instrument. Any error that may have been committed in reference to the issues thereon is not available to the appellants. Galvan had nothing to do with the preparation of the codicil, and the testimony sought from him was not rendered competent upon the issues upon the codicil by reason of his having prepared the original will. In all the matters relating to the codicil there was no relation between him and Nelson from which there could be implied any consent on the part of Nelson to his disclosing the information which he had acquired as his physician.

3. The contestants sought to show by Dr. Galvan that after the execution of the will on the 17th, and prior to the 20th, Jones and Smith, who are named as executors in the codicil, had sought to obtain from him the management of the estate. They also offered to show that after the execution of the codicil Jones had stated that the reason the codicil was made was that they wanted some one at Colusa, rather than at San Francisco, to handle the property. Upon the objection of the proponents that the matters thus sought were irrelevant and immaterial, the court excluded the answers. The appellants now urge that this testimony was relevant and material upon the issue of undue influence, inasmuch as the answers to these questions would show a motive and desire on the part of these persons to procure the execution of the codicil, in which two of them were named as executors, in order that they might obtain the control and management of the estate. The contestants did not, however, offer to show that either of these persons had any interview with Nelson, or ever spoke to him, or to any one for him, with reference to the codicil, or the disposition of his property; and, in the absence of all evidence of that nature, it could be only the merest conjecture that they had anything to do with the execution of the codicil, or attempted to influence Nelson in making the same, or in the disposition of his property.

4. In its instructions to the jury, after stating to them that the issues for their determination were whether Nelson was of sound and disposing mind at the time of the execution of the will and the codicil, the court further stated to them that every one has the right to dispose of his property according to his own desires, and that, if there is no defect of testamentary capacity, the law must give effect to his will, irrespective of its provisions, or of his reasons or motives for making such disposition; that the jury were not at liberty to consider the character of its provisions, but were solely to determine whether it was his will. It is contended by the appellant that these general statements respecting testamentary disposition, and instructing the jury that they are not at liberty to consider the provisions of the will, was an argumentative instruction by the court in support of the validity of the will. We do not so consider the instruction. It was very proper for the court to call the attention of the jury to the issues that they were called upon to decide, and to confine their deliberations to the evidence, which alone could be considered by them in giving their verdict. In these statements to the jury the court made no reference to the evidence that had been given upon the issue submitted to them, but limited its remarks to cautioning the jury against allowing their verdict to be influenced by matters which it was not proper for them to consider. Its subsequent statement to the effect that the will before them could not be considered, as matter of law, to be inequitable, was not inconsistent with these instructions. It merely emphasized the previous statement that it was not a matter to be considered by the jury. It may be added that the appellants took no exception to this part of the instruction.

5. One of the instructions given to the jury was as follows: "It is soundness or unsoundness of mind, and not any particular state of bodily health, that must control your judgment. A man may be in a state of extreme bodily or mental weakness and disease, and yet he may possess sufficient understanding to direct how his property should be disposed of. The soundness of mind required by law to enable a man to make a will is not necessarily that soundness which men in good health and vigor possess." Appellants contend that by this instruction the jury were, in effect, told that Nelson was competent to make a will, notwithstanding they should find that he was upon the very point of mental extinction or dissolution; and they base their argument upon the proposition that the word "extreme" is a word which is itself superlative in meaning, and implies a degree of the quality named which admits of nothing higher or greater. Whatever may have been the original use of the word, its distinctively superlative meaning was lost at a very early day, and throughout the various stages of English literature down to the present time has been employed as a word susceptible of different degrees, and which itself takes on a superlative form. The word "extremest" is used by Shakespeare many times in his plays, and is also found in the writings of such modern authors as Gladstone, Proctor, and Herbert Spencer. "Extreme" from the Latin "extremus," like its Saxon counterpart "utmost,"—"outermost,"—was originally an adjective of locality. It is only by a transferred and secondary application that it is used as the attribute of a quality or condition. Although, from its derivation, it indicates a superlative degree, in actual use it is often employed as the opposite of "moderate," and to indicate a very high degree, or as the equivalent of "excessive," or "very far advanced." We speak of extreme old age without meaning that the person cannot live any longer, and when we say that a person is in extreme peril, or necessity, or penury we do not mean that there is no higher degree of that condition, or that he is unable to endure any higher degree thereof. The "extreme cruelty" which authorizes a judgment of divorce is itself defined by the statute to mean only "grievous" bodily injury or mental suffering. Philology is at best an unsafe criterion for ascertaining the meaning of words which are in common use, and the definition thus obtained is always subordinate to the meaning derived from the context, or from the circumstances under which the word is used. We do not think that in the connection in which this word was used in the above instruction the jury could have understood that the court intended them to find that Nelson was capable of making a will, if it should appear to them that he was on the point of mental dissolution. They were told in the preceding sentence that his soundness or unsoundness of mind was the issue submitted to their judgment, and the sense in which these words were used in this instruction is given in the next clause of the very sentence in which they are found, wherein the extreme mental weakness here referred to is stated by the court to be that in which the man "may possess sufficient understanding to direct how his property should be disposed of."

6. The court gave the following instruction to the jury: "On the trial of the question as to whether a person was of sound mind at the time of the execution of his will, it is a presumption of law that the person was of sound mind at that time, and the legatees and devisees under the will are entitled to such presumption as a matter of evidence. The legal presumption is that every person is of sound mind until the contrary is proven by a preponderance of evidence, and he who alleges such unsoundness must prove it." The contestants excepted to this instruction, and in support of their exception have argued in their brief herein that, because the jury found that Nelson was incompetent at the making of the will of October 17th, the court was not authorized to instruct them that there was any presumption of his sanity. It must be borne in mind, however, that the instruction was given by the court before the jury had rendered their verdict, and at the time it was given the court could not know how they would regard the evidence. If it be conceded, as claimed by appellants, that the evidence in reference to his want of capacity on October 17th was without contradiction, it was still the duty of the court to submit the evidence to the jury for their verdict thereon. At the time the instruction was given, no fact had been established which would repel this presumption of sanity, and the instruction itself informed the jury that the presumption was only a matter of evidence, which would be overcome by a preponderance of evidence to the contrary. The instruction upon this point requested by the contestants, "If you find that the testator was on the 17th day of October, 1897, of unsound mind, the presumption is that he was of unsound mind on the 20th day of October, 1897," in effect was to tell the jury to disregard the evidence before them with reference to his capacity on the 20th, and was properly refused. The court had already instructed them that, if they found that he was not of sound mind at the time of making the will of October 17th, they might consider that fact in determining whether he was of sound mind at the time of making the codicil of October 20th; and thus gave to the contestants the right to have the weight of this presumption considered with other evidence. The court had also given to the jury the following instructions, to which no exception was taken: "The alleged will and codicil having been admitted to probate, the presumptions of law are that said will was legally executed, and that said Nelson was of sound and disposing mind at the respective dates of the execution of said will and codicil; and the defendants have the right to rely upon such presumptions of law until they have been overcome by evidence. The fact, however, that said alleged will and codicil have been admitted to probate, in no way deprives the petitioners here of their right to contest the validity of the will and codicil, and if, from the evidence, you are satisfied that his will was not executed in accordance with law, or that said Nelson was not at said times of sound and disposing mind, you will so find, notwithstanding the fact that said alleged will and codicil have heretofore been admitted to probate as the last will of said testator." There was nothing inconsistent in the finding by the jury that Nelson was competent at the time of making the codicil and incompetent on the 17th of October. There was evidence before them from which they could have found that his condition on the 17th was only temporary.

7. While the instruction that "the testimony of a witness who has solemnly subscribed to a will as an attesting witness, and afterwards endeavors to overthrow it, should be closely scrutinized," is open to objection, it is not sufficient, under the circumstances of the present case, to justify a reversal of the order. The court did not designate any witness, or point out any particular testimony, to which this instruction was directed, and it avoided giving any expression of opinion upon the weight to which such testimony was entitled, or the credit to be given to any of the witnesses. It merely stated a well-recognized rule to be observed by the jury in the consideration of such testimony, and, as was said in reference to a similar instruction in People v. Newcomer, 118 Cal. 263, 50 Pac. 405: "It could not possibly have done any harm, for it was merely telling the jury to do certain things which jurors would evidently do without being so told."

8. There was no evidence before the jury which would have justified the court in submitting to them an issue upon the question of undue influence, and the court very properly declined to submit this issue to them. The only evidence that is claimed by the appellants to authorize the submission of this issue is that which tended to establish the mental and physical infirmity of Nelson, and that those who were benefited by the codicil were the only persons who had access to him, and that Mr. Goad, before drawing the codicil, had made inquiries of him as to his desires in reference to the appointment of executors. It was not shown that either of the beneficiaries spoke to Nelson upon the subject of his will, or that Mr. Goad made any suggestion to him as to the disposition of his property, or as to the persons who should be appointed as his executors. "The presumption of undue influence is not raised by proof of interest and opportunity alone. In order to set aside a will for undue influence, there must be substantial proof of a pressure which overpowered the volition of the testator at the time the will was made." In re Langford's Estate, 108 Cal. 608, 41 Pac. 701. "In order to establish that a will has been executed under undue influence, it is necessary to show, not only that such undue influence has been exercised, but also that it has produced an effect upon the mind of the testator by which the will which he executes is not the expression of his own desires." In re Calkins' Estate, 112 Cal. 296, 44 Pac. 577. Weakness of mind may afford an opportunity for the exercise of undue influence, and, when it appears that such influence has been exerted upon testator, may be evidence tending to show that it affected his acts. But unless there is some evidence of an actual attempt to exercise some undue influence upon him, the proof of his mental weakness is insufficient to establish more than a conjecture that the will is a result of undue influence. "Circumstantial evidence must do more than raise a suspicion. It must amount to proof, and such evidence has the force of proof only when circumstances are proven which are inconsistent with the claim that the will was the spontaneous act of the alleged testator." In re McDewitt's Estate, 95 Cal. 17, 30 Pac. 101. "In order to justify the submission of any question of fact to a jury, the proof must be sufficient to raise more than a mere conjecture or surmise that the fact is as alleged." Janin v. Bank, 92 Cal. 14, 27 Pac. 1100, 14 L. R. A. 320.

The appeal from the order denying the revocation of the probate was taken more than 60 days after its entry, and must, therefore, be dismissed. The order denying a new trial is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. MULLENDER. (L. A. 769.)¹

STATUTES—TITLE OF ACT—SUBJECTS INCLUDED THEREIN—GENERAL LAWS—HARBOR COMMISSIONERS—ACTION BY—JOINER.

1. St. 1889, p. 305, is entitled "An act to add thirty-four sections to the Political Code," all of which relate to the establishment of a board of state harbor commissioners for the Bay of San Diego, to be known as sections 2575-2608. Sections 2578, 2579, provide that such board shall have possession and control of San Diego Bay and the improvements, easements, etc., appurtenant thereto, and that they may institute actions in the name of the people for the possession of any portion of such premises, or for the collection of any money due or that may become due. Held, that such sections were not in conflict with Const. art. 4, § 24, requiring every act to embrace but one subject, which shall be expressed in its title.

2. St. 1889, p. 305, creating a board of state harbor commissioners for the Bay of San Diego, is not in violation of Const. art. 4, § 25, par. 28, prohibiting special laws in relation to offices and officers in cities, counties, townships, and election or school districts.

3. St. 1889, p. 305, creating a board of state harbor commissioners for the Bay of San Diego, is not in violation of Const. art. 4, § 25, par. 33, prohibiting any special laws where general laws can be made applicable, as the legislature is the judge of such applicability.

4. Under St. 1889, p. 305, § 2578, authorizing the board of harbor commissioners of San Diego Bay to bring action for the possession of property appurtenant thereto, and for the collection of any money due by virtue of such act, such board may join an action for the possession of such property and for damages for the wrongful withholding thereof.

Ejectment by the people, by N. H. Conklin and others, as the board of state harbor commissioners for the Bay of San Diego, against Joseph Mullender. From a judgment awarding possession of property to plaintiffs, but denying damages, plaintiffs and defendant both appeal. Modified and affirmed.

Atty. Gen. Ford and Geo. H. Neale, for the People. Oscar A. Trippet, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Ejectment to recover possession of certain lands alleged to be tide lands of the Bay of San Diego, and for damages for withholding possession thereof. The defendant demurred to the complaint, and the demurrer was overruled. Defendant failed to answer, and judgment was entered for plaintiffs for possession of the land, and from that judgment the defendant appeals.

In addition to the demurrer, the defendant moved to strike out paragraph 4 of the complaint on the ground that it was irrelevant, and that motion was granted, and from that action of the court the plaintiffs appeal, and by stipulation both appeals are brought up in the same transcript, and are submitted together. Plaintiffs' appeal involves the question of the right to recover damages for withholding possession of the demanded premises. Defendant's appeal presents the more important question, and will be first considered. Defendant's demurrer is based upon the alleged unconstitutionality of an act approved March 18, 1889 (St. 1889, p. 305), creating the board of state harbor commissioners for the Bay of San Diego.

1. It is contended that said act violates section 24, art. 4, of the constitution, which provides: "Every act shall embrace but one subject, which subject shall be expressed in its title. But if any subject shall be embraced in an act which shall not be expressed in its title, such act shall be void only as to so much thereof as shall not be expressed in its title." The title of the act is as follows: "An act to add thirty-four sections to an act of legislature of the state of California to establish a Political Code, approved March 12, 1872, said sections to be known, numbered and designated as sections 2575, 2576 [enumerating all the sections consecutively to and including section 2608], all relating to the establishment of a board of state harbor commissioners for the Bay of San Diego." The constitutional provision above quoted is not peculiar to this state. In substantially the same form it exists in many states. It was incorporated in the constitution of 1849, but at an early day it was held to be merely directory. Washington v. Page, 4 Cal. 388. Our present constitution provides: "The provisions of this constitution are mandatory and prohibitory, unless by express words they are declared to be otherwise." Article 1, § 22. But, regarding, as we must, the mandatory character of the requirement that "every act shall embrace but one subject, which subject shall be expressed in its title," the question whether any particular enactment violates this provision is one of construction. Judge Cooley, in his work on Constitutional Limitations (4th Ed.; p. 178), speaking of this provision in constitutions, said: "There has been a general disposition to construe the constitutional provision liberally, rather than to embarrass legislation by a construction whose strictness is unnecessary to the accomplishment of the beneficial purposes for which it has been adopted." To this proposition the learned author cites a very large number of cases from many different states. In Ex parte Liddell, 93 Cal. 638, 29 Pac. 251, it is said: "It is admitted that the constitutional provision under consideration has always been given a liberal construction; and this must be so, because the constitution itself does not define the degree of particularity with which a title shall specify the subject of a bill. The matter must, therefore, be left largely to legislative discretion." In the opinion in that case Mr. Justice Paterson traced the history of the part which titles of acts have played in legislation, and that history need not again be rehearsed; but we call attention to the several cases there cited illustrating the sufficiency of titles of acts under constitutional provisions of the character here in question. In People v. Parks, 58 Cal. 624, 636, it is said: "Provisions of an act may be numerous; but, however, if they can be, by fair intendment, considered as falling within the subject-matter of legislation, or necessary as means to the attainment of the subject, the act will not conflict with the constitution. But if the act shall be found to be made of incongruous parts, or to comprehend unconnected and dissimilar subjects to that expressed in its title, it cannot be upheld." It is not necessary to examine the provisions of said act in detail, and pass upon the constitutionality of each. We are here concerned only with the validity of the board of harbor commissioners created by and under the provisions of said act, and of its authority to bring and maintain the present action. Section 2579 of said act provides, among other things, that "the commissioners shall have possession and control of the entire Bay of San Diego, together with the improvements, rights, privileges, easements and appurtenances connected therewith, or in anywise appertaining thereto, for the purposes in this article provided"; and section 2578 provides: "The commissioners may institute and prosecute to final judgment actions in the name of the people of the state of California, for the possession of any portion of the premises described in this article, or for the collection of any money due or that may become due the state by authority of this article." These provisions of the act would seem, upon their face, to authorize the present action, and they are clearly within the title of the act.

2. It is contended, however, that said act violates section 25, art. 4, of the constitution, which prohibits the enactment of local or special laws in the cases there specified. Appellant specially refers to paragraphs 28 and 33 of said section. The twenty-eighth has no application. It relates to offices and officers in cities, counties, cities and counties, townships, election or school districts. The thirty-third paragraph prohibits local or special laws "in all other cases where a general law can be made applicable." That the act here in question is both local and special is conceded. But that is not conclusive. The language of said paragraph plainly implies that there are or may be cases where a local or special act may be wise, salutary, and appropriate, and in no wise promotive of those evils which result from a general and indiscriminate resort to local and special legislation. The constitution submits the question whether a general law can be made applicable in any given case to the judgment of the legislature to be determined in the light of the evils intended to be avoided, and with its determination upon that question we may not interfere unless the disregard of the constitutional requirement is clear and palpable. In Indiana it is held that the legislature is the exclusive judge whether a general law can be made applicable. State v. Tucker, 46 Ind. 358, and cases there cited. In Iowa it is held that, where a local or special law is not within the evil which the constitution sought to provide against, or where the enactment of a general law would not afford any remedy for or relief from that evil, such local or special law is valid. State v. Squires, 26 Iowa, 340, 345. In discussing a similar provision of the constitution of Kansas, the supreme court of that state said: "It is not the purpose of the constitution to compel the legislature to accomplish an act of local or special legislation beneficial to one person or locality only through a general law, which might, in their opinion, result in damage when applied to other persons or localities. * * * The legislature must necessarily determine whether their purpose can or cannot be expediently accomplished by a general law. Their discretion and sense of duty are the chief, if not the only, securities of the public for an intelligent compliance with that provision of the constitution. Whether we could, in any conceivable case presenting a flagrant abuse of that discretion, hold a private law invalid as contrary to that provision of the constitution, we need not here decide, but we would certainly not hold such a law invalid merely because it would, in our opinion, have been possible to frame a general law under which the same purpose could have been accomplished." State v. Hitchcock, 1 Kan.

178, 185. See, also, Farrelly v. Cole, 60 Kan. 375, 56 Pac. 492, 44 L. R. A. 464. The act in question, if made general, could only apply to the harbors within the state. These are of different size and importance, and we may well assume that the legislature determined that laws suitable and adapted to one would not be suitable or adapted to the others, or to any of the others. There would seem to be the same necessity for diversity of laws and regulations for the different harbors that exists in the case of cities and counties; but the constitution has not directed the classification of harbors, nor would their classification at all simplify or diminish the legislation required. We do not think the act in question is within the evils sought to be remedied by said provision of the constitution, nor that the legislature, in adopting it, abused its discretion, or violated any provision of the constitution.

3. It is not required that the complaint shall specify the use to which the commissioners propose to put the premises when recovered. If the defendant has no right to the possession of the property or its control, the use to which plaintiffs may put it does not concern him.

Plaintiffs' Appeal.

Upon defendant's motion the court struck out paragraph 4 of the plaintiffs' complaint, which alleged that the value of the rents and profits of the demanded premises during the time the possession was wrongfully withheld from the plaintiffs was $600, and sought to recover that sum as damages. In this, we think, the court erred. The argument of defendant is that the act does not authorize the board to bring suit in the name of the people for damages, that it only gives the right of action for possession, that damages are not mentioned, and that the courts cannot extend the powers of the board. The statute does not prescribe the form of the action to be brought. It provides that the commissioners, in the name of the people, may institute and prosecute "actions" for the possession, etc. The actions here referred to are the usual and appropriate actions for the recovery of the possession of real estate. No new action or new form of action is prescribed, nor is there any exemption from liability on the part of the defendant for damages, or rents and profits, such as are incident to the action of ejectment when resorted to for the enforcement of a private right to the possession of land. The general law attaches liability for damages to the wrongful possession of the land of another; and the defendant, if he would escape liability for such damages when they have been suffered, must affirmatively show an exemption therefrom. Plaintiffs' appeal is from that portion of the judgment which ordered "that plaintiffs recover nothing from defendant as damages for withholding the possession of the premises and the loss of the value of the rents and profits thereof." The action of the court complained of by the plaintiffs appears by bill of exceptions, but it does not show that the value of the rents and profits was in any manner ascertained by the court. It is, therefore, ordered that the order of the court below striking out the fourth paragraph of plaintiffs' complaint be vacated, and that so much of the judgment herein as denies the right of the plaintiffs to recover damages be reversed, and that upon due notice to the defendant plaintiffs' damages for the withholding of the possession of the demanded premises be assessed, and that plaintiffs have judgment therefor.

DIVORCE—JUDGMENT—COMMUNITY PROPERTY—SALE—ALIMONY—APPEAL—DEATH OF PARTY—CONVEYANCE BY WIFE.

1. Where, pending an appeal from a judgment for a wife in divorce proceedings, involving community property rights, the wife conveys the property secured to her by the trial court's judgment, and dies before the affirmation thereof by the supreme court, the interests of the wife pass to the grantees under her deed.

2. Where a wife dies pending an appeal from a judgment of divorce in her favor, together with an adjudication as to certain rights to community property, and the supreme court affirms the trial court's judgment, such decision will govern in a subsequent action brought by the husband to recover such community property on the ground that the action abated on the death of the wife.

3. Where no appeal was taken from an order for an execution sale of community property to satisfy costs and alimony on judgment of divorce in favor of a wife, the purchaser of such property acquired a good title thereto, though an appeal was taken from the judgment and the wife died before the supreme court's affirmation thereof.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county; Joseph H. Budd, Judge.

Action by Thomas R. Smith against E. F. Smith and others to determine conflicting claims to real property. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Elliott & Elliott, for appellants. J. G. Swinnerton, for respondent.

VAN DYKE, J. September 2, 1897, in a certain action then pending in the superior court of San Joaquin county, wherein Mary E. Smith was plaintiff, and the respondent herein, Thomas R. Smith, was defendant, it was ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the bonds of matrimony then existing between said parties be dissolved, and by said decree the said plaintiff therein, Mary E. Smith, was assigned an undivided two-thirds of the community property of the parties to said action, which property was the same as that set forth in the complaint herein, and was at that time the homestead of the parties to said action. Thereafter the defendant in said action, the respondent in this, appealed from said judgment, and after said appeal was perfected, to wit, on the 30th day of September, 1897, said superior court gave and made an order that the defendant in said action pay to said Mary E. Smith, the plaintiff therein, the sum of $750 costs and alimony, and that execution for said sum be issued if the same was not paid. Execution was thereupon issued and levied upon the property in question, and the same thereafter was sold to the defendant herein L. W. Elliott, and, the same not having been redeemed, a sheriff's deed afterwards was executed and delivered to him for the interest of said defendant in said action, respondent in this, to the premises in question. Pending the appeal in this court, in the month of January, 1898, the respondent in said divorce suit, Mary E. Smith, died, and such proceedings were had therein in this court that the defendants herein E. F. and Estrella Smith were substituted in her place upon said appeal. Respondent herein commenced this action May 23, 1898, and in his complaint alleges that he "now is, and at all times since the 1st day of February, 1898," has been, the owner and in possession of the premises in question, and that defendants claim to own or have some interest in said property; in other words, an action to determine conflicting claims to real property, under section 738, Code Civ. Proc. Defendants answered denying title in plaintiff, and admitting that they claim an interest in the property in question, setting forth the divorce proceedings and the judgment therein rendered, the execution sale upon the order entered after judgment therein, and alleging that on the 4th day of December, 1897, the said Mary E. Smith, in whose favor judgment had been entered in said divorce proceedings, executed and delivered to the defendants Estrella and E. F. Smith a conveyance in fee of and to all her title in said property.

The theory of the plaintiff in bringing this action, and of the court below in the trial thereof, seems to be that, upon the death of Mary E. Smith pending the appeal from the judgment in her favor in the divorce suit, the action abated, and that the homestead survived to her husband, the plaintiff and respondent herein. After the judgment in the present action was entered in the court below, the decision was rendered by this court in the divorce suit of Smith v. Smith, 124 Cal. 651, 57 Pac. 573. It is said in the opinion: "Plaintiff having died pending the appeal, her heirs at law have been substituted as parties plaintiff, and the litigation continued, certain property rights being involved;" and it is held that: "Upon this cause of action, and upon the findings and judgment made and entered therein, the court had the power to deal with the property as was done. The property here in, volved is a homestead created upon the community property. By virtue of subdivision 1, § 147, pt. 3, Civ. Code, the trial court may divide the community homestead between the parties. Its discretion in such matter is of the widest, and there is no ground in this case upon which to disturb that discretion,"—and the judgment was affirmed. On the trial of this case the deed executed by Mrs. Smith to the defendants Estrella and E. F. Smith, which was admitted in evidence, was subsequently, on motion of plaintiff, stricken out. This was error. The decision of this court on that appeal governs this case. As to property rights the action survived, and the affirmance of the judgment in Smith v. Smith relates back to the date of the entry of that judgment in the court below, and the interest of the plaintiff Mrs. Smith in the property in question passed by her deed to the said defendants. That disposes of the two-thirds interest of the property in question in favor of said appellants Estrella and E. F. Smith. The other third claimed by appellant Elliott was acquired under an execution sale upon the order made after the judgment in the divorce suit, and, as there was no appeal taken from that order, the sale thereunder cannot be disturbed. Judgment and order denying new trial are reversed.

DEVLIN v. RYDBERG et al. (S. F. 2,662.)
(Supreme Court of California. March 25, 1901.)
INJUNCTIONS—DISSOLUTION—ORDER—AP-PEAL AND ERROR.

The court signed an instrument adjudging that an injunction restraining defendant was no longer in force. This was not filed with the clerk or entered in the minutes of the court, but a certified copy thereof was filed by plaintiff's attorney, and defendant appealed. Held, that the appeal should be dismissed, since the instrument was not an "order" dissolving the injunction, from which an appeal lies under Code Civ. Proc. § 939, an order being defined by Code Civ. Proc. § 1003, as a "direction" of a court made and entered in writing.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

Action by A. J. Rydberg and others against F. J. Devlin. From an order decreeing that an injunction restraining defendant from certain acts was no longer in force, defendant appeals. Dismissed.

Kierce & Gillogley, for appellant. H. A. Massey, for respondents.

HARRISON, J. Motion to dismiss the appeal. The superior court granted an injunction in the above-entitled cause January 8, 1900, restraining the defendant from doing certain acts therein specified, and on January 12, 1901, the Honorable F. J. Murasky, judge of said court, signed a written instrument, wherein, after reciting the granting of the injunction, and that more than 12 months had elapsed since it was granted, and that the action had never been set for trial or tried, and that the defendant had not consented to the continuance of said injunction, it was "ordered, adjudged, and decreed that said injunction is no longer in force." This instrument was not filed with the clerk, or entered in the minutes of the court, but on January 25th the plaintiff's attorney filed a certified copy thereof in the clerk's office, and on February 5th, at his request, it was copied by the clerk into the minutes of the court. February 6th the defendant gave notice of an appeal from this order. The plaintiff now moves to dismiss the appeal upon the ground that the entry by the clerk upon the minutes of the court of a certified copy of an order is not an order of the court, and the further ground that an order declaring that an injunction is no longer in force is not an appealable order.

Section 1003, Code Civ. Proc., defines an order to be a "direction" of a court or judge, made or entered in writing, and not included in a judgment; and section 939 provides that an appeal may be taken from an order "granting or dissolving an injunction." The order appealed from is not a "direction" of the court, nor does it purport to dissolve the injunction previously granted, or by its terms have any effect upon that injunction. It is a mere declaration by the judge that the injunction is no longer in force. That it was not the intention of the judge that it should be considered as an order of the court may be inferred from the fact that he did not cause it to be entered upon its minutes or filed with the clerk. It also appears upon the face of the writing that he erased from the form presented for his signature the words, "and the same is hereby vacated and dissolved"; and it is clear from this fact that he did not intend that the injunction previously granted should be dissolved by reason of this order. No authority has been cited in support of the authority of the clerk to enter upon the minutes of the court a certified copy of an instrument without any direction of the court therefor.

Section 527, Code Civ. Proc., as amended in 1895, provides: "No injunction granted prior to the actual trial of the cause wherein it is granted, shall continue in force for a longer period than twelve months from the time such injunction was granted, except by consent of the parties, or unless the cause be set for trial upon its merits." Whether, upon establishing these facts, the defendant in the injunction suit may show in excuse of his conduct that the injunction has ceased to be operative, although it has not been formally dissolved, or whether these facts authorized the court to dissolve the injunction, is not involved upon this motion. The court did not make any order dissolving the injunction, and, as it is only from such an order that an appeal can be taken, the motion must be granted. The appeal is dismissed.

I concur: VAN DYKE, J.

GAROUTTE, J. I concur in the judgment upon the ground that an appeal cannot be taken from the entry of a certified copy of an order.

BLEDSON et al. v. DECKROW et al. (L. A. 745.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 22, 1901.)

WATERS AND WATER COURSES—NEW TRIAL—CONDITIONAL ORDER—RIGHT TO OBJECT
—INVALIDITY OF CONDITION.

1. Where a new trial is granted on the ground that the evidence is insufficient to support a finding that certain defendants are entitled to a certain amount of water, the order will not be disturbed on appeal, though the evidence would have been sufficient to sustain a judgment on the findings, since the granting of a new trial lies in the sound discretion of the trial court.

2. An order granting a new trial is not rendered void by the addition of an invalid condition authorizing its denial on the performance thereof.

3. Where a condition is attached to an order granting a new trial, providing that it will be denied on the performance of the condition by defendants, but they make no attempt to perform such condition, they cannot insist that the order granting the new trial is invalid by reason of the illegality of the condition.

4. A new trial of a suit to determine certain water rights was granted on the ground that the evidence was insufficient to show that certain defendants were entitled, as prior appropriators, to the amount of water as provided in the finding; but it was provided that if certain defendants would consent to take a certain amount of water delivered to them in lieu of their rights of appropriation, or if other defendants would consent to take all the water for certain days except enough to supply the defendants mentioned, in lieu of their right of appropriation, the new trial would be denied. Held, that the condition was invalid, since the court had no right to allow plaintiffs to give the defendants a less amount of water than that to which the evidence showed that they were entitled.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; J. L. Campbell, Judge.

Action by J. B. Bledson and others against George W. Deckrow and others to determine disputed water rights. From a judgment in favor of the plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Rolfe & Rolfe and John Brown, Jr., for appellants. James Hutchings and Bledson & Bledson, for respondents.

COOPER, C. This action was brought by plaintiffs for the purpose of having it adjudged that they are the owners of the right to take and divert, at the point described in the complaint, the waters of the Mojave river to the extent of 600 inches, measured under a 4-inch pressure, and that defendants have no right, title, or interest to said 600 inches. The defendants, by their different answers, claimed by prior appropriation certain portions of the waters of said river. The court filed findings of fact, upon which judgment was entered for plaintiffs for the amount of water claimed, with certain exceptions and reservations. It was found that defendants Julius E. Meyer, Jr., Henry Meyer, Charles Meyer, and Julius Meyer, Sr., are the owners, as against the plaintiffs, of the right to 175 inches of the waters of said river to be taken at the point designated in their answer. This finding is not attacked, and there is no appeal by plaintiffs as to said defendants Meyer, and no appeal by them. The court found that defendants Davidson, Bemis, and Lane have a prior and superior right to divert, at the intake of their ditch where it is now situated, 230 inches, measured under a 4-inch pressure; that defendants Deckrow and Van Horn have a prior right to divert from said river, at the intake of their ditch where it is now situated, 400 inches, measured under a 4-inch pressure. The plaintiffs made a motion for a new trial, as to said defendants Davidson, Bemis, Lane, Deckrow, and Van Horn, upon the ground, among others, of insufficiency of the evidence to justify the decision. The motion was granted, and this appeal is from the said order.

The rule is well settled that a motion for a new trial, on the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict or other decision, is addressed to the sound legal discretion of the court, and that an order granting a new trial on this ground will not be reversed on appeal, unless it appears that there was a manifest abuse of such discretion. Bjorman v. Redwood Co., 92 Cal. 501, 28 Pac. 591, and cases cited. We cannot say there was such abuse of discretion in this case. The case was one of great importance. The credibility of the witnesses, the expert testimony applied to the locality, the surroundings, and local influences were all matters upon which the judge of the court below was much more competent to pass than we could be from a mere examination of the record. The court found that defendants Deckrow and Van Horn and their grantors, in the year 1879, by a ditch known as the "Deckrow and Snodderly Ditch No. 5," converted and conveyed, and have since continuously, to the winter months of 1884, converted and conveyed, from said river, by means of said ditch, 400 inches of water, measured under a 4-inch pressure. There is evidence tending to support this finding, and we would, perhaps, have to hold, in case of an appeal here on the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to support the finding, that there is sufficient evidence to support it. But the question here is whether the evidence was such that the court below, exercising its sound discretion, was justified in setting aside the finding. The witness Clark testified that he knew the ditch, and further said: "I suppose it was two foot on the bottom, and may be three feet on top and a foot and a half deep, and, from my knowledge of the ditch and water measurements, I should say the ditch would carry 100 inches." The witness Bledsoe, speaking of this ditch, said: "The ditch was probably two feet wide on the bottom and two and a half on top, and possibly a foot deep, but my recollection of it is that when I saw it there wasn't over a foot of water in it." The witness Finkle, a civil engineer, testified that he made an accurate measurement of the size and grade of the ditch, and that the capacity of the ditch is only 85 inches. He also testified that a ditch of a larger size, as described by some of the witnesses, would only carry 173 inches. The court found that Davidson, Bemis, and Lane have a prior right to divert, at the intake of their ditch, 230 inches measured under a 4-inch pressure, through what is known as the "Pioneer Ditch"; that they and their predecessors in interest appropriated said 230 inches in the year 1879, and have ever since continuously used and appropriated the said amount for irrigating purposes during the irrigating season of each year. The defendant Bemis testified that the first year he ever irrigated on his place was in 1885; that he never claimed any water of his own until 1889; that they changed the place of diversion of the water from where it was taken out by the Pioneer ditch, in 1889, to about a mile and a half or two miles below; that this change was made in 1890; that the ditch was made smaller, and the water put into the "Hill Ditch." Defendant Lane testified that the first irrigation that was done on his place was in 1885; that he used the water out of the old Pioneer ditch from 1885 to 1889, but never claimed the right to it; that from 1874 to 1885 he was not engaged in farming.

It would serve no useful purpose to give the evidence more in detail. It is sufficient to say that the evidence was such that the court might well grant a new trial because of its insufficiency to support the findings. If the new trial was properly granted for any reason, the order will be affirmed here. In the order the court inserted certain conditions, and provided that, in case defendants complied with the conditions named in the order, the motion would be denied. It is claimed that the court had no right to insert the conditions, that they were not justified in law, and that the order for this reason was void. To this view we cannot accede. The plaintiffs made the motion for a new trial upon the reasons therein stated, and, if the motion was granted for any valid reason, it would not become void because certain conditions not warranted in law were stated as terms upon which defendants could avoid the order. The appellants made no attempt to comply with the conditions, and hence are not in a position to claim the order was void on account of such conditions. But, as the case will have to be retried, it may be well to express our views as to the conditional order. The order provided that, if defendants Deckrow and Van Horn would stipulate or consent that plaintiffs take judgment, they are entitled to the prior right to perpetually divert from the river at any point above plaintiffs' land the full flow thereof to the extent of 1,150 inches, provided they perpetually deliver to said defendants Deckrow and Van Horn, free of charge to them, the full amount of 90 inches of water at a certain point where there is now a measuring box on said Deckrow and Snodderly ditch, but that plaintiffs shall have 18 months after the entry of such judgment in which to construct conduits through which to deliver said 90 inches of water; that, in case defendants should so consent to take said 90 inches instead of 400 inches, then, and in that case, the new trial would be denied.

As against the defendants Davidson, Lane, and Bemis, the order provided that, in place of the 230 inches continuous flow given them by the judgment, they might stipulate to take 1,150 inches for the first 3 days of every 15 days, commencing March 1, 1899, provided they at all times should allow to flow down the river sufficient water to enable plaintiffs to deliver 90 inches at the measuring box of defendants Deckrow and Van Horn. If the stipulation should be made as above set forth, then the order would be made denying a new trial as to Deckrow and Van Horn. We do not think the court had the right to have plaintiffs give defendants, or either of them, less water than the evidence shows they are entitled to. The court may have been correctly of the opinion that in taking the water from the river, and conducting it through open ditches, a large part of it was wasted by evaporation or percolation through the lands over which the ditches run, and that 90 inches furnished Deckrow and Van Horn would be fully as much as would ultimately reach their lands through the ditch. It may have correctly concluded that defendants Davidson, Bemis, and Lane would be benefited more by using 1,150 inches the first 3 days in every 15 than by a continuous use of 230 inches. But it is not for the court to prescribe such conditions. The findings should state correctly the rights of defendants, and, if they are the owners of part of the waters of the Mojave river by prior appropriation, the finding should show the correct number of inches so appropriated. The rights of the parties, as against each other, should be definitely settled. In a partition suit the court might be convinced that it would be best for one of the parties to give him a definite rental either in money or part of the crops, but the court could not do this in lieu of the rights of the party to his land. In this case, if the defendants waste water in conducting it through their ditches, it may be that, by pipes or otherwise, they can hereafter save it, and thus have the full benefit of all they own. The appropriation must be for some useful or beneficial purpose. It may be conducted through ditches, flumes, or pipes. It may even be turned into the channel of another stream, mingled with its waters, and then reclaimed, so long as the amount of water appropriated by another is not diminished. If defendants have appropriated more water than they use for beneficial purposes, or if they willfully waste it, the court has power to give proper relief, but to allow the plaintiffs to give to defendants a certain number of inches in lieu of the amount they have the right to as prior appropriators would be to introduce a new rule as to water rights in this state. The specifications as to the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the findings resulted in getting all the evidence in the record. Counsel for appellant in their brief say: "They also specify that the evidence was insufficient to justify the finding of fact as to the appropriation of water by the defendants in 1879, and the quantity and continuance thereof, and the location of ditches, and the intake thereof." The specification seems to have informed defendants' attorneys as to the respects wherein the evidence was alleged to be insufficient. We advise that the order be affirmed.

PEOPLE ex rel. FOGG v. PERRIS IRR. DIST. (HUTCHINGS et al., Interveners. L. A. 743).¹

IRRIGATION—FORM OF DISTRICT—ORGANIZATION—PROCEEDINGS TO DETERMINE VALIDITY—CONCLUSIVENESS—COLLATERAL ATTACK—QUO WARRANTO.

1. Code Civ. Proc. § 387, provides that any person who has an interest in the matter in litigation may intervene at any time before trial, either by joining the plaintiff, and claiming what is sought by the complaint, or by uniting with defendant in resisting the claims of the plaintiff, and the intervention shall be made by complaint, setting forth the grounds on which it rests. Held that, where the court granted parties leave to intervene to resist plaintiff's claim, an appeal by them will not be dismissed because the judgment was against the defendant, and not against the interveners, since the leave to intervene entitled the interveners to any remedy available to the defendant.

2. Act March 16, 1889 (St. 1889, p. 212), provides that proceedings for the organization of an irrigation district may be examined and confirmed in the superior court. In quo warranto to forfeit defendant company's franchise, defendant introduced a certified copy of a judgment in the superior court of another county, in which all of the steps taken in the organization of the defendant company were declared legal and valid. Held, that the admission of evidence to impeach such judgment, as obtained by fraud, was erroneous, since, until set aside in a direct proceeding, the judgment was conclusive.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Riverside county; J. S. Noyes, Judge.

Quo warranto by the people, on the relation of one Fogg, against the Perris irrigation district, for a forfeiture of defendant's franchise, in which J. C. Hutchings and others intervened. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, interveners appeal. Reversed.

C. C. Wright, L. L. Boone, Wm. E. Cox, and Oscar A. Trippet, for appellants. Atty. Gen. Ford, Works & Lee, and John F. Crowe, for respondents.

HARRISON, J. The present action was brought against the defendant by the attorney general, under section 803, Code Civ. Proc., charging it with the usurpation and unlawful exercise of the powers of a legally organized irrigation district, and asking a judgment declaring that the proceedings under which it claimed to have been organized were illegal and void, and that its powers and franchise be forfeited. An answer denying the allegations of the complaint was filed by the defendant, and thereafter, with the permission of the court, certain persons claiming an interest in the controversy, by reason of having become bona fide purchasers for value of certain bonds that had been issued by the defendant, filed complaints in intervention, wherein the allegations of the complaint were denied, and certain defenses to the action of the plaintiff were also set forth. The cause was tried by the court, and upon its findings of fact judgment was rendered in accordance with the prayer of the complaint. A motion for a new trial was made on behalf of the interveners, and denied by the court. From this order, and also from the judgment, the interveners have appealed. No motion for a new trial or appeal was made or taken by the defendant.

1. The motion of the respondent to dismiss the appeal upon the ground that there is no judgment against the appellants, and that the district has taken no appeal, must be overruled. In the order of the superior court granting leave to intervene, it was determined that the interveners had an interest in the matter in litigation, and in the success of the defendant and against the plaintiffs; and under section 387, Code Civ. Proc., after the intervention had taken place they became parties to the action, "uniting with the defendant in resisting the claims of the plaintiff," and as such parties they are entitled to avail themselves of all the procedure and remedies to which the defendant would be entitled for the purpose of defeating the action or resisting the claim of the plaintiff. The defendant cannot by its inaction deprive them of the right to review the action of the superior court in rendering judgment against their claim or against the defendant. Upon the same principles the claim of the interveners that, as the plaintiff did not answer their complaints in intervention, the facts therein alleged are to be deemed admitted, must be overruled. Although their pleadings are termed "complaints," they are in effect answers to the complaint of the plaintiff. They were permitted to intervene upon the claim that they had an interest in the success of the defendants and against the plaintiffs, and, in addition to their denials of the allegations in the complaint, their pleadings contain only new matter in defense of the defendants' right, which, under section 462, Code Civ. Proc., is "deemed controverted" by the plaintiff.

2. The plaintiff offered certain evidence tending to show that the defendant had not been legally organized as an irrigation district, and rested. The interveners then offered a certified copy of certain proceedings in the superior court of San Diego county, taken by virtue of the provisions of the act of March 16, 1889 (St. 1889, p. 212), for the examination and approval of the proceedings for the organization of the district, wherein that court made and entered its judgment December 13, 1890, that all the proceedings had and taken for the organization of the district were confirmed and declared legal and valid. They also introduced another decree of confirmation under the act aforesaid, wherein the same court on December 8, 1892, ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the said district had been duly organized. The plaintiff, against the objection of the interveners, was permitted to introduce evidence tending to show that the notice for the hearing upon the first petition for confirmation had not been given as prescribed by the aforesaid act, and also introduced testimony to the effect that, upon the application for the second decree of confirmation, an attorney who had been employed to defend certain owners of property within the district at the hearing upon this application had been paid $100 by the president of the board of directors to be absent from the court room at said hearing, and that said attorney did not appear or in any way oppose the confirmation. In its findings of fact herein the court found that the notice for the hearing upon the application for confirmation in December, 1890, had been published for only one week, and that the judgment then given was without jurisdiction of the subject-matter or the parties, and was procured by fraud, and that the said proceedings were wholly void; that the judgment of December 8, 1892, was procured by the fraudulent bribery of the attorney for certain property owners in the district, and was therefore void and of no force and effect. The court also found that the original petition for the formation of the district was not signed by 50 or a majority of the freeholders within the district, and that no notice of the time or place for the presentation of any petition for the organization of the district was ever given. In People v. Linda Vista Irr. Dist., 128 Cal. 477, 61 Pac. 86, it was held that the proceeding under the aforesaid act of March 16, 1889, is a proceeding in rem, and that the decree of confirmation entered therein is binding and conclusive upon the state, as well as others, and is a bar to a subsequent proceeding in quo warranto, where the state seeks to assail the validity or regularity of the proceedings for the organization of the district. Upon the rule thus declared, the judgments of the superior court of San Diego county, offered in evidence by the interveners, were judicial determinations that all the steps necessary for the proper organization of the district had been taken, and were conclusive evidence of that fact, and constituted a bar to any further investigation of the validity or regularity of the proceedings. The plaintiff could not by a collateral attack impeach the validity or force of these judgments. Whether invoked in support of a cause of action or as a defense, so long as they remained in force upon the records of the court wherein they were given their validity and correctness could be questioned only in a direct proceeding therefor. Carpentier v. City of Oakland, 30 Cal. 439; Joyce v. McAvoy, 31 Cal. 273; Eitel v. Foote, 39 Cal. 439; Hodgdon v. Railroad Co., 75 Cal. 642, 17 Pac. 928. Certain authorities have been cited by the respondents in support of the action of the superior court, but in each of these cases the action was between the parties to the original judgment, and was brought for the express purpose of setting aside that judgment. The superior court, therefore, erred in admitting evidence for the purpose of impeaching these judgments, and in holding that it could enter upon an examination of the original proceedings for the organization of the district. The judgment and order denying a new trial are reversed.

OLIVER v. AGASSE. (Sac. 719.)

EASEMENTS—NATURE OF SERVITUDE—ALTERATION.

Where, at the time plaintiff's mining claim was patented, the land was subject to a right on the part of defendant to convey water in an open ditch across the lands, defendant was not entitled to place a pipe line in the ditch for the conveyance of the water, such change being a substantial alteration of the method of enjoyment.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Tuolumne county; G. W. Nicol, Judge.

Suit by John K. Oliver against Jules Agasse. From a decree in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

F. W. Street, for appellant. J. B. Curtin, for respondent.

VAN DYKE, J. This action was brought to have the defendant move off a pipe line which he had laid in an old ditch extending across the mining claim belonging to plaintiff. The Tuolumne County Water Company for many years past has been the owner of the water ditch crossing said plaintiff's mining claim, conveying water therein for sale for mining and irrigation purposes. Defendant is the owner of a tract of agricultural land adjoining said mining claim, and has been for many years purchasing water from the Tuolumne County Water Company, and during said time conveying the same from the ditch of the Tuolumne County Water Company across plaintiff's mining claim, by means of a ditch, to defendant's land and premises. On September 13, 1898, defendant entered upon plaintiff's mining claim, and laid a pipe line from the said company's ditch, along and in said defendant's ditch, across plaintiff's land to his (defendant's) land and premises. A patent to plaintiff's mining claim was issued by the United States July 1, 1898, which was subject to defendant's easement as provided by section 2340 of the Revised Statutes, as follows: "All patents granted or pre-emptions or homesteads allowed, shall be subject to any vested and accrued water rights, or rights to ditches and reservoirs used in connection with such water rights, as may have been acquired under or recognized by the preceding section." The court below gave judgment for the plaintiff, and the appeal is taken from said judgment, and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial.

In Allen v. Water Co., 92 Cal. 138, 28 Pac. 215, 15 L. R. A. 93, the question, as stated by the court in its opinion, was whether an easement to run water over plaintiff's land in an open ditch is satisfied by carrying the water in a closed pipe laid on the bottom of such ditch, and then covered, provided that the change in the easement would benefit the servient estate and convenience the dominant estate, and it is said: "After a careful examination of many authorities, we are led to conclude that the allegation of the answer 'that the alteration in the mode and manner of using the easement will be less burdensome to the servient estate and more convenient to the defendant' adds no strength to defendants' position, and that such fact is never a material element in a case where it is insisted that the alteration is so substantial as would result in the creation and substitution of a different servitude from that which previously existed." Again: "If the owner of the servient estate is not allowed to materially alter the character of the servitude, although such alteration would not result in damage to the dominant estate, but might be a benefit thereto, we see no reason why the same principle would not apply to the owner of the dominant estate in making material alterations in the character of his easement." Citing the section from the Civil Code bearing upon the question, this court continues: "And it appears to be settled doctrine that both parties have the right to insist that so long as the easement is enjoyed it shall remain substantially the same as it was at the time the right accrued, entirely regardless of the question as to the relative benefit and damage that would ensue to the parties by reason of a change in the mode and manner of its enjoyment;" and it was held that the substitution of a pipe line for an open ditch as a means of conveying water was a substantial alteration in the mode of enjoyment of the easement. This case was referred to in Joseph v. Ager, 108 Cal. 517, 41 Pac. 422, with approbation, and it is said: "The general law applicable to this case is, therefore, well settled. * * * Such an easement does not give its owner the right to commit a trespass upon the servient tenement, or to exercise the easement after any manner which happens to suit his pleasure.

His right is measured by the terms of his grant, or, where the supposed original grant does not appear, by the prescriptive use. This, however, includes what are called 'secondary easements,' such as the right to enter upon the servient tenement and make repairs, and to do such things as are necessary for the full exercise of the right. But these secondary easements must be exercised only when necessary, and in such a reasonable manner as not to needlessly increase the burden upon the servient tenement." But it is contended on the part of the appellant that the rule laid down in these cases does not apply to the present action, for the reason that "the appellant was the owner of this easement long prior to any right of respondent to the lands over which the easement exists; it was created and enjoyed while the lands of respondent were public lands, and when respondent's patent was issued it contained the usual reservation as to water rights"; and hence it is contended that the owner of the easement is not limited to the original mode of enjoying the same existing at the time of the patent. In Smith v. Hawkins, 110 Cal. 125, 42 Pac. 453, relied upon by appellant, it is said: "An appropriator of water under these circumstances, and while the land which he subjects to his necessary uses continued to be part of the public domain, is a licensee of the general government; but when such part of the public domain passes into private ownership it is burdened by the easement granted by the United States to the appropriator, who holds his right against this land under an express grant." The fee to the land in this case was conveyed by the United States to the plaintiff subject to this easement. But there can be no difference in this case from that of an easement acquired by grant of a private proprietor, wherein a conveyance of the fee by such proprietor is made subject to the burden of said easement. As every easement is a restriction upon the right of the property of the owner of the servient tenement, no alteration can be made in the mode of enjoyment by the owner of the dominant tenement, the effect of which will be to increase such restriction. The right must be limited by the amount of enjoyment proved to have been had. Water Co. v. Edwards, 121 Cal. 662, 54 Pac. 69; Gale & W. Easem. p. 237; Jones, Easem. § 888. In re DOW'S ESTATE. (S. F. 2,180.)

ADMINISTRATOR—RIGHT OF FORMER WIFE TO NAME—SECOND MARRIAGE.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1365, providing that the administration of an intestate's estate must be granted to some one or more of the persons mentioned therein, and giving the right to the surviving husband or wife, or some competent person whom he or she may request to have appointed, and section 1370, giving a married woman a right to be appointed, the widow of an intestate, who was married again before the letters of administration were issued, had the right to have the administrator appointed whom she named in a written request.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Mateo county; George A. Buck, Judge.

Petition by Maggie J. Sullivan for the appointment of an administrator of the estate of William Dow, deceased. From a decree appointing James Crow administrator, James J. Dow appeals. Affirmed.

O. C. Pratt, for appellant. Henry W. Walker, for respondent.

COOPER, C. Appeal from order appointing administrator. William Dow died intestate in San Mateo county in 1882, being a resident of said county at the time of his death, and leaving estate therein. He left surviving him his wife, Maggie J. Dow, and a son, James J. Dow. Before any steps were taken to administer upon the estate, the widow married one Sullivan. Petitions were filed for letters by the son, James J., and by James Crow,—the latter at the written request of said Maggie J. Sullivan. An order was made appointing Crow administrator, and denying the petition of Dow. The question is as to whether or not the surviving wife, after her marriage with Sullivan, had the right to have Crow appointed at her written request. It is provided in section 1365, Code Civ. Proc., that administration of the estate of a person dying intestate must be granted to some one or more of the persons mentioned therein, and that, of the persons mentioned, they are entitled in the following order: "(1) The surviving husband or wife, or some competent person whom he or she may request to have appointed." It has been held, under the above section, that the surviving wife, although incompetent to serve on account of nonresidence, is nevertheless entitled to nominate a suitable person for administrator. In re Cotter's Estate, 54 Cal. 215. It was held in the above case that the written request was a right given by statute, and that it was the duty of the court to appoint the person so requested. In the case at bar, Mrs. Sullivan was entitled to be appointed and to administer upon the estate, although a married woman. Code Civ. Proc. § 1370. The policy of the law is to give the right to the surviving husband or wife, not only to administer, but to have a person appointed upon request. So fully does the law carry out this policy, that if letters have been granted to a child, father, brother, or sister of the intestate, the surviving husband or wife may assert his prior right, and obtain letters of administration, and have the prior letters revoked.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1386. In this case, if letters of administration had been issued to the son without objection, the surviving wife might have them revoked and be appointed herself. Her right to request the appointment of a competent person is given in the very same sentence of the same subdivision of the section which gives her the right to administer. It is argued that after her marriage she ceased to be the "surviving wife," within the meaning of the section. True, she is not the wife of deceased. She could not be the wife of her husband after his death. She was his widow. But she was during life his wife, and as his wife she survived him. When the legislature used the words "surviving husband or wife," it intended to designate the survivor of the spouses, and to give to such survivor the right to administer, or to name some person to administer. In speaking of the right to request, in Re Bedell's Estate, 97 Cal. 341, 32 Pac. 323, it is said: "The evident purpose of the provision is to give to the one entitled to administration the power to select some competent person to discharge the duties of the office, but to hold that his request is not to be considered when resisted by one who belongs to a class subsequent in rank to his own would be to confine his selection to some person falling within the class immediately after his own." In re Allen's Estate, 78 Cal. 581, 21 Pac. 426, is not in conflict with what we have said. The decision was made under the statute prior to the amendment of 1891, which provided that a married woman must not be appointed administratrix. It was held that, as she was expressly prohibited by the statute from being appointed administratrix, she did not have the right to give to one a greater right than she had herself. If the contention of appellant is correct, then Mrs. Sullivan would not be entitled to letters if she applied in person. If this is the law, then the amendment to section 1370, Code Civ. Proc., authorizing a married woman to be appointed administratrix, must have reference to estates of others than her deceased husband. We cannot think it was the legislative intent to allow a married woman to become administratrix of estates in which she has no interest, and to deprive her of that right upon the estate of her deceased husband, in which she is vitally interested. After the death of the husband or wife the survivor has the right to marry. Such marriage is not in contravention of any statute, nor is it against public policy. In the absence of a statutory provision, such marriage does not deprive the party so marrying from the right to hold property, administer upon an estate, or to do any other lawful act. The order should be affirmed.

YOLO COUNTY v. COLGAN, Controller.

(Sac. 745.)¹

STATUTES — VALIDITY — LEGISLATIVE PROCEEDINGS — JOURNAL — EVIDENCE — STATE REVENUES — COLLECTION — REPEAL — REVIVAL.

1. The validity of a statute which has been duly certified, approved, enrolled, and deposited in the office of the secretary of state cannot be impeached by a resort to the journals of the legislature.

2. Acts March 5, 1870, and March 1, 1871-72, authorized the county officers to collect and hold from the state the commissions for the collection of the revenue for the state. St. 1873-74 provided that all fees or commissions allowed to or received by county officers for such services should be paid into the county treasury, and apportioned to the salary fund. Held, that Act Feb. 23, 1893 (St. 1893, p. 5), abolishing all commissions or fees paid by the state to the officers of any county for services in the collection of ad valorem taxes, except the fees allowed under certain provisions of the Political Code, repealed the said acts of March 5, 1870, and March 1, 1871-72; the intention being to relieve the state of all fees except those under the Political Code.

3. Since the act of February 23, 1893 (St. 1893, p. 5), abolished General Revenue Act 1861, § 107, and Act March 5, 1870, §§ 13, 15, it is immaterial, as affecting such abolished statutes, whether or not the said act of February 23, 1893, was repealed by the county government act of 1893, as the repeal of an abolishing act does not revive the act abolished.

Temple and Harrison, JJ., dissenting.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; Joseph W. Hughes, Judge.

Petition by the county of Yolo to compel Edward P. Colgan, as controller of the state of California, to allow petitioner to retain certain money in the hands of its treasurer. From a judgment denying the writ, petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

E. R. Bush, Dist. Atty., and Devlin & Devlin, for appellant. Tiley L. Ford, Atty. Gen., and George A. Sturtevant, Dep. Atty. Gen., for respondent.

PER CURIAM. When this case was in department an opinion was prepared and submitted by the commissioners; and after oral argument in bank, and full consideration of the case, we are satisfied with that opinion, and the conclusion therein reached. The opinion is as follows:

"HAYNES, C. The county of Yolo petitioned the superior court for a writ of mandate to compel the respondent to allow the petitioner to retain out of any moneys belonging to the state of California which might be in the hands of the treasurer of said county at its settlement with the respondent in December, 1899, the sum of $26,771.20, and such other sum as may have accrued to the county upon said December settlement, for commissions, charges, and fees directed and fixed by law to be allowed to it for services of its auditor and assessor in connection with the state taxes" for the fiscal year 1893-94, and for each successive fiscal year since that date. An alternative writ was granted, the respondent answered, and upon the hearing the writ was denied and the petition dismissed, and from the judgment of dismissal the petitioner appeals, upon the judgment roll.

"Said fees and commissions are claimed by the petitioner to have accrued to it under section 107 of the general revenue act of 1861 (St. 1861, p. 453), and under sections 13 and 15 of the act of March 5, 1870 (St. 1869-70, p. 148). The respondent contends that said statutes were superseded and rendered inoperative by the county government act of 1883, or, if not, that they were directly repealed, so far as said fees and commissions are concerned, by an act approved February 23, 1893 (St. 1893, p. 5), except as to commissions paid to the assessors of the several counties for services in the collection of personal property taxes, as provided by chapter 8 of the Political Code, and except, also, as to the mileage allowed the county treasurers in making settlements with the state under section 3876 of the same Code, and as to which there is no controversy. The petitioner—appellant here—contends that said repealing act never became a law, because it did not receive in the senate the number of votes required by the constitutional provision that 'no bill shall become a law without the concurrence of a majority of the members elected to each house.' The court found that the journal of the senate showed that the vote on said bill was: Ayes, 20; noes, 3; 21 being a majority of the senators elected. The question whether the validity of a statute duly certified, approved, enrolled, and deposited in the office of the secretary of state can be impeached by a resort to the journals of the legislature has been long controverted, and the conclusions reached in the courts of last resort of the different states are inharmonious and conflicting, and this want of harmony is frequently found in the different decisions in the same state; and this remark is not entirely inapplicable to the state of California. In Fowler v. Pierce, 2 Cal. 165, it was held that the court may go behind the record evidence of a statute, and inquire whether it was passed or approved in accordance with the constitution. The case of Sherman v. Story, 30 Cal. 253, decided in 1866, overruled Fowler v. Pierce; and it was held that 'neither the journals of the legislature, nor the bill as originally introduced, nor the amendments attached to it, nor parol evidence, can be received in order to show that an act of the legislature properly enrolled, authenticated, and deposited with the secretary of state either did not become a law in accordance with the prescribed forms, or did not become a law as enrolled.' The opinion of the court in that case was delivered by Mr. Justice Sawyer. It is too long to be quoted here, and any attempt at condensation would weaken its force. In it will be found not only cogent arguments in support of the conclusions reached, but many authorities entitled to the highest consideration. In Oroville & V. R. Co. v. Plumas Co. Sup'rs, 37 Cal. 355, the invalidity of an act of the legislature was alleged, upon the ground that its passage was procured by fraud. The court, by Rhodes, J., said: 'An act of the legislature is not subject to attack on that ground, and it is sufficient on this point to refer to Sherman v. Story, 30 Cal. 266.' In Harpending v. Haight, 39 Cal. 189, the question was presented whether the motive of the mover of a resolution to adjourn the senate was to prevent thereby the executive from returning the bill with his veto; and Wallace, J., held the evidence incompetent, citing Sherman v. Story, supra. In People v. Burt, 43 Cal. 560, the court, by Belcher, J., said: 'If an act is properly enrolled, authenticated, and deposited with the secretary of state, it is conclusive evidence of the will of the legislature at the time of its passage;' citing Sherman v. Story, supra. In Paving Co. v. Hilton, 69 Cal. 480, 11 Pac. 3, a proposed amendment of the constitution was referred to in the journals of the senate and assembly as senate bill No. 10, but was not copied at large in the respective journals. It was held by Thornton, J., and McKee, J., that the failure to enter the proposed amendment at large in the journals was in violation of section 1 of article 18 of the constitution, and that the amendment never took effect. The opinion was written by Thornton, J., who said: 'There is nothing here in conflict with what is said in Sherman v. Story, 30 Cal. 256.' In People v. Dunn, 80 Cal. 211, 22 Pac. 140, it was contended by the respondent that 'every act not shown by the journals to have taken place must be presumed not to have been done.' The court said that this contention cannot be upheld by reason or authority, and that the question as to the power of the court to go behind the enrolled bill in order to determine from the journals whether the bill was properly passed was not presented. Hale v. McGettigan, 114 Cal. 112, 45 Pac. 1049, was similarly disposed of. It was said (pages 114, 115, 114 Cal., and page 1049, 45 Pac.): 'It is, however, unnecessary for us to determine in the present case whether the journals of either branch of the legislature may, under any circumstances, be examined for the purpose of impeaching the validity of an act that has been duly enrolled and deposited with the secretary of state, since we are of the opinion that it does not appear from those journals that the act in question was not constitutionally passed.'

"It is clear, even upon the authority of those cases which hold that the journals may be looked into to determine whether a bill has been passed in conformity to the requirements of the constitution, that the validity of the statute does not depend upon the failure or omission of the journals to show affirmatively that such requirements were in fact complied with, and hence the correctness of the decisions in People v. Dunn and Hale v. McGettigan cannot be questioned; yet it is equally clear that if the enrolled statute in the office of the secretary of state is conclusive, and unimpeachable by the legislative journals, that each of those cases could have been decided with equal propriety upon that ground. These cases have, therefore, been regarded as somewhat weakening the force of Sherman v. Story and People v. Burt.

"Weil v. Kenfield, 54 Cal. 111, is cited with much confidence by appellant. The report of that case contains no statement of the points or authorities of counsel; nor is any decision of this court, or any other, cited in the opinion. The question we are now considering is not even suggested in it. There was no controversy in that case as to what transpired in the assembly in relation to the passage of the act; it being conceded that only the title and the first few words of the bill were read; the question considered being whether such reading fulfilled the requirement of the constitution in that regard. Here what transpired in the senate is the very point in controversy; appellant contending that the journal contains the only competent evidence, while respondent insists that the enrolled act duly signed, approved, and filed with the secretary of state is the conclusive evidence that the bill did receive the vote of a majority of the members elected to each house. If it were here conceded that the bill in question received but 20 votes in the senate, Weil v. Kenfield would be in point. Indeed, in such case there could be no controversy. The learned justice (McKinstry) who wrote the opinion in Weil v. Kenfield, in a later case (People v. Thompson, 67 Cal. 628, 9 Pac. 833), though placing the decision upon a different ground, made some remarks tending strongly to sustain the proposition that the enrolled statute should be held conclusive. That was a petition for a writ of mandate directing the secretary of state to certify that the petitioners had been duly elected as members of congress in congressional districts created by the act of 1872, claiming that the act of 1883, under which the election was proclaimed by the governor, was invalid because of noncompliance by the legislature with certain formalities required by the constitution; the petitioners having received a few votes each in the old districts, while the great mass of the people observed the new law, and voted in the new districts. The decision was based upon the ground that the proclamation giving notice of the election according to the law must control, whether it was valid or not. It was there said: 'Courts of justice in this state take judicial notice, perhaps, of the contents of the journals of the two houses of the legislature. The citizens at large are not required to take legal notice of the entries of the journals. The people had not been actually notified of such entries when the election was held. They had before them (let us assume) the statute of 1883, approved by the governor, and published, as statutes are required to be published, and the governor's proclamation. We are asked to decide that all the voters should have inquired whether the statute was invalid by reason of matters of which they had not been notified; that the duty was imposed upon them to make investigation into the history in the legislature of the bill for the act of 1883, and to consider questions as to the validity of the law arising out of the proceedings in the legislature which preceded its final passage.' Here is an actual case practically illustrating the confusion and uncertainty which must inevitably result from the doctrine contended for by appellant. Appellant also cites Stevenson v. Colgan, 91 Cal. 649, 27 Pac. 1089, 14 L. R. A. 459, and Popper v. Broderick, 123 Cal. 456, 56 Pac. 53. The first of these cases is distinguished by the court from those cases where it has been held that the court may look into the journals of the legislature for the purpose of determining whether a statute was in fact passed by the requisite vote required by the constitution, but the court said: 'While the courts have undoubted power to declare a statute invalid, when it appears to them, in the course of judicial action, to be in conflict with the constitution, yet they can only do so when the question arises as a pure question of law, unmixed with matters of fact, the existence of which must be determined upon a trial, and as the result of, it may be, conflicting evidence.' This proposition utterly destroys appellant's contention, since whether a bill was passed by a majority vote is a question of fact, which could only be established by evidence of what took place in the legislature. In the case of Popper v. Broderick, supra, no question here involved was presented or discussed.

"From this review of the cases in this court, it appears that the case of Sherman v. Story has not been followed in some cases where it might have been, the decision being reached upon other grounds; that it has been quoted and followed in two cases, and distinguished in another; and that, in the only case directly conflicting with it, the opposite doctrine was assumed without discussion, upon conceded facts, and without reference to that case or any other. We are referred by appellant to San Mateo Co. v. Southern Pac. R. Co., 8 Sawy. 238, 294, 13 Fed. 722, 767, where the same learned justice who wrote the opinion in Sherman v. Story, afterwards, as United States circuit judge, said: 'While we think the case of Sherman v. Story correctly decided under the constitution as it then was, we are of the opinion that the change in the constitution requires a change in the rule, and such seems to be the view of the supreme court of California in Weil v. Kenfield, 54 Cal. 111,' and cites Spangler v. Jacoby, 14 Ill. 297, and Prescott v. Board, 19 Ill. 323, saying that California adopted the said provision in its present constitution substantially as found in the constitution of Illinois. But this change in the constitution does not affect the rule that the record consisting of the enrolled statute in the office of the secretary of state cannot be impeached by evidence of any fact outside of such record, as was clearly shown in the opinion of the same justice in Sherman v. Story. If it could be, then, before it can be determined what the law is in any given case, resort must be had to the journals of the legislature, which are often imperfect and erroneous; and different courts might readily differ in their conclusions as to whether the evidence obtained from the journals did or did not show that the requirements of the constitution had been complied with. We are not bound, however, by this decision of a federal court, not only because our conclusion upon the question cannot be reviewed by that court, but because the supreme court of the United States has reached a different conclusion.

"In Field v. Clark, 143 U. S. 649, 12 Sup. Ct. 495, 36 L. Ed. 294, it was said (page 668, 143 U. S., page 496, 12 Sup. Ct., and page 302, 36 L. Ed.): 'The contention of the appellants is that this enrolled act, in the custody of the secretary of state, and appearing upon its face to have become a law in the mode prescribed by the constitution, is to be deemed an absolute nullity in all its parts, because—such is the allegation—it is shown by the congressional record of proceedings, reports of committees of each house, reports of committees of conference, and other papers printed by authority of congress, and having reference to house bill 9416, that a section of the bill, as it finally passed, was not in the bill authenticated by the signatures of the presiding officers of the respective houses of congress, and approved by the president.' After quoting the alleged omitted section, the opinion proceeds: 'The argument in behalf of appellants is that a bill, signed by the speaker of the house of representatives and by the president of the senate, presented to and approved by the president of the United States, and delivered by the latter to the secretary of state, as an act passed by congress, does not become a law of the United States if it had not in fact been passed by congress. In view of the express requirements of the constitution, the correctness of this general principle cannot be doubted. There is no authority in the presiding officers of the house of representatives and the senate to attest by their signatures, nor in the president to approve, nor in the secretary of state to receive and cause to be published, as a legislative act, any bill not passed by congress. But this concession of the correctness of the general principle for which the appellants contend does not determine the precise question before the court; for it remains to inquire as to the nature of the evidence upon which a court may act when the issue is made as to whether a bill originating in the house of representatives or the senate, and asserted to have become a law, was or was not passed by congress. It has received, as its importance required that it should receive, the most deliberate consideration. We recognize, on one hand, the duty of this court, from the performance of which it may not shrink, to give full effect to the provisions of the constitution relating to the enactment of laws that are to operate wherever the authority and jurisdiction of the United States extend. On the other hand, we cannot be unmindful of the consequences that must result if this court should feel obliged, in fidelity to the constitution, to declare that an enrolled bill, on which depend public and private interests of vast magnitude, and which has been authenticated by the signatures of the presiding officers of the two houses of congress, and by the approval of the president, and been deposited in the public archives, as an act of congress, was not in fact passed by the house of representatives and the senate, and therefore did not become a law.' After quoting from article 1, § 5, of the constitution, the court proceeded: 'It was assumed in argument that the object of this clause was to make the journal the best, if not conclusive, evidence upon the issue as to whether a bill was in fact passed by the two houses of congress. But the words used do not require such interpretation. On the contrary, as Mr. Justice Story has well said: "The object of the whole clause is to insure publicity to the proceedings of the legislature, and a correspondent responsibility of the members to their respective constituents. And it is founded in sound policy and deep political foresight. Intrigue and cabal are thus deprived of some of their main resources, by plotting and devising measures in secrecy. The public mind is enlightened by an attentive examination of the public measures. Patriotism and integrity and wisdom obtain their due reward, and votes are ascertained, not by vague conjecture, but by positive facts." * * * The signing by the speaker of the house of representatives, and by the president of the senate, in open session, of an enrolled bill, is an official attestation by the two houses of such bill as one that has passed congress. It is a declaration by the two houses, through their presiding officers, to the president, that a bill thus attested has received, in due form, the sanction of the legislative branch of the government, and that it is delivered to him in obedience to the constitutional requirement that all bills which pass congress shall be presented to him. And when a bill thus attested receives his approval, and is deposited in the public archives, its authentication as a bill that has passed congress should be deemed complete and unimpeachable. As the president has no authority to approve a bill not passed by congress, an enrolled act in the custody of the secretary of state carries on its face a solemn assurance by the legislative and executive departments of the government, charged, respectively, with the duty of enacting and executing the laws, that it was passed by congress. The respect due to the co-equal and independent departments requires the judicial department to act upon that assurance, and to accept, as having passed congress, all bills authenticated in the manner stated; leaving the courts to determine, when the question properly arises, whether the act so authenticated is in conformity with the constitution.' The court in that case cited Sherman v. Story, and quoted extensively from it, and also cited and approved Pangborn v. Young, 32 N. J. Law, 29, and State v. Swift, 10 Nev. 176. The opinion in the latter case was delivered by Mr. Justice Beatty, now chief justice of this court. In it the question here under consideration was very fully discussed, and numerous authorities cited and reviewed. It is true, the supreme court of the United States, in the case above cited, referred to the case in 8 Sawy., and 13 Fed., supra, quoting the remark of Judge Sawyer that the constitution had been changed since Sherman v. Story was decided; but that court did not specify or comment upon the change. It is also true that the court said: 'In regard to certain matters, the constitution expressly requires that they shall be entered on the journal. To what extent the validity of legislative action is affected by the failure to have those matters entered on the journal, we need not inquire.' The reasoning of the court, however, in Field v. Clark, is equally conclusive in the case at bar, as under the facts there stated. The mandate of our constitution that the yeas and nays shall be entered on the journal, in the absence of a further provision making the journal higher evidence of the due passage of a bill than the approved and enrolled statute, does not affect the question. Such provision would, in effect, empower the courts to correct the journals of the legislature, and declare that a bill certified by it to have been passed was not passed,—a power that is nowhere in the constitution either expressly or impliedly given to the judicial department. The lawmaking power of the state is vested by the constitution in the legislature; and, while the constitution has prescribed the formalities to be observed in the passage of bills and the creation of statutes, the power to determine whether these formalities have been complied with is necessarily vested in the legislature itself, since, if it were not, it would be powerless to enact a statute. The constitution has not provided that this essential power thus vested in the legislature shall be subject to review by the courts, while it has expressly provided that no person charged with the exercise of powers properly belonging to one of the three departments—the legislative, executive, and judicial—into which the powers of the government are divided shall exercise any functions appertaining to either of the others. In Pangborn v. Young, 32 N. J. Law, 29, the constitution provided, as to the form of enacting bills, 'that the yeas and nays of the members voting on such final passage shall be entered on the journal,' and is therefore directly in point here. For a citation of numerous authorities for and against the rule laid down in Sherman v. Story, see 2 Notes Cal. Rep. p. 573.

"It is further contended by appellant that said act of 1893 'does not purport to abolish the fees and percentages allowed to the county by section 15 of the act of March 5, 1870 (St. 1869-70, p. 166), or the commissions allowed to the treasurer for the disbursement of public money by section 107 of the act of 1861 (St. 1861, p. 453).'

"Under the acts of March 5, 1870, and March 1, 1871-72, the county officers were authorized to collect and hold from the state the commissions for the collection of the revenue; but a later act (St. 1873-74, p. 420) provided that all fees or commissions allowed to or received by these county officers for these services in collecting the revenues of the state should be paid into the county treasury, and apportioned to the salary fund; so that while the counties, and not the officers, received the benefit of these fees and commissions (except those provided for in the Political Code, and which are not affected by the repealing act), the moneys thus accruing to the counties were the 'fees and commissions allowed to or received by the auditor, assessor, collector or treasurer.' The intention of the repealing act, when considered in connection with the prior statutes, is, therefore, to relieve the state from the payment of all fees and commissions except those allowed by the Political Code.

"It is further contended by appellant that, 'assuming that the "abolishing act of 1893" became a law, it was repealed by the county government act of 1893.' The act in question was approved February 23, 1893, and took effect the first Monday in May of that year. The county government act of 1893 was approved March 24, 1893. It is not claimed that the first-mentioned act was expressly repealed by the second, nor that the second expressly provided for the payment by the state of the fees and commissions here in controversy, but the contention is that the first act was repealed by implication. We see no ground upon which a repeal by implication can be sustained; but a repeal of the 'abolishing act,' if it were repealed by the county government act, whether expressly or by implication, would not revive the acts repealed by the abolishing act.

and, if the county government act re-established these fees and commissions, it must have done so by express enactment. The case of San Luis Obispo Co. v. Felts, 104 Cal. 60, 37 Pac. 780, cited by appellant, referred only to fees or percentages allowed by the Political Code, and which were expressly excepted from the operation of the abolishing act; nor does the case of Goodwin v. Buckley, 54 Cal. 295, have any application, since the county government act did not provide for the fees and commissions which appellant here seeks to recover.

"In appellant's brief we find a statement of the amounts directed by the legislature to be raised for state purposes for five fiscal years there named, ending with that of 1897-98, and of the amounts actually collected and paid into the state treasury for the same years, from which it appears that the amount collected exceeds the amount directed to be raised by $1,244,847.54; and the question is asked, 'Does not this surplus money belong to the counties?' Whether it does or not is immaterial in this proceeding, as it was not included in petitioner's demand.

"Appellant also refers to 'an act authorizing the allowance, settlement and payment of claims of counties against the state,' approved March 9, 1893 (St. 1893, p. 109). This statute did not create or fix any fees or charges against the state, but provided for the allowance of fees and commissions which, having been paid into the state treasury, might be allowed in the next settlement. There is no inconsistency between this act and the abolishing act previously passed, since claims which had accrued to the counties prior to the repeal were not affected by it; and, besides, 'the abolishing act' expressly excepted from its operation certain fees or commissions therein named, to which the later act might properly apply.

"Respondent refers to an act approved February 16, 1899 (St. 1899, p. 9), to prevent the maintenance of any action for the recovery of the fees and commissions such as are here in question, which provides that 'all such actions and proceedings heretofore commenced and now pending, and all such actions or proceedings that may hereafter be instituted, shall be dismissed by the court in which the same may be pending, upon its own motion'; but this act excepts the fees and commissions which were excepted by the said abolishing act. In view of the conclusion reached as to the validity of said abolishing act, this act need not be considered. We think the court below did not err in denying the writ, and advise that the judgment appealed from be affirmed.

FEENEY v. HINCKLEY et al. (S. F. 1,485.)

JUDGMENT—LIMITATION OF ACTION—STATUTES.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 336, limiting the time within which an action on a judgment or decree must be brought to five years, no recovery could be had in an action on a judgment brought more than five, but less than six, years after judgment was entered; Code Civ. Proc. § 1049, providing that an action is pending from its commencement until its final determination on appeal, or until the time for appeal has passed, unless the judgment is sooner satisfied, not giving additional life to the judgment.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; S. P. Hall, Judge.

Action by Bridget Feeney against H. G. Hinckley and another. From a judgment in favor of defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

B. McFadden, for appellant. Wm. H. H. Hart and Cotton & Cotton, for respondents.

CHIPMAN, C. Action to recover an unpaid balance due on a judgment rendered in an action of unlawful detainer. Defendants had judgment on demurrer to the complaint, from which plaintiff appeals.

The complaint showed that on August 22, 1891, plaintiff recovered judgment for possession of certain real property, and for $1,500 damages and $20.30 costs, and under a writ issued thereon September 1, 1891, and returned November 3, 1891, there was realized on the judgment $63.30, and that there is now unpaid on the judgment $1,457, with interest, etc.; and judgment is demanded against defendants for the amount. The action was commenced August 17, 1897,—more than five, but less than six, years after the judgment was entered. Defendants demurred to the complaint for insufficiency of facts, and because the action is barred by section 336, Code Civ. Proc., which provides that an action on a judgment or decree must be brought within five years. Appellant contends that the judgment was not a final determination as to the rights of the parties until the time for appeal had passed. Appellant lays much stress upon section 1049, Code Civ. Proc., which provides that "an action is deemed to be pending from the time of its commencement until its final determination upon appeal, or until the time for appeal has passed, unless the judgment is sooner satisfied." This section has no bearing upon the construction to be given section 336. For many purposes the action should be deemed to be pending until the right of appeal has elapsed, but it was competent for the legislature to prescribe the time within which an action might be brought to enforce the judgment, whatever might be the rights of the parties under section 1049. Appellant would read into the statute by construction a year's additional time, although the statute plainly says that the action must be brought within five years. The court said in Rowe v. Blake, 99 Cal. 167, 33 Pac. 864: "The provisions of section 681 of the Code of Civil Procedure, limiting the issuance of an execution for the enforcement of a judgment to the term of five years, is but a limitation upon a certain mode for its enforcement, and does not purport to limit or qualify the right to its enforcement in any other mode. The right to bring an action upon a judgment or decree is recognized by that Code as the subject of a civil action, and may be brought within five years. Code Civ. Proc. § 336. The provisions of this section are applicable to domestic judgments. Mason v. Cronise, 20 Cal. 211. And the time thus limited begins to run from the entry of the judgment. Trenouth v. Farrington, 54 Cal. 273." See Edwards v. Hellings, 103 Cal. 204, 37 Pac. 218. If it be true, as claimed by appellant, that the question has never arisen in the precise form as in the present case, we think it beyond doubt that the judgment creditor who would seek to enforce his judgment by an action brought for that purpose must do so within the time limited by section 336, or the action will be barred. The judgment has no additional life given to it by section 1049, so as to enlarge the time within which he may have execution under section 681, nor within which he may bring his separate action as limited by section 336. The judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; GRAY, C.

HARRIS v. SMITH et al. (L. A. 750.)

REPLEVIN—PLEADING—ALLEGATIONS OF PETITION—WRONGFUL ATTACHMENT—DAMAGES.

1. Where, in replevin, the complaint alleged that on a date named plaintiff was the owner and entitled to the possession of the property, and that he was in possession, and that defendant on that day, without plaintiff's consent, and against his will, unlawfully came into possession of the property, and that it was taken from his possession, the complaint was not objectionable on the ground that it failed to allege ownership or right of possession at the commencement of the action.

2. Where plaintiff sued to recover personal property taken, or its value, and for damages for ruining his business, an objection by demurrer that several causes of action were improperly united became immaterial after a judgment limiting the relief to the recovery of the possession of the property or its value.

3. Where an attachment had been issued against an owner of goods, and between 12 and 1 o'clock a. m., in consideration of a bona fide indebtedness of more than the value of the property, the goods were sold to plaintiff, and the attachment was levied and the property taken after the hour of 5 p. m. the same day, in an action for the recovery of the property, a finding that plaintiff, after delivery, remained in sole and exclusive possession of the property, was not contrary to the evidence, because the leasehold of the premises was not assigned, and the former owner retained the key to the store, and the goods were not removed.

4. Where there is a judgment for plaintiff in replevin, plaintiff is not entitled to damages because of expenditures for attorney's fees.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; J. W. Hughes, Judge.

Action by W. O. Harris against A. F. Smith and others. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Sam F. Smith, for appellants. L. E. Dodmun and Eugene Dovey, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The plaintiff had judgment in the court below for the recovery of the possession of the personal property described in the complaint, or for the sum of $350, the value thereof, and $100 as damages and costs. The defendants appeal from the judgment and from an order denying a new trial. The grounds urged for reversal are insufficiency of the complaint, misjoinder of causes of action, insufficiency of evidence to justify the findings, and the allowance of attorney's fees as damages.

1. The complaint, it is contended, fails to allege ownership or right of possession at the time of the commencement of the action, and hence, under the decisions in this state, is insufficient. Affierbach v. McGovern, 79 Cal. 268, 21 Pac. 837; Fredericks v. Tracy, 98 Cal. 658, 33 Pac. 750; Holly v. Heiskell, 112 Cal. 174, 44 Pac. 466; Truman v. Young, 121 Cal. 490, 53 Pac. 1073. In the cases cited the only allegations of the complaint were, in each case, that at a day named prior to the filing of the complaint the plaintiff was the owner and entitled to the possession of the property sued for, and that the defendant now wrongfully detains the same, etc. In this case the complaint alleged not only that on the day named the plaintiff was the owner and entitled to the possession of the property, but also that he was in possession of it, and that the defendants on that day, without the plaintiff's consent, and against his will, wrongfully and unlawfully and by force came into possession of said personal property; and, in effect, that it was thus taken from his possession. The difference is that in the cases cited no cause of action is alleged as existing either at the time of the commencement of the suit or at any other time. But in the case at bar a complete cause of action is alleged as arising at the day named; and it may be contended that, the obligation of restoration having been created by the wrongful act of the defendants, it continues, with the action founded on it, until it is affirmatively shown to have been extinguished.

2. The objection by the demurrer that several causes of action are improperly united in the complaint has become immaterial by reason of the judgment being limited to the recovery of the possession of the property or its value. No judgment was given upon the plaintiff's claim for damages for ruining his business.

3. The plaintiff deraigned title to the goods in controversy under a sale of date October 11, 1898, from one Bowdish, who was then admittedly the owner of the property, and against whom an attachment had been issued. The sale was made between 12 and 1 o'clock, and was in consideration of an indebtedness to the plaintiff of $450, which was more than the value of the property. It is found that possession was immediately delivered to Harris, who remained "in the sole and exclusive possession thereof continuously thereafter"; and that the sale was made in good faith, and not with the intent to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors. The attachment was levied and the property taken from his possession after the hour of 5 p. m. of the same day. The specifications of insufficiency of the evidence are, in effect, that the leasehold of the premises was not assigned, that Bowdish retained the key or a key of the store, and that the goods were not removed. But there is nothing in the facts specified inconsistent with the findings.

4. The court rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff for the possession of the property described in the complaint, or the value thereof in case delivery cannot be had, "together with one hundred dollars as damages." This portion of the judgment rests upon the finding of fact that the plaintiff had expended the sum of $300 as attorney's fees in pursuit of said personal property, but that any part of said amount over $100 could not be recovered. The action is not for the conversion of personal property, and the provisions of section 3336, Civ. Code, do not apply. The action is brought for a recovery of the possession of the property described in the complaint, or for the value thereof in case delivery cannot be had. In such an action, if the plaintiff recovers judgment, section 667, Code Civ. Proc., authorizes the court to give judgment for "damages for the detention." No damages are claimed herein for the detention of the property, and there is no authority in the statute by which the plaintiff may recover attorney's fees incurred in the action. Kelly v. McKibben, 54 Cal. 192; Redington v. Nunan, 60 Cal. 632. In Arzaga v. Villaba, 85 Cal. 191, 24 Pac. 656, the question of the right to attorney's fees was not presented. The decision in that case was given under section 3294, Civ. Code, and upon the ground that there had been shown such oppression on the part of the defendant as to justify an award of exemplary damages. The superior court is directed to modify the judgment appealed from by striking out that portion thereof which adjudges that the plaintiff recover "one hundred dollars as damages," and, as thus modified, the judgment shall stand affirmed.

SIDDALL v. HAIGHT. (S. F. 1,789.)

HUSBAND AND WIFE—TITLE BY ADVERSE POSSESSION—COMMUNITY PROPERTY—SEPARATE PROPERTY—ATTORNEY AND CLIENT—NEGLIGENCE—JUDGMENT LIEN—OWNERSHIP BY JUDGMENT DEBTOR—DEFENSE.

1. Where a married woman and her husband acquired possession of real property by a gift to the wife from her sister, and occupied it together for more than 20 years, after which time she was decreed to be the owner by adverse possession in a suit to quiet title brought by the administratrix of the sister, the title so perfected by adverse possession was not, in effect, a purchase with community funds, so as to give the husband a half interest in the land, but operated as a purchase by the wife, so as to make the land her separate property.

2. Where a client sued his attorney for negligence in failing to have an execution levied on the property of the judgment debtor before the judgment lien expired, the fact that no property belonged to the judgment debtor is a complete defense to the action.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; George H. Bahrs, Judge.

Action by Henry Siddall against George W. Haight. From a judgment in favor of defendant, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

C. M. Jennings, for appellant. John B. Mhoon, for appellee.

CHIPMAN, C. Action for neglect of professional duty as attorney for plaintiff. Defendant had judgment on motion for nonsuit, from which, and from the order denying his motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals.

Defendant was the attorney for plaintiff in an action against one Robert Thompson, against whom plaintiff recovered judgment for $879.99 on May 18, 1891. The lien of this judgment expired May 18, 1893. Plaintiff testified that he employed defendant on April 1, 1893, to cause levy of execution to be made on certain real property (admittedly the only property in which Thompson had any alleged interest, and out of which alone the judgment could be collected, if at all), being a lot situated in the city of San Francisco. On April 20th plaintiff paid defendant $20, of which $10 was to go on account of his fees and $10 to pay sheriff's fees for levying execution. Execution was sued out the next day, April 21st, and put in the sheriff's hands, but for some unexplained reason was returned to defendant, and was by him again given to the sheriff April 25th, and levied. There would have been time to advertise the sale before the expiration of the lien had the notice been published promptly, but here again, for reasons not clearly appearing, but apparently because the cost of publishing the notice was not prepaid, the publication did not begin until about May 25th, and the day of sale was fixed for June 19th. On the 19th of June, before the hour of sale, Mrs. Thompson filed a declaration of homestead on the lot in question. On account of this homestead being filed, and because of defendant's absence at the time, the sheriff adjourned the sale for a day, and what afterwards took place does not appear. It seems to be conceded by both parties—what is undoubtedly the law—that the execution and levy did not extend the judgment lien, and hence no enforceable judgment lien existed at the time the sale was advertised to take place, the property being then exempt from forced sale by virtue of the homestead. Civ. Code, §§ 1240, 1241. It was admitted that, if Thompson had no interest in the lot in question, he was insolvent. It follows that, if this lot belonged wholly to Mrs. Thompson as her separate property, it becomes immaterial whether defendant was negligent in failing to have it sold on execution; and this would be true regardless of the homestead. Plaintiff introduced in evidence the complaint, answer, and judgment in a certain action brought by the administratrix of the estate of Jane Peebles, deceased, against Elizabeth M. Thompson, who was the wife of Robert Thompson, but he was not made a party defendant. The action was to quiet plaintiff's title, as administratrix, to the lot in question; and it was alleged that defendant, Mrs. Thompson, claimed some interest therein. The complaint was filed November 14, 1891. Answer was filed January 11, 1892, on which day the cause was tried. The court found in that action that for more than 20 years last past defendant has been in the actual and continual and exclusive occupation of the premises under claim of title, and has claimed title for that time adversely to all the world; that she maintained a substantial inclosure around the lot, and had paid all the taxes levied or assessed upon the land during all said time; and "that the defendant [Mrs. Thompson] is the owner and entitled to the possession of said land and premises"; and decree was accordingly entered. At the trial of the present action, plaintiff called Robert Thompson, husband of Elizabeth, as a witness. He testified that he had been married for 30 years, and had resided, with his wife, on the lot in question, since 1862. He testified that he "never owned it," and never had a lease of the premises; that his wife paid the taxes with money she got from her sister, Jane Peebles, the deceased person referred to in the action against Mrs. Thompson. He testified: "I lived with my wife there all this time on those premises. That property was her sister's. Her sister died, and gave it to her. I do not know that my wife's claim to that property was based upon adverse possession." Upon cross-examination he testified: "My wife's sister, Jane Peebles, gave her the property, and put her in possession of it; and we have lived there together under that possession." It is contended, however, by appellant, that a verbal gift is impossible; citing section 1091, Civ. Code, and section 1971, Code Civ. Proc. But there may be an executed parol gift of land (Tuffree v. Polhemus, 108 Cal. 670, 41 Pac. 806), and as the evidence was that Jane Peebles gave the lot to Mrs. Thompson, and put her in possession, I do not think the fact that her husband lived on the lot with his wife "under that possession," as he testified he did, could affect his wife's right to perfect her title by adverse possession. There is no evidence to show that Mrs. Thompson did not reside on the premises before marriage, but we do not think this essential.

Respondent makes the point that the judgment by which Mrs. Thompson was decreed to be the owner of the lot was, in effect, a conveyance, within the meaning of section 164, Civ. Code, as amended in 1889 (St. 1889, p. 328), and that the presumption is that the title was "thereby conveyed in her as her separate property." We do not think it necessary to pass upon this question. There is evidence of an executed parol gift to Mrs. Thompson, her sister, and, so far as anything appears, the adverse possession under which Mrs. Thompson was decreed title was the possession thus given, and whether it was before or after her marriage makes no difference. Thompson claimed no interest in the lot, and he testified that he never owned the property. According to plaintiff's view, a wife could never perfect a title in herself by adverse possession which had originated in a gift or devise to her, either before or after marriage, because, as he claims, the joint adverse possession of husband and wife would be, in effect, a purchase with community funds. We cannot agree with appellant. All property owned by either spouse before marriage and that acquired afterwards by gift, bequest, devise, or descent is separate property. Civ. Code, §§ 162, 163. All property otherwise acquired after marriage is community property. Id. § 164. Here, however, the right to possession was by gift to the wife, and if, when later the administratrix of her sister's estate set up a claim to the premises, Mrs. Thompson could defend by showing subsequent adverse possession, and because the decree adjudged the title in her by adverse possession, it does not follow that the premises became community property. As Thompson had no interest in the property, plaintiff suffered no injury by defendant's alleged negligence. Appellant claims that whether or not Thompson had any interest in the land ought to have been left to be determined by future litigation after sale on execution. We do not think so. The complaint is framed on the theory that Thompson owned the premises sought to be levied upon and sold, and, before plaintiff could show damage, it was incumbent on him to prove his allegations. This he failed to do, and the nonsuit properly followed.

The judgment and order should be affirmed.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order

SUTLIFF v. SEIDENBERG et al. (S. F. 1,660.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 30, 1901.)

In bank. On rehearing. Denied.

For opinion in department, see 64 Pac. 131.

PER CURIAM. The petition for rehearing in bank is denied. Upon further examination of the record, we think, however, that it does not sustain the statement in the opinion hereinbefore given that "the issue as to whether plaintiff was discharged in May becomes immaterial in view of the reduced verdict, which limited recovery to commissions earned prior to May"; but there was sufficient evidence to warrant a submission to the jury of the question whether or not the respondent was discharged in May, upon which question they found that there had not been such discharge.

CRIMINAL LAW—SEPARATE CRIMES—CONVICTION—CUMULATIVE SENTENCES—VALIDITY—IMPRISONMENT—DISCHARGE.

1. Pen. Code, § 670, provides that, when any person is convicted of two or more crimes before sentence has been pronounced on him for either, the imprisonment to which he is sentenced on the second must commence at the termination of the first term of imprisonment. Defendant was convicted of an assault with intent to kill, and sentenced to 10 years' imprisonment on July 19, 1890, and in the following month was found guilty of burglary, and sentenced to 5 years' imprisonment, to commence at the expiration of the term under his former sentence. Held, that after a service of 10 years in the state's prison defendant was entitled to his discharge, since the second sentence was invalid, because accused was not convicted before the sentence under the first conviction.

2. Pen. Code, § 105, providing that every prisoner confined in the state's prison for a term less than for life, who escapes therefrom, shall be punishable by imprisonment for a term equal in length to the term he was serving at the time of such escape, the second term of imprisonment to commence from the time he would otherwise have been discharged, being limited to escapes, does not warrant imposing a cumulative sentence on defendant for burglary after a sentence had already been pronounced on him under a former conviction for an assault to commit murder.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; F. W. Van Reynegom, Judge.

Habeas corpus by James Morton to secure his release from the state's prison. Prisoner discharged.

N. S. Wirt, for petitioner. Atty. Gen. Ford, for the State.

BEATTY, C. J. The prisoner was convicted of the crime of assault with intent to commit murder, and on the 19th of July, 1890, was sentenced to be imprisoned at Folsom for a term of 10 years. Subsequently, on the 7th day of August, 1890, he was found guilty of burglary in the second degree, and on the 9th day of the same month was sentenced to be imprisoned at Folsom for a term of five years, "to commence at the expiration of the term of imprisonment defendant is now serving in the state prison at Folsom for assault to commit murder." Ever since the second sentence he has been continuously in the custody of the warden at Folsom, and he claims that, without regard to the credits he has earned by his good conduct, his imprisonment, since the expiration of 10 years from the date of his first sentence, had been and is now unlawful, and this because the superior court had no power to include in the second sentence the provision above quoted, to the effect that the 5-year term of imprisonment thereby imposed should commence at the expiration of the term of imprisonment which he was then undergoing.

Whether our courts have the power to impose cumulative sentences is a question which must be answered by the statutes. A term of imprisonment commences to run when the defendant is actually delivered at the place of imprisonment. Pen. Code, § 670. This is the rule, but it has some exceptions. First, "When any person is convicted of two or more crimes before sentence has been pronounced upon him for either, the imprisonment to which he is sentenced upon the second or other subsequent conviction must commence at the termination of the first term of imprisonment to which he shall be adjudged, or at the termination of the second or other subsequent term of imprisonment, as the case may be." Pen. Code, § 669. This section prescribes one exception to the rule, but it does not cover the present case, because the prisoner was not convicted of the second offense until after sentence on the first conviction. There would seem to be no rational ground for a distinction between this case and the case provided for, but the distinction is clearly drawn in the statute, and we cannot hold that the provision quoted warrants the sentence under which alone the prisoner can now be held. The only other statutory provision for cumulative sentences called to our attention is contained in section 105 of the Penal Code, which applies exclusively to escape from the state prison. These exceptions seem to prove and establish the rule that in all other cases the term of imprisonment commences to run from the delivery of the convict at the prison. It must, therefore, be held that the direction in the second sentence of the prisoner, making it cumulative upon the first, was invalid, and that the lawful term of his imprisonment has expired. This conclusion does not involve the inconveniences apprehended by counsel for the people. The prisoner here could have been punished, as the court designed he should be punished, by simply postponing judgment on the first conviction until after the verdict in the second case; and so can all persons in his situation be subjected to successive and cumulative terms of imprisonment by simply observing the terms of the statute. Pen. Code, § 669. The prisoner is discharged.

SPRINGER v. SPRINGER et al. (L. A. 756.)

CANCELLATION OF DEED—UN SOUND MIND—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY—PRESUMPTION—HUSBAND AND WIFE—CONSIDERATION—LOVE AND AFFECTION—APPEAL—FINDINGS—CONFLICTING EVIDENCE—NEW TRIAL—STATEMENT—AMENDMENT.

1. Plaintiff deeded a lot to her son, retaining a life estate therein. In an action by her to cancel the deed, the attorney drawing it testified that at the time of executing it her mind was sound. There was no evidence that she was of weak intellect, though she was old and in feeble health. Held, that a finding that she was of sound mind will not be reversed.

2. Where the evidence was conflicting, a finding for defendants will not be disturbed on appeal.

3. Where plaintiff conveyed a lot to her son, and he conveyed it to his wife, in an action by plaintiff to cancel her deed to the son findings that his deed to the wife was for a valuable consideration, and also for love and affection, were not prejudicial to plaintiff; the court having refused to cancel plaintiff's deed.

4. Love and affection are a good consideration for a conveyance of land by a husband to his wife, and will support the conveyance.

5. Where the statement on a motion for a new trial certified by the judge contained a summary of the evidence, but made no mention of any exceptions to evidence or other errors of law alleged to have occurred at the trial, and excepted to by plaintiff, plaintiff's remedy is not by motion to the trial court to amend the statement, but by petition to the appellate court.

6. Where, on appeal from an order denying a new trial, the statement as certified by the trial judge contained a summary of the evidence, but made no mention of any exceptions to evidence or other errors of law alleged to have occurred at the trial, and excepted to by plaintiff, such exceptions and errors cannot be considered.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Waldo M. York, Judge.

Action by Maria C. Springer against A. J. Springer and another. From a judgment in favor of defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

See 58 Pac. 1060.

W. W. Holcomb and W. T. Williams, for appellant. Geo. P. Adams, for appellees.

CHIPMAN, C. Action to have certain deeds declared void and canceled, and for the reconveyance of the property to plaintiff. Defendants had judgment, from which, and from an order denying her motion for new trial, plaintiff appeals.

1. Plaintiff contends that the evidence does not support the finding that she was of sound mind when she executed the deed sought to be set aside, and that she knew that she was making a deed when she executed it. Plaintiff is an elderly widow, and is the mother of defendant Andrew J. Springer and of Edward Springer. Defendant Rosa Springer is the wife of Andrew. The court found that on May 11, 1895, and for some time prior thereto, plaintiff was the record owner of lot 22 of the Aurora tract, in the city of Los Angeles, but that her son Andrew had an equitable interest therein; that, at the time the lot was purchased, her two sons, Andrew and Edward, purchased said lot 22, and also lot 31 in the same tract, but the title to lot 22 was taken in plaintiff's name and the title to lot 31 was taken in Edward's name; that the purchase price was contributed by each of said plaintiff's sons and by plaintiff, and thereafter and prior to May 11, 1895, plaintiff and her said sons built a house on said lot 22, and each contributed to pay therefor. Defendant Rosa was not the wife of Andrew until some time after plaintiff had conveyed to Andrew. The court found that on May 5, 1895, plaintiff was, and had been for some time, sick and in feeble health; that she stated to her son Andrew "that she was about to die, and informed him that she desired to make her last will and testament to said lot 22 to and in his favor." The court further found that subsequently, to wit, on May 11, 1895, plaintiff and defendant Andrew went "to the office of a notary public who was also an attorney at law, and plaintiff and her said sons, Andrew and Edward, thereupon agreed upon a settlement of and settled their respective interests in and to all the said real estate, as follows, to wit: Said defendant A. J. Springer transferred said lot 31 to said Edward Springer in full of all the latter's interest in all of said property. Plaintiff reserved to herself a life estate in said house and lot known as lot 22, in full of all her interest in all of said property; and she transferred to defendant A. J. Springer, subject to her said life estate, in full of all his interest in all of said property, the said house and lot known as said lot 22, and in pursuance thereof she executed and delivered to defendant A. J. Springer a deed thereto, which is * * * the deed sought to be set aside in this action; that at the time plaintiff executed and delivered said deed * * * she was of sound mind; that she did not read said deed, but that said notary public who drew it read portions of it to her, and explained to her that she was thereby conveying by deed to defendant A. J. Springer the absolute title to said property, subject only to her said life estate, and she then and there fully understood, and ever since has understood, the same, and that she was so conveying it to her said son A. J. Springer, and that it was not a will nor a testament." The court further found that no mistake was made by plaintiff, and none was discovered; that on August 1, 1897, plaintiff asked defendant A. J. "to return said property, and he promised to, but did not, do so; that on August 4, 1897, for a valuable consideration, defendant A. J. Springer executed and delivered to his wife, Rosa M. Springer, his co-defendant, a deed conveying said lot 22 to her." These deeds were duly recorded. The court also found that the conveyance to Rosa was "in consideration of the love and affection of her said husband, without notice of any equity or interest in favor of plaintiff, except said life estate." The testimony given by the sons was that they deliberately deceived their mother, pursuant to a previous understanding between the sons to do so, and they testified that they made her believe she was executing her will, and not a deed. She testified that she understood she was signing a will. Andrew testified that he explained to his wife, when the latter asked him to convey the property to her, that he could not do so, as it belonged to his mother; but this, his wife testified, was not true. At the trial defendants were living separate and apart. Plaintiff and her two sons testified that they did not know the difference between a will and a deed. Friend E. Lacey, the notary who prepared the deeds, a practicing lawyer at the Los Angeles bar, testified fully to the transaction. Having explained that the brothers came to him to prepare a deed from Andrew to Edward for lot 31, and to prepare a deed similar in form, but reserving a life estate in plaintiff from her to Andrew of lot 22, the witness stated with much particularity what took place at his office when afterwards the brothers and their mother came to execute the deeds. It would serve no useful purpose to quote at length this testimony. The facts narrated by this witness were sufficient to justify the finding that plaintiff understood perfectly what she was doing when she signed and acknowledged the deed, for Lacey carefully explained its contents and meaning to her. He also testified that he had known plaintiff well for several years, and had attended to business for her, and that at the time she executed the deed her mind was sound. There is no evidence that plaintiff was of weak or of impaired intellect, and the only reason now urged to show that she was of unsound mind is that the court found her to be advanced in years and weak in body. No presumption of impaired intellect can arise alone from impaired bodily health, and besides all the direct evidence was against any such presumption. There is a clear conflict in the evidence. The court manifestly believed the witnesses Lacey and Rosa Springer, and disbelieved the witnesses for plaintiff; this the court had a right to do, and with its conclusions upon this branch of the case we cannot interfere.

2. It is claimed that the finding that the deed to Rosa was for a valuable consideration is unsupported. The evidence was that the consideration was love and affection alone, and the court also so found. Appellant was not injured by these findings, inasmuch as the court found on sufficient evidence that plaintiff's deed to Andrew conveyed plaintiff's interest in the property. Andrew could and did convey whatever interest he acquired for the consideration of love and affection, which was a good consideration, and it is immaterial whether the consideration was valuable. The court found, on sufficient evidence, that plaintiff was not imposed upon in making her deed, but understood what she was doing, and intended to do just what she did. The finding that the deed was for a valuable consideration was without injury.

3. Much of the record is taken up with matter which the court refused to place in the statement on motion for new trial, and error is claimed on account of the refusal of the court to amend the statement as originally settled by the court. As we understand the record, this appeal is from the order denying plaintiff's motion to have certain facts set forth in the statement, alleged to be material, and which it is alleged were omitted or refused by the judge to be placed in the statement after his attention was called thereto, and before the final settlement. A counter affidavit of defendants' counsel disputes the correctness of some of the facts alleged by plaintiff to have occurred at the trial. The statement on motion for a new trial, as certified by the judge, is a summary of the evidence as shown by plaintiff's affidavits to have been adduced at the trial; but it makes no mention of any exceptions to evidence or other errors of law alleged to have occurred at the trial, and excepted to by plaintiff. The purpose of the proposed amendments seems to be not so much to enlarge the statement of facts, as to bring these exceptions to the attention of the appellate court for consideration. In effect, the purpose is to review the action of the trial judge in refusing to make the statement to fully and fairly represent the facts as they occurred at the trial. Plaintiff's remedy was by petition to this court. Hudson v. Hudson, 129 Cal. 141, 61 Pac. 773, and cases there cited. This court can, on appeal, look only to the statement as certified by the judge. In re Gates, 90 Cal. 257, 27 Pac. 195. The judgment and orders should be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; GRAY, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. FINDLEY. (Cr. 668.)

EMBEZZLEMENT—CHANGE OF JUDGES—PREJUDICE—REDUCTION OF BAIL—DEFENSES—INSANITY—PRESUMPTION OF CONTINUANCE—JUDGE'S STATEMENT BEFORE JURY—DENIAL OF FOREIGN SUBPOENA—EVIDENCE—APPEAL—INSTRUCTIONS—INTOXICATING LIQUORS—MISCONDUCT OF JURORS—VERDICT—RESORT TO CHANCE—PROOF BY AFFIDAVIT—HEARSAY STATEMENTS.

1. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 170, providing that, when it appears from affidavits on file that either party cannot have a fair and impartial trial before any judge of a court of record about to try the case by reason of the judge's prejudice or bias, the judge shall forthwith secure the services of some other judge to preside at the trial of such case, an affidavit alleging that affiant believed that he could not have a fair and impartial trial was insufficient, in absence of facts showing that a fair trial could not be had.

2. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 170, declaring that, when it appears from affidavits on file that either party to a case before a certain judge cannot have a fair trial by reason of the latter's prejudice, such judge shall forthwith secure the services of another judge, the judge's decision on the question of fact as to whether such showing was made would not be disturbed on appeal unless plainly contrary to the evidence.

3. An allegation in the affidavit of a party on trial for embezzlement before a certain judge that defendant was a successful candidate for office against a relative of the judge was insufficient to show a bias on the part of such judge, within Code Civ. Proc. § 170, authorizing a change of judges for prejudice.

4. That a judge consented to reduce the bail of one charged with embezzlement, which was not excessive, and then withdrew such consent without giving a reason therefor, did not show prejudice in the judge, within Code Civ. Proc. § 170, authorizing a change of judges on that ground, since such withdrawal merely amounted to a refusal to reduce the bail.

5. The mere statement that the judge, in a trial for embezzlement, said in the presence of the jury that he never had any doubt as to the defendant's sanity, the latter relying on insanity as a defense, was insufficient to show bias, within Code Civ. Proc. § 170, authorizing a change of judges for prejudice, in the absence of a statement of the full proceedings in reference to the matter, since the circumstances under which the alleged statement was made might show that it was called for by the remarks or demands of defendant's counsel.

6. The fact that the judge in a prosecution for embezzlement denied defendant a foreign subpoena while granting the prosecution one, was insufficient to show prejudice in the judge, within Code Civ. Proc. § 170, authorizing a change of judges for prejudice, in absence of a showing that defendant had taken the requisite steps to entitle him to such subpoena.

7. Where checks executed by the sureties of a tax collector to the county treasurer were admitted in a prosecution for embezzlement as tending to show the amount of the embezzlement by showing that a certain amount had been paid to the treasurer on the tax collector's account, and not by him, the admission could not be complained of on appeal on the ground that it must have raised a presumption that defendant was short in his accounts, in the absence of an objection on such ground at the trial.

8. Where a defense to a prosecution for embezzlement was insanity at the time of the offense, caused by long-continued overindulgence in intoxicating liquors, and there was evidence tending to support it, an instruction that settled insanity, produced by such use of liquor, affected responsibility in the same way as insanity produced by any other cause, but that it must be settled insanity, and not a mere temporary condition, was not improper as misleading and inapplicable to the evidence.

9. An instruction that, when temporary or spasmodic insanity was proved to have existed prior to the commission of a criminal act, there was no presumption of its continuance to the specific time of such act, was proper.

10. Where the rule as to the degree of proof required in criminal cases and the doctrine of reasonable doubt were fully stated and explained in instructions in a prosecution for embezzlement, a requested instruction that the jury had a right to consider that innocent men had been convicted, and the danger of convicting innocent men, was properly refused.

11. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 657, providing that, when any of the jurors have been induced to assent to any verdict or finding by a resort to a determination by chance, such misconduct may be proved by the affidavit of any of the jurors, the misconduct of a juror, in a prosecution for embezzlement, other than a resort to chance, could not be proved by the affidavits of jurors.

12. The alleged misconduct of jurors in a prosecution for embezzlement could not be proved by hearsay statements of jurors regarding such misconduct.

13. The alleged misconduct of jurors in a prosecution for embezzlement could not be proved by defendant's affidavits, founded on information and belief.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Luis Obispo county; E. P. Unangst, Judge.

Samuel M. Findley was convicted of embezzlement, and he appeals. Affirmed.

C. A. Palmer and E. M. Emmert, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Ford, for the People.

GRAY, C. The defendant was convicted of embezzling $8,000, public money in his hands as tax collector of San Luis Obispo county, and sentenced to eight years in the state prison. He appeals from the judgment of conviction. We will consider the points urged for reversal in the order in which they appear in appellant's brief.

1. When this case was called for trial, defendant's attorney, pursuant to the provisions of section 170, Code Civ. Proc., moved the court to secure the services of some judge other than the regular judge of the court to preside at the trial and in the subsequent proceedings. The affidavit of the defendant was filed, and read in support of this motion. The affidavit of the district attorney in rebuttal was also filed, and read on the motion. The court denied the motion. In his affidavit defendant alleges five acts of the judge of the trial court as tending to show his prejudice against defendant. These acts are as follows: (1) The said judge, in December 1897, advocated the candidacy of his brother-in-law for tax collector, as against defendant's candidacy for the same office, before the board of supervisors, and defendant received the appointment, much to the displeasure of said judge. (2) That said judge had consented to a reduction of defendant's bail from $10,000 to $6,000, and then withdrew said concession without assigning any reason therefor. (3) That after a former trial of this case, and a disagreement of the jury, the Evening Breeze, a newspaper of San Luis Obispo, published an editorial criticising and deriding the defendant and the disagreeing jury, and intended to prejudice the public mind against defendant. Defendant says he verily believes that a bias exists in the mind of said judge against defendant, or otherwise the proprietor, editor, or manager of said paper would have been cited to show cause why he should not be punished for contempt. (4) That at a former trial of the case, after defendant's counsel had made his opening statement to the jury, said judge, "in an audible voice, and within hearing of the jury, said substantially that he had never had any doubt as to the sanity of the defendant, to which remark defendant's counsel then and there duly excepted." (5) That prior to the first trial said judge, at request of the prosecution, issued a foreign subpoena for one John C. Fraser, and, notwithstanding the failure of service in this state on said Fraser, he was served in Denver, Colo., and attended as a witness; and said judge illegally ordered a warrant drawn on the county treasurer in Fraser's favor for $184.45 in payment of his traveling expenses from Denver, Colo., to San Luis Obispo and return. That defendant requested a foreign subpoena for one Berry, the auditor of the Fidelity & Deposit Company, a material witness for defendant, and said judge refused the order.

It is not sufficient, in a case of this kind, to allege in the affidavit simply that the defendant "believes that he cannot have a fair and impartial trial," etc., but it must be made to appear by the affidavit or affidavits on file that a fair trial cannot be had before the judge about to try the case by reason of the bias and prejudice of such judge. Section 170, subd. 4, Code Civ. Proc. The affidavit or affidavits must not only state facts, but the facts stated must establish to the satisfaction of a reasonable mind that the judge has a bias or prejudice that will in all probability prevent him from dealing fairly with the defendant. We are unwilling to think that a trial judge would be prejudiced, within the meaning of the statute cited, against one on trial before him, on account of his successful candidacy for office against a relative of such judge.

The withdrawal of the consent to reduce bail without giving any reason therefor simply amounted to a refusal to reduce the bail. We cannot say that the bail was excessive, under all the circumstances of the case; and on the question under consideration no importance can be attached to the action of the court in this regard.

Insanity being set up as a defense, if the judge had wantonly and without any occasion for it announced in the presence of the jury that he had never had any doubt as to defendant's sanity, this might indicate that he was not disposed to give the defendant a fair trial. But the affidavit does not give us the full proceedings in reference to this matter. It does not state what was said by defendant's counsel in his opening statement or elsewhere to call forth any remark from the court as to the sanity of defendant. The exact language of court and counsel was undoubtedly taken down by the court reporter at the time, and this, or its substance, should have been presented at the hearing of the motion. In the absence of a showing to that effect, it will not be presumed that the court made the remark without any call for it. The only proper occasion, that occurs to us, that the court would have to announce that he never had any doubt as to defendant's sanity, would be in response to a suggestion on the part of defendant's attorney that his client was then insane, and a demand that the question of his then present sanity be tried before a jury called specially for that purpose in accordance with the provisions of section 1368 of the Penal Code. It would be no evidence of prejudice in the judge for him to declare, in response to a demand of this nature, that he had no doubt as to the sanity of defendant; and, if counsel desired that the declaration should not be made in the presence of the jury, he should not call for the ruling in their presence, but should request the court to direct them to retire.

As to the denial of a foreign subpoena, there is nothing in defendant's affidavit to show that he ever filed with the judge an affidavit, or took the requisite steps to entitle him to a foreign subpoena. Pen. Code, § 1330. A mere request was not sufficient to entitle the defendant to a foreign subpoena.

The other allegations of defendant's affidavit are not of sufficient importance to require special notice. We deem it sufficient under this head to say in conclusion that the statute (section 170, Code Civ. Proc.)

leaves the hearing upon a motion of this kind to the judge in whose court it is made, and consequently his decision on the questions of fact before him should be treated the same as the decision of a court on any other question of fact, and we can interfere with it on appeal only when it is plainly contrary to the evidence. After a careful consideration of the affidavits used on the hearing, we cannot say that the trial court was not warranted in denying the motion. Higgins v. City of San Diego, 126 Cal. 303, 58 Pac. 700, 59 Pac. 209 (at page 312, 126 Cal., and page 703, 58 Pac.).

2. It appears that the Fidelity & Deposit Company of Maryland was surety on defendant's official bond as tax collector, and at the trial the prosecution introduced evidence in the way of checks and the indorsements thereon to show that said surety had paid to the county $8,246.50, presumably on account of defendant's defalcation. The defendant objected to these checks as evidence on the ground that they were "incompetent, immaterial, and irrelevant for any purpose in the case." The prosecuting attorney said, "We will show its connection." The overruling of the objection is assigned as error. It appears subsequently in the trial that the expert accountants who figured out the the shortage in the tax collector's office found and testified that there was a shortage of $3,040.49 after crediting the $8,246.50 which was paid into the county treasury by the bond company. The defendant having been indicted for embezzling $8,000, to prove the crime as charged it was proper to show how this item of $8,246.50 got into the treasury, and that it was not paid in by the defendant. For this purpose, at least, the evidence objected to was pertinent and proper. But the defendant now urges that this evidence of transactions between third parties could not bind the defendant; and its admission must have raised a presumption in the minds of the jury that, because this money was paid in by the bond company, therefore the defendant was short in his accounts with the county. At the trial no objection of this nature was made. If such an objection had been made, it would have been in order for the court to limit the admission of the evidence to its legitimate purpose, and, in the absence of any request that it be in any way limited, on appeal the defendant cannot be heard to complain that it was not limited. The other exceptions of appellant to the rulings of the court in receiving and rejecting evidence are without merit, and are not of a nature to require further discussion.

3. The theory of the defense seems to have been that defendant was insane at the date of his alleged offense, November 18, 1898, and that such insanity was due, in part, at least, to a long-continued overindulgence in intoxicating liquors. Defendant's wife testified as follows: "During October and November, 1898, he would often bring home a quart of liquor daily for days at a time, and he would frequently use a quart in one day. During July, 1898, he drank some liquor, but not so bad as in August; and in August, 1898, he drank less liquor than in October and November. After October 1, 1898, I do not think he was ever sober. Before he went away he had acted very strangely several days. His talk was silly, and he seemed to be in great mental distress. I was afraid he would carry out threats of suicide if not watched carefully." There was much other testimony given on behalf of defendant as to his drinking habits for many years before the date of the alleged crime, as well as immediately prior to said date. In this condition of the evidence the court instructed the jury as follows: "Settled insanity produced by a long-continued intoxication affects responsibility in the same way as insanity produced by any other cause. But it must be settled insanity, and not merely a temporary mental condition, produced by recent use of intoxicating liquor." "When temporary or spasmodic insanity is proved to have existed prior to the commission of a criminal act, there is no presumption of its continuance down to the specific time of the criminal act. To establish the basis of a presumption that insanity, once shown to have existed, continues to exist, it must appear to have been of such duration and character as to indicate the probability of its continuance, and not simply the possibility or even probability of its recurrence." The contention of defendant that these instructions were misleading, confusing, and inapplicable to any evidence in the case cannot be upheld. The first instruction quoted is copied from the opinion of the court in People v. Travers, 88 Cal., at page 239, 26 Pac. 91, and in speaking of it further in said opinion the court expressly approves of it as an instruction when there is evidence to which it will apply. In the case at bar it applies to the evidence already quoted. The second instruction quoted is equally free from error. The last sentence of it is quoted from People v. Schmitt, 106 Cal. 48, 39 Pac. 204 (at page 54, 106 Cal., and page 206, 39 Pac.), wherein the principle set forth in the instruction is clearly approved. The instruction is also applicable to the facts presented in evidence on behalf of defendant.

It was proper for the court to give the instruction as to the law making it the duty of the tax collector to settle with the auditor on the first Monday of each month for all moneys collected, and to pay the same to the county treasurer. This instruction did not stand alone, but was accompanied by other instructions, one of which was to the effect that a felonious intent was a necessary element of the crime of embezzlement.

The rules as to the degree of proof required in criminal cases were fully stated in the instructions, and the doctrine of "reasonable doubt" was fully elucidated to the jury. It was not necessary, therefore, that the court should give to the jury defendant's requested instruction No. 23, which reads as follows: "In weighing the evidence to determine whether there is a reasonable doubt as to the defendant's guilt, you have the right to consider that innocent men have been convicted, and to consider the danger of convicting innocent men." Besides, the instruction contains matter more appropriate to the argument of counsel than to the instructions of the court.

4. It is the settled law of this state that the verdict of a jury cannot be impeached by the affidavits of jurors showing misconduct on the part of any member of the jury, except where the verdict is reached "by a resort to the determination of chance." Section 657, Code Civ. Proc. Nor can a verdict be impeached by the hearsay statements of jurors regarding such misconduct. People v. Azoff, 105 Cal. 632, 39 Pac. 59. It is equally clear that defendant's affidavit as to the misconduct of the jury, based, as it is, solely on information and belief, is entitled to no weight. There was no competent or proper evidence of misconduct of the jury laid before the court, and the court very properly refused to grant a new trial. The judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: COOPER, C.; HAYNES, C.

BOWERS' CALIFORNIA DREDGING CO.
v. SAN FRANCISCO BRIDGE CO.
(S. F. 1,722-1,724, 2,888-2,291.)

CONTRACTS—CONDITIONS PRECEDENT—PLEADINGS—EVIDENCE—JUDGMENT—APPEAL—PRESUMPTIONS.

1. Where a complaint alleges a written contract with defendant containing certain specified conditions, plaintiff's performance of the conditions and defendant's default, the written agreement is admissible in evidence, though it contain conditions not alleged, but not inconsistent with the allegations, over defendant's objection that it is not in accordance with the complaint, and at variance therewith, since such additional conditions do not constitute a variance, but should be disregarded.

2. Where the contract recites that plaintiff is the owner of the right to use a certain patent for dredging machines, and "hereby grants" an exclusive license to defendant to use such patents in certain government work if defendant obtains the contract, for a certain consideration, which defendant agreed to pay, in a suit to recover such consideration after defendant had performed the work, using such machines, plaintiff need not prove that it owned the patents, since the acceptance of the grant by defendant was an admission of plaintiff's title and right to make the grant, and, if defendant claimed that nothing passed thereby, it must establish that fact.

3. Where plaintiff, in consideration of certain payments, promised by defendant, granted to defendant licenses to use certain patents in the prosecution of certain dredging for the government, and also the right to use a dredging machine of which plaintiff was half owner, if defendant obtained the consent of the other joint owner the obtaining such consent by defendant and use of such machine were not conditions precedent to plaintiff's right to recover such payments.

4. Where an issue was tried before the court, and findings were waived, and there was no bill of exceptions, it must be assumed on appeal that the evidence was sufficient to sustain the judgment.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by Bowers' California Dredging Company against the San Francisco Bridge Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

R. Percy Wright, for appellant. Albert C. Aiken, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The parties hereto entered into a written agreement July 21, 1897, wherein, after reciting, among other matters, that the plaintiff was the owner of the right to use certain patents in the state of California, and was also the owner of a one-half interest in a dredging machine, the defendant agreed that, if it should secure from the United States government a certain contract for dredging at Mare Island, or if its dredging machine should be used on said work, it would pay to the plaintiff 7 per cent. of the total gross amount paid by the government for the work on said contract, said payments to be made monthly within five days after the defendant should receive its monthly estimates on account of said contract. Immediately following the above agreement on the part of the defendant was the following: "In consideration of said agreement to pay the amount and in the manner above specified, and the further consideration of one dollar to it in hand paid, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, the party of the second part hereby grants an exclusive license to the party of the first part to use the aforesaid patents, or any or all of them, on said dredging, and further agrees to give to it the free use on said contract of its one-half interest in the certain Von Schmidt dredging machine hereinbefore mentioned, until the completion of said contract, provided the other half can be obtained from A. W. Von Schmidt; it being understood that the party of the first part, if it desires to use said Von Schmidt machine, must, at its own expense, arrange for the use of the other one-half interest of said dredger with A. W. Von Schmidt." The defendant thereafter obtained from the government the dredging contract referred to in the agreement, and performed the dredging required thereby, and employed on said work the dredging machine referred to in said agreement, and received from the government monthly payments on account of said contract, but did not pay to the plaintiff any of the sums agreed by it to be paid. The plaintiff has brought the present actions for the recovery of these several monthly payments. Judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendant has appealed.

In the appeals numbered as above, 1722, 1723, and 1724, the complaints alleged the execution of the contract between the parties; that the defendant had obtained the contract from the government; that it had received certain amounts from the government for the work done under the contract, and had not paid any part thereof to the plaintiff. The defendant answered the complaint, and denied therein that the government had paid it any sum of money whatever, and the cause was tried upon this issue. At the trial the plaintiff offered the written agreement in evidence, to which the defendant objected upon the ground that it is not in accordance with the allegations of the complaint, and is at variance with the contract therein alleged, and on the further ground that it was irrelevant, immaterial, and incompetent. The court overruled the objection, and admitted the instrument in evidence, and the defendant excepted thereto. The plaintiff also offered evidence in support of its allegation that the government had made the payments to the defendant, and rested. The defendant then moved for a nonsuit upon the grounds that there was no evidence that the plaintiff had ever fulfilled the conditions of the contract alleged in the complaint; nor any evidence that it had ever granted to the defendant a license for the use of any patent; nor any evidence that it ever owned any patent, or any interest therein, or ever had any authority to grant a license for its use. The motion for a nonsuit was denied. No evidence was offered by the defendant, and the case was submitted to the jury, who rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff. From the judgment entered thereon, and from an order denying a new trial, the defendant has appealed.

1. The agreement between the parties was properly admitted in evidence. Although it contained matters which were not included in the complaint, it contained evidence both relevant and material in support of the allegations therein. To the extent that it tended to establish these allegations, there was no variance. No objection was made by the defendant on the ground that it contained other matters than those which were relevant to the allegations in the complaint. If the defendant had desired to exclude them from consideration, he should have so requested when the instrument was offered in evidence, and the court would have limited it accordingly. It does not appear that they were in any respect considered by the jury.

2. The agreement does not contain any condition precedent to be performed by the plaintiff before it became entitled to receive the money which the defendant agreed to pay to it. By its terms the plaintiff "hereby grants an exclusive license to the defendant to use the patents referred to." This was a present grant, and was made in consideration of the previous agreement on the part of the defendant, and was in no respect executory, but became effective at the execution of the instrument. It cannot be held that the grant thus made was ineffective merely because the parties had recited in a previous part of the agreement that the plaintiff was the owner of the right to use the patents. Such recital was not inconsistent with its right to grant a license for such use to another, and there is no presumption that the plaintiff did not have such right. The acceptance of the grant from the plaintiff was an admission by the defendant of the plaintiff's title and right to make the grant. If it would claim that nothing passed thereby, it was incumbent upon it to establish that fact by competent evidence. Neither was the agreement by the plaintiff to give to the defendant the free use of its interest in the Von Schmidt dredging machine a condition precedent to the right to receive the percentage. This was an executory covenant on the part of the plaintiff, and its performance was conditioned upon the defendant obtaining from Von Schmidt the right to use the machine. The plaintiff would not be in default upon this covenant except it should fail to comply therewith after the defendant had obtained Von Schmidt's consent. The defendant could not put the plaintiff in default until this preliminary condition on its part had been performed, and such performance must be affirmatively shown by it. As the performance of this covenant on the part of the plaintiff was not a condition precedent, a failure to perform it might give to the defendant a cause of action, but would not prevent the plaintiff from enforcing its claim against the defendant.

3. In the appeals numbered as above, 2288, 2289, 2290, and 2291, the agreement is set forth at length in the complaints, and its sufficiency is raised by demurrer thereto, upon the ground that no cause of action is stated; but under the construction given above to the terms of the agreement it must be held that a cause of action in favor of the plaintiff is sufficiently stated. In its answers in these cases the defendant denied that the plaintiff had granted to it any license to use the patents. The issues thus presented were tried before the court, and judgments rendered in favor of the plaintiff. Findings were waived, and there is no bill of exceptions in the record. In the absence of the evidence which was offered at the trial, it must be assumed that it was sufficient to sustain the judgments. The judgments and the orders denying a new trial are affirmed.

EMINENT DOMAIN—CONDEMNATION OF PROPERTY—FINAL ORDER—APPEAL—STAY.

1. A final order for the condemnation of land, made after an alleged payment of damages awarded therefor, is a special order after a final judgment, from which an appeal may be taken under Code Civ. Proc. § 939, subd. 3.

2. The giving of a bond on an appeal, under Code Civ. Proc. § 941, from a final order for the condemnation of land, made after an alleged payment of damages therefor, stops all proceedings thereunder till the appeal is determined.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Lucien Shaw, Judge.

Proceedings by the city of Los Angeles against A. E. Pomeroy and another for the condemnation of property. From a final order of condemnation, defendants appeal. Application by defendants for a stay of proceedings pending the appeal. Stay granted.

R. H. F. Variel, John Garber, John G. North, and J. S. Chapman, for appellants. W. B. Matthews and Lee & Scott, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. The plaintiff brought this action to condemn the lands described in the complaint for the purpose of constructing head works for its domestic water supply. Such proceedings were had that a judgment of condemnation was made and entered in April, 1896, in favor of plaintiff, and awarding defendants the sum of $25,000 as damages for the land. Upon appeal this judgment was affirmed by this court. 124 Cal. 597, 57 Pac. 585. Upon the remittitur being sent to the court below, plaintiff made a motion for a final order of condemnation, alleging that the damages and costs awarded to defendants had been fully paid. This motion was supported by affidavits on behalf of plaintiff. Defendants opposed the motion, claiming that the amount of damages had not been paid. At the same time, defendants asked leave to file affidavits in opposition to the motion, and to be permitted to file a motion to set aside the judgment and decree that had been entered. The court refused to hear defendants' motion, or to receive or hear the affidavits in opposition to plaintiff's motion. Thereupon, on the 12th day of July, 1899, the court made an order that a final order of condemnation be entered as prayed for, and as provided in Code Civ. Proc. § 1253, which order was accordingly entered. This was a special order made after final judgment. California S. R. Co. v. Southern Pac. R. Co., 67 Cal. 63, 7 Pac. 123. It was appealable. Code Civ. Proc. § 939, subd. 3. Within due time defendants appealed to this court from the said order, and gave an undertaking in due form in the sum of $300, which appeal is now pending.

The defendants claim that the court erred in making the final order without allowing them to offer evidence as to the fact of the damages not having been paid, and they claim that the judge was disqualified, and therefore had no authority to make the order. As these matters go to the merits of the appeal, they need not be here discussed.

This is an application for a writ of superseas. The undertaking mentioned in section 941, Code Civ. Proc., stays all proceedings in the court below upon the order appealed from, except in those cases specified in sections 942-945, 949. The order appealed from is not one of the cases mentioned in either of said sections. The undertaking, therefore, stayed all proceedings. Code Civ. Proc. § 946; In re Woods' Estate, 94 Cal. 567, 29 Pac. 1108; Root v. Bryant, 54 Cal. 183.

The motion for a stay of proceedings is granted, and the plaintiff is restrained from using the lands described in the complaint, and constructing head works for its water system thereon, pending this appeal, and until the final termination thereof.

PEOPLE v. COL. (S. F. 2,657.)¹

ELECTIONS—COUNTY OFFICES—VACANCIES—APPOINTMENT TO FILL—UNEXPIRED TERM—NEXT GENERAL ELECTION—GUBERNATORIAL ELECTION—ELECTION AT IMPROPER TIME.

1. Acts 1897 (St. 1897, p. 474) § 58, provides that all elective county officers shall be elected at the general election at which the governor is elected, and shall take office in January next succeeding their election. Section 25, subd. 19, authorizes the board of supervisors to fill by appointment all vacancies that may occur in any elective county office; the appointee to hold office for the unexpired term, or until the next general election. Held, that the words "next general election" mean the next general election for the particular office so filled by appointment, and one appointed by the board of supervisors to fill a vacancy in the office of county auditor is entitled to that office till the next gubernatorial election.

2. Under Acts 1897 (St. 1897, p. 474) § 58, declaring that all elective county officers shall be elected at the time of the gubernatorial election, an election of a person at another time to fill the office of county auditor for the unexpired term of a former auditor was void, in the absence of other statutory provision for the election of county officers, and could not oust one regularly appointed to fill such vacancy.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; A. L. Rhodes, Judge.

Action by the people of the state of California, on the complaint of Martin Murphy, against Al. G. Col. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

S. F. Leib, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Ford and D. W. Burchard, for respondent.

auditor of Santa Clara county. At the general election held in November, 1898, one Veuve was elected county auditor of Santa Clara county for the ensuing term. On August 6, 1900, Veuve having died, and the office being vacant, the defendant was duly appointed by the board of supervisors to fill such vacancy, and qualified and entered upon the discharge of his duties. On October 22, 1900, the said board made an order and issued a proclamation that at the election to be held in November, 1900, an auditor of said county be elected to fill the unexpired term of Veuve. At the November election in 1900 the relator received a majority of all the votes cast for said office, and the question as to whether or not he is now county auditor of said county depends upon the questions as to whether there was a vacancy in the office at the time of his election, and whether the election was authorized by law. The principal, if not the only, question that need be discussed is as to whether the term of defendant under his appointment expired at the November election, 1900. It is provided in the county government act of 1897 (St. 1897, p. 474, § 58) that all elective county officers (with certain exceptions) "shall be elected at the general election at which the governor is elected, and shall take office at twelve o'clock meridian on the first Monday after the first day of January next succeeding their election. All officers elected under the provisions of this act shall hold office until their successors are elected or appointed and qualified." The official term of Veuve, if he had lived, would therefore not have expired until the first Monday after the first day of January, 1903. His successor would have been elected at the "general election at which the governor is elected" in November, 1902. When the vacancy occurred the board of supervisors had the power to appoint defendant to fill it; and the question is as to the term of the defendant after having been so appointed. The said county government act provides, in subdivision 19 of section 25, that the board shall have power "to fill, by appointment, all vacancies that may occur in any office filled by the appointment of the board of supervisors and elective county or township officers, except in those of judge of the superior court and supervisor, the appointee to hold office for the unexpired term or until the next general election." Id. p. 463. What is meant by "the next general election"? The section specifies the unexpired term or the next general election as the extent of time to which the appointee shall hold. If the sentence had omitted the words "or until the next general election," it would be plain as to its intent. It is provided in section 17 of the same act that, when the governor appoints a member of the board of supervisors to fill a vacancy, "in such case the election of a supervisor shall be held at the next general election to fill the vacancy for the unexpired term." The constitution provides that, in case a vacancy occurs in the office of superior judge, the governor shall appoint the appointee to hold until the election and qualification of a judge to fill the vacancy, "which election shall take place at the next succeeding general election, and the judge so elected shall hold office for the remainder of the unexpired term."

The meaning of the county government act, as to filling the office of supervisor for the unexpired term by election, and of the constitution, as to filling the office of judge of a superior court for the unexpired term by election, is plain. The county government act of 1883 and the county government act of 1893 each provided that, in case of vacancies in county offices filled by appointment by the board of supervisors, the appointee "shall hold for the unexpired term." We think the phrase "next general election," used in subdivision 19, § 25, refers to the general election for filling the particular office to which the person is appointed, or, in other words, to the general election provided for as to all the county officers in section 58. This was plainly the intent of the legislature, for in the very same act express provision is made in section 17 for filling the unexpired term of a supervisor by election at the next general election. There is no provision in the act for filling the unexpired term of any other county officer by election. We cannot believe that, if the legislature had intended to provide for filling the unexpired term of all county officers at the next general election, it would have made express provision for such election as to supervisors, and not as to any other county officer. Section 58 says, "All elective county and township officers, and city justices of the peace, except otherwise provided for in this act, shall be elected at the general election at which the governor is elected." The auditor of Santa Clara is an elective county officer. There is no other provision in the act for the election of such county officer. The logical conclusion would be that, when the words "until the next general election" were used, reference was made to the general election referred to and provided for in section 58. It is claimed that the construction herein given leaves the words "for the unexpired term" without meaning. If "the unexpired term" and "the next general election" refer to precisely the same period of time, it was not necessary to use both expressions. But there may arise cases in which the unexpired term would not mean until the next general election. In cases where the board of supervisors have the sole right to fill an office by appointment, such as county physician or game warden, in case of vacancy the appointee might hold until the expiration of the term only. So after a general election for county officers in November the newly-elected officers do not take office until the first Monday after the 1st day of January following. A vacancy might occur after the election, and before the beginning of the term of the newly-elected official. In such case the appointee would only hold for the unexpired term.

We think the case of People v. Budd, 114 Cal. 170, 45 Pac. 1060, 34 L.R. A. 46, is directly in point, and conclusive of this case. There the elected lieutenant governor, Millard, died soon after his election, and the governor appointed William T. Jeter to fill the vacancy. It was sought, by writ of mandate, to compel the governor to include in his election proclamation for the coming election of 1896 the office of lieutenant governor for the unexpired term of Millard. The provision of the constitution as to the commission of the governor in filling the vacancy by appointment states that the commission "shall expire at the end of the next legislature, or at the next election by the people." In the opinion it is said: "An office has become vacant, and there is no other mode provided by the constitution or laws to fill it. 'The next election by the people' does not mean the next general election, or the next election held by the people, but it must mean that the appointee shall hold until some one has been elected to fill that office. * * * If, however, the phrase 'the next election by the people' is equivalent to the phrase 'the next election,' and we assume that it was intended thereby to indicate the election at which such vacancy would be filled, we would feel compelled to hold that the next election is that which the constitution has provided for filling that particular office; that is, the next gubernatorial election." The above decision was rendered prior to the election of the legislature that prepared the county government act of 1897. We must presume that the legislature and its judiciary committee knew of the interpretation given by this court to the phrase "the next election by the people" when they used the words "until the next general election." The same legislature had provided for the time of holding the general election for all county officers. Where it used the phrase "until the next general election," it meant the next general election for county officers for which it had made provision. The construction in People v. Budd and that herein given is in accord with the rule in other jurisdictions. In People v. Wilson, 72 N. C. 157, the governor had appointed to fill a vacancy in the office of judge of the Eighth judicial district. The language of the constitution of the state provided that in case of such appointment "the appointees shall hold their places until the next regular election." The supreme court, after a careful consideration of the question, said that the meaning was, "The appointees shall hold their places until the next regular election for the office in which a vacancy has occurred." In State v. Philips, 30 Fla. 590, 11 South. 922, in which the title to a municipal office was involved, the charter provided that the city council might appoint to fill all vacancies "until the next regular election." The court, in construing the phrase, said: "When it is declared that the city council shall fill vacancies until the next regular election, it means until the next regular election provided by the charter for electing the officer whose term has become vacant." In Matthews v. Commissioners, 34 Kan. 607, 9 Pac. 765, the governor had appointed one Webb as judge of the superior court. The constitution of the state provided that in case of such appointment the appointee shall hold "until the next regular election that shall occur more than thirty days after such vacancy shall have happened." The court in the opinion said: "In the case of State v. Cobb, 2 Kan. 32, 54, 55, it is held that the exact literal signification of the phrase 'next regular election' is the next election held conformable to established rule or law, and that the next regular election is the one next occurring at which the particular class of judicial officers is to be chosen. These definitions we think correct." To the same effect are State v. Gardner, 3 S. D. 553, 54 N. W. 606; State v. Cobb, 2 Kan. 32. The case of People v. Babcock, 123 Cal. 308, 55 Pac. 1017, is not in conflict with what has been said. In that case section 14 of the consolidation act contained the clause, "In case of a vacancy in the office of superintendent, the board of education may appoint a person to fill the vacancy until the regular election then next following when the office shall be filled by election of the people." St. 1863, p. 605. In construing the above clause this court correctly held that it was not in the contemplation of the legislative mind that the appointee of the board of education should hold for the remainder of the unexpired term after a general election.

The judgment in this case must be reversed for another reason. There is no provision, other than in section 58, for electing a county auditor. The election was not the election at which the governor was elected. If the office of defendant expired at the general election held in November, 1900, that did not, in the absence of other authority, authorize an election to fill the office. People v. Budd, supra; Same v. Mathewson, 47 Cal. 446; Sawyer v. Haydon, 1 Nev. 75. It follows that the judgment should be reversed, and the court below directed to enter judgment upon the findings in favor of defendant, and that he is rightfully entitled to the office of auditor, and is the auditor of Santa Clara county.

PUCKHABER et ux. v. SOUTHERN PAC. CO. (Sac. 633.)¹

(Supreme Court of California. April 2, 1901.)

RAILROADS—ACCIDENT ON TRACK—NEGLIGENCE OF COMPANY—PROXIMATE CAUSE—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—PRESUMPTIONS.

The mutilated body of plaintiff's intestate, who was a stranger in the village in which he was killed, was found on a side track in defendant's yard, near the body of another stranger, on a certain morning, and it was shown that an engine of defendant had backed over such track, without a light on the tender, at about 5 o'clock on the same morning. There were no eyewitnesses of the accident. Held not sufficient to show that defendant's negligence was the proximate cause of the death of deceased.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Placer county; J. E. Prewitt, Judge.

Action by Herman F. Puckhaber and another against the Southern Pacific Company for the negligent killing of plaintiffs' son. From a judgment in favor of the plaintiffs, the defendant appeals. Reversed.

John M. Fulweiler and Foshay Walker, for appellant. Henley & Costello and Pullen & Wallace, for respondents.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an action for damages by the parents, based upon the death of a son, alleged to have been caused by the negligence of defendant. The facts of the case are of the most meager character. Upon a dark and foggy morning, about half-past 5 o'clock, the mutilated dead body of this young man, a total stranger in the village, was found lying upon a side track in the railroad yards of defendant, at Rocklin. His body was discovered near the dead body of another man, also a stranger to the village. There were no witnesses to any accident. It is claimed by plaintiffs that deceased was killed by a backing engine and tender, which passed over the particular spot to the roundhouse about 5 o'clock of the same morning. The negligence of defendant is then claimed to be established by showing that the tender of this engine had no light upon the rear end thereof. It thus appears that the case in its facts is the merest skeleton; and inference, presumption, and conjecture necessarily play a prominent part in the search for evidence sufficient to support the verdict for plaintiffs.

For present purposes, it will be conceded that the aforesaid engine and tender in backing to the roundhouse caused the death of deceased. It will be further conceded that defendant was guilty of negligence in backing this engine and tender to the roundhouse without a light upon the rear end thereof. Yet, after making these concessions, the case is still too weak to support a verdict and judgment. This is so, for the reason that there is a total lack of evidence showing any causal connection between the absence of a light upon the tender and the death of the deceased. It is a basic element in every right of recovery that a defendant's negligence must contribute to the injury,—must be the approximate cause of the injury. By proving defendant's negligence, without in some way fastening that negligence to the injury, a case is not made out. This is true, even though it be assumed that the law of this state is to the effect that in the absence of evidence upon the subject it will not be presumed that deceased was guilty of negligence; for, conceding negligence of defendant in the abstract was shown, and no negligence upon the part of deceased was shown, still a case may have arisen of damnum absque injuria. If the negligence of defendant in omitting to carry a light be simply abstract negligence,—that is, negligence having no relation whatever to the injury done,—then such negligence is a matter foreign to any issue in the case. And unless the negligence is connected with the injury the case stands exactly as if no negligence had been proven. Plaintiffs insist that the jury had a legal right to infer as a fact that the absence of the light upon the tender was the cause of the death. While, as before suggested, it may not be presumed against deceased that he became drunken and slept upon the track, or deliberately stood upon the track in front of the backing engine, the laws of self-preservation denying any inference of such conduct upon his part, still, as is said in some of the cases, the deceased may have fallen insensible upon the track in a fit, and thus have been killed without fault upon his part, and under such circumstances that the absence of the light in no way tended to his death. Tested by this illustration, a dozen lights upon the tender would not have saved his life. Neither do we consider the fact that another man was killed at the same time sufficient evidence to create a presumption that the want of the light upon the tender was the approximate cause of death. To this point it may be said there is not a scintilla of evidence that the other man was possessed of a single one of the five senses. It follows, therefore, that there is an absolute dearth of evidence to the point that the absence of the light upon the tender added the weight of a hair to the cause which occasioned the young man's death. No inference of fact justified by the law declares that the want of a light had any connection with the cause of death. It would be a guess pure and simple upon the part of the jury to so find as a fact, and a verdict and judgment cannot rest upon a foundation created upon a guess. It is as necessary for the plaintiffs to show that defendant's negligence caused the injury as it is for them to show that defendant was guilty of negligence or that the party was injured.

While there appears to be no authority in this state upon the question just discussed, we find authority elsewhere directly to the point. In Welsh v. Railway Co., 181 Pa. 461, 37 Atl. 513, in discussing this principle, the court said: "Assuming, then, as to the general public, that the company was negligent in not operating the gates at night, or in not maintaining a flagman at night, or in not keeping a sufficient light, this negligence must be so connected with the injury to deceased as to afford a presumption that the negligence caused the injury. But how can we presume the negligence caused the injury when there is no necessary connection between the alleged negligence and the injury? * * * In this case the jury were permitted to presume negligence on the part of defendant, then to presume that deceased was lawfully on the railroad track, and then to still further presume that defendant's negligence caused his death. The plaintiff was bound, not only to prove negligence as to the general public using the crossing, but to go further, and show that this negligence was the proximate cause of a particular individual's death, or, as in this case, of Welsh's death. A presumption must be based on a fact or facts, not on a presumption." In Railroad Co. v. Schertle, 97 Pa. 450, it is said: "There was not a particle of proof that either the track or step had anything to do with his death. For aught that appears, he may have fallen in a fit, or for some cause wholly disconnected from either. The case was submitted to the jury without evidence, and the verdict has no better foundation than a guess." In Stringert v. Ross Tp. (Pa. Sup.) 36 Atl. 345, we find the court using the following language: "But, in order to recover, it must be further shown that the negligence of the defendant in this regard was the producing cause of the death. If, taking all the facts together, a justifiable inference could be drawn that the negligent condition of the road was the cause of the death, then there was enough to carry the case to the jury. * * * Now, if all these things had been proven by testimony, there would have been sufficient evidence to carry the case to the jury, because a verdict could then be founded upon proof, and not upon mere inference. But there was no testimony upon any of these subjects, and the question then arises whether the inference that the death was caused by the negligence of the defendant is the only inference that can be drawn from the facts that are in evidence. If it is not, and other inferences may be drawn from the same facts, then there is nothing for the jury but mere guesses or conjectures, and upon these no verdict can be founded."

Section 1835 of the Code of Civil Procedure declares: "That evidence is deemed satisfactory which ordinarily produces moral certainty or conviction in an unprejudiced mind. Such evidence alone will justify a verdict. Evidence less than this is denominated slight evidence." The evidence in this case upon the point under discussion falls far short of filling the measure furnished by this section of the Code. Here there is not even slight evidence that the absence of the light to any degree contributed to the death of deceased. For a jury to so declare could only be done by the indulgence of the merest conjecture. It would be a guess upon the part of the jurors, and would not rise to the dignity of an inference.

In arriving at the conclusion declared, the court has considered but one branch of the evidence; the remaining branches of it, going to establish other elements of the case, are afflicted with almost the same degree of weakness. The only theory advanced by plaintiffs in their brief as to the circumstances surrounding the death, is as follows: "The only rational explanation of the simultaneous killing of these two men is that this monster engine of death, bearing no light and giving no warning of its approach, suddenly came down upon them in the darkness, and ground them into fragments, while they were on their way to become passengers on the train of defendant then preparing to move out of the depot." It may be suggested that we find no word of evidence in the record indicating, directly or indirectly, that these two men contemplated being passengers on defendant's train. For the foregoing reasons, the judgment and order are reversed.

HOMICIDE—INSANITY—DELIRIUM TREMENS—INSTRUCTIONS—EVIDENCE OF DRUNKENNESS—ADMISSIBILITY—DEGREE OF INSANITY—HARMLESS ERROR.

1. Pen. Code, § 26, subd. 5, providing that persons committing a crime without being conscious thereof shall not be responsible, applies to cases of somnambulism and the like, and not to a defense, in a trial for murder, of insanity induced by delirium tremens.

2. A charge that an insane person was incapable of committing crime, and that if the jury were satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that defendant, when he killed deceased, was either a lunatic or an insane person, he should be acquitted, was properly modified by eliminating the words, "beyond a reasonable doubt."

3. Where defendant, who was charged with murder, pleaded insanity as a defense, it was proper, in a charge respecting the responsibility of insane persons, to insert after the words "insane persons" the words "as 'insanity' is defined in these instructions."

4. A charge that the plea of insanity is sometimes resorted to where aggravated crimes have been committed under circumstances which render hopeless all other means of evading punishment, and while such proof, when satisfactorily established, should be viewed as a full and complete defense, yet it should be examined into with great care, while not prejudicial to defendant, is purely abstract, and should not have been given.

5. Where there was no evidence that defendant was drunk when he committed the murder, an instruction as to the effect of drunkenness, while unnecessary, was not prejudicial to defendant.

6. Under Pen. Code, § 22, providing that no act committed by a person while in a state of voluntary intoxication is less criminal therefor, but whenever the actual existence of any particular motive is a necessary element to constitute any particular degree of crime the jury may consider the fact that accused was drunk at the time, it is proper to charge in a trial for murder that evidence of drunkenness can only be considered for the purpose of determining the degree of crime.

7. Where defendant pleaded insanity as an excuse for the crime, an instruction that if defendant's mind was so affected that he had not sufficient will power to abstain from killing the deceased he should be found not guilty was properly refused.

8. An instruction that the value of the testimony of defendant's expert witnesses depended largely on the truth or falsity of the facts given them, while unnecessary, and not involving any principle of law, was not prejudicial to defendant.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; B. N. Smith, Judge.

E. V. Methaver was convicted of murder, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Davis & Morrison, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Ford, for the People.

GAROUTTE, J. Defendant has been convicted of murder, and the death penalty adjudged. The homicide occurred at the village of Long Beach, Los Angeles county, July 25, 1899. Dorothy McKee, an attractive young woman of about 24 years of age, lived with her mother in a small house, and they were engaged in conducting a bakery business in the front part thereof. This house was divided by a partition, and in the other part lived the defendant, who there carried on a small shoe-store business, and as a cobbler worked at his trade. The relations between these three people were of the most friendly character. Defendant received his food from the table of the McKees, and their daily intercourse was continuous. On the morning of July 25th, Dorothy McKee and a friend, Mrs. Scudder, went for a bicycle ride at about 6 o'clock. Soon thereafter defendant mounted his bicycle, followed the course the two women had taken, and, meeting them returning, directed his bicycle against that of deceased, Dorothy, and the moment both were dismounted he fired either two or three pistol shots at her, which resulted in her immediate death. He then inflicted a serious wound upon himself by a shot from the same pistol. The defendant relied upon the plea of insanity, claiming that this insanity arose from several serious injuries received upon his head during the course of his past life, conjoined with an attack of delirium tremens, which he claims actually encompassed him at the time of the killing. There is but little evidence to support this claim. Indeed, there is hardly a circumstance to support the claim of delirium tremens, aside from defendant's own testimony, while the evidence to the contrary is almost overwhelming. Under this state of the case, it is most unfortunate if the penalty of the law for this otherwise most cruel murder cannot be promptly administered upon defendant. His reliance upon this appeal for an order giving him a second trial is based largely upon exceptions taken to the rulings of the trial court in the giving and refusing of certain instructions bearing upon the law of the case.

The court gave this instruction as modified: "The jury are instructed that the following persons, among others, are not capable of committing crime under the laws of the state of California: Lunatics and insane persons, persons who commit the act charged without being conscious thereof, persons who commit the act charged through misfortune or by accident, when it appears that there was no evil design, intention, or culpable negligence; and if the jury are satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt by the evidence in this case that the defendant, when he killed the deceased, was either a lunatic or an insane person, [as 'insanity' is defined in these instructions], or was not conscious of the act when he committed it, or that the same was committed from misfortune or by accident, and it also appears that there was no evil design, intention, or culpable negligence on the part of the defendant, then the jury must acquit the defendant." The modification made by the court consisted—First, in eliminating all that portion of the instruction which we have identified as being in italics; and, second, by inserting that portion thereof as appearing in brackets.

The major part of the elimination is composed of portions of section 26 of the Penal Code, which section, among other matters, provides: "All persons are capable of committing crimes except those belonging to the following classes: * * * (2) Idiots; (3) lunatics and insane persons; * * * (5) persons who committed the act charged without being conscious thereof; (6) persons who committed the act or made the omission charged through misfortune or by accident, when it appears that there was no evil design, intention, or culpable negligence."

There is no claim whatever in this case that subdivision 6 of the section has any application, so we pass that portion of the elimination without comment. There is a claim that subdivision 5 has an application to this case, yet the court is fully satisfied that it has not. Section 21 of the Penal Code declares: "All persons are of sound mind who are neither idiots nor lunatics, nor affected with insanity;" and the court is entirely convinced that subdivision 5, § 26, does not contemplate cases of unsound mind,—that is, cases of idiots, lunatics, and insane persons,—but, upon the contrary, only contemplates cases of persons of sound mind, as, for example, somnambulists, or persons suffering with delirium from fever or drugs. There is no claim of the existence of any such conditions here, and if the claim were made there is an absolute dearth of evidence to support it. There is no reason why subdivision 5 should be given any broader construction; for, as to persons afflicted with unsound minds, subdivisions 2 and 3 include them all.

It may be further suggested, in answer to the claim that the defendant did the act while unconscious thereof by reason of his insanity, that instructions covering every phase of the question of insanity, including that of delirium tremens, were presented to the jury; instructions of which no complaint is here made; and, where the defense is insanity, that is all the defendant is entitled to at the hands of the court. If the law excuses him for his acts under these circumstances, it is not by reason of his unconsciousness at the time the act is committed, but by reason of his insanity. Delirium tremens is but a phase or kind of insanity. If defendant was unconscious at the time he committed the act, he was only unconscious by reason of his delirium tremens; that is, by reason of his insanity.

The elimination of the words, "beyond a reasonable doubt," was clearly proper, as the law does not demand that measure of proof in order that insanity may be established; and, in addition thereto, it may be further said that the elimination of this language from the instruction was strongly favorable to defendant. The language inserted by the court, as indicated by the brackets, was properly inserted.

The following instruction is assailed by appellant's counsel: "In prosecutions for crimes, defense of insanity is often interposed, and thereby becomes a subject of paramount importance in criminal jurisprudence. A due regard for the ends of justice and the peace and welfare of society, no less than mercy to the accused, require that it should be thoroughly and carefully weighed. It is a plea sometimes resorted to in cases where aggravated crimes have been committed under circumstances which afford full proof of the overt acts, and render hopeless all other means of evading punishment. While, therefore, it ought to be viewed as a not less full and complete, than it is a humane, defense, when satisfactorily established, yet it should be examined into with great care, lest an ingenious counterfeit of the malady furnish protection to guilt." While the statements contained in this instruction are true as historical facts, there is but little law involved in them. And, while we see no legal reason why the information therein contained should be given to the jury in the court's charge, yet, upon an examination of these statements, we find them made purely and entirely in the abstract. They are not directed towards the defendant and his case, and, assuming the jury to be an intelligent body of men, the instruction could have done him no prejudice. Yet in view of the later decisions of this court, wherein the rights of a defendant to have the facts of his case passed upon by the jury alone have been most zealously protected, and where argumentative instructions have been condemned, we would suggest that in the future this instruction be not given. At the same time it has been given so often in the past and approved by this court that it will not now be held prejudicially erroneous. In People v. Dennis, 39 Cal. 636, this instruction was carefully considered, and the court there said: "We are satisfied that the instruction as given was entirely proper, under the circumstances developed by the evidence in this case." We find the decision there laid down followed in People v. Bumberger, 45 Cal. 650; People v. Pico, 62 Cal. 55; People v. Larrabee, 115 Cal. 159, 42 Pac. 922; People v. McCarthy, 115 Cal. 264, 46 Pac. 1073; People v. Allender, 117 Cal. 83, 48 Pac. 1014.

The court instructed the jury: "It is a well-settled rule that drunkenness is no excuse for the commission of crime. Insanity produced by intoxication does not destroy responsibility when the party, when sane and responsible, made himself voluntarily intoxicated; and drunkenness forms no defense whatever to the fact of guilt, for, when a crime is committed by a party while in a fit of intoxication, the law will not allow him to avail himself of his own gross vice and misconduct to shelter himself from the legal consequences of such crime. Evidence of drunkenness can only be considered by the jury for the purpose of determining the degree of crime, and for that purpose it must be received with great caution." We are at a loss to understand why instructions as to drunkenness were given to the jury in this case. Upon examination of the record, we find no evidence whatever tending to indicate that defendant was intoxicated when he killed this young woman. No one had seen him take a single drop of intoxicating liquor. No one testified that he looked like a drunken man, or acted like one. He rode his bicycle for a considerable distance immediately prior to the killing. He himself testifies that he had entirely abstained from liquor for a period of five days prior to the killing. Indeed, the whole theory of his defense is that he was afflicted with delirium tremens at the time of the killing, induced by his total abstinence from liquor for the previous five days. As against this evidence, we have the testimony alone of various parties to the effect that, immediately after the homicide, defendant's breath smelled of liquor. Upon this state of facts, there was no question of present intoxication in the case at the time of the homicide, and therefore no instructions to the jury upon the matter of drunkenness were demanded. Hence the law here involved contained abstract propositions; but, whether the instruction was legally sound or unsound upon its face, it shows that no injury resulted to defendant from the giving of it. It may be further added that this instruction has repeatedly met the approval of this court. People v. Lewis, 36 Cal. 533; People v. Williams, 43 Cal. 352; People v. Ferris, 55 Cal. 592; People v. Jones, 63 Cal. 169; People v. Vincent, 95 Cal. 428, 30 Pac. 581; People v. Fellows, 122 Cal. 239, 54 Pac. 830.

We are also satisfied the instruction is sound in declaring that "evidence of drunkenness can only be considered by the jury for the purpose of determining the degree of crime." Section 22 of the Penal Code declares: "No act committed by a person while in a state of voluntary intoxication is less criminal by reason of his having been in such condition. But, whenever the actual existence of any particular purpose, motive, or intent is a necessary element to constitute any particular species or degree of crime, the jury may take into consideration the fact that the accused was intoxicated at the time, in determining the purpose, motive, or intent with which he committed the act." This section simply means that, when a particular motive, purpose, or intent constitutes a necessary element going to make up a particular crime or degree of crime, then evidence of drunkenness at the time the act is committed may be shown as casting light upon defendant's mind, in ascertaining the purpose, motive, or intent with which he did the act. In a case of murder, drunkenness may be shown for the purpose of establishing the degree of murder, and for that purpose alone. This was the Vincent Case, supra. In the case of People v. Phelan, 93 Cal. 112, 28 Pac. 855, this court held that drunkenness might be shown in a case of burglary; for there the entry into the building must be made with a particular intent, in order that the crime may be made out, and that case comes directly within the purview of the aforesaid section 22. As a complete review of the authorities covering this principle, and as supporting the conclusion of the court here declared, we cite Flanigan v. People (and the note found thereunder) 40 Am. Rep. 560.

An instruction was properly refused which intimates that, if defendant's mind was so affected that he had not sufficient power of will to abstain from killing the deceased, then he should be found not guilty. People v. Hoin, 62 Cal. 120; People v. Ward, 105 Cal. 343, 38 Pac. 945; People v. Barthleman, 120 Cal. 11, 52 Pac. 112.

The court instructed the jury that the value of the testimony of defendant's expert witnesses depended largely upon the truth or falsity of the facts given to them, and upon which their opinion was founded. Why the court did not include in this instruction the testimony of the expert witnesses for the people we are at a loss to know. If the instruction is ever to be given at all, certainly it should include the testimony of all expert witnesses, rather than those upon one side of the case. We see no principle of law involved in the instruction, and for that reason it should not be incorporated in the charge to the jury, yet it is apparent that no possible prejudice resulted to the defendant from the giving of it. It was simply a declaration of a truism,—a declaration of a matter of everyday, ordinary, common sense. In People v. Barthleman, supra,—a case tried in the same court where the present case was tried,—this same instruction was under consideration by this court, and it was then held not to be prejudicial error to give it. At the same time the trial court was advised to refrain from giving it in the future. We now reiterate what was said upon that occasion. The motion for a new trial upon the ground of newly-discovered evidence was properly denied. For the foregoing reasons, the judgment and order are affirmed.

APPEAL—DISMISSAL—MOTION.

Where appellant's motion to dismiss her appeal is based on affidavits presented by respondent's counsel, but it is not contended appellant's attorney has any special contract or lien on the property in controversy so as to entitle him to continue the prosecution, the appeal will be dismissed, notwithstanding the unusual method of presenting the matter.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Motion by Bridget Degnan to dismiss her appeal. Motion granted.

C. F. Callaghan and Leon E. Prescott, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is a motion to dismiss the appeal of Bridget Degnan, based upon her own and the supporting affidavits of others, and pressed before the court by respondent's attorneys. It may be conceded that the regular, orderly, and courteous method of procedure would have been for the client to give notice to her own attorney of her desire that her appeal should be dismissed, and, in the event of his refusal, after notice, to procure a substitution of attorneys, and through the new attorney bring the matter to the attention of the court. But the fact that the mode here adopted is unusual does not deprive the appellant of her right to a dismissal when it is made to appear to the court, as in this case it is, that such is her desire; it not being contended that her attorney has any special contract or lien upon any property in controversy entitling him to continue the prosecution. By way of intimation rather than accusation, it has been suggested that there has been some impropriety or unprofessional conduct upon the part of some one of the attorneys connected with this matter. If this be so, its consideration has no place in this determination, and the matter can receive attention only after the preferment of charges properly formulated. The appeal is therefore dismissed.

BILLS AND NOTES—CONSIDERATION—EVIDENCE.

1. A note given by a widow in lieu of a note given by herself and husband in his lifetime was surrendered at maturity, and a new note for the original sum, payable one day after date, was given in lieu thereof by the widow and her daughter, who had received all the property that the husband had transferred to the widow before his death to avoid probate proceedings. Held, that there was a sufficient consideration for the daughter's signature to the note.

2. Evidence that a mother had transferred all her property to her daughter, when the latter offered to and did sign a note with her mother in lieu of an outstanding note against the mother, was admissible, as against the daughter, to show a consideration for her signature.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2.
Appeal from superior court, Alameda county;
F. B. Ogden, Judge.

Action by J. F. Whelan against L. H. Swain and Emma Swain. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying a new trial, the defendant Emma Swain appeals. Affirmed.

Linforth & Whitaker, for appellant. A. Lewis (Chickering, Thomas & Gregory, of counsel), for respondent.

COOPER, C. Plaintiff recovered judgment on a promissory note. This is an appeal from the judgment and from an order denying appellant's motion for a new trial. The principal contention of appellant is that the finding that the promissory note was signed by her for a sufficient consideration is not supported by the evidence. The facts in connection with the matter are substantially as follows: In 1889 the defendant L. H. Swain and her husband borrowed $400 from the plaintiff's assignor. In March, 1895, the husband died leaving the note unpaid, and leaving surviving him his widow, L. H. Swain, defendant, and his daughter, the appellant. Prior to his death he deeded all his property to his wife to avoid probate proceedings, trusting to her to care for the daughter, who was to receive all the property upon the mother's death. Soon after the husband's death the note was returned to the widow, and a new note signed by her alone taken for a like sum. After the execution of the second note, the widow by deed transferred all the property to the daughter. About the 1st of July, 1897, the widow was having trouble with her creditors. Plaintiff's assignor had requested and appellant had offered to sign a joint note with her mother, and take up the old one, in order to satisfy the plaintiff's assignor, and to prevent an attempt being made to collect at that time. Accordingly, on July 18, 1897, the old note was delivered up, and the joint note of the mother and daughter given in lieu thereof. This note was payable one day after date, and was for $400, the original sum. On April 25, 1898, the mother filed her petition in insolvency, and was duly adjudged insolvent, and proceedings against her stayed. The note has not been paid, and the only claim made by appellant is that she signed the note without consideration.

We think there was a sufficient consideration for appellant's signature. The old note was surrendered. The appellant had received the property that belonged to the father and mother when their note was outstanding, and that belonged to the mother alone when her note was outstanding. The new note was payable one day after date, and there was a forbearance implied for at least the one day. If there was a consideration, the law will not attempt to measure the amount thereof. As said by Justice Wilmet in Pilans v. Van Mierop, Langd. Cas. Cont. p. 177: "The law does not weigh the quantum of the consideration. The suspension of plaintiff's right to call upon White for a compliance with his engagement is sufficient to support an action, even if it be the suspension of the right for a day only or for ever so little a time." See Westphal v. Nevills, 92 Cal. 545, 28 Pac. 678. There was no necessity for an express agreement to delay. The taking of the new note, payable at a future day, imposed upon the payee the duty of waiting until the maturity of the new note. Thompson v. Gray, 63 Me. 230, and cases cited.

Certain questions were asked and answered under appellant's objection, tending to show that the creditors of defendant L. H. Swain were not harassing or annoying her at the time the note was given, that the husband deeded the property to her for the purpose of avoiding probate proceedings, and that defendant L. H. Swain afterwards conveyed the property to her daughter. The evidence was proper, under the circumstances. The appellant had signed the note, and had not paid it. She had claimed, and was claiming, that there was no consideration for her signature. The fact that the liability was changed when the title to the property was changed certainly tended to show a consideration for signing the note. If the defendant L. H. Swain had transferred all her property to her daughter, and the daughter offered to and did sign the note in lieu of the note outstanding against the mother, it tended to show a benefit conferred upon the daughter. There is no merit in this appeal. The judgment and order should be affirmed.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. GOODWIN. (Cr. 705.)

CRIMINAL LAW—SEDUCTION UNDER PROMISE OF MARRIAGE—EVIDENCE—LETTERS—WITNESSES—PROPER CROSS-EXAMINATION—INSTRUCTION.

1. On a prosecution for seduction under promise of marriage, the error in receiving evidence letters from the defendant to the prosecutrix without proper identification was cured by the subsequent admission of such proof.

2. On a prosecution for seduction under promise of marriage, a letter from the defendant to the prosecutrix, beginning, "My dear, beloved friend Mary," was relevant evidence, as showing the sentiment and feelings of defendant towards prosecutrix.

3. On a prosecution for seduction under promise of marriage, it was not error to allow the prosecutrix to testify that she got in a "family way" by the defendant two months after the alleged seduction, as this evidence tended to show, in connection with evidence of her previous chastity, that she had been seduced prior to that time.

4. On a prosecution for seduction under promise of marriage, it was not error to ask the defendant, on cross-examination, if certain letters were in his handwriting, where the identity of the letters as those of the defendant were fully established before such questions were asked.

5. It was not prejudicial to the defendant, on a prosecution for seduction under promise of marriage, to ask questions on cross-examination seeking to show that he began the correspondence between the prosecutrix and himself, where they had been answered in the negative.

6. Where an information for seduction under promise of marriage charged the defendant with having committed the crime at a certain time and place, and the defendant had testified that he was not at such place at the time alleged, questions as to where he was on other days in the same month were properly allowed on cross-examination to test the memory of the witness.

7. On a prosecution for seduction under promise of marriage, an instruction that, if the jury had a reasonable doubt as to whether the defendant was with the prosecutrix on the day on which the crime was alleged to have been committed, the defendant should be found not guilty, was properly refused, since the exact date of the offense was not material.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; W. E. Greene, Judge.

Charles Goodwin was convicted of seduction under promise of marriage, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Edwin M. Sweeney and H. H. Adams, for appellant. Tirey L. Ford, Atty. Gen., for the People.

GRAY, C. The defendant appeals from a judgment convicting him of the crime of seduction under promise of marriage, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

1. In a case of this kind it is worse than useless for counsel to address long arguments to this court on mere questions of fact. The prosecutrix testified to every fact necessary to establish defendant's guilt as charged. The jurors were the sole judges of her credibility. They believed her, and found the defendant guilty. Therefore, he must be treated as guilty, and suffer the penalty of his crime, unless it is shown that for some reason he did not have a fair trial. People v. Hough, 120 Cal. 538, 52 Pac. 846.

2. The prosecution offered in evidence a number of letters purporting to be written by defendant to the complaining witness prior to the alleged seduction. Previous to the introduction of these letters the prosecutrix testified, as to each of them, that she recognized it as in the handwriting of defendant, "all of it, and signed by him," and that she received it through the mail. Counsel for defendant asked to be permitted to examine the witness as to her knowledge of the defendant's handwriting before the letters were admitted. The court replied, "You will have an ample opportunity to examine the witness thoroughly upon your cross-examination," to which counsel excepted. Counsel then objected to the introduction of the letter "upon the ground that it is incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and upon the further ground that there is no proper evidence that the letter was written by the defendant. There is no proof of his handwriting, as required by the Code of Civil Procedure in such cases." The court overruled this and all other objections to the letters, to which ruling the defendant excepted. After the letters had all been received and read in evidence, it appeared on the cross-examination of the prosecutrix that while she had never seen the defendant write, yet he had in a conversation with her acknowledged writing to her one of the letters introduced in evidence. The brother of the prosecutrix was also subsequently called as a witness, and testified that he had seen defendant write, and, on the said letters being shown to him, he testified that they were each and all in the handwriting of defendant. It therefore appears that, if there was any error in any ruling of the court in connection with the admission of the letters, such error was cured by this subsequent competent evidence, showing without conflict that the letters were in the handwriting of defendant. In Robinson v. Bank 81 Cal. 106, 22 Pac. 478, it is held that error in admitting evidence without the requisite preliminary or connecting proof is cured by the subsequent admission of such proof. The record contains only the letter of defendant first written and first introduced in evidence. This letter begins with "My dear, beloved friend Mary." That it is relevant to the subject under inquiry in the case does not admit of question. It was a part of quite an extensive correspondence between the prosecutrix and defendant, and this letter, as well as the rest of the correspondence, undoubtedly tended to show the sentiment and feelings of these parties, each for the other. State v. Burns (Iowa) 78 N. W. 681.

3. There was no prejudicial error in permitting the prosecutrix to testify that she got in a "family way" by defendant on September 28th (more than two months after the alleged seduction), as this tended to show, in connection with the evidence of previous chastity, that she had been seduced prior to that date. State v. Wickliff, 95 Iowa, 386, 64 N. W. 282; State v. Robertson, 121 N. C. 551, 28 S. E. 59; Armstrong v. People, 70 N. Y. 38; People v. Rangod, 112 Cal. 669, 44 Pac. 1071.

4. On cross-examination the defendant was asked if certain letters then shown to him were in his handwriting. Counsel for defendant excepted to the action of the court in overruling his objection to these questions. It does not appear that these letters were ever introduced in evidence except as we may infer that probably the inquiry related to the letters of defendant to the prosecutrix which had already been introduced in evidence. These letters, except the first one written, are not before us, but their identity as the letters of defendant were fully established before any questions were asked of defendant concerning them. It is, therefore, difficult to see how defendant could be injured by the questions, whatever the letters may have contained; and, without any knowledge of the contents of the letters, we must hold that no error is made to appear. As to the question asked of defendant on cross-examination, seeking to show that he began the correspondence between himself and the prosecutrix, his answer was in the negative, and of course he suffered no harm from that question.

5. The defendant was charged in the information with having committed the crime of seduction in Alameda county on or about July 15, 1899, and the testimony of the prosecution tended strongly to establish said July 15th as the date of the crime. The defendant testified on his direct examination, in substance, that he was not in Alameda county on July 15, 1899, but was in San Francisco all that day, and not with the prosecutrix. On cross-examination he was asked, "Were you in the county of Alameda on the 14th day of July, 1899?" This was objected to on the ground that it was not proper cross examination, and the court inquired, "For what purpose do you ask it?" to which the attorney for the prosecution replied, "I simply desire to test the recollection of the witness." The court then said, "It is allowed for that purpose." The defendant excepted, and the witness answered, "No, sir; I was not." Numerous other similar questions were asked concerning various other dates in said month of July, all of which were objected to, and exception taken by defendant to the overruling of said objections. The answers of the defendant were in the negative as to some of the dates inquired about, and as to others he did not know. These questions having been allowed solely for the purpose of testing the memory of the witness, as to a matter about which he had testified on direct examination, there was no error in the ruling of the court.

6. There was no error in refusing to instruct the jury that if they had a reasonable doubt as to whether defendant was with the prosecutrix on July 15, 1899, they should find defendant not guilty. The exact date of the offense was not material. The jury might have been convinced that the prosecutrix was mistaken as to the exact date of her seduction, and yet have been satisfied that it occurred at some date very near said July 15th, and on this they would have been warranted in finding defendant guilty.

7. There was some friction between the attorney for the defendant and the court on the trial of the case, and in this connection the attorney noted an exception to the language of the trial court on several occasions. We have made a careful study of the language thus excepted to, and we find that in each instance it was addressed and referred expressly to the attorney personally, and did not in any way tend to cast any reflection upon the defendant, nor was it intended in any manner to prejudice the defendant's case.

There is no merit in the contention that the trial judge aided in the prosecution of the case. It is true that he made some suggestions as to a certain line of examination that might be pursued on the cross-examination of defendant, but the prosecution, after consultation, decided not to "consume any more time on that line." No exception was taken to the language or conduct of the court in this connection, nor do we see how an exception could have availed defendant had one been taken. The instructions were fair to the defendant, the law of the case was clearly stated to the jury, and the defendant had a fair trial. The judgment and order should be affirmed.

I concur: HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. KELLY. (Cr. 722.)

GRAND LARCENY — INSTRUCTIONS — POSSESSION OF MONEY — EVIDENCE — MOTIVE.

1. Where the court instructed on the subject of reasonable doubt, and the principles applicable to the case, and that the jury should bring their intelligence to the consideration of the case, and let their common sense and best judgment control in its determination, it was not prejudicial to defendant, as giving the jury the impression that they could disregard the instructions previously given.

2. Where defendant was charged with grand larceny, evidence that defendant had no money just before the theft, but had considerable money for a man in his circumstances just afterwards, was properly admitted.

3. Where defendant made no attempt to show that the usual motive for committing larceny did not exist, a charge that the failure of the evidence to show motive on the part of the accused for the commission of the crime was a circumstance in favor of his innocence was properly refused.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; W. E. Greene, Judge.

Patrick A. Kelly was convicted of grand larceny, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Jas. E. Ennis and Thos. Scott, for appellant. Tiley L. Ford, Atty. Gen., for the People.

McFARLAND, J. Appellant was convicted of grand larceny, and appeals from the judgment and from an order of the court denying a motion for a new trial.

The position that the evidence did not justify the verdict is untenable. The evidence was circumstantial, but it tended strongly to show appellant's guilt, and there is no ground for holding that, as matter of law, it was insufficient to support the verdict.

After the court had correctly charged the jury on the subject of reasonable doubt, and had instructed correctly as to the general principles of law applicable to the case, and very favorably to appellant, it used the following language, which is claimed by appellant to have been erroneous: "But take this case, bring your intelligence to the consideration of it, and let your common sense and your best judgment control you in its determination." It is contended that this language would give the impression to the jury that they might "disregard the instructions as to the law." But this contention cannot be maintained. The fair meaning of the language was simply that the jury, having the evidence and the instruction of the court as to the law before them, should exercise their best judgment in coming to a conclusion. We see in this language nothing erroneous or prejudicial.

The larceny having been committed on the morning of June 8th, the prosecution asked the witness Lund the following question: "Did you, previous to the 8th day of June of this year, while the defendant was working for Mr. Hanna, transact any business with him on his account?" and, the witness Delmue having testified that he saw the defendant after the alleged time of the larceny, the prosecution asked him this question: "Did he have any money at that time?" Appellant objected to both of these questions, and, his objection having been overruled, he excepted. The contention is that these questions had reference to the financial condition of the appellant at different times, and for this reason were irrelevant and incompetent. The answer of Lund to the question asked him was rather colorless, and of little importance. Delmue testified that on the occasion of which he spoke the appellant exhibited considerable money. But, assuming that the answers to both these questions tended to show that before the date of the larceny the appellant had no money, and that afterwards he had a large amount of money for a man in his circumstances, still the evidence was properly admitted. Generally, evidence of the wealth or poverty of a defendant is not admissible; but the sudden possession of money, immediately after the commission of a larceny, by one who before that had been impecunious, is clearly admissible as a circumstance in the case. 2 Bish. New Cr. Proc. § 748.

The court did not err in refusing to give the following instruction asked by appellant: "That, when the evidence fails to show a motive to commit the crime charged on the part of the accused, this is a circumstance in favor of his innocence." Generally, an instruction as to motive is not pertinent on a trial for larceny, for there is always an apparent motive for that crime, although there might, perhaps, be peculiar circumstances calling for such an instruction. But the instruction was certainly not applicable to the evidence in the case at bar, for there was no attempt on the part of the appellant to show any want of the usual motive which prompts the commission of the crime of larceny. There are no other points made by appellant. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

LANDLORD AND TENANT—ENTRANCE TO BASEMENT—DOORS IN SIDEWALK—AUTHORITY TO CONSTRUCT—PROPER CONSTRUCTION—CONTROL BY LESSEE—INJURIES—LIABILITY OF LANDLORD.

1. The owners of a building constructed a 12-foot walk abutting it, and through such walk built an entrance into their basement, the opening in the walk being covered by iron doors protruding 2 feet above the walk when open, and leaving the surface level when closed. The doors were safely and properly constructed, and left 7 feet of sidewalk always unobstructed. The premises were in the occupation and control of a lessee, who opened such doors on one occasion to use the basement entrance. Held, that the owners were not liable for injuries sustained by a passer-by, who fell over one of the doors into the excavation.

2. An entrance through a sidewalk to a basement, and the iron doors thereof in the former, would be presumed to have been constructed and placed in position by proper authority, in absence of proof to the contrary.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county.

Action by E. A. Rider against W. R. Clark and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, W. R. Clark and another appeal. Reversed.

Woods & Levinsky and Nicol, Orr & Nutter, for appellants. H. V. J. Swain and Jacobs & Flack, for respondent.

COOPER, C. Action to recover damages for personal injuries. Plaintiff recovered a verdict, and judgment was entered thereon. Appellants made a motion for a new trial, which was denied, and this appeal is from the judgment and order denying the motion.

The appellants were the owners of a three-story brick building on the east side of Sutter street, in the city of Stockton. The sidewalk in front of said building was of the latest improved concrete, over 12 feet in width. In the sidewalk on the east side of Sutter street, being the west side of the building, there is an opening for the use of tenants, so that they may get into the basement of the building. The opening is covered by two iron doors running east and west across a portion of the sidewalk next the street. The length of said doors is five feet, so that they leave a clear space of nearly seven feet between the building and the east end of the doors. The space covered by the doors is five feet east and west by four feet north and south, under which there is the excavation. The doors, when open, extend about two feet above the level of the sidewalk, and are held in a perpendicular position by stay chains and an iron rod hooked in an eyelet in each door; and, being thus open, and fastened, the excavation is surrounded on the north and south by the iron doors. These iron doors do not in any way obstruct the use of the sidewalk when closed. They fit into the frame to which they are fastened perfectly. When closed, the surface is as even and smooth as the other portions of the sidewalk. There is no question but that the sidewalk and doors were properly constructed, and no claim is made that the appellants were in any way guilty of negligence in their construction. On the 21st day of November, 1898, at the time of the injury to plaintiff, the premises and store on the ground floor of said building immediately east of the opening, and the basement into which the opening from the sidewalk led, were in the occupation, control, and possession of defendant Wood under a lease from appellants. As such tenant, defendant Wood had full control and charge of the iron doors covering the opening. On the evening of said day, defendant Wood opened said iron doors for the purpose of putting merchandise in the basement. Neither of the appellants was present, nor did either of them have any notice of the doors being so left open. About 6 o'clock of said evening there was an alarm of fire sounded. Plaintiff, who was in the employ of the fire department, while running along the sidewalk in a southerly direction to catch the hook and ladder truck, fell over the iron door on the north side into the opening, receiving severe injuries. The plaintiff, owing to the excitement and hurry under which he was laboring, did not notice the doors nor the opening. The doors were opened by defendant Wood for his own uses and purposes, and had been open about an hour when the accident happened.

While there are many questions raised in the record as to rulings on evidence and giving and rejecting instructions, we will, at the request of counsel, discuss the main and important question,—as to whether or not the owners of the building are, under the circumstances, responsible in damages to plaintiff. The case was tried in the court below and given to the jury upon the theory that the owners of the building, having made the excavation and built the doors over the same, were, in all events, responsible for the injury caused to plaintiff by falling therein. This is apparent by the instructions given to the jury at plaintiff's request, to wit: "If you believe from the evidence that at the time of the injury complained of the defendants Clark and Henery owned the building at the corner of Market and Sutter streets, in the city of Stockton, and that said defendants Clark and Henery, prior to such injury, had built a sidewalk in front of the said building, and that under said sidewalk they had made an excavation, and through said sidewalk they had left an opening to connect with said excavation, and that over said opening they had built or placed a covering, and that prior to said injury they had rented a storeroom in said building to the defendant Wood, and that said renting carried with it the right by said Wood to use said excavation, basement opening, and the covering over the same, and that at the time of the injury complained of said Wood was so renting, as aforesaid, from said defendants Clark and Henery, and was at said time using said basement, excavation, opening, and the covering over the same as contemplated by said Clark and Henery in their said lease to said defendant Wood; and if you believe from the evidence that said excavation under said sidewalk, the opening through said sidewalk, and the covering to said opening, as so used by said Wood at the time of said injury, was in an unsafe condition to the public or dangerous to passers-by,—then I instruct you that the defendants Clark and Henery are liable in damages to the plaintiff, if he, while said defendant Wood was so using said excavation, opening, and the covering thereto, as aforesaid, not knowing that such obstruction then existed, tripped over said covering, and fell into said opening, thereby sustaining personal injuries." And by the refusal to give the following instructions asked by appellant: "(2) Before the jury can render a verdict against defendants W. R. Clark and Samuel Henery, you must find from the evidence that in the construction of the sidewalk and basement doors they were guilty of negligence, and constructed them so that they were unsafe and insecure to travel over and upon them. (3) Before the jury can find a verdict in favor of plaintiff in this case and against the defendants Clark and Henery, you must find from the evidence that the said sidewalk and basement doors were defectively constructed and built, or thereafter left in an unsafe and insecure condition for travel over the same by the public by said defendants Clark and Henery, or either of them. (4) If the jury find from the evidence that in the construction of said sidewalk and doors the defendants Clark and Henery used good material, well and securely built the same, and that the said doors were well and safely constructed, and properly provided with guards,—such as the chains and rod,—and that they were in a safe condition when leased to defendant Wood, and that said defendants Clark and Henery were not thereafter guilty of any act or negligence concerning the same, then you should find a verdict in favor of the said defendants Clark and Henery."

We think the instructions as given to the jury were not correct, and that the instructions offered by appellants should have been given. When the tenant enters into possession under a lease, the landlord parts with all his right to and control over the premises, and is not liable to third persons, except for such defects in the premises or defective construction as existed in the premises when let to the tenant. 2 Wood, Landl. & Ten. § 355; Shear. & R. Neg. (5th Ed.) § 708, and cases cited; 1 Wood, Nuis. § 269, and cases cited; Saltonstall v. Banker, 8 Gray, 195; Rich v. Basterfield, 4 C. B. 783; Kalis v. Shattuck, 69 Cal. 597, 11 Pac. 346. In the latter case, following the rule which is laid down in the text-books, this court held that the landlord of a building which is in the exclusive possession and control of a tenant is not liable for injuries to a third person, caused by the fall of an awning belonging to the building, when the fall was occasioned by the negligent and improper conduct of the tenant in permitting it to be used as a standing place for a crowd of people. After a careful review of the authorities, the court said: "It is well settled that a landlord is not liable for such consequences unless: (1) The nuisance occasioning the injury existed at the time the premises were demised; or (2) the structure was in such a condition that it would be likely to become a nuisance in the ordinary and reasonable use of the same for the purpose for which it was constructed and let, and the landlord failed to repair it; or (3) the landlord authorized or permitted the act which caused it to become a nuisance occasioning the injury." In Frassi v. McDonald, 122 Cal. 404, 55 Pac. 141, it is said: "The owner of property fronting on the street is not an absolute guarantor that no opening may be found in his sidewalk. The law does not demand that he shall guard his sidewalk at night lest some evil doer shall make an opening therein to the great danger of the belated traveler. Before liability attaches to the owner in such a case, he must have known of its defective condition, or, as a careful, prudent man, should have known it." In City of Boston v. Gray, 144 Mass. 53, 10 N. E. 509, it appeared that the basement of a building extended under the sidewalk of the street on which the building abutted, and was lighted by a "Hyatt light," the iron frame of which was set in, and formed part of, the sidewalk. The first story and basement of the building were occupied by a tenant under a lease. The iron frame had worn smooth and slippery from long use, and by reason thereof a traveler fell, and was injured. It was held that the owner of the building was not liable. In the opinion the court said: "We think the lease of the store and basement included the excavation under the sidewalk and its covering, and that the tenant's covenant to keep in repair applied to it." In McAlpin v. Powell, 70 N. Y. 130, it is said: "To maintain an action for personal injury occasioned by the negligence or want of care of another, it must be made to appear that the defendant owed some duty or obligation to the party injured, which he failed to discharge or perform. Unless there is some contract, duty, or service which a party is bound to fulfill, there can be no negligence, fault, or breach of the obligation. The reported cases where parties are charged for injuries to another occasioned by accident have been decided upon the principle that there was negligence in doing or omitting to do some act by which a duty or obligation which the law imposed has been disregarded." Applying the rule above given, there can be no negligence imputed to appellants. It was not their duty to guard the open space in the sidewalk when the doors were open. They constructed the sidewalk and the iron doors in a proper and safe manner. When the premises were let to the tenant, they were in good condition. There is no pretense that the injury was caused by any defective construction of the doors or sidewalk. There is no claim that the premises were out of repair, and appellants did not even know that the doors were open.

It is claimed that the excavation and iron doors were a nuisance, and placed on the sidewalk without authority, and contrary to law. There is no such proof in the record. On the contrary, the plaintiff objected to all evidence tending to show that it was the usage or custom in the city of Stockton to allow such doors, and the court sustained the objections. But we may presume, for the purposes of this case, that the iron doors were placed there by proper authority; for the court instructed the jury of its own motion: "If the defendants Clark and Henery were the owners of a building fronting on Sutter street, in the city of Stockton, they had the right to construct a good and substantial sidewalk on Sutter street, in the city of Stockton, adjacent to such building. They had the right to construct and to maintain a good and substantial passageway under said sidewalk to the basement of said building, so long as such passageway did not interfere with the free passage of persons on and along said sidewalk. They had a right to construct and maintain a good and substantial iron frame in said sidewalk, and good and substantial doors thereon, so long as the same did not interfere with the free passage of persons on and along said sidewalk." And it is generally the usage and custom to allow openings to be made in the sidewalks of cities in order to obtain entrance into the basement, such openings and the coverings thereof being subject to proper municipal regulation. 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. (4th Ed.) § 699; McCarthy v. City of Syracuse, 46 N. Y. 197; Wolf v. Kilpatrick, 101 N. Y. 147, 4 N. E. 188; Fisher v. Thirkell, 21 Mich. 1. The cases of Van Praag v. Gale, 107 Cal. 441, 40 Pac. 555, and Barry v. Terkildsen, 72 Cal. 258, 13 Pac. 657, are not in conflict with what has been said. In the former case the question as to the liability of a landlord when the premises were leased to and in the possession of a tenant is not referred to or discussed. In the latter case the wooden trapdoor was used and maintained by the owner, and not by a tenant, and was so maintained in direct violation of an ordinance of the city. It follows that the judgment and order as to appellants should be reversed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; SMITH, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order as to appellants are reversed.

FRITZ v. CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (S. F. 2,377.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS—PARK AND BOULEVARD ACT—SUPERSEDED BY CITY CHARTER—CONSTRUCTION—ISSUANCE OF BONDS.

1. Under the park and boulevard act (St. 1889, p. 362, § 6), providing that at special elections, wherein the question of the issuance of bonds is submitted to the voters, "if two-thirds of the qualified electors voting an assent" to such issuance, the proper authorities may provide for the issuance, only two-thirds of the votes cast at the election are necessary for the issuance of such bonds, since the insertion of the word "an" before "assent" was clearly a typographical error, and its elimination made the provision perfectly plain.

2. The park and boulevard act (St. 1889, p. 361) prescribes a complete scheme for the acquisition of lands for park and boulevard purposes, by the issuance of bonds therefor, and the method of submitting such questions to the voters. San Francisco Charter 1900, art. 16, § 29, provides that, when the supervisors determine that the public interest requires "the construction or acquisition of any permanent municipal building or improvement" of a certain cost, they must submit the proposition to incur a bonded indebtedness for such purpose to the electors; and in other sections the plan set out for the acquisition of such property was complete, but different and inconsistent in many respects from the park and boulevard act in regard to the creation of the bonded indebtedness. Held, in an action against the city and county of San Francisco to enjoin the issuance of bonds under the park and boulevard act for the purpose of acquiring park lands, that the acquisition of lands for public park purposes comes within the charter provisions for permanent improvements, and hence the park and boulevard act was superseded by the city charter, under Const. art. 11, § 8, stating that a city or county charter shall become the recognized law thereof, and supersede any charter or other laws inconsistent therewith.

3. Where a special election on the question of issuing bonds for the purpose of park lands in San Francisco was held under the park and boulevard act (St. 1889, p. 361), which act was subsequently superseded by the adoption of the San Francisco county and city charter of 1900, before the bonds were issued, such bonds could not be issued under the charter, since they could only be issued on the procedure laid down by the charter, the scheme being complete in itself.

Action by Eugene M. Fritz against the city and county of San Francisco and others. From a judgment in favor of defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an appeal from a judgment of the superior court in and for the city and county of San Francisco sustaining the demurrer to a complaint filed by a taxpayer in a proceeding to enjoin the board of supervisors and the mayor of said city and county from taking any further action in pursuance of certain proceedings previously inaugurated, and having for their object the issuance of bonds of said city and county, and the purchase of lands for park purposes from the proceeds thereof. The proceedings leading up to the proposed issuance of these bonds are assailed at many places, but the court only finds it necessary to review the more important propositions of law involved.

The park and boulevard act (St. 1889, p. 361), under which the election was held submitting the question of the issuance of these bonds to the electors of the city and county of San Francisco, provides (section 6): "If at such an election two-thirds of the qualified electors voting an assent to the issuance of the bonds, then the 'city and county' or 'city or town' having held such election, may, by ordinance, or in such manner as other municipal legislative acts are enacted under its charter, provide," etc. It is now claimed that the proper construction of this section demands that two-thirds of all the qualified electors of the city and county of San Francisco must vote in favor of the issuance of the bonds, or the proposition for their issuance is defeated. The statute cannot bear this construction. As it appears upon the page, it is apparent by a casual inspection that a misprint has occurred; for as it stands, literally, it is meaningless. But if we eliminate the word "an," the insertion of which is clearly a typographical error, then the section becomes grammatically correct and full of meaning, for it would read: "If at such an election two-thirds of the qualified electors voting, assent to the issuance of the bonds, then," etc. Standing upon the page in this form, it means exactly what it says, and says only one thing, namely, if two-thirds of the qualified electors voting, assent, etc. If any authority were needed to support this construction of the statute, it may be found in Howland v. Board, 109 Cal. 152, 41 Pac. 864. But the language of the section as it should appear upon the page is so clear and explicit that its meaning in no degree is doubtful.

The proceedings taken by the city leading up to the election here involved were had under a general law. St. 1889, p. 361. This election was held in the latter part of the month of December, 1899, and the present charter went into effect January 8, 1900. The question is now presented, what effect did the new charter have upon the general law under which these proceedings were inaugurated and conducted? In speaking of charters similar to that of this city and county, section 8, art. 11, of the constitution declares that it "shall become the organic law thereof, and supersede any existing charter, and all amendments thereof and all laws inconsistent with such charter." The second question is at once presented: Is the general law which may be termed the "Park and Boulevard Act" inconsistent with the provisions of the charter? If it is, then that act was superseded by the charter at the moment the charter went into force and effect, and is no longer applicable to this city and county. Condensing the matter into a nutshell, it may be said the park and boulevard act provided a complete scheme for the acquisition of lands for park and boulevard purposes by the issuance of bonds, the proceeds thereof to be used for that purpose. Do we find any complete scheme laid down in the provisions of the charter to accomplish the same results? The court is entirely satisfied that such a scheme is there found. Section 29 of article 16 of that instrument provides: "When the supervisors shall determine that the public interest requires the construction or acquisition of any permanent municipal building or improvement, the cost of which in addition to the other expenses of the city and county will exceed the income and revenue provided for the city and county for any one year, they must, by ordinance passed by the affirmative vote of not less than fourteen members of the board, submit a proposition to incur a bonded indebtedness for such purposes to the electors of the city and county at a special election to be held for that purpose only. All the provisions of this charter providing for the acquisition of public utilities, so far as the same are applicable, shall apply to the manner of submitting such proposition to the electors, to the limitations of said bonded indebtedness, to the issuance and character of the same, and to the time when and the kind of money in which said bonded indebtedness shall be payable." Measured by the notice of election given in these proceedings, it appears that this bonded indebtedness was to be created "for the acquisition by purchase or by condemnation proceedings according to law, of the following lands for public park purposes": (1) Thirteen blocks, being for an extension of the Pan Handle of Golden Gate Park; (2) eight blocks for a connection between said Golden Gate Park and the Presidio military reservation; (3) two blocks for a public park in that part of the city and county known as the "Mission."

Chapter 2 of article 2 of the charter defines the powers of the board of supervisors, and subdivision 12 of section 1 thereof declares, "To purchase or acquire by condemnation such property as may be needed for public use." By this provision of the law the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco is vested with power to purchase land for a public park. The question then remains, does this proposed acquisition of lands for public park purposes come within the provisions of the charter section which allow the supervisors to submit to the electors the question of the creation of a bonded indebtedness for the purpose of "acquisition of any permanent municipal building or improvement"? The court is satisfied that the acquisition of these lands for park purposes by the city would be an acquisition by the city and county of a permanent municipal improvement, within the spirit and intent of the charter. An extension of the Pan Handle to Van Ness avenue would be a permanent municipal improvement of the highest character. Likewise would be the acquisition of eight blocks of land for the purpose of connecting the park with the Presidio military reservation, and likewise the acquisition of two blocks of land in the Mission district for public park purposes. If Golden Gate Park may be designated as a permanent municipal improvement of the city and county of San Francisco, then the extension of that park by way of boulevards to the military reservation and to Van Ness avenue are improvements of a like character. It is thus apparent that the acquisition of this property by the city and county is authorized by the section of the charter quoted, wherein the power to acquire permanent municipal improvements is granted. The scheme for the acquisition of this property, as set out in the provisions of the charter, is also perfect and complete. Section 29, previously quoted, declares that "all the provisions of this charter providing for the acquisition of public utilities, so far as the same are applicable, shall apply to the manner of submitting such propositions to the electors, to the limitations of said bonded indebtedness, to the issuance and character of the same, and to the time when, and the kind of money in which, said bonded indebtedness shall be payable." Upon turning to article 12 of the charter, we find there laid down a comprehensive scheme, perfect and full in all its details, providing for the acquisition of public utilities by the creation of a bonded indebtedness. As we have seen, the provisions of that article are made applicable to the provisions of said section 29, and thus we find within the provisions of the charter a complete and perfect scheme for the acquisition of permanent municipal improvements of the character now before us. The respective schemes of the charter and the park and boulevard act for the creation of a bonded indebtedness to acquire improvements are different in many respects, and therefore the park and boulevard act is inconsistent with the charter. The result declared by the constitution where such inconsistency exists must follow, namely, the park and boulevard act is superseded by the charter. That act being superseded by the charter, it is gone from the case. It went instantaneously the moment the charter took effect. It is no more a law applicable to the city and county of San Francisco, and its provisions can no longer be invoked to support this proceeding.

By reason of the foregoing conditions the remaining questions present themselves: May these bonds now be issued under the provisions of the charter? May the charter take up the work where the park and boulevard act left it, and continue it to the end? Our answers to these interrogatories must be in the negative. It cannot be done, for the charter only contemplates the issuance of bonds based upon the procedure laid down by the charter. As we have said, the scheme laid down is complete in itself, and it must be followed as a whole, or the attempt to create a bonded indebtedness will inevitably come to nothing. The bonds must be issued after the procedure marked out by the charter has been followed, or they cannot be issued at all.

By carrying out to greater detail the discussion of the proposition of law which has just received our consideration, the soundness of the conclusion declared is even more apparent. In the creation of a bonded indebtedness under the charter, article 12, § 9, of that instrument thus declares what shall be specified in the notice of election: "Such notice shall specify the purpose for which the indebtedness is to be incurred, the number and character of the bonds to be issued, the rate of interest to be paid, and the amount of the tax levy to be made for the payment thereof." It must be conceded that no bond issue can be had under the charter unless the notice of election shall specify the matters demanded in said section 9. By this provision of the charter the electors, prior to the election, must have notice of the facts there set forth; and, if they do not have such notice, no election held under any other notice can give the city and county authority to issue bonds. The notice of election here involved did not fill the measure furnished by the aforesaid section. Even if it be conceded that the number of bonds may be deduced by mathematical computation from the notice of election given, still the character of the bonds is not mentioned. Section 11 of the same article declares that those bonds shall be of the character known as "serials." No other kind of bonds can be issued under the charter. Yet this notice of election says nothing about serials, or possibly it may be said that the notice of election wherein it is provided that the bonds shall mature and become due and payable in 20 years from the date thereof is in effect a notice to the electors that they shall not be serial bonds. Does the city and county now propose to issue serial bonds (that is, bonds a certain number of which are payable each year), or does it propose to issue bonds all payable at the end of 20 years? But it cannot issue serial bonds, for the notice of election said nothing about serial bonds. Neither can it issue bonds payable in 20 years, for bonds of that character cannot be issued under the charter. It seems to follow that bonds cannot be issued at all. Again, it was demanded by said section 9 that the notice of election shall specify "the amount of the tax levy to be made for the payment thereof." In view of the fact that the bonds must be serial bonds, it is perfectly plain what this provision of the notice means. Yet there is nothing in the notice of election given in this case even looking towards the carrying out of this demand of the law.

We will not pursue further this investigation. The scheme provided by the charter for the creation of a bonded indebtedness being materially different from the scheme provided by the park and boulevard act for the creation of a bonded indebtedness, a proceeding inaugurated under the one scheme cannot be continued under the other. When the first scheme failed, the proceeding failed. When the law was superseded, that moment the proceeding fell. Again, it is plain that the notice to electors actually given for this election was not the notice demanded by the charter, and no issue of bonds under the provisions of the charter can be valid which has not the support of an election held under a notice specifying, in substance, all matters designated in section 9 of article 12 of the charter. The notice relied on in this case did not comply with the provisions of that section, and therefore no issue of bonds by the city and county of San Francisco based upon an election held under some other notice will be valid. For the foregoing reasons, the judgment is reversed and the cause remanded.

TEMPLE, J. I concur in the conclusion reached in the principal opinion, but upon slightly different grounds. As I understand the opinion, it is determined that the park and boulevard act was abrogated by the adoption of the charter, because the charter itself contains a provision authorizing the supervisors to do the same thing authorized by that act. In other words, the purchase of lands for parks and boulevards, and the issuance of bonds, is a "municipal affair," because it is authorized by the charter itself. To sustain this proposition reliance is placed entirely upon section 29 of article 16 of the charter, which is an article entitled "Miscellaneous," and is made up of explanatory and supplemental provisions. Section 29, as I understand it, merely provides for a possible contingency, to wit, when, in pursuing its lawful authority, the board proposes to acquire permanent municipal improvements, it finds that the cost will exceed the annual revenue, it may issue bonds. Whether it may acquire the particular improvement or expend municipal funds for that purpose is not determined at all by that section. To answer this question, which was the main matter discussed by counsel, other charter provisions must be considered. Surely it was never doubted that, if these lands could be acquired under the charter, bonds could be issued therefor under section 29. As I understand the controversy, the park and boulevard act was relied upon because the city authorities were of the opinion that the municipal charter of itself did not authorize the purchase of the lands for that purpose. And since the charter specifies a great many public municipal improvements which the supervisors and the board of public works may acquire, and does not specify parks and boulevards, there is some ground for such belief.

Subdivision 12, c. 2, art. 2, certainly does not, of itself, unaided by other provisions, authorize the board of supervisors to purchase lands by condemnation for a public park. Surely it was not intended to confer power to purchase by condemnation, when the board could not purchase without condemnation if the owner would sell for a fair price. It does not authorize the board to purchase lands for a purpose for which they could not have purchased without this authority. It only authorizes the proceeding to condemn when the owners are unwilling to sell or demand an exorbitant price. The public uses referred to are those defined in other sections. Can it be contended that it was intended to throw the door wide open, and authorize such purchase for any use which might be deemed public? To acquire lands for a race track or a beer hall, or perhaps for a hotel, might be deemed a public use. The reference emphasizes my proposition that the doctrine of this opinion is that the only limitation on the power of the board is that, in the opinion of the board, the public interests require the acquisition of the improvement. The professed policy of the advocates of the new charter was not to leave the gates ajar.

From my point of view, it is not necessary to determine whether the municipal charter authorizes the purchase of lands for park and boulevard purposes. If it does authorize such purchase, plainly, as determined by Mr. Justice GAROUTTE, the procedure there prescribed has not been followed. If such power is not found in the charter, it is my opinion no general law can add that provision to the charter. I do not comprehend how it can be said that a statute which confers upon a city council additional powers over affairs of the city,—powers which have always been deemed municipal, and only concern the city as such,—which authorizes the city to incur an indebtedness of $4,000,000, and which makes necessary a large annual expenditure by the city forever thereafter, is not a municipal affair. If a general law having such effect is not prohibited by section 6, art. 11, of our constitution, then language has lost its force, and nothing has been accomplished by this long struggle and many amendments to the constitution for the purpose of preventing legislative interference with municipal affairs.

McHUGH v. CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (S. F. 2,378.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—PUBLIC IMPROVEMENT ACT SUPERSEDED BY SAN FRANCISCO CHARTER.

Since the San Francisco city charter provides a complete scheme for the acquisition of "permanent municipal buildings and improvements," which include school houses, sewers, etc., by bonded indebtedness, the public improvement act, relating to the construction of such improvements in the same manner, is superseded by the charter, being inconsistent with the latter; and hence bonds issued for such purposes cannot be issued under such act, but must be issued under the charter.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by Felix McHugh against the city and county of San Francisco and others. From a judgment in favor of defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Wm. T. Baggett, Charles E. Naylor, and Arthur H. Barendt, for appellant. Franklin K. Lane, City Atty., George W. Lane, and Garret McEnerney, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This case in all essential particulars is the same as Fritz v. City and County of San Francisco (S. F. No. 2,377) 64 Pac. 566, this day decided. By the facts disclosed upon this appeal, there is no question whatever but that the bonded indebtedness is to be created for the purpose of acquiring "permanent municipal buildings and improvements." School houses, sewers, etc., come directly within that classification. This being so, the act termed the "Public Improvement Act" is inconsistent with the provisions of the charter; for by the charter provisions a complete scheme for the acquisition of this character of municipal improvements by the creation of a bonded indebtedness is provided. For this reason the improvement act is superseded by the charter, and, being superseded, it stands as to the municipality exactly the same as if it were repealed. No bonds can be issued under its provisions, for as a law it is dead to the city. The bonds, therefore, if they may be issued at all, must be issued under the provisions of the charter. Yet bonds cannot be issued under the provisions of the charter unless their issuance has been authorized by the provisions of the charter. While the notice of election in this case appears to have been in a similar form to that laid down in the charter, yet the other objections suggested to the proposed issuance of these bonds are fatal. For these reasons, and upon the authority of the decision in Fritz v. City and County of San Francisco, supra, the judgment in this case is reversed, and the cause remanded.

TEMPLE, J. I concur in the judgment.

(Supreme Court of California. April 5, 1901.)

APPEAL—REVIEW—DISCRETION—NEW TRIAL—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY—OBJECTION—WAIVER.

1. The question whether the location of a mining claim had been distinctly marked, so that its boundaries could be readily traced, as required by Rev. St. U. S. § 2324, being a question of fact to be determined in each case by the trial court on the evidence presented, its action in granting plaintiff's motion for a new trial, in an action to quiet title tried to the court, on the ground that his notice of location was void for failure to contain a sufficient description, will not be reviewed on appeal, though the finding specified many particulars in reference to the manner in which the boundaries were marked, not supported by the evidence in the statement, which recited that it contained all the evidence, since the court's action was a matter within its discretion.

2. Where it was not objected on the trial that evidence was not admissible under the pleadings, such objection cannot be made on appeal.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Tuolumne county; G. W. Nicol, Judge.

Action by J. W. McCarthy against Michael E. Phelan. From an order granting a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

F. W. Street and J. B. Curtin, for appellant. J. F. Rooney and Jas. H. Daly, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. Action to quiet title to a mining claim. The defendant is in the possession of the property, and the plaintiff alleges ownership and right of possession in himself. The defendant denies the plaintiff's allegations, and alleges his own ownership, setting forth also his location of the claim, under the laws of the United States. The cause was tried by the court, and findings of fact made by it to the effect that the plaintiff made a location of the claim October 14, 1895, giving the character of the location and of the notice thereof; that from the time of said location until the 1st day of January, 1897, there was not $100 worth of work done upon the claim; that on January 18, 1897, the lands were public mineral lands of the United States, open to location, and that on that day the defendant entered thereon and located the same in sufficient compliance with the requirements of the United States laws. The court also found that on the 26th of March, 1896, the plaintiff again entered upon the claim for the purpose of relocating the same, and therein performed the acts required therefor under the laws of the United States. Upon these facts the court found that the defendant was the owner and entitled to possession of the claim, and rendered judgment in his favor. The plaintiff moved for a new trial upon the grounds of the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the decision, and for certain errors of law committed at the trial, specifications of which were set forth in the statement. The court granted his motion, setting forth in its order as the grounds upon which it was made—First, that the findings of forfeiture were outside of the issues raised by the pleadings; second, that the plaintiff's notice of location of October 14, 1895, is void for not containing a sufficient description of the claim; third, that said mine was not open to location January 18, 1897, in that the plaintiff had made a valid location of claim March 26, 1896. From this order the defendant has appealed.

In the statement upon his motion for a new trial the plaintiff specified as one of the grounds for granting the same that the evidence was insufficient to justify the finding of the court that in making his location of the mining claim, in October, 1895, the plaintiff marked off the boundaries thereof in such a manner that they could be readily traced, and the statement of the court, in granting the motion upon the ground that the plaintiff's notice of location did not contain a sufficient description of the claim, is in pursuance of this specification. Section 2324, Rev. St. U. S., authorizing the location of mining claims, declares: "The location must be distinctly marked on the ground so that its boundaries can be readily traced." Whether the location of a mining claim has been distinctly marked on the ground so that its boundaries can be readily traced is a question of fact to be determined in each case by the trial court upon the evidence presented to it upon that issue. Erhardt v. Boaro, 113 U. S. 527, 5 Sup. Ct. 560, 28 L. Ed. 1116; Hammer v. Milling Co., 130 U. S. 291, 9 Sup. Ct. 548, 32 L. Ed. 964; Bennett v. Harkrader, 158 U. S. 441, 15 Sup. Ct. 863, 39 L. Ed. 1046; Book v. Mining Co. (C. C.) 58 Fed. 106; Warnock v. De Witt, 11 Utah, 324, 40 Pac. 205; Golden Fleece Gold & Silver Min. Co. v. Cable Consolidated Gold & Silver Min. Co., 12 Nev. 312; Gleeson v. Mining Co., 13 Nev. 442; Howeth v. Sulenger, 113 Cal. 547, 45 Pac. 841. In Erhardt v. Boaro, supra, the notice of location was as follows: "We, the undersigned, claim fifteen hundred feet on this mineral bearing lode, vein, or deposit;" and an instruction by the circuit court that the notice was deficient, and that under it the locators could not claim any more than the very place in which the stake was planted, was held to be incorrect, the court saying: The notice "informed all persons subsequently seeking to excavate and open the lode or vein that the locators claim the whole extent along its course which the law permitted them to do. It is, indeed, indefinite in not stating the number of feet claimed on each side of the discovery point, and must, therefore, be limited to an equal number on each side; that is, to seven hundred and fifty feet along the course of the lode or vein in each direction from that point. To that extent, as a notice of discovery and original location, it is sufficient." In Gleeson v. Mining Co., supra, a notice of location, in which only its extent along the lode was given, was held sufficient, and that the width of the claim was to be determined by the boundaries marked upon the surface of the ground, under the limitations prescribed in section 2324. In Hammer v. Milling Co., supra, the court said that stakes driven in the ground may be such permanent monuments as will satisfy the requirements of the statute.

The evidence in the present case of the plaintiff's location of the claim in October, 1895, was that of the plaintiff himself, who identified the copy of the notice which he posted upon the claim, and who testified as to the manner in which he had marked its boundaries. The court in its findings specifies many particulars in reference to the manner in which these boundaries were marked, which find no support in the evidence contained in the statement, and it is recited in the statement that it contains all the evidence that was admitted in the case. If the court, upon a re-examination of this evidence, was of the opinion that it had erred in finding that the plaintiff did mark off the boundaries so that the claim could be readily traced, and that for this reason there was not a sufficient description of the claim, it was justified in setting aside its decision. Its action in this respect was so far a matter within its discretion as to preclude us from a review thereof.

As the order granting a new trial must be affirmed, it is unnecessary to determine whether in an action of this character it is incumbent upon the defendant to allege the facts constituting a forfeiture of the plaintiff's right to the possession of the claim. When the evidence upon this point was offered, the only objection thereto was the general one that it was irrelevant, immaterial, and incompetent. If the plaintiff would have objected thereto that the evidence was not admissible under the pleadings, he should have specified this ground of objection, and the defendant could then have asked leave to amend his answer. Having tried the cause without making the objection that the evidence was not within the issues, he ought not to be permitted now to make that objection. Upon the cause going down to the superior court, if the defendant shall be advised that an amendment of his pleadings in this particular is proper, that court will doubtless allow such amendment to be made. The order is affirmed.

(Supreme Court of California. April 5, 1901.)
INJUNCTION—JURISDICTION—MULTIPLICITY OF SUITS—CONSPIRACY—RAILROADS—TICKETS—STOP-OVER PRIVILEGES—REFUSAL—PENALTY—PASSENGER—RECOVERY—STARE DECISIS.

1. Where, in an action to restrain defendants from prosecuting actions under Civ. Code, § 490, providing that every railroad corporation must furnish every person desiring a passage on their passenger cars a ticket entitling the holder to ride to his destination or any intermediate station, or from any intermediate station to his destination, within six months, and making the company refusing such ticket, or the passage therein called for, liable to the person refused in the sum of $200, and the complaint alleged that defendants composed a confederacy of individuals formed to create and prosecute about 3,000 causes of action for penalties against plaintiff, equity has jurisdiction of the case, and can consolidate the actions, and dispose of it in its entirety.

2. Certain persons combined for the purpose of creating causes of actions for the penalty prescribed under Civ. Code, § 490, and demanded tickets with the stop-over privilege of a railroad company, and also demanded passage from an intermediate station, having stopped there, for the purpose of being refused passage on a subsequent train, nearly 3,000 times. They did not desire the stop-over privilege, but in making their demands desired that they be refused. Held, that they could not recover the penalties provided by the statute, since it referred only to persons desiring the stop-over privilege.

3. A prior decision, in an action for refusal to carry a bona fide passenger, that though the face of the ticket says nothing as to stop-over privileges, yet Civ. Code, § 490, enters into the contract, and gives the holder of the ticket stop-over privileges, is not stare decisis in actions by members of the combination to recover the penalties allowed by the section.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; A. A. Sanderson, Judge.

Action by the Southern Pacific Railway Company against W. H. Robinson and others. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Thomas V. Cator and C. M. Jennings, for appellants. Foshay Walker and Pierson & Mitchell (Wm. F. Herrin and John Garber, of counsel), for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This action was brought to restrain the appellants from prosecuting about 500 suits, which it was alleged in the complaint they had already commenced, and also from bringing any other actions based on claims for penalties of $200 each, which they claimed were due them by reason of alleged violations by the respondent of the provisions of section 490 of the Civil Code, and further calling upon the appellants to submit to the court for adjudication all claims which they had of a similar character. It is alleged that they comprised a confederacy of individuals who had been seeking to extort money from the railroad company by laying apparent foundations for claims to penalties, bringing suits thereon, and prosecuting those suits severally to final judgment. Issue was joined, and upon the trial the court found as a fact that 674 of these actions were pending in various justices' courts, and also found that about 2,300 other alleged causes of action of the same general character were held by them. It thus appears that appellants held about 3,000 alleged causes of action against plaintiff, which they were either prosecuting or threatening to prosecute, and upon which they were claiming $600,000 in penalties, or, as they term it, "liquidated damages."

This important litigation rests upon section 490 of the Civil Code, which grants a stop-over privilege to passengers holding a particular kind of railroad ticket. The section is as follows: "Every railroad corporation must provide, and, on being tendered the fare therefor fixed as provided in the preceding section, furnish to every person desiring a passage on their passenger cars a ticket which entitles the purchaser to a ride, and to the accommodations provided on their cars, from the depot or station where the same is purchased to any other depot or station on the line of their road. Every such ticket entitles the holder thereof to ride on their passenger cars to the station or depot of destination, or any intermediate station, or from any intermediate station to the depot of destination designated in the ticket, at any time within six months thereafter. Any corporation failing so to provide and furnish tickets, or refusing the passage which the same calls for when sold, must pay to the person so refused the sum of two hundred dollars."

The aforesaid section was construed by this court as granting stop-over privileges to passengers in the case of Robinson v. Railroad Co., 105 Cal. 526, 38 Pac. 94, 722, 28 L. R. A. 773. It was there strenuously contended that the section had no such effect, but this court determined that the railroad company was mistaken in its contention as to the law; and, pending the final decision of that case, these appellants most industriously engaged in the business of manufacturing the 3,000 alleged causes of action here involved. No case is found in the law books where an undertaking of this character ever assumed such proportions, and where the spirit of speculation was carried on daily for weeks, months, and even years, with all the method and system of a great business undertaking; and it may be well to suggest right here that the law and the facts should be very plain before any court would assist appellants in carrying out this questionable venture to a successful end.

Some objection is made to the form of the present action. Yet, while the proceeding is somewhat novel, it may be said that the facts upon which it is inaugurated are also somewhat novel, and we see no reason why equity will not take hold of this state of facts. In Weinstock, Lubin & Co. v. Marks, 109 Cal. 529, 46 Pac. 142, 30 L. R. A. 182, the power of equity to deal with novel conditions was directly presented and discussed, and it was held that there were no fixed rules limiting the power of equity in dealing with subject-matters coming generally within its jurisdiction, and that the chancellor should not be cramped in the exercise of his powers by fixed and rigid rules of law. We leave this branch of the case with the declaration that this action is maintainable in a court of equity by reason of the claim of a confederacy and combination formed and existing between these appellants to create and prosecute the aforesaid 3,000 causes of action against the plaintiff; and upon the further ground that, in order to avoid a multiplicity of actions, equity will consolidate these 3,000 alleged causes of action into one action, and, thus having taken hold of the matter, will dispose of it in its entirety.

The evidence in this case is sufficient to support the material findings of fact made by the trial court, and we will not deal with it in detail. It shows that these appellants combined and concerted together to create these alleged causes of action, with the sole end in view of securing the penalties or damages provided for in the aforesaid section of the Code, and that fact is a vital point in the case. The findings further establish that these appellants did not desire the stop-over privilege, but, upon the contrary, in making their demands for such privilege, desired that those demands should be refused. It is further found that appellants stopped over in Oakland, in transit to Alameda, for the single purpose and object of securing a refusal upon a subsequent train of the stop-over privilege, and thus lay the foundation for a cause of action. There is some general evidence that, upon 20 of these occasions when stop-over privileges were denied, certain of these appellants had business in the city of Oakland. But the evidence to this effect is not clear and explicit, and, in view of the fact that 2,980 of the stop-overs were made when the parties had no business, did not desire to stop over, and demanded the privilege simply to lay the foundation for a suit based upon a denial thereof, we feel that the court was entirely justified in placing these 20 refusals in a common receptacle with the remaining 2,980.

Whatever rights these appellants have are purely statutory. Their entire right, whatever it may be, is found alone in the provisions of section 490 of the Civil Code. The tickets sold to appellants in all these cases are similar to the one which was involved in the Robinson Case, heretofore cited. While the face of the ticket says nothing whatever as to stop-over privileges, yet the court has held that section 490 enters into the contract made by the parties, and must be read as a part thereof, and from the language of that section it was held by construction that stop-over privileges were given to the holders of the tickets there described. That is the length and width of the Robinson decision, and it is in no way stare decisis upon the question now before the court. That question is this: Are these appellants within the scope, spirit, and intent of the law? That is, what is a fair and reasonable construction of this section of the Code? And we are greatly aided in arriving at that construction by a consideration of the objects and purposes of its enactment. That particular portion of it bearing upon this matter is essentially of a remedial character, and it was enacted solely for the benefit of the traveling public. It was enacted solely to enable passengers traveling upon railroad trains to stop over at intermediate stations for the purposes of business or pleasure, and then at any time within six months thereafter to resume their journey to the original point of destination, without the payment of an additional fare.

The first part of the section declares that the railroad corporation, upon being tendered the proper fare, must furnish a ticket to every person desiring a passage upon their passenger trains, which ticket entitles a passenger, etc. Now, let us assume that the section provided for the mulcting of the corporation in damages or penalties to the amount of $200 for any refusal upon its part to furnish such a ticket upon demand. Without question, a mere tender of the fare, and demand upon the corporation for the ticket, would not conclusively fasten the liability for a penalty upon it. This is true, for the reason that the section says the person demanding the ticket must be one "desiring a passage" on the corporation's passenger cars. Whether or not he be such a person is a pure question of fact, to be decided like any other question of fact, before a right of recovery would be established, and, if that question of fact be decided in the negative, no recovery could be had. A person desiring a ticket for any other purpose than for use upon the corporation's passenger cars would not be a person coming within the purview of the section, and therefore the corporation would not be liable in refusing him the ticket. If the law had been such as the illustration here shows, and these appellants had tendered the proper fare, demanded tickets, and had been refused, and had made the tender expecting and desiring to be refused tickets, and for the single purpose of creating a cause of action against the corporation, their efforts would have gone for naught in any court of justice; for they would not have been acting in good faith either towards the corporation or towards the law. They would have been mere pretenders, and not persons desiring a passage on the passenger cars of the railroad corporation. They would have placed themselves neither within the letter nor the spirit of the statute. Indeed, the proposition may be more broadly stated to this effect: The corporation, either with or without the section of the Code, owes no duty to furnish a ticket to any person, unless that person desires to put it to the use for which it was made and issued. It appears, therefore, by the provisions of the Code itself, that, as to parties entitled to tickets, this section was only dealing with, and treating of, persons who desired to become passengers upon its trains, and these persons do not come within that class.

When these appellants delivered up their tickets at the ferry gates, they demanded what they termed "Oakland Stop-Over Checks." Let us assume the statute fixed a penalty to be suffered by the corporation if it refused on demand to give Oakland stop over checks. If such were the law, we are satisfied appellants would not be entitled to recover the penalty fixed by the statute; for when they made their demands for the checks they did not desire them, but desired a refusal of them. If they made a demand purely and solely for the purpose of securing a refusal thereof, and thus laying the foundation for the future prosecution of an action to recover the penalty, then certainly they did not desire to exercise the stop-over privilege, and therefore did not desire a stop-over check. These people, in effect, said: "I do not want to stop over in Oakland, but I demand that you give me a stop-over check." Or they said: "If you will give me a stop-over check for Oakland I do not want it, but if you will not give me the check I do want it." The law does not require the corporation to give checks to people of that kind. The whole spirit and intent of the law declare that persons of that class do not come within its provisions.

In the enactment of the section of the Code, the legislature only intended to give the stop-over privilege to holders of tickets desiring to exercise it. It would be a reductio ad absurdum to say that it was intended for any other purpose. That is the entire force and effect of the act; and it stands the same as if it had said, in plain and direct words, "A passenger holding a ticket and desiring a stop-over privilege is entitled to it by virtue of this ticket." But a desire to exercise the stop-over privilege, and a desire to lay the foundation for a cause of action by securing a refusal of the stop-over privilege, cannot exist in the mind at the same time. They are wholly irreconcilable, and cannot stand together.

It is claimed that these appellants were the holders of first-class, unlimited tickets furnished by the corporation, and by the contract thus entered into between them and the corporation—considering section 490 as a part thereof—they were entitled to stop-over privileges as a naked legal right. This contention is mainly sound, and, if these parties had desired to exercise that stop-over privilege, the right was theirs, and the corporation would have violated the law, and have subjected itself to the penalties therein named if that right had been denied to them. But the trial court has found, and the finding is clinched by the evidence, that these parties did not desire to exercise this right. Informing the conductor upon the train that they desired to exercise it, or testifying in court at the trial that they desired to exercise it, is not conclusive evidence of the fact. It may be prima facie evidence of the fact, but the daily conduct of these parties for months, and even years, indicates otherwise, and absolutely overwhelms all evidence to the contrary.

A person holding one of these tickets, and traveling from San Francisco direct to Alameda via Oakland, would have no right of action under this section, for the reason—First, that he did not desire a stop-over privilege at Oakland; or, second, if he did desire it, he did not demand it. Both of these things are equally necessary to support a recovery. If a person simply within his own mind desires to exercise the stop-over privilege at Oakland, but says nothing to the corporation about it, he has no right of action; yet he is in a position just as favorable to the law as one who does not desire to stop over, but in the loudest of tones demands of the corporation the privilege of stopping over. A mere demand of that kind, without the desire to stop over, constitutes but words and noise,—nothing more. A person going direct to Alameda from San Francisco, with the unexpressed desire to stop over at Oakland, has no right of action, because he has not been deprived by the corporation of the stop-over right. Neither have these appellants been deprived of the stop-over right, although they demanded it; and this is true because they did not desire or want the right, and would not have exercised it if it had been given them. This section of the Code—be it construed strictly or liberally, narrowly or broadly,—does not contemplate a case where the stop-over privilege is denied to a person who does not want it, and who would refuse it if offered to him.

Let us look at this question from a slightly different angle. The tickets furnished by the corporation gave these persons a stop-over privilege; that is, the privilege of stopping over at Oakland, an intermediate station, and thereafter, within six months, the right to resume the journey to the original point of destination without payment of an additional charge. This was a privilege and right given by the contract of carriage. It was purely optional with the holder of the ticket whether or not he would invoke it. If he did not desire to make use of the right, he had that option. The beneficial and important element to the passenger in this stop-over privilege was the right to resume his journey without payment of an additional fare. This is plain, for he could stop at the intermediate station, regardless of the contract evidenced by his ticket. Now, when these appellants resumed their journey from Oakland to Alameda, and demanded of the conductor free passage to Alameda, they did not act in good faith, for they demanded some thing they did not want, and demanded it, not to get it, but to secure a refusal of it, and did this solely in order that a foundation for a cause of action might be laid against the corporation. For this reason the demand was not made in good faith, and their entire conduct was opposed to the spirit and purpose of the law; for the purpose and spirit of the law was to give passengers traveling upon the corporation's passenger trains the stop-over privilege, if, in fact, they desired to exercise it. These appellants do not come within that class, for they never desired to exercise the privilege. While it even may be said that they desired to stop over in Oakland, still it cannot be said that they desired to continue their journey without paying an additional fare. Upon the contrary, it may well be said they desired to pay the additional fare from Oakland to Alameda.

Considering these railroad tickets to constitute contracts giving stop-over privileges to all the holders thereof who desire to exercise them, then we have direct judicial authority for the conclusion to which we have arrived. In the case of Meyers v. Railroad Co. (Sup.) 41 N. Y. Supp. 798, the court there said: "The command of the statute is that the corporation shall carry for a single fare, between any two points on its road, 'any passenger desiring to make one continuous trip between such points,' and the plaintiff's whole case must rest upon the proof of his allegation that upon each of the occasions when he was refused a transfer ticket he desired to make a continuous trip from the point where he first boarded the car to a point on the line to which he demanded to be transferred. Unless he has established that fact, he is not within the protection of the statute, and no penalty has been incurred by defendant by refusing his demand. That he did not desire to make a continuous trip between two points on the connecting lines is too plain for argument. His whole purpose was not to be transferred at the point where he made his demand. He knew that the demand would be refused, and he had, when he boarded the car, no intention to proceed beyond the point where the two lines connected, and no desire to go beyond that point. His whole purpose was fulfilled when he reached the place where he could conveniently have his demand for a transfer ticket refused. * * * To call such a person a 'passenger' desiring to take a continuous trip between two points on the connecting lines would be to defeat the true purpose and intent of the statute." In that case, notwithstanding the passenger demanded a transfer, thereby asserting that he desired to continue his journey upon the corporation's road, the court found from the evidence that he did not desire to continue his journey, and therefore his demand for a transfer went for naught, and a refusal to issue it to him did not form the basis of an action. In other words, this passenger was not a person coming within the class with which the statute there involved was dealing. In this case, if section 490, as to stop-over privileges, only deals with holders of tickets who desire to exercise that privilege, then these appellants do not come within that class; for, according to the findings of fact, backed up by the whole history of the case, they never desired to exercise the stop-over right.

It is asserted that, "if appellants had a legal right to stop over, then the reasons why they stopped over were immaterial in this case." Or, in other words, it is claimed the motives of appellants in stopping over at Oakland are an immaterial matter. As before suggested, stopping over at Oakland, or desiring to stop over at Oakland, is not the exercise, or the desire to exercise, the stop-over privilege. The stop-over privilege is the right to stop over, and thereafter continue the journey, without the payment of an additional fare. Both of these elements are essential to the right. And, if these appellants did not desire to exercise both elements of the right, they did not desire to exercise the right. This is not a mere question of the motives which actuated appellants in traveling upon the corporation's trains, but it is the question: Were the appellants deprived of a right granted by the ticket, which right they desired to exercise? If they were not so deprived, they were not damaged, and do not come within the provisions of the statute; for the statute being remedial, and, as contended by counsel for appellants, designed to furnish compensation for damage suffered by the passenger, it could only have been intended to apply to cases where the passenger has suffered some damage, and therefore the appellants would not come within its terms.

Do the rules of statutory construction, as illustrated by the decisions of courts, justify the meaning that we have given to this statute, namely, "all holders of these tickets are entitled to exercise the stop-over privilege given by said tickets, if they so desire?" It is hardly necessary to go outside of the lids of appellants' brief in this case for authority to justify the aforesaid construction of the section. This same section uses the words, "every railroad corporation," and by its terms only attempts to deal with tickets issued by railroad corporations. Yet appellants find it necessary to construe this language, and, invoking statutory rules of construction for that purpose, declare the words "railroad corporation" are broad enough to include, "persons, partnerships, and associations." We are not concerned as to the soundness of appellants' position in this regard. But to support it they say: "Anything which is within the purpose and intention of the makers of the statute, is as much within the statute as if it were its letter." Again they say: "It is a cardinal rule of interpretation that a statute must be construed with reference to the objects intended to be accomplished by it." And again: "That construction will be given an act which will carry into effect the true intent of the legislature." And again: "An act induced by public considerations, the purpose of which is to protect the traveling public, should receive a liberal construction to effectuate the benign purposes of its framers, and every statute should be expounded, not according to the letter, but according to the meaning." These rules of construction are elementary, and appellants cite numberless authorities in support thereof. We now indorse those rules, and tried and tested by them, the construction we have given section 490 cannot be successfully assailed.

In the very recent case of Ex Parte Lorenzen, 128 Cal. 438, 61 Pac. 68, 50 L. R. A. 55, this court said: "But for the more substantial objection that the ordinance by its terms would oppress and lead to the conviction of persons guilty of no fraudulent act, it is to be remembered that the letter of a penal statute is not of controlling force, and that the courts in construing such statutes, from very ancient times, have sought for the essence and spirit of the law, and decided in accordance with them, even against express language; and in so doing they have not found it necessary to overthrow the law, but have made it applicable to the class of persons or the kind of acts clearly contemplated within its scope." And the court held that, notwithstanding the language of the ordinance was broad enough to include all passengers, as matter of construction it only included passengers who put the transfer to an unlawful use. For the foregoing reasons, the judgment and order are affirmed.

HEARNE v. DE YOUNG et al. (L. A. 733.)

LIBEL—PUBLICATION IN NEWSPAPER—MALICE—BAD REPUTATION OF PLAINTIFF—PRIOR PUBLICATIONS—EVIDENCE—REPUTATION—DAMAGES—INADEQUACY—NEW TRIAL.

1. Where a verdict for one dollar is returned in a libel case, the court may grant a new trial, if it deems such damages to be wholly inadequate.

2. An instruction in a libel suit that, if the libelous article was published without malice, only such actual damages may be recovered as are shown by the evidence, is erroneous, since actual damages may be recovered in the absence of actual proof.

3. An instruction defining "actual malice" in a libel case, which is not sufficiently full, is cured by another instruction giving a complete and satisfactory definition thereof.

4. Where the publisher of a newspaper has no actual malice in the publication of a libelous article, actual damages only can be recovered.

5. Evidence of the bad reputation of a plaintiff in libel before the publication of the libel complained of is admissible as bearing on the question of actual damages.

6. A newspaper publisher, who is defendant in a suit for a libel, may testify to his sources of information, for the purpose of showing his good faith in publishing the article.

7. A newspaper publisher, who is defendant in a suit for the publication of a libel, cannot introduce prior publications of the libelous article in other newspapers published in the vicinity of the place where the transaction spoken of in the libel was stated to have occurred.

8. Where a newspaper article charging the commission of a crime is the basis of a libel suit, the defendant cannot show a general report existing at the time of the publication that the plaintiff committed that or a similar crime.

9. Actual damage for a libel published without malice on the part of the publisher is not confined to actual pecuniary loss, but includes loss of reputation, shame, injuries to feelings, etc.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; Lucien Shaw, Judge.

Action for libel by Joseph C. Hearne against M. H. De Young and others. Judgment for one dollar in favor of plaintiff, and from an order granting him a new trial the defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Lloyd & Wood, J. S. Callen, and Wm. J. Hunsaker, for appellants. E. W. Hendrick, Herbert Peery, and Works & Works, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This appeal is taken from an order granting plaintiff a new trial. The case has once been before this court. 119 Cal. 670, 52 Pac. 150, 499. It is an action for damages based upon an alleged libelous publication in defendant De Young's newspaper. Upon the return of the case to the lower court for a second trial the complaint was amended, thereby counting alone upon that portion of the published article relating to the murder of one Dr. Stillwell, at Hannibal, Mo. A complete statement of the facts may be found in the opinion of the court rendered upon the former appeal. The jury rendered a verdict in favor of plaintiff, assessing the damages at one dollar, and a motion for a new trial was made upon the ground of the inadequacy of the damages found, and also upon the ground of errors of law committed by the trial court. A general order granting a new trial was entered, and defendants appeal from that order.

While it may be conceded that, if the lower court had denied the motion for a new trial based upon the ground that the damages awarded were not enough, then this court would have sustained the order, still it does not follow but that the court will affirm an order granting a new trial upon the ground of the inadequacy of the verdict. After the jury by its verdict has once placed the amount of damages, it will be an exceptional case where this court will interfere with the action of the trial court in reviewing an order either approving or rejecting the amount of the verdict. While in some cases this court has very properly held that the trial court should have granted a new trial by reason of the verdict being excessive in amount, still it has very rarely reversed an order of the trial court declaring the verdict too small. It is insisted that, as matter of law, the trial court declared the verdict inadequate. As far as we know from the record, the claim is not well founded, and it would seem that the verdict was declared too small as matter of fact. As to cases similar to the one at bar, it is said in Childers v. Publishing Co., 105 Cal. 289, 38 Pac. 903, in speaking of that branch of actual damages not included in special damages: "The remaining branch of actual damages embraces recovery for loss of reputation, shame, mortification, injury to feelings, etc., and, while special damages must be alleged and proven, general damages for outrage to feelings and loss of reputation need not be alleged in detail, and may be recovered in the absence of actual proof, and to the amount that the jury estimates will fairly compensate plaintiff for the injury done." While it thus appears that the jury has a wide discretion in assessing the amount of damages in cases of this character, still it is the duty of the trial court to see that the jury do not abuse that discretion in its exercise. And here, if the court deemed this verdict wholly inadequate in amount, it was its right and duty to order a new trial, and that order will not now be disturbed.

The soundness of the law evidenced by the following instructions is at issue upon this appeal. Those instructions have been numbered for the convenience of the court: *

(1) "You are instructed that if you find the defendant De Young did not publish the article in question in this case with actual malice or ill will towards the plaintiff, and that the publication was made in the 'Chronicle' in the usual course of his business as a public journalist, you will, in estimating the damages, if you should find for plaintiff, confine yourselves to the actual damages sustained by plaintiff because of the publication of that portion of the article complained of, as shown by the evidence; and, if you find that the plaintiff has not shown by the evidence that he sustained any actual damages on account of that portion of said article, you will, in case you find for plaintiff, fix the damages at a nominal sum only."

(2) "The jury are instructed that by the term, 'actual or express malice,' when used in these instructions, is meant a spiteful or rancorous disposition, which causes the act to be done for mischief."

(3) "You are instructed that if you find the defendant De Young did not publish the article in question in this case with actual malice, and if you further believe that the defendant De Young had no actual malice or ill will towards the plaintiff, and made the publication in the usual course of his business as a public journalist, you will, in estimating damages (if you should find for plaintiff), confine yourselves to the actual damages sustained by plaintiff because of the publication of that portion of the article which relates to the murder of Amos J. Stillwell, as shown by the evidence."

(4) "If you find from the evidence that the alleged libelous article consisted wholly or in part of the repetition of current reports of long standing, by which plaintiff's reputation had already become and was then impaired, you may take such fact into consideration in estimating damages, should you find for the plaintiff."

(5) "And if you should find for plaintiff, but find De Young did not have actual malice as aforesaid, then in estimating damages you will be confined to the actual pecuniary loss or damage shown by the evidence to have been sustained by the plaintiff because of the publication of that portion of the article which is complained of."

It may be said as to instruction numbered 1 that there must be malice in fact before exemplary damages may be allowed. Childers v. Publishing Co., supra. The term "actual damages," as here used, is broad enough to include damages for loss of reputation, shame, feelings, etc. Again, if there was no malice in fact established by the evidence against defendants, thus eliminating the question of exemplary damages from the case, and the jury thought plaintiff had suffered no actual damages, a verdict for nominal damages was perfectly proper. It was said in the Childers Case, "General damages may be recovered in the absence of actual proof." If the instruction here means that direct evidence must be offered, establishing actual damages, before a verdict may be given the plaintiff for such damages, then it is opposed to the doctrine declared in that case. It would seem that the instruction in this regard is too narrow in its statement of the law.

As to instruction numbered 2, it may be said that, while the definition of actual or express malice there found is probably not sufficiently broad to cover the full meaning of the term, still a complete and satisfactory definition was given in another portion of the charge. It is there said: "Actual malice, in this connection, means personal hatred or ill will towards the plaintiff, or wanton disregard of the civil obligations of the defendants towards the plaintiff." It is unnecessary to decide whether or not these two instructions are contradictory.

There is no legal objection to instruction numbered 3, but instruction numbered 4 is wrong. If plaintiff's reputation was to any degree bad before the article here in question was published, that fact may be taken into consideration by the jury in fixing the amount of actual damages suffered. While defendant Blunt, as decided upon the previous appeal, had the right to explain in detail the reasons which actuated him in publishing the article, and the sources of information upon which he acted in framing the article for publication, for the purpose of showing his good faith, still the admission in evidence of the Missouri papers containing articles of the same general character as that here under consideration was error. If this article was libelous, evidence that other papers also libeled the plaintiff in the same manner is inadmissible. Wilson v. Fitch, 41 Cal. 385. It is said in Newell, Defam. p. 800: "Hence the fact that the plaintiff had a general bad character before the date of the libel or slander may be given in evidence in mitigation of damages; but the defendant may not go into particular instances, still less may he prove the existence of a general report that the plaintiff has actually committed the particular offense of which the defendant accuses him, or any similar offense." For this reason, the instruction given was erroneous.

Instruction numbered 5 is unsound. Conceding there was no malice in fact upon the part of defendants in this case, still plaintiff in his recovery was not confined to an amount which would compensate him for his actual pecuniary loss or damage shown by the evidence. He was entitled to actual damages above and beyond any question of actual pecuniary loss; for he was entitled to damages for loss of reputation, etc. Childers v. Publishing Co., supra. For the foregoing reasons, the order is affirmed.

STORKE v. STORKE. (L. A. 767.)

NEW TRIAL—MOTION BARRED BY LACHES—ACCEPTANCE OF ALIMONY—BAR TO NEW TRIAL OF DIVORCE PROCEEDINGS.

1. Plaintiff secured a judgment of divorce, and a few weeks after defendant served notice of a motion for a new trial on a statement of the case, the court ordering plaintiff to pay defendant a certain sum to defray the cost of transcribing the testimony. Plaintiff failed to make the payment, and on the day for the settlement of the statement the order continuing the same recited that plaintiff had not complied with the previous order because of his inability to do so. No further proceedings were ever taken to settle the statement. Held, that the failure of plaintiff to make such payment did not excuse the laches of the defendant in prosecuting her motion, and it was error four years after to refuse to dismiss the motion for a new trial made on the ground of the laches of the defendant.

2. Defendant in a divorce proceeding against whom a judgment had been rendered is precluded from obtaining a new trial by the acceptance of the alimony paid in compliance with the judgment.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Barbara county; M. T. Allen, Judge.

Action by C. A. Storke against Yda Addis Storke. From an order denying plaintiff's motion to dismiss defendant's motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

B. F. Thomas, for appellant. Yda Addis Storke, in pro. per.

COOPER, C. This appeal is from an order denying a motion made by plaintiff to dismiss the defendant's motion for a new trial. On the 16th of January, 1895, the court made, and caused to be entered, a final judgment dissolving the bonds of matrimony existing between plaintiff and defendant upon the ground of defendant's extreme cruelty. This judgment awarded defendant $250 for alimony and $200 for attorney's fees and costs. After the entry thereof, and before any notice of intention to move for a new trial had been given, plaintiff paid to defendant, and defendant accepted, the said $450 so awarded to her by the judgment. On February 12, 1895, the defendant served a notice of intention to move for a new trial. The notice specified that the motion would be made upon a statement of the case. Thereupon the court, upon the application of the defendant, ordered that the plaintiff pay to the defendant on or before the 18th of February, 1895, the sum of $350 to defray the cost of transcribing the testimony in the case. On March 28th the defendant presented and served upon the plaintiff her proposed statement on motion for a new trial. After amendments were proposed by plaintiff, the judge designated May 8th as the day on which he would settle the statement. On that day the matter came on for settlement, and the judge continued the hearing until July 8th, reciting in his order of continuance the previous order requiring the plaintiff to pay $350 for transcribing the testimony, and that "through his inability to comply with said order" the plaintiff had not paid the same. No further proceedings have ever been taken towards the settlement of said statement, nor does it appear that plaintiff has ever had the ability to pay the said $350. On November 6, 1895, the defendant filed a petition setting forth the above facts, that she had not the means to pay for transcribing the testimony, and "that plaintiff is now, and at all times since the 18th day of February, 1895, has been, unable to pay her the money necessary to procure the said testimony," and asked that the said judgment be vacated and set aside. After notice and hearing, the court made an order setting aside the decree and judgment on account of the failure of the plaintiff to pay the $350, which the court found he had not the ability to pay. On January 16, 1896, the defendant appealed from that portion of the judgment decreeing a divorce between herself and the plaintiff. This appeal was dismissed here upon the ground that, the judgment having been vacated on defendant's motion, she could not appeal from such vacated judgment. Storke v. Storke, 111 Cal. 514, 44 Pac. 173. The plaintiff appealed from the order vacating and setting aside the judgment, and the order was reversed by this court. Storke v. Storke, 116 Cal. 51, 47 Pac. 869, 48 Pac. 121. In the opinion this court said: "When the court found that the statement which had been prepared by defendant's counsel represented as correctly as possible the proceedings had on the trial of said cause, its proper course was to settle the same accordingly." It was held that the court had no right to vacate the judgment, unless in proper proceedings it should determine that the judgment had been rendered upon some error of law or fact, or by reason of some inadvertence, or excusable neglect; that it could not disturb or change the rights of the parties, as determined by the judgment, by reason of facts or transactions occurring subsequent to the rendition thereof. The opinion was filed February 12, 1897. The defendant has taken no further steps to have said statement settled or said motion brought to a hearing. On March 30, 1899, the plaintiff served notice of motion to dismiss defendant's motion for a new trial, on the grounds, among others, that defendant has received all the money awarded to her by the said judgment, and thus waived her right to move for a new trial, and laches in prosecuting the same. The notice of motion was accompanied by affidavits setting forth the above facts, in substance. The defendant filed a counter affidavit, in which she set forth "that the only reason why the defendant has failed to prosecute her motion for a new trial is the fact that the said plaintiff has failed and refused to comply with the repeated orders of this court to pay to defendant alimony, and thereby enable her to present said motion." There is no attempt made in defendant's affidavit to show that there is any merit in her pending motion, or that she is prosecuting it in good faith. She asks for the sum of $350 to pay for transcribing the evidence, and for the further sum of $500 to pay counsel fees and expenses in prosecuting the motion. No pretense is made that she has ever tried to have the statement settled. The matter came on for hearing on the notice, affidavits, and the record on April 4, 1899, and the court made an order denying the motion.

We think the motion should have been granted upon both grounds herein stated. The court found by the judgment that defendant had been guilty of extreme cruelty, and that plaintiff was entitled to a divorce. The presumption is that the judgment is correct. It has become final, except as affected by the motion for a new trial. More than five years have elapsed since its entry. The court found that plaintiff was unable to pay the $350. It was held here that the court could not enforce the payment of the $350 by setting the judgment aside. Neither can it enforce it by keeping a motion designed to vacate it pending forever. This is not a remedy "applicable" to the enforcement of the order. The plaintiff might have been compelled by contempt proceedings, by execution, or other appropriate remedy to comply with the order for the payment of the $350, if he had the ability to do so. But the court, on the motion to vacate the judgment, found that plaintiff did not have the ability to pay it. Because plaintiff is unable financially to furnish defendant means to attack the judgment, it is not to be kept open forever. It is not like a case where plaintiff is seeking a divorce upon grave charges against defendant, and the court makes an order for the payment of a sum to enable defendant to protect her rights and present her defense. In such case the presumption is in favor of defendant. Here the presumption is in favor of the correctness of the judgment.

The rule is well settled in this state that a motion for a new trial must be prosecuted with due diligence. In Eckstein v. Calderwood, 27 Cal. 414, the statement was settled by the court in May, 1863. The motion not having been prosecuted, the respondent made a motion in December, 1863, to dismiss it for want of diligence in prosecuting it. The court granted the motion, and the order was affirmed here. In Boggs v. Clark, 37 Cal.

239, the statement was settled and filed August 6, 1867. The moving party not having taken any steps to prosecute the motion, it was dismissed, for want of diligence, in October, 1867. The order dismissing was affirmed here on appeal. In this case there is no excuse for the delay, except that plaintiff cannot pay $350 to defendant, against whom he has a judgment. Another reason exists why the motion for a new trial should be dismissed. Defendant accepted the part of the judgment that was beneficial to her. It was a final judgment, and by its terms gave her $450. This sum was based upon the findings, and was the result of the litigation. Defendant took the $450, and now seeks to attack the judgment through which she received it. This she cannot do. Having taken the benefit, she must bear the burden. The amount of this judgment was not large, but the principle is the same. It may have been as great a hardship to plaintiff to have paid the $450 as it would be to a wealthy man to pay $450,000. If the defendant should procure a new trial, she would still have the $450, and plaintiff would not have his divorce. If she has used it, or is otherwise unable to pay it back, the plaintiff cannot be placed in the same condition in which he was before the trial.

The principle is well settled that a party accepting and receiving the portion of the judgment beneficial to him cannot appeal from it. Bennett v. Van Syckel, 18 N. Y. 481; Clark v. Ostrander, 13 Am. Dec. 548, note; 2 Freem. Judgm. § 480a; People v. Burns, 78 Cal. 646, 21 Pac. 540; In re Baby's Estate, 87 Cal. 202, 25 Pac. 402; In re Shaver's Estate (Cal.) 63 Pac. 340. The above principle was applied by the supreme court of Indiana in Garner v. Garner, 38 Ind. 139, where the party against whom a decree of divorce was granted married. After his marriage he appealed, and his appeal was dismissed. The court said in the opinion: "It seems to be the law that a party cannot be relieved from a judgment of divorce after he has used the privilege of the judgment. Having availed himself of the benefits of the decree or judgment, he must bear its burdens." In Bourne v. Simpson, 9 B. Mon. 454, the husband brought suit against the wife for divorce, which was granted. The decree gave her a negro man, woman, and child, two beds, a French bedstead, a horse, $100, and a piano. She received and used all the property except the piano. She afterwards claimed the right to dower in certain lands of which the husband was seised during coverture. The court in the opinion said: "Having used all the privileges conferred on her by the decree, she is too late in complaining of its burdens, if any such exist." The rule is well stated in Baylies, New Trials, p. 18, § 7: "A party may also waive his right to appeal from a judgment or order by acts which are wholly inconsistent with the assertion of the right. Thus, if all the provisions of a judgment are connected and dependent, so that a part cannot be reversed without a reversal of the whole, a party cannot proceed to enforce such portions of the judgment as are in his favor, and appeal from the part which is against him. In such case the right to proceed on the judgment and enjoy its fruits, and the right to appeal, are not concurrent, but wholly inconsistent, and an election to assert one right is a waiver and renunciation of the other." The order should be reversed, and the court below directed to dismiss the motion.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; GRAY, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the order is reversed, and the court below directed to dismiss the motion.

RICE et al. v. NATIONAL CITY et al. (L. A. 737.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—CITY MARSHAL—SALARY—INCREASE—TERM OF OFFICE.

The board of trustees, on March 16, 1898, fixed the salary of the city marshal at $5 per month, and $1 for each dog impounded. Defendant was elected city marshal on April 11, 1898, but refused to qualify and file a bond. On June 21, 1898, the board of trustees increased the salary of the city marshal to $25 per month, and on July 13th appointed defendant marshal, and he qualified and entered on the duties of his office. Held, that the contention that defendant was not entitled to receive $25 per month, because the increase in salary was made in violation of a statute forbidding an officer's salary to be raised during his term of office, cannot be sustained, since his term did not begin until he qualified and accepted the office.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; E. S. Torrance, Judge.

Action by J. A. Rice and another against National City and Samuel W. Smith, to enjoin the payment of a certain sum to defendant Smith as city marshal. From a judgment in favor of plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Reversed.

D. M. Hammack, for appellants. L. E. Dodmun, for respondents.

HAYNES, C. The plaintiffs, taxpayers of National City, brought this action against said city, and Samuel W. Smith, as city marshal, and also against the city clerk and treasurer, to enjoin them from paying said city marshal the sum of $25 per month, that being the salary fixed by a certain ordinance, which plaintiffs contend increased the salary of the marshal after his term of office commenced. The defendants demurred to the complaint for want of facts, and, their demurrer having been overruled, declined to answer, and now appeal from the judgment thereupon entered.

Defendant Smith was elected to the office of city marshal at the April election, 1896, for the term of two years, and qualified and entered upon the duties of his office on the 20th of that month, the monthly salary of the city marshal being then fixed by ordinance at $40 per month. On March 16, 1898, shortly before the expiration of his term of office, the board of trustees passed a new ordinance, in which it was provided that the city marshal should receive $60 per year, payable in monthly installments of $5 each, and also $1 for each dog impounded under the authority of the ordinances of said city, and in case the dog was redeemed under the provisions of the ordinance, as well as under certain other circumstances mentioned in the ordinance, he should receive $1.50 per dog. At the regular election held April 11, 1898, defendant Smith was again elected city marshal for the term of two years, commencing on April 20, 1898, and was duly declared elected, and notified by the city clerk of his election. It is further alleged that defendant Smith failed, refused, and neglected to file his bond and take the oath of office and to qualify under his said election, and "that a vacancy in said office was thereby created, and said office thereupon became vacant, but the said defendant held over until his successor was elected and qualified, and that said defendant did so voluntarily hold over and act as city marshal and to fill said vacancy created by his refusal to qualify." It is further alleged that on June 21, 1898, the board of trustees adopted a new ordinance (No. 140), "attempting to amend said ordinance No. 138, by which [new ordinance] the salary and compensation of the marshal of said city was raised and increased from the sum of five dollars per month to twenty-five dollars per month." It is further alleged that on July 13, 1898, "the board of trustees of said city filled the vacancy so created by electing and appointing said defendant to said office, and that afterwards, and in the manner and within the time required by law, said defendant qualified under said election and appointment of said board of trustees, and that said defendant is now filling said office according to law." It is also alleged that ever since said appointment the marshal has been paid said salary, and that the clerk will continue to draw warrants therefor, and the city treasurer to pay them, unless enjoined from so doing.

It is clear from the allegations of the complaint that defendant Smith did not take office under his election in April. He refused to qualify, and, as alleged, a vacancy resulted. The term of the office, as fixed by the municipal government act, is two years, dating from the 20th of April after the election. But that does not necessarily fix the term of the officer. The language of the statute is, "their several terms of office," not during the statutory term fixed for the office. Incumbents frequently die. Sometimes they resign. In either case the term of the incumbent ends. If the people fail to elect an officer, or if the person elected fails or refuses to qualify, the incumbent holds over until his successor is appointed or elected and qualifies; but the period during which he holds over is not a new term, but is a continuance or prolongation of the term for which he was elected. It was so held in People v. Edwards, 93 Cal. 153, 157, 28 Pac. 831, where it was also said: "During the time he holds over his salary cannot be increased, and he and his sureties are liable on his official bond for all his acts until his successor is elected or appointed and qualified." Or, as said in People v. Ward, 107 Cal. 239, 40 Pac. 538: "He had a fixed tenure and a contingent term." See, also, People v. Hammond, 66 Cal. 654, 6 Pac. 741, and Dillon v. Bicknell, 116 Cal. 111, 47 Pac. 937. If Doe had been appointed instead of Smith, it would hardly be contended that the ordinance passed in June, prior to his appointment, increased or in any manner changed his compensation "during his term of office," which could not begin until he was appointed and qualified. If the statute had provided that the compensation attached to the office of city marshal should not be increased or diminished during the statutory term of two years for which the marshal shall be elected, respondent's contention would be sound. The difference, however, is apparent. The object of the statute is to protect the incumbent against a reduction of compensation during his occupancy of the office, and also to take away all inducement to use his official influence and efforts to procure an increase of it during his incumbency; and in accepting the appointment Smith had a right to rely upon the compensation as then fixed, but which could not take effect until he entered upon a new term under his appointment. Our conclusion upon the main question renders it unnecessary to consider the question whether the complaint is otherwise sufficient. The judgment should be reversed, with directions to dismiss the action.

We concur: GRAY, C.; COOPER, C.

(Supreme Court of California. March 29, 1901.)

VENDOR AND PURCHASER—RESCINDING CONTRACT—FINDINGS—EVIDENCE TO SUPPORT—ANSWER—AMENDMENT—VALUE—PROOF—HARMLESS ERROR—EXPERT TESTIMONY—QUESTION—FORM.

1. Where plaintiff in an action to rescind a contract for the purchase of land alleged that it was not worth more than $6,000, but introduced no evidence of its value, and defendant and several witnesses testified it was worth from $14,000 to $16,000, and that the shares of stock in a water company sold plaintiff was sufficient to water 20 acres in a year of ordinary rainfall, it cannot be contended that findings that it was worth $15,000, and that the shares of water stock were sufficient to irrigate 20 acres, were not supported by the evidence.

2. Where defendant testified that he did not represent that all of the land purchased by plaintiff was suitable for fruit raising, except that part already planted to fruit trees, and that 10 acres in addition to that under cultivation might be rendered suitable for cultivation by a small expenditure, a finding that defendant did not make such representation was supported by the evidence.

3. Where defendant testified that there were 1,476 trees on the land purchased by plaintiff, and the written contract specified that there were from 1,400 to 1,500, a finding that defendant did not represent that there were 1,600 was supported by the evidence.

4. Plaintiff alleged that defendant fraudulently represented that the shares of water stock sold plaintiff were sufficient to irrigate the entire tract purchased by plaintiff, and defendant denied that he represented that plaintiff's shares of water stock would entitle her to a sufficient amount of water to irrigate said lands, or any portion thereof except that part planted to fruit trees. Held, that allowing defendant to amend his answer after the trial by striking out the words, "or any portion thereof except that part planted to fruit trees," was not prejudicial to plaintiff, where the findings of the court supported the answer as it stood prior to the amendment.

5. Where plaintiff in an action to rescind a contract for the purchase of land alleged that it was worth only $6,000, but introduced no evidence of its value, error in the admission of evidence of value on the part of defendant was harmless, since the burden to show value was on plaintiff.

6. Where witnesses as to the value of land were qualified to give an opinion, the question what was the value of the land as "between a party who wished to buy and one who wished to sell" was not objectionable as to form.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Ventura county; W. S. Day, Judge.

Action by Laura E. Fowler and husband against John Carne and others. From a judgment in favor of defendants, and from an order denying a new trial, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Barnes & Selby and H. L. Poplin, for appellants. Blackstock & Edwing, for respondents.

GRAY, C. This action was brought to rescind a contract of purchase and sale of a certain fruit ranch of about 53 acres, situated in Ventura county, together with 55 shares of water stock, and to compel defendant to give up for cancellation a note and mortgage for $12,000, given to secure the balance due under said contract, and to recover $3,000 and interest paid on said contract, and also the further sum of $3,000 and interest for the value of a dwelling built on said ranch by plaintiffs. The complaint alleges that plaintiff was induced to enter into the contract by the fraudulent representations of defendant. The defendant denied the fraud, set up the mortgage and note in a cross complaint, and on a trial before the court without a jury had judgment in his favor on the issue of fraud, and also foreclosing the mortgage. From this judgment, and from an order denying a new trial, the plaintiffs appeal.

Laura Fowler and her husband and co-plaintiff resided in Chicago, Ill., and in July, 1898, they met the defendant Carne, who resided in Ojai Valley, Ventura county, Cal. Neither of plaintiffs knew anything about fruit farms or fruit farming in Ventura county, but they desired to purchase a fruit farm and live in California principally for the health of themselves and their two boys, and incidentally to profit by fruit farming. Accordingly, on making the acquaintance of defendant, they opened negotiations with him for the fruit ranch in controversy, which resulted in the contract now sought to be rescinded. Plaintiffs did not see the ranch, but took the defendant's word for everything. The representations of defendant claimed in the complaint to have been false, and on which plaintiff was induced to make the purchase, are as follows: (1) He represented that said lands and 55 shares of water stock were of the value of $15,000; (2) that said lands were in every way adapted, suited, and capable of and for profitable growing of citrus fruits, especially lemons and oranges; (3) that 20 acres of the tract contained 1,600 trees, that would yield a crop worth net profit of $3,200 for the year 1899; (4) that the remainder of the tract, 33 acres, was in proper condition to put into orange and lemon culture, and just as good as the 20 acres already in trees and bearing; (5) that the 55 shares of stock of the San Antonio Water company, sold with the land, carried with it water ample and sufficient to irrigate the entire tract planted to fruit trees or any and all crops that would grow upon said lands; (6) that the lands were entirely free from freezing temperature in winter time each year. As to all these alleged false and fraudulent representations the findings are adverse to plaintiff. Appellant's principal attack is directed against these findings. She contends that they are not supported by the evidence.

As to representation 1 above referred to, the finding is "that said realty and water stock at the time of the sale thereof to plaintiff Laura E. Fowler were of the value of $15,000." Plaintiff, in her complaint, alleged that this property "was not of a value to exceed six thousand dollars," but she introduced no evidence whatever as to its value. The witnesses for defendant gave their opinions as to its value, fixing it, most of them, from $14,000 to $15,000; one of them testifying that, in his opinion, it was at the time of the sale worth from $15,000 to $16,000. Certainly, this finding is supported by the evidence.

As to representations 2 and 4, the findings are "that it is not true that defendant Carne * * * stated or represented * * * that said lands, other than the twenty acres thereof planted to trees, and about ten acres in addition thereto, were in any way or at all adapted, suited, or capable of or for profitable growing of any citrus fruits." The court also finds that about 10 acres in addition to the 20 acres already planted to trees could, by a small expenditure, be rendered fit for cultivation, and as good as said 20 acres; and that defendant did not represent that any of the tract not already planted "was in proper or any condition to put into orange or lemon culture." These findings find support in the testimony of defendant, and, so far as it relates to the condition of the ranch, his testimony is corroborated by that of other witnesses called in his behalf.

The finding as to representation 3 is to the effect that defendant made no such representation, but did represent that the 20-acre tract contained about 1,476 trees. This finding is also supported by defendant's testimony, which is corroborated by the written contract between the parties, in which the number of trees is given as "between fourteen and fifteen hundred orange, lemon, and other fruit trees." The evidence shows without conflict that this representation as to the number of trees did not differ materially from the true number.

As to representations 5 and 6, the findings are that they were not made, but it is, in substance, found that the water from said 55 shares is sufficient in a year of ordinary rainfall to properly irrigate the 20 acres set to trees, and that defendant so represented to plaintiffs. This finding is supported by the testimony of defendant and of several witnesses who gave their opinion, derived from experience, as to the amount of continuous flow of water in inches required to irrigate a certain number of acres on the tract in question. There was some conflict in the evidence on the question of the sufficiency of the water derived from these 55 shares to irrigate the 20 acres already planted; but it was for the trial court to sift this evidence, and find where the preponderance lay, and we are not prepared to say that the finding on the question was without warrant in the evidence.

As to many of the alleged false representations the trial court seems to have relied on the testimony of the defendant alone whenever it came into conflict with that of the plaintiffs. This, perhaps, arose from the fact that in an important particular already referred to the testimony of defendant was corroborated by the written contract made in Chicago on or about the same day as the alleged false representations. We have reference here to the testimony as to the representation concerning the number of trees. We cannot uphold appellants' contention that the findings on the subject of false representations are without support in the evidence; and, these findings being adverse to plaintiffs, it follows that the groundwork of their action is gone. It will, therefore, be unnecessary to inquire whether the other findings complained of are supported by the evidence.

Appellants, in their brief, complain of several errors of law, only two of which we will discuss. The first is that the court permitted the defendant to amend his answer by striking therefrom the words, "or any portion thereof other than said twenty acres planted to fruit trees," thereby changing an admission that defendant represented to plaintiffs that there was ample water to properly irrigate the 20 acres in orchard each and every year into a denial of that fact. We think appellants misapprehend the effect of the amendment. To set them right, we quote the entire allegations of the complaint and answer pertinent to the question. The complaint is as follows: "That he had, and would sell with the said tract, 55 shares of the stock of the San Antonio Water Company, which shares of stock he stated and represented to plaintiffs carried and entitled the owner to water ample and all sufficient to irrigate the said entire tract of land during the entire irrigating season of each year.

* * * That said tract was well and amply supplied with water for the proper and sufficient irrigation of the same planted to fruit trees, orange and lemon trees, and any and all crops that would grow upon said lands." The answer to the above allegations was as follows: Deny "that the defendant Carne stated or represented to plaintiffs, or either of them, that said shares of water stock carried or entitled the owner to water ample or sufficient to irrigate said tract of land, or any portion thereof other than said 20 acres planted to fruit trees, during the irrigating season of each year, or of any year other than one of ordinary rainfall; or that said lands, * * * or any portion thereof other than said twenty acres planted to fruit trees, was well or amply supplied with water for the proper or sufficient irrigation of the same planted to fruit, orange, or lemon trees, or any crops that would grow upon said lands, or at all." The part of the above quotation in italics was stricken from the answer on motion of defendant to amend some days after the trial, and immediately before the findings were filed. An examination of the findings discloses that on this issue they follow the exact language of the answer as it stood before this amendment. The testimony of the defendant also supports the answer exactly as it stood before the amendment. He says: "I told them it was very dry at that very time, and that I had a letter from my son saying that it was dry, and the fruit was dropping. * * * I explained to Mrs.

Fowler and Dr. Fowler that the supply from this water stock, according to my experience, would be sufficient to irrigate the twenty acres in citrus fruits in a season of ordinary rainfall. * * * I told them there was no water for citrus fruit on the ten acres; that all the water was used on this twenty acres, except for domestic use." There is no pretense that it was represented that water was to be had for this ranch, or had ever been obtained for it, from any other source than from these 55 shares of water stock. We are therefore at a loss to understand why the defendant desired to amend his answer as he did, or of what benefit it could be to him to so amend it. So long as the evidence of defendant and the findings followed and supported the denials and allegations of the answer as it was before amendment, the amendment was entirely immaterial, and accomplished nothing. Besides, the amendment did not materially change the issues, and appellants were not injured thereby.

The second alleged error of law that we will notice is claimed to have been made in overruling plaintiffs' objection to evidence offered by defendant as to the value of the property sold. Though the plaintiffs alleged that this property was worth no more than $6,000,—and the burden was undoubtedly on them to show that it was worth less than they agreed to pay for it, in order to show that they were injured by the alleged false representations,—yet, as we have already seen, they offered no proper evidence as to the value of the property whatever. Therefore, if the defendant had presented no evidence on the question of the value of the property, the finding on that subject must have been adverse to the plaintiffs, or just as it now stands, to wit, that the property was worth $15,000, the amount for which it sold. The evidence as to value in no way affected the findings. They are the same as they would have been in the absence of such evidence. Therefore the plaintiffs are in no way injured by the evidence complained of. Again, all the witnesses who testified on this question of value showed themselves, either in direct or cross examination, to be competent to give an opinion thereon. The form of the question—it being directed to the value of the property "between a party who wished to sell and one who wanted to buy it"—is not open to objection. Lawrence v. City of Boston, 119 Mass. 126.

The further contentions of appellants are not of sufficient importance to require special discussion. The judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; COOPER, C.

 EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS—CLAIMS—CONTINGENT—REJECTED—ACTIONS—TIME TO SUE—STATUTORY PROVISIONS—PLEADING—SUPPLEMENTAL COMPLAINT—PREMATURE ACTION.

1. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1498, providing that where a claim is rejected by an executor the holder must sue the executor within three months, if it be then due, or within two months after it becomes due, an action against an executrix on a contract made between plaintiff and deceased two years before his death, as to certain live stock, which was to continue in force for four years, and which was presented to the executrix as a contingent claim and rejected, does not lie until such claim becomes due.

2. Where an action was prematurely brought, the original complaint falls, and it is not error to refuse to permit the filing of a supplemental complaint.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; George H. Bahrs, Judge.

Action by Henry M. Morse against Emma S. McPherson Steele, as executrix of the estate of E. L. G. Steele, deceased. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Noble Hamilton, R. M. F. Soto, and E. H. Stearns, for appellant. Bishop & Wheeler and Wm. Rix, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This appeal is taken from a judgment rendered upon the pleadings. Plaintiff and E. L. G. Steele entered into a contract pertaining to the care and proceeds of certain live stock, which contract was to be continued in force for the period of four years. Two years thereafter Steele died, and the contract was presented to the executrix of his estate as a contingent claim. The claim was rejected, whereupon the present action was brought thereon. Of course, the judgment in such an action could go no further than simply to establish the status of the claim, even conceding that any judgment whatever could be rendered. Section 1498 of the Code of Civil Procedure declares: "When a claim is rejected either by the executor or administrator, or a judge of the superior court, the holder must bring suit in the proper court against the executor or administrator, within three months after the date of its rejection if it be then due, or within two months after it becomes due. otherwise the claim shall be forever barred." There is no authority in the law for bringing the present action unless it can be found in this section. And, in view of the fact that contingent claims are required to be presented to the representative of an estate for allowance, it would seem that in case of rejection there should be some legal procedure by which the claimant's rights may be preserved. For this reason, the court is strongly inclined towards holding the existence of such authority in the aforesaid section. The claim here involved certainly was not due when presented; hence no action could be brought upon it, as in the case of a rejected claim which is due. But the court is satisfied that, for the purpose of bringing an action upon the claim, it may be held, without doing any violence to rules of construction, that a claim similar to the one here presented, namely, a contingent claim, is a claim "not due," within the purview of the aforesaid section 1498. This claim is both contingent and not due. Indeed, no contingent claim is due. But, by the happening of the event upon which the contingency depends, the claim becomes due, and then may be enforced as any other claim which becomes due. If the event upon which the contingency depends never happens, the claim never becomes due, and necessarily no action can be or should be brought upon it. By this construction of the statute the rights of all parties are protected, and equal and exact justice done. It follows that an action upon a rejected contingent claim may be brought only within two months after such claim becomes due. The claim here sued upon shows upon its face that it was a contingent claim, and necessarily not due when the complaint was filed; hence the action was prematurely brought. While there may be some obiter in Fratt v. Hunt, 108 Cal. 292, 41 Pac. 12, intimating that section 1498 by its terms is not broad enough to include "contingent claims," we conclude that the rule here laid down is the better rule, and the court so declares. The trial court did not commit error in refusing plaintiff the privilege of filing a supplemental complaint. This action was prematurely brought. For that reason the original complaint must fall. In such a case a supplemental complaint has no place as a pleading. Lewis v. Fox, 122 Cal. 250, 54 Pac. 823. The judgment is affirmed.

In re COAN'S ESTATE. (S. F. 2,153.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 5, 1901.)
ADMINISTRATORS—CHILDREN—APPOINTMENT OF SON AND DAUGHTER—MALES PREFERRED TO FEMALES—FOREIGN WILLS.

1. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1365, providing that the administration of estates must be granted in the second place to children of deceased; and section 1366, declaring that, of several persons claiming and equally entitled to administer, males must be preferred to females,—an order appointing both son and daughter of deceased to administer her estate was error, notwithstanding that section 1367 authorizes the court to grant letters to one or more of several persons equally entitled to the administration.

2. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1322-1324, providing that, when a copy of a duly-probated foreign will is produced by "any person interested in the will," letters of administration shall issue thereon, must be construed with section 1350, declaring that, if the executors fail to apply for letters, etc., letters of administration with the will annexed must be issued as designated for the grant of letters in cases of intestacy, and section 1366, prescribing in cases of intestacy that, of several persons claiming and equally entitled to administer, males must be preferred to females, and cannot be construed by themselves to the support of an appointment of both son and daughter of deceased to administer.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Monterey county; N. A. Dorn, Judge.

Proceedings for the appointment of an administrator cum testamento annexo of the estate of Mary Elizabeth Coan. From an order appointing J. W. Coan and Catherine Eubank joint administrators, J. W. Coan appeals. Reversed.

W. M. Pierce and Fred A. Treat, for appellant. Dougherty & Lacey, for respondents.

GRAY, C. At her death deceased was a resident of Pennsylvania, and left a will in which she appointed "Adam Keller, of Carlisle, Pa.," as executor. This will was duly probated in said state. As shown by the findings in this matter, J. W. Coan was the son, and Mrs. Catherine Eubank was the daughter, of deceased. Both of them were residents of California, and both entitled to succeed to a portion of the personal estate of said deceased under the terms of her said will. Said J. W. Coan petitioned for letters of administration with the will annexed on the mother's estate. Mrs. Eubank also petitioned for letters to herself or the public administrator, and her three nonresident sisters, also interested in the estate, joined her in this petition. Coan filed an opposition to the appointment of either his sister or the public administrator, and, after hearing all these matters together, the court found that Coan and his sister were equally entitled to letters, ordered that the will be admitted to probate, and that letters of administration with the will annexed issue to both Coan and his sister, Mrs. Eubank. Coan appeals from that part of the order in favor of Mrs. Eubank.

Section 1365, Code Civ. Proc., places "the children" second in the list of those entitled to administer. If there were no other provisions concerning the matter, it would seem from the section cited that all the children, when entitled to succeed to the personal estate of the deceased parent, are equally entitled to letters; but this section is qualified by the next section (section 1366, Code Civ. Proc.), which provides that, "of several persons claiming and equally entitled to administer, males must be preferred to females, and relatives of the whole to the half blood." The way to prefer one to the other is to appoint the one and exclude the other; the way not to prefer either is to appoint both, as was done in this case. The section quoted is mandatory by its terms, and it is plain that, if any effect is to be given to it, a brother and sister are not equally entitled to administer, and cannot in a contest be treated as "several persons equally entitled to administer," and be both appointed under the provisions of section 1367, Code Civ. Proc. The finding that the brother and sister were equally entitled was merely an erroneous conclusion of law. It being found that the one was a son, and the other a daughter, of the deceased, the order should have directed letters to issue to the son alone, as the court had no discretion to do otherwise under the terms of the statute. It will be presumed that the appellant is entitled to administer because it has been so adjudged by the trial court, and no appeal from that adjudication is before us. That question, then, must be treated as settled for all purposes of this case. If he is entitled to administer at all, he is entitled to be appointed sole administrator, and is therefore aggrieved by the appointment of the respondent, and may appeal from the order appointing her.

It is contended by respondent that the sections of the Code relating to the probate of foreign wills (sections 1322-1324, Code Civ. Proc.) should be construed independently of the other provisions of the Code, or, as she expresses it, those sections "are a law unto themselves, and are not affected by section 1365 et seq." This contention cannot be maintained. Section 1350, Code Civ. Proc., provides that, if the executor named in the will is incompetent or fails to apply, etc., "letters of administration with the will annexed, must be issued as designated and provided for the grant of letters in cases of intestacy." The section just quoted from is not restricted to any class of wills, and it certainly must include foreign wills in its provisions. The "cases of intestacy" referred to in said section 1350 are provided for in said section 1365 et seq. It seems, therefore, beyond question that these sections apply to the probate of a foreign will, where, as in this case, the controversy as to who shall administer is between parties interested in the will. In Re Engle's Estate, 124 Cal. 292, 56 Pac. 1022, and in Re Bergin's Estate, 100 Cal. 376, 34 Pac. 867, the contest for letters was in each case between one interested in the will and the public administrator, who had no interest in the will or in the estate; and in this respect, at least, these cases are to be distinguished from the case now before us. We advise that the order appealed from be reversed, and that the trial court be directed to enter an order on the findings in accordance with the views herein expressed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; CHIPMAN, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the order appealed from is reversed, and the trial court directed to enter an order on the findings in accordance with the views herein expressed.

WINCHESTER v. HOWARD et al.

(Supreme Court of California. April 6, 1901.)
CORPORATIONS—OFFICERS—CORPORATE FUNDS
—MISAPPROPRIATION—DIRECTORS—LIABILITY—PRESUMPTION—ELIMINATION—PETITION—SUFFICIENCY.

1. A petition, in an action to charge directors of a corporation with a misappropriation of the corporate funds by its officers, alleged that the purchase of a note was only a pretended purchase, and that the payment of the corporate fund therefor was unlawful, and that the corporation suffered by reason of the misappropriation and pretended purchase. Held, that the use of the words "pretended," "unlawful," and "misappropriation" did not dispense with the necessity of pleading the facts showing a misappropriation, and such words would be stricken.

2. Const. art. 12, § 3, provides that the directors of a corporation shall be jointly and severally liable to the creditors and stockholders for all moneys embezzled or misappropriated by the officers of the corporation during the term of such director. A petition to charge defendants, as directors of a bank, with the misappropriation of its funds, alleged that the treasurer of the defendant corporation paid the sum of $20,000 for a note, and that the note was not secured in any way, but did not allege that the note was not paid, or that the makers were not solvent at the time it was purchased, or that the money was embezzled by any officer of the corporation, or was used for any unlawful purpose, or was converted by any officer to his own use. Held, that the facts alleged were not sufficient to make the defendants liable for a misappropriation, and hence a demurrer to the petition was properly sustained.

In banc. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; E. S. Torrance, Judge.

Action by Joseph Winchester against Bryant Howard and others. From a judgment in favor of defendants sustaining a demurrer to the complaint, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

C. H. Rippey and Withington & Carter, for appellant. S. F. Leib, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This appeal is from the judgment for the purpose of reviewing the order sustaining the respondent's demurrer to the complaint. The action was brought by plaintiff, as assignee of certain depositors of the Savings Bank of San Diego County, to recover of respondent and others the sum of $376,359.46, claimed to have been misappropriated by the officers of the bank. The proceeding is under the latter clause of section 3, art. 12, of the constitution, which reads as follows: "The directors or trustees of corporations and joint stock associations shall be jointly and severally liable to the creditors and stockholders for all monies embezzled or misappropriated by the officers of such corporation, or joint stock association during the term of such director or trustee." The plaintiff in his brief concedes "that the allegations which connect Mr. Mabury are not claimed to hold him further than the same allegations would impose a liability upon other directors not implicated." As this appeal is for the purpose of reviewing the order sustaining Mabury's demurrer to the complaint, we need not discuss the allegations of the complaint as to any other defendant. It is stipulated that the plaintiff must recover, if at all, on the provision of the constitution quoted.

There has been no legislation for the purpose of aiding or assisting in carrying into effect the said provision. The character of action that may be brought, the proportion of recovery to be paid, respectively, to the creditors and to the stockholders, whether the creditors are to be paid first, and whether judgment creditors or contract creditors merely are meant, whether the creditors or stockholders must have been such at the time of the alleged embezzlement or misappropriation before they can complain, whether a creditor can complain if the bank is solvent, or whether a creditor in any case can recover more than the amount due him, or whether an action can be maintained by the creditors without the stockholders, or vice versa, and many other questions of similar import, are all matters of judicial construction, if the provision is self-executing. But, under the view we take of the complaint, it is not necessary here to decide as to whether or not the provision is self-executing. The remedy seems to be given to "creditors and stockholders," or, at least, the aim is to create a liability in their favor. Whether or not, in such case, the action to recover for such liability may be maintained by an assignee, being a person not named in the provision, need not be determined. If it be conceded that the provision is self-executing, —which we do not intimate to be the case,—and that an assignee of a contract creditor can maintain the action, yet the demurrer was properly sustained as to Mabury. The provision imposes a liability upon the honest, faithful director or trustee for all amounts embezzled by any officer of the corporation. The honest official is made to pay for the moneys stolen or embezzled by the dishonest one. The action is therefore in its nature a penal action. Carr v. Rischer, 119 N. Y. 117, 23 N. E. 296; Globe Pub. Co. v. State Bank (Neb.) 59 N. W. 683, 27 L. R. A. 854. Therefore the provision must be strictly construed, and the liability claimed must be shown, not by implication, but by unambiguous language. Askew v. Ebberts, 22 Cal. 264; Association v. Sullivan, 62 Cal. 395. The liability is for "moneys embezzled or misappropriated" by another. In this case there is no claim or allegation that the money was embezzled, but the attempt is to show that it was misappropriated. What, then, is the meaning of the word "misappropriated" as used in the constitution? It is used in connection with "embezzled," and does not mean merely applying money in a manner not authorized by law. It is used in a criminal sense in article 2, § 1, of the constitution, where it is provided: "And no person hereafter convicted of the embezzlement or misappropriation of public money shall ever exercise the privilege of an elector in this state." Pen. Code, § 504, makes the fraudulent appropriation to any use or purpose, not in the due and lawful execution of his trust, by any officer of a corporation of property which he has in his possession by virtue of his trust, embezzlement. In speaking of the word "misappropriation," as used in the provision, this court said in Fox v. Mining Co., 108 Cal. 426, 41 Pac. 308: "But in my opinion the word 'misappropriation' is to be construed by the maxim, 'Noscitur a sociis.' It means something like embezzlement; or, in other words, it means the misapplication of funds intrusted to an officer for a particular purpose by devoting them to some unauthorized purpose, and does not apply to the payment of an extravagant price for services or materials properly appertaining to the business of the corporation." It is therefore evident that unless the complaint, in view of the above definitions, alleges fully a misappropriation of the funds of the corporation by some officer thereof, while Mabury was a director, it states no cause of action against him. The complaint contains 27 separate statements as to the alleged misappropriations. As they are all of the same general nature, it will not be necessary to examine each in detail. One or two will suffice for the purposes of this case.

The first is as follows: "(1) On the 29th day of November, 1887, said defendant Bryant Howard, who was then the attorney in fact of defendant Hiram Mabury, directed John Ginty, who was then the secretary and treasurer of said savings bank, to pay to said Consolidated National Bank of San Diego, out of the funds of said savings bank, for the benefit of said Hiram Mabury, the sum of $20,000 upon the pretended purchase by said savings bank from said Hiram Mabury of a note of Guion, Hamilton & Hartley, payable to said Hiram Mabury, of that date, due February 29, 1888, with interest at 12 per cent., for $20,000, which note was not then secured in any way, which sum of $20,000 said John Ginty as such treasurer, on said November 29, 1887, did unlawfully pay out of the funds of said savings bank to said Consolidated National Bank, for the benefit of said Hiram Mabury, by reason of which misappropriation and pretended purchase the said savings bank and its depositors have suffered a loss, including interest amounting to $54,236.65." We may eliminate from the above specification the words "pretended," "unlawfully," and "misappropriation." While the words are unpleasant, they are not sufficient to dispense with the necessary statement of facts. Spring Valley Water Works v. City of San Francisco, 82 Cal. 321, 22 Pac. 910, 1046, 6 L. R. A. 756; Ambler v. Choateau, 107 U. S. 590, 1 Sup. Ct. 556, 27 L. Ed. 322; Pehrson v. Hewitt, 79 Cal. 598, 21 Pac. 950.

The character of the transaction must be determined by the facts alleged, and not by the epithets used by the pleader. We then have the allegation that Ginty, the treasurer of the savings bank, under the direction of Howard, the president, on November 29, 1887, paid to the Consolidated National Bank of San Diego the sum of $20,000, upon the purchase of the note of Guion, Hamilton & Hartley payable to Mabury for the sum of $20,000, with interest at 12 per cent., due February 29, 1888. That said note was not secured in any way, and the sum was paid for the benefit of Mabury. As the note was payable to Mabury in the first place, it would, of course, follow that the payment of the purchase price was for his benefit. It is not alleged that the makers of the note were not solvent at the time it was purchased. In fact, it is nowhere alleged that they were ever insolvent, nor that the note has not been paid. It is alleged as a conclusion that the depositors have suffered a loss in consequence of the purchase, including interest amounting to $54,236.65. Whether this loss was caused by the fact that the money, if kept, could have been loaned at a higher rate or used in speculation, does not appear. It is not alleged that the money was embezzled by any officer of the corporation. It is not alleged that it was used for any unlawful purpose or converted by any officer to his own use. It may be, and probably is, true that the money of the savings bank should not have been loaned without security, but we cannot think that a loan made by an officer of a bank, in good faith, for the bank, and not for his own gain, would be a misappropriation, within the meaning of the constitutional provision.

The fifth specification of facts relied upon to constitute a misappropriation is as follows: "(5) That on the 22d day of October, 1889, the said Bryant Howard, as president of said savings bank, directed said John Ginty, as such secretary and treasurer, to pay said Consolidated National Bank the sum of $88,210, upon the pretended purchase of certain notes held by said Consolidated National Bank of one R. W. Waterman, which notes were then long overdue, were not secured in any manner, and which had been in large part protested, and which notes were not transferred to said savings bank, in pursuance of which the said John Ginty did, on said 22d day of October, 1889, as such secretary and treasurer, unlawfully pay out of the funds of said bank to said Consolidated National Bank the sum of $88,210, by reason of which misappropriation said savings bank and its depositors have suffered a loss, including interest, of $23,696.52." Here it appears that on the 22d day of October, 1889, the treasurer of the savings bank, under direction of the president, paid to the Consolidated National Bank, $88,210, for the purchase of certain notes held by the national bank made by one Waterman which were overdue, and which had been in part protested. It is alleged that the notes were not secured, but there is no allegation that the maker was then or ever was insolvent. The amount of said notes is not shown, neither is it shown that they were not paid. It is alleged that by reason of the purchase the savings bank suffered a loss, including interest, of $23,696.52. Whether this loss was from the amount due on the face of the notes, or by reason of the bank not having the money to loan or use for other purposes, does not appear. The savings bank may have received the entire amount back and thousands of dollars interest, and yet all the allegations concerning this transaction may be true. There is no allegation that any officer of the bank embezzled or appropriated to his own use a single dollar of the money. It is provided in section 5209 of the Revised Statutes of the United States: "Every president, director, cashier, teller, clerk or agent of any 'national banking association,' who embezzles, abstracts or willfully misapplies any of the money, funds or credits of the association, * * * shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor." This section came before the supreme court of the United States in U. S. v. Britton, 107 U. S. 666, 2 Sup. Ct. 512, 27 L. Ed. 520, and the court, in construing the section, said: "To constitute the offense of willful misapplication there must be a conversion to his own use, or use of some one else, of the moneys and funds of the association by the party charged. * * * There is no averment of a conversion by the defendant to his own use, or the use of any other person, of the funds in the purchase of the shares. The counts, therefore, charge maladministration of the affairs of the bank, rather than a misapplication of its funds." The central idea of the provision is "embezzlement or misappropriation" by the officers to their own use. It was not the intention to make every director of a bank responsible for the business mistakes of his associates. Neither is it the policy of the law to allow a stockholder to profit by an investment if it proves to have been a good one, and to hold the directors responsible if it proves to have been a bad one. Corporations are managed by their agents and directors. If, after using their best judgment, an investment should not prove profitable, it is no more than happens to individuals in the everyday transactions of life. Banks have their financial crises, when assets that were at the time they were taken ample become valueless. In all cases the directors and officers should be honest, and held criminally for any embezzlement or misappropriation of funds to their own use. The individual directors should not be held for the acts of others with which they are in no way connected, unless under the plain mandates of the law. In this case the facts alleged do not make respondent liable for the acts of other officers. The judgment is affirmed.

In re BLACK'S ESTATE. (Sac. 797.)

WILLS—PROBATE—VALIDITY—UNDUE INFLUENCE—UNREASONABLENESS—BURDEN OF PROOF—PROPONENT—MENTAL CONDITION—EVIDENCE—ATTENDING PHYSICIAN—ADMISSIBILITY.

1. Undue influence, to affect the validity of a will, must bear directly on the testamentary act.

2. Evidence of mere opportunity to unduly influence testatrix is not sufficient without a preponderance of evidence that such influence was exercised, and induced a disposition of property other than would have been made without it.

3. Where a will is unreasonable, the burden of explaining away the unreasonableness does not devolve on the proponent in a contest over its probate.

4. Where, in a will contest, the testimony of attending physicians of the testatrix as to her mental condition was not founded on information acquired in attending her which was necessary to enable them to prescribe or act for her, it was not barred by Code Civ. Proc. § 1881, which precludes a physician from being examined only as to such information, and was therefore properly admitted.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Yolo county; A. J. Buckles, Judge.

Application by W. F. Wall for the probate of the will of Mary A. Black, deceased. From a judgment probating the will, R. E. Moore and others appeal. Affirmed.

Chas. W. Thomas, for appellants. Arthur C. Huston, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is an appeal by the contestants of the will of Mary A. Black, deceased, from a judgment probating said will, and from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

As to the contention that the evidence did not justify the verdict, waiving the technical point made by respondent, it is enough to say that the evidence largely preponderates in favor of the findings of the jury.

Appellants' main contentions relate to the instructions to the jury. The case ought to have been a reasonably simple one, but the parties managed to get it into a labyrinth of legal propositions. The attack on the will made in the pleading of appellants had very feeble support in the evidence, but apparently respondent feared to stand on the real merits of his case, and sought unnecessarily to fortify his position by numerous objections to evidence and a multitude of instructions, and thus enabled his opponents to make a more respectable showing on appeal than they made in the trial court. At the request of respondent the court gave the jury 36 mortal instructions, covering 16 pages of the printed transcript, while appellants asked for 27 more, 17 of which were given and 10 refused. It would be surprising if such a record did not show some errors. However, in the statement on the motion for a new trial, the assignments of error as to the rulings of the court in the matter of instructions go only to parts of such rulings. We will notice only such points made in their brief as are based on the record.

The giving of respondent's instruction No 4, which is so elaborately discussed by appellants, is not assigned as error. It is proper, however, to say that it has not the meaning ascribed to it by appellants. It does not mean that appellants must have proven conjunctively both mental unsoundness and undue influence in order to have succeeded in upsetting the will. It merely means that a preponderance of evidence was necessary to establish mental unsoundness, and that such preponderance was also necessary to establish undue influence, and could not have been otherwise understood by the jury. Each of the three issues of mental unsoundness, undue influence, and fraud was separately submitted to the jury at the request of appellants, and no other issue was requested to be or was so submitted; and a finding for appellants upon any one of these issues would have resulted in a judgment in their favor. There is no assignment of error as to instructions numbered 5, 6, or 7, which contain mere statutory definitions. The giving of subdivisions fifth and seventh of instruction 8 is assigned as error, but no argument is made as to these subdivisions. Appellants insist that instruction 9 is erroneous, and so prejudicial to appellants as to require a reversal. This instruction is on the subject of undue influence, and, like some others, is perhaps subject to the criticism that it has too many words in it; but when closely examined it will be found, we think, to be substantially in accord with the principles announced on that subject in Re McDevitt, 95 Cal. 17, 30 Pac. 101; Re Carpenter's Estate, 94 Cal. 406, 29 Pac. 1101; Re Langford's Estate, 108 Cal. 610, 41 Pac. 701; Re Calkins' Estate, 112 Cal. 301, 44 Pac. 577; Re Kaufman's Estate, 117 Cal. 295, 49 Pac. 192; and kindred cases. It substantially does nothing more than to state the rule that evidence of mere opportunity to exercise undue influence is not sufficient, but that there must be a preponderance of evidence to the point that said influence was actually exercised, and that it influenced the mind of the testatrix at the time of the making of the will, and induced her to make a disposition of her property other than she would have made had it not been for such undue influence. The instruction should be considered in connection with certain other instructions given on the same subject at the request of appellants, of which the following are fair samples: "(23) If, from the testimony, you believe that William Wall and James Black, or either of them, made false and fraudulent representations to the testatrix concerning her children, R. E. Moore, Mrs. Washington, and Mrs. Wolfskill, or any of them, and that such representations were believed by the testatrix, and that she thereby became incensed against said children, or any of them, and under the influence and belief of such representations, and by reason thereof, executed a will, then you are instructed that you should find that the execution of said will was obtained by undue influence and fraud." And again: "(15) If you believe from the evidence that William Wall and James Black, or either of them, falsely and positively represented to the testatrix, in a manner not warranted by their information, they believing such representation to be true, that her children, Mrs. Washington, Mrs. Wolfskill, and R. E. Moore, or any of them, had made unkind and slighting remarks about her, and if you believe from the evidence that such false representations were made with the intent to induce said testatrix to become or remain hostile in feeling towards her said children, or any of them, and thereby induce the said testatrix to withhold from her said children, or any of them, her favor or property, and to gain an advantage for themselves, or either of them; and if you believe from the evidence that under the influence of said false representations, so made, the testatrix made and executed the will in question,—you will then find that such will was signed and executed under undue influence and fraud." All these instructions, taken together, correctly gave the law on the subject to the jury, and as favorably as appellants could have expected, and we do not think that they were at all prejudiced in the premises. Instruction 11 is correct. It is merely to the effect that undue influence must bear directly on the testamentary act. In instruction 14 it is merely said in the brief that it is "to my mind contradictory and contravenes the law"; but we do not see any grounds for this short criticism. Instructions 16, 18, 27, 29, and 30 are criticised as "argumentative," but there is no assignment of error in giving any of them.

We see no reason for a reversal on the ground of the refusal to give instructions asked by appellants. In appellants' brief the refusal to give, "or to give without modification," instructions 2, 7, 8, 17, 18, 19, 22, 23, and 24, is noticed, but such refusal is not assigned as error. The refusal to give No. 3 is submitted "without argument." Its refusal was not error. Instruction 19 was properly refused. If given, it would have told the jury, in substance, that, if they thought the will "unreasonable," then it devolved on the proponent to explain away the unreasonableness, which is not the law. As to appellants' instruction No. 20, it is doubtful if the latter part of it is true as a proposition of law, or whether it is within the domain of law at all, and, moreover, it is not clear that there was any evidence to which it could be applied, even if true as an abstract legal proposition; but, at all events, the other instructions given were full enough on the subject alluded to in instruction 20, and appellants were not prejudiced by its refusal.

The record shows 36 exceptions to rulings on the admissibility of evidence, and we deem it necessary to notice only one of them. Appellants contend that the testimony of three physicians as to the mental condition of the testatrix was improperly admitted because they had attended her professionally, and should not have been allowed to testify on account of the confidential relation of physician and patient, as prescribed by section 1881 of the Code of Civil Procedure. This objection was made, however, only to the testimony of Dr. Prose; but it was properly overruled. Under section 1881 a physician is precluded from being examined as a witness only "as to the information acquired in attending the patient which was necessary to enable him to prescribe or act for the patient" (In re Redfield's Estate, 116 Cal. 644, 48 Pac. 794; Harris v. Zanone, 93 Cal. 59, 28 Pac. 845; People v. Koerner, 154 N. Y. 355, 48 N. E. 730; Rog. Exp. Test. [2d Ed.] p. 107); and it clearly appears that the testimony of the physicians in the case at bar was not founded upon any such information. As to the other numerous exceptions and rulings upon the admissibility of evidence, it is sufficient to say that such rulings do not present any ground for a reversal. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

(Supreme Court of California. April 6, 1901.)
CONSOLIDATED CITY AND COUNTY GOVERNMENTS — COUNTY OFFICERS — DEPUTIES — QUALIFICATIONS — APPOINTMENT — CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION.

1. Under Const. art. 11, § 8½, empowering consolidated city and county governments to provide for the number of deputies that each county officer shall have, and for the compensation payable to each of such deputies, the consolidated municipal government of the city and county of San Francisco, through its civil service commission, could not prescribe the qualifications of the deputies of the county sheriff, clerk, recorder, etc., and compel those officers to select deputies from persons named by such commission.

2. Under Const. art. 11, § 8½, empowering consolidated city and county governments to provide for the manner in which "county officers" should be elected, etc., the contention that there were no county officers in such consolidated governments, was idle.

Beatty, C. J., and Van Dyke and Temple, JJ., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Action by Timothy O. Crowley against J. Richard Freud and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

F. K. Lane, City Atty., and G. W. McEnerney, for appellants. Garber, Creswell & Garber and Campbell, Metson & Campbell (Geo. D. Squires, of counsel), for respondents.

McFARLAND, J. The only question presented in this case is whether the consolidated municipal government called the "city and county of San Francisco" can, through its civil service commission, prescribe the qualifications of deputies of certain county officers, such as sheriff, county clerk, recorder, etc., and compel those officers to select their deputies from persons named by said commission. The court below held that there is no such power, and in accordance with such ruling made certain restraining and enjoining orders, from which defendants appeal. The power in question does not exist unless it is granted in that clause of section 8½ of article 11 of the state constitution, adopted in 1896, which is as follows: "Where a city and county government has been merged and consolidated into one municipal government, it shall also be competent in any charter framed under said section eight of said article eleven, to provide for the manner in which, the times at which, and the terms for which the several county officers shall be elected or appointed, for their compensation, and for the number of deputies that each shall have, and for the compensation payable to each of such deputies." It is scarcely necessary to again consider at length the position of appellants—so elaborately discussed, and so clearly held to be untenable, in Kahn v. Sutro, 114 Cal. 316, 46 Pac. 87, 33 L. R. A. 620—that there is no such thing as "county officers" in that part of the state which is included within the boundaries of the city and county of San Francisco; for the clause of section 8½ of the constitution above quoted directly recognizes such officers, and expressly calls them "county officers," and the whole clause deals with county officers and their deputies, and with no other subject whatever. In the opinion in Kahn v. Sutro, the citation of authorities is very full, and it would be a mere waste of labor to restate here the reasoning there employed, or again refer to the authorities there cited. That case establishes the law as to the matters therein determined. It is proper, however, to notice the contention of appellants that Kahn v. Sutro has been overruled, or materially modified, by the subsequent case of Martin v. Board, 126 Cal. 404, 58 Pac. 932. There is no foundation for this contention. Kahn v. Sutro was decided before section 8½ had become a part of the constitution, and it was there held that under the constitution and the statutes as they then stood the terms of office and the times of election of county officers were fixed by the general state laws on the subject; but the Martin Case was decided after section 8½ had been adopted, and was based entirely on the amendment made by that section, which expressly makes the law as to the election, etc., of county officers different from the law as it stood on that subject when Kahn v. Sutro was decided. The Martin Case was brought by certain county officers in San Francisco, upon the theory that the adoption of section 8½ had not changed the law declared in Kahn v. Sutro as to the time of their election and their terms of office; and this court held in the Martin Case that those things had been changed by section 8½, because it declared that it was competent to provide in the charter of a consolidated city and county government "for the manner in which, the times at which, and the terms for which the several county officers shall be elected." This was the only question involved, and the only question decided; the only question to which the minds of the court were directly called, and upon which they directly acted. The contention of appellants is based mainly upon one or two expressions to be found in the opinion in the Martin Case. One of these,—and the main one,—is as follows: "But the act establishing a uniform system of county and township governments does not and never did apply to the county of San Francisco in the sense claimed by the appellant." This, however, is not saying that it does not apply in any sense. And what was the sense in which appellants in that case claimed such application? They "claimed," briefly stated, as follows: Section 6 of article 11 provides that all municipal charters shall be, except in municipal affairs, "subject to and controlled by general laws"; county officers not being within the exception of "municipal affairs," the county government act, which provides for their election, time of office, etc., "controls the provisions of the charter on that subject"; and section 8½ can be kept out of conflict with section 6 only by a construction which is stated in appellant's brief in the Martin Case in this language: "The only construction admissible, therefore, is that which renders section 8½ subject to section 6 by permitting a charter to provide for the appointment, election, tenure, and compensation of county officers and their deputies only where there is no general law on the subject; the charter to be superseded in that respect whenever a general law is adopted." They also contended that section 8½ could not be legally adopted as an "amendment," and that what was attempted thereby could only be done through a general revision by a constitutional convention; and they argued that for the foregoing reasons, and for many others which were urged, section 8½ is not an existing amendment, and therefore the county government act applies to San Francisco for all purposes. The above views of counsel show the application of the county government act to San Francisco "in the sense claimed by the appellants." But the court did not agree with these views, and held that section 8½ was a valid amendment, and that by its express terms it provides for the election and terms of office of the county officers of the city and county of San Francisco; and it is with respect to the contentions of appellants in the Martin Case that the expression above quoted must be taken. And a somewhat broader expression in the opinion, following closely after the one above noticed, must be taken as subject to the same qualification as the first. It is nowhere in the opinion stated that there are no county officers in the city and county of San Francisco; on the other hand, it recognizes the existence of such officers, as section 8½ itself does. For instance, in the constitutional convention Judge Hagar, in replying to the objection that consolidated governments multiplied offices and increased expenses, said that the opposite was the result, and referred to the consolidated government of San Francisco as sustaining his position; and in the opinion in the Martin Case the following from his remarks is quoted: "We have a sheriff who is sheriff of the county and of the city. * * * We have a tax collector and we have an auditor that acts for both. Formerly we had one for each." Whether there were county officers in San Francisco was not a question in the Martin Case, and there was no pretense of overruling Kahn v. Sutro on that subject. The only question involved was, when are county officers to be elected, and what are their terms of office? Miller v. Curry, 113 Cal. 644, 45 Pac. 877, is to the same effect as Kahn v. Sutro.

The fact that in a consolidated city and county there is neither a separate county governmental organization nor a separate city governmental organization, each distinct from and entirely independent of the other,—as there is in ordinary counties and cities,—was as fully recognized in Kahn v. Sutro as in Martin v. Board. There is no conclusiveness in the argument that there can be no county officers for a consolidated government, because to hold otherwise would be to violate the original section 4 of article 11 of the constitution, which contemplates a "uniform" system of county governments; for other provisions of the constitution,—mostly amendments,—and particularly section 8½, which are specific provisions on the subject, allow such want of uniformity in the case of a consolidated city and county government, and expressly apply provisions to county officers in such consolidated government which do not apply to officers in other counties. Not only is the state itself interested in county officers as parts of its necessary governmental machinery, but the people of any particular county of the state are interested, and some of them are frequently deeply interested, in county officers, such as sheriffs, recorders, clerks, etc., in other counties. The functions of such officers are general, not municipal. And while, in the American system of state governments, the people of the whole state have generally kept in their own hands control over such important public governmental agencies as county officers, still if they choose to yield up part of that control by adopting a constitutional amendment such as section 8½, there is no apparent reason why they may not do so, unless the amendment should be so revolutionary as to be destructive of a republican form of government, as the same is understood in this country. Section 8½ cannot be said to be of that character. But when the whole people of the state have thus yielded up part of their sovereign power to a local municipality, the grant will certainly not be carried, by construction, to any greater extent than the words of the granting amendment clearly go. By section 8½ power over county officers is given to the municipality only to the extent of providing for the manner of their election and their terms of office and compensation. As to their deputies,—and they alone are involved in this action,—the only power granted is to provide "for the number of deputies that each shall have, and for the compensation payable to each of such deputies." By no reasonable stretch of construction can this be held to include the power to prescribe the qualifications of such deputies by any mode or process whatever. The foregoing views are conclusive of the case in favor of the respondent, and it is not necessary to pursue in detail the various points and arguments made by counsel for either side in support of their respective contentions. The orders appealed from are affirmed.

I dissent: BEATTY, C. J.

VAN DYKE, J. I dissent. Martin v. Board fully expresses my views concerning the nature of the consolidated government styled the "City and County of San Francisco." As was there pointed out, by the consolidation act passed in 1856 the act dividing the state into counties, so far as the same related to the formation of the county of San Francisco, was repealed, and the provisions of law defining the powers and duties of county officers, excepting those relating to supervisors, were considered as applicable to the officers of said city and county of San Francisco, and all the property and property rights of the former city and the former county of San Francisco were transferred to and vested in the new corporate body designated the "City and County of San Francisco." All the officers who, prior to that time, had been simply county officers and those who had been purely city officers, were thenceforth alike officers of the new municipal corporation, and were thereafter neither officers of the city of San Francisco nor officers of the county of San Francisco. As remarked in the dissenting opinion in Kahn v. Sutro: "In no sense can it be said that some were county officers and some were city officers. The sheriff and county clerk are as much officers of the municipal corporation as the mayor or the police judge. Whatever may be said of their powers and duties, they are part and parcel of the corporate organization known as the 'City and County of San Francisco.'" At that time the legislature was not restricted by constitutional limitations, and could do just what it did do, to wit, merge and consolidate the former city of San Francisco and the former county of San Francisco into one body under the name and style of the "City and County of San Francisco," and thereupon wipe out of existence each of the former public corporations. The present constitution in many ways recognizes the existence of this consolidated local government. For instance, in the judiciary article it is provided that: "There shall be in each of the organized counties or cities and counties of the state, a superior court, for each of which at least one judge shall be elected by the qualified electors of the county, or city and county, at the general state election: provided, * * * that in the city and county of San Francisco there shall be elected twelve judges of the superior court;" and it is further provided for the classification of the 12 judges of the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco. But for the county of San Francisco, as distinguished from the subdivision of the state known as the "city and county," no court is provided by the constitution, either of record or inferior court; and no sheriff, clerk, or other officer incident to a court is therefore required. Judge Hagar, chairman of the article of the constitution in reference to counties, cities, and towns, speaking in defense of the consolidated government of the city and county of San Francisco, said: "The tendency is to reduce the number of officers. Instead of having a set of city officers and a set of county officers, they are consolidated. We have a sheriff who is the sheriff of the county and of the city. We have a tax collector and we have an auditor that acts for both. Formerly we had one for each. The tendency of consolidated government is to reduce the offices from two to one in every case, and reduce the expenses in every particular." Since the consolidation act there has not been, nor is there now, any county of San Francisco. Necessarily there can be no officers of a county that does not exist. Besides, it was expressly provided that the officers formerly known and recognized as county officers were constituted officers of the new body politic, to wit, the city and county of San Francisco, and they have continued to be such up to and since the adoption of the present freeholders' charter. Being officers of the city and county of San Francisco, recognized as such under the freeholders' charter, they are subject to its provisions, the same as the officers who, before the consolidation, were known and recognized as officers of the city of San Francisco. Although Kahn v. Sutro was not overruled in terms in Martin v. Board, yet the effect is the same. The two cases are not in harmony, and cannot stand together. A question had arisen whether so-called "county officers" were subject to the county government act, or whether they were officers of the consolidated municipal government in like manner as though they belonged strictly to a city government; and one purpose, evidently, of the adoption of the new section 8½ of article 11 of the constitution was to set this controversy at rest, and the plain meaning of subdivision 4 of said new section is to put the so-called "county officers" in the same category as those formerly known as "city officers." Public policy favors local self-government, and the popular sentiment in this respect is constantly strengthening. This is manifest by the constitution of 1878-79, and by the repeated amendments thereto proposed by the legislature and adopted by the people. And it may also be said that the popular tendency is in favor of the merit system in the appointment and tenure of all subordinate officers in the civil service. Bearing these facts in mind, the court should adopt a liberal line of construction, and resolve all doubts in favor of such recognized public policy, and sustain the freeholders' charter in its integrity, instead of weakening it in a vital part.

CAHEN v. WELLS, Auditor. (S. F. 2,439.)
(Supreme Court of California. April 6, 1901.)
MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—CIVIL SERVICE—STATUTE PROVIDING SAME CON-STITUTIONAL.

The San Francisco city and county charter (St. 1899, p. 350, art. 13) establishes a civil service commission, and requires that all places of employment in the different offices and departments shall be filled by appointments from the applicants receiving the highest rank in competitive examinations therefor conducted by the commissioners. Regulations as to the conduct of the examinations are prescribed, and section 12 provides that no deputy, clerk, or employé who shall have been appointed under the rules shall be removed or discharged except for cause, on written charges, which shall be investigated by the commissioners. Held, in a proceeding to enjoin the payment of the salaries and expenses of the commissioners, that though section 12 might be unconstitutional, as violating Const. art. 20, § 16, prohibiting the holding of an office, the tenure of which was not fixed by law, for more than four years, inasmuch as the general provisions of the law were not inseparably dependent on section 12 the entire act was not void.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Carroll Cook, Judge.

Proceeding by S. Cahen against Asa R. Wells, auditor of San Francisco city and county, to enjoin the payment of salaries and expenses of the civil service commissioners. From an order sustaining a demurrer to the complaint, the plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

P. F. Dunne, for appellant. Lloyd & Wood, Franklin K. Lane, George W. Lane, and Garret W. McEnerney, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This case differs materially from the case of Crowley v. Freud (this day decided) 64 Pac. 696, although the two cases were argued and submitted at the same time, and both involve powers of the civil service commission created by the present charter of the city and county of San Francisco. This action was brought to enjoin the defendant, Wells, who is auditor of said city and county, from drawing any warrant in payment of salary of the civil service commissioners, or of any employé of said commissioners, or of any expenses of said commission, on the ground that all the provisions of said charter on the subject of civil service are unconstitutional and void. A general demurrer to the complaint was sustained in the court below, and judgment rendered for defendant, and from that judgment plaintiff appeals.

The provisions of the charter (St. 1899, p. 350) here brought in question are contained, under the caption of "Civil Service," in article 13 of that instrument. This article is quite lengthy, and contains 20 sections (St. 1899, p. 350). The main attack in this case is made on section 12. Leaving that section out of view for the present, it will be sufficient for the purpose of this decision to state very briefly some of the provisions of the other sections of the article. Those provisions are, in substance, as follows: Three persons, who shall constitute the "civil service commission," shall be appointed by the mayor, and shall "classify all the places of employment under the offices and departments of the city and county"; and it is provided in section 2 that "no appointment to any such place shall be made except according to the rules hereinafter mentioned." Id. p. 350. The commissioners are to make rules "for examinations, appointments, promotions, and removals"; and "all applicants for places in the classified civil service shall be subject to examination, which shall be public, competitive and free." The examinations are to be held after notice, and are to be conducted either by the commissioners or by examiners appointed for that purpose. From the returns of the examiners a register is to be prepared of persons whose general average standing upon the examination is not less than the minimum fixed by the rules, and who are otherwise eligible; and such persons "shall take rank upon the register as candidates in the order of their relative excellences as determined by the examination." When a position is to be filled in any department or office, the head of the same shall notify the commissioners of that fact, and the commissioners shall thereupon certify to the appointing officer the name of one or more candidates, not exceeding three, standing highest on the register of the class to which the position belongs; and the appointing officer shall fill the place by the appointment of the person certified by the commissioners, if only one be certified, or, if two or three be certified, then by the appointment of one of those certified. The first appointment is declared to be on "probation" for a period "to be fixed by the rules of the commissioners," but not to exceed six months; and during this period of probation the head of the office may, "by and with the consent of the commissioners," discharge the person appointed "upon assigning in writing his reasons therefor to the commissioners." If he is not discharged within the probation period "his appointment is deemed complete." It is also provided that to meet "extraordinary exigencies" the head of an office may, "with the approval of the commissioners," make temporary appointments to remain in force until regular appointment under the provisions of the article may be made, but not exceeding 60 days. There are other details as to appointments under the said article 13, which need not be here mentioned.

Said section 12 is as follows: "Sec. 12. No deputy, clerk, or employee in the classified civil service of the city and county, who shall have been appointed under said rules, shall be removed or discharged except for cause, upon written charges and after an opportunity to be heard in his own defense. Such charges shall be investigated by or before the civil service commission, or by or before some officer or board appointed by the commissioners to conduct such investigation. The finding and decision of the commissioners, or such investigating officer, or board, when approved by the commissioners, shall be certified to the appointing officer or board and shall be forthwith enforced by such officer. Nothing in this article shall limit the power of any officer or board to suspend a subordinate for a reasonable period not exceeding thirty days." Id. p. 352. Appellant contends that section 12 is unconstitutional and invalid, because it provides for a life tenure of office, and is therefore in violation of section 16 of article 20 of the state constitution, which is as follows: "When the term of any officer or commissioner is not provided for in this constitution, the term of such officer or commissioner may be declared by law; and if not so declared such officer or commissioner shall hold his position as such officer or commissioner during the pleasure of the authority making the appointment; but in no case shall such term exceed four years." Of course, a judgment in favor of appellant in this present action would obliterate all the provisions of the charter on the subject of civil service, and therefore plaintiff must maintain the unconstitutionality not only of the provisions of section 12, but also of all the other provisions of article 13. This he endeavors to do by showing that the life tenure which he claims to be created by section 12 is the main, controlling, final, and vital purpose of all the provisions of the charter about civil service, and that if section 12 be unconstitutional the other provision, being merely introductory, ancillary, and instrumental to the main purposes, must fall with it. His positions, therefore, are: First, that section 12 is unconstitutional; and, second, that its unconstitutionality carries with it the unconstitutionality of the whole scheme of civil service presented in the charter, all the provisions being so inseparably blended that no part can stand if other parts are invalid.

In our view of appellant's second position, it is not necessary for us to determine whether or not his first position is tenable. We have not before us the case of a person who, having been appointed under the civil service provisions of the charter, and having held his position for more than four years, claims to be entitled to hold it for life. Whether or not section 12 undertakes to provide for terms of office in excess of the limitation of section 16 of article 20 of the constitution; whether or not all persons dealt with by article 13 of the charter are within the description "officer," as used in said section 16; whether or not the head of an office might remove a subordinate without the consent of the commission,—these and other questions which would be involved in passing on the constitutionality of section 12 can be more properly determined as the facts of future cases may present them. In the present action they are remote, general, and speculative.

In the briefs of counsel on both sides there are a great many quotations from sayings of people who are designated as prominent "civil service reformers"; and it is insisted by respondent that, in the opinion of these reformers, the main principle of what is called "civil service reform" is that appointments to subordinate official positions shall be made only after competitive examinations, and upon the basis of merit, to be ascertained by such examinations, while it is insisted by appellant that "according to those opinions" a permanent tenure for life, subject only to removal for cause after a trial, is the mainspring of such reform, without which all the other machinery would be useless. While the decision in this case as to the purposes of the framers of the charter must rest on the language to be found in the charter itself, yet it may be said that its language seems to be in accord generally with the views of said reformers quoted in the briefs. The purpose to be gathered from the language of the charter, as well as from said quotations in the brief, is clearly dual. One of the purposes is to secure a change in the method of appointment of subordinates, and most of the provisions of article 13 are especially directed to that end. It is clear that one of the supposed evils which civil service was expected to eradicate was the tendency to give places as rewards of political services, which left open the temptations to make improper promises and bargains about appointments prior to elections and party conventions. The intended remedy is what is called the "merit system," by which it is sought to give places to such persons best fitted to discharge the duties of such places, upon the theory that fitness can be best ascertained by a competitive examination. Under this system the head of an office has no opportunity to appoint a friend, and it is assumed that he would not be likely to select as competent a man as an examining board would select for him. It is apparent that this is one of the main purposes appearing on the face of article 13 of the charter. The great body of the article deals with the appointments of subordinates, and with the details of the examinations of candidates for such appointments. And this is an independent purpose not inseparably interwoven with section 12, and, not being itself unconstitutional, is not involved in the asserted unconstitutionality of section 12, and can stand as a valid enactment, even though section 12 be eliminated. Appellant contends—and quotes some of the "sayings" above noticed—that all the provisions about appointments under the so-called "merit system" would be worthless without the provision in section 12 against removals, and that therefore the two are inseparably connected. But since the head of an office could not, under the merit system, fill a vacancy with a person of his own choice, but must do so with the person, or one of the two or three persons, certified by the commission, the incentive to make removals, except for actual incompetency, would be very slight. One of the reformers quoted in the brief, after pointing out that removals are rarely asked for except to make a vacancy for a particular man, says, "Under the merit system of appointment, the question of removals would be solved without legislation."

Our conclusions are that those sections of article 13 of the charter which provide for the method of appointment are not inseparably interwoven with section 12, which deals with removals; that those sections stand as valid enactments, even though section 12 be eliminated; and that there applies to the case at bar the well-established rule of construction which is stated in Cooley, Const. Lim. p. 211, as follows: "If, when the unconstitutional portion is stricken out, that which remains is complete in itself, and capable of being executed in accordance with the apparent legislative intent, wholly independent of that which was rejected, it must be sustained. * * * If a statute attempts to accomplish two or more objects, and is void as to one, it will still be in every respect complete and valid as to the other." We must not be understood, however, as in any way expressing an opinion as to the constitutionality of said section 12. The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. WELLS, FARGO & CO.
(S. F. 2,136.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 6, 1901.)
INTERNAL REVENUE—EXPRESS COMPANIES—REGULAR RATES—PAYMENT OF WAR REVENUE TAX—REFUSAL OF PACKAGE.

Where a package was offered to an express company for transportation, accompanied by a tender of the full amount of the company's regular charges for the service, such company could not refuse to accept the package unless further payment of one cent or of a one-cent documentary internal revenue stamp was made, and mandamus would lie to compel its acceptance.

McFarland and Harrison, JJ., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Mandamus by the people of the state of California against Wells, Fargo & Co. From a judgment for relator, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

E. S. Pillsbury and Alfred Sutro, for appellant. Tirey L. Ford, Atty. Gen., Geo. A. Sturtevant, Dep. Atty. Gen., and Wm. M. Abbott, Dep. Atty. Gen., for the People.

HENSHAW, J. This action is mandate, brought by the state to compel the defendant corporation, an express company, to accept, carry, and deliver a certain package offered to it for transportation, the offer being accompanied by a tender of the full amount of defendant's regular charges for such services. Defendant refused to accept the package without further payment by plaintiff of one cent, or of a one-cent documentary internal revenue stamp, as provided by the United States statute of June 13, 1898, commonly designated the "War Revenue Act." These facts were admitted by defendant's answer, and plaintiff moved and obtained judgment upon the pleadings. From that judgment defendant appeals.

At the time when the appeal came before this court for argument, many questions which had received learned and elaborate attention from counsel in their printed briefs had been disposed of by a decision of the supreme court of the United States in American Exp. Co. v. Michigan, 177 U. S. 404, 20 Sup. Ct. 695, 44 L. Ed. 823. So far as the law of that case is applicable to the one before us, it is of the highest authority, and absolutely determinative. It invites, therefore, careful consideration. The first distinction to be noted between this case and the one which came under decision before the supreme court of the United States is this: In the former the pleadings admit that the regular charge of the express company was tendered by the shipper, and refused by the company, which exacted one cent, or a one-cent internal revenue stamp, in addition to its regular charge. In the latter case the company increased its rates by adding to them the amount of the war revenue tax. In dealing with the question of the increased rate, the supreme court of the United States held that the state tribunal had not decided that the rate otherwise reasonable had become unreasonable solely because increased by the amount of the war tax, and its further discussion of the law is based upon this holding that, in effect, the state court had decided that the increased rate was not unreasonable per se. We cannot here do better than quote at length from the opinion of the supreme court after it had reached this conclusion:

"The controversy which is contained in the merits of the cause is resolvable into three questions: First. Does the act of congress impose upon the express company the duty of making a receipt for a package tendered to it, and does it also forbid the express company from requiring the shipper to furnish the stamp to be affixed to the receipt, or of supplying the means of paying the same? Second. If the act of congress does impose such duty on the express company, and does inhibit it from requiring that the shipper furnish the stamp or the means of paying it, does the act further forbid the express company from seeking to cast the burden on the shipper by an increase of rates? Third. And, as a corollary of the second proposition, does an increase of rate by an express company which is otherwise just and reasonable become unlawful, under the act of congress, because such increase is made with the purpose of shifting the burden of the one-cent tax from its own shoulders to that of the shipper? The first proposition is unnecessary to be considered, since, even although it be conceded that the act of congress imposes on the express company the duty of paying the one-cent stamp tax, this admission would not be at all decisive of the cause, unless also it be ascertained under the second proposition that the act of congress also forbids the express company from shifting the burden of the tax by means of an increase of rates. And no necessity for passing on the first proposition arises from the mere fact that the decision of the second proposition requires a consideration of the provisions of the statute which it would be necessary to take into view if the first proposition was under consideration. It is also to be observed that the second and third propositions, which involve, the one the right to shift the burden of the tax by exacting that the one cent be provided, and the other the power to increase rates within the limits of the requirements that the charges as increased are reasonable, both depend upon the same considerations. Indeed, the question into which all the issues are ultimately resolvable is whether the right exists to shift the burden, of course ever circumscribed by the duty of not exceeding reasonable rates. If it does not,—that is, upon the hypothesis that it not only can be but is forbidden,—then it must result that all methods adopted to attain the prohibited result are void. On the contrary, if the right to seek to shift the burden obtains, then the substantial result of what is done becomes the criterion, and the mere fact that the motive announced for a reasonable increase of rates is declared to be a shifting of the burden cannot prevent the exercise of the lawful right. * * * Now, there is nothing in the provisions just quoted which, by the widest conjecture, can be construed as expressly forbidding the person upon whom the taxes are cast from shifting the same by contract or by any other lawful means.”

The court then decides that, conceding (not determining) that the primary duty to pay the tax is cast upon the transportation company, it is a burden which may be shifted, and that a rate charge, otherwise not unreasonable, will not, as matter of law, be held to be unreasonable when increased by the amount of the war revenue tax, for so to hold would be to declare, against the language of the law, that the burden may not be shifted, and, further, it would be, in effect, but to hold that the act of congress, by the mere fact of imposing a stamp tax, forbids all attempts to shift it, and, consequently, that the carrier is deprived by the law of the right to fix rates, even though the limit of reasonable rates be not transcended. With this exposition of the law there can be no cavil, but it is to be remembered that the state of facts to which it applies is one where the express company's regular and reasonable rate, exacted of each and every shipper, includes the amount of the war tax, while in the case at bar it is admitted that the regular rate and charge of the company was tendered and refused. The supreme court of the United States found it unnecessary to decide, and therefore did not decide, whether, primarily, the duty to pay the tax is cast upon the carrier. Throughout its discussion it conceded that such was the law. If a decision upon this point had been necessary, we entertain no doubt but that one conclusion could have been reached,—that this duty is primarily upon the carrier. The language of the act seems to foreclose any controversy upon the matter: “There shall be levied, collected and paid, for and in respect of * * * documents, * * * by any person or persons or party who shall make, sign or issue the same, or for whose use or benefit the same shall be made, * * * the several taxes,” etc. Section 6, War Revenue Act. “It shall be the duty of every * * * express company * * * to issue to the shipper * * * a bill of lading, * * * and there shall be duly attached * * * to each bill a stamp of the value of one cent.” Section 25, Id. In the Michigan case the express company shifted the burden by a reasonable change in its rate. In the present case the question before the court may thus be put: May an express company, to which has admittedly been tendered its regular charge for the transportation of a package, refuse to accept and transport that package upon its arbitrary demand that something more than the regular charge shall be paid? Here it is true that the exaction is small, amounting to only one cent; but, if the principle is good, it would apply equally well if the amount were large. Being an arbitrary demand of the company,—that is to say, a demand which it could waive at pleasure,—it would mean, if the principle contended for by appellant be upheld, that one shipper might receive the services of the express company upon payment of the regular charge, while others for the same service would be compelled to pay varying sums, arbitrarily exacted, in addition to the regular charge. So stated,—and we think the statement a fair one,—it will not need discussion to show that the principle is erroneous, and that this may not be done. Each and every shipper is entitled to the services of the company upon the payment of the regular charge for the same service. The judgment appealed from is therefore affirmed.

We concur: BEATTY, C. J.; GAROUTTE, J.; TEMPLE, J.; VAN DYKE, J.

McFARLAND, J. I dissent. I can see no difference whatever between the case at bar and the case of American Exp. Co. v. Michigan, decided by the supreme court of the United States, and reported in 177 U. S. 404, 20 Sup. Ct. 695, 44 L. Ed. 823. The facts in the two cases are exactly the same. In the Michigan case the express company refused to accept any goods for transportation “unless the shipper attaches the stamp to the said bill of lading, * * * or furnishes the money or means for that purpose to said company." That was exactly what was done in the case at bar. In the Michigan case there was no pretense that the express company had rearranged its schedules of charges. When a package was presented, it merely demanded that the shipper put the stamp on the receipt, or furnish the money for that purpose; and the United States supreme court held that it had the right so to do. The same demand was made in the case at bar. There was no question of the reasonableness of the rate in either case. The question decided in the Michigan case is precisely the same question upon which the case at bar depends, and I can see no distinction between the two cases in either the facts or the law. I think that the judgment should be reversed upon the authority of the said case of American Exp. Co. v. Michigan.

NEW TRIAL—FINDINGS—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—ALLEGATIONS OF COMPLAINT
—VARIANCE—TRIAL.

1. Three devisees of a ditch agreed to advance a certain amount each, to pay certain expenses, to be charged in the account of the manager of the ditch, and if, in the settlement of his account, such expenses should be allowed as proper charges against the revenue of the ditch, in which the testator's widow had a life interest, the advances should be refunded. The expenses were allowed as a proper charge, and one of the devisees sued the agent of the manager of the ditch for the return of his advance, from the revenues. The manager testified that he knew from his accounts that such an amount was received from the ditch revenues. Held, that the evidence was sufficient to sustain a finding that defendant collected from the ditch revenues the funds with which to repay plaintiff.

2. A contention that, because the complaint alleged that the testator's widow refunded the amount of plaintiff's advance to defendant, the finding that it was collected from the revenues of the ditch did not correspond with the allegations of the complaint, was unfounded, since the widow was entitled to the revenues of the ditch, and, if they were paid to her and then refunded, the sum was substantially a repayment on her part.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Yolo county; W. H. Grant, Judge.

Action by John Wolfskill against James A. Douglas. From an order denying his motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Bush & Ish and Byron Ball, for appellant. R. Clark, for respondent.

VAN DYKE, J. This is an appeal from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial. A separate appeal from the judgment was considered by this court and the judgment affirmed February 7, 1900. 59 Pac. 987.

The first point made by the appellant is that the complaint states no cause of action, but in the opinion on affirmance of the judgment it is held that the complaint does state a cause of action sufficient to support the judgment.

James Moore in his lifetime was the owner of the Moore Ditch, in Yolo county, and in his will devised the same in equal shares to his three children, R. E. Moore and the wife of the plaintiff and the wife of the defendant herein, with a life interest in the revenues of said ditch to Mrs. Moore, later Mrs. Black. At the time of Moore's death the ditch water rights were being litigated, and certain expenses had accrued, which the court ordered paid. Thereupon the plaintiff, the defendant, and said R. E. Moore entered into an agreement by which they mutually agreed to advance the sum of $400 each to pay these expenses, and that the same should be charged in the account of said Moore as manager of said ditch, and, if in the settlement of said account the expenses so advanced by plaintiff, defendant, and Moore should be allowed as proper charges against the revenue of said ditch, the same should be refunded. In pursuance of this agreement each advanced $400, which was used in the payment of said court expenses; and in January, 1894, the said account was settled and allowed by the superior court of Yolo county, and the charges so paid by plaintiff, defendant, and Moore were allowed as proper charges against the revenues of said ditch, and the funds theretofore collected by defendant from said ditch revenues then became available for the payment of the debt herein sued on. The appellant contends that the evidence does not sustain the finding of the court that the defendant collected from the revenues of said ditch the funds with which to repay the plaintiff for the advances made, or that such funds ever came into the defendant's hands for such purpose. Moore testifies: "I know, according to my accounts, it was paid. I say he received it from the ditch revenues." And the defendant, Douglas, was Moore's agent. We think the evidence sufficient to support the finding. But the appellant says that it is alleged in the complaint that said Mary A. Black refunded and paid said $400 to the defendant, whereas the finding is that it was collected from the revenues of the ditch, and that the finding, therefore, does not correspond with the allegations of the complaint. This, however, is a mere play upon words. Mrs. Black was entitled to the revenues from the ditch, and, if the money was collected from the revenues of the ditch, it was substantially a repayment on the part of Mrs. Black. The action was not barred by the statute of limitation. The order appealed from is affirmed.

MOORE v. DOUGLAS. (Sac. 727.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 5, 1901.)

APPEAL—CONFLICTING EVIDENCE—JUDGMENT—REVIEW—DELAY IN APPEAL—NEW TRIAL—DEMURRER TO COMPLAINT—PLEADINGS—PROOF—VARIANCE.

1. Where an appeal from a judgment is not taken in time, neither it, nor whether the complaint stated a cause of action, or the judgment was supported by the findings, or the findings were contradictory with the pleadings, can be considered.

2. The action of the court in overruling an objection to testimony on the ground that the complaint did not state a cause of action cannot be reviewed on appeal from an order denying a new trial.

3. Where it did not appear that defendant was in any respect misled to his prejudice by the admission of evidence which he claimed varied from the pleadings, it was not error to refuse to strike it out, under Code Civ. Proc. § 469, providing that no variance between the pleadings and proof shall be deemed material unless it actually misled the adverse party to his prejudice.

4. There being a substantial conflict in the evidence, the findings will not be disturbed on appeal.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Yolo county; W. H. Grant, Judge.

Action by Robert E. Moore against James A. Douglas. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Bush & Ish and Byron Ball, for appellant. N. A. Hawkins, for respondent.

VAN DYKE, J. This action is, in a measure, a companion of Wolfskill v. Douglas (Sac. 702) 64 Pac. 704, and much of the testimony taken was used in both actions. The appeal is from the judgment in favor of the plaintiff, and also from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial. The judgment was rendered July 19, 1895, and the order denying a new trial, July 6, 1899. The notice of appeal was filed July 17, 1899. The appeal from the judgment, not having been taken in time, cannot be considered; and the appellant's contention that the complaint fails to state a cause of action, and that the demurrer to the same should have been sustained, also that the judgment is not supported by the findings, and that the findings are contradictory and inconsistent with the pleadings, cannot, therefore, be considered; there being no appeal from the judgment. Brison v. Brison, 90 Cal. 323, 27 Pac. 186; Insurance Co. v. Fisher, 109 Cal. 566, 42 Pac. 154; Hall v. Susskind, 120 Cal. 559, 53 Pac. 46; Jenkins v. Frink, 30 Cal. 586; Roberts v. Eldred, 73 Cal. 394, 15 Pac. 16.

On the appeal from the order denying a new trial it is contended by the appellant that the court erred in overruling his objection to certain testimony, and denying his motion to strike out the same after being admitted. The objection to the testimony was placed upon the ground that the complaint states no cause of action, and that there is a variance between the proof offered and the pleading; and the motion to strike out the testimony was based upon similar grounds. The objection to the evidence upon the ground that the complaint states no cause of action was only, in effect, a demurrer to the complaint upon that ground, and, as we have seen, cannot be reviewed upon an appeal from an order denying a new trial. Whether there was a variance between the allegations of the complaint and the evidence offered could not be determined until after the evidence had been received, and, as the defendant does not make it appear that he was in any respect misled to his prejudice thereby, no material error was committed in refusing to strike it out. Code Civ. Proc. § 469. In reference to appellant's contention that the evidence does not support the findings, the most that can be said in his favor is that there is a substantial conflict in the evidence; and hence, under the general rule, the findings must be allowed to stand. The order denying a new trial is affirmed.

NOTES—MORTGAGES—FORECLOSURE—PLEADING—COMPLAINT—AMENDMENT—NEW CAUSE OF ACTION—LIMITATIONS—EXTINGUISHMENT OF COLLATERAL OBLIGATION—CONTINUANCE—APPEAL—EVIDENCE—ASSIGNMENT OF NOTE BEFORE SUIT.

1. An amendment to a complaint on a note alleging a mortgage to secure the note was not erroneous as stating an entirely different cause of action, but merely set up an additional remedy, and was properly allowed.

2. Where complaint on a note was filed two days before the expiration of limitations of four years, and an amended complaint setting up a mortgage to secure such note was filed four days thereafter, the action was not barred by limitations, which ran only to the filing of the original complaint.

3. Civ. Code, § 2911, providing that a lien is extinguished by the lapse of the time within which an action can be brought on the principal obligation, had no effect on an action on a note commenced two days before the expiration of limitations, the complaint of which was amended four days thereafter by alleging a mortgage to secure such note, since extinguishment of a collateral could not affect the principal obligation.

4. Where a complaint on a note was filed two days before limitations expired, and was amended four days later to allege a mortgage to secure the note, and the mortgagor had sold the premises subject to the mortgage, the latter's personal liability was not extinguished by the mortgagee's allowing limitations to run against the mortgage.

5. Where, on the facts shown by the bill of exceptions, there was no error in refusing to grant defendant a continuance, resort could not be had to defendant's affidavit for continuance to show the contrary.

6. Where a note made to S., "cashier of Paso Robles Bank," was assigned to the bank, but the assignment was not dated, and S. severed his connection with the bank long before suit on the note, the evidence, in absence of evidence to the contrary, was sufficient to sustain a finding that the note was assigned before suit.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Luis Obispo county; E. P. Unangst, Judge.

Action by F. D. Frost against G. F. Witter, Jr. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

E. Graves and G. F. Witter, Jr., for appellant. W. H. Spencer, for respondent.

SMITH, C. Appeal from a judgment for foreclosure of mortgaged premises and from an order denying defendant's motion for new trial. The original complaint counted on a promissory note made by the defendant to one Speyer March 14, 1894, payable six months after date, and assigned to plaintiff. It was filed September 12, 1898, two days before the lapse of four years from the maturity of the note. An amended complaint was filed September 16, 1898, which, in addition to the matter alleged in the original complaint, counted also on a mortgage of even date, executed by the defendant to secure the note, and also made one W. G. Witter a party as claiming some interest in the mortgaged premises, etc. The defendants each moved to strike the amended complaint from the files on "the ground that [it] wholly changes the cause of action," and the motions were denied. The amended complaint was then demurred to on general grounds, and on the ground that the action was barred by the provisions of section 337, Code Civ. Proc., and section 2911, Civ. Code. The demurrer of the new defendant, W. G. Witter, was sustained on the latter ground; that of the original defendant overruled. The answer of the remaining defendant, besides a general denial and the plea of the statute, pleads affirmatively that by deed of date June 20, 1898, he had conveyed the mortgaged property to W. G. Witter subject to the mortgage, and "that the plaintiff negligently and without the consent of [the] defendant * * * permitted the statute of limitations to run on said mortgage," etc. On this plea it is found that defendant deeded the land to W. G. Witter as alleged, and it appears from the ruling on demurrer that as to him the action was barred. On the issues raised by the general denial and the plea of the statute, the findings are for the plaintiff. Judgment in the usual form was accordingly rendered for the foreclosure of the mortgage and for the docketing of a deficiency judgment. The principal questions involved relate (1) to the refusal of the court to strike out the amended complaint; (2) to the overruling of the defendant's demurrer and plea of the statute of limitations; and (3) to the sufficiency of defendant's affirmative plea.

1. In considering the limit to the right of amendment, cases of amendment at the trial for variance under sections 470 and 471 of the Code of Civil Procedure are to be distinguished from amendments under sections 472 and 473. With reference to the former, an express limit is established by the statute. With reference to the latter, this is not the case. It is with the latter class of amendments only that we are concerned here. Again, some distinction is perhaps to be made between amendments as of course, under section 472, and amendments allowed by the court, under section 473. But in the absence of any restriction or qualification to the right of amendment under the former section, it may be assumed that it is at least as extensive as under the latter. Whether or not it is more extensive it will be unnecessary in this case to inquire. The question will be regarded, therefore, as relating generally to the limit or extent to which the complaint may be amended under sections 472, 473, Code Civ. Proc. On this point I find no general rule laid down by the decisions in this state. All that is said is that great liberality should be used by the courts in allowing amendments (Burns v. Scooffy, 98 Cal. 276, 33 Pac. 86, and cases cited); and that the allowance of amendments is a matter within the discretion of the courts (Coubrough v. Adams, 70 Cal. 378, 11 Pac. 634; Lestrade v. Barth, 17 Cal. 288). And in practice the courts have been extremely liberal,—as, e. g., in Heilbron v. Heilen, 72 Cal. 376, 14 Pac. 24, where the complaint was amended so as to describe a different tract of land from that described in the original complaint; or in Walsh v. McKeen, 75 Cal. 519, 17 Pac. 673, where the case was changed from an action at law to a case in equity; or in Cox v. McLaughlin, 76 Cal. 60, 18 Pac. 100, where the change allowed was from an action on a special contract to an action on a quantum meruit; or as in Castagnino v. Balletta, 82 Cal. 256, 23 Pac. 127, where the change was from an action on a mechanic's lien to an action on the special contract, or in assumpsit; or in Bogart v. Crosby, 80 Cal. 195, 22 Pac. 84, where the principal debtors, who had been omitted from the original complaint, were brought in by amendment. In other states the decisions are conflicting. Pom. Rem. & Rem. Rights, § 566. In one, and perhaps the most numerous, class of cases, the rule is established, says the author cited, that a party "cannot, under the form of an amendment, change the nature and scope of his action"; or, rather, as he adds in the same breath, "he cannot substitute a wholly different cause of action." The latter, however, is an essentially different proposition, and is the form in which the rule is commonly asserted,—as, e. g., in Shields v. Barrow, 17 How. 144, 15 L. Ed. 158, and the Alabama cases cited in note to 1 Enc. PL & Prac. p. 463. And it is obvious that the unqualified way in which the rule is sometimes stated—i. e. that a new or different cause of action cannot be introduced by amendment—cannot be accepted; for the most common kinds of amendments are those in which complaints are amended that do not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and in these, and often in the case of new parties, a new cause of action is in fact for the first time introduced. All that can be required, therefore (to use the language of Mr. Pomeroy), is that "a wholly different cause of action" shall not be introduced; or, as said by the court in Shields v. Barrow, supra, that "a complainant [is not] at liberty to abandon the entire case made by his bill, and make a new and different case by way of amendment," or "to strike out the entire substance and prayer of his bill, and insert a new case by way of amendment"; or, as expressed by this court in an early case, the matter of the amendment must not be "entirely foreign to the original complaint." Canal Co. v. Kidd, 28 Cal. 681. On the other hand, under statutory provisions similar to ours, the rule has been entirely repudiated by the court of appeals of New York, and it is there held to be immaterial whether the cause of action set out in the amended complaint is new or otherwise. Brown v. Leigh, 12 Abb. Prac. (N. S.) 193, and other cases cited; Pom. Rem. & Rem. Rights, § 566, p. 649, note 1. The rule has not been expressly adopted in any of the decisions in this state, though the point that it had been violated has often been made and overruled on special grounds,—as, e. g., that the amendment did not "materially" change the cause of action (Louvall v. Gridley, 70 Cal. 510, 11 Pac. 777); or that the amendment did not state an "essentially" different cause of action (Bogart v. Crosby, 91 Cal. 281, 27 Pac. 603); or that the new matter was not "entirely foreign to the original complaint," as in Canal Co. v. Kidd, supra. But the rule has not been affirmatively asserted in any of the decisions; and in the case last cited the court declined to consider the question whether a cause of action could be introduced by amendment different from the one originally alleged, "or, more properly speaking, attempted to be alleged." And this is in accordance with the cases cited supra, in each of which the cause of action set up in the amended complaint was more or less widely different from the original. For the purposes of this case, however, it may be assumed that the rule in its more liberal form—as stated in the cases cited—has been tacitly recognized, and the question to be considered will be regarded as relating simply to its application.

In applying the rule, some confusion has resulted from the neglect to define the terms "cause of action" and "action," to which, therefore, our attention must be first directed. The latter term is very commonly confounded with the suit (litis) in which the action is enforced. But this is not the technical meaning of the term, according to which an action is simply the right or power to enforce an obligation. "An action is nothing else than the right or power of prosecuting in a judicial proceeding what is owed to one,"—which is but to say, an obligation. "Actio nihil aliud est quam jus persequendi in iudicio quod sibi debetur." The action therefore springs from the obligation, and hence the "cause of action" is simply the obligation. This is in accordance with the view of Mr. Pomeroy, though expressed by him in new and somewhat awkward terms. Pom. Pl. & Prac. § 453. The obligation thus constituting the cause of action may be either ex contractu or ex delicto; and, again, the latter may be either for compensation or damages, or for restitution,—as, e. g., the obligation of a wrongdoer to restore the property of another; for, though there is a distinction between actions brought for the recovery of damages or compensation and those brought for restitution, the former constituting actions in rem and the latter actions in personam, yet in either case the action is to enforce an obligation; nor can there be an action for any other purpose. 1 Aust. Jur. § 527. The "cause of action" is therefore to be distinguished also from the "remedy," which is simply the means by which the obligation or the corresponding action is effectuated; and also from the "relief" sought. Pom. Pl. & Prac. § 453. Applying these definitions to the case at bar, it is clear that the cause of action set up in the original, and that set up in the amended, complaint, was simply the obligation sought to be enforced,—that is to say, the obligation to pay the money agreed to be paid,—and that the only change that took place was in the remedy by which it was sought to enforce the obligation. This was the view taken in Lackner v. Turnbull, 7 Wis. 105, affirmed in Ball v. McGeoch, 78 Wis. 359, 47 N. W. 610, where the original complaint was in assumpsit for work and labor, and the plaintiff was permitted to set up in an amended complaint a mechanic's lien; the court saying: "We do not think that in strictness the amendment which was made in this case did change the cause of action. It only changed the remedy, * * * but the cause of action, or, in other words, 'the labor performed and materials furnished' [and, it should be added, the corresponding obligation], were the same, whether the plaintiff proceeded under the original or amended complaint. By amending his complaint he was enabled to obtain relief which he would not have been entitled to under the original complaint, but the 'cause of action' was not changed by the amendment." In the present case the cause of action was the obligation to pay the note, to which the mortgage was merely an incident. Storch v. McCain, 85 Cal. 307, 24 Pac. 639. The original complaint was defective only by reason of failure to set up the mortgage, which by a technical statutory rule was necessary. The amendment simply cured this defect; and the effect of the judgment was simply to give to the plaintiff what he originally demanded, and some additional relief, which, though necessary under the statute, was of no value. The case therefore comes within the rule. Nor is this decision in conflict with Ramirez v. Murray, 5 Cal. 222, and Hackett v. Bank, 57 Cal. 335, cited by appellant's counsel. These cases did not refer to amendments under section 472 or section 473, Code Civ. Proc., but to amendments at the trial for variance, which are governed by a different rule. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 470, 471; Prac. Act 1851, §§ 71, 579. Nor is the cause of action here changed from tort to contract, or vice versa, as in those cases.

2. It follows that there was no error in overruling the defendant's demurrer or his plea of the statute. Where the cause of action is not changed, the time to which the statute of limitations runs is the filing of the original complaint. Lorenzana v. Camarillo, 45 Cal. 125; Easton v. O'Reilly, 63 Cal. 308; Cox v. McLaughlin, 76 Cal. 60, 18 Pac. 100; Vanderslice v. Matthews, 79 Cal. 273, 21 Pac. 748; Smith v. Bellows, 77 Pa. 441; 1 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 551, and notes. The cases cited by appellant's counsel are not in conflict with this view. In each of them the causes of action in the original and in the amended complaint were different, or assumed to be different. Anderson v. Mayers, 50 Cal. 525; Atkinson v. Canal Co., 53 Cal. 105; Meeks v. Railroad Co., 61 Cal. 149. The decision in Bank v. Parrish, 116 Cal. 259, 48 Pac. 73, refers to the filing of a cross complaint by the defendant. Nor is the case affected by the provisions of section 2911, Civ. Code. A lien may be extinguished by the extinction of the principal debt, but the contrary does not follow. Nor, even were it extinguished, would that prevent a judgment on the principal obligation. The contrary has been expressly held. Association v. King, 83 Cal. 440, 442, 444, 23 Pac. 376; Beatty, O. J., in Hearn v. Kennedy, 85 Cal. 57, 24 Pac. 606. The plaintiff was compelled by express statutory provisions to set up the mortgage, but it was for the defendant to waive the privilege if he desired; and the maxim would apply, "Volenti non fit injuria." But here, if there were error in foreclosing the mortgage,—and I hold the contrary,—no harm was done, for the defendant had parted with his interest.

3. In the affirmative defense set up by the defendant it is claimed that, by the negligence of the plaintiff in suffering the mortgage to be barred as to the defendant's grantee, the obligation of the defendant was extinguished; but I know of no principle of equity on which this claim can be maintained. A surety may sometimes be released by failure to pursue the principal with due diligence, but the converse is not true. The case of Society v. Thornton, 109 Cal. 427, 42 Pac. 447, cited by appellant, has no application. In that case the action was brought on the note alone, and the decision was simply an application of the rule established by other decisions in this state,—that the mortgagee "is not authorized to waive the security and to bring an action on the indebtedness." Had the mortgage been set up, whether it had become valueless by neglect or otherwise, the result would have been different. Association v. King, 83 Cal. 440, 442, 444, 23 Pac. 376. It will be observed also that the principal case, and the cases therein cited, involve simply the construction of section 1475 and cognate sections of the Code of Civil Procedure, and hence have no application to the case here, where the same questions are not involved.

Other points made by appellant's counsel are: (1) The refusal of the court to grant a continuance; (2) the denial of the defendant's motion for a reporter; (3) the admission of the note in evidence, and the alleged insufficiency of the evidence to show that the assignment was made to the plaintiff before the beginning of the suit. With regard to the first point, it will be sufficient to say that on the facts shown by the bill of exceptions there was no error, and that resort cannot be had to the affidavit of the defendant to show the contrary. With regard to the second, as the reporter could not be found, the motion could not be granted. Whether it was error in the court to proceed without the reporter need not be determined. The case was one in which the reporter's service could very well be dispensed with without inconvenience, and it is at least clear that no harm could have resulted. As to the admission of the note, the objection, I think, was not sufficiently definite. The note was not barred by the statute, and it was immaterial whether or not the assignment was dated. It was not objected that it did not appear that the assignment was not made before the beginning of the suit, nor was the witness asked that question. As to the evidence, in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, it was sufficient to justify the finding. The note was to Speyer, "cashier of Paso Robles Bank," and presumably for its use, and on his ceasing to be connected with the bank, in the year 1895, there was at least an equitable assignment to the equitable owner. Inferentially, the formal assignment was made about that date, and at all events would relate to it. I advise that the judgment and order appealed from be affirmed.

COHN v. KELLY. (L. A. 785.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 15, 1901.)

QUIETING TITLE—SEPARATE DEFENSE—CROSS COMPLAINT—ANSWER—NECESSITY—FINDINGS—MATERIAL ISSUES.

1. A separate defense, in an action to quiet title, in which it was alleged that plaintiff's deed was acquired by fraud, did not constitute a cross complaint, and hence plaintiff's failure to answer it was not an admission of its truthfulness.

2. Where, in action to quiet title, there was a general finding that the allegations of the complaint were true and that the averments of defendant's answer were false, and that plaintiff did not procure his deed by fraud, as alleged as a separate defense, it cannot be contended that the findings did not cover all the material issues of the case.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; M. T. Allen, Judge.

Action by L. B. Cohn against William J. Kelly. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Dunnigan & Dunnigan, for appellant. D. P. Hatch, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. This was an action to quiet title. Defendant answered, denying the title of plaintiff to the property in controversy. Defendant then, "for a further and separate answer and defense to said cause of action set out in plaintiff's complaint," alleged fraud in the procurement of plaintiff's deed. At the conclusion of the evidence offered by plaintiff upon the trial, defendant moved for a nonsuit, urging, as he here urges, that his separate defense was in reality a cross complaint; that plaintiff's failure to answer it as a cross complaint was equivalent to his admission that the matters set up were true, and consequently he was entitled to a judgment against plaintiff upon the pleadings. This proposition, however, has been repeatedly advanced, and as repeatedly answered against the contention of defendant. Brannan v. Paty, 58 Cal. 330; Shain v. Belvin, 79 Cal. 262, 21 Pac. 747; Goldman v. Bashore, 80 Cal. 146, 22 Pac. 82; Carpenter v. Hewel, 67 Cal. 589, 8 Pac. 314; Doyle v. Franklin, 40 Cal. 106.

Complaint is further made that the findings do not cover all the material issues, but this complaint is also unfounded. In the first place, there is an omnibus finding that all and singular the allegations of plaintiff's complaint are true, and the allegations of defendant's answer are false; but, in addition to this, the findings specifically negative the charge of fraud and conspiracy, which was the basis of the separate defense, and this finding is supported by the evidence. In view of this fact, the absence of other findings becomes immaterial, since, if defendant was not defrauded as he alleges, he had no right to claim a rescission. The judgment appealed from is therefore affirmed.

QUIETING TITLE—ANSWER—VERIFICATION—WAIVER—STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS—NEWLY-DISCOVERED EVIDENCE—SURPRISE—FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES—ACTION FOR TORT—CREDITOR—EVIDENCE.

1. Where the transcript did not show that defendant's answer was verified, but there was no motion to strike it out, and the parties went to trial on the pleadings without objection, the objection that it was not verified cannot be raised for the first time on appeal.

2. Where land was conveyed to plaintiff by her husband pending an action by defendant against the husband, but before judgment was rendered, and the property was subsequently sold to defendant under execution on the judgment, the statute of limitations did not begin to run against defendant's right to set aside the deed to plaintiff until the execution of the sheriff's deed to defendant, since defendant's right did not accrue until he had caused the property to be sold under execution on his judgment.

3. Newly-discovered evidence which consisted of statements made by defendant on a former trial contradicting his present testimony, and merely designed for impeachment, is not sufficient to warrant a new trial.

4. The first counsel employed by plaintiff refused to continue prosecuting the case because plaintiff claimed that the fee received in a former suit was sufficient to pay for his present services, but the attorney confided to S., his successor, all the facts of the case. S. took charge of the controversy July 17th, and the trial was continued to September 8th, and at the close of the evidence was ordered submitted on briefs. S. received a copy of the testimony on September 23d, but, owing to his appointment as colonel of a volunteer regiment, the brief was prepared by his partner, and filed in July, 1898. Held, that the refusal to grant a new trial because of accident and surprise was not an abuse of discretion.

5. Where land was conveyed to plaintiff by her husband pending an action by defendant against the husband for slander, the contention that defendant could not attack the transfer as fraudulent, because he was not a creditor of the husband, cannot be sustained, since one having a claim for a tort is a creditor, even before an action is instituted therefor.

6. Where land was conveyed to plaintiff by her husband pending an action by defendant against him for slander, it was not necessary for defendant to show that plaintiff participated in the husband's fraud, in order to avoid the conveyance.

7. A physician transferred his property to plaintiff, his wife, pending an action against him for slander for circulating a defamatory report concerning defendant. The physician testified that the transfer was made on the advice of another physician, to avoid the unforeseen consequences likely to arise in any physician's surgical practice, but was unable to state any threatened suits of that nature. The physician was angry because defendant had attached his property in a former suit, and threatened to ruin defendant's reputation, and told a witness that he had fixed his property so that defendant could not get a cent of it. Held, that the evidence justified a finding that the transfer was made with the intention of placing the property beyond defendant's reach.

Action by Ella T. Chalmers and another against James Sheehy and others. From the judgment, and from an order denying a new trial, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

J. J. Dunne, for appellants. Sullivan & Sullivan, for respondents.

CHIPMAN, C. Action to quiet title. Sheehy alone answered, and is the sole defendant. The court adjudged that plaintiff Mary D. Chalmers and defendant James Sheehy were owners, as tenants in common, of an equal undivided one-half interest in and to the premises in controversy, and that plaintiff Ella T. Chalmers had no interest therein. Plaintiffs appeal from the order denying their motion for a new trial on a statement of the case. It was admitted at the trial, and the court found, that plaintiff Mary Chalmers was the owner of all the interest claimed by her. We do not see, therefore, that the appeal concerns her. The real issue is as to the ownership of the remaining undivided one-half interest in the property. Sheehy commenced an action against Chalmers on March 1, 1892, in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, for an alleged slander, laying his damage at $50,000. The cause was tried in May, 1894, by a jury and Sheehy had a verdict against Chalmers for $2,000, and judgment was accordingly entered on May 18, 1894. A transcript of the judgment docket was filed for record May 21, 1894, in the office of the county recorder of Santa Cruz county, where the land in question is situated. Execution duly issued on said judgment, and was received by the sheriff of Santa Cruz county, who duly levied upon Chalmers' interest in the land on June 4, 1896, resulting in the sale by the sheriff to Sheehy on October 19, 1896, of all the title and interest of Chalmers in and to the said premises for the amount of the judgment, costs, and accrued interest. There being no redemption, the sheriff duly executed his deed of the premises to Sheehy on April 21, 1897. Sheehy claims title under this deed. Plaintiff, Ella, claims title under deed of gift from her husband dated October 3, 1893, after Sheehy had commenced his slander suit against Chalmers, but before judgment in that action. The motion for a new trial was made on the grounds: (1) Irregularity in the proceedings; (2) accident and surprise; (3) newly-discovered evidence; (4) insufficiency of the evidence; (5) errors in law occurring at the trial.

1. Appellants make the point that the transcript does not show that the answer was verified. No verification appears in the printed copy of the answer. In the clerk's certificate, however, it is stated that the transcript was correct, "with the exception of the following, to wit: * * * The affidavit of James Sheehy, verifying the answer in said action." There was no motion to strike out the answer, and the parties went to trial on the pleadings without objection.

Conceding the clerk's certificate to be insufficient to show that the answer was in fact verified, it is too late to urge the objection here for the first time. It is also objected that the allegations of fraud in the answer impeaching the deed from Chalmers to his wife are not sufficiently specific. There was no demurrer to the answer, in the absence of which the allegations were sufficient. The case was tried on the assumption that the issue of fraud was properly pleaded.

2. Appellants also make the point that Sheehy's right to have the transfer to Mrs. Chalmers set aside is barred by the three-years statute of limitations (section 338, Code Civ. Proc., subd. 4). This contention rests upon the claim that the statute began to run from the date of Chalmers' deed to his wife, October 3, 1893. The present cause of action did not accrue to Sheehy until he had obtained the judgment in the slander suit, and had caused the premises to be sold in execution thereof; and hence the statute, as to him, did not begin to run at the date of Mrs. Chalmers' deed, but at the date of the sheriff's deed to Sheehy. Hager v. Shindler, 29 Cal. 47; Stewart v. Thompson, 32 Cal. 260; Goodnow v. Parker, 112 Cal. 437, 44 Pac. 738. The point was directly decided in Stewart v. Thompson. The cases are reviewed in Goodnow v. Parker, and Stewart v. Thompson cited approvingly.

3. The grounds much relied on for reversal are newly-discovered evidence and accident and surprise. The alleged newly-discovered evidence referred to in the affidavits is not set out. It is alleged to consist of statements previously made by Sheehy and one Horgan in another action, pending between Sheehy and Chalmers, contradictory of their testimony in this action, but of which affiants had no knowledge at the latter trial. Judging from what is stated in the affidavits, it is impeaching evidence, for it is stated to be intended to contradict testimony given by Horgan and Sheehy in the present action. The rule is that newly-discovered evidence which is merely cumulative or designed to contradict a witness is not of a character to warrant a new trial. People v. Anthony, 56 Cal. 397. Upon the question of accident and surprise the affidavits and counter affidavits are very lengthy, and embrace the history not only of the trial of the present case, but much of that relating to the action for defamation of character, out of which the defense in this action arose. An examination of the numerous affidavits shows that appellants relied on the alleged fact that the cause was not fairly or fully or properly presented to the court, on account of the abandonment of the case at a critical moment by plaintiffs' attorney, Mr. Eugene Deuprey, who had defended Chalmers in the slander suit and had prepared the present cause for trial. It is set forth in plaintiffs' affidavit that Mr. Deuprey was fully paid for his services, but, because of other important engagements, refused to attend to this present case, and that plaintiffs were compelled to employ counsel unfamiliar with the law and the facts, in consequence of which the cause was not tried as it should have been on plaintiffs' behalf; that the firm of Smith & Murasky were retained as substitute attorneys, and that Mr. Smith, of that firm, attended at the trial, but that about that time he was appointed colonel of the 1st California infantry volunteers, which made it necessary for Mr. Murasky, his partner, to take up the case without any previous knowledge of it, and prepare the brief for plaintiffs after the cause was submitted to the court; that Mr. Murasky was a candidate for an office about that time, and was elected, and he, too, gave up the case after he had prepared and submitted his brief, and the statement and motion had to be prepared by his successor, the present counsel. It is, no doubt, true that enforced changes in counsel during the progress of a case sometimes is most unfortunate, although not always necessarily so. We think, however, that the facts as shown to the court warranted its conclusion that no injury resulted to plaintiffs' cause by a change of counsel, and that plaintiffs were not wholly blameless for Mr. Deuprey's withdrawal from the case. Mr. Deuprey made affidavit that the trial was continued once at his request, and that before the day of trial arrived he demanded a fee for his services, which was refused on the ground that he had been amply paid in the slander suit, and ought not to expect pay in this action. He refused to take plaintiffs' view of the matter, but nevertheless accompanied Mr. Smith to Santa Cruz, and took part in the trial at the day fixed. He deposed that he imparted to Mr. Smith fully all the facts relating to the litigation and the law involved, as he understood it, and that Mr. Smith was fully equipped to conduct the case. A further continuance became necessary, and, because his clients refused him any compensation in this action, Mr. Deuprey drew out of the case, and Mr. Smith conducted it to the close of the evidence, when it was submitted upon briefs to be thereafter prepared. It was at this point he became colonel of the 1st California, although his regiment was not mustered in for several months thereafter, during which time it is shown that he continued in active practice. The first day of the trial was July 17, 1897, and the cause was then continued to September 8, 1897, giving Mr. Smith ample time for preparation. The testimony was written out and placed in his hands September 23, 1897, and his regiment was not mustered in until the following April. In an affidavit by Matt I. Sullivan, Esq., one of the attorneys for defendant, it is stated that the cause was continued the second time, by agreement, to July 31st, and from time to time for the mutual accommodation of counsel until September 8, 1897, when "Colonel Smith appeared alone as counsel for plaintiffs, announced himself as ready to proceed with the trial, made no suggestion whatever indicating surprise or accident, made no motion for a continuance, but proceeded with the case in a manner indicating that he was fully prepared to represent his clients"; that the cause was submitted to the court upon the evidence, upon briefs to be prepared and sent to the court. Affiant further stated that Col. Smith was actively engaged in the practice of law in San Francisco for several months after the submission of the case, to affiant's personal knowledge. The briefs found their way to the court in July, 1898, and the findings were filed and the judgment entered on August 19, 1898. There is no satisfactory explanation of Col. Smith's failure to brief the case. With the transcript before him, and an opportunity to consult with Col. Smith about the case after the trial, if not before, it is not likely that plaintiffs' case failed to be well and fully presented by Mr. Murasky. All the matters, of which the foregoing is a brief summary, were submitted on the motion to the trial judge, who was in a position to determine whether there had been any miscarriage of justice. A careful examination of all the facts, the salient features of which have been given, fails to convince us that there was any abuse of discretion in denying the motion.

4. The court found that the deed of Chalmers to his wife "was without consideration whatever, and was made with intent to hinder, delay, and to defraud said defendant Sheehy of his demand against said Wm. P. Chalmers, and was made in anticipation of judgment that might be rendered against said Wm. P. Chalmers in said action of Sheehy v. Chalmers" (the slander suit). It was further found that, at the time the transfer was made, Chalmers owned no property, except his interest in the land in dispute, out of which execution could be satisfied in whole or in part, and that Chalmers "is now, and at the time the transfer was made, and until said sheriff's sale was, without any property whatever, other than said" interest, and that the deed to plaintiff Mrs. Chalmers "is void as against said defendant James Sheehy." Appellants insist that the evidence does not support these findings. Appellants claim the law to be "that no third party can question the validity of a conveyance from the husband to the wife unless he was a creditor of the husband before the conveyance was made, or was a subsequent purchaser without notice"; that the slander suit had not been tried when Chalmers executed the deed, and Sheehy, therefore, was not a creditor, within the statute of frauds. It is also contended that there was no evidence of Mrs. Chalmers' participation in or knowledge of the fraud of her husband, if it be conceded that he acted fraudulently, and therefore the decision was erroneous. Mr. Freeman says "that one having a claim for a tort is a creditor before the commencement of an action thereon as well as after, and as such creditor is, upon recovering judgment, entitled to avoid a fraudulent transfer antedating the commencement of his action." Freem. Ex'ns (4th Ed.) § 137a. See Bump, Fraud. Conv. §§ 502, 503; Waite, Fraud. Conv. (3d Ed.) § 90; 8 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 750. See, also, sections 3429, 3430, Civ. Code, as to who are creditors and debtors, and Melvin v. State, 121 Cal. 16, 53 Pac. 416, where it is said that the term "debt," used in our statutes, "should be given its modern legal significance, as including any sort of obligation to pay money." The cases are very numerous where it is held that a cause of action based upon a tort is within the statute against fraudulent conveyances, and that a person having such a cause of action is a creditor of the wrongdoer, before judgment is obtained. The following are cases where it was so held, and where the liability was for slanderous words: Walradt v. Brown, 1 Gilm. 397; Lillard v. McGee, 4 Bibb, 165; Langford v. Fly, 7 Humph. 585; Shean v. Shay, 42 Ind. 375; Jackson v. Myers, 18 Johns. 425; Boid v. Dean, 48 N. J. Eq. 193, 21 Atl. 618; Cooke v. Cooke, 43 Md. 522; Miller v. Dayton, 47 Iowa, 312. The principle has been applied to other forms of torts or causes of action arising ex delicto, and it is held that the injured party becomes a creditor when the cause of action accrues. Bongard v. Block, 81 Ill. 186; Petree v. Brotherton, 133 Ind. 692, 32 N. E. 300; Weir v. Day, 57 Iowa, 84, 10 N. W. 304; Schaible v. Ardner, 98 Mich. 70, 56 N. W. 1105.

Appellants' contention that participation in the fraud on the part of the grantee, Mrs. Chalmers, must be shown, is equally untenable; for it is not pretended that the deed to her was other than a gift, pure and simple, and there is evidence to sustain the finding that Chalmers was then and has been since unable to meet his liabilities, and owned no property at the time of or since the execution, levy, and sale to Sheehy, other than the land in dispute. The facts are unlike those in Cook v. Cockins, 117 Cal. 140, 48 Pac. 1025, and other cases cited by appellants. It is immaterial that Mrs. Chalmers was innocent (Judson v. Lyford, 84 Cal. 505, 24 Pac. 286), or that she did not know the condition of her husband's affairs (Threlkel v. Scott [Cal.] 34 Pac. 851). When on the witness stand, Chalmers was unable to state when he first informed his wife that he had made the deed to her, and was unable to say that he at any time made a manual delivery of it to her; and he stated that he did not know who deposited the deed for record, and he testified that he thought it was prepared in the office of Mr. Deuprey, who was his attorney in the slander suit. As a reason for making the conveyance, he testified that he was advised by another physician to do so, "to avoid the unforeseen consequences of a suit for damages," which it was explained was likely to arise in any physician's surgical practice; but when on cross-examination he was asked if he had been personally threatened with any suit prior to October 3, 1893, on account of any operation performed by him, or on account of any medical treatment of any patient, he could give but one instance, which was the threat of Sheehy to sue him, and that was not for alleged malpractice, but for falsely circulating a defamatory report concerning Sheehy. It appeared that Sheehy had loaned Chalmers money, and held his note for $1,050; that, being called on for payment, Chalmers informed Sheehy that he was unable to pay it without mortgaging his interest in the land in dispute, and that he did not want to do that. Sheehy, however, brought suit and attached this land, and the debt was afterwards paid. It is in evidence that immediately following this suit, which was brought December 1, 1891, Dr. Chalmers made threats that he would blast the reputation of Sheehy. He circulated the story that he had treated Sheehy for a loathsome disease, and on December 3d brought suit against Sheehy for $2,000 for medical services alleged to have been rendered in treating him for a constitutional disease; and there is evidence tending to show that this was by way of reprisal, and was without merit, for a jury gave Sheehy the verdict, and he recovered judgment for costs. Sheehy promptly brought his action for defamation of character upon learning of the reported slanderous statements by Chalmers. A witness, who had known Chalmers many years, and had been his friend up to the commencement of the slander suit, testified: "I had a conversation with Dr. Chalmers after the commencement of the slander suit, and before October 3, 1893, in relation to the slander suit. * * * He came to my office one night at eight o'clock, and stayed there until twelve o'clock, and we talked over different matters, and, among other things, talked over this slander suit. * * * I told him he was very foolish, and would have to pay for it in the end,—that he had property,—and then he remarked: 'He will never get a damned cent of my property. I will fix it so that he will never get a dollar out of it.'" Other facts appeared showing that the court was justified in believing that Chalmers' intention was to put the property where Sheehy could not reach it, should he recover; and, as it was all the property he had, he would thus prevent Sheehy from collecting anything if he succeeded in obtaining judgment. If we could assume the law to be as claimed by appellants, Chalmers' deed to his wife might have accomplished its evidently fraudulent purpose; but, as the law is otherwise, we must hold the effort to have been abortive. The deed was void, and the court did not err in so finding.

There are no errors of law alleged to have occurred at the trial which seem to call for special notice. The order should be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; GRAY, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the order is affirmed.

UNION SAV. BANK v. BARRETT.
(S. F. 2,580.)¹

(Supreme Court of California. April 10, 1901.)
MORTGAGE FORECLOSURE—ACTIONS—ABATEMENT—SERVICE—APPEARANCE—WAIVER.

Code Civ. Proc. § 385, provides that an action does not abate by the death of a party if the cause of action survive. Section 581 gives a plaintiff three years after the commencement of an action to make service and return of summons, but declares that, if appearance is made, the action may be prosecuted as if summons had been served. Held that, where proceedings were instituted to foreclose a mortgage, and the mortgagor died before service of summons, on the appointment of an executrix and filing of an amended complaint an appearance by the executrix within the three years obviated the necessity of service of summons, and the executrix could not subsequently plead limitations.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; F. B. Ogden, Judge.

Proceedings by the Union Savings Bank against Katie Barrett, executrix, to foreclose a mortgage. From a judgment in plaintiff's favor, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

B. McFadden and A. Boyer, for appellant. Reed & Nusbaumer, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Appeal from a judgment foreclosing the mortgage of the defendant's testatrix. The action was commenced August 13, 1896, and summons was issued therein June 25, 1897. The mortgagor died September 27, 1897, before any service of the summons was made. The defendant herein was appointed executrix of the last will and testament of said mortgagor, and on December 1, 1897, letters testamentary thereon were issued to her. Thereafter the plaintiff filed an amended complaint setting up these facts, and the defendant filed a demurrer thereto March 3, 1899. Her demurrer was overruled, and she subsequently filed an answer upon which the action was tried, and judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiff. The defense relied upon in her answer was the statute of limitations (sections 337, 343, Code Civ. Proc.), and in support thereof it is contended that the action was already barred at the time that she filed her demurrer, and that, under the provisions of section 1490, Code Civ. Proc., she had no authority to appear, or bind the estate by her appearance. The action did not abate by the death of the original defendant (Code Civ. Proc. § 385), but survived against her estate (Loan Society v. Wackenreuder, 99 Cal. 503, 34 Pac. 219), and could be prosecuted against the person who should thereafter be appointed her personal representative. Upon the appointment of such personal representative the plaintiff had the same right to proceed against him as it would have had to proceed against the original defendant had she not died. Section 581, Code Civ. Proc., gives to the plaintiff three years after the commencement of an action within which to make service and return of the summons, and declares: "But all such actions may be prosecuted if appearance has been made by the defendant or defendants within said three years, in the same manner as if summons had been issued and served." In the present case the personal representative appeared in the action within three years, and thus obviated the necessity of any service of the summons. By this voluntary appearance the court acquired jurisdiction over her with the same effect as if she had been brought in by the service of summons upon her at that time, and, as this jurisdiction was acquired within three years after the commencement of the action, no rights of the estate, or of the persons interested therein, were waived by her appearance. In Vrooman v. Li Po Tai, 113 Cal. 302, 45 Pac. 470, more than three years had expired after the amendment to section 581, without any service of the summons, during all of which time the mortgagor was living. It was held that, as the three years had expired in the lifetime of the mortgagor, the action was, in effect, at an end, and that it was not in the power of the administrator to revive it by an appearance. In Davis v. Hart, 123 Cal. 384, 55 Pac. 1060, the plaintiff allowed nearly nine years to elapse before making any attempt to serve the summons, and it was held that, although the defendant had died before the expiration of the three years, the running of the statute was not stopped thereby. The judgment is affirmed.

ISLAIS & SALINAS WATER CO. v. ALLEN
et al. (S. F. 2,216.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 6, 1901.)
ACTION TO QUIET TITLE—RIGHT TO DISMISS—ANSWER DEMANDING AFFIRMATIVE RELIEF.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 581, authorizing a dismissal of a suit by the plaintiff before trial on the payment of costs unless a counterclaim has been made, or affirmative relief sought by cross complaint or answer, it is not error to refuse to allow plaintiff in a suit to quiet title to dismiss his suit after the filing of an answer denying the material allegations in the complaint, and alleging facts entitling defendant to a decree to quiet title against plaintiff, and asking such relief.

Temple, J., dissenting.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action to quiet title by the Islais & Salinas Water Company against Charles R. Allen and others. From an order refusing to allow plaintiff to dismiss, it appeals. Affirmed.

F. D. Brandon (J. H. Henderson, of counsel), for appellant. Leon Samuels, for respondents.

HAYNES, C. This action is prosecuted by the plaintiff against a large number of defendants, including one R. C. De Boom, to quiet its title to a large tract of land, being part of the Rincon de las Salinas or Bernal Rancho, situated in the city and county of San Francisco. De Boom alone answered, and, after denying the material allegations of the complaint, alleged that he is the owner in fee and in the possession and entitled to the possession of a large number of lots and blocks, being a portion of the land described in the complaint, and, after describing the portion so owned and possessed by him, alleged: "That said plaintiff, as defendant is informed and believes, and accordingly alleges, claims an estate or interest in the lands described adverse to said defendant; and this defendant alleges that the claim of said plaintiff is without any right whatever, and that said plaintiff has no estate, right, title or interest in or to said lands, or any part thereof;" and, after praying that plaintiff take nothing by its complaint, prayed "that it be ordered, adjudged, and decreed that this defendant is the owner in fee and entitled to the possession of the land hereinbefore described, and that plaintiff be forever enjoined from asserting any claim or title to any part thereof." Plaintiff served notice that it would move the court to strike out that portion of said answer and of defendants' prayer above quoted upon the ground that it was irrelevant and redundant, and also gave notice that, upon said motion being granted, plaintiff would immediately move the court to dismiss the action. Upon the hearing, which was had upon the complaint and answer, the court denied both parts of said motion, and plaintiff excepted. The plaintiff then moved the court to dismiss the said action as against defendant De Boom upon the ground that plaintiff did not desire to further prosecute the said action as against said defendant, and deposited with the clerk the costs to which the said defendant would be entitled. This motion was also denied, and plaintiff excepted, and a bill of said exceptions was settled. The action then came on for trial, and plaintiff offered no evidence, but moved, first, that a judgment of nonsuit be entered, and, this being denied, moved for a judgment of dismissal, which was also denied, and exceptions were taken, and a bill thereof settled. The defendant then introduced evidence in support of his allegations, and, findings being waived, judgment was entered for defendant De Boom as prayed for, and plaintiff appeals from the judgment upon the judgment roll which contains said bills of exception.

The only question here presented for decision is whether a plaintiff in an action to quiet title to real estate is entitled to dismiss his action as against a defendant who has answered and put in issue all the plaintiff's material allegations, and also alleged the material facts entitling him to a decree quieting his title as against the plaintiff, and added a prayer therefor. The plaintiff (appellant here) insists that his motion should have been granted. Section 581, Code Civ. Proc., provides: "An action may be dismissed, or a judgment of nonsuit entered, in the following cases: (1) By the plaintiff himself, by written request to the clerk, filed among the papers in the case, at any time before trial, upon payment of costs, provided, a counter-claim has not been made, or affirmative relief sought by the cross-complaint or answer of the defendant. * * *" Appellant's contention is that affirmative relief is not sought by the answer, and that, therefore, he had a right to dismiss the action. If that were true, the plaintiff had a right to dismiss the action without applying to the court, and without moving to strike out any of the allegations of the answer, or any part of the prayer. It has been held in several cases that a cross complaint alleging title in the defendant, and praying that his title be quieted as against the plaintiff, is not necessary, inasmuch as the issues raised by the answer to plaintiff's complaint, if found for the defendant, and judgment entered thereon, would operate as an estoppel, and protect the defendant as well as a decree in his favor upon a cross complaint. Wilson v. Madison, 55 Cal. 5, 8; Miller v. Lucio, 80 Cal. 257, 22 Pac. 195. There are cases, however, where a cross complaint in actions to quiet title is necessary to the defendant's protection. See Winter v. McMillan, 87 Cal. 256, 264, 25 Pac. 407. Appellant relies principally upon Wilson v. Madison, and Miller v. Lucio, supra. In the last-named case all that was said upon this question was the following: "There was no error in striking out the defendant's cross complaint. In an action to quiet title, where defendant relies upon title in himself, a cross complaint is unnecessary. Wilson v. Madison, 55 Cal. 5; Loan Association v. Wagner, 61 Cal. 349. Besides, as judgment was given for plaintiff, the error, if any, was harmless." In that case the plaintiff did not move to dismiss his action. In the other case (Wilson v. Madison, supra) there was no dismissal of the case by the plaintiff, nor any motion to strike out the defendant's cross complaint to quiet his title against the plaintiff, to which the plaintiff had filed an answer. Upon that state of the pleadings the defendant moved that the issues raised by the cross complaint and the answer thereto be first tried. This motion was denied. This court held that under the circumstances the ruling was not erroneous, and said: "In fact, we can see no necessity for a cross complaint. Issue was joined on title by the complaint of plaintiff and defendant's answer thereto, and, if judgment passed for the defendant, it would be an estoppel as to the title, which, under the rulings of the supreme court of California, would protect the defendant as well as a decree in his favor." Appellant also cites Wood v. Jordan, 125 Cal. 263, 57 Pac. 998, which appears to directly sustain its contention. That was an action to quiet title, and the defendant answered, setting up his title, and prayed for a decree establishing it, and enjoining the plaintiff from asserting any interest in the land. Thereafter the plaintiff procured a dismissal of the action, and a judgment of dismissal was entered. Defendant moved to vacate said judgment. The motion was denied, and he appealed. The court said: "He insists that by his answer he seeks affirmative relief, and that under section, 581, subd. 1, of the Code of Civil Procedure, it was erroneous for the court, under these circumstances, to dismiss the action. But this contention has been definitely settled against him in Moyle v. Porter, 51 Cal. 639." Moyle v. Porter was correctly decided under section 581, Code Civ. Proc., as it then stood. The first subdivision, as it then existed, provided: "(1) By the plaintiff himself, at any time before trial, upon the payment of costs, if a counterclaim has not been made;" and in that case the court said that "the answer of the defendant did not amount to a counterclaim." But now there is added to the foregoing subdivision the following: "Or affirmative relief sought by the cross complaint or answer of the defendant." It would seem that Wood v. Jordan was decided upon the authority of Moyle v. Porter, without the attention of the court having been called to the material change in the statute above specified, and should, therefore, not be regarded as authority in the present case.

The Code plainly provides that the plaintiff cannot dismiss his action if the defendant, by his answer, has sought affirmative relief. Whether he did so is therefore the question to be decided. Conceding that upon the denials in defendant's answer his title would have been quieted by a judgment in his favor, if the plaintiff had prosecuted its action, it does not follow that he may not seek and be entitled to affirmative relief. The commencement of the action and the allegations of plaintiff's complaint were an attack upon defendant's title to his property, which, however unfounded, impaired the market value thereof, and obstructed its alienation; and, if the plaintiff should be permitted to dismiss the action, the defendant, in most cases, would feel compelled to bring an action to remove the stain upon his title. It is therefore important to him to prevent a dismissal, and compel a trial of the action; and this he may do by setting up his own title and right of possession, and praying that it be quieted as against the plaintiff who has asserted an adverse right. It thus appears that the action to quiet title, in some of its features, is peculiar. The defendant's title may never have been questioned, and therefore no cause of action existed in his favor against any one; but the plaintiff, by bringing the action, created a cause of action in the defendant against the plaintiff, for it was the assertion of an adverse claim or interest in the same property. In Robinson v. Railroad Co., 65 Cal. 263, 3 Pac. 878, the plaintiff alleged that he was the owner of certain bonds of the defendant, secured by mortgage to trustees, and sought to remove the trustees upon the ground that they had failed to discharge the duties of the trust. The answer alleged that the bonds held by the plaintiff "were paid, satisfied, and discharged," and prayed that the bonds be delivered up and canceled, or in default of such delivery be declared void. The court said: "The answer claimed affirmative relief, and the plaintiff was not authorized to dismiss his action." In Kitts v. Austin, 83 Cal. 167, 172, 23 Pac. 290, the plaintiff in an action to quiet title was in possession of a portion of the land. The court said: "The defendant here in her answer set up her adverse claim of title to the property. She thereby became an actor, with the burden of proof upon her to establish her claim. And the court, having found that her adverse claim was superior to that of the plaintiff's from which the right of possession flowed, properly included in its decree an award of the possession." In Mining Co. v. Moses, 58 Cal. 168, 176, the trial court, after judgment that plaintiff was not the owner of the property, and defendants were the owners, decreed that the plaintiff's claims to the property were groundless, and that defendants were the true and lawful owners, "and that said defendants' title thereto is adjudged to be quieted against all claims, demands, and pretensions of the plaintiff, which said corporation (plaintiff) is hereby estopped perpetually from setting up any claim thereto, or any part thereof." This court said: "The answer of the defendants contained none of the elements of a cross complaint, as distinguished from a defense to plaintiff's action, and contained no prayer for affirmative relief. The part of the decree awarding affirmative relief should be stricken out." In the case before us, however, there were affirmative allegations, which, if sustained by the evidence, entitled the defendant to affirmative relief, and such relief was demanded. Pomeroy, in his work on Code Remedies (3d Ed. p. 120), says: "Affirmative relief may certainly be given to the defendant upon his answer in all cases where, from the nature of the subject-matter and from the relations of the parties, a specific remedy in his favor is possible according to the doctrines of equity jurisprudence; certainly in all cases where the answer can be considered as setting up a counterclaim. There are undoubtedly instances in which no such relief is possible. Where, however, the nature of the subject-matter and of the relations between himself and the plaintiff are such that he could have maintained an independent suit in equity against the plaintiff, and procured specific relief thereby, or could have filed a cross bill under the old practice, he may now obtain the same remedy upon his answer, at all events, as was before remarked, if the demand alleged in the answer constitutes a valid counterclaim." Appellant also cites Thompson v. Spraug, 66 Cal. 350, 5 Pac. 506, where it was held that, "when a cross complaint has been stricken from an answer, leaving therein matters of defense only, the plaintiff may dismiss the case at any time before the trial, on payment of costs." It is conceded that in several cases of actions to quiet title where the defendant is the owner and in possession it has been held that a cross complaint is "unnecessary," and may be stricken out. But no case goes beyond holding that in such a case the cross complaint is unnecessary. Here, however, the notice of motion to strike out the affirmative allegations of the answer and the prayer for affirmative relief gave notice that, upon said motion being granted, the plaintiff would move immediately that the action be dismissed as to the defendant De Boom. In Thompson v. Spraug, supra, "the cross complaint was stricken out on motion. Subsequently the plaintiff dismissed the action." We think if the court in that case had been informed that the purpose for which the plaintiff desired to have the cross complaint stricken out was, as here, that he might dismiss the action, his motion would not and should not have been granted. We think the court did not err in denying appellant's several motions, and that the judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, C.; GRAY, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is affirmed.

TEMPLE, J. (dissenting). I am unable to concur with my associates in the conclusion they have reached. If the issues tendered by the plaintiff had been tried, and found in favor of the defendant, and judgment entered accordingly, defendant would have had all the relief which he could get under the allegations of his answer. The judgment in either case would have been only an estoppel, and would, as a matter of fact, have amounted to nothing more, even though in terms it had declared the defendant to be the owner. In either view it would have settled the question of title as between the parties, and could have had no further effect. Affirmative relief means relief which the defendant would not get by a judgment that plaintiff's allegations are all untrue. The answer shows that defendant is in possession of the demanded premises. In other words, the action, under our decisions, is really ejectment. A judgment for defendant would constitute a perpetual bar, and the so-called affirmative relief would be nothing more or other. I am utterly at a loss to comprehend how the fact that the plaintiff might desire to dismiss the action, and, if he does, the cloud would remain on defendant's title, can have any bearing on this question. To prevent the plaintiff from dismissing his action is not affirmative relief. That would be simply and only to compel the plaintiff to try his case, rather than to dismiss. This is not relief in an action, as the phrase is used, affirmative or otherwise. To say that this is the purpose of the claim to the supposed affirmative relief is to admit that the purpose is not to get affirmative relief. The same dilemma might arise in a suit upon a disputed money demand. The defendant might be very desirous of having the claim determined, but he claims no affirmative relief when, after denying the allegations of the complaint, he demands the judgment of the court that he owes plaintiff nothing. The supposed case is not analogous to the one in hand, simply because it is this case, and not another. These are matters of procedure, and the Code has provided that in such cases a plaintiff may dismiss his action, after answer without prejudice to his right to again sue. Whether this ought to be so is a matter of policy, which it is not the province of the courts to determine.

(Supreme Court of California. April 11, 1901.)

In bank.

On application for rehearing. Denied.

For opinion in department, see 64 Pac. 261.

PER CURIAM. Rehearing denied.

BEATTY, C. J. I dissent from the order denying a rehearing of this cause. The opinion of the court is based upon the ground that the canal company cannot arbitrarily make assessments for the cost of maintaining and operating the works, and enforce payment by shutting off the supply of delinquents. Concede this proposition, and it does not follow that this judgment should be reversed or modified. The judgment of the superior court is not inconsistent with this view. The defendant threatened to shut off the water from plaintiffs if they failed to pay certain assessments. He was temporarily restrained from carrying out this threat, and the question was litigated as to the real amount due from the plaintiffs as their share of the expenses incurred in maintaining and operating the canal. It was found that $135 less was due in the aggregate than had been charged. Upon this fact being found, the superior court enjoined the defendant from shutting off the water for failure to pay the assessment bills as presented, but provided that the defendant might present corrected bills for the sums actually due, and, if such bills were not paid, he could move to modify the judgment. In other words, the court merely reserved the right to relieve the defendant from the injunction, if it should be made to appear that the plaintiffs, or any of them, refused to pay assessments not arbitrarily made by the canal owner, but judicially ascertained by the court itself. It decided that it would not by injunction compel the canal owner to go on performing its contract, when the water takers were refusing to perform on their part,—that it would not afford equitable relief to parties who deliberately refused to do equity. The propriety of this decision appears to me to be unquestionable; but it is this part of the judgment which is reversed, and the result is that the defendant must go on furnishing zanjeros, meters, gates, etc., for measuring out the water, and keeping up the canal, at large expense, with no means of enforcing payment from water takers of their share of the expense except separate actions in the courts against the respective delinquents. In effect, a specific performance is decreed in favor of parties who refuse to perform, and the party enjoined is remitted to another action, or series of actions, to enforce his right under the contract. This is not equity. The judgment of the superior court was equity.

or that the inmates working with plaintiff were dangerous and unskillful, or that the accident happened through any incompetency of the officers or inmates. Held, that the superintendent was not liable for the injury, since it cannot be presumed that the inmates were unskillful from the fact that they were insane.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county; Joseph H. Budd, Judge.

Action by J. E. Atkinson against Asa Clark. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

A. H. Carpenter, for appellant. Dudley & Buck and George F. Buck, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, C. Plaintiff sues to recover damages for personal injuries received through the alleged negligence of defendant in employing an unfit fellow servant. The cause was tried by a jury, and, at the close of plaintiff's evidence upon the issue of defendant's liability, the court granted defendant's motion for a nonsuit, and entered judgment accordingly, from which plaintiff appeals.

The complaint alleges that about September 18, 1895, defendant employed plaintiff as a servant, in the capacity of a carpenter, for a certain compensation; that plaintiff entered into the service of defendant on that day, and worked as a day laborer until October 2, 1895; that, while so engaged and working for defendant, he (defendant) negligently and wrongfully employed one Baptista Cavaleries and others, whose names are unknown to plaintiff, to work for defendant "as servants for hire, in * * * the same line of work as the plaintiff was then engaged to perform, and that in the choice of the aforesaid servants the defendant wrongfully neglected to use ordinary or any prudence or care in their selection, but willfully, and with full knowledge of their unskillfulness, carelessness, and mental and physical unfitness for the work for which they were employed, engaged and hired, without plaintiff's knowledge of the fact, or of their employment in his line of work, the above-named servants," etc. It is alleged that on October 2, 1895, while in defendant's said service, plaintiff was injured through the negligence of the said servants, in the following manner: Plaintiff was engaged to tear down a building, and, while he was at work removing the lath and plaster from the partition walls within the outer brick walls of the building, the said Cavaleries and said other servants, "while under defendant's control and direction, and within the scope of their employment and without the knowledge of plaintiff, negligently * * * precipitated said walls upon the person of plaintiff," thus injuring him. The testimony of defendant, who was called as a witness by plaintiff, was that he was the medical superintendent of the state asylum for the insane at Stockton; that one James Halliday was an outside attendant at the

INJURY TO SERVANT — NEGLIGENCE — PRESUMPTIONS—SELECTION OF INCOMPETENT WORKMEN.

Plaintiff was injured while tearing down some brick walls at the state insane asylum, on which some of the inmates were working. The patients allowed to work around the asylum were selected by subordinate officers appointed by the superintendent of the institution. There was no evidence that the superintendent was negligent in selecting the subordinate officers, asylum, and had charge of the insane patients. Defendant testified: "The patients were put to work at various kinds of employment in and about the asylum, but I did not designate or select them myself. Whatever is to be done in a laboring way, the patients generally take a hand in. Q. They were under your authority, I suppose. A. Well, of course, yes; under my authority in a measure. I did not select them myself." Referring to the work of tearing down the building, he testified: That the patients were taken out by those who knew them and handled them. That he did not designate the patients himself. That Cavaleries was one of the patients. "I was not present when the wall fell down upon Mr. Atkinson, and knew nothing about it until I was called to see him immediately afterwards. James Halliday had charge of the patients who were working upon the building at the time. * * * The employés use their own discretion in taking out to work the patients that have been there a long time and are well known. Mr. Peterson, the foreman, has charge of the selection of the patients that are distributed about under the different attendants to go to work, and he receives them from the inside attendants. Peterson is one of the officers at the asylum." It appeared that there were three parallel partition walls, about 8 feet apart and 12 feet high, fastened at the ends to the outside brick wall and an inside corridor parallel brick wall. These partitions had been detached from the brick walls preparatory to being torn down. Plaintiff was working on the south side of the south partition wall, and could not see what was being done on the north side of the north partition wall. Something caused the north wall to fall over on the middle wall, which latter was thrown over on the south wall, causing it to fall on plaintiff. Plaintiff testified that after he was taken out from under the débris he saw Cavaleries at the north wall, "with a crowbar in his hand, digging at the partition which had first fallen"; that "Cavaleries caused the wall to fall." The reason for so testifying, as he stated, was that Cavaleries was the first one he saw when he was released from under the wall, and Cavaleries was then standing, with the bar in his hand, digging under the wall, and that there was no other person near at the time; the other patients were on the west side of the building. He testified that he did not know where Cavaleries was at the time the walls fell. From anything that appears, Cavaleries may have gone to the north wall after it had fallen. Plaintiff testified that he was hired by defendant, but that he (plaintiff) was working for the state and was paid by the state; that he knew he was working in a state insane asylum, and knew that the fellow workmen were insane inmates. It appeared that plaintiff had been working for two or three weeks alongside of these insane patients on the same kind of work. There is no evidence that the inmates were known by the defendant to be, or in fact were, in any sense dangerous or unskillful. There is no evidence that they were unskillfully handled, nor, indeed, was it alleged as the fact, the allegation being that they were unskillfully selected; and there is no evidence of unskillful or imprudent selection of these inmates, and there is no evidence that there were not enough attendants to see to the proper management of the inmates as fellow laborers. Without entering upon the discussion of the questions raised by appellant, it is sufficient to say that before the superintendent could be held liable, if at all, there should have been evidence tending in some degree to establish the truth of the allegations in the complaint. Defendant did not select the inmates for the work, nor did he have immediate control or direction of them. His control was general, and the immediate duty of selecting inmates suitable for the work, and the management of them when at work, devolved upon other officers of the asylum. Liability for their negligence cannot fall upon the superintendent simply by reason of his general supervision of the asylum and its subordinate officers. Conceding liability at all, it could only arise in such a case as this where there is evidence of his negligence in selecting unskillful and incompetent subordinates, and that he was in some way culpable in allowing them to select the inmates for the work. But there is no evidence of incapacity of the subordinates, or that they were careless or unskillful in the selection of the inmates; nor is there any evidence that the inmates selected were dangerous or unskillful, or that the accident happened through any unskillfulness of officers or inmates. There can be no presumption that the inmates were dangerous or unskillful from the fact alone that they were insane. The judgment should be affirmed.

HOMICIDE—MOTIVE—NECESSITY—TRIAL—CASE—REASSIGNMENT—ORDER OF DEFENSE—PREPARATION—TIME—INDICTMENT—DEMURRER—WITNESSES—CROSS-EXAMINATION—IMMATERIAL MATTER.

1. The establishment of a motive is not an essential element in a conviction for murder.

2. The fact that defendant's case was transferred to another division of the superior court a short time before trial did not constitute an abuse of discretion, in the absence of a showing that defendant suffered any injury.

3. The allowance of time for defendant to prepare the order of his defense at the close of the state's evidence being a matter in the discretion of the trial court, the allowance of 13 minutes for that purpose will not be reviewed, where no abuse of discretion was shown.

4. Where the information on which defendant was tried was in due form, a demurrer to it, on the ground that defendant's name was omitted from the copy furnished him, was properly overruled, since it raised only the question of defects in the information, and not those in the copy.

5. Where defendant sought to excuse shooting deceased on the ground of insanity, the question whether the witness and deceased were not living together as husband and wife, though unmarried, was not proper cross-examination, since it related to a matter wholly foreign to the issue.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Sonoma county; S. K. Dougherty, Judge.

Thomas P. Owens was convicted of murder, and he appeals. Affirmed.

R. W. Miller, for appellant. Tirey L. Ford, Atty. Gen., and A. A. Moore, Jr., Dep. Atty. Gen., for the People.

GAROUTTE, J. Defendant has been convicted of the crime of murder in the first degree, with the death penalty affixed. He now appeals from the judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial. The evidence showing that defendant fired the fatal shot is uncontradicted, and insanity is relied upon as a defense.

Some claim is made by counsel that the evidence on the subject of defendant's insanity is such as to justify this court in setting aside the verdict as matter of law. But this claim cannot be maintained for a moment, and it may be said that even the preponderance of evidence points to defendant's mental responsibility. While the motive for the commission of the homicide is not plainly manifest from the evidence, yet the establishment of a motive is not at all essential as an element necessary to justify a conviction. The presence or absence of motive is simply a circumstance, sometimes weak and sometimes strong, in each particular case, going to the question of guilt or innocence. People v. Durrant, 116 Cal. 179, 48 Pac. 75.

Defendant complains that his case was transferred from one department of the superior court to the other a very short time before the hour set for trial. We know of no law violated by such an order of transfer. And, if the transfer was made under an exercise of discretion upon the part of the judge or the court, we see no abuse of that discretion. Indeed, it is not established by the record that defendant suffered any injury by the reassignment of his case. He also complains that he was only allowed 13 minutes to prepare the order of his defense after the prosecution had rested its case. An allowance of any period of time is entirely a matter of discretion upon the part of the trial court, and, in the absence of a showing of an abuse of that discretion, this court will not interfere. Here there is no showing whatever.

The name of the defendant was omitted from the charging part of the certified copy of the information at the time of his arraignment. He now complains because his demurrer to the information was overruled. The information upon which defendant was arraigned was in due form, and the demurrer was properly overruled. If the copy given to defendant was defective, his remedy for the defect was not by demurrer; for a demurrer must be directed to defects in the information, and not to defects in the copy. For the same reason, the motion in arrest of judgment was properly denied.

Misconduct by the district attorney in his argument to the jury is relied upon as ground of reversal. We find in the record various abstracts taken from his argument which appear to be of a rather fervid character, but beyond this they do not go. Courts are not favorably disposed towards granting new trials upon this ground, and in regulating the arguments of counsel much is left to the discretion of the trial court. There is no substantial error disclosed by the record upon this branch of the case.

A great many technical objections are made to the rulings of the court in limiting the cross-examination of the witnesses Mrs. Denison and her daughter. A great part of this proposed cross-examination was directed to the purpose of showing that the deceased and this daughter of Mrs. Denison, though unmarried, were living together as husband and wife. Such evidence was not proper cross-examination. Indeed, it was not proper evidence from any standpoint of the case. The relations between the deceased and the woman were a matter wholly foreign to the issue on trial. An attorney should not be allowed to place that kind of evidence before the jury upon the pretext that the examination is for the purpose of refreshing the recollection of the witness. If such were the rules of law, then all kinds of matter tending to degrade a witness could be inquired into upon cross-examination,—matters wholly foreign to the issue upon trial, and only serving the single purpose of prejudicing the witness in the eyes of the jurors. Witnesses cannot be impeached in this way.

No error was committed by the court in its ruling upon the evidence of the witness Leard, and the same may be said of the witness Dr. Swisher. We find many other exceptions in the record taken to the action of the trial court in the admission and rejection of evidence. We have examined them all with care, and there is no substantial merit in them. Defendant has had a fair trial, and the judgment and order are affirmed.

We concur: VAN DYKE, J.; HARRISON, J.; McFARLAND, J.; HENSHAW, J.; TEMPLE, J.

BEATTY, C. J. I concur in the judgment, but I do not concur in what is said as to the preponderance of the evidence on the question of defendant's insanity. For the purpose of disposing of this appeal, it is enough to say that there is evidence to support the verdict upon that issue.

HUNTER v. HUNTER. (S. F. 1953.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 24, 1901.)

DIVORCE—CRUELTY—CONDONATION—PLEADING—FINDINGS.

1. Civ. Code, § 118, provides that in actions for divorce conjugal kindness shall not be evidence of condonation of any of the acts authorizing divorce, unless accompanied by an express agreement to condone. Held, that where defendant had been guilty of inhuman and cruel treatment towards plaintiff, affectionate letters written to him thereafter by plaintiff were not sufficient to condone the offense.

2. Where the evidence shows condonation of the acts for which a divorce is sought, it is the duty of the court to find to that effect, though condonation was not pleaded.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; M. H. Hyland, Judge.

Action by Lillian A. Hunter against Charles H. Hunter for divorce. From a decree denying a divorce, and from an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Will M. Beggs, for appellant. N. T. Biddle and Julian H. Biddle, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Action for divorce on the ground of extreme cruelty. The court found that defendant "treated the plaintiff in a cruel and inhuman manner, inflicting on her great bodily injury and mental suffering, striking her, and otherwise physically abusing her." The fourth finding is "that, after the commission of the said acts of cruelty, the plaintiff forgave the said defendant, and condoned the said matrimonial offenses." As conclusion of law the court found that by reason of such condonation plaintiff is not entitled to a decree of divorce. Appellant claims that the evidence does not sustain the finding of condonation, and she appeals from the judgment and from the order denying motion for new trial.

The evidence showed that the parties were married in Nebraska in 1878, and had lived in Santa Clara county six years previous to the commencement of the action, and that six children were born to the marriage; the youngest now 5, and the oldest 19, years. The cruel treatment complained of consisted of successive acts of ill treatment, of which there was abundant evidence, and began about three years before the commencement of the action. It was of such character as not only to impair the health of plaintiff, but, as she testified, to endanger her life. In August, 1897, defendant left his home, and went to Nebraska. The complaint was filed March 17, 1898, and defendant returned to California the following month. Plaintiff testified on cross-examination: "He came to the house. We did not receive him very kindly. We did not drive him away. He came in the house, and went around to each of the children, and wanted to know if I had a kiss for him. I told him 'No.' That was in April, 1898. He stayed all night, and left the next morning. He has been working on various ranches near my home ever since." Defendant introduced no evidence except to recall plaintiff as his witness, who was shown three letters written by her to defendant after he left his home August 2, 1897. She admitted that she wrote the letters. She testified: "After my husband went away, I had peace with my children. I had peace on the place. It seems as if I could not bear to have him come back again. If he had not written me as he did, I would not have commenced this suit. He said he intended to come back. My husband drove the boys from the ranch, and wanted to keep a hired man." In the first letter, dated August 4, 1897, she addresses her husband as "Dear Charlie," and begins by saying: "I wonder where you are to-night, and how you are feeling. We are all well." The letter is devoted to matters relating to the business of the farm; acknowledges the receipt of a letter from defendant, and expresses the "hope to hear again soon," and closes, "Love to all, and write soon to your Lillie." The second letter is dated August 10, 1897, and is addressed to "Dear Charlie," and states: "Received your letter to-day written Thursday, the day after you got there. Glad you stood the trip so well as you did." The letter then relates to doings on the farm, and what the children had been about, and closes: "Love to all, and hope to hear good news from you soon. * * * Children all send love. * * * A good-night kiss from your Lillie." The third and last letter is dated August 26th, and is much the same as the other two, minus the proffered kiss. The letters were admitted over plaintiff's objection that they were irrelevant, immaterial, and incompetent. Defendant's counsel stated that he offered them "for the purpose of showing that the witness knew that he (Hunter) was sick, and kept him informed of what she was doing. They are offered in evidence for that purpose." The court interrogated the witness after the letters were read: "Q. The Court: Don't you think it is possible for you and your husband to live together? A. No, sir. If he had been home six months longer, I should have been in my grave. I never expected him to come back and live with me. Q. At that time you did not intend to sue for a divorce? You really had forgiven him, Mrs. Hunter? A. No, sir; I did not forgive him. The debts mentioned in the letters were not all paid that year. I have paid a good many of the debts from money taken from the ranch. I borrowed $127 from Nebraska, and that has not yet been paid. In one of the letters my husband wrote me that he had joined the Christian Science Church, and expected to live as long as the longest, he said. This was just before he came back." Defendant here rested. The answer of defendant did not plead condonation in defense. Appellant claims that it was error to admit the evidence, because it was offered for a limited purpose, and not to prove condonation, and that, there being no issue of condonation presented by the answer, it was error to receive this evidence to prove such issue. It is not necessary to pass upon the admissibility, materiality, or relevancy of this evidence. If the letters be given all the weight which the most liberal interpretation of their meaning would warrant, they do not show condonation, for the Code says neither cohabitation, passive endurance, nor conjugal kindness shall be evidence of condonation of "any of the acts constituting such cause (i. e. the cruelty mentioned in the statute), unless accompanied by an express agreement to condone." Civ. Code, § 118; Morton v. Morton, 117 Cal. 443, 49 Pac. 557; Smith v. Smith, 119 Cal. 183, 48 Pac. 730, 51 Pac. 183. These letters, being the only evidence from which any agreement can be inferred, fall far short of being "an express agreement to condone." As condonation is a specific defense to an action for divorce, it should be pleaded like any other defense. It is true that an action for divorce differs from an ordinary proceeding in that a decree may not be rendered upon the admission of a party, or upon the uncorroborated evidence of either of the spouses. If, therefore, the evidence had shown condonation, it would have been the duty of the court, even without a pleading, to have found to that effect. But, as the evidence upon which the court bases its finding of condonation is wholly inadequate, as the letters were not even offered for the purpose of showing condonation, as the case was contested, and presumably the defendant urged all matters of defense available to him, we think this finding may and should be disregarded as wholly unsustained, when clearly the plaintiff becomes entitled to judgment. The judgment is therefore reversed, with directions to the trial court to enter judgment for divorce for plaintiff as prayed for, and to award her such other and further relief as, under the pleadings and proofs, may be equitable.

First. It is charged in the complaint that the decree of confirmation was obtained by fraud. The facts constituting the alleged fraud are perhaps insufficient, as pleaded, to sustain the charge, but, if it is permissible in a proceeding of this kind to attack the decree of confirmation for fraud, the plaintiff should have leave to amend. The opinion assumes, however, that the attack is collateral, and not permissible in this proceeding, however conclusively the fraud in obtaining the decree might be alleged and found. In other words, it seems to be considered either that a decree affirming the regularity of the organization of an irrigation district is beyond the reach of attack for fraud in its procurement, or that the state or other aggrieved party must first commence and prosecute to a successful conclusion a separate action to invalidate the decree of confirmation before attempting to call in question the proceedings in the board of supervisors. I do not assent to either proposition. I know of no reason why a decree of confirmation obtained by fraud may not be set aside in a proper proceeding, and, if it may be set aside upon that ground, I know of no reason why the state—as a party bound by the decree—may not in one action attack the decree and the proceedings of the board of supervisors which it was designed to confirm.

Second. The decree of confirmation was objected to upon the ground that the court never acquired any jurisdiction of the res. The petition for confirmation is a proceeding in rem, and the res is the irrigation district. The petition in this case contained no description of the alleged district more definite than this: that it was situated partly in San Bernardino and partly in San Diego counties. This being the case, the point is made in the briefs, and strenuously argued, that the court never acquired any jurisdiction to affirm the existence of the district. No notice of this point is taken in the opinion, and I agree with the petitioners that it called for a decision. There being no sufficient description of the district in the petition, it is certainly not unreasonable to contend that no one was called upon to answer or resist the petition to have it decreed a valid organization.

MEUX v. TREZEVANT et. al. (S. F. 1,812.)
 (Supreme Court of California. April 26, 1901.)
 MORTGAGES—FORECLOSURE—SALE IN SEPA-RATE PARCELS—CONFIRMATION—RE-VIEW—OPPOSITION—AFFIDAVITS.

1. Where property was described in a mortgage as a quarter section of land, but in fact consisted of a grape farm and four city lots, commissioners appointed to sell the property under foreclosure decree and order of sale, following the description in the mortgage, were not required to sell the vineyard property in two separate parcels, it being divided only by an imaginary line, but properly sold such property and each of the city lots as separate parcels.

2. Where, on a motion to confirm a mortgage foreclosure sale, there is a conflict as to whether the land constituted one known parcel or two separate known parcels, the finding of the trial court on such question will not be disturbed on appeal.

3. A sale of land under mortgage foreclosure will not be set aside because the same was not sold in separate parcels, as required by the mortgagor, unless it is made to appear that a larger sum would have been realized from the sale if the property had been offered in separate parcels, or that the sale of less than the whole tract would have been sufficient to satisfy the debt.

4. Where a mortgagor opposed confirmation of sale on the ground that the property was not sold in separate parcels, but it was shown that the property sold for its full cash value, and the only injury set forth in the mortgagor's affidavit was that the sale in one lot tended to reduce the number of bidders, and deprived affiant of the right to redeem either parcel separately, but failed to allege that he could redeem or desired to do so, the affidavit was insufficient to prevent confirmation.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; J. R. Webb, Judge.

Suit by T. R. Meux against N. M. Trezevant and another to foreclose a mortgage. From an order denying a motion to set aside the sale under a decree of foreclosure, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

C. C. Merriam (L. D. McKisick, of counsel), for appellants. Meux & Johnston (H. M. Johnston and E. D. Edwards, of counsel), for respondent.

COOPER, C. Appeal from order denying motion to set aside sale under a decree of foreclosure. The mortgage to plaintiff described as part of the premises mortgaged the following: "The northeast quarter of the southwest quarter of section 33, in township 13 south, of range 21 east, Mount Diablo base and meridian, together with one-fourth of one cubic foot of water from the Fresno Canal and Irrigation Company's canal, appurtenant to said land." The decree contained the description precisely as in the mortgage, and, after it was prepared and before it was signed, at the request of the judge it was presented to defendant's attorney, who indorsed thereon, "O. K. M. K. Harris," whereupon it was signed and filed. The order of sale followed the description in the decree. The commissioner duly advertised the property, describing it as described in the decree and order of sale. On the day of the sale, and at the time and place named in the notice, and before the sale, the defendants served a written demand upon the commissioner that the real estate be sold in separate parcels, to wit: "The county or vineyard property separately as lot one and lot two, block three, Nevada Colony, Fresno county, California, together with one-eighth of one cubic foot of water from the Fresno Canal and Irrigation Company's canal, appurtenant to said lots of land, a plat of which colony, showing this division of land of said colony, with lots so numbered and divided, is recorded in the office of the recorder of said Fresno county, and said property is generally known, by its description as aforesaid, as colony lots; and also the Fresno city lots also separately as lot 21, block 204; lot 22, block 204; lot 25, block 337; and lot 26, block 337,—all in said city of Fresno." The property referred to in said demand as the county or vineyard property as lot 1 and lot 2 is the said northeast quarter of southeast quarter of section 33, described in the decree and order of sale. The commissioners sold the property in five separate lots, selling the lots in the city of Fresno separately, but sold the vineyard property in one parcel, as described in the decree and order of sale. The court properly refused to set aside the sale.

The commissioner in selling the vineyard property followed the decree and order of sale. It was his duty to do so. Hopkins v. Wiard, 72 Cal. 262, 13 Pac. 687; Heyman v. Babcock, 30 Cal. 367.

There was a conflict as to whether the land constituted one known parcel or two separate known parcels. In such case the finding of the court below as to such question of fact will not be disturbed here. Gleason v. Hill, 65 Cal. 18, 2 Pac. 413. In a motion of this kind, it must be made clearly to appear that the land consisted of separate "known lots or parcels." Connick v. Hill, 127 Cal. 165, 59 Pac. 832.

In opposition to the unsupported affidavit of defendant N. M. Trezevant, the plaintiff filed many affidavits, in which it was stated that the premises consisted of one vineyard, known as the "Trezevant Vineyard," upon which there is a dwelling house, two wells, a barn, a raisin house, outbuildings, a small orchard, and the balance in vineyard; that there are no visible monuments or landmarks upon the said land showing any division thereof, but, on the contrary, the imaginary line that would have divided the land in the manner claimed by appellant had been plowed across and planted in vines running across its entire length and cultivated regardless of any subdivisions; that the land or vineyard is almost entirely surrounded by levees, fences, and irrigating ditches, and, in order to irrigate the western portion of the vineyard, the water must be taken across the eastern portion; that the water right constitutes a lien upon the whole land, and is not capable of segregation and apportionment. In view of the order of the lower court, we must consider the statements in these affidavits as true. Unless it is made to appear that a larger sum would have been realized from the sale of the property if it had been sold in separate lots or parcels, or that the sale of less than the whole tract would have brought sufficient to satisfy the writ, the sale will not be set aside. Hudepohl v. Mining Co., 94 Cal. 591, 29 Pac. 1025. In this case there is no statement in defendant's affidavits tending to show that the property would have brought more if sold separately, or that the sale of less than the whole would have satisfied the writ. On the contrary, the affidavits on the part of defendant show, without contradiction, that the property sold for its full cash value, and that it would not have brought as much as it sold for if it had been sold in separate lots. The only pretense of injury set forth in defendant's affidavit is that he was injured by said sale in one lot, because it "tended to reduce the number of bidders," and because "it deprived affiant of the right to redeem either of said colony lots separately." This is clearly insufficient. Defendant does not show that he could redeem, or that he ever desired to or now desires to redeem, any part of said property. Courts will not set aside a sale under foreclosure for light or trivial reasons. It must appear that there has been a material departure from the mandates of the decree, or the law governing such sales, to the injury of the party applying to have the same set aside. Nor can injury be presumed from mere irregularities. The order should be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; SMITH, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the order is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. COMPTON. (Cr. 721.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 26, 1901.)
CRIMINAL LAW—IMPANELING JURY—WITNESS—IMPEACHMENT.

1. Where in a criminal case in one of the departments the court ordered that certain other jurors, attending other departments of the court at that time, should appear to act in case the jury was not selected from the regular panel then present, and on the exhaustion of such panel the names of those jurors appearing from other departments were placed in the box, and the jury completed therefrom, such jury was improperly selected, since, on the exhaustion of the regular panel, the jury must be completed by drawing other names from the trial jury box, and then those persons summoned to appear, or by the court ordering a special venire, not taking bystanders.

2. Where, in a criminal case, the testimony of an absent witness given at the preliminary examination was read to the jury, such testimony could not be impeached by showing that subsequent to the preliminary examination the witness had made statements to third parties in contradiction of his testimony.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Lucien Shaw, Judge.

Charles Compton was convicted of crime, and appeals. Reversed.

W. H. Shinn and Davis & Rush, for appellant. Tirey L. Ford, Atty. Gen., and A. A. Moore, Jr., Dep. Atty. Gen., for the People.

GAROUTTE, J. Defendant appeals from a judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial. His principal contention is that the jury which convicted him was improperly selected, and with this contention the court agrees. For present purposes it will be assumed that there was a regular panel of jurors present in department 2 of the court for the purpose of trying the defendant. When the impanelment of the jury began, the court made an order that certain other jurors, attending other departments of the court at that time, appear in department 2 to act in the cause, provided the jury was not selected from the regular panel then present. In the selection of the jury the jurors regularly in attendance upon department 2 were exhausted, and no jury obtained, whereupon the court ordered the names of those jurors who had appeared from other departments in pursuance of its aforesaid order to be placed in the box, and it was from these jurors that the jury was finally completed. The course here pursued we deem a radical departure from the procedure laid down in the statute for the selection of a jury in a criminal case. The jurors brought from other departments of the court were either a part of the regular panel, or they were not. Again, when the selection of the jury began, those jurors were present in department 2 for the purpose of trying this cause, or they were not present for that purpose. If they formed a part of the regular panel, their names should have been placed in the box with the other part of the panel. There is no principle of law by which, in a criminal case, the court may place the names of part of a panel in the box, and draw the jury therefrom. Neither is there any principle of law by which the court may place the names of a portion of the panel in the box, and exhaust it, and thereafter place the remaining portion thereof in the box. The defendant is entitled to select the jury from the entire panel present and competent to act. If these jurors from other departments were present in court, properly assembled there, for the purpose of trying this cause, their names should have gone into the box before any names whatever were drawn therefrom. Defendant had a legal right to so demand. Taking the other view of this matter, if the jurors brought from other departments of the court were not properly a part of the regular panel, then the court had no authority to place their names in the box at all, for jurors not on the panel cannot be brought into court to try a cause by the mere order of the court. The statute does not authorize it. When the panel summoned before the court from which the jury is to be selected is exhausted, and a jury is not completed, the law says the jury may be completed by drawing other names from the "trial jury box," and then those persons be summoned by the sheriff to appear in court. This is, in effect, a second regular panel. The only other course open to the court is to order a special venire, not taking bystanders. The attorney general says: "The effect of the order relative to the second jury in the case at bar was the same as if the court, before the expiration of the drawing of all names in the regular jury box, had directed that a special venire issue." This position cannot be successfully maintained. The jurors taken from the other departments of the court, if a part of the regular panel, should have had their names placed in the box when the impanelment of the jury began. This was not done. If those jurors did not form a part of the regular panel, then, to be qualified jurors to act in the case, they must have constituted a special venire; yet the law does not allow a special venire to be selected and brought into court in the way here adopted. If authority were needed upon this proposition, it may be found in People v. Edwards, 101 Cal. 543, 36 Pac. 7, where the impanelment of a jury in a criminal case was held irregular, notwithstanding the departure from the statute was not nearly so substantial as in the case at bar.

The witness Ware being absent from the state, his testimony given at the preliminary examination was read to the jury. Defendant thereafter proposed to impeach the testimony of the witness by showing that, since the preliminary examination, Ware had made statements to third parties in contradiction of his testimony. We know of no rule of law justifying the impeachment of the witness under these circumstances. For the foregoing reasons, the judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded.

(Supreme Court of California. April 27, 1901.)

MECHANICS' LIENS—MATERIAL MEN—ABANDONMENT OF CONTRACT—EXTENT OF LIEN—COMPLETION BY OWNER—COST—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

1. Code Civ. Proc. § 1187, provides that cessation from labor for 30 days on any contract or building shall be deemed equivalent to a completion thereof, for all the purposes of a mechanic's lien. Section 1200 provides that if the contractor fails to perform his contract in full, or abandons the same, the portion of the contract price applicable to the liens of other persons than the contractor shall be fixed by deducting the payments then due and actually paid from the value of the work and materials already done and furnished, estimated by the standard of the whole contract price. Held that, where a contractor had abandoned a house before completion, material men were not entitled to a lien to the full amount due them, limited only by the contract price, less the payments made thereunder to the contractor, though the owner did not proceed with the completion of the building within 30 days after the abandonment by the contractor.

2. It was error to reject evidence offered by defendant as to the value of work and materials furnished by the contractor, estimated by the standard of the whole contract price, and what would be the reasonable cost of completing the building according to the plans and specifications of the original contract, on the ground that such evidence was immaterial and irrelevant, because the work on the building was not resumed within 30 days after such abandonment, since such evidence was necessary to determine the extent of the owner's liability.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; George H. Bahrs, Judge.

Action by D. B. MacDonald and others against John Hayes and others. From a judgment in favor of plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Leon Samuels, for appellants. William H. Jordan, for respondents.

HAYNES, C. Action to foreclose mechanics' liens in favor of the several plaintiffs, who had judgment foreclosing each of their several liens; and defendants Esther Attell and Seymour Attell appeal from the judgment and from an order denying a new trial. Hayes did not answer.

Esther Attell is and was the owner of a house and lot in the city of San Francisco, and on November 21, 1896, entered into a written contract with defendant Hayes to make certain alterations and repairs upon the building upon said lot. This contract was duly recorded before the work was commenced, and no question is made as to its validity. Hayes was to receive for the work and materials $2,200, to be paid in installments; the first two of $415 each; the third of $400, the fourth, $420; and the last, $550, to be paid 30 days after completion; the time for the payment of the first four installments being fixed by specified conditions of the work. Hayes entered upon and pursued the work in accordance with the contract until he had earned and received the first and second installments, amounting to $830; and on January 27, 1897, in the language of the finding, "he entirely ceased labor thereon, without completing said building." And the court further found that from and after that date no work of any kind was done thereon until March 27, 1897. Plaintiffs regarded the cessation of work for 30 days "as a completion of the building," and thereupon filed their several claims of liens for the foreclosure of which this action is prosecuted. The answer of Mr. and Mrs. Attell affirmatively alleged the contract with Hayes; the work done under it; the payments made; that he failed and neglected to proceed further with the work; that on January 18th he was notified in writing to supply material and workmen sufficient to complete the contract within the time limited therefor, or the owner would furnish them and proceed to finish the work, and deduct the reasonable cost thereof from the contract price; that he failed and refused to proceed further with the performance of his said contract, and that all labor ceased on said building and under said contract until the 27th of March, 1897, when a contract was made with D. R. Perry to furnish the necessary material and labor to complete the building according to the plans, specifications, and drawings set forth in the contract made with Hayes; that Mrs. Attell paid Perry for such completion of the building $1,500, which was the reasonable value thereof; that she had paid Hayes the first and second installments under his contract, amounting to $830; that the value of the labor and materials done and furnished by Hayes, including materials then actually delivered, estimated by the standard of the whole contract price, was the sum of $1,150; and that no more than $120, if any sum at all, is applicable to the payment of the lien claimants,—and offered to deposit said sum in court for distribution by the court to them.

Upon the trial defendants called as a witness Thomas A. Peters, who testified that he was a contractor and builder; that he knew the building in question, and examined it after Hayes ceased work; that he also examined the contract, and was familiar with its terms and conditions, and the plans and specifications. No question was made as to his competency. He was then asked the following question: "Taking the building in the condition it was left by Hayes when all work thereon by or under him ceased, and including all materials then delivered or on the ground, at what figure did you estimate the cost of completing said building according to the plans and specifications set forth in said contract with Hayes? Mr. Jordan: I object to the question that it is immaterial and irrelevant, unless it appears that there was no cessation of work on said building for a period of thirty days after Hayes had ceased work thereon." The objection was overruled provisionally, and the witness answered: "$1,500. Hayes had not completed half of the building when he ceased work." And in reply to another question, to which the same objection and same ruling were made, he answered that $1,500 was the reasonable cost. Mr. Jordan then moved to strike out both answers "on the ground that it did not appear that there was not a cessation of work on said building for a period of thirty days after January 27, 1897." This motion was granted, and defendants excepted. Other witnesses were called by defendants, and apt questions put to ascertain the value of the work and materials done and furnished by Hayes, including material upon the ground not used, estimated by the standard of the whole contract price of $2,200, and what would be the reasonable cost of completing the building according to the plans and specifications of the Hayes contract, to all of which the objection was made "that it is immaterial and irrelevant what the value of such work and materials is, unless work on said building did not cease for a period of thirty days after January 27, 1897"; and these objections were all sustained by the court, and defendants excepted to each ruling. The same question is also made and clearly presented by an amendment made to the complaint by striking out the allegation that the contractor "abandoned" the work on January 27, 1897; that the value of all the work done and materials furnished and used or on hand at the time of the abandonment was about $1,800; that the first and second payments, amounting to $830, had been paid, leaving due and unpaid from defendants to Hayes at the date of abandonment $970,—and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "That all work ceased upon said building, as plaintiffs are informed and believe, upon the 27th day of January, 1897, and that no labor was done upon said building, whatsoever, subsequent to said 27th day of January, 1897, for a period of more than thirty days, and until after the 26th day of February, 1897."

The objections to the testimony offered by defendants and the above amendment to the plaintiffs' complaint are based upon the last clause of section 1187 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which is as follows: "Cessation from labor for thirty days upon any contract or upon any building, improvement, or structure, or the alteration, addition to, or repair thereof, shall be deemed equivalent to a completion thereof for all the purposes of this chapter." It is not alleged, nor in any manner contended, that the contractor ceased work or abandoned the contract because of any fault of appellants, or of any violation of the contract by them, and therefore there was not, at the date of his cessation from the work, or at any time afterwards, any indebtedness or liability on the part of appellants to the contractor; but it is contended that, because appellants did not resume work within 30 days after the contractor ceased, they are liable to respondents, who furnished materials to the contractor, to the full amount of the contract price remaining unpaid, notwithstanding appellants were compelled to finish the work at an expense which, added to the payments made to the original contractor in accordance with the contract, exceeded the contract price. This contention cannot be sustained. If that were the law it would work a monstrous injustice to the owner who had in all respects complied with the requirements of the law and of his contract, and who, notwithstanding such compliance, would be at the mercy of a defaulting contractor, who could thus pocket the partial payments specified in the contract, and, without paying for the material purchased and used in earning the installments paid, enable the material man, who had contracted with him to be paid out of the installments, to enforce payment from the owner, with whom he had no contract relation. To justify the finding and enforcement of such a liability, the statute must be absolutely incapable of any other construction. Respondents' argument is "that there had been no abandonment, under the law, but that there had been a statutory completion both of the contract and of the building." There is no allegation in the complaint that the contractor ever resumed work on the building. It was alleged in the answer that he did not, and that a contract for its completion was let to another, and the court found that Hayes "entirely ceased labor thereon without completing said building." This is a fair definition of "abandonment." I do not see why the word itself was not used. There are several cases in our reports where cessation of the work for 30 days is spoken of as a "completion." But this language is generally used in reference to the time within which notices or claims of lien shall be filed. It is quite true that, where the notice of lien is filed because of a cessation of labor for 30 days, a suit may be maintained to foreclose the lien. But the statute plainly distinguishes between actual completion and those cases where the contractor fails to perform his contract fully, or abandons the contract after part performance or before completion, so far as the rights of the subcontractor and the owner are concerned. Where there is a valid contract between the owner and contractor, it is the measure of the owner's liability. Greig v. Riordan, 99 Cal. 319, 33 Pac. 913; Kellogg v. Howes, 81 Cal. 175, 177, 22 Pac. 509, 6 L. R. A. 588; Walsh v. McMenomy, 74 Cal. 359, 16 Pac. 17, and cases there cited. But in cases where, as here, the contractor fails to perform his contract, section 1200, Code Civ. Proc., provides the mode of determining the owner's liability as follows: "In case the contractor shall fail to perform his contract in full, or shall abandon the same before completion, the portion of the contract price applicable to the liens of other persons than the contractor shall be fixed as follows: From the value of the work and materials already done and furnished at the time of such failure or abandonment, including materials then actually delivered or on the ground, which shall thereupon belong to the owner, estimated as near as may be by the standard of the whole contract price, shall be deducted the payments then due and actually paid, according to the contract and the provisions of sections 1183 and 1184, and the remainder shall be deemed the portion of the contract price applicable to such liens." Defendants Attell, in their answer, alleged that, under the provisions of the above-quoted section, there was a balance in their hands of $120, which they offered to pay into court for distribution by it among those entitled thereto. As there was no evidence received by the court tending to show the extent of their liability, measured by the rule stated in said section, we can only say that it furnished the true rule by which the rights of the parties are to be determined, and that the court erred in not receiving the offered evidence, and in holding that plaintiffs were severally entitled to liens upon Mrs. Attell's house and lot for the full amount due them from defendant Hayes, limited only by the full contract price, less the payments made thereunder to Contractor Hayes.

Respondents contend that, as the appeal from the judgment was not taken within 60 days, the evidence cannot be reviewed. There is no controversy as to the facts. The rulings of the court upon the exclusion of defendants' evidence present only questions of law, and were saved and presented by a bill of exceptions. The same questions were also made upon the defendants' motion for a new trial.

In view of the conclusion reached, it is not necessary to consider whether the motion for nonsuit should have been granted. Nor is it necessary to consider whether the claim of plaintiff Leahy should have been rejected; the notice of lien having alleged an indebtedness of $195 from Hayes for materials, while the true amount is said to be $135. As the defendant Mrs. Attell concedes that there is a small amount in her hands applicable to the claims of the plaintiffs, and which is obviously insufficient to satisfy all of them in full, the validity of said claim is a question for the consideration of his co-plaintiffs. I advise that the judgment and order be reversed, and the cause remanded.

We concur: COOPER, C.; GRAY, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded.

BUNKER v. OSBORN. (S. F. 1,807.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 26, 1901.)

BILLS AND NOTES—INDORSERS—CONTRIBUTION—PLEADING—LIMITATION OF ACTIONS.

1. Under Civ. Code, § 3116, providing that an indorser of a negotiable note warrants that it is in all respects what it purports to be, and that the signatures of all prior parties are binding on them, in an action by an indorser who has taken up a note, against his co-indorser, for contribution, it is immaterial whether the note was or was not legally executed by the maker.

2. Under Civ. Code, § 1432, providing that a party to a joint obligation, who satisfies more than his share of the claim, may require a proportionate contribution from all the parties joined with him, an indorser who has paid the note may require contribution from his co-indorser, whether the indorsements were for the accommodation of the maker or not.

3. Where one of two joint indorsers has paid the note, and sues his co-indorser for contribution, it will be presumed that they were equally liable, and defendant should be required to pay one-half.

4. Where the complaint, which is otherwise good, contains allegations which are not essential, such allegations, and the findings based thereon, may be treated as surplusage.

5. Where one joint indorser paid the whole note, and within two years after such payment, but more than two years after the note was due, sued his co-indorser for contribution, the action was not barred by Code Civ. Proc. § 339, subd. 1, providing that an action on a liability not founded on an instrument in writing must be brought within two years, since the statute did not begin to run until the note was paid.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by C. F. Bunker against G. W. Osborn. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Naphtaly, Freidenrich & Ackerman, for appellant. T. M. Osmont and E. J. French, for respondent.

GRAY, C. An instrument dated February 16, 1894, purporting to be the promissory note of the Boyle Mining Company (a corporation) for $3,000, besides interest, payable 90 days after date, to the order of G. W. Osborn and Alfred Gonzalez, was by the said payees, on the date of said note, duly indorsed to Wells, Fargo & Co.'s Bank (a corporation). After the said note was due by its terms, Gonzalez paid the amount thereof to said last-named corporation. This suit was brought by the assignee of Gonzalez to enforce contribution from Osborn of one-half of the amount so paid by Gonzalez. Plaintiff had judgment as demanded in his complaint, and the defendant appeals from said judgment, and from an order denying him a new trial.

The note of February 16, 1894, was executed and delivered for the purpose of paying and discharging a previous note of date November 21, 1889, which the Wells, Fargo & Co.'s Bank held against Gonzalez and Osborn. Osborn was president and Gonzalez was secretary of the said Boyle Mining Company, and it appears that on their said personal note of November 21, 1889, they had borrowed $3,000 from the said bank, all of which had been paid out to the use and for the benefit of the said Boyle Mining Company. On the receipt of the note of the Boyle Mining Company the bank surrendered the earlier note of Gonzalez and Osborn. Attached to the note of 1894 was a copy of the resolution of the mining company authorizing its execution. This resolution was certified by Osborn as president, and Gonzalez as secretary, to have been duly passed at a regular meeting of the board of directors of said corporation, and that "said meeting of the board of directors was duly and regularly called and held." The name of the mining company was signed to the note by Osborn as president and Gonzalez as secretary. A waiver of demand, protest, and notice was indorsed upon the note, and signed by Gonzalez and Osborn.

1. On the foregoing state of facts, it is immaterial whether the note of 1894 was legally executed by the said mining company. Gonzalez and Osborn, as indorsers, were liable to the payee, whether it was so executed or not. Indorsers impliedly warrant that the note "is in all respects what it purports to be," and "that the signatures of all prior parties are binding upon them." Sections 3116, 3117, Civ. Code.

2. It is likewise immaterial whether the indorsement was for the accommodation of the Boyle Mining Company or not. The parties had jointly indorsed the note, and the presumption arising from that fact is that they were equally liable, and there is nothing in the record to rebut that presumption. One of them having paid the entire amount due on the note, he was entitled to contribution of one-half that amount from his co-indorser. Civ. Code, § 1432. The allegation in the complaint as to the accommodation character of the indorsements was not essential, and, the complaint being good without it, it may be disregarded as surplusage, and the finding on the same subject may be treated the same way.

3. Appellant contends that the account introduced in evidence on the cross-examination of Gonzalez shows that, at the time the 1889 note was given to Wells, Fargo & Co.'s Bank, the mining company was not in need of funds, but had a surplus of about $3,000 in its treasury, and from this it is argued that the $3,000 received on the said note was not obtained for its benefit. The evidence, however, is not only to the effect that the $3,000 was in the first instance obtained for the use of the mining company, but that it was actually checked out in execution of that purpose. The fact, if it be a fact, that the company had $3,000 in its treasury on November 21st, would not prevent its treasurer from obtaining $3,000 more. All this surplus might be necessary to meet demands expected to accrue in the near future. The evidence shows without conflict that the money obtained on the first note to the bank went to the mining company. There is nothing in the case to show that Gonzalez derived any benefit personally from the giving of either of the two notes to the bank. It is true that by the giving of the second note he was released from liability on the first, but it seems that in this he had not bettered his position, as his liability on the second note was as great as on the first. It is also urged by appellant that every claim which Gonzalez had against the mining company was settled, included in, and paid off by said company by its note for $14,066.91, given to Gonzalez on February 16, 1891. It is sufficient to say, as to this, that the testimony of Gonzalez is to the effect that the $3,000 note involved in this case was not included in the said note of February 16, 1891, and the court found, in accordance with this testimony, that "neither is it true that plaintiff's claim sought to be recovered herein was included in any settlement ever had or made between him and said company."

4. The cause of action is not barred by subdivision 1, § 339, Code Civ. Proc., because the statute did not begin to run until the note of 1894 was paid by Gonzalez. The note was so paid, as shown by the testimony of Stein, on June 19, 1896, and this suit was commenced August 28, 1897. Richter v. Henningsan, 110 Cal. 530, 42 Pac. 1077. Other points urged by appellant are not of sufficient importance to demand special notice. The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: SMITH, C.; COOPER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. TERRILL. (Cr. 711.)¹

FORGERY—INDICTMENT—EVIDENCE—VARIANCE—ACQUITTAL—FORMER JEOPARDY.

1. The indictment charged forgery in uttering a false and fictitious note, dated April 28, 1897, purporting to have been made by R. J. McIntyre to Eddie Bunney for $260, gold coin, payable one year after date. The note offered in evidence corresponded with such description, except that it contained a provision for interest, and for payment of attorney's fees if collected by suit. Held, that there was no material variance, since the description in the indictment was correct, as far as it went, and sufficient to identify the instrument, and the fact that there were conditions in the instrument not inconsistent with, but in addition to, those mentioned in the description, was immaterial, since an indictment is sufficient, without containing a copy of the instrument alleged to be forged.

2. On a trial for forgery, the court excluded the instrument claimed to be forged, on the ground of variance with the indictment, and directed a verdict for defendant; and a verdict was returned of "not guilty, on the ground of a material variance between the note set forth in the indictment and the note offered." Held, that defendant could not be again tried for the offense, since by the verdict he was acquitted, and it was immaterial what reason the jury gave for the acquittal, or that there was in fact no material variance.

3. On a trial for forgery, the court excluded the instrument claimed to be forged, on the ground of variance with the indictment, and directed a verdict for defendant. In fact, there was no material variance. Held, that Pen. Code, § 1021, providing that if the defendant was formerly acquitted on the ground of variance between the indictment and the proof, without a judgment of acquittal, it was not an acquittal of the same offense, had no application except when there was in fact a material variance; that the variance here, being immaterial, should have been disregarded, and the case is governed by section 1023, providing that, when defendant has been once placed in jeopardy on an indictment, the jeopardy is a bar to another indictment for the same offense, or for any offense necessarily included therein of which he might have been convicted under that indictment.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; W. G. Lorigan, Judge.

Samuel B. Terrill was indicted for forgery. From an order directing a verdict for defendant on the ground of variance between the writing offered in evidence and the indictment, the people appeal. Affirmed.

Tirey L. Ford, Atty. Gen., H. A. Melvin, and James H. Campbell, Dist. Atty., for the People. Jackson Hatch, for respondent.

COOPER, C. This is an appeal by the people from an order of the court directing the jury to find a verdict for defendant. The indictment charged the defendant with the crime of forgery in uttering and passing a certain false and fictitious note, dated April 28, 1897, purporting to have been made by one R. J. McIntyre to one Eddie Bunney for $260, gold coin, payable one year after date. In proof the prosecution offered in evidence a certain promissory note, of which the following is a copy, to wit: "$260.00. San Jose, April 28th, 1897. One year after date, without grace, I promise to pay to the order of Eddie Bunney, at San Jose, Cal., two hundred and sixty dollars, in gold coin of the United States of America, with interest thereon in like gold coin at the rate of 9 per cent. per annum from date until paid, for value received; and in case suit or action is instituted to collect this note, or any portion thereof, I promise to pay such additional sum as this court may adjudge reasonable as attorney's fees in said suit or action. R. J. McIntyre." The defendant objected upon the ground of variance, and that the note offered in evidence was not the one described in the indictment. The objection was sustained, and the judge said: "The defendant's objection of a variance between the note set forth in the indictment and the note offered, the court sustains, and refuses to allow it in evidence. Now, gentlemen, you will return a verdict as I have prepared it here, finding the defendant not guilty, upon the ground of a material variance between the note alleged in the indictment and the note offered in evidence." The jury retired, and, after returning into court, found the following verdict: "We, the jury, find the defendant not guilty, upon the ground of a material variance between the note set forth in the indictment and the note offered and read in the case, and the introduction of which in evidence was, under defendant's objection, refused. Geo. W. Hanson, Foreman. Dated, Aug. 16, 1900."

The court erred in directing the jury to bring in a verdict on the ground of variance between the note offered in evidence and the indictment. The indictment was sufficient, without containing a copy of the note alleged to have been the subject of the forgery. People v. O'Brien, 96 Cal. 174, 31 Pac. 45. There was no material variance here between the promissory note offered in evidence and the note described in the indictment. The indictment correctly described the note, as to its date, amount, time of maturity, maker, payee, and the kind of money in which it was payable. It did not contain any statement as to the interest agreed to be paid, nor as to the clause concerning attorney's fees; but we are not prepared to say this was necessary, unless we should hold that a literal copy of the note should have been set forth in the information. It is said by Underh. Cr. Ev. § 31, in speaking of a variance: "In determining whether a variance is material, the question to be decided is, does the indictment so far fully and correctly inform the defendant of the criminal act with which he is charged that, taking into consideration the proof which is introduced against him, he is not misled in making his defense, or placed in danger of being twice put in jeopardy for the same offense?" It was said in People v. Arras, 89 Cal. 226, 26 Pac. 766: "A material variance between the proof and the information arises when an acquittal of the defendant under the information would be no bar to a further prosecution for the same offense. In this case the check described in the information and the check introduced in evidence have so many earmarks in common as to establish the identity of the two instruments as being one and the same, beyond all doubt, and to indicate conclusively that the misdescription could not have misled the defendant to his prejudice, and that a conviction or acquittal of the offense charged in this information would forever bar any further prosecution for the larceny of the check." The language of that case may well be applied to the promissory note described in this. No one could doubt the identity of the note as being the one described in the indictment. The defendant could not have been misled by the description.

But the error of the court in regarding as material a variance which was not so in fact will not render the acquittal less available and conclusive as a bar to a subsequent prosecution. It is provided in Pen. Code, § 1021: "If the defendant was formerly acquitted on the ground of variance between the indictment or information and the proof, or the indictment or information was dismissed upon an objection to its form or substance, or in order to hold the defendant for a higher offense, without a judgment of acquittal, it is not an acquittal of the same offense." In People v. Hughes, 41 Cal. 236, this court, in speaking of a similar provision of the criminal practice act, said: "If the variance be immaterial, it should be disregarded; and, if the defendant be in fact acquitted on the ground of an immaterial variance, he cannot be again prosecuted for the same offense. * * * The error of the court or jury in regarding as material a variance between the allegations and proof will not render the acquittal less available as a bar to a subsequent prosecution." In this case there was no material variance, and section 1021 of the Penal Code does not apply. It is provided in section 1023, Pen. Code: "When the defendant is convicted or acquitted, or has been once placed in jeopardy upon an indictment or information, the conviction, acquittal, or jeopardy is a bar to another indictment or information for the offense charged in the former, or for an attempt to commit the same, or for an offense necessarily included therein, of which he might have been convicted under that indictment or information." In this case the defendant has been placed upon trial upon a valid indictment. A jury was duly impaneled, and have found him not guilty. Our constitution provides "that no person shall be twice put in jeopardy for the same offense." Article 1, § 13. Jeopardy attaches when a defendant is placed upon his trial before a competent court and jury upon a valid indictment, unless the jury be discharged from rendering a verdict by legal necessity or by his consent, or, in case a verdict is rendered, it be set aside at his instance. It is provided in Pen. Code, § 687: "No person can be subjected to a second prosecution for a public offense for which he has once been prosecuted and convicted or acquitted." The maxim of the common law, "That no man is to be brought into jeopardy of his life more than once for the same offense," is embraced in article 5, of the amendments to the constitution of the United States, and in the constitutions of the several states, in the following language: "Nor shall any person be subject for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb." It is therefore evident that the defendant has been "once in jeopardy." In such case the court has no authority to order a new trial, at the instance of the prosecution, for errors in the rulings of the court or in its instructions during the progress of the trial; and such new trial, if granted, would be vain and useless. Conceding that the court improperly directed the jury, the principle is the same. The court had no power to command the jury to bring in a verdict, and the jury were not bound by the instruction. Pen. Code, § 1118. The rule is that if, through misdirection of the judge in matter of law, a verdict is improperly rendered, it can never afterwards, on application of the prosecution in any form of proceeding, be set aside. 1 Bish. Cr. Law, § 665; People v. Webb, 38 Cal. 467; People v. Horn, 70 Cal. 17, 11 Pac. 470; People v. Roberts, 114 Cal. 68, 45 Pac. 1016. It results from what has been said that the order must be affirmed.

We concur: SMITH, C.; HAYNES, C.

WILLS et al. v. PORTER et al. (L. A. 697.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 30, 1901.)

CONTRACTS—RESCISSION—DILIGENCE—EQUITY.

1. Plaintiff and interveners alleged that they were stockholders in defendant corporation; that defendant P. owned a majority of the stock; that the majority of the directors were persons whom he had supplied with one share of stock each, and elected to act in his interest; that, the corporation being indebted to P. for land purchased of him, which, by agreement, was to be paid only out of the proceeds of sales of such land, and owing other debts, the directors had adopted a resolution authorizing a loan and mortgage of all its property, and, in consideration of P.'s guarantying the payment of the loan, that he should be paid at once; that the loan was made, and P. was paid his claim out of the proceeds; that the land had decreased in value, and prayed that the resolution be annulled, and P. be required to return the money so paid him. Held, under Civ. Code, § 1691, providing that rescission, when not effected by consent, can be accomplished only by the complainant rescinding promptly on discovering the facts which entitle him to rescind, that rescission should be denied, the action not having been commenced until two years after the acts complained of, and no excuse being offered for the delay.

2. Where a corporation negotiated a loan, and, in consideration of the principal shareholder guarantying the payment, paid him out of the proceeds a debt which was not then due, he should not be required to refund the amount so paid him, until he is released from his liability on the contract of guaranty.

Temple, J., dissenting.

In bank. Reversed.

For opinion in department, see 61 Pac. 1109.

PER CURIAM. This action was brought by plaintiff as a stockholder of the Porter Land & Water Company, a corporation, for the purpose of annulling a certain resolution passed by the board of directors of said corporation, and of recovering of defendant Porter $46,650, and interest thereon, the said sum having been paid to Porter under the authority of the board of directors, and by virtue of said resolution. A complaint in intervention was filed by certain other stockholders. A demurrer was interposed to the complaint and to the complaint in intervention, and overruled, and answers filed. After trial, findings were filed, and judgment entered thereon in favor of plaintiff and the interveners. A motion for a new trial was made and denied, and this appeal is from the judgment and order denying the motion.

The complaints, as amended, allege, in substance: That on the 23d day of April, 1887, the defendant Porter entered into a written contract with one McFarland, by the terms of which the corporation defendant was to be formed, and Porter was to convey to it, for the considerations therein named, 16,000 acres of land of the Ranch Ex-Mission San Fernando. Porter then supposed the ranch contained 18,000 acres, and under the contract he was to retain 2,000 acres for his own use, and to convey just 16,000 acres to the corporation; and if, upon a survey being made of the ranch, there proved to be less than 18,000 acres, the amount reserved by Porter should be diminished, and the full 16,000 acres conveyed to the corporation. The corporation was formed as provided for in said contract, and a survey made of the ranch, by which it was found that the ranch contained 18,734 acres, or 734 acres more than the number of acres to be conveyed to the corporation after reserving 2,000 acres for Porter. The corporation, after its formation, duly adopted the contract so made by Porter with McFarland, and after the survey of the said ranch it entered into a supplemental contract with Porter in regard to the 734 acres. This supplemental contract recited that the original contract was for the conveyance of 16,000 acres, and that there was 16,734 acres, and that it was impracticable to segregate the 734 acres from the 16,000 acres. It then provided that Porter should convey the 734 acres to the corporation by the same conveyance, and with the 16,000 acres. It was further provided, as the consideration for the 734 acres that the corporation should improve, subdivide, and sell it with the 16,000 acres, and out of the proceeds, after paying expenses and commissions pro rata, to account for and pay to Porter the sum of $40 per acre for each and every acre of the said surplus, and all sums above $40 per acre to be retained by the corporation as compensation for improving and selling it. It was further provided that the payment to Porter for the 734 acres should be made whenever dividends on the capital stock should be declared, and should in all cases be in the proportion of money on hand, when the dividends are declared that 734 bears to 16,734, less the proper proportion of costs, expenses, and commissions. These payments to Porter were to bear interest from the 16th of August, 1887, at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, but Porter was to have no interest, except as a stockholder, in whatever interest might be realized upon the profits of the sales of the 734 acres. The said Porter, in pursuance of the contracts, duly executed a deed to the corporation of the 16,734 acres and certain personal property, also included in the agreement. The capital stock of the corporation consisted of 524 shares of which defendant Porter owns 336, plaintiff 5, and the remaining shares by the interveners and others named in a list attached to the complaint. The directors of the corporation were at all times named in the complaint Yarnell, Threlkeld, Graves, Forrester, Witmar, Hubbard, and Cochran, and of these directors it is alleged that Yarnell, Threlkeld, Witmar, and Graves hold each one share only, conveyed to them respectively by Porter to qualify them to serve as directors, and that they have at all times acted in the interest of Porter, and as his agents and trustees. On the 29th day of March, 1895, the corporation was indebted, over and above its indebtedness to Porter, in the sum of about $50,000, and on said date, at a meeting of the directors of the corporation, for the alleged purpose of concentrating all the indebtedness, a resolution was passed to borrow from the Los Angeles Savings Bank the sum of $100,000, and that the corporation execute its note and mortgage for the amount, with interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum net; and the board of directors further adopted the following resolution: "In consideration of the guaranty by George K. Porter of this company's note to the Los Angeles Savings Bank for one hundred thousand dollars: Resolved, that this corporation pay to said George K. Porter the amount due him under the contract of date June 29, 1887, at this time, out of money borrowed this day, instead of waiting until the same can be paid out of the proceeds of land sales, the amount now due being $45,650 or thereabouts; the said George K. Porter to rebate interest on the amount paid him at the rate of one per cent. per annum, until said loan of $100,000 is paid off." It is further alleged that in pursuance of the said resolution the said loan was effected, and that the said note and mortgage of $100,000, and some interest thereon, still remains due and unpaid; that the agreement of Porter to guaranty the payment to the Los Angeles Savings Bank was without substantial value; and that Porter received $45,650 of the said money so borrowed by the corporation. It is alleged that in the passage of the said resolution a majority of the directors were acting under the influence of Porter, and for his interest, and under his direction and control; that the resolution was secured by the undue influence of Porter, and was the result of a fraudulent contrivance and combination between the said directors and Porter, "in order to pay the debt of the said Porter that was not due, and that would come due only upon the sales of land." It is further alleged that on the 19th day of March, 1897, the plaintiff demanded in writing of the directors of said corporation "to take steps at once to procure the rescission of said contract, and to compel the said Porter to account to the said corporation for the money received by him, as aforesaid, or, upon his refusal, to take the proper legal proceedings to compel him to do so"; that the directors refused to take any such steps, or to institute any legal proceedings, and for this reason the plaintiff, as a stockholder, brings this suit, and makes the corporation a defendant. The prayer of the complaint is that the resolution of March 29, 1895, be rescinded and set aside, and also the contract thereby made between the said corporation and the said Porter, and that Porter be required to pay the said sum of $45,650, with interest thereon at the legal rate, to the corporation, or that the same be credited and paid upon the note and mortgage held by the Los Angeles Savings Bank.

The complaint was filed some two years after the resolution complained of, and after the note and mortgage had been executed, and guarantied by Porter. There is no allegation that any interest has been paid upon the note and mortgage, and we must, therefore, assume that the note, and interest thereon since the 29th day of March, 1895, still remains due and unpaid and guarantied by Porter. The complaint expressly alleges that the guaranty by Porter of the $100,000 note was made in consideration that the corporation pay to Porter the $46,650, and that the money was paid to him. While the corporation still has the loan secured by the guaranty of Porter, it is sought to recover back the consideration for which the guaranty was given, and still hold Porter as guarantor. Relief is asked as to that portion of the resolution that is injurious to the corporation, while the benefit that was given by Porter in consideration of the resolution is to be still retained. No offer is made to pay the $100,000 note and interest, and nothing to show any intention to release the defendant Porter therefrom. But, nevertheless, it cannot be held, as appellants argue, that, before plaintiff could maintain this action for a rescission, he must have placed, or offered to place, Porter in the position which he occupied at the time the transaction was consummated; or, in other words, that plaintiff must have relieved Porter from his guaranty to the bank, and reimbursed him for any loss which he may have sustained by reason of his guaranty. Under the peculiar facts of this case it would be impossible for the plaintiff, who, after all, is acting but in a representative capacity on behalf of the corporation, so to do. As plaintiff is suing on behalf of the corporation, his recovery can be no other than that which the corporation itself might obtain were the cause prosecuted by its own officers. The court is not limited, in this equitable action, by the mere offers and demands of the parties. It may do exact justice between them all. The decree as entered is clearly inequitable in compelling Porter to return the $46,000, with interest, while at the same time leaving him as guarantor upon the corporation's debt for the full amount of that debt. But, if this were the only difficulty which the case presented, it could easily be remedied by a modification of the decree compelling Porter within a fixed, reasonable time to restore the money upon condition that the corporation itself either extinguish the debt upon which he was guarantor, and thus relieve him from his contract, or in some other equally efficacious manner accomplish the same result. But the difficulty with this action is more serious than the mere form of the decree. It goes to the right of plaintiff to maintain it at all. Prompt action upon the part of the complainant is essential to the right of rescission. It is provided in section 1691, Civ. Code, that: "Rescission when not effected by consent, can be accomplished only by the use on the part of the party rescinding of reasonable diligence to comply with the following rules: (1) He must rescind promptly upon discovering the facts which entitle him to rescind, if he is free from duress, menace, undue influence, or disability, and is aware of his right to rescind; and (2) he must restore to the other party everything of value which he has received from him under the contract, or must offer to restore the same upon condition that such party should do likewise, unless the latter is unable or positively refuses to do so."

The complaints of plaintiff and interveners, as amended, allege that when the resolution was passed and the acts consummated the complainants had no notice thereof, and no knowledge that any such acts had been consummated. They do not say when they obtained knowledge thereof, and their silence is significant of the fact, or at least justifies the presumption, that they acquired this knowledge immediately afterwards. But two years elapsed from the date of this contract to the date of the commencement of this suit, and no explanation at all is offered for such unreasonable delay. Moreover, it appears affirmatively by the complaint that, after the consummation of the agreement, the lands of the corporation decreased in value. The result, then, so far as Porter is concerned, was that he parted with the absolute title and control of the property, was lulled into security, and into the belief that no objections were made or to be made to the contract for fully two years, at the end of which time, without reason shown for the delay, he is to be subjected to the penalty of a heavy money judgment, and have the lands which he had sold turned back under the earlier agreement with depreciated value, while during all of this time he has been held as guarantor upon the corporation's debt. Clearly, plaintiff and interveners have not acted promptly, or used due diligence, in bringing this action. 2 Pars. Cont. p. 680; Barfield v. Price, 40 Cal. 542. In the case of Marten v. Wine Co., 99 Cal. 355, 33 Pac. 1107, it was held that a delay of three months in an offer to rescind a purchase of stock after discovery of the facts constituting fraud in the purchase was fatal to a rescission. In Bailey v. Fox, 78 Cal. 389, 20 Pac. 868, it was held that a delay of four months after the discovery of fraud in a partnership contract was fatal to the right to rescind. In this case, as has been said, the unexplained delay was for a period of two years. We think, therefore, that the demurrers to the amended complaint should have been sustained. The judgment and order appealed from are therefore reversed, with directions to the trial court to sustain defendants' demurrers, with leave to plaintiff and interveners to amend if they shall be so advised.

TAXATION—ASSESSMENT—LOANS—NOTES—
NONTAXABLE SECURITY.

Under Const. art. 13, § 1, providing that "moneys, credits, dues," etc., shall be taxed, loans are taxable, though secured by property exempt from taxation.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by the Security Savings Bank against the city and county of San Francisco. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Sidney V. Smith (A. N. Drown, of counsel), for appellant. Harry T. Creswell and Franklin K. Lane, City Atty., for respondent.

VAN DYKE, J. This action was brought to recover the amount of certain taxes for the fiscal year 1896-97 paid by the plaintiff corporation under protest. There was due to the plaintiff in May, 1896, upon outstanding solvent loans theretofore made by it, and secured by pledge of divers stocks and bonds, the sum of $578,200, and the further sum of $30,000, evidenced only by the promissory note of the borrower. In the statement delivered to the assessor by said plaintiff of its property subject to taxation for said fiscal year, no mention was made of said outstanding loans. The assessor thereupon notified the plaintiff that he had discovered the omission in the statement furnished, and that, unless reason could be shown to the contrary, he should add the same to the assessment roll. Said credits were assessed accordingly, —the loans on stocks and bonds for the amounts stated, to wit, $578,200, and the loan of $30,000 evidenced by the promissory note, at $22,500. Judgment in the court below went for the defendant, from which plaintiff appealed.

It is not claimed on the part of the plaintiff and appellant that there was any error committed by the assessor as to the amount or value of the property assessed, but it is contended that said property is exempt from taxation. While this appeal has been pending the question under consideration has been determined by this court, and the decision is adverse to the contention of the appellant. Savings & Loan Society v. City and County of San Francisco (Cal.; opinion filed Jan. 14, 1901) 63 Pac. 665; City and County of San Francisco v. La Société Francaise D'Epargnes et de Prevoyance Mutuelle (Cal.; opinion filed Feb. 19, 1901) 63 Pac. 1016. In the first case the court say: "We cannot see any reason for holding that, because the security happens to be of some kind of property exempt by law, that the debt secured thereby should also be exempt." In the second case it is said: "We are of opinion that loans or solvent credits secured by pledge on nontaxable property are taxable. Section 1 of article 13 of the constitution provides that 'all property,' with certain exceptions therein stated, 'shall be taxed in proportion to its value.' It further provides that the word 'property,' as used in said 'article and section,' shall include 'moneys, credits, bonds, stocks, dues, franchises, and all other matters and things, real, personal and mixed, capable of private ownership.' The admitted credits or outstanding loans of defendant come clearly within the above constitutional definition of taxable property, and the fact that such loans are secured by pledge of nontaxable personal property in no way affects the question." In the same case it was also held to be the duty of the assessor to add such credits and property to the assessment roll, if omitted in the statement furnished by the owner thereof. Judgment affirmed.

WAHLGREN v. MARKET ST. RY. CO.
(S. F. 2,226.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 9, 1901.)

TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—REFUSAL.

A requested instruction, which was but an elaboration of a legal proposition which the court in different parts of its charge had several times declared to the jury, was properly refused.

In bank. On rehearing. Affirmed.

For former opinion, see 62 Pac. 308.

HENSHAW, J. Upon the argument following the rehearing in this case, it was urged, first, that the evidence showed beyond a conflict that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence. This matter is considered in the opinion heretofore rendered in department, and the conclusion was there expressed that the question of the contributory negligence of the plaintiff was one which, under the facts, was proper for the determination of the jury. Further consideration serves only to confirm the soundness of the department's conclusion in this regard.

Appellant's second complaint is that the following instruction proposed by it was refused by the court: "A defendant cannot be charged with damages for injury to a plaintiff, notwithstanding the contributory negligence, if there be such, of the plaintiff, unless the danger of the plaintiff was actually known to the defendant in time, so that the injuries could have been avoided by the exercise of ordinary care; and a defendant, under such circumstances, is not liable in damages merely because he ought to have known of the plaintiff's danger, and could have known of it but for remissness on his part. A defendant in such a case must have actually known of the plaintiff's danger. If, therefore, the plaintiff in this case, by using her senses with ordinary care, as she approached the track, could have observed the car moving on such track in time to avoid danger, but failed to look or to listen, in the exercise of ordinary care, even though you should find that the defendant did not know of her presence prior to the accident, and should further find that the defendant by keeping a lookout, or using any other precaution, in the exercise of ordinary care, could have made itself aware of her danger, your verdict, none the less, should be for the defendant." This instruction, it may be conceded, is a correct exposition of the law governing the rather rare and exceptional cases to which it applies. See Herbert v. Southern Pac. Co., 121 Cal. 227, 53 Pac. 651. But in the present instance the giving of this instruction would have been the injection into the case of no new element. It was but the elaboration of the legal proposition which the court in different parts of its instructions had several times declared to the jury. Thus the jury were instructed: "Assuming the duty of the railroad company to anticipate that persons would walk along the sidewalk and cross the track at the car-house door, there is also, and there was, a duty on the part of this plaintiff, under the evidence here, to exercise reasonable and ordinary care in approaching and crossing the track; and if it should appear that the railroad company, in the exercise of ordinary care, could have observed, but did not observe, the plaintiff as she approached the track, in time to avoid accident, nevertheless if it should further appear that the plaintiff herself, in the exercise of ordinary care, by using her eyes or ears before she was struck, could have observed the approach of the car on such track, and so have avoided the accident, her failure to exercise such care, and thus to make use of her eyes and ears, is contributory negligence, and in such event the verdict must be for the defendant." And again they were told: "If you find from the evidence that the plaintiff failed to use ordinary care in approaching the track at the car-house door, up to the time that she was struck, and if you should further find that the railroad employes did not observe her, then, even though no bell whatever was rung, the verdict must be for the defendant. But the question whether a bell was rung is for the jury to determine, upon a fair consideration of the entire evidence, and the question whether the bell should have been rung is also for you." And still further they were advised: "If you find from the evidence that the plaintiff was injured while attempting to cross this track at the car house, in front of a car approaching dangerously near, which she knew, or by using her faculties with ordinary care could have known, was dangerously near, and which might have passed her in safety, had she paused for a few seconds before making the attempt to cross, then she was guilty of contributory negligence, and your verdict must be for the defendant, even though you should believe that the railroad company did not ring any bells or maintain any lookout at the place of this accident." Indeed, reading and considering the instructions as a whole, they omitted no point of law to the giving of which defendant was entitled, and were as favorable to the defendant as justice could permit. Therefore the opinion heretofore rendered in department (62 Pac. 308) is adopted and approved, and the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

STEEN v. MARCH et al. (S. F. 1,487.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 7, 1901.)

JUDGMENTS—FRAUD—PERJURED TESTIMONY—SUIT TO SET ASIDE—EQUITY—BILL OF REVIEW.

1. The fact that a judgment is obtained by means of perjured testimony is not sufficient to support a suit in equity to set it aside on the ground of fraud.

2. A bill of review will not be considered unless filed within the time in which an appeal or writ of error could have been filed.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Santa Cruz county; Lucas F. Smith, Judge.

Suit by Jacob Steen against Alvaretta L. March, as administratrix of the estate of William F. March, deceased, and another, to set aside a judgment for fraud. From a judgment in favor of the defendants, the plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Z. N. Goldsby, for appellant. W. D. Storey, for respondents.

HAYNES, C. Action to set aside a judgment, and to restrain its enforcement. Defendants' demurrer to the complaint was sustained, and, plaintiff having failed to amend, judgment was entered against him, and he appeals.

Pending the action, William F. March, the principal defendant, died, and the administratrix of his estate was substituted.

The complaint is very long, but a statement of the facts, so far as requisite to a decision of the material questions involved, is as follows: In December, 1888, William F. March and George Olive and John Ross were mutually interested in the construction of a steam schooner, and were endeavoring to obtain money therefor. The amount required was $32,000, and this was divided into shares of $500 each. These parties proposed to plaintiff that if he would execute his note for $500, payable to the order of Ross, at one year after date, that upon the completion of the vessel within that time, and the payment of the note, they would procure a certificate for one share in said vessel to be issued to him. The note was thereupon executed by Steen, and placed in the hands of Olive. Afterwards Ross indorsed and delivered said note to March, and March, before its maturity, for the face value thereof, sold, indorsed, and delivered it to one O. M. Button. These transfers were made without the knowledge of Steen, the maker of the note, and it is alleged that March gave Ross no consideration for the note, and it is also alleged that Steen received no interest in the vessel, and that the consideration of the note wholly failed at the maturity thereof; that in February, 1892, Button obtained judgment upon said note against March and Steen, and afterwards assigned said judgment to one Joseph Blum, who caused execution to be issued and levied upon certain property of March, which was afterwards sold, and the net proceeds, amounting to $596.10, were credited upon said judgment, leaving a deficiency of $89.65. Afterwards, in December, 1892, March brought suit against Blum, Steen, and the sheriff to recover damages for the sale of his property, and obtained judgment against Steen for $943.41, and this action is prosecuted by Steen against March and Devoe, his assignee, to vacate said judgment and enjoin its collection, upon the ground that in the action of Button against March and Steen upon said note, and in the action of March against Button, Steen, and the sheriff, in which the judgment was rendered that is now sought to be vacated, March falsely and fraudulently testified that he paid Ross full value for the note; that he (Steen) had no personal knowledge upon that subject; that Ross had left this state before Blum brought suit; that during the pendency of each of said actions he had made diligent efforts to ascertain where Ross was, but without success until December 1, 1896, some two or three weeks before commencing this action.

I think the demurrer was properly sustained. Appellant apparently relies upon the proposition, which he states without qualification, that "equity will grant relief against fraudulent judgments." Among the authorities cited are Hayden v. Hayden, 46 Cal. 333; Pico v. Cohn, 91 Cal. 129, 25 Pac. 970, 27 Pac. 537, 13 L. R. A. 336; and Mining Co. v. Mitchell, 59 Cal. 168. But the fraud alleged in the complaint does not bring his case within the requirements of either of those cases. In each of those cases it is held that judgments are impeachable for those frauds only which are extrinsic to the merits of the case. In Pico v. Cohn it was said that "the fraud which Cohn committed was the production of perjured evidence in support of his defense," but the court refused to set aside the judgment. In Allen v. Currey, 41 Cal. 318, 321, a case almost identical with the one before us, it is said: "The fraud imputed to the defendant is his alleged failure to disclose at the trial the fact that he had authorized the plaintiff to bid in the land in his own name and for his own benefit; but it is said that instead of admitting this fact, as he ought to have done, the defendant denied it, when testifying in his own behalf; and it is proposed to prove the truth of this allegation by the testimony of Emeric, in addition to that of the plaintiff himself." It was held that the action, which was in the nature of a bill of review to set aside the judgment, would not lie; that, if a judgment could be set aside as fraudulent upon such a showing, litigation would be interminable. See, also, In re Griffith's Estate, 84 Cal. 113, 23 Pac. 528, 24 Pac. 381, and Pico v. Cohn, 91 Cal. 135, 25 Pac. 970, 27 Pac. 537, 13 L. R. A. 336, and cases there cited.

Respondent also makes the point that a court of equity will not entertain a bill of review for a new trial after the time within which an appeal or writ of error may be prosecuted. This contention is sustained by the following cases: Allen v. Currey, 41 Cal. 321; Whitney v. Kelley, 94 Cal. 154, 29 Pac. 624, 15 L. R. A. 813; Thomas v. Brockenbrough, 10 Wheat. 146, 6 L. Ed. 287; Evans v. Bacon, 99 Mass. 213. Whether a bill of review will lie to set aside a judgment or decree for fraud discovered after the limitation above stated (which is not statutory, but is fixed in analogy to the statute limiting the time for appeals) is not considered, as that question does not arise in the present case. In view of the foregoing, it is not necessary to notice other grounds of demurrer pointed out by respondent. The judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: GRAY, C.; COOPER, C.

ASSIGNMENTS—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

At a meeting of about 50 persons who had been working for the defendant company, all present agreed that plaintiff should present their claims; and plaintiff sued on his own claim and those of 45 others, and alleged that they were assigned to him, which defendant denied. Held, that the evidence of an assignment was not sufficient to justify a verdict in favor of plaintiff as assignee, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1835, defining satisfactory evidence as that which ordinarily produces moral certainty or conviction in an unprejudiced mind.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county; Joseph H. Budd, Judge.

Action by Gus Gustafson against the Stockton & Tuolumne County Railroad Company and another. From a judgment in favor of defendant corporation, and in favor of plaintiff on a personal demand against defendant Riker, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. W. Middlecoff, for appellant. McNoble & McNoble (J. J. Burt, of counsel), for respondents.

TEMPLE, J. Plaintiff brought this suit on his own behalf and for 45 others, whose assignee he claims to have been. Judgment was rendered in favor of the corporate defendant, but plaintiff recovered the amount of his personal demand against the defendant Riker. He failed to recover the amount of the assigned claims, the court holding that they had not been assigned to him. Except some objections to the sufficiency of the specifications as to alleged failure to specify wherein the evidence failed to support the findings, this is the only matter urged on the appeal. The claims alleged to have been assigned were the demands of day laborers engaged in grading a railroad. The plaintiff, who was one of them, stated, in his testimony, the conclusion of law, "They all assigned to me." In particularizing as to what was done in regard to making the assignment, his testimony amounted to nothing more than that at a meeting of some 50 of the workmen it was agreed that he should present their claims. They left it all to him. He does not testify as to each one, but only all at the meeting. Another witness, Peterson, who kept the pay roll, produced a list showing the amount due each, and stated that all assigned. Cross-examined, however, he plainly shows that he did not know as to each person. The fact was, the crowd consented, and none objected. The assignment was denied, and the court found upon the issue in favor of the defendant, and, I think, correctly.

The respondent earnestly contends that the claims not being evidenced by any writing, and the debtor not being present or notified, or requested by the creditor in any form to pay the assignee, the assignment was not complete. There was no delivery of anything, symbolical or otherwise, and the alleged assignors were not concluded by anything said or done to deny, after the claims had been paid, that there had been an assignment. It may be that this position cannot be maintained as broadly as it is stated; but, surely, in the case of a suit brought on an oral assignment, if the fact be denied, the proof should be clear, positive, and in every way satisfactory, to justify a court in rendering judgment. In this case the evidence was slight and vague. It would not have justified a verdict for plaintiff. Section 1835, Code Civ. Proc. The judgment is affirmed.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; S. P. Hall, Judge.

Petition for distribution of the estate of Mary Fath, deceased. From an order denying the same, distributees appeal. Reversed.

Thos. C. Huxley, for appellants. Modena I. Scott and G. W. Langan, for respondents.

HARRISON, J. December 29, 1865, Adam Fath was the owner of certain real property in Alameda county, and on that day he filed in the office of the county recorder a declaration, properly executed and acknowledged by him, of his intention to claim and use the same as a homestead. The property so claimed was his separate estate, and of less than $5,000 in value, and he and Mary Fath, the above-named decedent, were husband and wife, and resided thereon with their family. A portion of the land covered by the declaration was conveyed by them in his lifetime, and on July 28, 1894, he died, leaving five children, who were at that time past majority. July 22, 1895, the superior court of Alameda county, wherein his estate was in process of administration, made an order setting apart the said homestead premises to his surviving widow, the above-named decedent, absolutely, for her sole use and benefit as a homestead. She died December 27, 1898, leaving surviving her the above-named five children, and a last will and testament wherein she devised a portion of said premises to one of her daughters and the remainder to the other four children in equal shares. Her will was admitted to probate, and, after letters testamentary had been issued thereon, a notice for the presentation of claims against her estate was given by the executor, and certain claims were presented and allowed by him, and approved by the judge, and filed in court. After the time for the presentation of claims had expired, a petition to the superior court for the distribution to the devisees under her will was filed by certain of said devisees, and an objection thereto was filed on behalf of one of the creditors of the estate, whose claim had been presented and allowed. Upon the hearing of this petition and objection the court made an order denying the same, upon the ground that said property was subject to be applied in satisfaction of all unpaid claims presented and allowed against the said estate. From this order the present appeal has been taken.

Section 1474, Code Civ. Proc. provides: "If the homestead selected by the husband and wife, or either of them, during their coverture, and recorded while both were living, was selected from the community property or from the separate property of the person selecting or joining in the selection of the same, it vests on the death of the husband or wife absolutely in the survivor." This section in its present form is the latest expression of the legislative will upon the subject, and supersedes the provisions thereon in section 1265, Civ. Code. Weinreich v. Hensley, 121 Cal. 647, 54 Pac. 254. Under this provision of the section Mrs. Fath upon the death of her husband became the owner in fee of the homestead property by virtue of her survivorship, and the title thus acquired was not affected by the subsequent order of the court setting the property apart to her as a homestead. Sanders v. Russell, 86 Cal. 119, 24 Pac. 852; In re Croghan's Estate, 92 Cal. 370, 28 Pac. 570; In re Young's Estate, 123 Cal. 337, 55 Pac. 1011. The descent of the property is governed by the law in force at the death of her husband. Tyrell v. Baldwin, 78 Cal. 470, 21 Pac. 116. The effect of that order was to withdraw the property therein named from administration, and to this extent relieve the executor from the necessity of accounting therefor; but it did not qualify or affect the title that had vested in Mrs. Fath at the instant of her husband's death. Rich v. Tubbs, 41 Cal. 34; Bollinger v. Manning, 79 Cal. 7, 21 Pac. 375; In re Ackerman's Estate, 80 Cal. 208, 22 Pac. 141. The homestead character of the property and its exemption from a forced sale was not affected by the death of her husband, but continued so long as it remained a homestead. Dickey v. Gibson, 113 Cal. 26, 45 Pac. 15; Robinson v. Dougherty, 118 Cal. 299, 50 Pac. 649. Upon the death of Mrs. Fath leaving no minor child, there ceased to be any family for whose benefit the exemption existed, and the homestead itself ceased to exist. It was subject to her testamentary disposition, and, in case she had died intestate, it would have descended to her heirs under the laws of succession.

Section 1485, Code Civ. Proc. provides: "Persons succeeding by purchase or otherwise to the interests, rights and title of successors to homesteads, or to the right to have homesteads set apart to them as in this chapter provided, have all the rights and benefits conferred by law on the persons whose interests and rights they acquire." The clause in the section referring to the "right to have homesteads set apart" is not involved herein, and the provision in the section for persons succeeding "by purchase or otherwise" is universal in its terms. The question, then, presented is whether those who acquire the title of a successor to a homestead hold the property under the same exemption as did the person to whose interest they have succeeded. "Succession" is defined in section 1383, Civ. Code, to be "the coming in of another to take the property of one who dies without disposing of it by will"; and section 1386, Id., gives the rule of succession, "unless otherwise expressly provided in this Code and the Code of Civil Procedure." The aforesaid provision of section 1474, Code Civ. Proc. is a special rule of succession provided for homesteads, and under its terms Mrs. Fath took the title to the homestead as "successor" to her husband. Section 1485, Id., was adopted by the legislature at the same time as section 1474, and under its provisions those who succeed to the title of Mrs. Fath "have all the rights and benefits conferred by law" on her. One of these rights and benefits was its exemption from being appropriated against her will in satisfaction of any indebtedness incurred by her. If the owner of the homestead incurs any indebtedness, or if any credit is given to him by another, it is with full knowledge on the part of the creditor that the homestead cannot be subjected to sale for their payment. The owner can sell and convey the homestead in his lifetime freed from all liability for any indebtedness incurred by him, and a voluntary conveyance by him cannot be impugned by his creditors, since such conveyance is in no respect in fraud of their rights. Civ. Code, § 3441; Wetherly v. Straus, 93 Cal. 283, 28 Pac. 1045. No injustice is in either case done to the creditors, since they have it always in their power to protect themselves, either by refusing credit, or by demanding such security upon the homestead as will protect them from loss.

The object of all homestead legislation is to provide a place for the family and its surviving members, where they may reside and enjoy the comforts of a home, freed from any anxiety that it may be taken from them against their will, either by reason of their own necessity or improvidence, or from the importunity of their creditors. Such legislation, being of a remedial character, is to receive a liberal construction. Keyes v. Cyrus, 100 Cal. 322, 34 Pac. 722. Mrs. Fath could have made a deed of gift of the property to her children in her lifetime in the same form as she devised it in her will, and they would have taken it freed from any claim of her creditors. The provisions of section 1485, Code Civ. Proc., however, extend to persons who succeed "by purchase or otherwise," and we must hold that her testamentary disposition of the property is attended with the same result. This question was presented in the case of Myers' Guardian v. Myers' Adm'r, 89 Ky. 442, 12 S. W. 933, and the same conclusion was there reached, although it does not appear that there was in that state any statutory provision of this nature. The court says in its opinion: "It would, therefore, seem no more injury to creditors, nor in contravention of the purpose and reason of the homestead law, for the debtor to pass the title by will than by deed; for if, as has been held, he can by deed, and for merely love and affection, convey the remainder interest to his children, reserving a life estate to himself, we see no reason why he may not do practically the same thing by will, because his creditors are prejudiced in one state of the case no more than the other. In fact, they are not wronged in either; but in both the object of the law, which is to secure to every housekeeper with a family the certain and uninterrupted enjoyment of a homestead, is accomplished."

The objection on the part of the respondent to a consideration of the statement, for the reason that the specification of the particulars wherein the evidence is insufficient is defective, must be overruled. The appeal is from an order denying an application for an order. The court made no findings of fact, nor was there any motion for a new trial. The provisions of section 659, Code Civ. Proc., have, therefore, no application. Section 648, Id., declares that "no particular form of exception is required, but, when the exception is to the verdict or decision upon the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to justify it, the objection must specify the particulars in which such evidence is alleged to be insufficient." The statement in the present bill of exceptions that "the evidence does not show" certain facts is equivalent to saying that the evidence "is insufficient to justify" the decision upon those particular facts. The order is reversed.

TRUSTS—VALIDITY—DETERMINATION—REMAINDER IN TRUST.

1. The question whether or not a trust may be effective by virtue of re-enactment in the will of the grantor, the deed of trust being void, is to be determined by the probate court in the first instance.

2. Grantor conveyed realty to trustees to hold to his sole use, and, whenever directed by him, to convey and deliver the same to persons he should direct, and to hold the proceeds received in exchange therefor, to grantor's use. Held, that such trust being merely a trust to hold for the grantor's use, and not within the uses authorized by Civ. Code, § 857, was invalid.

3. Where an attempted life trust in certain property is void, the trust to take effect on the death of the settlor, as to the residue of such property, will fail.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Action by E. W. Carpenter and others, as trustees, against E. V. S. Cook and others. From a judgment in favor of defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed. See 60 Pac. 475.

Mastick, Belcher & Mastick and W. B. Treadwell, for appellants. T. J. Lyons and C. W. Slack, for respondent Cook. John H. Durst, for respondent Willey.

HENSHAW, J. This action was prosecuted by plaintiff to quiet against defendants their title to certain real estate, plaintiffs claiming the legal title to the estate as trustees—First, under a deed of trust executed by one Amasa P. Willey in his lifetime; and, second, as trustees under the will of said Willey, by the terms of which he devised to them the property in question upon the trusts declared in a deed of trust executed by him in his lifetime. By its judgment the court decreed that the trusts created by the deed of trust were void, and that, consequently, under this instrument, the trustees had no title; second, that whether or not they had title by virtue of the will was a question to be resolved in the first instance by the court in which administration of the estate of Willey was pending. From the judgment thus rendered against them, plaintiff's appeal.

Upon this appeal we are concerned solely with the question of the validity or the invalidity of the trusts declared by the deed. Of those trusts, one was to operate during the lifetime of the settlor; the others were to operate upon and after the death of the settlor upon the "residue" of the trust property remaining at his death. As has been said, by his will the testator conveyed his property to these same trustees upon the trusts declared in his deed of trust. The first of those trusts having terminated by his death, the trusts which could be operative under the will necessarily are only those designed to follow thereafter. Whether or not these trusts, even though the deed of trust be void, may still be effective by virtue of their re-enactment in the will, is a question in the first instance to be determined by the court in probate (see In re Willey's Estate, 128 Cal. 1, 60 Pac. 471), and therefore not the subject of consideration here. We deem it important to say this in emphasis of the fact that upon this appeal the court is dealing only with the question of the validity of the trust scheme created by Willey's deed.

In his lifetime, Willey conveyed all the real estate which he owned or possessed to these plaintiffs, as trustees, in trust "for the uses and purposes following, that is to say: First. During the lifetime of the said party of the first part to hold the same, and all the rents, income, profits, and proceeds thereof, and all property received in exchange therefor, to the sole use and behoof of the said party of the first part; and, whenever directed by the party of the first part, to bargain, sell, convey, assign, transfer, and deliver said property, or any part thereof, to such person or persons as the said party of the first part shall direct, and to hold the proceeds of any such sale, or any property received in exchange therefor, to the sole use and behoof of the said party of the first part. Second. Upon and after the death of the said party of the first part, to have, hold, and possess all and singular the residue and remainder of said property and effects, to lease and demise the same, and to receive the rents, income, and profits thereof." Following this is an elaborate trust scheme, unnecessary here to be set out.

Manifestly, the trust declared in the first clause of the deed is a trust designed to continue through the life, and to terminate upon the death, of the settlor. It must be an express trust permitted by section 857 of the Civil Code or it is void. That section is divided into four subdivisions. Subdivision 2 permits a trust in real property to mortgage or lease it for the benefit of annuitants or other legatees, or for the purpose of settling any charge thereon. Clearly, the trust here created is not referable to this subdivision. Subdivision 4 permits a trust to receive the rents and profits of real property, and to accumulate the same for the purposes, and within the limits, prescribed in title 2, pt. 2, Civ. Code. This has to do with accumulations during minorities of beneficiaries, and of course the trust in question does not belong to this class. Subdivision 1 permits a trust to sell real property, and apply or dispose of the proceeds in accordance with the instrument creating the trust. In such a trust the essential elements are—First, an imperative duty upon the trustee to sell, which means a disposition of the property for money; and, secondly, an equally imperative duty to apply or dispose of the proceeds in accordance with the instrument creating the trust. To apply or dispose of the proceeds is a plain direction and command that the trustee must part with the moneys obtained by the sale. Subdivision 3 permits a trust "to receive the rents and profits of real property, and pay them to or apply them to the use of" a specified person. Here, too, it is of the essence of the trust that there should be imposed upon the trustee the active duty of applying, distributing, and apportioning the rents and profits in accordance with the directions of the trust. The trust here created is not a trust referable to any one or more of these specified classes.

It is a trust, primarily, "to hold" the property, and its rents and income, "to the sole use and behoof of the settlor." A trust to hold property is not a trust to sell and dispose of the proceeds. A trust to hold rents and profits to the sole use and behoof of a person is not a trust to receive rents and profits, and pay them or apply them to the use of any person. It is a mere passive trust. It is a trust not specified by section 857, and therefore void. Jarvis v. Babcock, 5 Barb. 139; Verdin v. Slocum, 71 N. Y. 347; Hagerty v. Hagerty, 9 Hun, 175. It cannot be successfully argued that this is a trust under subdivision 3 of section 857. The language of the trust is to hold the rents, income, and profits of the property to the sole use and behoof of the party of the first part, not to pay or apply them to his use. The trustees are to do with them as the settlor may direct, and he might direct them to hold and accumulate them in an unlawful manner and to an unlawful extent.

It is equally impossible to find in this language a valid trust, under subdivision 1 of section 857. First, because, as has been said, it is essential to such a trust that the duty upon the trustees to sell should be imperative. Cooke v. Platt, 98 N. Y. 35; Morfew v. Railroad Co., 107 Cal. 587-595, 40 Pac. 810. Here no such duty is imposed. The trustee is not to sell at all, either all or any part of the property, unless directed by the settlor, and then he is not alone to sell to such person or persons as the settlor may direct, but he may exchange property for other property, as clearly appears from the language, "to hold the proceeds of any such sale or any property received in exchange therefor to the sole use and behoof of the party of the first part." We think it too plainly apparent to need further exposition that the trust or trusts attempted to be created in the first clause of this deed are, one and all, wholly without the purview of section 857, Civ. Code, and we pass on to the consideration of the effect of the invalidity of this life trust upon the trusts to commence upon the death of the settlor.

It is a familiar principle that if several trusts are so inextricably interwoven, so mutually interdependent, that the destruction of one mutilates and maims in essential particulars the trust scheme, the whole must fall. In this case, the dependence of all succeeding trusts under this deed results, if it results at all, from the language above quoted from paragraph 2: "Upon and after the death of the said party of the first part, to have, hold, and possess all and singular the residue and remainder of said property," for certain specified uses and trusts. Here it is apparent that it is only the "residue"—a legal phrase of well-defined meaning—which after the settlor's death is to be devoted to the purposes of the succeeding trusts. In Limbrey v. Gurr, 6 Madd. & Gel. 151, the rule applicable to this case is laid down in the following language: "Where a residue is given to a valid purpose, it will fall with the prior void purpose if not capable of being ascertained except by the actual execution of that purpose;" and as Jarman expresses it (2 Jarm. Wills [6th Ed.] p. 236): "A gift of the residue after providing for an illegal object is void." In Cowen v. Rinaldo (Sup.) 31 N. Y. Supp. 554, will be found a learned discussion of the question here arising, and the court concludes: "But we have failed to find any case in which the primary trust has been held to be invalid, and the ulterior trusts or dispositions of the will have been held to be good. * * * The primary objects may still remain, and those that follow may be cut off. But, if you cut off the primary object, upon what do the ulterior provisions depend?" In instance of the rule that when the primary trust has been adjudged void the trusts and limitations over have uniformly fallen, may be cited Rice v. Barrett, 102 N. Y. 161, 6 N. E. 898; Beekman v. Bonsor, 23 N. Y. 298, 80 Am. Dec. 269; Dodge v. Pond, 23 N. Y. 69; Hone's Ex'rs v. Van Schaick, 20 Wend. 564; Smith v. Edwards, 88 N. Y. 92; Fowler v. Ingersoll (N. Y. App.) 28 N. E. 471. It follows, therefore (and this language has exclusive application to the trust scheme created and attempted to be set in operation by the deed of trust alone), that the trial court correctly decided that no title vested in the trustees by virtue of the deed of trust, and the judgment appealed from is, therefore, affirmed.

We concur: VAN DYKE, J.; HARRISON, J.; GAROUTTE, J.; TEMPLE, J.; BEATTY, C. J.

McFARLAND, J. (concurring). I concur in the judgment and in the opinion of Mr. Justice HENSHAW. It is well to notice, however, that in Re Willey's Estate, 128 Cal. 1, 60 Pac. 471, the first clause of the deed to Carpenter and Boericke was not attacked on the ground that it attempted to create a trust not permitted by section 857 of the Civil Code. Moreover, in Re Willey's Estate, which dealt entirely with the will, the question whether or not said first clause of the deed was valid was immaterial. The will, of course, did not take effect until after the death of the testator, and the reference in the will to the deed embraced only those trusts declared in the deed which became operative after the testator's death; and for the uses and purposes of these latter trusts he devised and bequeathed to Carpenter and Boericke "all the property, real and personal, * * * of which I may die seised or possessed."

In re FAIR'S ESTATE. (S. F. 1,491.)ANGUS et al. v. FAIR et al.¹*(Supreme Court of California. April 30, 1901.)

WILLS—REAL PROPERTY—TRUST—VALIDITY—SURPLUSAGE—ESTATE IN REMAINDER—USE—EXECUTION—ACTIVE TRUST—POWER IN TRUST—INSEPARABLE TRUST—QUANTUM OF ESTATE—LIMITATION—ESTATE FOR LIFE—LIMITED FEE—TESTATOR'S INTENTION.

1. Since all uses and trusts in relation to real property are abolished by Civ. Code, tit. 4, § 847, except those specified in that title, and those enumerated therein do not include a trust to convey real property to beneficiaries, a devise of the residue of testator's property to trustees, to have and to hold during the lives of testator's children, and to be transferred and conveyed on the death of the surviving child to certain beneficiaries, was void.

2. Testator devised the residue of his property to trustees, to have and to hold in trust during the lives of testator's children, and that on the death of the surviving child the trustees should transfer and convey the trust property to certain named beneficiaries. Held, that the contention that the words "transfer and convey" should be eliminated, as surplusage, and the trust considered as devising estates in remainder to the persons designated as beneficiaries, cannot be sustained, since if the words "transfer and convey" were eliminated the beneficiaries named would not take the estate at all, as there are no other words operative to create an estate in remainder.

3. The contention that the trust to convey, though invalid, should be considered merely as a use executed by the English statute of uses (27 Hen. VIII., c. 10), and hence as vesting a fee in the beneficiaries, cannot be sustained, since the English statute of uses executed only valid passive trusts, and the trust to convey was both active and invalid.

4. The contention that, though the trust to convey was void, it should be held good as a power in trust to convey, cannot be sustained, since a power to convey is a trust to convey, and hence is also void, as prohibited by the statute.

5. Testator devised the residue of his estate to trustees during the lives of testator's children, in trust to hold and manage the trust property, and to pay the income therefrom monthly to his children, in certain portions, and, on the death of his children and the survivor of them, to transfer and convey the trust property to certain named beneficiaries, which did not include testator's son. Held that, where the trust to transfer and convey the trust property on the death of the surviving child was void because prohibited by statute, the whole trust must fail, since the trust to convey and the trust to manage the estate and pay over the income were inseparable parts of one entire scheme, and to hold one valid and the other invalid would lead to a result contrary to the purposes of the will.

6. Testator devised the residue of his estate to trustees, "to have and to hold" during the lives of testator's children and the survivor of them, and on the death of the survivor to transfer and convey the trust property to certain named beneficiaries. Held, that the words "to have and to hold" did not diminish the quantum of estate vested in the trustees to an estate during the life of testator's children, but merely fixed a date on which the trustees should convey the fee vested in them.

7. The contention that the will created an estate for life in the trustees, with a direct devise to testator's beneficiaries, notwithstanding testator's intention to create a trust to convey the fee on the death of the surviving child, cannot be sustained, since, where the method used by the testator to give his estate to his beneficiaries is illegal, the courts have no power to substitute a legal mode in lieu thereof, and hence words creating a void trust cannot be considered as creating a valid direct devise.

8. Civ. Code, § 863, provides that, except as thereafter provided, every express trust in real property shall vest the whole estate in the trustee, subject only to the execution of the trust, and the beneficiaries shall not take any estate or interest, but may enforce the performance of the trust; and section 864 declares that, notwithstanding anything contained in section 863, the author of a trust may, in its creation, prescribe to whom the real property to which the trust relates shall belong in the event of the failure of the trust. Testator devised the residue of his estate to trustees, to have and to hold during the lives of the testator's children and the survivor of them, and on the death of such survivor to transfer and convey the trust property to certain named beneficiaries. Held, that the contention that, notwithstanding the trust to convey was void, the estate should go to the beneficiaries named, by virtue of the prescription contained in section 864, cannot be sustained, since the testator made no attempt to prescribe to whom the property should go in case the trust failed, and the language creating the trust itself cannot be treated as the prescription mentioned in the statute.

9. The contention that the fee devised to the trustees was one of a limited character, and vested in them only in case they decided to sell the property, and that therefore the trust was valid, cannot be sustained, since the fact that the testator gave the trustees power to convey the fee shows conclusively that he intended to vest an absolute fee in them.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an appeal from a decree of partial distribution. Upon the former decision of this case Justice McFARLAND rendered the following opinion, which is now adopted as the opinion of the court upon the questions therein discussed:

[The opinion here referred to is published in full in 60 Pac. 453-460.]

The foregoing opinion disposes of what may be termed the technical legal phases of the case, and we pass to the consideration of questions which largely have presented themselves upon the last arguments, and which were called forth by reason of the views of the various justices promulgated in the former decision.

The will provides: "All the rest, residue, and remainder of my estate, property, and effects, real, personal, and mixed, whatsoever and wheresoever situated, I give, devise, and bequeath unto my trustees herein-after named, and to the survivors of them, and to their successors in office, in trust for the following uses and purposes: That is to say, to have and to hold the same in trust during the lives of my daughters Theresa A. Oelrichs and Virginia Fair, and of my son, Charles L. Fair, and during the life of the survivor of them, and upon the death of said survivor to transfer and convey to the children or descendants of my said daughter Theresa A. Oelrichs the one-fourth of said trust property and estate," etc. We are now directly confronted with a question of construction, namely, does this provision of the will place in the trustees a trust to transfer and convey this estate to certain of Fair's kindred, or may it be construed as a direct devise to those kindred? Simplifying the proposition, yet leaving it exactly the same in principle, aside from the question of perpetuities, let us assume the provision to be: "All the rest and residue of my estate and property I give, devise, and bequeath unto my trustees in trust for the following uses and purposes: That is to say, to have and to hold in trust for six months, applying the rents and profits thereof to the care of my children, and upon the expiration of the six months to transfer and convey said property and estate to my kindred [naming them]." Does this provision create a trust in the trustees to transfer and convey the estate? Thus presented, this question does not seem to be a big one. Yet a wonderful amount of argument, of learning, and of law, by most eminent counsel, has been advanced to aid the court in giving the true answer. In construing this language of the will, it must be kept in mind that the court is not allowed to force the construction of a sentence, or even a word, in order that a particular result may be reached; and this is the rule, even though such construction be absolutely necessary to save the document from complete condemnation. In the Walkerly Case, 108 Cal. 656, 41 Pac. 772, it is said: "Where the language of the provisions of the will is plain and unambiguous, the courts are not permitted to wrest it from its natural import in order to save it from condemnation. * * * It may be said of all wills that the testator's intent is to make a valid disposition of his property. * * * But a court is not therefore authorized to modify or vary the plain language of the testator, and thus create a new and valid will for him, even if it were certain that the testator would have adopted the interpretation of the court, had he known his own attempt was invalid." Now, this property, under the illustration, was devised to the trustees in trust for certain uses and purposes. What are these uses and purposes? They are: (1) To hold the property for six months, and apply the income to the care of the children; (2) at the period of time fixed, to transfer and convey the property to certain kindred. It is conceded that the trustees took the property in trust for certain uses and purposes; yet the trust to transfer and convey appears as plain and palpable from the language used, as the trust to hold the property for six months, and apply the income to the care of the children. If there be a trust created to do one of these things, there is a trust created to do the other. The testator's intentions must be determined from the words he used. He said he desired the trustees to hold the property in trust for a fixed period, and then transfer and convey it. He certainly intended by these words that they should make a deed of conveyance of the property. And, if he intended that they should make a deed of the property, he only could have intended that they should by the deed pass the fee of the property. The words used indicating a conveyance are words of simple, ordinary legal import, and are the words always used in an instrument where a party desires property to pass by deed. A layman would not hesitate a moment in the declaration that Fair intended by this language that the trustees should pass title to the property by deed. It is only the astute lawyer who can see any other intention. While Fair's intention as to the creation of a trust in the trustees to convey stands out so that all may see, we find nothing in the instrument anywhere showing a contrary intention. Indeed, when the pleadings in this case were prepared and filed by the trustees, we find a verified allegation in those pleadings to the effect that these trustees were the owners in fee simple absolute of this property, in trust, etc.

Stress is laid by appellants upon the effect of the words "to have and to hold in trust during the lives of * * *," as fixing the estate of the trustees; yet it is plain the simple purpose and effect of that clause is only to fix the time when the trustees shall make the conveyance,—shall transfer and convey the estate. These words were not used to diminish the quantum of the estate of the trustees, but to fix the day when the fee should be conveyed to the beneficiaries. If the estate were devised to the trustees in trust to have and to hold for six months, and then to transfer and convey to the beneficiaries, would the estate in the trustees be an estate simply for years? We hold not, but, on the contrary, are assured that the words "to have and to hold in trust for six months" were used for the purpose, and should have the effect, alone, of marking the time when the property should be transferred and conveyed, and would in no degree diminish the quantum of estate devised by the instrument to the trustees in trust. These words not having any effect upon the quantum of the estate, there are no other words in the instrument having any tendency to diminish that quantum. It would seem, under these circumstances, that, if a complete and perfect fee ever could vest in a person, it has vested in these trustees. It follows from these views that the contention of appellants to the effect that the trustees took only an estate for the lives of Fair's children, or an estate for life, with an incidental fee which allowed them to sell and transfer the property during that period, cannot be maintained.

Another view of this contention, closely allied to the one just considered, is found in the claim that the will creates an estate for life in the trustees with a direct devise to Fair's kindred. And this claim is based upon the concession (for the purposes of the case only) that Fair intended to create a trust to convey, but, the means or mode provided by him for vesting the estate being illegal, in order to carry out his general intent to vest the property in certain of his kindred a legal means and mode will be substituted by the court. In other words, the contention is that notwithstanding Fair's intention to create a trust to transfer and convey his property may appear upon the face of the will as plain as a blazing fire in the darkness of night; notwithstanding Fair may have said in his will, "I hereby intend in and by this will to create a trust in the trustees, to transfer and convey my property to my beneficiaries,"—notwithstanding all this, the court will give no concern to that expressed intention, the trust being void, but, in order that these particular beneficiaries may secure the property, will hold that it passes to them by direct devise. Courts will look askance at such a proposition, for it is startling in the extreme. In the first place, we do not find any general or ultimate intent upon the face of the document indicating that these beneficiaries shall take this property by hook or by crook. The only intent we find is an intent that they shall take it in a certain specified way, namely, by way of a trust to transfer and convey. Can counsel or court say that, from the face of this instrument, there is a plain intent that these beneficiaries shall have this property, regardless of the way provided by the testator for them to take it,—indeed, regardless of everything? Upon the contrary, it would seem that they were only to get it by way of the route pointed out in the will. If that route be blotted out, how may they get it at all? Who can say, from the words of the will, but what the testator intended that they should get it by way of the trust, or not get it at all? This court is not wise enough to say that Fair did not know he was creating a trust to transfer and convey when he made his will. In re Young, 123 Cal. 343, 55 Pac. 1011, it is said: "One of these rules, firmly established and never departed from, nor even criticised, is that the expressed intent will not be varied, under the guise of correction, because the testator misapprehended its legal effect. The testator is presumed to know the law. If the legal effect of his expressed intent is intestacy, it will be presumed that he designed that result. The inquiry will not go to the secret workings of the mind of the testator. It is not, what did he mean? but it is, what do his words mean?" Let it be conceded that a general intent may be found in this will indicating that these beneficiaries should have the property; still the only mode provided by the testator for them to get it is illegal,—prohibited by the law,—and this court has no power to provide a legal mode. In attempting to vest an estate, if the only mode prescribed for the purpose by the testator is illegal, courts cannot close their eyes to that mode, and substitute in lieu thereof a legal mode. A valid power in trust, coupled with a statute of uses, might do it, but without the power and the use it cannot be done. If the mode provided by the testator was legal, but defective in substantial, the court could not create a new mode. Then, when the mode created is illegal, void, amounts to nothing, how may the court create a new and legal mode? The law says to Senator Fair, "You shall not create a trust to convey your property." Fair says, "I will create a trust to convey my property." The court says, "The trust you created to convey your property is void because prohibited by law, but your wishes as to the disposition of your property will be carried out through the medium of a direct devise, exactly the same as though the trust you created was entirely valid; and the words you used to create the void trust will be held to create a valid direct devise." This construction of the instrument renders the law forbidding trusts of this character absolutely nugatory, and demands the exercise of an accommodating spirit upon the part of the court, which the law forbids. Under the law of this state, a devise to A. in fee in trust to convey to B. cannot be the equivalent, by any possible rules of construction, of a direct devise to B. That is the substance of this contention, but to so declare would shock the statute forbidding the creation of trusts of the character here involved. In this illustration with equal propriety it may be said that there is a general intent B. should have the property, yet by no judicial construction could he ever get it. It is not the right of the court, by construction or in any other way, to evade a rule of law in order that some particular result may be reached. The court may only declare the law as it finds it, whatever the result of that declaration may be.

Some importance by appellants is attached to section 864 of the Civil Code. That section provides, "Notwithstanding anything contained in the last section, the author of a trust may in its creation prescribe to whom the real property to which the trust relates shall belong, in the event of the failure or termination of the trust, and may transfer or devise such property subject to the execution of the trust." The facts of this case do not call for an analysis in detail of this section of the Code. In the creation of the trust here involved the trustor has made no attempt to prescribe to whom the property shall belong in the event of the failure or termination of the trust. He has not said, as he may have said under this section, "If the trust I have hereby created in the trustees to transfer and convey my property is not a valid trust, and for that reason shall fail, then I direct that this property shall pass," etc. A provision of that character in this will would bring the case directly within the section. But the testator wholly fails to insert the provision. He makes no attempt to do it. Again, the section cannot be construed to mean that, the trust provided for by the instrument being void, the language creating it will be treated and deemed the prescription mentioned in the section, and therefore the property will pass exactly as it would have done if the trust had been valid. Certainly this construction of the section was never contemplated by the lawmakers, for it would be holding that every void trust to convey could be transformed into a valid prescription. If you eliminate the words "transfer and convey" from the will, then the beneficiaries named would not take the estate at all; for the heirs of Fair would be entitled to inherit it. Hence the interest of the beneficiaries in the estate can only come to them through the words "transfer and convey"; and if the beneficiaries are to take the fee, and take it only through the medium of those words, the trustees must have the fee vested in them, in order that they may transfer and convey it. The will demands that they shall transfer and convey to the beneficiaries; that is, make a conveyance of the property to them; that is, vest the title of the property in them by a conveyance. To hold otherwise—to give the words "transfer and convey" some other meaning—is to wrest words from their usual and ordinary import, and give them a forced meaning wholly unjustified by anything contained in the instrument. The favor of the law in the direction of supporting testacy cannot go to these lengths. If the document under consideration had been a deed, and not a will, would this court hold that these named kindred would take the estate by direct grant, the trust being void? We apprehend not. Yet, the intent in both cases being the same, the rules of law as to the construction of deeds and wills stand the same. We cannot imagine that an estate created by will would be valid, while the same estate created by deed would be invalid. The rights of devisees are no more sacred and are entitled to no more protection than are the rights of heirs. The trustees had the power under Fair's will to convey away the fee of this property. This power was granted to them in express words. However, it is said by appellants that this fee was of a limited character,—a fee simply feeding that portion of the trust which authorized the trustees to sell. In another form, the contention may be stated to be that the trustees had the fee vested in them if they decided to sell the property, but had no fee vested in them if they decided to hold the property.

It may well be said that such a fee is of a nondescript character. The fact, standing alone, that the trustees were authorized to sell the property and convey a fee, points directly and unerringly to the fact that the fee was cast in them; for, if they had no fee, they could convey no fee. And this power vested in the trustees to convey the fee points with equal certainty to the fact that when the testator said, "I devise my estate to my trustees in trust to hold for the lives" of my children, vesting in the trustees the power to convey the fee during that period of time, and, if they do not convey during that period, then they shall transfer and convey my property to certain of my kindred," he meant, and could only mean, by every rule of construction, that the trustees were vested with the fee of his property, which fee they could convey to third parties during the lives of his children, and, if not so conveyed, then they should convey it to these kindred.

The court concludes that the fee to Fair's property was cast in the trustees in trust to transfer and convey to certain of his kindred, that his intention to so place the fee stands out plainly from the face of the entire will, that no contrary intention whatever appears therefrom, and that the will must fall by reason of this prohibited trust. We are more satisfied with this result, when it is considered that a contrary conclusion would perpetuate a trust of this vast estate probably for a period of 50 years or more, and also result in a disinheritance of Fair's children. Notwithstanding a man has a right under the law to make a will, still the law is not kindly disposed to either of these things; and, if this were a closely-balanced case, these threatened results would furnish reasons for a decision the other way.

We concur: VAN DYKE, J.; McFARLAND, J.

HENSHAW, J. (concurring). Upon the former hearing of this case I gave my assent to the conclusion reached by Mr. Justice HARRISON, that an equitable remainder in the estate of Fair was devised to the persons to whom the trustees were directed to convey upon the death of his last surviving child. That the will created a trust to convey I never entertained any doubt. Not only is the language apt and well chosen for that purpose, not only have its phrases been selected and employed with sedulous care, not only was it the opinion of the astute attorneys who prepared the pleadings of appellants that a fee was devised by the will to the trustees, but, in addition to all this, the question propounded upon the last argument of the case has remained without satisfactory answer, and is, to my mind, unanswerable: "If this language does not create a trust to convey, what different words would you or could you employ to create such a trust?" In the light of the arguments, oral and printed, upon the last hearing, and after a more detailed and exhaustive consideration of the authorities, I am convinced that, in a natural desire to uphold the last will of the deceased, due weight was not given to the clear and explicit intent of the testator. While always of the opinion that a trust to convey was clearly meant and created in the will, and that such a trust, under the laws of this state, is absolutely void, it then seemed to me that the provisions of the will could be sustained in accordance with the doctrine of the cases holding that under such a trust an equitable interest or estate or remainder passes to the beneficiaries. The error of this position came from a failure to give due recognition to the fact, emphasized and demonstrated upon the last argument, that only in those courts where a trust to convey is valid, as in England, or in those like New York, where its purpose is effectuated by an enabling statute, as a power in trust, has this rule or doctrine ever been declared. It is because the trust is valid, and that consequently a legal estate vests in the trustees, that an equitable interest or estate, eo instanti, following the legal, vests in or passes to the beneficiaries. But where, as in this state, the trust is void, and where consequently no legal estate can ever vest in the trustees, there can be no estate in law to support the equity. The whole trust is void. The legislature has prohibited a trust to convey. It has declared such a trust to be void. It has forbidden the separation of the equitable from the legal interest by this mode, and a court can no more say that the equitable estate under such a void trust passes to the beneficiaries, than it can say that the legal estate passes to the trustees. Such, I think, is the unanswerable argument in every jurisdiction where, as with us, a trust to convey is prohibited and declared void by express law; for, if it can be said that equitable estates may vest in the beneficiaries notwithstanding that they owe their existence to trusts prohibited by and void in law, it can only mean that the legislative inhibition against certain trusts is made utterly vain and nugatory. If the trust violates the rule against restraints on alienation, for example, as in the Walkerly Case, the solution then would be not, as there declared, that, the trust being void, all estates, legal and equitable, attempted to be created, were likewise void, but rather that, notwithstanding the trust is void, it is plain what the testator intended, and it will be held that equitable estates passed to the beneficiaries, by reason of which they will be permitted to draw to themselves the legal title. Such, of course, cannot be the law.

To uphold the terms of the will, as creating a power in trust, presents equally formidable obstacles: First, because the testator's plain and obvious intent, it seems to me, was to create, not a power, but an explicit trust; but, if that point be waived, still the power is a power in trust, and it either must be held that the repeal of powers in trust by the legislature of this state abolished any such power if it did exist, or else that notwithstanding the declaration of section 847, Civ. Code, that uses and trusts in relation to real property are those only which are specified in this title, powers in trust, as known to the common law, with all their labyrinthal difficulties and sinuosities, are in full force and effect with us, and that, while the legislature has, at great pains, simplified trusts and estates, it has designedly and intentionally perpetuated the most intricate and difficult subject of common-law and equity cognizance, and, through powers in trust, has preserved all the difficulties which it attempted to eliminate in dealing with trusts. It is unquestionable that it was because powers at common law were abstruse and full of uncertainty that the New York codifiers recommended the abolition of all not expressly declared and reserved. Jennings v. Conboy, 73 N. Y. 233. The design was to simplify the cumbersome system which had grown up at common law. Our own code commission followed the example of New York, and adopted bodily their proposed scheme. As part of this scheme were the following sections:

Civ. Code 1874, § 860: "Where an express trust in relation to real property is created for any purpose not enumerated in the preceding sections, such trust vests no estate in the trustees; but the trust, if directing or authorizing the performance of any act which may be lawfully performed under a power, is valid as a power in trust, subject to the provisions in relation to such powers contained in title V of this part."

Civ. Code 1874, § 861: "Nothing in this title prevents the creation of a power in trust for any of the purposes for which an express trust may be created."

Civ. Code 1874, § 862: "In every case where a trust is valid as a power in trust, the real property to which the trust relates remains in, or passes by succession to, the persons otherwise entitled, subject to the execution of the trust as a power in trust."

They were properly placed, under the chapter on "Uses and Trusts," which begins with the declaration that "uses and trusts in relation to real property are those only which are specified in this chapter," for powers in trust are trusts. As Sugden says, "Powers, as we have seen, are mere declarations of trust" (Sugd. Powers, p. 119); and Lord Hardwicke declared that "such powers [where any person other than the holder has an interest in its execution] ought rather to be called 'trusts' than 'powers.'" 1 Perry, Trusts, § 248. These sections were repealed with other sections, and, recommending their repeal, our learned codifiers reported to the legislature as follows: "We have proposed to strike out the whole chapter on 'Powers,' as wholly unsuited both to the wants and habits of the people, retaining one or two sections by amendment of other portions of the Code in places where the provisions of those sections properly belong." What, then, was the effect of these repeals? Can it be said that they meant the revivification of the abstruse common-law system? Can it be fairly argued that that incomprehensible scheme was better suited to the wants and habits of our people than the simpler one taken from New York, and by us afterwards abolished? And if this was in the mind of the revisers and legislature, and, if in their contemplation, the common-law system was revived by these repeals, why, in expunging those sections, were they so careful to preserve, and to report their preservation of, certain other necessary powers? The re-enactment of these carefully preserved powers was unnecessary, because they were existent common-law powers. Can any other conclusion logically be reached than that the repeal meant, not the restoration of common-law powers, but a further simplification and advance over even the New York system, by the abolition of many of the powers which that state had preserved, and the perpetuation of only such as were considered suitable to the simpler wants and habits of the people of this state?

But, if it be conceded that common-law powers in trust do exist in this state, still another difficulty confronts us. In England there would not be, and never has been, any occasion to resort to a power in trust to save a will like this; for the trust to convey would be valid and operative as a legal, active trust. The English courts uniformly and unhesitatingly have upheld such wills as creating valid trusts. What those courts might do if their law declared such trusts illegal—whether they would convert the trust into a power in trust, and thus uphold it—is a question that, as it has never been asked of them, it would be mere speculation to declare what their answer might be. As the necessity never arose at common law for declaring that such language created a power in trust, there is no common-law decision to act as guide. And this was appreciated in New York, where such trusts, as here, are admittedly void, and are saved only by force of their enabling statute,—a statute which we have not, and which effectuates the void trust under an express grant of power. That the void trust may still be treated as valid to the extent that the testator must be held to have prescribed the persons or class to whom the property shall go upon the failure or termination of the trust (Civ. Code, § 864) is, to my mind, also an untenable proposition. There is never, or seldom, any difficulty in determining to whom or in whom the testator or settlor means that his trust property shall descend or vest upon the termination of the trust; but it does not follow from this that, because in indicating this intent he has prescribed an unlawful means for its accomplishment, the result will be assured without regard to the mode. In the case of trusts that violate the rule of restraints on alienation, there is never any doubt to whom the testator meant that the remainder or reversion should go; but in such cases no court has ever selected the designated beneficiaries, and declared that, notwithstanding the fact that their sole claim to title is through a void trust, nevertheless the testator has sufficiently indicated that upon the failure of the trust the trust property is to go to them, and, the trust having failed, they shall take at once. There was no difficulty in the Case of the Estate of Walkerly in determining to whom the testator meant that the land should go; but the thought was never entertained that after failure of the trust these persons should still be regarded within the testator's intent as prescribed and designated by him, to take in the event of the failure of the trust. There, as here, they were to take in conformity with the terms of the trust, or they could not take at all. So that, if it be considered in this case that there was an attempt to prescribe the class, it was an attempt either by a void trust or an unauthorized power in trust; and, if the mode be invalid, the heirs may not be disturbed in their rights. In Estate of Walkerly it is said: "A testator must do more than merely evince an intention to disinherit, before the heir's right of succession can be cut off. He must make a valid disposition of his property." We cannot in this case, more than in any other, substitute a valid method for the invalid one so plainly designated.

For reasons amplified in the preceding opinions, it seems apparent that the failure of the trust to convey defeats the testator's trust scheme. It leaves the whole beneficial interest and the whole reversion in his children living at the time of his death,—a result essentially and radically at variance with that which he sought to accomplish. The consequence, then, in these particulars, is the same as though he had died intestate. The property will descend to his heirs at law, as provided by the rules of succession in this state, so that those who are the immediate and direct offspring of his blood will succeed by inheritance. For these reasons, I concur in the judgment.

TEMPLE, J. I dissent. Convinced that powers have not been prohibited in this state, but that the right to create them is unlimited, I am not able to read the will as my associates do. In the first place, I see no force in the proposition that we must first construe the will as though trusts to convey were not prohibited, and then enforce the prohibition ruthlessly. All contracts, all conveyances, and other instruments in writing are to be construed with reference to the laws in force where they were made, and with the idea constantly in mind that they were made in view of such laws, and to be enforced under them. If we fail to do this, we do not place ourselves in the position of the contracting parties, and could not expect to understand the language found. They are presumed to know the law, and to have ordered their affairs with reference to it. There is no reason why this universal requirement to presume that parties contract in view of the law should be relaxed as to wills unless we seek for a pretext to avoid them. If there is any difference, the reason for applying the rule to the construction of wills is more cogent. They are generally more deliberately prepared, and are to be executed by others than the persons who made them, and usually there are those who would gladly defeat their execution. The testator can rely only upon positive law for its execution. I think, then, since a trust to convey cannot be created in this state, and a power in trust for that purpose is perfectly valid, that the obvious intent of the testator, as shown by the clear language of the will, was to convey to his trustees a life estate only, and that the direction to his trustees, "upon the death of such survivor to transfer and convey," was intended as a power in trust. The language is certainly as appropriate and apt for the creation of a power as for a direction to execute a trust. If the eminent counsel for respondents could believe that powers can be created under our laws, I cannot doubt but they would have so construed it. This proposition once admitted, in my opinion, the language of the will cannot be understood in any other way. The will having been probated, all presumptions are in favor of testacy and against intestacy. The presumptions in favor of the heirs then cease. The duty of the courts then is to so construe the will, if in reason it can be, as to prevent intestacy, total or partial. Keeping in view, therefore, these propositions, to wit, that the testator knew that a trust to convey cannot be created in this state, and that a power in trust can be, and also that an estate in trust cannot be created for a period unmeasured by lives in being, let us read the will. It is, in effect: "I give my estate to trustees in trust for the following uses and purposes: That is to say, to have and to hold the same in trust during the lives of my children and of the survivor of them, and upon the death of such survivor to transfer and convey," etc. "In trust, further, during the lives of my children and of the survivor, to manage and control the said trust property and estate." Here it is expressly declared that the purpose of the trust is that his trustees shall hold the estate during the mentioned lives, and during such lives, and only for that period, the trustees are expressly authorized to manage and control, to collect rents, etc. There are no further duties as trustees, and no further authority save to transfer and convey at the termination of the trust. This authority has all the attributes of a power, although it might also have been appropriate as a direction to trustees had not such trusts been prohibited. Being equally appropriate for both, if one course is unlawful and the other lawful, we must presume the testator meant to do that which only he could lawfully do. Nor do I see how the express declaration that the trustees shall hold during the lives of his children can be regarded otherwise than as also containing the condition that they shall not hold beyond that time, and this is rendered more plausible by the fact that such limitation was required to make the trust legal. The power was to be executed eo instanti upon the death of the survivor. If not then executed, the persons and the interests to be conveyed were ascertained. At that instant, if not before, the entire estate became alienable. I understand respondents to contend that the direction to hold during the lives of the children of the testator is a mode of indicating when the conveyances are to be made. But it seems to me the only purpose of the trust was to deprive his children of all power to control, manage, or dispose of his estate, while enjoying the profits thereof, and to deprive the children of his son of all interest in it. All this was accomplished by the life trust. The direction to convey was adopted as a mode of ending the trust; so the estate then passed to the beneficiaries in full property, the purpose of the testator in that regard was accomplished.

To repeat: We cannot doubt that the testator desired to accomplish these ends: First, to provide ample revenue for each of his children during his or her life; second, to prevent the descendants of his son from inheriting any part of his estate; third, upon the death of all his children to give one half of his estate to the descendants of his daughters, and the other half to his brothers and sisters and their descendants. Aside from some special legacies these are all, or the main, purposes sought to be accomplished. This can all be done without violating any law, and without giving an unnatural or strained construction to any language contained in the will. This will be admitted if the concession be made that it was competent for him to create a power.

Originally, in the second division of the Civil Code, part 2, tit. 4, treated of "Uses and Trusts," and title 5 of "Powers." Title 4 commenced with section 847: "Uses and trusts in relation to real property are those only which are specified in this title." Title 5 began: "Sec. 878. Powers in relation to real property are those only which are specified in this title." It is not contended that title 4 conferred upon any one the power to create uses and trusts. The sole purpose of the provisions originally found in that title was to limit and restrict the power of the owners of real property in that regard. This intent is manifest. And similarly title 5 was an express limitation upon the power of the owners of real property. The language, powers "are those only which are specified," is not a vesting of authority to do that which before could not be done. It is an express restriction. I understand this to be admitted, as, indeed, it must be. The two titles were parts of one statute, which recognized the right to create uses and trusts and powers, and limited such rights or authority to certain specified purposes. Two years afterwards the legislature repealed title 5. So far as affects this matter, the language of the repealing clause is only, "Title V is repealed." Two sections were retained, however, by being transferred to the title in regard to trusts. Section 900 was re-enacted as section 860, without the change of a word, and section 895 was re-enacted as section 858. Section 860 provides for the event of the death of one of several donees of a power. Section 858 provides for a power of sale in a mortgagee. This is the only instance in the Code, as it now exists, where any power is expressly authorized. The reason for this authorization is not far to seek. Supposing the right to create powers to be in all other respects unlimited, the right to create such a power, but for this section, would be forbidden by the policy in this state in regard to mortgages, which is that the mortgagee shall have, whatever the form of his contract may be, the right of redemption. This section declares an exception to that rule, and hence its necessity. Other sections recognize the existence of powers, but cannot be considered as authorizing them. Section 860 I have referred to. By section 781, a power of appointment does not prevent a future estate limited to take effect in case such power is not executed. This does not authorize any power, but regulates the effect. It does not state the purpose of the supposed power, except that it must refer to a power to convey land. Section 1229 refers to a case where power to modify or revoke an instrument affecting real property is reserved to the grantor or given to another. The section assumes the right to create such power, and states its effect in certain cases. Section 1330 refers to a power to devise. It assumes the existence of the power, and states one case in which the power shall be deemed executed. Not a word in the section can be construed as authorizing such a power. These provisions existed when title 5 was in the Code, and should have gone with it if the repeal of that section was to be deemed the abolition of powers. If, on the other hand, the repeal merely did away with a restriction upon the right to create powers, they are still properly in the Code, and have their proper use. It seems to be argued that the title on "Powers" was in reality an exception to the prohibition of uses and trusts contained in title 4, and that powers are trusts. For many reasons, this cannot be so. Section 648 forbids this construction. All trusts which could be created were specified in that title. Powers were not there specified, but were in the same statute regulated, and limited in another title. I suppose all will admit that title 4 has reference only to real property held in trust for certain purposes.* And it will not be contended that a power is real property, or that in an instrument creating the power any interest is conveyed to the donee of the power. The donee of a power has no estate or interest in land, legal or equitable. And in this state there need be no equitable estate in any one, either in the creation or the execution of a power. An example of this is the case of an executor. He may be the donee of a power to sell land and may execute it, but no equitable estate need be created in any one. Morffew v. Railroad Co., 107 Cal. 587, 40 Pac. 810. Section 857, it must be confessed, did not, when it was first passed, prohibit powers; for the use of powers was regulated in the same statute. How can a new meaning be put into it, then, by a statute which does not refer to it or the title in which it is found, and only says of title 5, "It is repealed"? Legislative policy can only be deduced from some language used by the legislature. The whole argument consists in denunciations of uses and trusts and powers, as though powers were part of the same thing, and in contending that the legislature would not strictly limit trusts and leave powers at large. It did once restrict the use of powers, and then repealed the statute, in the face of section 4468, Pol. Code. In so doing it declared that the common law of England would furnish the rule upon the subject. Certain expressions of law writers are cited in which powers are declared to be trusts. Of course, powers, when given to be executed in the interest of another, are trusts. The power of an ordinary agent is a trust, and he holds it in trust for another. A public office has been said to be a public trust. A power in trust is a trust in the same precise sense, and in no other. Will any one contend that these are the sort of trusts dealt with in title 4?

But it is contended that powers cannot exist in this state, for we have no statute of uses, and a power was but the right to appoint a use, which, under the statute, drew to it the legal title. I presume it was never contended before that powers did not exist at common law, and most likely the learned counsel for respondents do not wish to be understood as contending for that proposition. If they did not exist at common law, when were they authorized? Certainly not by the statute of uses. That statute recognized that they were in common use as to equitable estates, and its purpose was to crush out both trusts and powers. If the right to create a power did not exist, one could not have been made to dispose of equitable estates. Why were they efficacious as to equitable estates and of no avail as to legal estates, and how did the statute enable the landowner to dispose of freehold estates through the medium of a power? No doubt, powers, as known to the profession, are those which depended for their efficacy upon the statute of uses; and the reason why, in England, powers depended for their efficacy upon the statute of uses, was because of the restrictions upon conveyancing which existed at common law. This is most conclusively and elaborately shown by Sugden in the introduction to his work on Powers. It was not only or principally because a freehold estate could be created only by livery of seisin, or by some other solemn and public transfer, but because freehold estates could not be created to commence in futuro; nor could a power be reserved to the grantor, or given to any other person, to limit the estate or create any charge upon it in derogation of the estates created by the original feoffment. The author proceeds to show some devices resorted to at common law, and how, by changing the beneficiary interest into mere equities, almost perfect freedom of alienation was attained, and then how by the statute of uses almost a like freedom of alienation resulted as to freehold estates; and finally he sums up the effect of the statute upon conveyancing in the following words, which are not altogether in accord with the vehement denunciation of trusts and powers by the learned counsel for respondents: "The statute is generally considered as having had only the effect of enabling the conveyancer to shift the legal estate from one to another by mere words, in a way which ill accorded with the common law, but is excellently adapted to the increased opulence of the country. It, however, also gave legal effect to modifications of property which were repugnant to the common law, but are admirably suited to the varying wants and wishes of mankind. It has, moreover, had the beneficial operation of introducing an unrivaled code of equitable jurisprudence, which every admirer of the law of real property must wish forever to remain sacred and unconfounded with the strict rules of law. In comparing what the statute was intended to perform with what it actually has performed, one can hardly doubt that almost any other legislative measure which opposed the confirmed habits of the people in disposing of their property would have led to the same results. This should operate as a lesson to the legislature not vainly to oppose the current of general opinion; for, although diverted for a time, it will ultimately regain its old channel in spite of accumulated acts of parliament, which become a dead letter, and have a strong tendency to bring the most wholesome laws into disrepute." I repeat, therefore, that powers were not created by the statute of uses, but as they existed in England they depended for their efficacy upon the statute, because, and only because, by means of that statute they were relieved from the restrictions upon alienation which existed at common law; and, of course, where these restrictions do not exist, no statute is needed to give efficacy to powers. It is not a matter of interest to inquire whether everything could be done here under a power which could have been accomplished in England after the statute of uses. Doubtless the use of powers is subject to the restrictions which exist in this state upon conveyancing, and in this case to all limitations upon testamentary disposition of property. The direction in this will is to convey to ascertained persons, upon the expiration of a lawful trust, definite and fixed interests in the estate which had been the subject of the trust. The estates to be conveyed were present estates in fee simple. No reason occurs to me why such a power should be held invalid.

I do not deem it necessary to discuss at length the assumed implication from the authority given the executors in paragraph 17 to sell property. That cannot affect my argument that the testator intended to confer upon his executors a power in trust. If the estate in fee did pass to the executors to enable them to sell, surely the power ended upon the death of the surviving child, and then the estate of the trustees would necessarily end. There is nothing inconsistent in regarding them as trustees for the purposes of the lawful trust, and donees of a power to convey the property when the trust estate ends. I have only to add that I still concur with Mr. Justice HARRISON in the view that the will may also be maintained as a direct devise, if powers do not exist in this state.

HARRISON, J. I dissent from the order of affirmance upon the grounds stated in the opinion given by me at the former hearing of the cause. I also concur in the foregoing opinion of Mr. Justice TEMPLE.

BEATTY, C. J. (dissenting). A careful consideration of the arguments advanced upon the rehearing of this case has convinced me that the opinion which I formerly expressed requires modification, and especially that my conclusion that the intent of the testator might be given effect as a direct devise of the remainder cannot be sustained upon the concession that the only means chosen by him for effecting the transfer was unlawful. There are decisions which sustain, and others which in their expressions seem to sustain, such a conclusion; but I am satisfied that the weight of authority is the other way, and that, whenever it appears that a testator has attempted to transfer his estate by a method clearly unlawful, the attempt must fail. His lawful intention cannot be carried into effect by disregarding the unlawful means chosen by him for its accomplishment. It therefore becomes essential for me, in order to reach a conclusion in the case, to determine the question which in my former opinion was treated as unimportant. That question, as it presents itself to my mind, may be stated thus: If in the creation of a valid testamentary trust the testator directs and empowers his trustees upon the termination of the trust to convey the remainder, is that an unlawful means of transferring the property to the objects of his bounty? A trust to convey is, of course, forbidden by statute; and, if the will of Senator Fair attempts to create a trust to convey, it must, at least to that extent, fail. If his grandchildren and brothers and sisters can take only through the medium of such unlawful trust, they cannot take at all. But to me it seems a misuse of terms to say that this is a trust to convey. It is a perfectly valid trust for other purposes and for a lawful term. The conveyance which the trustees are directed to make at the termination of the trust is a mere incident. I still adhere to my original opinion that although, upon its more obvious construction, the will was designed to create an invalid trust to convey, in addition to the valid trust or trusts, it is nevertheless susceptible of a construction more favorable to testacy, which for that reason it is our duty to adopt. I still think it can be construed as a devise to the trustees of a life estate only, with an added power to convey the remainder; and I am not shaken in this opinion by the argument so much insisted upon in the opinion of the court,—that an estate in fee in the trustees was essential to enable them to carry out the evident purposes of the testator. If he could create a lawful power to convey, as distinct from a trust to convey, the trustees could, under such power, not only transfer and convey the remainder to the grandchildren and brothers and sisters, but they could also sell and convey, and reinvest the proceeds of, any of the property embraced in the trust, as by one clause of the will they were authorized and empowered to do. In Morffew v. Railroad Co., 107 Cal. 587, 40 Pac. 810, it was held by this court that the donee of a testamentary power could make an effectual conveyance of an estate in which she had no interest. It is true that the power in that case would have been lawful as a trust, and the case is only cited to prove that this court has heretofore approved the doctrine—which it would seem difficult to deny—that an estate may be conveyed under a power as effectively as by a trustee in whom the estate is vested. It only remains, therefore, to inquire whether, under the laws of California, it is competent for the creator of a trust, whether by will or deed, to empower his trustee, at the expiration of the trust term, and upon the completion of his trust duties, to transfer and convey the property to the person or persons to whom the grantor or testator desires it to go. Unless such power is denied or forbidden by positive law, there is no conceivable reason why it should be held unlawful. It contravenes no policy declared or implied in any of the statutory law of the state, and is sanctioned by the most elementary principles of the common law. It is one mode, and a perfectly natural, just, and unobjectionable mode, of doing what is expressly authorized by section 864 of the Civil Code, with reference to which I can only repeat what I said in my former opinion. Upon these grounds, I dissent from the judgment of affirmance.

COOPER, C. This is an application by the board of railroad commissioners of the state of California for a writ of mandate to compel the defendant corporation to produce to the plaintiffs, and to permit plaintiffs to examine, the books, records, and papers of said corporation. The court below refused the writ, and ordered the action dismissed, and judgment was accordingly entered. This appeal is from the judgment. The question to be here determined is as to whether or not the defendant corporation is subject to the supervision of plaintiffs, under the provisions of an act of the legislature entitled "An act to organize and define the powers of the board of railroad commissioners," approved April 15, 1880 (St. 1880, p. 45). The constitution provides for and defines the duties and jurisdiction of the railroad commissioners. Article 12, § 22. The language is: "The state shall be divided into three districts as nearly equal in population as practicable, in each of which one railroad commissioner shall be elected. * * * Said commissioners shall have the power and it shall be their duty to establish rates of charges for the transportation of passengers and freight by railroad and other transportation companies." Do the words, "railroad and other transportation companies," include a street-railway company in a municipality engaged in the business of carrying passengers on street-railroad cars? In order to correctly determine this question, we must look to the words used, the context, the object in view, and the evils that were intended to be remedied. In this manner we should, if possible, arrive at the intention of the convention in using the words, and give to them the same meaning and effect as was intended by the people through their representatives in framing the constitution.

It is a matter of common knowledge that among the evils, or supposed evils, under which the people of the state were suffering, and for which they demanded redress, was that of exorbitant and discriminating charges by railroad corporations engaged in transportation of freight and passengers. The political agitation of the times resulted in calling a constitutional convention, and the people, through their representatives, framing the present constitution, in 1879, which was afterwards, in the same year, adopted by the people by the expression of their will at the ballot box. The constitution in no place mentions street-railroad corporations, although there were many such corporations in existence at the time it was framed. The

OF CALIFORNIA et al. v. MARKET ST. RY. CO. et al. (S. F. 2,034.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 15, 1901.)
STREET RAILROADS—RAILROAD COMMISSION—JURISDICTION—CONSTITUTIONAL INTERPRETATION.

1. Const. art. 12, § 22, defining the judgment and jurisdiction of the railroad commission, and authorizing it to establish rates of charges for the transportation of passengers and freight by railroad and other transportation companies, does not give the commission jurisdiction and control over street-railroad companies, since such companies are not railroad or transportation companies, within the meaning of the act.

2. A legislative interpretation of a constitutional provision contemporaneous with its adoption may be considered by the courts in an interpretation of a doubtful provision thereof.

Temple, J., dissenting.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Application for a writ of mandate by the board of railroad commissioners and others

Civil Code of the state, at the time, in title 3, §§ 454-491, contained many provisions in regard to "railroad corporations," and in title 4, §§ 497-511, treated of and provided for "street-railroad corporations." Those sections of the Code so treating railroad corporations and street-railroad corporations, under separate and distinct titles, had long been a part of the law of the state. Therefore we must presume that the convention, in which there were many lawyers of ability, knew that the two classes of corporations had long been known by the legal profession, and treated by the people through their legislatures as separate and distinct,—the one being engaged in the commercial business of carrying freight and passengers over the quasi public ways from one part of the state to another; the other, in carrying passengers only in the larger municipalities of the state; the one obtaining its franchise from the state, the other, from the municipal authorities of the town or city in which it was carrying on its business. It is therefore a significant fact that no mention is made in the constitution of "street-railway corporations," and we cannot resist the conclusion that such omission was not unintentional. There was no public demand for the regulation of fares of street railways in municipalities. The convention consisted of delegates chosen from all parts of the state. In the section of the constitution quoted the power is given to establish rates for passengers and freight. And it is further provided that "the rates of fares and freights" established by the said commission shall be conclusively deemed just and reasonable. It is further provided, in section 23 of the same article, that the state shall be divided into three "railroad districts," naming the counties in each district. This is consistent with the idea that the entire people of the state were interested in the great corporations engaged in the carrying of freight and passengers from one portion of the state to another, or from sister states into or through the state.

It is inconsistent with the idea that the entire people of the state were interested in the rates for carrying passengers within the corporate limits of a town or municipality. It was the policy of the constitution that such matters as concerned the inhabitants of a particular subdivision of the state or county should be governed as far as practicable by local laws. That the people of the state, through their representatives, understood the said sections of the constitution not to apply to street-railroad corporations, is apparent from the contemporaneous construction given to them by the legislature in the act providing for the organization and defining the powers of the railroad commission, approved April 15, 1880, before cited. This act was passed for the purpose of providing machinery to carry into effect the constitutional provision creating the railroad commission. It was passed at the first meeting of the legislature after the constitution was adopted, and by the representatives of the people who had been elected for the purpose of providing for carrying it into effect. In this act it is provided in section 14: "The term 'transportation companies' shall be deemed to mean and include—First. All companies owning and operating railroads (other than street railroads) within this state. Second. All companies owning and operating steamships engaged in the transportation of freight or passengers from and to ports within this state. Third. All companies owning and operating steamboats used in transporting freight or passengers upon the rivers or inland waters of this state."

It will thus be seen that street railroads are expressly excepted from the act. While the interpretation given to the act by the legislature is not controlling upon this court as to the meaning of a provision of the constitution, yet, where it is doubtful, the courts may, very properly, look to the contemporaneous interpretation given such provision, either by the legislature or the courts. Particularly is this the case where that interpretation has been upon the statute books unchallenged for 20 years. The interpretation placed upon the constitution by the legislature of 1880 has ever since been acquiesced in, and legislation has been in accord with such interpretation. Thus, the legislature by an act approved March 23, 1893 (St. 1893, p. 288), made provision, among other things, for granting of franchises to operate railroads along public streets and highways by the board of supervisors or common council, only after public notice by advertising in one or more daily newspapers and then to the highest bidder. Again, on March 13, 1897 (St. 1897, p. 135), it was enacted that a franchise to construct or operate street railroads, except steam railroads, upon any public street or highway, shall be granted by the governing or legislative body of the city or town, only after public notice by advertising, as provided in said act, to the highest bidder, for a stated per cent. of the gross annual receipts, which shall in no case be less than three per cent. of such receipts. Thus, under the interpretation given to the act, and as it always appears to have been interpreted by the legislature, franchises for street railroads have been granted and rights have accrued. In the case of Stuart v. Laird, 1 Cranch, 299, 2 L. Ed. 115, the constitutional objection was made that the judges of the supreme court had no right to sit as circuit judges, not being appointed as such, nor having commissions for that purpose. In passing upon the question the supreme court of the United States said: "To this objection, which is of recent date, it is sufficient to observe that practice and acquiescence under it for a period of several years, commencing with the organization of the judicial system, affords an irresistible answer, and has indeed fixed the construction. It is a contemporary interpretation of the most forcible nature. This practical exposition is too strong and obstinate to be shaken or controlled. Of course, the question is at rest, and ought not now to be disturbed." In End. Interp. St. § 527, it is said: "The greatest deference is shown by the courts to the interpretation put upon the constitution by the legislature, in the enactment of laws and other practical application of constitutional provisions to the legislative business, when that interpretation has had the silent acquiescence of the people, including the legal profession and the judiciary, and especially when injurious results would follow the disturbing of it. The deference due to such legislative exposition is said to be all the more signal when the latter is made almost contemporaneously with the establishment of the constitution, and may be supposed to result from the same views of policy and modes of reasoning that prevailed among the framers of the instrument thus expounded." This court said in Re Warfield's Will, 22 Cal. 71, 83 Am. Dec. 58: "Courts feel themselves constrained to uphold, where it is possible, contemporaneous interpretation of statutes, under which interpretation rights of property have for many years been acquired." In the case of Manufacturing Co. v. Ferguson, 113 U. S. 733, 5 Sup. Ct. 741, 28 L. Ed. 1138, in speaking of an act of the legislature as interpreting a provision of the constitution of Colorado, the court said: "The act was passed by the first legislature that assembled after the adoption of the constitution, and has been allowed to remain upon the statute book to the present time. It must, therefore, be considered as a contemporary interpretation entitled to much weight."

But, independent of the contemporaneous interpretation so given to the constitution by the legislature, we think the interpretation correct, and that the words "railroad company" were not intended to mean street railway. In the ordinary acceptance of the term "railroad company" or "railroad," it is not understood to mean a street railway engaged in the business of carrying passengers the entire distance, or any part of the distance, over which the road runs, for one and the same fare. In the late case of Ferguson v. Sherman, 116 Cal. 169, 47 Pac. 1023, this court had under consideration a provision of the constitution of Kansas exempting from statutory liability the stockholders of railroad corporations, and it was held that the provision did not extend to stockholders of the Electric Rapid-Transit Company, which was a street-railway corporation. In the opinion it is said: "It is not so easy to believe that the purpose of that constitution was to exempt from liability the stockholders of street railways, which are designed merely to facilitate travel and communication upon the public highways of a municipality. * * * In this state the difficulty is much relieved by the distinction which our

Codes make between railroad corporations proper and street-railroad corporations. This consideration, however, is entitled to weight, * * * and we therefore conclude that the provision of the constitution of Kansas was not designed to apply to stockholders of street-railroad corporations." In Gyger v. Railway Co., 136 Pa. 96, 20 Atl. 399, it was held by the supreme court of Pennsylvania that section 4, art. 17, of the constitution of the state, providing that "no railroad, canal, or other corporation * * * shall consolidate * * * with or lease or purchase the works or franchises of, or in any way control, any other railroad or canal corporation owning * * * a parallel or competing line," is not applicable to street-railway companies. In the opinion it is said: "It is perfectly clear that the convention did not regard the word 'railroad' as synonymous with 'railway' or 'street passenger railway' when this section of the article was framed." In Louisville & P. R. Co. v. Louisville City Ry. Co., 2 Duv. 175, it was held by the court of appeals of Kentucky that a provision in a railroad charter that no other railroad should be constructed between two named points in a city did not prohibit the construction of street railways. In the opinion the court said: "A railroad is for the use of the universal public, in the transportation of all persons, baggage, and other freight; a street railway is dedicated to the more limited use of the local public, for the more transient transportation of persons only and within the limits of the city. In the technical sense, therefore, a street railway is not a railroad." In Bloxham v. Railroad Co., 36 Fla. 539, 18 South. 446, 29 L. R. A. 509, it is said: "The word 'railroad,' as generally used, applies to commercial railways engaged in the transportation of freight and passengers for long distances, and, as a general rule, having steam engines for motive power, and making stops at regular stations for the receipt and discharge of freight and passengers. The term 'street railroad' applies only to such roads the rails of which are laid to conform to the grade and surface of the street, and which is otherwise constructed so that the public are not excluded from the street as a public highway, which runs at a moderate rate of speed compared with commercial railroads, which carries no freight, but only passengers from one part of a thickly-populated district to another in a town or city and its suburbs." In Trust Co. v. Douglas, 104 Iowa, 536, 73 N. W. 1040, in a very late case it is said: "The words 'railroad' and 'railway' may undoubtedly be so used as to mean a street railway, but by popular usage, when used without qualifying words, they are understood to refer to commercial railways; the word 'street' being almost invariably used in connection with 'railway' to designate a street railway." The same has been substantially held in other states in the discussion of the various uses of the words "railroad" and "street railway." Funk v. Railway Co., 61 Minn. 435, 63 N. W. 1099, 29 L. R. A. 208; Sears v. Railway Co. (Iowa) 23 N. W. 150; Railway Co. v. Johnson (Wash.) 25 Pac. 1084, 11 L. R. A. 693. And the same rule has been laid down in the federal courts. Manhattan Trust Co. v. Sioux City Cable R. Co. (C. C.) 68 Fed. 82; Trust Co. v. Hamilton, 32 C. C. A. 46, 88 Fed. 588; 1 Foote & E. Incorp. Co. p. 668, note 5.

It is claimed that the words, "other transportation companies," include street-railway companies. We think, by reference to the context and other sections of the same article, it clearly appears that the words refer to transportation companies engaged in the business of common carriers of freight and passengers. The section refers to and speaks of "the rates of fares and freight" established by the commission. And in section 21 of the same article it is provided: "No discrimination in charges or facilities for transportation shall be made by any railroad or other transportation company between places or persons or in the facilities for the transportation of the same classes of freight or passengers within this state, or coming from or going to any other state." In section 20 reference is made to the consequences of lowering rates "for transportation of passengers or freight from one point to another." Companies engaged in draying, running freight wagons, delivery wagons, delivering parcels, teaming, or running elevators, are engaged in the business of "transportation," but it surely could not be contended that they are subject to the jurisdiction of the "railroad commission." The people of the state would not have agreed to pay the salaries and expenses of the railroad commissioners selected from different geographical sections of the state for the purpose of regulating the charges of the "United Carriage Company" of San Francisco. Yet it is a transportation company. It clearly is not a transportation company whose "fares and freights" are subject to regulation by the railroad commissioners of the state. It follows that the judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; GRAY, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is affirmed.

TEMPLE, J. (dissenting). This is an appeal from a judgment refusing a mandate to compel the corporate defendant to produce for the inspection of the plaintiffs its books, records, and other papers. The plaintiffs claim the right to inspect said records under their authority as railroad commissioners conferred by section 22, art. 12, of the state constitution. They do not contend that any such power is given by the act of the legislature defining the powers of the board passed April 15, 1880. Section 22, art. 12, provides for the formation of the districts, each to elect one commissioner, the commissioners to be qualified electors of the district, and not interested in any railroad corporation or other transportation company; and then said commissioners shall have the power, and it shall be their duty, to establish rates of charges for the transportation of passengers and freight by railroad or other transportation companies, and publish the same from time to time, with such changes as they may make; to examine the books, records, and papers of all railroad and other transportation companies; and for this purpose they shall have power to issue subpoenas and all other necessary process; to hear and determine complaints against railroad and other transportation companies; to send for persons and papers; to administer oaths, take testimony, and punish for contempt of their orders and processes in the same manner and to the same extent as courts of record, and enforce their decisions and correct abuses through the medium of the courts. Said commissioners shall prescribe a uniform system of accounts to be kept by all such corporations and companies. Any railroad or transportation company which shall fail or refuse to conform to such rates as shall be established by such commissioners, or shall charge rates in excess thereof, or shall fail to keep their accounts in accordance with the system prescribed by the commission, shall be fined, etc. It was further declared that the legislature may confer such further power on the commissioners as shall be necessary to enable them to perform the duties enjoined upon them by the constitution.

The question here is whether the jurisdiction of the commissioners, as thus defined, extends to street railroads. That the phrase, "railroad and other transportation companies," does include street railroads in its natural and most obvious sense, and also by common usage of the words, is not and cannot be denied. The phrase is repeated five times in the section, and nowhere is there a suggestion that anything comprehended in the phrase is to be excluded, and the constant repetition of the more extensive accompanying term, as though fearing and desiring to forestall an adverse construction which might limit the usefulness of the commission, is significant of a determination that there should be no doubt as to the extent of the power of the board. The five preceding sections of the article are upon the same general subject, and each contains the same or an equivalent phrase. The slight change in verbiage, while still showing an effort to comprehend all engaged in the transportation business, makes that effort still more evident. In section 17, all railroad, canal, and other transportation companies are declared to be common carriers, and subject to legislative control. Certainly this may well apply to street railroads. Section 18 prohibits the officers and employes of railroads and canal companies from being interested personally in certain affairs of such companies. No reason is perceivable why this should not apply to street railroads. It includes them as railroads. Section 19 prohibits free passes to certain officials by railroads or other transportation companies. It has always been supposed that this provision applies to street railroads. Section 20 declares that no railroad company or other common carrier shall combine, etc. The phrase "other common carrier" is used instead of "other transportation companies," and is a phrase of similar import and as comprehensive. In section 21 it is provided that no discrimination shall be made by "any railroad or other transportation company." The phrase, as already stated, clearly includes within the plain and unambiguous meaning of the words "street railroads." No reason has been suggested why it should not be held to apply to them. This section is expressly referred to in section 22, and the board is expressly enjoined to enforce its provisions. If it applies to street railroads the power of the commissioners must be held to extend to them.

And so of the use of the words in all of these sections. In the nature of things, some of the rules laid down could not apply to all such companies; such, for instance, as the right given to railroad companies to make connections in certain cases, as provided in section 17. Such is the case with nearly every general law applicable to a variety of subjects. Particular provisions apply only to matters which come within their special scope, and that some provisions cannot apply to all furnishes no argument for the contention that the entire law is limited to these special matters to which they apply. Street railroads come clearly within the usual and ordinary import of the terms used. There can be no doubt as to the meaning of the words, and the constitution will be searched in vain for a qualification or limitation of the terms. "If the text be clear and distinct, no restriction upon its plain and obvious import ought to be admitted, unless the inference be irresistible." Martin v. Hunter's Lessee, 1 Wheat. 304, 4 L. Ed. 97. Street railroads are not specially mentioned, because included in the general language. If it were not intended to include them they should have been mentioned, as they were in the act of 1880 (St. 1880, p. 45). Written laws will lose their usefulness, if unequivocal terms in them can be limited to what courts may think ought to have been included.

It is said that to give the words, "and other transportation companies," any meaning whatever will lead to absurd consequences, and one must limit the term, so far as railroads are concerned, to a particular species of them, to wit, what counsel call commercial railroads, and it is said if these words mean anything there was no occasion to mention railroads at all, as they are also transportation companies. By what rule of construction are these words, repeated in section 22 five times, and in article 12 many times more, to have no effect whatever? If the words serve no other purpose, they demonstrate that the jurisdiction of the commission was not to be confined to commercial railroads, although they were thought to be the principal offenders. Their use should conclude this question. Such repetitions are quite common in statutes, going from the less to the more comprehensive. The words, "lands, tenements, and hereditaments," are often used together, although the last includes both the others.

To give these words any meaning, it is suggested, will bring under the control of the commission elevators, hacks, etc. If that be so, it will be time enough to so construe the law when a case of that kind shall arise. The question now is as to street railroads. Elevators make no charges, and hacks have always been under municipal supervision, and have not generally been owned by companies. There are reasons why the commission should not control them which do not apply to street railroads. Telegraph companies do not, in their usual acceptance of the term, carry freight or passengers. Perhaps the terms may be limited to companies which were popularly considered transportation companies when the constitution was adopted. Street-railroad companies were then, as now, so considered, and up to that time the limit of charges on street railroads had been fixed by the legislature, and not by the municipalities.

The constant repetition of the words "other transportation companies," in connection with the word "railroad," takes all force from the argument that in the popular usage the word "railroad" refers only to commercial railroads; and here, again, the use and necessity of the words is shown. Upon this subject it is only necessary to make an extract from a well-considered opinion by Judge Hawley (Trust Co. v. Hamilton, 32 C. C. A. 46, 88 Fed. 588): "The words 'railroad' and 'railway' are synonymous, and, under all ordinary circumstances, they are to be treated as without distinction of meaning. As said by Justice Green in Gyger v. Railway Co., 136 Pa. 96, 20 Atl. 399: 'When either one or the other of these words is used in a statute, and the context requires that a particular kind of road is intended, that kind of a road will be held to be the subject of the statutory provisions; but if the context contains no such direction, and either of the words is used in describing the subject-matter, the statute will be held applicable to everything which is embraced within the general sense of the words used,' etc. (citing authorities). But if the provision were conceded to be unreasonable, and to lead to absurd or unjust consequences, still if it is clear, unambiguous, and its terms are not capable of some other meaning, and no suggestion of a limitation can be found in the context, we could not set up our own ideas of policy against the clearly-expressed sovereign will.

The argument here is simply that the only meaning which can be given to the language cannot be allowed, because it leads to absurd results. Cooley says, in his work on Constitutional Limitations (page 87): "Such provisions, when free from doubt, must receive the same construction as any other. I do not say, however, that, if a clause should be found in a constitution which should appear at first blush to demand a construction leading to monstrous and absurd consequences, it might not be the duty of the court to question and cross-question such clause closely, with a view to discover in it, if possible, some other meaning more consistent with the general purposes and aim of these instruments." The language found in constitutional provisions is naturally more general than that used in statutes. The constitution only creates a government by outlines. It calls into being governmental departments, declares their functions in the most general terms, and in the same way imposes restrictions. The legislature is expected to supply details and to put the scheme into operation. A statute providing for the incorporation of railroad companies, or providing rules for running railroads, might well be expected to deal separately with steam and with street railroads. In regard to these matters there are essential differences, which might suggest that when treating specifically of street railroads they would be named as such. I am not contending that as to such matters general terms, even when not ambiguous, may not be limited by the context. Doubtless even a constitutional provision could be so limited. Here not only is there nothing in the context from which a limitation can be inferred, but extraordinary pains have been taken to prevent such a construction by the careful iteration of the enlarging phrase, whenever the word "railroad" is so used that a restriction could be asserted.

But it is said section 22, art. 12, has received a practical and contemporaneous construction by the act to organize and define the powers of the board of railroad commissioners, passed April 15, 1880. The act provides for the organization of the board, and that its members and employes, when in performance of their official duties, shall be carried free over all railroads, steamboats, etc., and in all vehicles employed in or by any railroad or other transportation company, etc.; and in section 14 that the term "transportation companies" shall be deemed to mean and include, "first, all other companies owning and operating railroads (other than street railroads) within this state." Contemporaneous construction can have no weight whatever where there is no doubt or ambiguity in the terms used, and none arises by implication from the context. This is clearly laid down by Cooley, Const. Lim. p. 80, et seq.

The authorities are carefully collected and elaborately discussed in Morris v. Wrightson, 56 N. J. Law, 126, 28 Atl. 56, 22 L. R. A. 548. It would serve no useful purpose to go over that subject, especially as I think there has been no contemporaneous or practical construction of this constitutional provision.

If the declaration that the phrase, "other transportation companies," includes all railroads except street railroads, was intended as a declaration of the meaning of the constitution, and not as a restriction upon the operation of the statute, then it was a usurpation of judicial powers. We cannot attribute such motive to the legislature, especially as the presumption is all but conclusive that the motive was merely to limit the operation of the law. There was reason for this, if the phrase in the constitution would otherwise have been construed to include street railroads. If the contrary was the natural construction, there would have been no occasion for this express restriction as to the operation of the statute. This limitation has its excuse, if it was merely intended to limit the right to free passes to railroads other than street railroads.

But the probability is that the legislature did intend to limit the action of the board by this provision. Still the presumption is conclusive, as I think, that it was not an attempt to declare the meaning of the constitutional provision. Section 22 defines with minuteness many powers which are thereby conferred upon the commissioners. No one would contend that the legislature could limit these express grants of power. The section further declares that the legislature "may confer such further powers on the commissioners as shall be necessary to enable them to perform the duties enjoined on them in this and the foregoing section." All that could be justly concluded, then, is that the legislature restricted the additional powers by them granted the commissioners to transportation companies other than street railroads. This, perhaps, they could do; more, they certainly could not. This would not be a construction of the constitution, unless the implication would be that but for the provision street railroads would be included.

But for another reason the act cannot be deemed a practical construction of section 22. The legislation did not depend for its validity upon the supposed meaning attributed to the language of section 22. If the language of the statute merely limited the operation of the statute, operating under it could not amount to a practical construction. To illustrate: In Stuart v. Laird, 1 Cranch, 299, 2 L. Ed. 115, the right of the justices of the supreme court of the United States to sit as circuit judges was called in question. An act of congress expressly authorized them so to do, and for a series of years the circuit court had been so held. The constitution was silent upon the subject. The court treated the question as though it was simply whether the justices should be specially appointed and commissioned as circuit judges. The practical construction here consisted of the fact that, if the contention were sustained, the practice for years had been illegal, and many judgments of the circuit courts were void. No such consequence would follow here. Whichever construction is adopted, the validity of no act of the commissioners will be affected. I think a similar comparison could be made with every case cited by respondents upon this point.

In re MARTI'S ESTATE.

MARTI v. ANDERSON et al. (S. F. 1,872.)
(Supreme Court of California. May 11, 1901.)

In bank. On rehearing. Reversed.

For former opinion in department, see 61 Pac. 964.

HARRISON, J. The appeal herein was originally heard in department 1, and an opinion filed therein, upon which an order was made reversing the judgment of the superior court. 61 Pac. 964. Upon the petition of the respondents a rehearing was granted, and the cause was afterwards argued before the court in bank. The opinion rendered in department is now adopted by the court in bank, and, for the reasons therein stated, the judgment is reversed, and the superior court is directed to enter a decree distributing the entire residue of the estate to the appellant.

UNION SAV. BANK v. BARRETT. (S. F. 2,580.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 11, 1901.)

ACTION—ABATEMENT—PERSONAL REPRESENTATIVE—JURISDICTION.

Code Civ. Proc. § 385, provides that an action does not abate by the death of a party if the cause of action survives. Held, that the fact that defendant in an action to foreclose a mortgage died more than a year after the commencement of the action, and before the service of summons on her, did not prevent the court from acquiring jurisdiction of her personal representative, since the cause of action did not abate, and the court had implied power to order a new summons to bring in the new party.

In bank. On rehearing. Denied.
For former opinion, see 64 Pac. 713.

PER CURIAM. Rehearing denied.

BEATTY, C. J. (concurring). In their petition for a rehearing counsel for appellant complain that the real grounds of their appeal have not been considered in the opinion affirming the judgment. The two propositions to which their argument was addressed may be stated as follows: First. That, the court never having acquired jurisdiction of Nellie Ryan, and she having died more than a year after the commencement of the action, it had become legally impossible for the court to acquire jurisdiction of her executrix; and, if so, second, that her executrix had no right or authority, by a voluntary appearance in the action, to revive against the estate a claim legally extinct. It is true that these propositions are not met by the department opinion, but I think the first—which is essential to the appellant's case—is unsound. If the action did not abate on the death of Nellie Ryan, as clearly it did not (Code Civ. Proc. § 385), the power expressly conferred upon the court to continue the proceeding against her personal representative, carried with it an implied power to order a new summons to bring in the new party. If this is a correct view of the first proposition, the second need not be considered. I concur in the order denying a rehearing.

LAND v. CLARK. (Sac. 818.)

ELECTIONS—STATEMENT OF EXPENSES—FORFEITURE OF OFFICE.

Purity of Elections Act (St. 1893, p. 15) section 4, declares that one elected to an office shall forfeit it if he neglects to file a statement of election expenses, as prescribed by section 3, which provides that he shall give an itemized statement, showing in detail all moneys expended by him in aid of his election, giving the names of persons to whom such moneys were paid, and the specific nature of each item; and section 13 provides that on the trial under the act of the right to an office, if it appear that the offenses complained of were trivial, unimportant, and limited in character, the candidate shall not be deprived of his office by reason thereof. Held, that an election was not rendered void by the candidate putting down as a single item, "Sundries and incidentals, $22.65;" the statute providing that the candidate may expend $100 for necessary incidentals, and dispensing with vouchers for expenditures in amounts less than $5.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; Matt F. Johnson, Judge.

Action by William Land against George H. Clark. From an adverse order, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Holl & Dunn, for appellant. Chas. T. Jones, Hiram W. Johnson, and Albert M. Johnson, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. Defendant was elected to the office of mayor of the city of Sacramento, and plaintiff was his predecessor in office. When the time arrived for defendant to take possession of his office, plaintiff refused to give him possession, and this litigation thereupon arose. The action is in the nature of a proceeding in injunction, and many questions of law are raised upon this appeal. But the court only finds it necessary to consider a single one of these questions. Plaintiff relies upon various provisions of the purity of elections act to support his conduct in declining to give the office to his successor, Clark, and especially upon section 4 of the act (St. 1893, p. 15). Among other matters, that section provides: "Any candidate for a public office who shall refuse or neglect to file, or who makes a false statement of moneys received or expended, as prescribed by section 3 of this act, shall in addition to the punishment for such offense prescribed by the laws of this state, forfeit any office to which he may have been elected at the election with reference to which this statement is required to be made. If a candidate elected to a public office refuses or neglects to file the statement prescribed by section 3 of this act, * * * the incumbent of the office, unless he is himself a defaulting candidate, must not surrender or deliver up said office, but shall continue to discharge the duties, and shall receive the emoluments thereof." Plaintiff, resting upon the authority which he claims is found in this section, declined to give up the office, and now declares that defendant refused and neglected to file the statement of moneys expended as required by the section aforesaid, and for that reason he alleges that defendant forfeited his right to the office, and that he (plaintiff), as the present incumbent, is entitled to continue in the discharge of its duties. Does the statement filed by defendant substantially comply with the law? If it does, the whole case against him falls to the ground, and the consideration of other questions is not demanded. Section 3 of the act declares that the statement filed shall be "an itemized statement showing in detail all moneys paid, loaned, contributed, or otherwise furnished to him, or for his use, directly or indirectly, in aid of his election, and all moneys contributed, loaned or expended by him directly or indirectly, by himself or through any other person, in aid of his election. Such statement shall give the names of the various persons who paid, loaned, contributed or otherwise furnished such moneys in aid of his election, and the names of the various persons to whom such moneys were contributed, loaned or paid, the specific nature of each item, the service performed, and by whom performed, and the purpose for which the money was expended, contributed or loaned." Let us test the statement filed by these requirements of the law, and in doing so our attention will only be directed to those items contested by plaintiff. Under the head of "Receipts" the statement says, "No money received." This declaration goes even beyond the demands of the statute. The statute only contemplates a record of affirmative matters. It does not contemplate negative declarations. And, if no moneys had been received by the defendant, either directly or indirectly, no mention of that fact need be included in the statement. The purity of elections act is not concerned in things the candidate did not do, but only in those things he did do. Under the head of "Expenditures" we find the item of $200 contributed to the Republican city central committee for campaign purposes. We have in this statement the nature and amount of the items, to whom contributed, and the purpose for which it was contributed. A contribution to the regularly constituted committee of a political party for campaign purposes is allowable, and perfectly proper, under the law; and, the money being given for campaign purposes, it will be assumed it was to be expended in a legitimate and lawful way. A statement of the candidate, showing such a contribution, is in substantial compliance with the law. The remaining item to which objection is made is one of "Sundries and incidentals, $22.65." The statute provides that the candidate may expend an amount not exceeding $100 for necessary incidental expenses; and it also further provides that vouchers are not required for expenditures in amounts less than $5. This act should receive a construction, if possible, which will not render it an absurdity; and to declare this statement filed by the candidate, by reason of this last aforesaid entry, to be violative of the law in substance, and thus invalidate the election, would have that effect. To the honest, conscientious candidate a literal rendition of the statement required by law, accompanied by the oath also required, is difficult indeed. But as to the rendition of the statement by the candidate not honest, and not conscientious, the law presents no difficulties. As to items of money so small as not to demand a voucher, and coming under the head of incidental expenditures, possibly it might be held that the provisions of the law requiring the statement to set forth a history in detail of expenditures does not apply; but it is unnecessary to so hold here. For the court to annul the election of a mayor of the city of Sacramento by reason of a defect in a single item in his statement of expenditures, that item being of the character above described, would be to give the law a construction which might well be termed "sticking in the bark." The act does not contemplate that kind of a construction. Its tenor and spirit is opposed to it. By section 13 thereof, among other matters, it is provided: "Where, upon the trial of any action or proceeding under the provisions of this act for the contesting of the right of any person declared elected to an office, or to annul or set aside such election, or to remove a person from his office, it appears from the evidence * * * that the offenses complained of were trivial, unimportant, and limited in character, * * * and in any case did not arise from any want of good faith, and under the circumstances it seems to the court to be just that the said candidate should not forfeit his office, * * * then the election of such candidate shall not, by reason of such offense or omission complained of, be void, nor shall the candidate be removed from or deprived of his office." It thus appears that the trial court is vested with a large discretion in these matters, and successful candidates are not to forfeit their offices merely for technical violations of the act. This case was heard upon affidavits. The statement of the candidate was attached as an exhibit to one of these affidavits. By its face the trial court was entitled to say, and should have said, this defect in the statement, if it be a defect, is trivial, and unimportant, and did not arise from any want of good faith. For the foregoing reasons, the order is affirmed.

IOWA & CALIFORNIA LAND CO. v. HOAG
et al. (L. A. 685, 686.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 9, 1901.)
FOREIGN TRUSTEE—MORTGAGE SECURITY—RIGHT TO FORECLOSE—COMITY BETWEEN STATES—HOLDER OF LEGAL TITLE.

1. Where an Iowa court appoints a trustee in place of one created by articles of trust securing the debenture bonds of an insolvent Iowa corporation, and empowers him to collect the mortgage securities constituting the trust, such trustee may sue in a California court to foreclose such a mortgage, through the comity extended to a sister state, though Iowa courts have denied a like privilege to the same officers appointed by courts of other states.

2. Where the assignee for the benefit of creditors of an Iowa corporation has transferred the corporation's remaining title and interest in mortgage securities, deposited in trust to secure its debenture bonds, to a trustee appointed by an Iowa court in lieu of the original trustee, such trustee may sue in a California court to foreclose such a mortgage as the holder of the legal title to the security by virtue of such transfer.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Riverside county; J. S. Noyes, Judge.

Opinion in department (62 Pac. 189) reversed, and opinion of trial court affirmed.

Charles R. Gray, for appellants. E. W. Freeman, Rolfe & Rolfe, and W. J. Hunsaker (Joseph H. Call, of counsel), for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. These actions were both actions to foreclose mortgages executed by the defendants to secure their promissory notes. The notes and the securities passed by sundry transfers and assignments to this plaintiff. The questions involved upon these appeals are identical, and the cases may therefore be considered and decided together.

The defendants executed their promissory notes, secured by mortgages, upon lands in California, to the Union Loan & Trust Company, a foreign corporation, organized under the laws of the state of Iowa. The Union

Loan & Trust Company, to secure its debenture bonds, deposited with one Garretson, as trustee, certain notes and mortgages, among which were the ones executed by these defendants. Thereafter the Union Loan & Trust Company became insolvent, and made an assignment to one Hubbard, as assignee for the benefit of its creditors, of all of its remaining right, title, and interest to the securities under the control of Garretson, trustee. Garretson in turn became insolvent, and the creditors of the Union Loan & Trust Company filed a bill in equity in the district court of the state of Iowa for the county of Woodbury, a court of general jurisdiction, setting forth these facts, and praying for the removal of Garretson, and the appointment of some fit and proper person in his place. The Iowa court rendered its decree in accordance with the prayer of its petitioners, ousting Garretson from his trusteeship, and appointing F. B. Hutchins in his place, and empowered him to use all proper means to enforce the collection of the securities so intrusted to him. Under this appointment, Hutchins, as trustee, commenced his action in the superior court of this state to foreclose these mortgages. Before commencement of this action, Hubbard, the assignee for the benefit of creditors, had assigned the notes to Hutchins. Thereafter, and during the pendency of this action in this state, certain other creditors of the Union Loan & Trust Company, and holders of the debenture bonds of that company, attacked and opposed the order and decree of the court appointing Hutchins as trustee, upon the particular ground that the court, by its order and decree, had enlarged the powers of Hutchins as trustee over and above the powers conferred by the articles of trust under which Garretson had been appointed. They pleaded that the court's order authorizing and empowering Hutchins to employ counsel and maintain suits to enforce collections of securities intrusted to him was null and void. After hearing, the district court of Iowa—the same court which had appointed Hutchins trustee—declared and adjudged that its former decree in the premises was a nullity; that Hutchins was without authority or capacity to sue; and revoked its order appointing him trustee, and in place thereof appointed him receiver of the property of the insolvent corporation, conferring upon him the powers with which such an officer is usually clothed. Hutchins then in turn sold and transferred the notes and mortgages here in question to other parties, and by mesne transfer they came into the ownership of the Iowa & California Land Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the state of Iowa. These matters having been shown to the California court by amended and supplemental pleadings, an order of substitution on behalf of the Iowa & California Land Company in the place of Hutchins, trustee, was asked for and obtained. By this substituted plaintiff these actions were prosecuted to judgment.

The questions upon this appeal may be thus stated: (1) May a trustee, as such, commence and maintain an action in a foreign jurisdiction, or is his power and authority so to do coterminous with the jurisdiction or law to which he owes his appointment? (2) Legal titles to these choses in action having been vested in Hutchins by assignment, may he not maintain these actions by virtue of such legal title, the allegations of trusteeship so far as may be necessary being treated as mere surplusage?

1. The early rule denied to such officers any standing in a foreign court, but the courts of late, influenced by a spirit of comity, have inclined to much more liberal views, and it may fairly be said that the prevailing doctrine permits the maintenance of such actions by foreign receivers and like officers, where the rights of domestic creditors are not interfered with. Toronto General Trust Co. v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co., 123 N. Y. 37, 25 N. E. 198; Comstock v. Frederickson, 51 Minn. 350, 53 N. W. 713; Boulware v. Davis, 90 Ala. 207, 8 South. 84, 9 L. R. A. 601; Winans v. Manufacturing Co., 48 Kan. 777, 30 Pac. 163; Hurd v. City of Elizabeth, 41 N. J. Law, 1; Wilson v. Keels, 54 S. C. 545, 32 S. E. 702; Gilman v. Ketcham, 84 Wis. 60, 54 N. W. 395; Sands v. E. S. Greeley & Co., 31 C. C. A. 424, 88 Fed. 130; Parker v. Mill Co., 91 Wis. 174, 64 N. W. 751; Beach, Rec. (Alderson's Ed.) § 665; Smith, Rec. p. 165; High, Rec. § 241. The modification of the rule, as has been said, rests upon the principle of comity,—a principle which the court was reluctant to apply in this particular case, by reason of the fact that the supreme court of Iowa in Ayres v. Siebel, 82 Iowa, 347, 47 N. W. 989, had refused to recognize the principle, and denied to a foreign trustee the right to maintain an action in its courts.

Mutuality of operation is of the essence of comity, and therefore, since a California trustee would not be permitted to maintain his action in the courts of Iowa, little reason could be perceived for the invocation of the principle of comity to permit an Iowa trustee to maintain a like action in the courts of this state. In the latter case of Hale v. Harris, 83 N. W. 1046, the supreme court of Iowa evinces a disposition to modify its views in this regard. But, apart from that, we think that the rule permitting the maintenance of such actions in our courts, where the rights of domestic creditors are not interfered with, is both just and reasonable, and should be enforced without distinction; and therefore regardless of the rule which may prevail in Iowa, and of the fact that the trustee in this case is a trustee under the laws of Iowa, as we are not hampered by the principle of stare decisis, and as the rights of domestic creditors are not involved, we hold that he may, as matter of comity, maintain this action.

2. As has been stated, Hubbard's assignment to Hutchins of the choses in action was made before he commenced his suit in this state, so that when he instituted his action he held legal title to the property, and this title was sufficient warrant and authority for his suit. As directly in point upon this proposition may be cited the Iowa case above mentioned. Hale v. Harris. The defense to these actions is purely technical. The mortgages were given, the money loaned upon the security of them, and the money has not been repaid. A payment by the defendants of the amount due would exonerate them from any possible claims by other parties. As was said by this court (Philbrook v. Superior Court, 111 Cal. 31, 43 Pac. 402): "A defendant's right is to have a cause of action prosecuted against him by the real party in interest, but, as has been elsewhere pointed out (Giselman v. Starr, 106 Cal. 651, 40 Pac. 8), his concern ends when a judgment for or against the nominal plaintiff would protect him from any action upon the same demand by another, and when, as against the nominal plaintiff, he may assert all defenses and counterclaims available to him, were the claim prosecuted by the real owner." See, also, McPherson v. Weston, 64 Cal. 275, 30 Pac. 842; Grant v. Heverin, 77 Cal. 263, 18 Pac. 647, 19 Pac. 493; Toby v. Railroad Co., 98 Cal. 490, 33 Pac. 550; Herman v. Hecht, 116 Cal. 553, 48 Pac. 611; Greig v. Rlordan, 99 Cal. 316, 33 Pac. 913. The judgments and orders appealed from are therefore affirmed.

MOORE v. GRAYSON. (S. F. 1,804).¹

(Supreme Court of California. May 4, 1901.)

APPEAL—FINDINGS—REVIEW—EVIDENCE.

1. Written admissions of a party before any controversy, as to what a contract was, outweigh his oral testimony in contradiction thereof, given after the controversy arose.

Action by Robert E. Moore against G. W. Grayson. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Henry E. Monroe (William B. Treadwell, of counsel), for appellant. Garber, Bolt & Bishop and William Rix, for respondent.

VAN DYKE, J. The complaint alleges: That the plaintiff and defendant entered into a parol contract,—no writing or note or memorandum of the same having ever been made, —by which the defendant agreed to sell, and the plaintiff agreed to purchase, a certain tract of land in the state of Nevada, consisting of 2,445 acres, being a cattle ranch, with a certain band of horses and cattle thereon, for the sum of $60,000. That the plaintiff, in pursuance of said contract, paid to the defendant at the time $14,000 of the purchase price, and thereafter various sums, amounting, with the first payment, to $59,154.47. That the defendant delivered to the plaintiff the cattle and horses, and delivered to him conveyances for about 1,200 acres of the land in question. That the land so conveyed consisted of scattered parcels, the remainder unconveyed being necessary to make a continuous tract. That the defendant subsequently refused to make further conveyances or to comply with his contract. That before the commencement of the action the plaintiff demanded a conveyance of the lands not theretofore conveyed, which demand was by the defendant refused. That thereupon the plaintiff tendered to the defendant a reconveyance of the lands theretofore conveyed to him, and offered to surrender possession thereof, and demanded of him the repayment of the sum so paid, less $28,180, the value of the horses and cattle which he had received from the defendant, and had theretofore disposed of for that amount, which offer the defendant declined, and refused to repay said sum or any portion thereof. The answer denies specifically the allegations of the complaint; and it is contended on the part of the defendant that the transaction was made by him for and on behalf of his brother, Nathan Grayson, and that said Nathan Grayson and his son George W. Grayson, Jr., were the owners of said land constituting said stock ranch and said cattle and horses; that the proceeds of the sale of the same to the plaintiff were to be received by the defendant as the amount of the indebtedness due him from his said brother, Nathan Grayson. The judgment below went for the defendant, from which, and from an order denying a new trial, plaintiff takes this appeal.

The findings of the court below sustain the contention of the defendant that the defendant, as the agent for his brother, Nathan Grayson, entered into a parol agreement with the plaintiff by the terms of which Nathan Grayson agreed to sell to plaintiff the lands referred to, with the horses and cattle, and that said defendant in such transaction did not act for himself, but as the agent of his brother, which fact was known to the plaintiff.

The main, and in fact the only, contention on the part of the appellant is that the findings are not supported by the evidence. There are about an equal number of witnesses on each side, the material witnesses on the part of the plaintiff being the plaintiff and his wife, and on the part of the defendant the defendant and George W. Grayson, Jr., Nathan Grayson having died prior to the trial. The plaintiff is the nephew of the defendant and of Nathan Grayson, deceased, and the cousin of his son, George W. Grayson, Jr. The appellant seeks to destroy the force of the defendant's testimony on the ground that there is a conflict between his deposition taken some time prior to the trial and his testimony at the trial. The defendant, however, at the trial, in advance, voluntarily explained discrepancies and misstatements in his deposition, which explanations seem to have been satisfactory to the judge before whom the cause was tried, and who had an opportunity of witnessing the conduct and demeanor of the defendant as a witness on the stand, and was much better prepared to determine the credibility of his testimony than the appellate court. Besides, the testimony of the plaintiff is very much weakened, if not entirely destroyed, by a letter written by him to his uncle entirely inconsistent with his testimony and theory of the agreement. The trade or sale was entered into in June, 1885, and the plaintiff thereupon immediately entered into possession of the ranch and cattle, had received conveyances for over 1,200 acres of the lands purchased, and was anxious to get conveyances for the balance, and for that purpose wrote the following letter: "Reno, Nevada, May 23, 1892. Mr. N. Grayson—Dear Sir: I sent to you a deed, and hope that you will have it filled out, and properly signed and acknowledged, and return to me, at your earliest opportunity. It is a piece of real estate that you applied for when you were in this state, and which I bought from you in 1885, but have never had a deed from you yet. I saw cousin George, your boy, some two months ago. He is quite lame yet from his smashup on the train. I don't know anything of any interest to you, as I have not been to California for some time. My family are all well at present. With kind regards, I am yours, respectfully, Robert Moore." The "piece of real estate" mentioned in this letter is one of those embraced in the sale referred to. Before this letter was produced, plaintiff, while giving his testimony, had denied that he ever told Nathan Grayson that he bought the land from him, or that he ever considered or thought so. The admissions in the letter are entirely inconsistent with the claim of the plaintiff that he bought from George W. Grayson, Sr., instead of Nathan Grayson. The written admissions of a party before any controversy has arisen, as to the meaning and effect of a contract, manifestly outweigh oral testimony in contradiction of same, given after the controversy has arisen. In Re Irvine's Estate, 102 Cal. 606, 36 Pac. 1013, it is said: "The rule is well established that oral testimony in contradiction of the plain terms of a written instrument, or of written admissions, should be clear, full, and precise, and that the weight to be given to any such testimony diminishes with its distance from the date of the instrument which it purports to contradict or overcome." In this case the letter, as shown, was written May 23, 1892, and the trial of the cause in which the oral testimony was given was had in March, 1896. But, without detailing in full the testimony on the respective sides, it is sufficient to say that there was a substantial conflict, with a preponderance in favor of the defendant. Under the general rule that this court will not disturb the findings of the court below where there is even a substantial conflict in the evidence, the judgment and order denying a new trial in this case must be affirmed. It is so ordered.

GARNER v. JUDD. (S. F. 2,361.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 4, 1901.)

ADMINISTRATORS—RIGHT TO LETTERS—ILLEGITIMATE CHILD—ADOPTION.

Under Civ. Code, § 230, providing that the father of an illegitimate child, by publicly acknowledging it as his own and receiving it into his family, adopts it and makes it, for all purposes, legitimate from the time of its birth, the acknowledging of an illegitimate child by a father without receiving it into his family is not sufficient for its adoption, and such child can confer no right to administer her father's estate.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Humboldt county; G. W. Hunter, Judge.

Proceeding by Georgina Garner, in the matter of the estate of William Goodman, deceased, for letters of administration, against A. R. Judd. From a judgment in favor of petitioner, and an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Henry L. Ford, E. M. Frost, and L. M. Burnell, for appellant. Mahan & Mahan, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is a contest for letters of administration of the estate of William Goodman, deceased, between Georgina Garner, a niece of defendant, and A. R. Judd, who claims under a written request of one Maggie Goodman-Phillips, an illegitimate daughter of decedent. Judgment went for Garner, and from the judgment and an order denying a motion for a new trial Judd appealed.

The only question in the case is whether or not the said Maggie was adopted and rendered legitimate under the provisions of section 230 of the Civil Code, which is as follows: "The father of an illegitimate child, by publicly acknowledging it as his own, receiving it as such, with the consent of his wife if he is married, into his family, and otherwise treating it as if it were a legitimate child, thereby adopts it as such; and such child is thereupon deemed for all purposes legitimate from the time of its birth. The foregoing provisions of this chapter do not apply to such an adoption." Maggie was the illegitimate daughter of an Indian woman named Mary; and the court found that at the time of her birth, in 1878, and from 1874 to 1897, the decedent, Goodman, had a family, and was living with his family, and with another Indian woman, named Annie, as his wife; that he acknowledged Maggie as his child, "but he did not receive her as such into his family, or otherwise treat her as if she was a legitimate child during her minority." It is quite clear that the evidence supports the finding that "he did not receive her as such into his family" during her minority, and, this being so, the judgment must be affirmed. Section 230 applies only to minors. In re Pico's Estate, 52 Cal. 84. It is contended that the findings that Goodman had a family and lived with Annie as his wife are unwarranted by the evidence, but we need not inquire into the correctness of these findings. If he had a family, then he must have received Maggie into it, in order to adopt her under section 230. If he had no family, then the section had no application to the case. If he had no family, of course, he did not take her into it, and therefore did not comply with the section in question. Whether or not an unmarried man can establish a family, within the meaning of the Code, by taking an illegitimate child to live with him in a home provided for that purpose, is a question not here involved. If a man who has no family, and makes no attempt to have one, desires to adopt an illegitimate child, he can do so by a written acknowledgment under section 1387 of the Civil Code, and not otherwise. There can be no compliance with section 230 in the absence of the conditions contemplated by that section, and absolutely necessary to give it effect. There is nothing contrary to this conclusion decided in Blythe v. Ayres, 96 Cal. 552, 31 Pac. 915, 19 L. R. A. 40. The part of the opinion in that case relied on by appellant was concurred in by only three of the judges participating in the decision, and was dissented from by the others, and the judgment was affirmed by the court upon the ground that there had been a compliance with section 1387. In Re Jessup's Estate, 81 Cal. 408, 21 Pac. 976, 22 Pac. 742, 1028, 6 L. R. A. 594, there is an expression favorable to appellant's contention in an opinion concurred in by four of the justices; but that expression was entirely unnecessary to the decision of the case, and one of the four justices afterwards expressed the opinion that it was erroneous. It cannot, therefore, be taken as authority on the question. See Blythe v. Ayres, 96 Cal. 593, 31 Pac. 915, 19 L. R. A. 40. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

JOHNSTONE v. MULCAHY. (S. F. 1,777.)
(Supreme Court of California. May 4, 1901.)
SALE OF LAND—PAYMENT—EVIDENCE—RECEIPTS.

Where defendant sold land to plaintiff by agreement in form of a lease, deed to be given on payment of 72 monthly installments of $45.07 each, and a note of $1,350, payable 9 years from date, receipts given by defendant to plaintiff 9 years thereafter, at a time subsequent to any payments on the 72 installments and when all payments were on the note, and reciting, "I received $55 rent in advance" for said premises, will, in the absence of explanation or proof of mistake, be conclusive of payment of all the previous installments.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; George H. Bahrs, Judge.

Action by Thomas Johnstone against James Mulcahy. From the judgment, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Charles Wesley Reed, for appellant. Naphtaly, Friedenrich & Ackerman, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Suit by vendee of real property in possession against the vendor for accounting and for specific performance. The judgment was that there was due on the contract the sum of $3,869.54, and that, on default of payment for 30 days, plaintiff should be foreclosed of his interest, and defendant have restitution of the premises. It is claimed by the appellant that the amount adjudged against him was excessive, and this is the only point that need be considered. The contract of sale was in the form of a lease and accompanying agreement of date May 17, 1878. The lease provided for the payment of 72 monthly installments of $45.07 each, amounting to $3,245.04; and the agreement—as written—was for a conveyance, upon the payment of these installments, and of a promissory note of $1,350, payable nine years from date, with interest at 9 per cent. per annum, compounding semiannually. Fifty-two of the monthly installments (it is found) were paid, amounting to $2,343.64, and on the promissory note the sum of $3,125; and it is found generally that "the amount owing at the time of the commencement of this suit from plaintiff to defendant over and above all payments made by plaintiff to defendant on account thereof, together with interest on all such payments at the rate of seven per cent. per annum, is * * * $3,869.54." The points made by the appellant are: (1) That the remaining monthly installments (20 in number) were also paid; (2) that a larger amount was paid on the promissory note than is credited; and (3) that the balance due at the commencement of the suit was much less than found.

(1) With regard to the first point, we think the payment of the 20 installments found to be unpaid is very clearly established by the evidence. The absence of receipts is accounted for by the fact that the plaintiff was in the habit of making payments without taking receipts. He testifies that in 1887, at a settlement between him and the defendant, the amount found to be due on the note was about $2,800, and that it was agreed that there was $200 more due for money paid by the defendant for taxes, etc. This statement is not denied by the defendant, but is apparently admitted. The amount stated to be due ($2,800) is about the amount that would have been due on the note, calculated with compound interest, subject to two payments shown by receipts of date December 1, 1878, and June 30, 1879. It is also asserted by both parties, in effect, and expressly found by the court, that the payments made subsequent to 1887 were all on the note, and that the receipts given for the amounts paid were in the same form as for the monthly installments originally provided for; as, for example, the following: "San Francisco, Dec. 1, 1887. Received of Thomas Johnstone fifty-five dollars rent in advance for house 1757 Ellis street. James Mulcahy." These receipts, taken in connection with the finding and other circumstances in the case, must, in the absence of explanation or proof of mistake, be taken as conclusive of the payments of previous installments. 2 Whart. Ev. § 1362.

2. The finding that only $3,125 was paid on the note is also in conflict with the evidence. According to the account of the defendant attached to his answer there was admittedly another payment of $243, and receipts were in evidence showing other payments.

3. It follows that the amount found due was excessive in failing to credit the plaintiff with the amounts last referred to, and in charging him with the amount of the 20 installments found to be unpaid, and with the interest thereon. But it also appears that it was otherwise excessive. In this regard the findings themselves are insufficient. The referee finds the aggregate of the payments on the note, but does not find the dates of the several payments. Without these the amount due cannot be determined, and it cannot be perceived how, or on what theory, he arrived at his conclusion as to the aggregate amount due. But there is at least enough in the finding to show that the referee proceeded on a wrong theory; for, while the plaintiff is charged with the principal of the note with interest compounding semiannually at 9 per cent. per annum, he is credited only with interest at 7 per cent. on his payments. The finding is also in conflict with the defendant's answer, where, from the account attached, it appears that, as claimed, the amount due at the date of filing the answer, November 5, 1896, was $3,869.54,—precisely the amount found by the referee to be due at the commencement of the action, December 17, 1895, nearly a year before. It may also be inferred, from the precise coincidence of the amount found with the amount shown by the defendant's account, that the finding is in fact based on the account; and, assuming this to be the case, and accepting pro hac vice the items of the account, it is obvious that the estimate of the amount due was grossly erroneous, and largely in excess of the true amount. The judgment and order appealed from must therefore be reversed.

But there is another peculiarity of the case to which, with a view to the further proceedings, attention should be directed. The contract, as stated by the defendant in his testimony, is quite different from the contract as written; and it seems clear, on the evidence appearing in the record, that there was a mistake of the parties in reducing the contract to writing. According to the defendant's explicit statement, the price agreed on for the property was $3,850, and the agreed monthly rental value was $35. Seventy-two payments of this rental would amount to $2,520, which, added to the amount of the note, would exceed the amount named by the plaintiff by $20 only. Of the nominal rent of $45.07, to be paid monthly, there was, therefore, an excess of $10.07, to go as payment of the note, which, adding the excess of $20 in the monthly installments, was about sufficient to pay the interest, and, with the continued payment of $45.07 after the expiration of the term named in the lease, to satisfy the note when it became due at the end of nine years. It is therefore impossible—at least on the evidence in the record—to resist the conviction that the real agreement was as stated by the defendant; and this conclusion is confirmed by the credit of $243 allowed by him on the note for the first two years' interest, and by the fact that in making the credit compound interest is not charged. The difference between the amount that should have been credited ($241.68) and the amount actually credited ($243) is readily accounted for by the inaccuracy of the defendant's accounts everywhere apparent. Under the actual pleadings, the failure of the court to credit the plaintiff on the note with the excess of $10.07 over the rent in the monthly installments, were there no other errors, could not, perhaps, be considered; but, as the case is to be tried anew, the pleadings can be amended. The judgment and order denying a new trial are reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to allow the plaintiff to amend his pleadings, if he be so advised, and for a new trial.

APPEAL—REMAND—JURISDICTION OF TRIAL COURT.

Where a money judgment against an administrator, which failed to direct that it be paid out of the estate in due course of administration, on appeal was modified to so direct, as so modified it was a final adjudication, and on remittitur the trial court was without jurisdiction to make an order directing payment of a certain sum in money, and a delivery of certain articles claimed by the judgment creditor.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; E. W. Risley, Judge.

Proceedings by Clara M. Vance, administratrix, against Bertha A. Smith, administratrix. From an order in defendant's favor, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

L. L. Cory and E. E. Sheperd, for appellant. George B. Graham, for respondent.

VAN DYKE, J. In February, 1895, S. L. Vance was appointed administrator of the estate of his deceased wife, Eliza M. Vance, but died before any accounting had. For the purpose of having his account as administrator of the said estate settled, the plaintiff, as administratrix on his estate, brought this action in the nature of a suit in equity against Bertha A. Smith, the daughter of his deceased wife, Eliza M. Vance, by a former marriage, and who had been appointed administratrix of her mother's estate. On the hearing of the case the court below found that said S. L. Vance, deceased, had in his hands as administrator, and belonging to the estate of his deceased wife, Eliza M. Vance, a balance in money of $1,093, and personal property, a watch and chain and some trinkets, amounting to $11.50,—in all $1,104.50; and thereupon the court entered judgment in favor of the defendant, as administratrix of the estate of Eliza M. Vance, and against the plaintiff, as administratrix of the estate of S. L. Vance, for said sum, but failed to direct how or by whom such judgment should be paid. On appeal to this court the cause was remanded, with directions to modify the judgment by adding thereto the following: "And that said judgment be paid in due course of administration," and, as so modified, the judgment was affirmed. 124 Cal. 219, 56 Pac. 1031. Upon the remittitur going down, the court below, June 6, 1899, on motion of the defendant, and after hearing the parties, entered an order directing "the plaintiff, Clara M. Vance, as administratrix of the estate of S. L. Vance, deceased, to pay to the defendant, Bertha A. Smith, as administratrix of the estate of Eliza M. Vance, deceased, the amount of the judgment heretofore given and entered in said action in favor of said defendant and against said plaintiff for the sum of $1,093, with interest thereon at the rate of seven per cent. per annum from June 12, 1897, on or before the 12th day of June, 1899; and said plaintiff is further ordered to deliver to said defendant, on or before the 12th day of June, 1899, one certain bird cage, certain trinkets, and one watch and chain, all of which are named and specified in said judgment." The present appeal is taken from this order.

The vice of the judgment from which the former appeal was taken was that it appeared to have been rendered against the plaintiff as administrator, and failed to direct that it be paid out of the estate in due course of administration, and for that reason the cause was remanded, with specific directions to modify the judgment accordingly, and, when so modified, the judgment was affirmed. "A judgment rendered against an executor or administrator upon any claim for money against the estate of his testator or intestate, only establishes the claim in the same manner as if it had been allowed by the executor or administrator and a judge; and the judgment must be that the executor or administrator pay, in due course of administration, the amount ascertained to be due." Code Civ. Proc. § 1504. The judgment, as modified according to directions, was a final adjudication of the rights of the parties in this action, and the court was without jurisdiction to make any further judgment or order. Barry v. Superior Court, 91 Cal. 486, 27 Pac. 763; White v. White (Cal.) 62 Pac. 1062; and cases there cited. Order appealed from reversed.

HAINES v. YOUNG et al. (S. F. 2,137.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 30, 1901.)

EVIDENCE—TAX DEED—EJECTMENT—TRIAL—REOPENING CASE—DISCRETION—ABUSE—DISTURBANCE ON APPEAL.

1. Since the Dupont street act (St. 1875-76, p. 433), authorizing the widening of Dupont street, assessment therefor, and sale for nonpayment of the same, does not include that part of the act for collection of taxes (Pol. Code, § 3786) declaring matters of which a general tax deed shall be evidence, a tax deed given for the nonpayment of assessments for improvements on such street is not prima facie evidence of the validity of all steps prior to its issuance.

2. Plaintiff claimed title under a tax deed, to the introduction of which in evidence defendant objected, in the absence of proof of all the steps from the inception of proceedings under such act authorizing the sale to and including execution of deed. Plaintiff refused to submit such evidence, and the case was submitted on proofs, after which plaintiff applied to reopen, and for leave to submit the omitted evidence, on the ground that same was omitted through inadvertence. Held, that there was no abuse of discretion in refusing to grant the motion.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Edward A. Belcher, Judge.

Action by E. A. Haines against William W. Young and others. From a judgment in favor of defendants, and an order denying a motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Pringle & Pringle, for appellant. Olney & Olney, for respondents.

CHIPMAN, C. Ejectment. Defendants had judgment, from which, and from the order denying motion for new trial, plaintiff appeals.

1. Plaintiff claims title to the lot in question by virtue of a deed from the tax collector of the city and county of San Francisco for delinquent taxes, under the act for the widening of Dupont street, in San Francisco, approved March 23, 1876 (St. 1875-76, p. 433). The deed was admitted in evidence on the offer of plaintiff against defendants' objections. No other evidence of title in plaintiff was offered. The only question presented is whether this deed, under section 3786 of the Political Code, is prima facie evidence of all the steps recited in it. Plaintiff's contention that the deed constituted such evidence cannot be maintained. Phe-lan v. City and County of San Francisco, 120 Cal. 1, 52 Pac. 38.

2. The motion for a new trial was made on the ground that the court abused its discretion in refusing to open the case after the evidence was closed and the cause submitted, and allowed plaintiff to prove the steps leading up to the deed. When plaintiff offered his deed in evidence, counsel for defendants objected on several grounds, and among them was the point now before us, namely, that the deed is not admissible "without proof having first been made of all the steps from the inception of the proceedings under the * * * Dupont street act to and including the execution of the deed." The court having admitted the deed, plaintiff rested without offering to submit the evidence pointed out by defendants as necessary. Defendants then submitted evidence of their title, and counsel remarked that in ordinary tax cases the deed makes a prima facie case, but that this is not the rule in the Dupont street assessments, and concluded by saying, "If counsel does not put in any other testimony I will not introduce any testimony." The cause was then submitted on briefs to be thereafter filed; five days being given to plaintiff, five to defendants to answer, and two to plaintiff to reply. This was on May 15, 1899. On May 19th following, counsel for plaintiff gave notice of motion to reopen the case and for leave to submit the omitted evidence, on the ground that such proof "was omitted through inadvertence, and that the ends of justice required the same to be submitted to the court." The motion was supported by an affidavit of one of the counsel for plaintiff, in which he states "that he stood ready at the time to prove the steps leading up to the tax collector's deed * * * but was of the opinion that the deed was prima facie evidence of such steps," and was sustained by the ruling of the court in admitting the deed over objection; "but, after further consideration of the case and the law applicable thereto, affiant now desires and is ready and willing and offers to prove each succesive step leading up to said tax deed, with leave of the court first had." Defendants' counsel make counter affidavits showing that plaintiff's leading counsel, the attorney who made the above affidavit, was informed by defendants' counsel before the trial began that the proof of steps preceding the deed was necessary to be made, and therefore he could not have omitted such proof through inadvertence, and that affiant read to the court the decision in Phelan v. City and County of San Francisco, supra, before the cause was submitted. These facts are not denied, and were hardly necessary, as the record shows that plaintiff submitted the case with ample warning that he was taking all the chances of suffering by his error, if it should turn out so to be. Furthermore, plaintiff's affidavit does not set forth what the steps were which he stood ready to prove, nor even generally that they were such as are set forth in the deed. It does not follow that, because "he stood ready to prove the steps leading up to the tax collector's deed," such steps were those required by law to be taken. It is altogether probable that, if the court had allowed the deed to be admitted in evidence under a mistaken impression of the plaintiff that no other proof was necessary, the court would and should, in all fairness, have allowed the proof to be made before it was too late, after he was advised of the decision of this court. But we do not find evidence in the record that the deed was admitted solely on plaintiff's theory, or under any misapprehension as to the law. The evidence on the motion shows that counsel persisted in submitting the case, claiming that what was said in Phelan v. City and County of San Francisco was dictum, and not decisive of the point here. It was within the discretion of the court to grant or refuse the motion, and we can disturb its ruling only on a clear showing of abuse of that discretion, which we cannot say has been shown in this case. The judgment and order should be affirmed.

GALLAGHER v. MCGRAW. (Sac. 864.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 3, 1901.)

SUPERIOR COURT—JURISDICTION—PECUNIARY LIMITATION—SUIT AGAINST ADMINISTRATRIX—ACCRUED INTEREST—PRESENTATION OF CLAIM—EFFECT.

Const. art. 6, § 5, limits the jurisdiction of superior courts in cases at law, with certain exceptions, to those in which the demand, exclusive of interest, amounts to $300. Code Civ. Proc. § 1500, provides that no holder of any claim against an estate shall maintain action thereon unless the claim is first presented to the executor or administrator. Held, that the fact that a note of $200 principal against a decedent, when presented to the administratrix in accordance with section 1500, with accumulated interest, amounted to over $300, did not give the superior court jurisdiction; the action still being on the note, and not on the claim as presented and rejected.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Placer county; J. E. Prewett, Judge.

Action by Anthony Gallagher against Catherine McGraw, administratrix. From a judgment dismissing the action, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Chas. Tuttle and L. L. Chamberlain, for appellant. J. J. Kincaid and W. H. Curtin, for respondent.

COOPER, C. This appeal is from the judgment. The court below ordered judgment dismissing the case upon the ground that it had no jurisdiction. The findings show that the note upon which suit was brought was for the sum of $200 principal, with interest from date. The demand, exclusive of interest, did not amount to $300, and hence the superior court had no jurisdiction. Const. art. 6, § 5; Christian v. Superior Court, 122 Cal. 119, 54 Pac. 518. The fact that the claim upon the note, with accrued interest, amounted to over $300 when presented to the administratrix, does not change the result. The action is upon the note. It is made necessary under the statute, to present a claim of this kind to the representative of deceased before an action can be maintained upon it, but when the action is brought it is upon the original claim or note. The presentation of the claim in no way changes the nature of the demand, nor the form in which the action must be brought. After the claim is presented, then the holder, in case of rejection, may maintain an action thereon. Code Civ. Proc. § 1500. He can recover only upon the claim so presented and rejected. Lichtenberg v. McGlynn, 105 Cal. 47, 38 Pac. 541; Etchas v. Orena, 127 Cal. 592, 60 Pac. 45. The judgment should be affirmed.

SHARPSTEIN v. EELLS et al. (S. F. 2,340.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 30, 1901.)

ACTIONS—PROCESS—SUMMONS—SERVICE AND RETURN—LIMITATION—DISMISSAL—STATUTES—INTENTION.

1. Code Civ. Proc. § 581, subd. 7, providing that all actions shall be dismissed unless the summons shall be served, and return thereon made, within three years after the commencement of the action, is mandatory; and, where the summons is not so served and returned, the defendant is entitled to dismissal, though his motion therefor was not made until after his default was entered.

2. Code Civ. Proc. § 581, subd. 7, as enacted in March, 1889, provided that all actions shall be dismissed unless summons shall be issued within one year, and served and return made thereon within three years, after the commencement of the action. In March, 1895, such subdivision was amended to read, "That all actions shall be dismissed unless summons shall be issued within one year and all such actions shall be in like manner dismissed unless the summons shall be served and return thereon made within three years." Held, that the amendment was merely to free the statute from ambiguity, and not made in order to oust the court of jurisdiction in those cases only in which the summons had not been issued within the year; and the statute therefore applied to all cases in which the summons had not been served and returned within three years from the beginning of the action.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Napa county; E. D. Ham, Judge.

Action by W. C. Sharpstein against Emma P. Eells, Fannie A. Morton, and others. From an order dismissing as to defendant Fannie A. Morton, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. J. Dwyer and T. B. Hutchinson, for appellant. Webber & Rutherford (H. C. Gesford, of counsel), for respondent.

COOPER, C. This is an appeal from an order dismissing the action as to respondent. The summons was issued October 26, 1895, but was not served until February 6, nor returned until February 17, 1900. On the last-named day, the respondent not having appeared or answered, her default was entered. On March 12, 1900, upon motion of respondent's counsel, the court made an order dismissing the action as to her upon the ground that the summons was not served, filed, or returned within three years after its issuance, as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 581, subd. 7. The action of the court was correct. The question has so often been discussed by this court that we deem it useless to do more than refer to the cases. Vrooman v. Li Po Tai, 113 Cal. 305, 45 Pac. 470; Davis v. Hart, 123 Cal. 385, 55 Pac. 1060; Cooper v. Gordon, 125 Cal. 297, 57 Pac. 1006; White v. Superior Court, 126 Cal. 247, 58 Pac. 450; Modoc Land & Live-Stock Co. v. Superior Court of Modoc Co., 128 Cal. 255, 60 Pac. 848.

It is urged that the respondent did not make the motion until after her default had been entered, and that it was then too late. The language of the statute is plain and mandatory. No action "shall be further prosecuted, and no further proceedings shall be had therein," unless the summons shall have been issued within one year; and all actions shall be dismissed "unless the summons shall be served and return thereon made within three years after the commencement of said action." The only exception is that, where appearance has been made within the three years, the action may be prosecuted in the same manner as if summons had been issued and served. Here no appearance was made, except for the purposes of the motion. The method of obtaining jurisdiction of the person of a defendant is statutory. The statutory mode not having been pursued in time, the right given to respondent to have the action dismissed was absolute. Subdivision 7 of said section 581, as amended in 1895, is as follows: "And no action heretofore or hereafter commenced shall be further prosecuted, and no further proceedings shall be had therein, and all actions heretofore or hereafter commenced shall be dismissed by the court in which the same shall have been commenced on its own motion or on the motion of any party interested therein, whether named in the complaint as a party or not, unless summons shall have been issued within one year, and all such actions shall be in like manner dismissed, unless the summons shall be served and return thereon made within three years after the commencement of said action." Said subdivision was added to section 581 by the legislature in March, 1889, with the exception of the words in italics, which were added in March, 1895. It is insisted that by the amendment of 1895, adding the words, "all such actions shall be in like manner dismissed, unless the summons shall be," the meaning of the section was materially changed. It is said in appellant's brief: "It now clearly appears that, as the subdivision was originally enacted, the court was denied jurisdiction just as much in one case as in the other; but that the legislature, with the evident intent of ousting the jurisdiction of the court in those cases only in which the summons has not been issued within a year, inserted the language in italics." We do not think the appellant's contention as to the construction of the amendment correct. The original words—"and served and return thereon made"—had reference to the summons. The words as amended—"and all such actions shall be in like manner dismissed unless the summons shall be served and return thereon made"—refer to the summons and also to the action. Under the section, prior to the amendment, it was made the imperative duty of the court to dismiss the action, unless the summons was served and return thereon made within three years after the commencement thereof. The section, as amended, makes it the imperative duty of the court to so dismiss the action unless the summons shall be served and return thereon made within three years. The amendment was intended to make the legislative intent free from ambiguity. Under the statute, the summons not having been served and return made within the three years, it was the imperative duty of the court to dismiss the action. The cases herein cited, with the exception of Vrooman v. Li Po Tai, were all decided after the amendment of 1895. What is said by Mr. Justice Temple in Cooper v. Gordon is not in conflict with the conclusion herein. The effect of the decision in that case is that, if defendant voluntarily appears, and answers, and demands a trial, after the three years the court has jurisdiction to proceed. In this case the respondent did not so appear. The fact that plaintiff, after three years, had the summons served upon her, and that default was entered, did not show any consent or voluntary appearance. When she appeared it was for the purpose of asking that the action be dismissed as to her. She had the right to have it dismissed. The order should be affirmed.

APPEAL AND ERROR—WAIVER—DISCUSSION IN BRIEF—CORPORATIONS—OFFICERS—RIGHT TO COMPENSATION—BOARD OF DIRECTORS—QUORUM—INTEREST OF DIRECTOR—RATIFICATION.

1. An assignment of error, not discussed in appellant's brief, will not be reviewed.

2. Where a director of a corporation performed services as its manager, not pertaining to his duties as director, he is entitled to recover the reasonable value of such services, though no rate of compensation was fixed by the board of directors prior to performance of the services.

3. No legal quorum of directors of a corporation is present when action is attempted to be taken on a matter as to which one of the directors necessary to make the quorum is interested.

4. Resolutions passed at such meeting cannot be ratified by the stockholders.

Beatty, C. J., and Harrison and Temple, JJ., dissenting.

In bank. On rehearing. Reversed.

Frank Shay, C. H. McFarland, C. H. Wilson, and E. W. McKinstry, for appellants. O. K. McMurray and Gunnison, Booth & Barnett, for respondents.

McFARLAND, J. The following parts of the opinion delivered in this case in department (61 Pac. 791) are hereby adopted:

It is averred in the complaint that each of the plaintiffs is the owner of at least five shares of the capital stock of the corporation defendant, the Bitumen Consolidated Mining Company, the capital stock being $300,000, divided into shares of $100 each, and that this action is brought on behalf of themselves and other stockholders. It is also averred that during the times when the alleged wrongs were committed defendants Fairchild, Perine, Walrath, and Miles were directors of the corporation defendant; the whole number of directors being six, and the other two being plaintiff Bassett and one Swift. It is further averred that said defendants, being a majority of the board of directors, improperly expended certain mon-neys of the corporation, and the purpose of the action is to recover from them the amount of money alleged to have been thus expended. The court rendered judgment against Fairchild, Perine, and Walrath for $10,729.90, which sum consists of $8,665.80 found to have been improperly expended, and legal interest thereon for several years; and against defendant Miles for $7,129.90 for money, and interest thereon, found to have been improperly expended by the directors by acts in which he participated. From the judgment, and from an order denying their motion for a new trial, the defendants appeal. The court found the appellants liable for $1,888.05 paid out by them as expenses incurred in defending a certain action brought in the superior court by the San Luis Bituminous Rock Company against the defendant corporation herein and certain others of the individual defendants herein. The ground of this finding is that, owing to the nature of that action, the defendants therein, other than the corporation, should have borne the expenses of the litigation, and, as this finding is not discussed in appellants' brief, it may be dismissed without further notice.

The chief item of appellants' liability allowed by the court, which is contested by appellants, is $6,475 paid defendant Fairchild for services as general manager of the corporation defendant before his compensation therefor had been fixed, which sum, with interest thereon, makes up the main amount of the judgment. The record shows that, after the case had been submitted to the trial court, that court made an order on August 29, 1896, that judgment be entered for plaintiffs for $1,888.05 alone. (In a written opinion attached to one of appellants' briefs the learned judge of the lower court gives his reasons, which we think are exceedingly cogent, for not allowing judgment for the $6,475 paid to Fairchild.) But afterwards the court made findings and ordered judgment for the $6,475 and interest, in addition to the said $1,888.05, and, under an amendment to the complaint, gave judgment also for an additional $332.25, which will be referred to hereafter, and ordered that $2,000 be allowed plaintiffs as a counsel fee, to be paid out of the judgment by a receiver, who was appointed to collect the same.

There is no averment, or proof, or finding of any fraud committed by appellants, but the theory of the complaint seems to be that in authorizing the payment of the said money to Fairchild the appellants acted with gross negligence. The appellants admit the payment of this money, and justify it. The findings seem to follow the theory of the complaint; but so far as they may be construed to find that appellants were guilty of such negligence as would render them liable on the ground of negligence alone, or that they willfully intended to injure the corporation for their own personal gain, they are not supported by evidence. However, the findings on these points need not be closely scrutinized; for the order denying the motion for a new trial contains this language: "There is no evidence in this case that either of the defendants Perine, Walrath, or Miles acted for their own private gains. If any finding bears that construction I regret it, and, if it were necessary to support the judgment, I would grant a new trial. Neither, under my views of the law, is the finding as to negligence material. Perine, Walrath, and Miles are held liable upon the ground that they voted money of the corporation to Fairchild without authority of law. If it be assumed that the corporation was indebted to Fairchild for past services, none of the defendants are liable for the money paid to him. * * * Upon the main question whether Fairchild had any legal claim for compensation before his salary was fixed by the board, I see no reason to change the views expressed by me in deciding the case." It is apparent, therefore, that the judgment was based on the principle that the payment of the money to Fairchild was unlawful because it was paid before his salary as general manager had been fixed, and that, as will be seen hereafter, it was so entirely illegal and ultra vires that it could not be ratified or made valid by any subsequent act of either the directors or the stockholders.

The corporation defendant was organized in September, 1891. Its main purpose was to control the mining and marketing of bituminous rock to be taken from several different mines or deposits of bitumen. It appears that these several mines were mainly owned by the persons who formed the corporation defendant, and became its stockholders and directors. The corporation took leases from the owners of these several mines, by the terms of which it was to give them a royalty of one dollar a ton for every ton of bitumen taken from the mines. It seems quite apparent that the main profit which the organizers of the corporation expected to receive was to come through the royalty of one dollar per ton to be paid for the rock taken from the mines which they owned; and, in this connection, we think that the court erred in sustaining an objection to the question asked Fairchild on the witness stand, whether at the time of the organization of the corporation "it was designed, intended, or expected by the directors of the Bitumen Consolidated that, outside of the royalties, there would be large earnings or dividends." Immediately after the organization of the corporation, and in September, 1891, Fairchild was duly elected vice president and general manager, and remained such during the time mentioned in the complaint. He immediately commenced to perform his duties as general manager, which duties were numerous and onerous, and occupied almost his entire time. The various kinds of work which he did as manager fully appear in the evidence, and need not be here given in detail. It is sufficient to say that his work included direction and supervision of the mining operations in the various leased mines; the supplies required; contracting for hauling rock from mines to cars; purchasing sacks for the rock; attending to shipping receipts and collecting moneys; securing transportation facilities; chartering vessels for shipping rock to points on the northern Pacific coast; seeing that cars which came to San Francisco were properly loaded and delivered in proper shape to purchasers; looking after office management, and attending to all "business of the corporation which come along from day to day." Before his employment he had visited points as far north as Vancouver, British Columbia, in the interest of the use and sale of bituminous rock, and had become acquainted with public officials and others having control of street paving, and was thus enabled to procure contracts with them for sale of the rock of the corporation. There is no doubt that his services were highly valuable, and there is no doubt that they were of such a character as to preclude any reasonable supposition that they were to be gratuitous. But there was no resolution of the board of directors and no express contract determining what compensation he should have for his services as manager prior to November 9, 1892, and for this reason it is contended by respondents that he cannot legally have any compensation prior to that date. Fairchild expected to receive compensation for his work as manager, the amount to depend somewhat upon the volume of business that would be developed, and the testimony of Walrath, president, and Perine, treasurer, of the corporation, shows that it was not expected by them or the other directors that he was to work gratuitously. Moreover, his work as manager was done with the knowledge of the directors, but there was no formal action taken on the subject until November 9, 1892. Some time before that date the president paid Fairchild, on account of his services, out of the money of the corporation, $3,600; and on November 9, 1892, the board of directors passed a resolution which, after reciting that Fairchild had been in the employ of the corporation since its organization "as managing agent and manager," and had been paid by the president $3,600 for his services, declared that "the acts of said president in advancing and paying said J. A. Fairchild said sum of $3,600 on account of his services be, and the same is hereby, approved, ratified, and confirmed." There were present at this meeting four directors, who constituted a quorum. Fairchild was one of the four, but he did not vote on the resolution, which was passed by the votes of the other three. At this same meeting a resolution was passed reciting that Fairchild had been elected general manager in September, 1891, and had ever since been acting as such without having his salary fixed, and declaring that his salary "be, and the same is hereby, fixed at the monthly sum of $200 per month from November 1, 1891, to April 1, 1892, and that thereafter he should receive a salary of $750 per month, which should remain the same until changed by the board of directors." On the 10th day of January, 1893, there was a general meeting of the stockholders. At this meeting there were present stockholders representing 2,510 shares of the capital stock of 3,000 shares; and by a resolution adopted by a majority of the shares, exclusive of those represented by Fairchild, it was resolved "that all the acts of the board of directors and officers of this company for the past year be approved and ratified."

The by-laws provide that "the compensation and terms of office of all officers of the corporation (other than directors) shall be fixed and determined by the board of directors." This language does not on its face mean that the compensation must be expressly and definitely agreed upon and settled before performance of the services; but respondents contend that under the general law, established by judicial decisions, there can be no lawful allowance to an officer of a corporation for services, no matter what their character and value, where the amount of the compensation had not been fixed prior to the rendition of the services. Many authorities on this subject have been cited on both sides, and they are to some extent conflicting. Most of those cited by respondents merely declare the rule that a "director" as such, without some previous understanding, is not entitled to pay for services which are within the ordinary duties to be expected of him as director, although some of them no doubt apply the rule to other officers or agents who are also directors, but as to the last proposition the weight of authority and reason is the other way.

As a general rule, when one person performs valuable services for another, whether the other be a corporation or a natural person, the law raises an implied promise to pay a reasonable compensation for the services, unless they are performed under circumstances which show an understanding that they were to be gratuitous. It frequently happens that one natural person performs valuable services for another natural person for which the former cannot recover, because circumstances show that they were rendered without any expectation of compensation. Now, it has been held that directors of corporations cannot, without previous express contract, receive compensation for such ordinary services as are usually rendered by directors without pay; for the common understanding, as declared by judicial decisions, is that such services are presumed to be rendered gratuitously. But that presumption does not apply to those onerous services performed by officers and agents of a corporation, though they be also directors, for which compensation is usually demanded, and allowed, and which could not reasonably be expected to be performed for nothing. The correct rule is stated by the United States supreme court in Construction Co. v. Fitzgerald, 137 U. S. 98, 11 Sup. Ct. 36, 34 L. Ed. 608. In that case, Fitzgerald, who was a director of a corporation and its treasurer, acted as superintendent and general manager, and as such did valuable work, "not at all pertaining to his office as director," and the question was whether he was entitled to compensation for such work done before any compensation was fixed. The opinion of the court states that the trial court "instructed the jury that if Fitzgerald, the plaintiff, acted as superintendent, treasurer, or general manager of said company, and transacted the usual business that devolves upon such officer of such a concern as that, with the knowledge and consent of the defendant (during the time before compensation was fixed), there would be an implied agreement on the part of the defendant to pay what the services are reasonably worth, and afterwards repeated this instruction more in detail, confining it to services as manager." The verdict was for Fitzgerald, and the judgment was affirmed. The court said: "The general rule is well stated by Mr. Justice Morton (since chief justice of Massachusetts) in Pew v. Bank, 130 Mass. 391, 395: 'A bank or other corporation may be bound by an implied contract in the same manner as an individual may. But, in any case, the mere fact that valuable services are rendered for the benefit of the party does not make him liable upon an implied promise to pay for them. It often happens that persons render services for others which all parties understand to be gratuitous. Thus, directors of banks and of many other corporations usually receive no compensation. In such cases, however valuable the services may be, the law does not raise an implied contract to pay by the party who receives the benefit of them. To render such party liable as a debtor under an implied promise, it must be shown, not only that the services were valuable, but also that they were rendered under such circumstances as to raise the fair presumption that the parties intended and understood that they were to be paid for; or, at least, that the circumstances were such that a reasonable man, in the same situation with the party who receives and is benefited by them, would and ought to understand that compensation was to be paid for them.' Tested by this rule, we think that the court fairly left it to the jury to determine whether Fitzgerald rendered services of such a character and under such circumstances that he was entitled to claim compensation therefor. It could not properly have been held as matter of law that he was not so entitled."

case directly in point. It is stronger in support of the proposition above stated than the case at bar, because the charter of the corporation in that case provided that the board of directors should appoint the officers, "and fix their compensation for the services to be rendered." Rogers was a director, and was appointed secretary of the corporation, and also acted as its land commissioner and attorney, and sued for the value of services rendered in such capacities. There had been no compensation fixed, nor any contract made, before the services were rendered, and it was contended there, as here, that no compensation could be recovered for past services. But it was held otherwise. The court said, among other things, as follows: "The evidence showed that the plaintiff, while acting as land commissioner, was a member of the board of directors. If his services as land commissioner had been performed by him simply as a director, it might be that he could not recover for the same, since, in the absence of a special agreement for compensation, he would, according to many authorities, be presumed to have acted gratuitously. But the duties and labors of a land commissioner of a land grant railroad company do not necessarily nor presumptively pertain to a director as such. Indeed, it would be unreasonable to suppose that duties so onerous would be undertaken by one acting simply as a director without pay. For such extraordinary services, outside of and beyond his duties as director, a party may certainly recover, notwithstanding his directorship; for the reason that, even if he performs the duties of director gratuitously, these services are not a part of those duties" (citing cases). In Henry v. Railroad Co., 27 Vt. 435, there was a standing resolution of the board that a director should not receive more than two dollars per day for special services, yet a director was allowed to recover for services which were outside his duties as a director in an amount much greater than could have been allowed under the resolution for services as director. The court said: "There are services which may be rendered for the benefit of a corporation, the performance of which may be delegated by the directors to other persons. For that purpose the directors may employ, as their agents, those who are not members of the corporation, or they may employ one of their own number. A director is not incapacitated to discharge those duties, and receive the same compensation which other agents would be entitled to recover. * * * In rendering those services the plaintiff was not acting in his official capacity as director, but as the agent of the corporation, and his compensation is no more limited by that vote than it would be if the services had been rendered by others who were not directors." In Sawyer v. Bank, 6 Allen, 209, the court, speaking of the circumstances under which the presumption arises that officers of a corporation are to be paid for their services, says: "Such a presumption arises in reference to any species of work, labor, or employment which is usually and commonly the subject of hire and reward, and paid for, whether any specific bargain is or is not made concerning it." In Beach, Priv. Corp. § 208, the author says: "When the charter of a corporation provides that certain officers may be elected, and their salary fixed, by a board of directors, and a president is thus elected, but without a salary named, the law raises an assumpsit on the part of the corporation to pay a reasonable compensation for his services rendered after election." In Mor. Priv. Corp. § 508, the author says: "If a director is properly employed to perform services which do not pertain to his office as director, he is entitled to such compensation as has been agreed upon, or as the services are reasonably worth." There are many other authorities to the same effect as those above cited, but they are too numerous to refer to here. See Ang. & A. Corp. § 317; Pew v. Bank, 130 Mass. 391; Chandler v. Bank, 13 N. J. Law, 255; Shackelford v. Railroad Co., 37 Miss. 209; Association v. Meredith, 49 Md. 389; Cheeney v. Railroad Co., 68 Ill. 575; Bank v. Drake, 29 Kan. 311; Severson v. Milling Co., 18 Mont. 13, 44 Pac. 79; Felton v. Mining Co., 16 Mont. 81, 40 Pac. 70. There was nothing decided in McCarthy v. Water Co., 111 Cal. 328, 43 Pac. 956, that conflicts with the views hereinbefore stated. There the plaintiff, who was a director of the corporation defendant, sought to recover of the latter the value of services rendered without any previously fixed salary or compensation; and a judgment in his favor was reversed merely because the trial court had erroneously excluded evidence offered by the defendant which "tended to show the relations of the parties, * * * and to throw light on the question whether or not it was intended that he should have compensation." The court referred to Barstow v. Railroad Co., 42 Cal. 465,—which was also an action brought by a director to recover for services rendered before his compensation had been fixed,—and quoted from the opinion in the latter case as follows: "The situation of the parties at the time—the relations, if any, in which they stood of a business character or otherwise—are important to be known and considered in order to arrive at a correct solution of the ultimate question involved." In neither the McCarthy Case nor the Barstow Case is there anything in the nature of a decision that there cannot be a recovery by an officer of a corporation who is also a director unless his salary had been previously fixed, but the contrary in both cases is assumed and necessarily decided. In the McCarthy Case it is assumed that plaintiff could have recovered on "an implied contract arising out of, and inferable from, the situation and relation of the parties"; and it is further said that "respondent, being a director of appellant, was not entitled to compensation for services rendered the corporation unless the circumstances were such as to raise an implied assumpsit to pay what they were reasonably worth." We conclude, therefore, upon the authorities above noticed, as well as upon reasonable and just principles, that Fairchild was not precluded from having a legal claim for the value of his services merely because that value had not been fixed beforehand.

In the opinion delivered in department it was held that the allowance of Fairchild's claim by the board of directors on November 9th was valid, notwithstanding the fact that the presence of Fairchild was necessary to constitute a quorum, and that, at all events, the allowance was an act that could be ratified by the stockholders, and that it was so ratified on January 10, 1893, as above stated. Since then it has been held in Curtin v. Ditch Co. (Cal.) 62 Pac. 552, that there is no legal quorum of directors present when action is attempted to be taken on a matter as to which one of the directors necessary to make the quorum is interested. Assuming this to be the established law on the subject, and that, therefore, the resolutions of November 9th were invalid, and assuming, also, that the invalid action of November 9th could not be ratified by the stockholders, still, under the above views, Fairchild was entitled to receive compensation upon quantum meruit for whatever his said services were reasonably worth, and appellants should be credited in this action with an amount of money equal to the value of said services. Buck v. City of Eureka, 109 Cal. 522, 42 Pac. 243, 30 L. R. A. 409. In the latter case it was declared that the plaintiff should be allowed to amend his complaint, if so advised. In the case at bar an amendment would hardly be necessary, as the facts supporting a quantum meruit are fully stated; but, if appellants be advised to amend their pleading in that respect, they should be allowed to do so.

It is contended by appellants that, after the case had been submitted, the court made orders allowing an amendment setting up a claim for about $300 for an entertainment to the board of supervisors of San Francisco at one of the mines (which appellants claim to have been legitimately expended in furtherance of the interests of the corporation), and an amendment setting up a claim for counsel fees of $2,000 alleged to be reasonable, and also an order that these amendments "are deemed to have been by defendants denied"; and that these orders were erroneously made. The record, however, does not clearly show that these things occurred in the manner asserted by appellants, and, as a new trial is to be ordered, it is not necessary to consider them. Of course, appellants should be allowed to contest these new items of the entertainment and the counsel fees. The reasonableness of the counsel fees which were allowed need not be passed upon; the finding as to that may be different on another trial. The judgment and order appealed from are reversed, and the cause is remanded for a new trial, with directions to the superior court to find the reasonable value of Fairchild's services as manager of the corporation, and to credit the amount thereof to appellants.

HARRISON, J. (dissenting). The plaintiffs bring this action as stockholders in the Bitumen Consolidated Mining Company, a corporation, one of the defendants, to recover from the other defendants, for the benefit of the said corporation, certain moneys alleged to have been illegally misapplied and withdrawn by them from the corporate funds of said corporation while acting as its directors. Judgment was rendered against the defendants, and they have appealed.

The defendant corporation was organized, under the laws of this state, in 1891, with a board of six directors, and a capital stock of $300,000, divided into 3,000 shares. The defendants Fairchild, Walrath, and Perine were directors of the corporation from its organization until the time of the commencement of this action (July 21, 1893). The defendant Miles was elected a director November 1, 1892, and thereafter acted as such director. The other two directors were the plaintiffs Bassett and Swift. The by-laws of the corporation were adopted at the time of its organization, in 1891, and provide as follows:

"The officers shall be a president, vice president, secretary, and treasurer, which officers shall be elected by, and hold office during the pleasure of, the board of directors. The vice president shall be the manager of the corporation. The compensation and tenure of office of all officers of the corporation (other than directors) shall be fixed and determined by the board of directors."

"The board of directors shall at their first regular meeting elect one of their number to act as president; and, if at any time the president shall be unable to act, the vice president shall take his place and perform his duties; and, if the vice president from any cause shall be unable to act, they shall appoint some other member of the board to do so, in whom shall be vested for the time being all the duties and functions of his office."

"The vice president, in addition to the duties imposed upon him in article 7 (that is, when acting in place of the president), shall be the manager of the corporation, and shall perform such duties as may be prescribed from time to time by the board of directors."

At the organization of the corporation, Walrath was elected president, Fairchild vice president and manager, and Perine treasurer, of the corporation, and they continued to hold those offices until the commencement of the action.

The court rendered its judgment against the appellants upon its findings, as facts in the case, that they had mismanaged and illegally applied the funds of the corporation in the following particulars: In paying to the defendant Fairchild the sum of $6,475 for services rendered by him as manager of the corporation prior to November 9, 1892; in paying $1,888.05 for the expenses of certain litigation for the benefit of the defendants Fairchild and Walrath, and in which the said corporation had no interest; in paying $332.25 for the entertainment of certain San Francisco supervisors at a clam bake in San Luis Obispo county. The court finds that during all the time covered by these transactions the corporation was under the control and management of the four defendant directors, and that the aforesaid payments were made under their direction, and that the plaintiffs Bassett and Swift protested and objected to the said payments, and at no time ratified or sanctioned the same. The payment of these sums of money out of the corporate funds, under the direction of the defendants, is not controverted, but they contend that they had authority to make them.

The facts connected with the payment of the money to Fairchild are as follows: As before stated, Fairchild was elected vice president at the organization of the corporation, and by virtue thereof acted as its manager under the provision of the aforesaid by-law, and rendered various services to the corporation. It was provided in the by-laws that the funds of the corporation should be deposited in bank, and should be paid out only by the check or order of the president, countersigned by the secretary. October 11, 1892, Walrath, with the consent of the defendant Perine, withdrew from the funds of the corporation $3,600, in disregard of this provision of the by-law, and without having the check therefor countersigned by the secretary, and paid the same to Fairchild for services rendered by him as vice president and manager. November 9, 1892, the defendants Walrath, Fairchild, Perine, and Miles held a meeting of the directors,—the other directors, Bassett and Swift, plaintiffs herein, not being present,—and caused the following resolution to be entered upon their records: "Whereas, J. A. Fairchild has been in the employ of the Bitumen Consolidated Mining Company since its organization as its managing agent and manager; and whereas, he has been paid by authority of the president thirty-six hundred dollars on account of the services rendered for the company; Therefore be it resolved, that the acts of said president in advancing and paying the said J. A. Fairchild said sum of thirty-six hundred dollars on account of his services be, and the same is hereby, approved, ratified, and confirmed." At the same meeting they also caused the following resolution to be spread upon their minutes: "Whereas, J. A. Fairchild was, on September 1, 1891, duly elected by this board of directors vice president and general manager of this company, and has continued to act as such general manager, and no salary for the services has been fixed: Now, be it resolved, that the salary of J. A. Fairchild, as general manager of this company, be, and the same is hereby, fixed at the monthly salary of two hundred dollars per month from November 1, 1891, to April 1, 1892, and that thereafter, to wit, from the 1st day of April, 1892, he shall receive as general manager of this company a salary of seven hundred and fifty dollars per month, and remain the same until changed by the board of directors."

These resolutions were adopted by the votes of Walrath, Perine, and Miles. Fairchild, although present, did not vote upon the adoption of either of them. Under this resolution there was paid to Fairchild, as and for his salary for services rendered prior to November 9th, the sum of $2,875, aside from the sum of $3,600 which had already been paid to him by Walrath. At a general meeting of the stockholders held January 9, 1893, at which there were present the holders of 2,510 shares of stock, a resolution was adopted "that all the acts of the board of directors of this company for the past year be approved and ratified." 1,510 votes were cast in favor of the resolution, and 1,000 votes against it. The plaintiff Swift voted 1,000 shares against its adoption, and, of those voting in its favor, the defendant Fairchild represented 500 shares, Perine represented 485 shares, Walrath 500 shares, and Miles 10 shares.

1. That the action of Walrath, in withdrawing $3,600 and paying it to Fairchild without any authority from the board of directors, and in disregard of the by-laws of the corporation, was a violation of his duty as director, as was also the act of Perine in consenting thereto, and of Fairchild in receiving the money, is not open to question, and has not been contended for by the appellants. No validity was imparted to this act by the resolution adopted at the meeting of November 9th. At that meeting there were present only four directors, and Fairchild was one of this number. Although he abstained from voting, there was not a competent majority of the board at that meeting to bind the corporation. The resolution then adopted ratifying the act of Walrath in making the payment was not, therefore, valid as a corporate act, and the resolution purporting to fix the salary of Fairchild was equally invalid for the purpose of creating any obligation against the corporation. Curtin v. Ditch Co. (Cal.) 62 Pac. 552. Neither is the position of the defendants fortified, nor did they receive any immunity from their acts, by reason of the vote of the stockholders in January, 1893, purporting to ratify the acts of the directors during the previous year. The resolution of November 9th, as we have seen, did not constitute an act of the "board" of directors, and, consequently, could not be affected by this resolution of the stockholders. Moreover, it was not in the power of a majority of the stockholders to vote to themselves or to one of their number the funds of the corporation against the protest and objection of the minority. A majority of the body of stockholders has no power to vote away the funds of the corporation for an illegal purpose, or to make a gift of its funds, against the will of the minority. If the claim of Fairchild for his services was not a legal charge against the corporation, a majority of the stockholders could not authorize its payment, and their ratification of an unauthorized payment by the directors would add no strength to the act of the directors in making such payment. The stockholders had no authority to determine what should have been the salary of the manager. Both by the statute (Civ. Code, § 305) and by the by-law above quoted this authority was conferred upon the board of directors, and could not be exercised by the stockholders. See Gashwiler v. Willis, 33 Cal. 11, 91 Am. Dec. 607.

2. It is contended, however, by the appellants that the services rendered by Fairchild constituted a valid claim against the corporation, which could have been enforced by him, and that they were therefore justified in paying this claim. This proposition is rested upon their contention that his services as manager were of great value to the corporation, and were of an extraordinary character, and not within the scope of his duties as a director or officer. The by-laws herein provide that the compensation of all of the officers of the corporation shall be fixed and determined by the board of directors, and the court finds that the board of directors did not, prior to November 9, 1892, adopt any resolution fixing or determining the compensation for any services that might be rendered by Fairchild, and that there was no contract or agreement between them, at any time prior to November 9th, with reference to his salary, or to the compensation to be paid for his services, and "that he acted as such manager and vice president without any contract respecting such salary."

The rule is well settled that in the absence of any provision, agreement, or resolution on the part of the corporation fixing a salary or compensation for its directors, who are also officers, they are not entitled to any compensation for services rendered by them as such officers or directors. Smith v. Putnam, 61 N. H. 632; Sawyer v. Bank, 6 Allen, 207; Road Co. v. Branagan, 40 Ind. 361; Ellis v. Ward, 137 Ill. 509, 25 N. E. 530; Kilpatrick v. Bridge Co., 49 Pa. 118; Kelsey v. Sargent, 40 Hun, 150; Railroad Co. v. Kneeland, 120 N. Y. 134, 24 N. E. 381, 8 L. R. A. 253; Pew v. Bank, 130 Mass. 391; Pierce, R. R. 31;

Wickersham v. Crittenden, 93 Cal. 17, 28 Pac. 788. In McCarthy v. Water Co., 111 Cal. 337, 43 Pac. 956, this court said: "As the respondent was a stockholder and director of the corporation, he was not entitled to compensation for services rendered by him for it, no matter under what claim or official position, unless there was some kind of a contract for such compensation." The interest of the directors in the subject-matter of the trust, and the advantages to be derived from their individual supervision of a corporation, are deemed to be a sufficient consideration for assuming the position, and authorize the presumption that they undertook to perform its duties without the acceptance of compensation. Such presumption can be overcome only by an agreement or resolution on the part of the corporation to the contrary before the services are rendered. This is but the application of the general rule as to the compensation of trustees. A trustee cannot, by his own act, while executing the duties of his trust, or by the performance of the duties assumed by him therefor, create an obligation against his beneficiary. By accepting the trust he assumes to act for the benefit of his beneficiary, and to perform gratuitously all the services necessary therefor. If the particular duties of his office are not defined, whatever services he may voluntarily render will be presumed to have been within his contemplation when he entered upon the trust, and he has no right of recovery for any services required of him in the exercise of the trust which may be referable thereto, and for which no compensation has been fixed. This rule has been applied where one of a board of directors was appointed treasurer, and performed the duties of that office. (Holder v. Railway Co., 71 Ill. 106); where the president of a bank was appointed superintendent of the repairs of the bank building (Pew v. Bank, 130 Mass. 391); where the vice president of a corporation was also appointed its general superintendent (Besch v. Manufacturing Co., 36 Mo. App. 333); where the president of a corporation was appointed its manager (Rose v. Carbonating Co., 60 Mo. App. 28).

In the cases cited in the opinion of Mr. Justice McFARLAND, where the right to compensation for services was upheld, this right was based upon the ground that the services were outside of the functions of a director, and had been rendered either in some ministerial or executive capacity,—such as secretary or treasurer of the corporation, or as superintendent or manager of its works,—to which he had been appointed by the other members of the board, or had been rendered under a similar appointment or authority in matters entirely distinct from the management of the corporate affairs, as in the case of an attorney at law or agent, whose functions were such as could be delegated by the board of directors to a person not a member of the corporation. In the Fitz- gerald Case the court bases its ruling upon the fact that "the character of all the services rendered by him placed them outside of official duties proper." A portion of the claim for these services, as stated by the court, was for the expense and trouble in procuring money for the company while acting as its treasurer. In its instructions to the jury, the circuit court had said that "if Fitzgerald acted as superintendent, treasurer, or general manager of said company, and transacted the usual business that devolves upon such officer," etc., he would be entitled to recover. In commenting upon this instruction the supreme court concedes that the reference therein to the "treasurer" was erroneous, but that the error was unimportant, saying in its opinion immediately following that portion which is quoted by Mr. Justice McFARLAND: "The reference to the treasurer, as made in one clause of the charge, even though inaccurate, was not of sufficient moment to require a reversal of the judgment. In none of these cases does it appear that the services for which the director was held entitled to compensation were rendered by him by virtue of his office, or that they were rendered in exercise of the official duties which he had assumed by virtue of his position as director."

In the present case Fairchild did not hold the position of manager by reason of any special appointment to that office by the board of directors. He was manager only by virtue of his position as vice president, and whatever service he performed as manager was by virtue of this position. The by-laws declare: "The vice president shall be the manager of the corporation, and shall perform such duties as may be prescribed from time to time by the board of directors." His election as vice president made him ipso facto manager, and his acceptance of the office carried with it an obligation on his part to perform all the duties required of the manager. It does not appear that any duties were imposed upon him or prescribed for him by the board of directors, after he was elected a director, other than those which existed by virtue of the by-laws, and the court finds that all of the services rendered by him prior to November 9, 1892, "were rendered within the functions of vice president and manager of said corporation and director thereof." These findings of fact are fully sustained by the evidence, and upon these facts the court has no alternative than to hold that he was not entitled to any compensation or salary for any of the services rendered by him as vice president or as manager during this period, and that the appellants should restore to the corporation the money that had been withdrawn for the payment of the services.

This liability does not depend upon any proof or finding of negligence or fraud on the part of the defendants, or upon the extent or value of Fairchild's services. The defendants may have acted in the utmost good faith in making the payment, and the corporation may have derived great benefit from his services, but, as the law forbids him from receiving any compensation therefor, they were not authorized to make the payment, and the legal obligation exists upon them to restore the money so withdrawn.

The rule invoked by the appellants that the law implies an agreement for compensation when one receives valuable services from another has no application in the case of services rendered to a corporation by one of its officers or directors. The mere fact that a director has rendered valuable services to the corporation does not create an implied promise on the part of the corporation to pay him therefor. The presumption in such case that the services were rendered gratuitously can be overcome only by showing an agreement for such compensation before the services were rendered, or that the services were distinct from those which pertain to the office, and the burden of making this showing is upon the claimant. The absence of an agreement that he should not be compensated therefor is not enough. It must be affirmatively shown that an agreement for compensation was made before the services were rendered.

The finding of the court that "no contract" respecting his salary was made before the 9th of November includes an implied, as well as an express, contract, and its findings that the services rendered were within his functions as vice president and manager preclude any implied promise to pay therefor. There could be no implied assumpsit for services which the law presumes he had agreed to render gratuitously. There were no duties imposed upon him after he was elected director of the corporation other than existed by virtue of the by-laws. Whatever services he rendered to the corporation were performed at his own suggestion, and without any direction from the board of directors, and it must be held that they were performed gratuitously, and without any expectation of compensation.

The appellants have not presented in their brief any argument against the correctness of the judgment to the extent that it declares them liable for the moneys paid for the expenses of the litigation which affected only Fairchild and Walrath, and the findings of the court in that respect are fully sustained by the evidence. The payment out of the corporate funds for the entertainment of the supervisors at a clam bake was unauthorized, even if it could be shown that the corporation had derived a benefit thereby. Whether such benefit was derived must, however, rest very materially in conjecture.

The objection that after the case had been tried and submitted to the court for its decision, and it had given directions for a judgment in favor of the plaintiffs in the sum of $1,888.05, the court improperly allowed certain amendments to the complaint, and ordered that they be considered as denied, and thereafter proceeded to render the judgment herein without again submitting the cause, cannot be considered. There is no bill of exceptions in the record, and, in the absence of any showing of the circumstances under which these acts and directions of the court were made, it cannot be assumed that any error was committed therein. The judgment and order should be affirmed.

DE JARNATT v. MARQUEZ. (L. A. 752.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 21, 1901.)

JURISDICTION—APPELLATE—ORIGINAL—JUS-TICE OF THE PEACE—SUPERIOR COURT.

Where an action to recover on a note for $250, and for $100 attorney's fees, was appealed from a justice to the superior court on questions of both law and fact, such court had original jurisdiction of the controversy, so that, while it could not obtain jurisdiction by the appeal, it could try the case anew after the parties had voluntarily submitted themselves to the jurisdiction, and the judgment rendered in such trial was valid.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Lucien Shaw, Judge.

Action by J. L. De Jarnatt against Pascual Marquez. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

R. Dunnigan and H. L. Dunnigan, for appellant. Hugh J. and Wm. Crawford, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. Plaintiff brought an action in the justice's court for the sum of $250, being the principal of a promissory note, and he also asked judgment for the sum of $100 as an attorney's fee in the litigation, the note providing for a reasonable attorney's fee in case suit was brought. Defendant filed a demurrer, one of the grounds of demurrer being that the court had no jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action. The demurrer being overruled, issue was joined, and judgment went for plaintiff. Defendant appealed to the superior court upon questions of both law and fact. The case was tried upon its merits, and judgment again went against him. He now appeals to this court, and attacks the jurisdiction of the superior court to try the case, and render judgment therein. He claims that the justice court had no jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action, and that, therefore, the judgment rendered by the court was void. He then claims that, the justice's court having no jurisdiction to try the case, the superior court, by appeal, gained no jurisdiction to try it, and for that reason its judgment is also void.

Defendant made no complaint at any time of lack of jurisdiction in the superior court to hear and decide this case upon its merits. It will therefore be seen from the foregoing statement of facts that he has placed himself in a somewhat novel position. Section 976, Code Civ. Proc., says: "When a party appeals to the superior court on questions of fact, or on questions of law and fact, no statement need be made, but the action must be tried anew in the superior court." Defendant appealed to the superior court upon both questions of law and fact. He made no protest or objection going to the jurisdiction of that court to try the case upon its merits, and, without raising any question of law whatever in that court, he goes to trial, and then, having lost his case, for the first time he here denies the jurisdiction of the superior court to hear and determine the cause. It may at least be said that, in the orderly course of civil procedure, he should have raised this jurisdictional question in the court where the case was upon trial. Of course, if the judgment there rendered is absolutely void,—a mere nullity,—the question may be raised anywhere and at any time, yet certainly the better practice and more orderly procedure would have been to pursue some other course than that which has been here followed.

In this case the superior court had original jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action. While not securing jurisdiction of the cause by virtue of the appeal, it had jurisdiction over it by virtue of the constitution. The defendant brought the pleadings before that court by reason of his appeal upon questions of both law and fact. The court then having jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action, and jurisdiction of the person and the parties going to trial upon the merits by consent, we are at a loss to see how a judgment rendered under these circumstances is void. The authorities fully support the conclusion to which we have arrived. Randolph County v. Ralls, 18 Ill. 29; Birks v. Houston, 63 Ill. 77; Allen v. Belcher, 3 Gilman, 594; Harrington v. Heath, 15 Ohio, 483; Van Dyke v. Rule, 49 Ohio St. 535, 31 N. E. 882; City of Santa Barbara v. Eldred, 95 Cal. 378, 30 Pac. 562; Hart v. Carnell-Hopkins Co., 103 Cal. 132, 37 Pac. 196. It further may be said that the question here involved was not considered in the case of Ballerino v. Bigelow, 90 Cal. 500, 27 Pac. 372. The appeal in that case was decided alone upon the proposition that the superior court could not obtain appellate jurisdiction upon an appeal from a judgment of a justice's court in a case of which that court had no jurisdiction over the subject-matter. But, however that may be, this case in its facts is similar to Hart v. Carnell-Hopkins Co., supra, and the decision in Ballerino v. Bigelow must give way, if the law there declared is opposed to the later case. As to the relative effect resulting from an appeal to a superior court upon questions of law alone, and from an appeal upon questions of both law and fact, see Maxson v. Superior Court of Madera County, 124 Cal. 468, 57 Pac. 379. For the foregoing reasons, the judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. KELLY. (Cr. 685.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 21, 1901.)

CRIMINAL LAW—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY—INSTRUCTIONS—HARMLESS ERROR—FORGERY—FILING FORGED INSTRUMENT.

1. Where there is no evidence that defendant entered into a conspiracy with others relative to the crime with which he is charged, conversations of such other persons, in the absence of defendant, are inadmissible.

2. Error in reading a city ordinance in the instructions in a criminal case is not rendered harmless, on the ground that the evidence, aside from the ordinance, is conclusive on defendant's guilt, since the weight of the evidence is for the jury.

3. Reading a city ordinance prohibiting the police court clerks from accepting bail bonds outside the city hall is error in a prosecution of such a clerk for filing a false bail bond, under Pen. Code, § 115, making it criminal to prosecute or offer any false or forged instrument for registration.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; William P. Lawlor, Judge.

Thomas A. Kelly was convicted of filing a false bail bond, and he appeals. Reversed.

Dibble & Dibble, for appellant. Tirey L. Ford, Atty. Gen., for the People.

GAROUTTE, J. The defendant has been convicted of a felony under an indictment charging him with a violation of section 115 of the Penal Code, wherein it is provided that every person who knowingly procures or offers any false or forged instrument to be filed, registered, or recorded in any public office within this state, which instrument, if genuine, might be filed or registered or recorded under any law of this state, or of the United States, is guilty of a felony. By the indictment defendant is charged with filing in a public office a false and forged bail bond.

The court will notice but two assignments of error relied upon for a reversal of this judgment. The first assignment is based upon the admission of a great mass of evidence as to occurrences taking place between one Wilson, a prisoner, and Wilson, his attorney, not in the presence of the defendant, and subsequent to the release of the prisoner from jail, upon an order based upon the aforesaid false and forged bond. There appears to be no evidence in the record of any conspiracy existing between the defendant and the two Wilsons bearing upon the subject-matter of the crime here alleged; and for that reason all matters occurring without the presence of the defendant between the Wilsons were inadmissible in evidence as in any way affecting his rights. There is an attempt made by the prosecution to show that the defendant was present in company with them, a short time after the release of the prisoner, but the attempt to show this fact is most feeble, and we deem the evidence wholly insufficient to establish it.

The trial court in its instructions to the jury read to them an ordinance of the city and county of San Francisco, wherein it is prohibited to the police court clerks (of which the defendant was one) to accept bail bonds outside of the limits of the city hall. It is conceded by the trial court, in an opinion attached to the record, that the reading of this ordinance to the jury was error upon its part; but it is asserted that in view of the fact that the evidence, aside from this ordinance, pointed conclusively to defendant's guilt, that, therefore, the reading of it did no harm, and for that reason it was in no wise prejudicial to him. Questions of fact are essentially matters for the jury to pass upon, and it is not for this court, nor for the trial court, to say that any particular quantum of evidence absolutely points to defendant's guilt. That is a question resting alone with the jury, and neither this court nor the trial court has the right to deprive the jury of its constitutional function in this regard. The court is at a loss to see the competency of this ordinance, even if it had been offered in evidence; and upon its face, when it came before the jury, it was clearly prejudicial to defendant's right, for the bail bond accepted in this case was accepted without the limits of the city hall, and for that reason the act of the defendant was violative of this ordinance of the city. And, the act being violative of the ordinance, it is impossible for this court to say that a showing of such violation of a city ordinance did not prejudice the defendant with the jury before whom he was being tried. For the foregoing reasons, the judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

ANGUS et al. v. CRAVEN (FAIR, Intervener. S. F. 1,458).

JURY TRIAL—ACTION TO QUIET TITLE—FORGED DEEDS—CROSS BILL.

1. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 738, providing that an action may be brought by any person against another who claims an estate or interest in real estate adverse to him, to determine such adverse claim, where the complaint shows that plaintiff is the owner and in the actual possession, and that defendant claims some title which is unfounded, and the answer admits plaintiff's possession, and does not allege prior possession in defendant, the defendant is not entitled as of right to a jury trial.

2. Plaintiffs alleged that their testator died seised and possessed of certain land, and that defendant claimed an interest therein based on certain forged deeds, and prayed to quiet their title. Defendant's answer admitted deceased's possession, denied that the deeds were forged, and claimed ownership thereunder. Held, that a cause of action was stated under Civ. Code, § 3412, providing that a written instrument in respect to which there is a reasonable apprehension that, if left outstanding, it may cause serious injury to a person against whom it is void or voidable, may be so adjudged on his application, and ordered to be delivered up or canceled.

3. The action being equitable, it was not error to refuse a jury trial.

4. Where plaintiffs alleged ownership and possession of land, and that defendant claimed title thereto under forged deeds, and prayed cancellation of such deeds, and that defendant be restrained from claiming thereunder, such equitable action cannot be changed into a legal action by defendant filing a cross bill in the nature of ejectment, so as to entitle defendant to a jury trial.

Temple, J., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Charles W. Slack, Judge.

Action by James S. Angus and others, executors of the will of James G. Fair, deceased, against Nettie R. Craven, defendant; Virginia Fair, intervener. From a judgment in favor of plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

D. M. Delmas and Denson, Oatman & Denson (W. W. Foote, J. H. Dickinson, and A. Ruef, of counsel), for appellant. Pierson & Mitchell, Garret W. McEnerney, Bishop & Wheeler, Lloyd & Wood, Wilson & Wilson, Knight & Heggerty, and Garber, Boalt & Bishop, for respondents.

McFARLAND, J. This is an appeal by the defendant, Nettie R. Craven, from a judgment in favor of plaintiffs and the intervener. Appellant made a demand for a jury for the trial of "said cause," which was refused, and the only question presented on this appeal is whether she was entitled to have said cause tried before a jury. Persons other than appellant were originally made defendants, but by defaults, disclaimers, etc., they disappeared from the case, and need not be further noticed; and in hereafter stating the pleadings we will treat them, for convenience, as if Mrs. Craven were the only defendant. In considering the question above stated, it will be necessary to notice as briefly as possible the condition of the pleadings.

The action was commenced on June 23, 1896, by a complaint which contained, substantially, these averments: James G. Fair died testate on December 28, 1894, and at the time of his death was the owner in fee and in actual possession of certain described lands. On the next day his will, together with a petition for the probate thereof, was filed in the proper court; and on January 2, 1895, the plaintiffs and one Bresse, since deceased, were appointed special administrators of his estate, with very full enumerated powers. Plaintiffs and said Bresse immediately assumed their rights and duties as such administrators, and took possession of all the property of the estate, including the premises described in the complaint, and continued to act as administrators until the death of Bresse, on April 22, 1896, and thereafter respondents continued to so act. It is averred that defendant claims and pretends to have some right or interest in said described lands adverse to the estate of Fair and to plaintiffs as such administrators, but that said claim is false and fraudulent, and is based in part upon certain false and forged deeds purporting to have been executed by the said James G. Fair, deceased, in his lifetime, on the 8th day of September, 1894, which deeds purport to convey the said lands hereinbefore described to the defendant, Craven, and were recorded in the recorder's office of the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, where said lands are situated, on the 19th day of June, 1896. It is further averred that the defendant sets up claims and pretensions to said lands under said forged deeds, and that such claims and pretensions tend to cloud the title of the estate of said Fair, deceased, to the said premises; to impair the market value thereof; to obstruct plaintiffs' management of said premises as special administrators; to harass and annoy them in their possession thereof and in the collection of rents therefrom; to depreciate the market value of said premises; and to thereby inflict irreparable injury upon the said estate and upon plaintiffs as administrators thereof,—and that, unless restrained by the judgment or decree of the court, the said false claims and assertions will continue to injure plaintiffs as above stated. It is further averred that, by a special order of the court, plaintiffs are authorized to commence the action. The prayer is that plaintiffs be decreed to be the lawful owners in fee of the premises and entitled to the possession thereof; that defendant has no right, title, or interest therein; and that she and those claiming under her be forever restrained from asserting any title or interest therein and from interfering with the possession thereof, "and for such other and further relief as may be just and agreeable to equity." To this complaint the appellant on July 17, 1896, filed her answer. By her answer she admitted that James G. Fair at the time of his death was in the actual possession of the premises, and that plaintiffs were at the time of the commencement of the action, and had been since their appointment as administrators, in the possession thereof. She denies that Fair was the owner of the premises. She admits that she claims under the deeds set up in the complaint, but denies that they, or either of them, was forged or simulated, and avers that each of them is true and genuine. She avers that she is the owner in fee of the premises. She admits that she will continue to harass and annoy plaintiffs in the possession of said premises until they shall have recognized and yielded to her rights as owner thereof. She also filed a cross complaint, which is, in form, what we generally call a "complaint in ejectment," in which she prays for possession of the property, with damages for withholding the same. To this cross complaint defendants filed an answer in which they denied all the material averments in said cross complaint.

Afterwards the will of said Fair, deceased, by which plaintiffs were appointed executors of his estate, was admitted to probate, and letters testamentary were issued to them as such executors. Thereafter, on February 24, 1897, plaintiffs filed their supplemental complaint, in which they set up the fact that they had become executors, and restated the material averments in the original complaint; but, in addition to said averments, they averred that the claim of the defendant was based solely upon the alleged forged deeds before mentioned. The prayer was substantially the same as in the original complaint. To this supplemental complaint the appellant, Craven, filed an answer substantially the same as her former answer to the original complaint, and in addition filed a cross complaint which was substantially the same as her former cross complaint. To this cross complaint the plaintiffs filed an answer denying its averments, and also a further and separate and distinct answer for the purpose of obtaining affirmative equitable relief. In this further answer all the facts as to the claim of defendant, Craven, under the two alleged forged deeds are again set up; and it is further alleged that the certificates of acknowledgment attached to said spurious deeds which entitled them to record were also false and spurious, and were not made or attached to said deeds until long after the death of said Fair, deceased, and also that in said forged instruments the dates, names of parties therein, and the description of the premises alleged to have been conveyed thereby, and the signature of said James G. Fair, were all written in lead-pencil writing, so that it would be within the power of any person having possession of the same to erase portions of said pencil writing and to write therein descriptions of other property of the deceased, and thus the outstanding of said deeds constitutes a constant menace to the interest of said estate, not only as to the property therein alleged to have been conveyed, but as to all other property of the estate; and it is prayed that the defendant, Craven, "do immediately surrender the same to this honorable court for cancellation."

Afterwards the respondent Virginia Fair was allowed to file a complaint in intervention, in which she alleged that she was the owner of one undivided third of the lands, and alleged in detail the possession by Craven of said two deeds, and her assertion of title under them; that said deeds were forged, as averred in the former pleading, and that the certificates of acknowledgment thereto which entitled them to record were spurious, and made long after the purported date of the same and after the death of said Fair; and she attached to her complaint copies of said alleged forged deeds, and copies, also, of the alleged spurious certificates of acknowledgment. She further alleged that the assertion of right under said false deeds and certificates was a cloud upon her title and caused her irreparable injury: and her prayer was that the defendant, Craven, be restrained from asserting or pretending that said deeds were valid or genuine, or from claiming any right or interest in or to said premises under said deeds, and that the court proceed to hear and determine without a jury the matters of equitable cognizance set forth in her complaint, and for such other and further relief as is meet in the premises and in conformity with equity. Defendant, Craven, moved to strike out this complaint in intervention, and the motion was denied. Afterwards the court granted the motion of plaintiffs "to proceed first with the trial of the equitable issues," to which ruling defendant excepted. The court then proceeded to the trial without a jury, and, having found all the material facts alleged in the pleadings of the respondents, found and decreed that the defendant, Craven, and all persons claiming through or under her, be forever enjoined "from asserting or pretending that said alleged deeds, or either of them, are or is valid or genuine, or from claiming or asserting any right or title to the said premises, or any part thereof, under the said deeds, or either of them." It was also decreed that the defendant, Craven, has no right or interest in or to any of the premises described in the complaint.

The case has been presented very fully by counsel on both sides, and with much labor and ability, and it is not at all free from difficulty. It is argued from various standpoints, one of which is that the action must be treated solely as an action to quiet title under section 738 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Taking this view of the case, it may be said that a complaint under section 738, having no averments inconsistent with the scope of that section as heretofore construed, presents on its face a case for equitable remedy. It seeks to have something done which a court of law cannot do. It invokes a decree in equity, not a mere judgment at law, which in its nature is only for the recovery of the possession of specific real or personal property or for damages. The purpose of the section is evidently to afford a remedy similar in character to that of the old bill of peace, but extending it to cases which the latter remedy did not reach. See Curtis v. Sutter, 15 Cal. 259. Courts, however, in guarding the constitutional rights to a jury trial, have repeatedly held that where the suit should have been, and in substance is, an action for the recovery of the possession of land, the right of a defendant to a jury cannot be defeated by the mere device of bringing the action in an equitable form. And so it has been held that the right to a jury is not defeated where at the commencement of the action the defendant, and not the plaintiff, was in the actual possession of the premises involved; and it has also been held that where the defendant had been for a long time in the actual possession, and the plaintiff had ousted him, the plaintiff, by first bringing his action to quiet title, could not by such inversion of parties avoid the defendant's right to a jury, but that the action should be treated as substantially an action to recover possession. But this is as far as this court has gone in Donahue v. Meister, 88 Cal. 121, 25 Pac. 1096; Newman v. Duane, 89 Cal. 597, 27 Pac. 66; Gillespie v. Gouly, 120 Cal. 515, 52 Pac. 816; Moore v. Copp, 119 Cal. 434, 51 Pac. 630; and kindred cases. As was substantially said in Donahue v. Meister, supra, the decision of the question whether, in an action brought under section 738, either party is entitled to a jury, must depend greatly upon the facts in that particular case. It has never been held by this court that an action to quiet title under the Code cannot be maintained as an equitable action where the plaintiff was, and for a considerable period of time had been, in actual possession, and defendant had never been in possession, or that in such case a defendant can overthrow the equitable character of the action by simply answering that he has title, and praying that he, for the first time, be let into possession. A complaint showing that plaintiff is the owner of the land and in actual possession of it, and that defendant asserts some right or title thereto which is unfounded, followed by an answer admitting plaintiff's possession, and not showing prior possession in defendant, seems to present the very action contemplated by the Code provision; and, under these conditions, its continued equitable character is not affected by the particular kind of right which the defendant sets up. Therefore, if we are to consider the case at bar solely in the light of an action to quiet title under section 738, we do not think that, under the conditions above stated, the court below erred in denying appellant's demand for a jury.

But really the action is something more than an action under section 738, if that section be construed as limiting the judgment to be entered to a mere general decree quieting title. Section 3412 of the Civil Code provides that "a written instrument, in respect to which there is a reasonable apprehension that if left outstanding it may cause serious injury to a person against whom it is void or voidable, may, upon his application, be so adjudged and ordered to be delivered up or cancelled." Relief under this section is clearly equitable, and it could not be successfully contended that in an action brought under it the defendant would be entitled to a jury trial. Now in the case at bar the facts averred in respondents' pleadings entitled them to relief under section 3412, and to have the alleged forged deeds declared to be such and to be canceled. The only apparent obstruction to this view is the fact that in their complaint the plaintiffs did not expressly pray that it be decreed that the deeds are forged, and that appellant be enjoined from asserting any right under them, etc.; contenting themselves merely with the general prayer for "such other and further relief as may be just and agreeable to equity." If respondents had put into their complaint the specific prayer above alluded to, we apprehend that there would have been great difficulty in making any plausible objection to the refusal of the demand for a jury trial. But section 580, Code Civ. Proc., expressly provides that when there is an answer to the complaint the court may grant plaintiff "any relief consistent with the case made by the complaint and embraced within the issue." See Walsh v. McKeen, 75 Cal. 519, 521, 522, 17 Pac. 673, and cases there cited; Grain v. Aldrich, 38 Cal. 520; Rollins v. Forbes, 10 Cal. 299; Pom. Rem. §§ 71, 580. It is said by Pomeroy (section 580, supra), quoting from the New York court of appeals, that "the relief demanded by no means characterizes the action, or limits the plaintiff in respect to the remedy which he may have." In Walsh v. McKeen, supra, the original prayer of the complaint was merely for a money judgment, and "during the progress of the trial" the plaintiff was allowed, against defendant's objection, to amend the prayer "so as to ask for an accounting, and for such other and further relief as might be deemed equitable and proper"; and it was held here that this was not error, although it actually changed the remedy from legal to equitable,—the court saying that, "when an answer has been filed, any relief may be granted to the plaintiff which is consistent with the facts stated in the complaint." In the case at bar no such amendment was necessary, for the prayer for general equitable relief was sufficient. However, in the answer to the cross complaint the prayer was made specific, so that appellant cannot claim that she was not fully informed on the subject long before the trial.

It is said that a court of law can try questions of fraud and forgery as well as a court of equity. Of course, this is true, and it is true of any question of fact, considered independently of the circumstances under which it arises. Either a court of equity or a court of law can hear and determine any issue of fact which is presented for adjudication in a proceeding properly before the court; otherwise, there could scarcely be any equitable remedies. But the circumstance that either kind of court may try a question of fact has no weight in determining whether upon a particular state of facts the remedy is legal or equitable.

In appellant's original points and authorities it is said by counsel that her cross complaint "was not necessary and did not really affect the proceeding"; but in parts of their subsequent arguments they seem to claim that the action should be treated as if it had been commenced by the cross complaint in ejectment, and that the cross complaint and the answer thereto are the only pleadings to be considered, and that the verdict of a jury in favor of plaintiffs would have afforded them ample remedy at law. But, for the reasons hereinbefore given, the equitable character of the remedy sought by plaintiffs was not overthrown by the filing of the cross complaint; and, moreover, if there had been merely a general verdict for plaintiffs, the record would not have shown the ground on which it was rendered, and, under any view, the judgment which could have been rendered on such verdict would not have been the equivalent of an equitable decree forever restraining appellant from asserting any right or interest under the forged deeds. When a party claiming under an invalid instrument would be compelled in establishing his rights to make direct proof of its genuineness or validity, equitable interposition might not be necessary; but a forged deed fraudulently acknowledged and placed on record is admissible in evidence without further proof of execution, and, as was said in Paper Co. v. O'Dougherty, 81 N. Y. 483, "when the law raises a presumption without direct proof of the validity of a conveyance, and its invalidity can only be made to appear by extrinsic evidence, a case is presented for the exercise of the jurisdiction of a court of equity, to compel the surrender and cancellation of the instrument as a cloud upon title."

We do not deem it necessary to consider counsel's discussion of the question whether or not the intervention of Virginia Fair was properly allowed; for the pleadings of plaintiffs fully presented the matters at issue, and her absence from the case would not have affected the disposition of the issues involved, or the substance of the decree. The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

We concur: VAN DYKE, J.; GAROUTTE, J.

I dissent: TEMPLE, J.

HIENSHAW, J. I concur. Defendant in the first instance was called upon to defend her deeds to the property against allegations that they were spurious and forged, and should be delivered up and canceled. Upon these allegations she joined issue. These issues, and the relief under them, were of equitable cognizance. That defendant at the same time filed a cross complaint in the nature of an action in ejectment could not operate to oust the court in equity of the jurisdiction it had acquired. Under our system, equitable and legal rights are determined in the same forum. It is within the discretion of the court to control the order of proof upon the issues joined. In the natural order, before defendant was entitled to a hearing upon the legal issues tendered she must defeat plaintiffs upon the equitable issues presented by them. This was the view of the trial court, and, in pursuance of it, it took to itself, as was proper, the determination of these equitable matters. The result was that it found defendant's deeds to have been forgeries. Had it reached the opposite conclusion, then defendant might with right have insisted that the remaining issues of law be tried before a jury. But that time never arrived, and I do not concede the right of a litigant to oust a court of equitable jurisdiction, in an action of purely equitable cognizance, merely by tendering additional issues which are triable at law before a jury. It is sufficient if a jury be had when those issues come to trial.

PEOPLE v. SUESSER. (Cr. 570.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 9, 1901.)

HOMICIDE—CHANGE OF VENUE—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

Pen. Code, § 1033, directs a grant of a change of venue in a criminal case on a showing that a fair trial cannot be had or a jury cannot be obtained. Defendant, who was a man of bad repute, made an assault on a person who had filed an information against him, and fired several shots into his house. The sheriff went to the house of defendant, and was shot by him. A mob was formed, composed of persons of standing in the community, and mob violence was only prevented by prompt removal of defendant to another county. The defendant was denounced in the pulpit and by the press, and public opinion was unanimous that the death penalty should be inflicted. Sixty-eight jurymen were examined on their voir dire, and all but eight had formed an opinion as to defendant's guilt, and three of these were excused. Held, that it was error to refuse a change of venue.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Monterey county.

George Suesser was convicted of murder in the first degree, and he appeals. Reversed.

Dougherty & Lacey, for appellant. Tirey L. Ford, Atty. Gen., and H. A. Melvin, for the People.

TEMPLE, J. The defendant was tried and convicted of murder in the first degree, and sentenced to be hanged, and has appealed from the judgment and from an order refusing a new trial.

The principal point relied upon for a reversal is the refusal of the court to grant a change of venue upon the showing made by the defendant. Section 1033, Pen. Code, directs the trial court to grant the change when it is made to appear that a fair and impartial trial cannot be had in the county, and when from any cause no jury can be obtained in the county where the action is pending. So far as this case is concerned, both provisions mean the same thing. A fair trial cannot be had where an unbiased jury cannot be had, and a juror who has an unqualified opinion that defendant is guilty, founded upon a knowledge of material facts of the case, does not possess the common-law qualifications for a juror, and it does not matter how that knowledge was obtained, provided the juror believed it. Indeed, the rule went beyond this. A juror was disqualified if he had made positive and unqualified statements in regard to the guilt of the defendant; and to suppose that the majority of mankind would or could act as freely, in the face of such statements made to neighbors and friends, as he could have done if such statements had not been made, is to ignore human nature. It was said in People v. Wong Ark, 96 Cal. 136, 30 Pac. 1115: "And when the constitution of this state guaranties to all the right of trial by jury, it means an impartial jury." It guaranties a common-law jury. Cooley, Const. Lim. 390; People v. Powell, 87 Cal., 348, 25 Pac. 481, 11 L. R. A. 75. It is true that this test as to whether a proposed juror is impartial, and can try a cause uninfluenced by rumors and newspaper accounts, has been modified, and much is now left to the discretion of the trial court, but it is not intended by this to deprive any one of the right to be tried by a jury which is in fact unprejudiced. No more now than formerly is a defendant compelled to submit his case to a juror who has such an opinion of his guilt as will require evidence to remove it, and thus unjustly add to the burden of his defense. The force of this suggestion will be appreciated, if we suppose the prejudice to have been the other way. Suppose the deceased, instead of being killed, had slain the defendant, and without just excuse, and this same demonstration had been made in his favor; all the newspapers, we may suppose, filled with denunciations of the deceased and commendations of his slayer; and suppose the jurors, when called one by one, all, or nearly all, as in this case, had testified that they had formed strong opinions from what they had read and heard in favor of the prisoner, and if taken as jurors would commence the trial with opinions in favor of the defendant, which it would take evidence to remove, and yet each juror should testify that he could fairly try the defendant and determine the case uninfluenced by his opinion. Could any one believe that a verdict of guilty could be obtained from such a jury? The very atmosphere pervading the community would forbid it. And yet the coercion of public opinion is a thousand times stronger in this than it would have been in the case supposed.

The defendant, to say the least, was a person of no consideration in the community. He had been arrested before for trifling offenses. He is said to have been an idler, addicted to drink. He made his living principally by hunting. He had been arrested on a charge of petit larceny, made by one Delaney. In the evening of September 18, 1899, he went to the dwelling house of Delaney at Salinas, and, calling him to the door, assaulted him. He afterwards fired several shots at the house, and set fire to a haystack on the premises. A fire alarm was turned in, and naturally the people were much excited. The deceased was sheriff of the county, a young man much esteemed. It is said he was the most popular man in the county. Upon hearing the alarm of fire, and upon learning something in regard to the conduct of Suesser, the sheriff went, with others, to prevent further trouble. Whether he at first designed to arrest Suesser does not appear. Going to the house of Suesser's parents, they found Suesser with a gun, and his parents and sisters trying to persuade him to remain at home. They heard Suesser, with an oath, declare that he would go and kill some person, probably Delaney, or Allen, who had served a warrant upon him. The sheriff addressed him, saying, "No, you won't," and advised him to remain at home. He asked him, "Do you know me, George?" Defendant replied, with a vulgar oath: "Yes; and I will shoot you, too." The sheriff then said: "George, behave yourself. I will shoot. I will shoot." Suesser immediately fired, killing Farley.

The affidavits upon which the motion for a change of venue was based state that the homicide was in the presence of several persons, who have detailed the occurrence for the public press, and such reports have been circulated throughout the country. Upon the arrest of defendant, which was shortly after the homicide, a large concourse of people gathered on the streets, which was composed of citizens of standing and repute. These openly threatened to lynch the defendant, and he was saved from mob violence by hurrying him in a carriage at breakneck speed through the streets of the city, and before reaching the jail the officers were met by another crowd bent upon violence, who were defeated only by dashing into a side street, and going out of the city. In the morning early the prisoner was secretly lodged in jail, around which a crowd gathered, who threatened to break into the jail and hang the defendant. Fearing this, the officers clandestinely removed defendant from the county. He was brought back for a preliminary examination on October 11th, and the examination was held at the sheriff's office, rather than at the office of the justice of the peace, for fear of further violence. And "that the defendant has been denounced in the church pulpits and in the public press, and the opinion is practically unanimous in Monterey county that no punishment but death is deserved by the defendant." The accounts published in the papers are appended as exhibits. Their nature is not overstated in the affidavits. It was natural that the greatest indignation and sorrow should be expressed. Their sheriff was killed in the performance of his duty,—in fact, in protecting the people of the city from the acts of an incendiary, who, while the fire set by him was still raging, was heard to declare his intention to take the life of a citizen. First vainly attempting to persuade the defendant, as was reported, to remain at home, and to abandon his homicidal intent, he endeavors to make the arrest. He was then shot down in the presence of several citizens by this, as represented, most desperate criminal. Many affidavits and considerable testimony was submitted by the defense, and there was a counter showing. This amounted to little more than a showing that after the lapse of a few days the excitement abated, and there was no real intent to lynch the defendant; also that there was not so much excitement in the remote parts of the county. That but one opinion in regard to the guilt of the defendant existed throughout the county is admitted. There was no pretense that such opinion had changed, but only that the feeling against the defendant was less intense. The motion was renewed after the examination of the panel on voir dire as to their qualifications, and was again denied. So far as the record shows, if I make a correct estimate, 68 jurors were examined, and all except 8 had formed an opinion as to the guilt of the defendant. So far as appears, all were against the defendant. Of the 8 who had not formed opinions, 2 were excused because opposed to capital punishment, and 1 had not been assessed. This left 5. Perhaps 5 to 60 would not unfairly divide the county between those who had not formed opinions and those who had. In fact, it is hard to understand how any one who had heard the reputed acts, as coming from several eyewitnesses, could fail to form an opinion against the defendant.

Most of the 20 peremptory challenges allowed the defendant were exercised upon proposed jurors who stated upon voir dire that, if sworn as jurors, they would take their seats in the box with a strong opinion against the defendant, which it would require evidence—some said strong evidence—to remove. Where such a state of things exists, the defendant cannot have a fair and impartial trial. If the change of venue should not be granted in this case, I think the statute should be repealed. Why courts should hesitate to grant change of venue in a proper case I cannot understand. It seems that many, perhaps most, of the merchants and business men of Salinas, made affidavits of the nature I have stated above to prevent such change. Why? Was it feared the defendant would escape if he were allowed a fair trial? It is suggested that there is undue delay in reaching final judgment. Those who complain of delay have prejudged the case, but delays are too often caused by plain disregard of obvious rights of friendless and unpopular defendants. The attorney general says the opinions formed by jurors were based upon rumor or newspaper reports; but there never was any real conflict about the occurrences at the time of the homicide. They were not denied. The opinions were therefore based on the facts as developed at the trial. The defendant testified that he was unconscious, and had no memory of what occurred.

Reference is made to the case of People v. Goldenson, 76 Cal. 328, 19 Pac. 161; People v. Fredericks, 106 Cal. 554, 39 Pac. 944; People v. Durrant, 116 Cal. 179, 48 Pac. 75. One reason for affirming the order in these cases was that leave was given to renew the motion when, on an attempt to impanel a jury, the state of mind would be shown. Here the motion was so renewed. These cases arose, too, in a populous city, where there were over 300,000 inhabitants. But it will be observed that in each case the writer of the opinion would have been better satisfied if the motion had been granted. I admit that much discretion is left in this matter to the trial court.

There are other questions in the case, but, if it is to be sent back with directions to grant the change of venue, a new trial will necessarily result, and such matters will be unimportant. The judgment is reversed, and the trial court is directed to grant the motion for a change of venue for the purposes of a new trial, which is ordered.

We concur: BEATTY, C. J.; VAN DYKE, J.; HENSHAW, J.; HARRISON, J.

McFARLAND, J. (concurring). I concur in the judgment and in the opinion of Mr. Justice TEMPLE. It is not improper, however, to say that, while appellant's counsel do not claim that he was not guilty of some crime, they do contend, with at least some plausibility, that he committed the homicide under a state of wild excitement and frenzy produced by causes entirely disconnected with the deceased, and not necessary to be here detailed, which show the absence of that deliberation and premeditation necessary to constitute murder in the first degree.

SAN JOSE RANCH CO. et al. v. SAN JOSE LAND & WATER CO. et al. (L. A. 671.)¹

NONNEGOTIABLE NOTES—DEFENSES—ASSIGNMENT AFTER MATURITY—MORTGAGES—MISTAKE—IRRIGATION—WATER RIGHTS—PURCHASE—FALSE REPRESENTATIONS—EVIDENCE.

1. Where notes given with a mortgage were nonnegotiable, but were assigned, the assignee took them subject to all equities; and the mortgages could set up the defense that by mistake the mortgage included more property than the parties intended, though the assignee had no notice of the mistake.

2. The notes having been assigned after maturity, they were subject to all defenses under

Code Civ. Proc. § 368, declaring that an assignment of a chose in action, except negotiable paper before maturity, shall be without prejudice to any defense or set-off existing at the time or before notice of the assignment.

3. Under Civ. Code, §§ 3399-3402, providing that, when by mistake a contract does not express the intention of the parties, it may be revised to conform to their intentions, on a finding that a mortgage given by the purchaser of land was intended by the parties to include only the lands purchased, but by mistake it included more, and that the notes given therefor, though nonnegotiable, were assigned with the mortgage after maturity, in good faith, the court should have reformed the mortgage to conform to the intention of the parties before decreeing foreclosure.

4. The president of a corporation which purchased a water right stated that he had thoroughly explored the cañon in which it was located; that the stream dried up, possibly 5 years in 12, and was sometimes so dry that people within four miles had trouble to get drinking water; and that the claims other than that purchased were inconsiderable. The agent who did the purchasing testified that he had been acquainted with the waters of the cañon since 1874, and that for several years he had occasionally traveled over the property on which the right was purchased, and that some years there was not much water, and he had seen the cañon dry. One of the organizers of the corporation testified that the owner of the claim said that he had a right to 70 inches of water under a 4-inch pressure and that the time of year when he could get water varied; that the corporation was claiming the water rights in the cañon, and purchased the claim to extinguish the owner's rights. Held, that the evidence supported a finding that the corporation had not relied on and been deceived by the representations of the owner.

Action by the San Jose Ranch Company and another against the San Jose Land & Water Company and another. From a judgment in plaintiffs' favor, and from an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Dunnigan & Dunnigan and Anderson & Anderson, for appellants. J. S. Chapman, for respondents.

VAN DYKE, J. The action was brought to foreclose a mortgage executed by the defendant company to one Peter H. Taylor to secure the payment of two promissory notes of even date, for $10,000 each. The notes were made by the defendant company to said Taylor in part payment of the purchase price of certain lands and water rights in the San Dimas Cañon, Los Angeles county. The notes were nonnegotiable, and passed, by sale and assignment after maturity, into the ownership of the plaintiffs. Both by answer and cross complaint the defendant corporation sets up and alleges—First, mistake in the contract of mortgage, and asks for a reformation thereof; second, alleges a failure of consideration, through fraud and misrepresentation on the part of Taylor as to the value of his water right. The appeal is taken from the judgment in favor of the plaintiffs, and from an order denying defendants a new trial.

1. The questions presented on the appeal may be grouped under the two heads contained in the defendants' answer and cross complaint. In reference to the alleged mistake in the execution of the mortgage, the finding of the court is as follows: "That it was the intent, purpose, and understanding of the said defendant the San Jose Land & Water Company and the said Peter H. Taylor that said mortgage should create and constitute a lien only upon the land and water right conveyed by said Peter H. Taylor to said defendant the San Jose Land & Water Company by the deed described in the seventh paragraph of these findings, but through mistake and inadvertence, and through the mistake of the scrivener who drafted said mortgage, in copying literally the description contained in said deed into said mortgage, said mortgage was so framed as to constitute a lien upon the flumes, aqueducts, and water rights owned by said defendant the San Jose Land & Water Company other and different and in addition to the water rights, flumes and ditches conveyed by said Taylor to said defendant by said described deed." And further: "That said notes are nonnegotiable notes, and, at the time of said assignments by said Taylor to said Wicks and by the said Wicks to the plaintiffs, the said A. S. Kimball and the San Jose Ranch Company, said notes were past due, but said several assignments, and each of them, was made in good faith and for a valuable consideration, and neither the said Wicks nor the said Kimball nor the San Jose Ranch Company had at the time of the assignment by said Taylor to said Wicks, or at the time of the assignments by the said Wicks to Kimball and to the San Jose Ranch Company, notice or knowledge of any mistake contained in said mortgage, or that it was the intent or purpose of the parties to said mortgage to create a lien upon any water right or other property other than described in said instrument of mortgage." It seems that the court, as a conclusion, found that the defendant was not entitled to relief on the ground of mistake in the execution of the mortgage, from the fact that the plaintiffs and their assignors had no notice or knowledge of the mistake. This fact is quite immaterial, as the notes in question were nonnegotiable. Besides, they were transferred by assignment after maturity, and the plaintiffs, as assignees, took subject to all the equities and defenses which could have been urged against the original payee. Civ. Code, § 1459; Code Civ. Proc. § 368; Bank v. Gay, 101 Cal. 286, 35 Pac. 876; 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 704; 1 Jones, Mortg. § 841 et seq.; Wilts. Mortg. Forec. § 354. On the facts found the court below should have revised and reformed the mortgage, before decreeing its foreclosure, so as to express the intention of the parties when it was executed. Civ. Code, §§ 3399-3402.

2. On the defense of failure of consideration through the fraud and misrepresentation of Taylor, the vendor of the property, the court finds as follows: "That at and prior to the time of the execution of said agreement the said Peter H. Taylor represented to the defendant the San Jose Land & Water Company that said water right so claimed by him was a right to seventy inches of water measured under a four-inch pressure, and acquired by prescription and adverse user; but such representations so made by the said Peter H. Taylor were not made fraudulently or with intent to deceive the said defendant the San Jose Land & Water Company, or for the purpose of inducing the said defendant to enter into said contract of purchase, and said defendant was not deceived by said representations, and was not induced by reason thereof to enter into said agreement of purchase; but said defendant, in entering into said agreement, acted upon its own investigation and judgment, and the investigation and judgment of its officers and agents, and not upon such representations, or any representations, made by the said Peter H. Taylor; and said defendant was at the time of entering into said agreement as fully informed and advised as to the character and extent of the water right so claimed and owned by the said Peter H. Taylor as was the said Peter H. Taylor himself."

The evidence fully supports the finding of the court to the effect that the defendant corporation, in entering into the agreement of purchase, acted upon its own investigation and judgment by its officers and agents. T. W. Brooks, called on behalf of the defendant, was one of the organizers of the defendant corporation, and was president thereof at the date of the purchase and execution of the mortgage. He testified that he was acquainted with the San Dimas Cañon, and had thoroughly explored it, and details an account of his operations in that section of the country, giving the names of the different parties who claimed water rights in the same. He was in fact one of the main promoters of the scheme to develop and control the waters of that cañon, and conduct the same to lands lying below its mouth. He says: "I thought that watershed, properly handled, was one of the valuable properties of Los Angeles county; that it was worth a million of dollars, with an expenditure of a hundred thousand to place a reservoir in it, which was my plan from the first." Again: "Seeing this, and knowing it to be a fact, and furthermore knowing that the summer water is a matter of no consideration,—it is so small that no intelligent man would fight another for it,—I saw that this property could be made a valuable property by building several reservoirs in the cañon, as was the plan, and I went to work to avail myself of this great watershed. It is the winter water that is worth money, and not the summer water that so much talk is about. The stream dries up there, possibly, five years in twelve; and it has been so dry that people were troubled, within a distance of four miles, to get water to drink. These are notorious facts, that all the settlers know. So far as appropriations were concerned, and who was using the water, I found that there was none except Mr. Bixby, Mr. Young, and those people on the mesa, Mr. Chappel. Their amount of water was so small that it was not a consideration, but expected to be respected, and the amount more than respected, in all my plans and operations." Mr. M. G. Rogers, another member of the defendant corporation, and agent of the company to purchase the land from Taylor, and a witness for the defendant, states that Taylor at the time claimed seventy inches of water, and that he had posted notice accordingly, and used the water for five or six years, and that they relied upon Taylor's statement. On cross-examination, however, he says that that conversation with Taylor was at the time he made the contract. He lived only about half a mile from Taylor, and had been acquainted with the waters of the cañon since 1874, and had known Taylor for about twelve years. He had looked at the ditch before he bought it, and was acquainted with the San Dimas creek. The road from Rogers' house to the mountain went over Taylor's place, and he had been traveling over it occasionally for several years. He is asked this question: "Q. Did you at that time know about how much water ran in the stream as far down as Mr. Taylor's ditch, in the irrigating season, as a general rule? A. Well, some years there was considerable, and some years there wasn't very much. Q. Didn't the stream dry up many years, above Mr. Taylor's place, in the summer time? A. The latter part of the season I think it almost always dried up. I have seen the cañon dried clean up; that is, occasionally. Q. But every year, along at the time they begin irrigation, haven't the waters of that stream subsided to such an extent that there is not more than from fifteen to twenty and twenty-five and thirty inches flowing down the — A. That might be, sir. I have never seen it, sir, since I have been in the country. Q. My question was whether you meant that you never saw so much as twenty or thirty inches flowing down as far as the head of Taylor's ditch in the irrigating season. A. Well, that would depend on when you would call the irrigating season. I have seen water running over his ditch when he would be irrigating. He would have all the water in his ditch when he would be irrigating, and still quite a number of inches of water beyond his ditch flowing down the creek. Other seasons he would have it all taken, without none passing his ditch; and then, again, he would have none coming to his ditch. The creek would be dry. And I have seen and known the creek to be that way during the seasons that I have known it." Again he says: "Our company, or some of its members, were at that time claiming rights to the water in the creek; and there were other parties claiming a right to the use of it, to my knowledge, or to some portion of it. I live a little ways above Mr. Taylor, in the cañon,—about a half a mile." And asked by the court, "In other words, you knew that the water rights in the cañon were in an unsettled condition?" he answered: "Yes, sir; yes, sir, we did." Mr. C. M. Wells, another of the original parties who organized the defendant corporation, testified that he went up the cañon with Brooks, and was introduced to Taylor. Negotiations had been in progress before that time for the purchase of the Taylor property. They had a general conversation in relation to his property and his water rights, and the character of them. Taylor told him that he had appropriated 70 inches of water, and Wells asked him during what portion of the year he would get water, and Taylor said it would vary; some years he would not get any water after June; other years it would run up to August. The negotiations for the purchase began before they had incorporated the defendant company, and continued after that. The witness says further: "Our company was then claiming water rights in the cañon. We had the Chappel place at that time, and there was a water right in connection with it. We were claiming the waters of the San Dimas Cañon that time, and the whole of it, and we recognized that Taylor had a right there. We purchased Taylor's claim to extinguish his water right,—to acquire his water right. The stream flows through the Taylor place in its natural course, when there is water enough in it to run down that far. Our company was obtaining water for the purpose of taking it out beyond the cañon upon other lands for use. The Taylor lands lay right directly along the route which we proposed to carry our pipe or ditch line. That would be the only possible route for it." In view of the testimony, therefore, it is quite clear that the organizers and officers of the defendant corporation were quite as well acquainted with the San Dimas Cañon and the water flowing therein as the defendant Taylor himself, if not better. The finding of the court to that effect is therefore fully supported.

The facts having all been found on which to enter a proper judgment, a new trial is altogether unnecessary. The order will therefore be: Judgment reversed and cause remanded, with directions to the court below to revise the mortgage so that it will embrace only the property sold by Taylor, the mortgagee, to the defendant corporation, the mortgagor, and, as thus reformed, to enter judgment and decree of foreclosure thereon.

MEMORANDUM DECISIONS.

BAUER v. QUINN et al. (S. F. 2,438.) (Supreme Court of California. April 6, 1901.) In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Carroll Cook, Judge. Action by A. C. Bauer against John E. Quinn and others. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed. P. F. Dunne, for appellant. Franklin K. Lane, City Atty., and G. W. McEnerney, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. Upon the authority of Cahen v. Wells (S. F. No. 2,439, this day decided) 64 Pac. 699, the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

FAIR v. ANGUS et al. (S. F. 1,155, 1,156.) (Supreme Court of California. April 30, 1901.) In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Charles W. Slack, Judge. Action by Charles L. Fair against James S. Angus and others. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, certain defendants appeal. Affirmed. See 60 Pac. 442. Wm. M. Pierson, Geo. E. Crothers, and Garret W. McEnerney, for appellant executors. Van R. Paterson, for infant appellants. Knight & Heggerty, for respondent Fair. Lloyd & Wood (Wilson & Wilson and Garber, Boalt & Bishop, of counsel), for respondents Oelrichs and Vanderbilt.

GAROUTTE, J. The appeals in this case are taken in an action brought by Charles L. Fair, prior to the admission of the will of James G. Fair to probate, against Angus, Crothers, and Goodfellow, individually and as trustees named in the will, to determine an adverse claim made by them to the Lick House property in San Francisco. Plaintiff made his sisters defendants under an allegation that he could not obtain their consent to join him as plaintiff. An amended complaint was filed, making as additional defendants the then living infant beneficiaries referred to in the will of James G. Fair. The cause was not brought on for trial until after the admission of the will for probate, and at the trial it was shown that the testator died seized of the property, that the plaintiff and his two sisters are his heirs at law, that his will was admitted to probate on the 16th of November, 1896, and letters testamentary issued to the defendants Angus, Crothers, and Goodfellow. The court found that the plaintiff and his sisters are the owners in fee simple absolute of the property described in the complaint; that the defendants Angus, Crothers, and Goodfellow have no right or interest therein, either as trustees under said will or otherwise; and that said minor defendants, or either of them, have no interest therein. Judgment was rendered accordingly. The two appeals in this case are taken by certain of defendants. In view of the decision this day rendered in Re Fair's Estate (S. F. 1,491) 64 Pac. 1000, wherein it is held that the estate passed to the heirs by succession by reason of the invalidity of Fair's will, we find no practical reason presenting itself why the appeals in this case should be considered in extenso upon the various matters presented by counsel in their briefs. The decision in Re Fair's Estate is to the effect that neither the trustees nor the beneficiaries take any estate by Fair's will. This being so, the judgment rendered in this cause should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

MEYER v. CITY OF SAN DIEGO et al. (CAPRON et al., Interveners; L. A. 909.) (Supreme Court of California. Feb. 26, 1901.) In bank. Appeal from superior court, Orange county; J. W. Ballard, Judge. Action by Albert Meyer against the city of San Diego and others. H. I. Capron and another intervene. From an order denying a motion to strike a certain sum from interveners' memorandum of costs, defendants appeal. Affirmed. H. E. Doolittle, for appellants. Works & Works, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. The appellants moved to strike from the cost bill filed herein the sum of $558, which it is claimed is for reporter's fees in transcribing the testimony taken at the trial for the use of the plaintiff and the interveners. The facts are substantially the same as in the case of Meyer v. City of San Diego (No. 904, this day filed), 64 Pac. 124. Upon the authority of that case the order is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. PELLER. (Cr. 707.) (Supreme Court of California. May 7, 1901.) Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Sierra county; Stanley A. Smith, Judge. Alfred Peller was convicted of assault, and he appeals. Affirmed. F. D. Soward, for appellant. Tirey L. Ford, Atty. Gen., for the People.

PER CURIAM. The defendant was convicted of an assault with a deadly weapon, and was sentenced to two years' imprisonment in the state prison; and an appeal appears to have been regularly taken on his behalf from the judgment and from an order denying a motion for a new trial. We have examined the record, and see no prejudicial error; and, as we have recently received a written communication from the defendant, in which he states that he had just learned that the appeal had been taken, that it was taken without his knowledge and against his express direction, and that, while he asserts his innocence, he does not desire a new trial, but prefers to finish his short term of imprisonment, we do not deem it necessary to enter upon a detailed discussion of the case. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

PEOPLE ex rel. ROBERTS v. RUSS et al. (S. F. 1,841.) (Supreme Court of California. March 2, 1901.) Appeal from superior court, Humboldt county; E. W. Wilson, Judge. Action by the people, on the relation of Robert W. Roberts, against W. N. Russ and Z. Russ & Sons for the abatement of a public nuisance. From a judgment in favor of defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed. Atty. Gen. Fitzgerald, L. F. Puter, and C. M. Wheeler, for appellant. J. H. G. Weaver and W. F. Clybourne, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This appeal is taken from the judgment. A separate appeal has been taken from the order denying a motion for a new trial. The briefs upon the two appeals are the same, and we find all the questions discussed come under the consideration of the appeal from the order. That order has this day been reversed. People v. Russ (S. F. 1,840) 64 Pac. 111. Upon the authority of that case the judgment is reversed.

THOMPSON, BEARD & SONS v. WELLS, FARGO & CO. (S. F. 2,142.) (Supreme Court of California. April 6, 1901.) In bank. Appeal from superior court, Napa county; E. D. Ham, Judge. Action by Thompson Beard & Sons against Wells, Fargo & Co. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed. E. S. Pillsbury, Alfred Sutro, and Percy S. King, for appellant. Webber & Rutherford, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The foregoing case was submitted under stipulation that the judgment herein should follow the determination and judgment in People v. Wells, Fargo & Co. (S. F. 2,136, this day decided) 64 Pac. 702. For the reasons given in People v. Wells, Fargo & Co. (S. F. No. 2,136), the judgment in the above-entitled case is hereby affirmed.

PEOPLE v. HARLAN. (Cr. 625.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 23, 1901.)

RAPE—EVIDENCE—LEADING QUESTIONS—INFANT PROSECUTRIX—IMMORALITY—ACTS—CREDIBILITY—ADMISSIONS BY DEFENDANT—EXAMINATION—AGE OF PROSECUTRIX—EVIDENCE—HEARSAY—RESISTANCE—INSTRUCTIONS—AGE OF CONSENT—STATUTE—INCREASE OF AGE.

1. Prosecutrix testified that defendant had sexual intercourse with her. He had boastfully admitted the fact to two witnesses. A physician testified as to her condition. Prosecutrix, her mother, and one aunt testified positively that she was under the age of 16, which was the age of consent. Another aunt's evidence tended to corroborate this. Prosecutrix, four years previous, had given her age to a school teacher as 13, which, if true, would bring her above the age of 16. Held, that the verdict of the jury convicting defendant of rape would not be disturbed.

2. Where the vocabulary of prosecutrix, a minor, was limited, and her answers consequently uncertain, leading questions were proper.

3. Where prosecutrix was asked why she did not say something to M., and, in the next succeeding question, why she did not make complaint to anybody at "the saloon where M. was," which latter question was answered, the exclusion of the first question was not error.

4. Under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 2051, 2052, prescribing the method of impeaching witnesses, questions tending to show the immorality of prosecutrix, or specific acts of immorality, cannot be introduced in evidence merely to affect her credibility, or impeach her, especially where the prosecutrix is below the age of consent.

5. On the day of and prior to commission of the alleged rape defendant had said to a stable keeper that he was procuring a conveyance to have carnal knowledge of a "little girl," without giving any idea as to who the girl was. Other evidence showed that he enticed prosecutrix into the conveyance, and drove to the place where the crime was committed. Held no error in admitting defendant's declaration to the stable keeper.

6. Declarations of defendant, on trial for rape, which clearly referred to the crime in question, and which were properly described as to time, place, and circumstances, were admissible in evidence against him.

7. In a prosecution for rape, evidence as to defendant's sobriety on the day previous to the day of the crime was immaterial to offset the declarations made by defendant in a conversation occurring in the evening of the day of the crime.

8. Where a witness testified as to the date of a transaction, the question, "How is it you can recollect a date as long ago as that and you cannot remember the day of the week?" was properly excluded, as not calling for a fact, but for an argument.

9. Testimony was given as follows: "Prosecutrix is my niece. I think I know her age. Q. What is it? A. I think it is fifteen." Held, that the answer could not be stricken out as not responsive to the question.

10. Objections to the evidence as to the age of prosecutrix in a rape case on the ground that it was based on hearsay, and not the best evidence, must be made in the trial court, or they will not be passed on by the appellate court.

11. Where prosecutrix in a rape case on cross-examination fully described the position into which she had been forced by defendant, and the jury was allowed to inspect the buggy wherein the crime was committed, there was no error in refusing to compel prosecutrix on cross-examination to again assume the position in view of the jury.

12. Evidence that prosecutrix failed to resist the assault of defendant, charged with rape, is immaterial where she was under the age of consent at the time.

13. That a female under the age of consent consented could not be proved, in a prosecution for rape, to affect her credibility; this being immaterial.

14. Where defendant, charged with the crime of rape, testified that he had kept up a course of drinking all during that day, but that he knew what he was doing, there was no prejudicial error in sustaining the objection to a question of defendant's counsel relating to whether or not he had been drinking just before getting into the buggy wherein the crime was committed.

15. An instruction substantially covering instructions requested by defendant in a rape case that, "if the jury believe that any witness has willfully sworn falsely to any material matter, then it is your duty to scan closely and distrust the entire evidence of such witness," is not objectionable on account of the words "to scan closely."

16. Where, in answer to defendant's affidavit for a continuance, counsel for the prosecution admitted that an absent witness, if present, would testify to facts set out in the affidavit of another witness, there was no error in rejecting an instruction based on the theory that the testimony of said absent witness "was conceded and admitted to be true by the prosecution."

17. There was no error in giving as an instruction to the jury Pen. Code, § 263, stating that the essential guilt of rape consists in the outrage to the person and feelings of the female, and that any sexual penetration, however slight, is sufficient to complete the crime.

18. Pen. Code, § 261, which raises the age of consent from 14 years to 16 years, having been duly certified, approved, enrolled, and deposited with the secretary of state, the presumption that it was legally adopted as a law cannot be set aside by showing the history of the bill's adoption.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; Joseph W. Hughes, Judge.

Charles Harlan was convicted of the crime of rape, and from a judgment of conviction, an order denying a new trial, and an order refusing to arrest judgment, he appeals. Affirmed.

William Henley, for appellant. Tiley L. Ford, Atty. Gen., for the People.

GRAY, C. The defendant was convicted of rape, charged to have been committed on a girl under the age of consent, and sentenced to a term of 40 years in the state prison at San Quentin. He appeals from the judgment of conviction, from an order denying his motion for a new trial, and from an order denying his motion in arrest of judgment.

1. The verdict of conviction finds ample support in the evidence. That the defendant had sexual intercourse with the prosecutrix in the most brutal manner conceivable is established by the testimony of the prosecutrix and by the boastful admissions of the defendant made to two different witnesses. This is corroborated by the testimony of a physician as to the condition of the prosecutrix. That the prosecutrix was, at the date of the crime, under the age of 16, was testified by herself, her mother, and one aunt positively. The mother testifies to her daughter's age as being 15 years on the 3d day of January, 1899. The testimony of another aunt tends to corroborate the evidence of the prosecutrix as to her age. This evidence was without contradiction, except that it was shown that the prosecutrix had, on the 14th day of October, 1895, given her age to a school teacher as 13 years. The crime of defendant is charged to have been committed in April, 1899. The jury seems to have given credence to the testimony of the witnesses as against the declaration of the prosecutrix on the question of her age, and, as the jurors are the judges of the evidence, we cannot see our way clear to interfere with the verdict.

2. The first objection to evidence urged on this appeal is to a leading question asked of the prosecutrix by the prosecution, on the ground of its being leading. Leading questions may be allowed on direct examination, in a proper case, in the discretion of the trial court. People v. Goldenson, 76 Cal. 328, 19 Pac. 161. There was no abuse of discretion or error in allowing the leading question under the circumstances disclosed by the record. In the field of inquiry pertinent to the main fact sought to be established by the prosecution, the vocabulary of the witness seems to have been limited, and it was uncertain as to what she meant by some of her answers. A leading question removed this uncertainty, and was, therefore, perfectly proper.

The question as to why she did not say something to Jake Martin at the saloon was answered by the prosecutrix in response to the next succeeding question,—as to why she did not make some complaint to anybody she saw at “the saloon where Jake Martin was.” This latter question embraced “Jake Martin,” and was fully answered. The defendant could not have suffered any injury by the exclusion of the previous question.

The court sustained objections to several questions asked by defendant's counsel on the cross-examination of the prosecutrix, intended to show that one of the houses that the prosecutrix visited with defendant was of ill repute, and that she knew of its character. It is claimed that the answers to these questions would have tended to test the credibility of the prosecutrix. It was not necessary to show in this case that sexual intercourse was had forcibly, and against the will of the prosecutrix. The questions were not proper on the ground stated, or on any other ground. The same rule applies to the evidence of other witnesses as to the character of the house. Questions on cross-examination tending to show the general immorality of the witness, or specific acts of immorality, should never be allowed in any case for the mere purpose of discrediting or impeaching the witness. Same v. Benc, 130 Cal. 159, 62 Pac. 404; Sharon v. Sharon, 79 Cal. 673, 22 Pac. 26, 131; People v. Hamblin, 68 Cal. 101, 8 Pac. 687. Nor can the immoral character of a witness, or specific acts of immorality, be shown by independent evidence for the purpose of impeaching a witness. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 2051, 2052, prescribe the method of impeaching witnesses, and they can be impeached in no way other than therein provided. People v. Johnson, 106 Cal. 289, 39 Pac. 622.

The court did not err in permitting the stable keeper, Lafferty, to state a declaration made by the defendant on the day of and prior to the commission of the alleged crime. The declaration was to the effect that he was procuring a conveyance from Lafferty to go to a place named to have carnal knowledge of a “little girl,” without giving any idea as to who the girl was. This declaration illustrated the intention and purpose of the defendant, and its relation to the case in hand is apparent when we consider that the other evidence in the case tends to show that in the afternoon of the same day of the declaration the defendant, with false promises, enticed the prosecutrix into a conveyance procured from this same stable keeper, and drove with her to the place where the crime was committed. The fact that the defendant procured the horse and buggy for the purpose of enabling him to have sexual connection with a “little girl” would, in some measure, corroborate the other evidence tending to show that he subsequently accomplished that purpose.

The declarations of defendant to the witnesses Bennett and Stanfield clearly identify the transaction about which he was talking as the crime with which he is here charged. The declarations were, therefore, properly admitted in evidence against him. The time, place, and circumstances of these declarations were sufficiently shown.

The conversation between Bennett and the defendant was had, according to statements made by defendant in that conversation, on the evening of the day of the crime. The defendant's condition as to sobriety on the day previous to that was immaterial, and evidence as to it was properly excluded.

The objection to the question on cross-examination of an aunt of the prosecutrix as follows: "How is it you can recollect a date as long ago as that and you cannot remember the day of the week?" was properly sustained. The question did not call for a fact, but for an argument in answer to the argument contained in the question. The witness had already stated on cross-examination that she went to get her father on the 5th day of April, 1884, and that she did not know on what day of the week that occurred. The counsel should have directed his argument as to the witness' memory to the jury in the regular way, and not through the examination of the witness.

Etonia Diaz testified as follows: "Reta Martin is my niece. Her mother is my sister. I think I know Reta's age. Q. What is it? A. I think it is fifteen." Defendant's counsel here moved "to strike out the answer, as not responsive to the question." No objection was made to the question, and the answer was responsive to the question. The motion was properly denied. Immediately after the disposition of this motion the witness stated: "She was fifteen in last January. I know that from letters that her mother sent me. * * * After Reta was born, I received letters from her mother every three months. I did not keep them, and I am most sure that Reta Martin's age is fifteen years. I remember Reta is fifteen years from those letters and other things." No objection was interposed during the giving of the above evidence, but at its conclusion counsel for defendant said: "I move to strike out all the testimony of this witness in regard to the age of Reta Martin, on the ground that there is no positive evidence in regard to it." But there was positive testimony that the witness had received letters from Reta's mother, and that she knew Reta's age from those letters. An objection that evidence is not positive goes to its weight, rather than to its admissibility. It may be that the evidence should have been excluded on the ground that it was based upon hearsay, or was not the best evidence; but neither this court nor the court below is required to pass upon objections that are not made.

It is proper for the trial court to place reasonable limits upon the cross-examination of a witness, and we see no error and no abuse of discretion in the action of the trial court in refusing to direct the prosecutrix to repair with the jury to a stable "across the street from the court house," and place herself in the position in the buggy described by her in her direct examination. On cross-examination the witness fully described the position, stated where her head rested on the horse, and the jury, at the request of defendant, were permitted to inspect the horse and buggy. This was sufficient, and it was not necessary that the witness should assume any position, or point out the spot on the horse where her head rested.

Whether the prosecutrix objected to anything the defendant did was immaterial, for the charge against the defendant proceeds on the theory that she was under the age of consent; therefore her failure to object could not avail the defendant. People v. Vann, 129 Cal. 118, 61 Pac. 776. Her consent could not be proved as affecting her credibility, for it was not proper to contradict her upon an immaterial matter. And, as already seen, it was not proper to show her want of chastity as affecting her credibility. Besides, the defendant testified without objection that "everything that was done was done with her full consent." This substantially covered the ground of and answered the question to which objection was made and sustained. There was no error, then, in not permitting defendant to testify that the prosecutrix made no "objection to anything that was done there."

The defendant testified, "I kept up a course of drinking all during that day, but I knew what I was doing." There was, therefore, no prejudicial error (if any error at all) in sustaining the objection to the question asked of the defendant by his counsel: "Now I will take you back for a moment. State whether or not you had been drinking before you got into the buggy."

This disposes of all the material objections and exceptions to the action of the court in the admission and exclusion of evidence.

3. Nothing worthy of attention herein occurred in the argument of the attorney for the prosecution, so far as the record before us discloses.

4. The court instructed the jury as follows: "The jury is instructed that, if they believe that Reta Martin, or any other witness examined during the progress of this trial, has willfully sworn falsely as to any material matter, then it is your duty to scan closely and distrust the entire evidence of such witness." This instruction contains the substance of two instructions requested by the defendant and rejected by the court, with the words "to scan closely" added by the court. These added words did no harm to the instruction. We think it is the duty of the jury "to scan closely" all the evidence placed before them. The defendant cannot complain of an instruction which is in substance the same as those requested by him.

An instruction drawn on the theory "that the testimony of Ernest Barada was conceded and admitted to be true by the prosecution" was properly rejected by the court because no such concession was made by the prosecution. In fact, Ernest Barada gave no testimony in the case. An affidavit made by defendant for a continuance was filed at the commencement of the trial, in which what the defendant expected to prove by said Barada was set out, and the prosecution admitted "that Ernest Barada would, if present, testify to the facts set out in the affidavits of Charles Harlan"; to which counsel for defendant replied, "Under such admission I am willing to proceed," and the trial went on. The above is all the admission in respect to the matter that we have been able to find in the transcript. There was no error in giving section 263, Pen. Code, as an instruction to the jury.

5. Defendant has reserved for his last point an attack upon the statute under which he is prosecuted. His position is that the amendment of 1897, raising the age of consent from 14 to 16 years, was not legally adopted as a law. The history of the bill by which the said amendment was made, as we glean it from appellant's brief, is as follows: The legislature, at its session of 1897, attempted to amend section 261, Pen. Code, by raising or increasing the age of consent from 14 years to 16 years. The bill purporting to amend the section was known as "Assembly Bill No. 76." The history of the bill shows that it passed the assembly on February 8, 1897, and was transmitted to the senate, by which body it was amended on February 16, 1897, and, as amended, it was passed February 19, 1897; and on the same day it was returned to the assembly, which body, without taking action upon the senate amendment, transmitted the bill, on February 24, 1897, to the governor. On February 25th the governor sent a communication to the assembly and senate, directing their attention to the failure to act on the senate amendment. On February 27, 1897, senate concurring resolution No. 9, recalling the bill from the governor, was passed. On March 1, 1897, the assembly received the bill from the governor, and on March 10, 1897, the assembly concurred in the senate amendment, and it was again transmitted to the governor on March 12, 1897, and was approved by the governor on March 27, 1897. If it were permissible to thus go into the history of the bill, we should have no hesitancy in saying that the same was properly passed and approved, and became a law; but it appears to be settled in this state that the presumption that the amendment was properly passed, arising from the fact that it was properly enrolled, authenticated, and deposited with the secretary of state, cannot be thus rebutted or set aside. Sherman v. Story, 30 Cal. 253, 89 Am. Dec. 93; Yolo Co. v. Colgan (Cal.) 64 Pac. 403.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment and orders appealed from should be affirmed.

SONOMA COUNTY v. HALL et al.
(S. F. 1,529, 1,688.)¹

(Supreme Court of California. May 1, 1901.)

LIMITATIONS—ACTION ON COUNTY RECORDER'S BOND.

Code Civ. Proc. § 338, subd. 1, prescribing a three-years limitation to action "on liability created by statute," and not section 337, prescribing a four-years limitation to action on a written undertaking, applies to an action on a county recorder's official bond because of his failure to collect and turn over legal fees.

In bank. Reversed.

For opinions in department, see 62 Pac. 257, 312.

PER CURIAM. In the decisions of these causes in department the case of Placer Co. v. Dickerson, 45 Cal. 14, had not been considered. It contains a declaration contrary to the views expressed in department, and for that reason a rehearing of the question was ordered. After such rehearings, and full consideration of the cases relied on by the petitioner, the court adheres to the reasoning and decisions contained in the department opinions. In Placer Co. v. Dickerson the decision upon this question is found in a single sentence. No discussion accompanies the determination, no authorities are cited, no reasoning indulged in. The court said merely: "The action is founded upon the official bond of Dickerson as treasurer of Placer county, signed by defendant, and running to the people of the state of California as the obligee therein, and the county of Placer had a right to maintain an action for a breach of its condition, by which an injury has been suffered by the county." But, as pointed out in the department opinions, while the bond of a public official is in a sense a contract in writing, it is at the same time merely security for the faithful performance by the officer of his duties. A written guaranty to answer for the debt of another is likewise a contract in writing, but no one would have the temerity to say, if the statute of limitations had barred the primary obligation, or in any other legal way it had become extinguished, that, because the guaranty was a contract in writing, the four-years statute of limitation would apply. The declaration in Placer Co. v. Dickerson that the action was not upon a liability created by statute is in direct conflict with the language of the later cases of People v. Van Ness, 76 Cal. 122, 18 Pac. 139, and Paige v. Carroll, 61 Cal. 211. Of the other cases cited by petitioner,—which cases he contends follow and support Placer Co. v. Dickerson,—People v. Gardner, 55 Cal. 304, was an action upon the official bond of the surveyor general, and it is held that neither he nor his sureties were liable for his misfeasance in the office of register. The statute of limitations upon an official bond is not discussed or referred to. People v. Van Ness, 76 Cal. 122, 18 Pac.

139, was an action in debt against the commissioner of immigration for fees collected by him. It is said in the opinion: "A cause of action, therefore, existed in favor of the people against appellant at the time of the expiration of his term of office. This action, having been commenced more than three years thereafter, is barred under subdivision 1 of section 338 of the Code of Civil Procedure." The opinion therefore holds that the action was upon a liability created by a statute, and was barred in three years, and to this extent supports the views expressed in the commissioners' opinion. People v. Huson, 78 Cal. 154, 20 Pac. 369, makes no reference to the statute of limitations, or to any statutory liability. San Luis Obispo Co. v. Farnum, 108 Cal. 568, 41 Pac. 447, is reversed upon the authority of San Luis Obispo v. Farnum, 108 Cal. 562, 41 Pac. 445, in which latter case it was held that it was no part of the official duties of a county auditor to receive from the license collector money collected by him for license taxes due the county, and that the sureties on his official bond are not responsible for moneys so received. It has not the slightest applicability to the question under consideration. We find nothing, therefore, in the cases cited to warrant a change in our views. The judgments and orders are, therefore, reversed, and the causes remanded, with directions to the court below to sustain the demurrers to the amended complaints.

PEOPLE v. PARKS. (Cr. 739.)

RAPE—INFORMATION—SUFFICIENCY.

An information against defendant for the crime of rape alleged that "said P., on August 10, 1900, at the county of S., and before the filing of this information, with one C., a female child under the age of 16 years, to wit, of the age of 14 years, and not the wife of the said defendant, P., unlawfully and feloniously did," etc. Held, that the information was not void, as against objection first made on appeal, as failing to charge that the prosecutrix was not the wife of defendant on August 10, 1900.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Solano county; William S. Wells, Judge.

Charles Parks was convicted of the crime of rape, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Frank W. Sawyer, for appellant. Tirey L. Ford, Atty. Gen., for the People.

PER CURIAM. Defendant has been tried and convicted of the crime of rape, and prosecutes an appeal to this court, contending that the information does not state a public offense, in this: that it is not alleged by the information that at the time of the commission of the alleged crime the prosecutrix was not the wife of the defendant. We do not find it necessary to enter into a consideration of the question as to whether or not, under the Penal Code of this state, such an allegation is necessary to the validity of an information. We do not find it necessary, for the reason that, in our opinion, this information in substance does charge that the prosecutrix was not the wife of the defendant. Possibly, the information is defective in this regard, and subject to a special demurrer; but we are entirely satisfied that it is not so defective as to render it wholly void. The information alleges "that the said Charles Parks, on the 10th day of August, A. D. 1900, at the said county of Solano, and before the filing of this information, with one Lela Condon, a female child under the age of 16 years, to wit, of the age of 14 years, and not the wife of the said defendant Charles Parks, unlawfully and feloniously did," etc. Appellant's contention is that the information charges the prosecutrix not to have been the wife of defendant upon the 17th day of August, 1900, the day the pleading was filed; but, as already suggested, as against a general objection to the pleading upon this ground, made for the first time before the appellate court, we are prepared to hold that the information charges the prosecutrix with not having been the wife of the defendant upon the 10th day of August. For the foregoing reasons, the judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. CASTRO. (Cr. 704.)

RAPE—INFORMATION—SEVERAL ACTS—ELECTION.

An information charging defendant with the crime of rape alleged that the offense was committed on June 30, 1899, and that prosecutrix was then under the age of consent. On the trial, over defendant's objection, four separate acts of sexual intercourse by defendant, extending over a period of several months, were sworn to by prosecutrix. No one of the acts was proven to have been committed on June 30th. Held, that the state should have been required to select the particular act relied on to make good the allegation of the information.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; Frank F. Oster, Judge.

Eulogio Castro was convicted of the crime of rape, and from an order granting a new trial the people appeal. Affirmed.

Tirey L. Ford, Atty. Gen., for the People. John Brown, Jr., F. B. Daley, C. N. Damron, Dist. Atty., and J. W. Curtis, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. Defendant has been convicted of the crime of rape. The superior court granted a motion for a new trial, and the state appeals. The offense is alleged by the information to have been committed upon June 30, 1899, and the prosecutrix was alleged to have been under the age of consent. At the trial four separate acts of sexual intercourse committed by defendant were sworn to by the prosecutrix. These acts were proven under objection of defendant, and covered a period of time extending over several months. No one of the acts was proven to have been committed upon the 30th day of June. It is not material upon this appeal as to the particular ground upon which the court based its order granting the new trial; for, if the order should have been made upon any one of the grounds raised by defendant, it will be affirmed. Kauffman v. Maier, 94 Cal. 276, 29 Pac. 481, 18 L. R. A. 124; In re Martin's Estate, 113 Cal. 481, 45 Pac. 813.

The doctrine appears to be fairly well settled that in actions of adultery, seduction, etc., evidence of sexual intercourse between the parties both before and after the particular act charged may be introduced in evidence, as tending to sustain the main allegation. Chief Justice Bartch, in his dissenting opinion in the case of State v. Hilberg (Utah) 61 Pac. 215, thus states the rule: "Where, as in this case, there is a continuation of the relation of intimacy and illicit intercourse between the parties to the offense, evidence of improper familiarity and adulterous acts both before and after the act charged is admissible. Such evidence is received to prove the adulterous disposition in the parties implicated. This appears to be the rule sanctioned by the weight of recent authority." The cases cited by him to support the proposition advanced may well be declared to constitute the great weight of authority. The Hilberg Case, in its facts, and upon the record, is very similar to the case at bar, and many of the reasons there advanced by the court for a reversal of the judgment appeal strongly to the court here. Under the instructions given to the jury in the case at bar, the defendant should have been convicted if any one of the various acts of intercourse sworn to by the prosecutrix was established beyond a reasonable doubt; but certainly the defendant was not called upon to defend himself against all of these respective acts of intercourse, extending through a period of several months. The information only charged one act, and upon that allegation the case must stand or fall. Possibly any one of the acts sworn to by the prosecutrix could have been selected by the state as the act charged in the pleading, but the entire four acts could not be so selected. The state at the commencement of the trial should have been required to select the particular act upon which it relied to make good the allegation of the information. This was not done, and, even conceding that the failure to make such election at that time did not constitute error, because of the want of demand upon the part of the defendant to make the election, still, when the case went to the jury, the court, in some form, should have directed their minds to the particular act of intercourse which it was incumbent upon the state to establish by the evidence, before a verdict of guilty could be returned against the defendant. This was not done.

Under the evidence disclosed by the record, a verdict of guilty or not guilty was the only verdict which could be properly rendered in the case. For the foregoing reasons, the order is affirmed.

I concur: VAN DYKE, J.

HARRISON, J. I concur in the affirmance of the order appealed from, for the reason, in addition to that given in the opinion of Mr. Justice GAROUTTE, that the court erred in admitting evidence of acts of sexual intercourse committed subsequent to the particular act selected by the prosecution in support of the information. The defendant could be convicted only upon proof of the act selected, and any evidence of subsequent acts would create no more than a presumption of his guilt, arising from the establishment of a disposition in that direction. A person charged with a crime is not to be convicted upon evidence that he has at another time committed a similar crime. The evidence thus admitted was manifestly prejudicial to the defendant, and should have been excluded.

(Supreme Court of California. May 25, 1901.)
GRATUITOUS SERVICES—CLAIM AGAINST ESTATE.

One who renders services gratuitously, with no intention to ask or to receive any compensation therefor, cannot make such services the subject of a claim against the estate of the person for whom the service was rendered.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Mendocino county; J. M. Mannon, Judge.

Proceeding for the settlement of an administrator's account. From an order approving and settling the account, the sole heir at law appeals. Order modified and affirmed.

McNab & Hirsch, for appellant. W. P. Thomas, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, C. Appeal from an order approving and settling the administrator's account. The only part of the account drawn in question is the following item: "Mrs. P. H. McClelland, pies, cakes, soups, etc., $208.00,"—which the court allowed as a proper charge. Letters were issued to the public administrator, and the sole heir at law of the deceased filed written objections to the above item. There is no brief for the respondent. The only witness sworn at the hearing in explanation of the charge was the claimant, Mrs. McClelland. She testified with entire frankness that she never had any conversation with deceased about paying for the articles and labor mentioned in the account, and that what she did was "out of kindness for Mr. Peter Hanson." She kept no account of the materials or labor at the time, and she stated that she was advised after the death of Mr. Hanson to put in a claim. She testified that she "never intended to charge Peter Hanson anything."

The single question is presented, namely: May one who renders a kindly and gratuitous service to another, with no intention at the time to ask or to receive therefor any pecuniary compensation, afterwards make such act the subject of a claim? It has been often held, where services were originally rendered gratuitously, they cannot afterwards be converted into a charge. The question is fully discussed in Lampligh v. Brathwait, found in 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. 268. It also arose and was similarly decided in Moulin v. Columbet, 22 Cal. 509. The books abound in cases holding that, under circumstances such as are disclosed here, there is no liability incurred. The court erred in allowing this item. The order, in so far as it approves and allows the above item, should be modified, with directions to strike it from the account, and otherwise the account should stand approved and allowed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; GRAY, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons stated in the foregoing opinion, the order is modified by striking from the account the item of $208 in favor of Mrs. P. H. McClelland, and, thus modified, is affirmed.

EDSON et al. v. SOUTHERN PAC. CO.
(S. F. 2,433.)¹

(Supreme Court of California. May 23, 1901.)
RAILROADS—RAILROAD COMMISSION—JUDICIAL POWERS.

Const. art. 12, § 20, prohibits a railroad corporation which has reduced its transportation rates for the purpose of competition from raising such rates without the consent of the authorities vested with the power to regulate such rates. Section 22 authorizes the railroad commissioners to hear and determine complaints against railroads, but provides that nothing therein contained shall prevent individuals from maintaining actions against railroad companies, and authorizes the recovery of exemplary damages in suits based on excessive charges. Held, that the railroad commission has no jurisdiction of judicial proceedings instituted before it to compel a railway company to reinstate a lower competitive rate which it had formerly made.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; George H. Bahrs, Judge.

Proceedings by E. B. Edson and others, as constituting the board of railroad commissioners, against the Southern Pacific Company, to compel the defendant to restore a lower rate. From a judgment in favor of plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Reversed.

J. E. Foulds (John Garber, of counsel), for appellant. C. N. Sterry, amicus curiæ. Tiley L. Ford, Atty. Gen., Geo. A. Sturtevant, Dep. Atty. Gen., and Frank H. Short, for respondents.

BEATTY, C. J. Section 20 of article 12 of the constitution provides that "whenever a railroad corporation shall for the purpose of competing with any other common carrier lower its rates for transportation of passengers or freight from one point to another such reduced rates shall not be again raised or increased from such standard without the consent of the governmental authority in which shall be vested the power to regulate fares and freights." This is a proceeding under said section to compel the defendant to restore a lower rate which it is charged was adopted by it for the purpose of competition, and which it has raised without the consent of the railroad commission established by section 22 of the same article of the constitution. The complaint consists of two counts, in the first of which it is alleged that the defendant lowered its passenger rate between San Francisco and Fresno for the purpose of competing with the San Joaquin Valley road, and afterwards raised the rate without the consent of the railroad commission. Several of the material allegations of this count are put in issue by the answer. In the second count it is alleged that, in a proceeding before the railroad commission instituted by John C. Moore, the facts alleged in the first count were established and found, and an order duly made requiring defendant to restore the lowered rate. The answer admits these allegations of the second count as to the proceedings actually had before the commission, but does not admit their force or efficacy. There was also a cross complaint by the defendant, to which a demurrer was interposed and sustained; but, on the view we entertain of the case, the order of the court respecting the cross complaint requires no special consideration. Conceding that it was properly overruled, we think the court erred in granting the prayer of the complaint upon the admissions of the answer. The court held that the findings and order of the railroad commission in the proceeding instituted before it as above stated were conclusive as an adjudication against the defendant, and accordingly, without hearing evidence or making any findings except by recital of what the commission had found, made its decree enjoining the observance of the commission's order.

If the commission had no jurisdiction to hear and determine the complaint of Moore, this was clearly an error; and we are of the opinion that the commission, in assuming to adjudicate the matters presented by that complaint, exceeded its jurisdiction. The jurisdiction of the railroad commission to hear and determine complaints against transportation companies is such only as is conferred by section 22 of article 12 of the constitution, which provides that "said commissioners shall have the power and it shall be their duty * * * to hear and determine complaints against railroad and other transportation companies," etc. But what complaints? It is clear from other provisions contained in the same section that they are not given jurisdiction of all complaints against transportation companies, for it is provided that nothing in the section shall prevent individuals from maintaining actions against any such companies, and further that in any action for damages "sustained by charging excessive rates" the plaintiff may, in the discretion of the judge or jury, recover exemplary damages. Plainly, therefore, it is a question of construction what complaints the railroad commission is empowered to hear and determine, or, in other words, what controversies are within its jurisdiction as a court of last resort? To this question we can find no answer in the constitution, except in another clause of this same section, which subjects transportation companies to a fine for any transgression of the rules established by the commission regarding the keeping of accounts and the rates of transportation. We think it is the clearly-manifested intention of the framers of the constitution to make the commission a court for the trial of charges preferred against transportation companies under this clause; and such, we think, and such only, are the complaints which they are empowered to hear and determine. Other complaints as to abuses by transportation companies they may hear and investigate with a view to action in their legislative capacity in the making or modifying of rules for keeping accounts and regulating fares and freights, and also, we think, for the purpose of taking proceedings in the courts on behalf of the public for the correction or restraint of abuses, but their jurisdiction as a court of justice does not extend to causes arising under section 20 of article 12. That section has no reference to rates fixed by the commission, and their power to impose fines is strictly limited by section 22 to violations of the rules and rates made and prescribed by themselves. It is a matter of history that section 20 was adopted by the convention before it was agreed to create the commission subsequently established by section 22,—a fact strongly emphasized by the language of the latter part of section 20, where, instead of naming the railroad commission, resort is had to the awkward periphrase above quoted: "The governmental authority in which shall be vested the power to regulate freights and fares." When the section was adopted it was understood that the power to regulate freights and fares might be left, along with the mass of legislative powers, to the senate and assembly; and, of course, it was not then supposed that any infraction of its provisions would be redressed otherwise than through the medium of appropriate proceedings in the courts. The subsequent adoption of section 22 required no change in this respect, and none seems to have been intended.

The superior court therefore erred in treating the findings and order of the railroad commission as a final and conclusive adjudication against the defendant, and in basing its decree upon the pleadings alone, without proof of the facts alleged in the first count of the complaint. As this error of the superior court necessitates a reversal of the judgment, it is unnecessary, and, as we think, undesirable, that we should at this time undertake to decide the constitutional questions which have been so elaborately argued in the briefs. The judgment is reversed, and cause remanded.

PACIFIC COAST SAV. SOC. v. CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO.

(S. F. 1,503.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 23, 1901.)

TAXATION—FOREIGN BANK BALANCE.

Where there was a balance to the credit of a California corporation in a New York bank, such balance due was properly taxed to the corporation in California.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Charles W. Slack, Judge.

Action by Pacific Coast Savings Society against the city and county of San Francisco. From judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Vincent Neale, for appellant. H. T. Creswell, W. B. Brobeck, City Atty., and Franklin K. Lane, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The plaintiff is incorporated under the laws of this state for the purpose of carrying on the business of a building and loan society, and banking incidental to said business, and has been so engaged since its organization. In connection with its business, the firm of J. and W. Selgman, bankers, doing business in the city of New York, have been its correspondents, and it has been accustomed from time to time, in the course of its banking business, to place money with them to its credit, and to sell, exchange, and draw drafts against the same in the usual and ordinary way customary among banks and bankers. Prior to the first Monday in March, 1896, it had sold in London certain of its bonds of the face value of $100,000, and the proceeds thereof were placed to its account and credit with its said correspondents in New York. After taking into account the drafts that had been drawn by it against its account with the Seligmans, there remained to the credit of the plaintiff with them, on the first Monday of March, 1896, the sum of $65,000. March 30, 1896, upon the demand of the assessor of the city and county of San Francisco, the plaintiff made and returned to him a statement purporting to contain a list of all its personal property, but which did not include the aforesaid sum of $65,000. After receiving this statement, the assessor notified the plaintiff that the same was not correct or satisfactory, and in response to a notice therefor the president of the plaintiff appeared before him, and stated to him that at noon, on the first Monday of March, 1896, there was a debt of $65,000 due from said Seligmans to the plaintiff, which did not appear on said statement, but insisted that the same was not taxable. The assessor thereupon assessed to the plaintiff, in addition to the property that had been returned to him in the aforesaid statement, the said sum of $65,000 as a "solvent credit." Subsequently the plaintiff applied to the board of equalization to reduce the assessment made by the assessor by striking the said sum of $65,000 therefrom, upon the ground that it was not on the first Monday of March within the state of California, or liable to taxation. The application was denied, and thereafter the plaintiff paid to the tax collector the amount of the tax upon all of the property so assessed to it, delivering to him at the same time its written protest against the amount paid upon the said sum of $65,000. The present action is to recover the amount of the taxes paid upon the said sum of $65,000. Judgment was rendered in favor of the defendant, and the plaintiff has appealed.

Upon the aforesaid facts, the judgment of the superior court was correct. The relation between a general depositor of money with a bank and the bank is that of debtor and creditor. Mackay v. City and County of San Francisco, 113 Cal. 392, 45 Pac. 696. The court finds in the present case that the plaintiff did not have any money on special deposit with its New York correspondents, and that the said sum of $65,000 was merely the balance due to it from them, and was a debt owing from its correspondents to the plaintiff on the first Monday of March, 1896. It was therefore properly assessed against the plaintiff as a solvent credit, and as property in San Francisco belonging to it on that day. The fact that the creditor is not a resident of this state is immaterial. "The general rule is that debts attend the person of the creditor, and are taxable at his domicile." In re Fair's Estate, 128 Cal. 607, 61 Pac. 184, and cases cited at page 612, 128 Cal., and page 186, 61 Pac. Other propositions presented by the appellant are discussed in this case, and also in the case of Savings & Loan Soc. v. City and County of San Francisco (Cal.) 63 Pac. 665, and decided adversely to the contention of the appellant. The judgment is affirmed.

Action by Thomas Hodge against Marian G. Norton and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order refusing to set aside an execution and order of sale, certain defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Nicholas Bowden, for appellants. S. A. Baker, S. G. Tompkins, and Wm. M. Beggs, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Marian G. Norton and H. C. Morril, defendants, appeal from the judgment of the superior court for the foreclosure of a mortgage executed by Marian G. Norton to the plaintiff, and for the foreclosure, on the cross complaint of defendant Yocco, of a mortgage executed by Marian G. Norton to him. During the progress of the administration upon the estate of Henry B. Norton, deceased, formerly husband of defendant Marian G. Norton, the court in probate set aside about 36 acres of land, as a homestead for the widow, Marian G. Norton, and her two minor children. The property thus set aside was community property; and, subject to the homestead, the title to an undivided one-half vested in Marian G. Norton, and the title to an undivided one-fourth each in the two minor children. One of the children was a minor at the commencement of the action, and would arrive at majority upon January 1, 1900. In 1894 Marian G. Norton executed the mortgage in suit to plaintiff upon her interest in the homestead land. Subsequently, in 1895, she executed another mortgage upon the same land to her co-defendant Yocco. The decree of the court ordered a foreclosure of the liens of these mortgages, and decreed a sale of Marian G. Norton's interest in the land; providing further, however, that the purchaser at foreclosure sale should be entitled to enter into possession only when the youngest child obtained majority.

Upon this appeal there is no pretense but that the money was paid upon the security of the mortgages, and has not been repaid. The contention merely is that the mortgages so made by Marian G. Norton were nullities, and ineffectual to impose any liens upon the homestead property. This contention is conclusively answered by the case of Hoppe v. Fountain, 104 Cal. 101, 37 Pac. 894. In that case, as in this, the widow executed a mortgage upon the probate homestead set apart to her and to the minor children, and in discussing the validity of this mortgage it was there said: "As the owner of an undivided interest in the land, it was competent for the mother to mortgage or convey such interest. She could not, however, confer upon her grantee or mortgagee any greater rights in the premises than she herself held. As she could not destroy the homestead quality of the premises, or deprive the minor children of their right to occupy the homestead, any grantee of her interest must take it subject to the same limitations. A purchaser at the foreclosure sale can obtain no greater rights than would her immediate grantee, and the court in the foreclosure proceedings would have no right, by reason of any covenant in the mortgage or allegation in the complaint, to make any order or direct any act which would affect the rights of any of her co-tenants. For the purpose of informing the court of the extent of her interest and the nature of the estate which she had mortgaged, it was proper for her to allege in her answer the manner in which her title had been derived, and to show that the premises had been set apart as a homestead, and that their homestead quality had not yet ceased. Upon these facts being brought to the attention of the court, the decree it might make would be adapted to the rights of the respective parties to the action. As the purchaser under the decree would not have a right of entry upon the premises as a co-tenant until the termination of the homestead, that limitation should be included in the decree under which the sale should be made. The demurrer to the separate answer of Mrs. Hoppe should therefore have been overruled." As overruling this case, the appellants rely upon the case of Moore v. Hoffman, 125 Cal. 90, 57 Pac. 769. But the Hoffman Case neither overrules the Fountain Case, nor is it in conflict with it. In the Hoffman Case a probate homestead had been set apart to the widow and the minor children. Upon obtaining majority one of the children deeded his interest, and the grantee under the deed sought to take possession as tenant in common with the widow. It was there decided that when the children arrive at majority their interest in the homestead, as such, ceases, and the homestead as to them is terminated, but as to the widow it continues to be a homestead so long as she desires to preserve its character as such, and does no act towards its destruction. Therefore, in the Hoffman Case, as the widow insisted upon preserving the homestead character, it was held that, as to her, it could not be destroyed by the act of an adult child. In the case at bar, however, it is the widow herself, by her own act, who has destroyed this character.

The court refused to recall and set aside the execution and order of sale which it had issued. The grounds of the motion were that the judgment itself as rendered by the court was void. The court's denial of the motion was therefore proper. The judgment and order appealed from are therefore affirmed.

PEOPLE ex rel., etc., v. BANK OF MENDOCINO et al. (S. F. 2,354.)

(Supreme Court of California, May 29, 1901.)

BANKS—INSOLVENCY—DISSOLUTION—FINAL JUDGMENT—INJUNCTION—APPEAL.

1. A judgment in favor of the people, under the bank commissioners' act (St. 1895, p. 175, § 11), to the effect that defendant bank is insolvent, and it is unsafe for it to continue business; that the property of the bank previously sequestered and in the hands of commissioners be delivered to the corporation for liquidation purposes, to be administered by the directors under direction of the bank commissioners; and that the injunction applied for issue,—is a final judgment, from which an appeal may be taken under Code Civ. Proc. § 1908, subd. 2.

2. The fact that defendants were enjoined under the judgment from doing business "until the further order of this court" did not affect the finality of the judgment, so as to render it nonappealable.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Mendocino county; Albert G. Burnett, Judge.

Suit by the people, on the relation, etc., against the Bank of Mendocino and others. From an order refusing to modify an injunction, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

T. L. Carothers, for appellants. Tirey L. Ford, Atty. Gen., and Geo. A. Sturtevant, Dep. Atty. Gen., for respondent.

SMITH, C. Appeal from an order refusing motion of defendants to modify an injunction. The injunction affected by the motion was part of the judgment rendered March 10, 1896, in a suit of the people against the defendant corporation, under section 11 of the bank commissioners' act, as amended March 26, 1895 (St. 1895, p. 175). The motion was made on two grounds, namely, the one, "that the judgment, * * * by its terms, provides that it be operative only until the further order of the court"; the other, "that the said judgment, in so far as it restrains and enjoins * * * the * * * defendant bank," etc., "is not warranted by the law and facts of the said case." It is claimed by the appellants that the judgment in which the injunction was ordered is "an interlocutory order, and not a final judgment," and the motion, with regard to both the grounds specified, proceeds on this assumption; otherwise, the appeal would not lie, or at least could not be sustained, for the time for appealing from the judgment has long since expired, and, assuming it to be final, it was not in the power of the court to modify it. Code Civ. Proc. § 939, subds. 1, 3. On the other hand, even were the judgment interlocutory, and hence unappealable, as not falling within the class of interlocutory judgments mentioned in subdivision 3 of the section, it would not follow that it would be within the power of the court to modify it. Id. §§ 577, 936, 1908. Possibly a judgment may be final in the sense of the term as used in the sections cited, and yet not final as the term is used in section 939. But, under the view we take of the case, it will be unnecessary to consider this aspect of the subject. We are satisfied that the judgment entered in a case of this character is final in the sense of the term as used in subdivision 1, § 939, Id., and therefore appealable. Such a judgment is, in effect, an adjudication that the defendant corporation is insolvent; that it is unsafe for it to continue business; that the property of the corporation previously sequestered and in the hands of the commissioners be delivered to the corporation for purposes of liquidation, to be administered by the directors under the direction of the bank commissioners; and that the injunction applied for be issued. Id. § 1908, subd. 2. This is the only judgment provided for in the act, and is, therefore, final in the strictest sense of the term. Stockton Combined Harvester & Agricultural Works v. Glens Falls Ins. Co., 98 Cal. 577, 33 Pac. 633; Bouv. Law Dict. "Decree" and "Judgment." Nor is the case affected by the peculiar language of the judgment, which is that the defendants be enjoined, etc., "until the further order of this court." Indeed, we are not satisfied that this addition to the usual form of the order is improper. It is expressly provided in the act that "the affairs of [the] corporation * * * shall be closed and the business thereof settled within" the time specified in the act; and upon such settlement, and the fact being made to appear, it would doubtless be in the power of the court—or, to speak more cautiously, it would perhaps be in the power of the court—to dissolve the injunction. If such be the case, the clause in question would add nothing to the order that was not implied by the law. But, however this may be, the character of the judgment was not affected by the language used. It was undoubtedly final, and there was no limitation as to its effect with reference to its principal provisions, to which the provision for injunction was merely subsidiary. While these remained in force, the injunction—which was essential to their due execution—could not be dissolved. Nor, even if the court had had power or jurisdiction to dissolve it, would it have been justified in doing so. The authorities cited by the respondent fully sustain this proposition.

Woffenden v. Woffenden (Ariz.) 25 Pac. 666; People v. Gold Run Ditch & Min. Co., 66 Cal. 155, 4 Pac. 1150. Still less can the second ground of the appellant be sustained. The judgment was duly entered on sufficient pleadings and findings, and it is now too late to inquire whether it was "warranted by the law and the facts of the case." The order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the order appealed from is affirmed.

AIGELTINGER v. WHELAN et al. (S. F. 1,900.)¹

SHERIFF—ATTACHED PROPERTY—STORAGE CHARGES—SALE—LIABILITY—ATTACHMENT SURETIES—RELEASE—EFFECT—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

1. Code Civ. Proc. § 540, provides that a sheriff must safely keep attached property; and section 553 declares that, if the defendant in attachment recover judgment, all the property attached remaining in the sheriff's hands must be delivered to the defendant. Held, that where a sheriff, without an order of court, allowed attached property in his possession to be sold by a warehouseman for storage charges, he was liable for conversion.

2. Property was seized in attachment, and the sheriff, without an order of court, allowed it to be sold by a warehouseman for storage charges, and defendants in the attachment obtained judgment, which they assigned to A. Held, that the fact that A. discharged the sureties on the attachment bond from liability constituted no defense to an action by him against the sheriff for conversion.

3. Where a sheriff allowed goods which he held under attachment to be sold by a warehouseman for storage charges, and the defendant in attachment obtained judgment, such judgment was admissible in an action against the sheriff for conversion to show a dissolution of the attachment.

4. Where there was evidence that the converted property was worth $315, a judgment fixing its value at that amount was, as a matter of law, supported by the evidence.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Edward A. Belcher, Judge.

Action by E. H. Aigeltinger against R. I. Whelan and others. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Reddy, Campbell & Metson, for appellants. Wal. J. Tuska, for respondent.

GRAY, C. This action is brought by the assignee of the defendants in an attachment suit against the sheriff of the city and county of San Francisco and the sureties on his official bond for damages arising out of a failure on the part of said sheriff to safely keep the attached property of the said defendants in said attachment suit, and to restore the same to said defendants on demand, after judgment rendered in their favor. The plaintiff had judgment, and defendants appealed from the same, and from an order denying them a new trial, and also from an order modifying said judgment.

The undisputed facts of the case are as follows: In the suit of Slosson against Glosser et al., a writ of attachment was issued, and the defendant in this case, as sheriff, under said writ, took into his possession some 22 bicycles and some other articles of small value belonging to said defendant Glosser. Nearly two years later judgment was duly given, made, and entered in said suit in favor of defendants and against the plaintiff therein. Thereupon the said defendant Glosser demanded of said sheriff that he return the property taken by him under said writ of attachment. In response to this demand, the sheriff made no claim of lien on the property for any costs, charges, keeper's fees, or anything of that kind, but stated, in substance, that he did not have the property, that he had stored it, and the warehouseman had sold it for storage, all of which was proven at the trial to be true. Thereafter, and before the commencement of this action, said Glosser assigned his claim against said Whelan, arising out of said facts, to the plaintiff herein. No order was made in the attachment suit allowing or fixing keeper's fees or other compensation to the sheriff for attaching or keeping the property.

It was also proven at the trial, and found by the court, that prior to the commencement of this action the plaintiff herein, in consideration of $60, the amount of the judgment for costs in favor of defendants in the attachment suit, released the sureties from all obligation on the undertaking on attachment given in said suit.

1. In permitting the property to be sold for storage, the sheriff violated the duty to safely keep the same, and to restore it to the defendant on his recovering judgment. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 540, 553. It is unnecessary to determine whether the sheriff ever had a lien on the property; but as to that matter it is sufficient to say that he had no right to sell the property, or to permit it to be sold, pending the suit, in the absence of an order of the court directing its sale. The act of the warehouseman in making the sale is to be treated as the act of his principal, the sheriff, and in so selling, or permitting the property to be sold, without authority of law, the sheriff became liable as for a conversion of the property, whether he ever had a lien on it for his charges or not. It he had a lien on the property, that alone would not warrant such a sale of it as the circumstances here disclose.

2. Nor does the fact that the plaintiff discharged the sureties on the undertaking on attachment from further liability operate as a defense to this action. They were not joint tort feorsors with the sheriff, and it is immaterial whether or not they were liable at all for the act of the sheriff. It is only by virtue of their contract that they can be held so liable. They were guilty of no tortious act. The sheriff's liability arose from his tortious act in not safely keeping the property, but permitting it to be disposed of contrary to law. In Obetwood v. Bank, 113 Cal. 414, 45 Pac. 704, Urton v. Price, 57 Cal. 270, and Tompkins v. Railroad Co., 66 Cal. 163, 4 Pac. 1165, the party discharged by plaintiff in each instance was a joint tortfeasor with the defendant in the suit; and it was upon the joint tort, from which one party to it had been discharged, that action was based in each of those cases. Of course, those cases are entirely inapplicable here. Civ. Code, § 1543; Wristen v. Curtiss, 76 Cal. 6, 18 Pac. 81; Insurance Co. v. Potter, 63 Cal. 157; French v. McCarthy, 125 Cal. 508, 58 Pac. 154.

3. The judgment in defendants' favor in Slosson against Glosser et al. ipso facto dissolved the attachment. Section 553, Code Civ. Proc.; O'Connor v. Blake, 29 Cal. 316; Loveland v. Mining Co., 76 Cal. 564, 18 Pac. 682; Hamilton v. Bell, 123 Cal. 93, 55 Pac. 758. It was proper, therefore, to admit said judgment in evidence to establish the dissolution of the attachment, and show defendants' right to a return of the property; and the fact that the time for appeal had not expired, and the judgment was not final, did not limit its effect on the attachment. On the record before us, no question arises as to whether an attachment may be continued in force by a compliance with section 946, Code Civ. Proc.

4. There was substantial evidence in the testimony of Van Der Vort tending to show that the property at the time of its sale by the warehouseman, as well as when seized by the sheriff, was of the value fixed in the modified judgment. It cannot be said, therefore, as a matter of law, that the decision that the property was worth $315 is without support in the evidence. The judgment and orders appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; SMITH, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and orders appealed from are affirmed.

CRIMINAL LAW—PLEADING—MINOR DEFECTS—ARREST OF JUDGMENT—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. Minor defects and imperfections in pleadings, not affecting any substantial right of defendant as provided by Pen. Code, §§ 960-1258, are insufficient to sustain a motion to arrest judgment.

2. An instruction that, "in case of a reasonable doubt whether defendant's guilt is satisfactorily shown, he is entitled to an acquittal," shows no error.

P. J. Wynn was convicted of obtaining money by false pretenses, and he appeals. Affirmed.

John J. Barrett, for appellant. Tiley L. Ford, Atty. Gen., for the People.

HENSHAW, J. Defendant was indicted, tried, and convicted of the crime of obtaining money by false pretenses. He appeals from the judgment, and from the order denying his motion for a new trial. In a long and studious brief his counsel assails the sufficiency of the indictment under which conviction was had, urging that the demurrer to the indictment should have been sustained, and his motion in arrest of judgment granted. But, after careful consideration of the points that he makes, we are satisfied that the ruling of the trial court was correct. The indictment charges an offense in language sufficient and sufficiently clear to put the defendant upon trial before a jury. While there are, as pointed out by the learned judge of the trial court, some minor imperfections and defects in the pleadings, none of them does, nor do they altogether, affect any substantial right of the defendant, and for these reasons the trial court properly refused to arrest the judgment. Pen. Code, §§ 960-1258.

Many objections are also presented to the court's rulings in the admission and rejection of evidence. These, too, have been examined. The rulings were without error, or, if it can be said that in any case error was committed, it was harmless to the defendant. To illustrate: Exception is taken to the court's overruling defendant's objection to a question asked by the district attorney of the complaining witness, upon the ground that it called for a conversation, without specifying the time and place and circumstances thereof, but the answer which the witness gave to the question began as follows: "He came in there in the evening afterwards,—into this place where I was doing business. I mean, 643 Mission street. And he went into a little room that was there, where was my wife and myself." Thus the answer itself relieved from the force of appellant's objection. Again, error is asserted in the ruling of the court in sustaining the people's objection to questions propounded by defendant to the complaining witness, concerning statements contained in two complaints sworn to by him in the police court, touching the ownership of the money of which the complaining witness was defrauded; but, notwithstanding, the ruling of the court allowed the defendant's counsel the fullest latitude in this inquiry. These are given as examples. It would serve no useful purpose to discuss one by one the many like objections pressed upon our attention. The only instruction given by the court to which exception is taken is found in its declaration to the jury as follows: "In case of a reasonable doubt whether the defendant's guilt is satisfactorily shown, he is entitled to an acquittal." We fail to see any just ground for complaint in this instruction. Whether or not during the trial of this cause the court took up other legal matters to the injury of defendant, as asserted in the affidavit of counsel for defendant upon his motion for a new trial, was a question disputed by counter affidavits, and one with the determination which was made of it by the trial court we see no valid ground of complaint. The judgment and order appealed from are therefore affirmed.

BURGLARY—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY—MISCONDUCT OF JUROR.

1. Where one witness in a prosecution for burglary testifies to having seen a man running from the burglarized house, evidence of another witness that defendant's shoes corresponded with tracks found at the place of the burglary is admissible, though it is not shown that the tracks were made by the man running from the house.

2. Evidence of the appearance of defendant, accused of burglary, when his shoes were compared and found to correspond with certain tracks, and when brought before the prosecuting witness for identification, is admissible against him.

3. Where the defendant attempts to show an alibi by proving his presence in a certain saloon at the time of the commission of the crime, the fact that a juror visits the saloon during the trial is not sufficient misconduct to invalidate a conviction.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; B. N. Smith, Judge.

George Rowell was convicted of burglary, and he appeals. Affirmed.

W. H. Shinn, Zue G. Peck, M. E. C. Munday, and E. E. Rowell, for appellant. Tirey L. Ford, Atty. Gen., and A. A. Moore, Dep. Atty. Gen., for the People.

GAROUTTE, J. Defendant has been convicted of the crime of burglary, and appeals to this court. Some intimations are made to the effect that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict; but, after a careful reading of it, the court is entirely satisfied with the verdict rendered. A witness testified that she saw a man, soon after the burglary, running from the house burglarized. A second witness testified that, in the presence of the defendant, he placed defendant's shoes in certain tracks which he found near the scene of the burglary, and that the shoes fitted those tracks. The objection was made that the tracks to which the shoes were fitted were not those made by the person to whom the first witness referred. This objection goes to the weight of the evidence, and in no way to its competency. If tracks near the scene of the crime compared with defendant's shoes, it was some evidence tending to show that defendant was there when the crime was committed. The weight of the evidence would be dependent upon a hundred different circumstances, and the particular weight to be given to it was for the jury alone to determine. The court sees no reason why the evidence of similarity in the tracks when compared with defendant's shoes would not have been admissible, regardless of the evidence of the first witness to the effect that she saw a man hastening away from the scene of the crime. We see no error in the admission of evidence as to the appearance of defendant when the tracks and his shoes were compared, or when he was brought before the prosecuting witness for identification. This character of evidence has always been held admissible. The identification of the cane found in the house as being the cane seen in the possession of the defendant shortly prior to the commission of the crime was amply sufficient to justify its admission in evidence.

Misconduct of the juror Stein in visiting a certain saloon during the progress of the trial is claimed to have amounted to error. Defendant's evidence tended to show an alibi to the effect that he was in this saloon building at the time the crime was committed in another portion of the city. Stein made affidavit that he went to this saloon for lawful purposes; but, aside from that fact, it would seem that the mere circumstance of a juror visiting a public place of business, only material to the case by reason of defendant's claim that he was there when the crime was committed in another portion of the city, could not possibly affect defendant prejudicially.

There are a few other objections made to the admission of evidence, but we find the rulings of the court thereon to be sound. Also, the action of the court in giving and refusing certain instructions of which complaint is here made is without error. For the foregoing reasons, the judgment and order are affirmed.

final judgment, from which an appeal may be taken under Code Civ. Proc. § 939, subd. 3.

2. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1251, requiring plaintiff in condemnation proceedings to pay the sum of money assessed within 30 days after final judgment, the costs of court need not be deposited.

3. In proceedings for the condemnation of land for a public street, the owner must allege and prove damages for improvements, if such damages are claimed.

4. Under St. 1889, p. 70, providing that streets may be laid out in municipalities, and property condemned therefor, a property owner, refusing to accept from the commissioners the amount awarded her, is bound by the judgment in subsequent condemnation proceedings, though the amount awarded therein is less than the amount of assessment on the land.

5. Where appellant does not point out in what part of the transcript alleged erroneous rulings as to the evidence may be found, and in what the error consists, the appellate court will not consider the objections raised thereto.

6. St. 1889, p. 70, § 18, provides that if any owner of land to be taken for a public street does not accept the warrant drawn in his favor for damages, or objects to the report of the necessity of taking his lands, proceedings for the condemnation thereof shall be taken, as provided by law, under the right of eminent domain. The complaint need not set forth the proceedings therein provided for, and the resolution and ordinance ordering said work to be done shall be conclusive evidence of the necessity of taking the land. Held that, if the resolution and ordinance are passed as in the law provided, authority exists to bring an action condemning property for a public street under the right of eminent domain, without proof of the regularity of the proceedings for levying assessments thereon.

7. Where a municipality proceeds to enforce its right to condemn land for a public street, the fact that a property owner's land is irregularly assessed does not affect the right of the municipality to condemn the land.

Condemnation proceedings by the city of Alameda against Emilie G. Cohen. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Alfred H. Cohen, for appellant. Geo. T. Wright and J. W. Goodwin, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Appeal from judgment in favor of plaintiff condemning certain lands in the city of Alameda for a public street, and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial. The main contention of appellant is that the act of March 6, 1889 (St. 1889, p. 70), is unconstitutional. The act has heretofore been before this court, and held to be valid (Davies v. City of Los Angeles, 86 Cal. 37, 24 Pac. 771); and again in a case, in which this appellant was plaintiff, involving the validity of the assessment for the purpose of paying for the right of way and improvement involved in this suit (Cohen v. City of Alameda, 124 Cal. 504, 57 Pac. 377). It is not necessary to further discuss this point, as it is settled upon reasons fully stated in said cases. It is also settled in the latter case that the resolution of intention passed by the board of trustees of the city of Alameda sufficiently described the work, and the land necessary to be taken, and that the assessment was made upon all the lands of the district. In fact, the latter case may be here regarded as conclusive of the constitutionality of the act, and as settling the principal contentions of defendant as to irregularities in the assessment upon which the proceedings are based. We will notice such other objections as appear of importance.

It is claimed that the judgment is void because the record shows that the amount of money deposited in court does not include the costs of defendant. This would not show that the judgment is void. The judgment of condemnation is the final judgment. It became the duty of plaintiff to pay the money assessed as damages within 30 days after such judgment, or to deposit the same in court. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1251, 1252. After payment has been made, the court must make a final order of condemnation. A copy of this order must be filed in the recorder's office of the county where the land is situated, and thereupon the title vests in the plaintiff for the purposes specified. Id. § 1253. This order of final condemnation was made, and it recited that the amount of damages awarded had been deposited in court for defendant. The order was not appealed from, and was an order made after final judgment. City of Los Angeles v. Pomeroy (Cal.) 64 Pac. 477. The Code does not require the costs to be paid or deposited in court, but "the sum of money assessed." Code Civ. Proc. § 1251. And costs may be allowed or not, in the discretion of the court. Id. § 1255. It was the duty of defendant to allege and prove damages for improvements if she claimed such damages. Monterey County v. Cushing, 83 Cal. 510, 23 Pac. 700; Town Co. v. Neale, 88 Cal. 55, 25 Pac. 977, 11 L. R. A. 604.

It is argued, with apparent earnestness, that the finding of the court that the value of the land was the sum of $3,120, and of the improvements $50, is not supported by the evidence. The witness Hanly testified, upon his direct examination, that the value of the land was $3,500, but upon his cross-examination he withdrew this estimate, and placed it at $3,120. This was the only evidence upon the subject, and is sufficient to support the finding. It is admitted that he so testified, but it is claimed that he is not an expert. Several pages of the transcript are taken up with questions and answers tending to show the knowledge of the witness as to land values in the neighborhood. We think the witness showed himself sufficiently qualified to give an opinion, and, even if he was not an expert, his evidence is in the record, and there is nothing to contradict it. It is said that there is absolutely no evidence in the record as to damages to improvements. Conceding this to be true, the defendant certainly cannot complain because given $50 more than she was entitled to from the evidence. The finding does her no injury. The court found "that no damages will accrue to the portion of the lands of defendant, Emilie G. Cohen, not sought to be condemned by virtue of the severance therefrom of the portion to be condemned, and the construction of the improvements in the manner proposed by plaintiff."

It is said in appellant's brief, "There is positively no testimony as to whether said land will be damaged or not." The witness Hanly was asked: "Does the circumstance of the extension of the street through the Cohen tract, as indicated on that Exhibit A, cause any damage to be suffered by the lands on either side of the extension? Does it damage the land on either side?" The witness answered: "I should not consider that it did." This evidence supports the finding.

It is contended by appellant that the amount awarded her by the judgment of condemnation is less than the amount of the assessment that she was compelled to pay for her part of the expense of opening the street, and that the act is invalid because under its provisions the total expense of opening a street might be assessed against one person. This position cannot be maintained. The defendant had the right and the option of accepting from the commissioners the amount awarded her. She refused to do this, and took her chances upon the judgment in condemnation proceedings. If the judgment had been for more than the award of the commissioners, she would have been entitled to it; as it was for less, she must accept it. The statute provides a means by which the value of the property may be ascertained, and if the amount thus fixed is satisfactory to the owner, and he voluntarily conveys the right of way for such sum, the city would get title without the expense and delay of a suit for condemnation. If the owner, however, is not satisfied, and refuses to accept the amount or make the conveyance, the property may be condemned as in other cases. Davies v. City of Los Angeles, 86 Cal. 48, 24 Pac. 771.

Certain errors are claimed in the overruling of objections to questions asked by plaintiff of certain witnesses, and in sustaining plaintiff's objections to certain other questions asked by defendant of her witnesses. We have examined the argument of counsel in his brief, and see no reasons given therein to convince us of any erroneous ruling. It is not shown whether, after an objection was overruled, the witness answered the question, or, after an objection was sustained, the witness did not elsewhere testify to the fact sought to be elicited. The brief does not refer us to the folios or pages of the record where the alleged erroneous ruling may be found, and, as the printed transcript contains 310 pages (930 folios), we have not the time, nor the inclination, to read it all for the purpose of discovering error. A party relying upon an erroneous ruling should point it out, and show that it is erroneous, referring to the folio and page where it can be examined. Much of appellant's brief is devoted to argument as to alleged irregularities in the proceedings taken for the purpose of levying the assessment and proceedings subsequent to the assessment.

As before stated, the principal irregularities complained of were passed upon in Cohen v. City of Alameda, supra. But, aside from this, the action is not for the purpose of setting aside an assessment, nor is it an action to collect an assessment. It is a proceeding under the law of eminent domain, as laid down in the Code of Civil Procedure. All the alleged irregularities are collateral to the main issue. The act provides (section 18): "If any owner of land to be taken neglects or refuses to accept the warrant drawn in his favor as aforesaid or objects to the report as to the necessity of taking his land, the commissioners, with the approval of the city council, may cause proceedings to be taken for the condemnation thereof, as provided by law under the right of eminent domain. The complaint may aver that it is necessary for the city to take or damage and condemn the said lands, or an easement therein, as the case may be, without setting forth the proceedings herein provided for, and the resolution and ordinance ordering said work to be done shall be conclusive evidence of such necessity." It will thus be seen that the act dispenses with proof of the regularity of the proceedings. If the resolution and ordinance are passed, as in the act provided, the authority to bring the action exists. The answer of appellant sets forth the resolution and ordinance in full, and the court found that they were correctly set forth. They were regular in form, and, under the statute, are conclusive evidence of the public necessity for which the land is sought. In fact, the action may be brought under the general provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure relating to eminent domain. City of Los Angeles v. Leavis, 119 Cal. 165, 51 Pac. 34; City of Santa Cruz v. Enright, 95 Cal. 105, 30 Pac. 197.

If the proceedings in regard to levying the assessment in the district in which the street is to be opened should be conceded to be irregular, it does not follow that appellant would be injured. She alleges in her answer that she has certain property within the assessment district which was assessed. The district comprises only a portion of the city of Alameda, and, if the assessment is void, then the damages awarded appellant might be paid from the general funds of the city. City of Los Angeles v. Leavis, supra. Appellant would in such case be benefited, and not injured, by the alleged irregular assessment. It was said in City and County of San Francisco v. Kiernan, 98 Cal. 623, 33 Pac. 724: "Whether the money thus tendered and paid into court for their use had been obtained by plaintiff through regular or irregular assessments on the property of others did not concern the appellants, nor affect the right of the plaintiff to condemn their lands which had not been assessed. The proceedings to assess and to enforce the payment of assessments are entirely distinct from actions to condemn land. There is no pretense that the money tendered was not the property of plaintiff, nor that it did not amount to just compensation. Therefore the rights of the appellants in this action could not have been prejudiced by defects in proceedings to assess the property of others." The same principle applies here. If the appellant's land is irregularly assessed, it could not for this reason be held that the portion sought for a public street should not be condemned. The plaintiff has the right to condemn property for public streets. Appellant has been brought into court, and evidence introduced. The court found the amount of damages to which she is entitled, and the evidence sustains the finding. The amount has been deposited in court as found by the court in its final order of condemnation. This order has not been appealed from.

It is not the business of appellant to try the title of plaintiff to the $3,170. It is there for appellant, whether obtained by legal or illegal assessment. The judgment and order are affirmed.

AMADOR COUNTY v. GILBERT.
(Sac. 886.)¹

PUBLIC LANDS — TOWN SITES — STREETS — PLAZAS — COUNTY AND SUPERIOR JUDGES — DEEDS — VALIDITY.

1. St. 1867-68, p. 692, § 15, gives the right of pre-emption of public lands in unincorporated town sites patented to the county judge as trustee under Rev. St. U. S. § 2387 et seq., to "possessors of adjoining lands or other citizens of said town," but provides further that, "if any such lands remain unsold at the end of six months after filing the town plat, the county judge shall proceed to sell such lands to the highest bidder for cash." Held, that a superior judge, who was substituted for the county judge by St. 1867-68, p. 692, had no power to convey such lands otherwise than to the highest bidders for cash, at public auction, in compliance with the act.

2. St. 1867-68, p. 692, § 5, provides that "all streets, roads, alleys," etc., "marked and platted on the map of the town site," dedicated under Rev. St. U. S. § 2387 et seq., "shall be deemed and considered and are hereby declared to be dedicated to public use by the filing of such town plat," etc. Land which constituted part of a plaza was defined on the map by the boundaries of a street, of which it formed a part. The other boundaries were marked by clearly-defined lines. The map showed the entrance of intersecting streets into the plaza. Held, that the plaza was designated as a part of the street, whose boundaries were coincident with it, and hence that a deed thereto by a judge of the superior court was void.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Amador county; G. W. Nicol, Judge.

Suit by Amador county against William S. Gilbert. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Neil A. Macguarrie, for appellant. C. P. Vicini, Dist. Atty., and William J. McGee, for respondent.

SMITH, C. The suit was brought to annul a deed made by the judge of the superior court of Amador county purporting to convey to the defendant a lot or piece of land in the unincorporated town of Jackson in said county, and to eject the defendant from the premises, and remove the buildings therefrom. The town site of Jackson was granted by the government of the United States, August 6, 1870, to the county judge of Amador county and his successors, in trust for the inhabitants of the town; the patent being issued under the provisions of the act of congress of March 2, 1867, "for the relief of the inhabitants of cities and towns upon the public lands" (14 Stat. 541; Rev. St. U. S. § 2387 et seq.). Under this act provision had been made for the entry of such lands by the county judge of the county in which they were situate, "in trust for the several use and benefit of the occupants thereof according to their respective interests; the execution of which trust, as to the disposal of the lots in such town, and the proceeds of the sales thereof, to be conducted under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the legislative authority of the state," etc. In pursuance of the authority thus granted, an act was passed by the legislature of the state March 30, 1868, prescribing the duties of the county judge in executing the trust in such cases (St. 1867-68, p. 692); and afterwards, by the amendatory and supplementary act of March 12, 1885, the judge of the superior court of the county was substituted as trustee in place of the county judge, whose office had been abolished (St. 1885, p. 115). At the date of the deed to the defendant, therefore, the legal title of the town site—with the exception of lands previously conveyed to occupants or others—was vested in the judge of the superior court, in trust for the inhabitants of the town, and subject to the provisions of the acts of the legislature prescribing the mode of executing the trust. The first question to be considered, therefore, is whether the deed in question was authorized by the terms of the trust; otherwise it was void. Civ. Code, § 871. In this case, before the passage of the last act, the trust, so far as it could be, had been executed by the county judge; who, on the issue of the patent in 1870, proceeded at once to perform, and, so far as appears, did perform, all the duties imposed on him by the original act. The trust was thus fully performed, except with reference to the "unoccupied or vacant unclaimed land within the limits of the town site," if any, referred to in section 15 of the act; and there remained no functions to be performed by the superior judge other than those prescribed—with reference to the land referred to—by the section cited. Ordinarily indeed the power of the trustee to convey might exist in favor of two classes of persons, namely, original occupants, to whom the original trustee had failed to convey, as required by section 10 of the act, and purchasers under the provisions of section 15. But there is no pretense here that the defendant was one of the former class, and the validity of the deed is therefore to be determined by the provisions of the latter section. Under these provisions the right of pre-emption "at a price not less than one dollar per acre or fraction of an acre" is given to "possessors of adjoining lands, or other citizens of said town"; but it is further provided that, "if any such lands remain unsold at the end of six months after filing the town plat, the said judge shall proceed, in the same manner and at the same time that any delinquent land shall be sold [i. e. at public auction,—section 12], to sell said lands to the highest bidder for cash"; and from this provision it appears that the privilege of pre-emption given in the preceding part of the section is limited to six months after the filing of the plat. We thus arrive at the conclusion that the superior judge had no power to convey lands otherwise than to the highest bidders for cash, at public auction, after survey and subdivision of the land, and compliance with the other provisions of this section of the act. It is not pretended that in the execution of the deed to the defendant any of these conditions were complied with.

Another objection made to the authority of the judge to make the deed is that the land conveyed did not come within the description of the land he was authorized to sell; or, at least, that it was of the kind of land referred to in section 5, namely, "all streets, roads, lanes and alleys, public squares, cemeteries and commons, surveyed, marked and platted on the map of [the] townsite," which it is provided "shall be deemed and considered, and * * * are hereby declared to be dedicated to public use by the filing of such town plat," etc., "and shall be inalienable unless by special order of the board of supervisors of the county," etc. In this case it is not claimed that the sale was authorized by the board of supervisors, and it will, therefore, be unnecessary to inquire whether the kind of lands referred to in this section, and declared dedicated to public use, come within the description of "unoccupied or vacant unclaimed land," referred to in section 15. It will be sufficient to inquire only whether the land described in the deed was in fact dedicated. On this point the record leaves no room for doubt. The land in question forms part of an open plaza or space about the center of the town, on which the three blocks shown on the map (8, 9, and 10) all front. The main street of the town, marked on the map "Main Street," and running from south to north, has its eastern line coincident with the east line of the plaza; and there is no line on the west other than the west line of the plaza. North and south of the plaza the street is marked by clearly-defined lines in ink, showing a width south of the plaza of about a chain or 66 feet, and to the north of it a little less. On the northwest of the plaza there enters a highway, marked "Sutter Road." All this indicates plainly that the plaza is "designated" on the map as part of the highway or highways of the town, as required by section 3 of the act; for otherwise the owners of lots on the west of it would have no frontage, and the communication between Sutter road and Main street would be cut off, and the alley entering it at the southwest corner would have no exit. And, further, it is clear from the boundaries of Main street, as represented on the map, that it constitutes a part of that street. The field notes are not very clear, but they, in effect, confirm this construction. Thus block 10 is described as "all on the west of Main street to crossing of creek, and [of] Sutter road to Trenchell residence," etc.; lots 29 and 30 as bounded "on the east by the road"; lot 31 as bounded "on the east by the creek" (running through the center of the plaza); and lot 24 as bounded "on east by Miner, etc., and Main street." The plaza must therefore be regarded as "designated" on the map as part of Main street, and therefore, under the provisions of section 5, as dedicated to public use. We have no difficulty, therefore, at arriving at the conclusion that the deed was absolutely void. Nor would this conclusion be affected by the provisions of section 24 of the act. That section can have no application to a case of this kind, where it appears affirmatively from the recitals in the deed, and from the verified petition of the grantee on which it was made, that the deed was not made "pursuant to the provisions of [the] act," etc. Nor have the provisions of section 10 any application to a deed of this kind, or to any deed other than those provided for in the section itself. I advise that the judgment and order denying the defendant's motion for new trial be affirmed.

We concur: COOPER, C.; GRAY, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order denying the defendant's motion for new trial are affirmed.

INSURANCE—MUTUAL INSURANCE COMPANY—GUARANTY FUND—GUARANTY NOTES—LIABILITY OF MAKER—TRIAL—FINDINGS—EXECUTION—CAVEAT EMPTOR.

1. The maker of a guaranty-fund note given to a mutual life company organized under St. 1865-66, p. 752, requiring a reserve fund of $250,000, created by the giving of such notes, and which prohibited the withdrawal of such notes, except on the substitution of similar notes by the consent of the corporation directors and the makers of other notes, is released from liability by the act of the corporation in returning certain of the notes without taking other notes in lieu thereof, and in making no attempt to file other notes as claims against deceased makers, and in transferring such notes to its successors.

2. The maker of such a note is only liable as surety for the corporation to its creditors, and not to its stockholders.

3. A finding of the trial court which is not embraced in the issues raised by the pleadings is of no validity.

4. An execution purchaser of a note takes it subject to all equities existing against it in the hands of the original maker.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; William R. Daingerfield, Judge.

Action on a note by Vincent Neale, as special administrator of the estate of James Laidley, deceased, against A. E. Head. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Bishop & Wheeler and Garber, Boalt & Bishop (Thos. B. Bishop and William Rix, of counsel), for appellants. Vincent Neale, in pro. per.

VAN DYKE, J. The appeal is taken from the judgment, and also from the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial. The action was brought in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco by one Joseph E. Shain, for whom the present plaintiff was substituted as plaintiff at the trial. The action is founded upon a promissory note of the defendant, constituting one of the so-called guaranty notes, of which the following is a copy: "Office of the California Mutual Life Insurance Company. $5,000. San Francisco, Jan. 6, 1868. Five days after actual demand, for value received, I promise to pay to the order of the California Mutual Life Insurance Company the sum of five thousand dollars, in United States gold coin, with interest at the then legal rate from and after such demand. A. E. Head." The case was heard in the court below on the second amended complaint filed by the original plaintiff, and the answer thereto, and the supplemental complaint substituting the present plaintiff.

The California Mutual Life Insurance Company was incorporated in the year 1867, under an act of the legislature of this state entitled "An act to provide for incorporation of Mutual Insurance Companies, for the insurance of life and health and against accident," approved April 2, 1866. St. 1865-66, p. 752. After obtaining the guaranty fund, as provided by said act, the said insurance company engaged in business and carried on the same during the years 1868, 1869, 1870, 1871, and 1872. In the year 1873 it sold out its business to the Republic Life Insurance Company of Chicago, an Illinois corporation, and ceased to do further business. In 1885 said insurance company being insolvent, proceedings in involuntary insolvency were on the 7th of March of that year commenced against it, and thereafter it was adjudicated insolvent; and the court decreed, among other things, that the assets of the insolvent, including the notes constituting the guaranty fund, should be sold, and in pursuance of said decree said notes were, by the assignee, sold; the note of the defendant being sold to one James H. Dobinson for $300, who, as alleged in the second amended complaint, transferred and assigned the same to the original plaintiff; and September 22, 1888, on demand being made on defendant, and refusal to pay, the action was commenced, in 1891, and the original plaintiff, before the trial, transferred the claim to the present plaintiff. By the act under which the company was organized and operating, a guaranty fund of not less than $250,000 is required, which "shall consist of the notes of solvent parties, approved by the board of directors and by each other," which notes so given by any one person should not exceed the sum of $5,000, exclusive of interest. It is also provided that, when the fixed capital of the company shall have been obtained, a sworn declaration of the amount and nature of the same shall be filed with the original certificate of incorporation, and "until such time no guaranty note shall be withdrawn from the fund, unless another note of equal solvency shall be substituted therefor, and unless with the unanimous approval of the board of directors then in office, and of all of the other parties liable on the rest of the notes comprising the guarantee fund." In this case there were 50 notes, of $5,000 each. There is no averment in the complaint of compliance with any of these requirements. The contrary, however, is expressly alleged in defendant's answer, and the findings substantially support the allegations of the answer. The findings show that five of the guaranty notes were, during the existence of the company, surrendered to the makers of the same, and withdrawn from the said guaranty fund, without any substitution or attempt at substitution of other securities, and without the knowledge, approval, or consent of the defendant. It is also found that eight of the makers of said guaranty notes had died, and had left solvent estates sufficient to pay their respective notes and other debts, and that the company neglected and failed to present any claim whatever against the estate of said deceased solvent note makers, or to take any steps whatever for the collection of the same, until the same had become barred by limitation; that said company, without the approval, consent, or knowledge of the defendant, transmitted all of said notes constituting said guaranty fund, including the note in suit, to the Republic Life Insurance Company, a corporation existing under the laws of the state of Illinois, without substituting or procuring to be substituted therefor any note, money, or property whatever; that after the commencement of this action, and without defendant's approval or consent, said company surrendered to the makers thereof 32 of said notes, constituting said guaranty fund, without any substitution of other notes or security, other than the execution of a bond in the sum of $25,000 in favor of the assignee in insolvency.

The appellant contends (1) that, having made the note in suit on certain conditions, he is not liable, because the conditions have not been complied with, and, being a guarantor, is discharged from liability in consequence of the acts and transactions referred to as having been found by the trial court; (2) that the claim, if any ever accrued, is barred by limitation.

The note in suit, as already shown, was given in pursuance of and in accordance with the provisions of the statute for 1866. Among the other provisions of that act, it is declared that such notes, or the proceeds thereof, should remain with the company, and should not be withdrawn from the guaranty fund without substituting therefor another note of equal solvency, nor without unanimous approval of the board of directors, and all of the other parties liable on the rest of the notes. These provisions of the law must be considered as having been read into the note, and they are in harmony with the general rules of law for the protection of a surety or guarantor. Each note maker had the right to require that there should be, in all, 50 solvent note makers, each of the sum of $5,000; and it was also his right to have that number of such solvent note makers continue, subject to the same conditions and liabilities as himself. The reason of this provision in the law is very obvious. The corporation and its stockholders are primarily liable for the company's debts. Morrow v. Superior Ct., 64 Cal. 383, 1 Pac. 354. The parties who executed the guaranty notes are the mere sureties of the company and its stockholders, for the payment of the company's debts. In re California Mut. Life Ins. Co., 81 Cal. 364, 22 Pac. 869. And, as sureties, each note maker, if required to pay in discharge of the company's debts, is entitled to contribution from such note makers as may not have paid an equal amount. As a guarantor, the defendant is entitled to stand upon the very letter of his contract. Brandt, Sur. (2d Ed.) §§ 93, 254; Miller v. Stewart, 9 Wheat. 680, 702, 703, 6 L. Ed. 189; Tomlinson v. Simpson, 33 Minn. 443, 446, 23 N. W. 864; Independent Dist. v. Reichard, 50 Iowa, 98. It was held in Re California Mut. Life Ins. Co., supra, that this guaranty fund was liable only for the debts of the company; and as an additional security to the parties dealing with said company, over and above the liability of the company and its stockholders, and as between the makers of these notes and the company and its stockholders, the money paid by stockholders cannot be made a charge upon such guarantors. It is very clear, therefore, that the company could not have maintained an action on this note under the circumstances, and there is nothing to show that the plaintiff is, or that his assignors were, creditors of the company. It is alleged in the second amended complaint, on which the case was tried, "that pursuant to said decree the said note was sold to one James H. Dobinson, who transferred and assigned it to this plaintiff;" and in the supplemental complaint, after averring the appointment of the plaintiff as special administrator of the estate of James Laidley, deceased, it is said "that since the commencement of this action, to wit, in the month of November, 1895, Joseph E. Shain, the original plaintiff in the above-entitled action, transferred to the plaintiff, as special administrator of the estate of James Laidley, deceased, the promissory note sued upon, and all his right, title, and interest in the above-entitled action." The title to the note in question passed from the insurance company, to which it was originally given, to Dobinson, by means of a judicial sale, and from him by mesne assignments to the present plaintiff. The plaintiff therefore stands in no better position than the company itself would have stood, had it brought suit on the note. The finding of the court that Dobinson transferred to the executors of Laidley in extinguishment of a claim against the insolvent company, held by said estate of James Laidley, deceased, is altogether outside of the issues raised in the pleadings, and is therefore without support. One who buys at judicial sale a negotiable promissory note takes it under the rule of caveat emptor, and holds it subject to all equities existing against it in the hands of the original maker or assignor. It is not a transfer in due course. 2 Pars. Notes & B. p. 46 et seq.; Ror. Jud. Sales, p. 474; Civ. Code, § 312; Code Civ. Proc. § 368. The small price paid for the note at such sale would indicate that the purchaser so understood it.

For the foregoing reasons, bearing upon the first point relied upon by appellant, we are of the opinion that upon the findings of the court, within the issues raised by the pleadings, the defendant was entitled to judgment. This view of the case renders it unnecessary to consider the other points made by appellant. Judgment and order reversed.

CAMPBELL v. CAMPBELL. (S. F. 1,782.)
(Supreme Court of California. May 24, 1901.)

NOTES—FORGERY—ESTOPPEL—LIMITATIONS —AMENDMENT—EFFECT OF FRAUD.

1. Plaintiff's original complaint, filed within four years of the giving of the note in suit, alleged that he loaned money to defendant on a note, and that he commenced suit thereon, and was defeated in the trial court and on appeal, and that defendant's name was forged to the note, but that he received the proceeds, and judgment was asked for damages therefor. The amended petition, filed after the expiration of four years, alleged that the note was a forgery, and was procured by an agent of defendant, and that the latter received the proceeds, and asked for judgment on the note. Held, that the amendment substituted a cause of action on the note for a cause of action for damages, and was barred by Code Civ. Proc. § 337, requiring suit on a written instrument to be commenced within four years.

2. Where money is loaned to an agent for defendant on a note, to which the name of defendant is forged, and the latter knows the facts and receives the proceeds, he is estopped from denying his liability on the note.

3. The character of an action on a note, as affecting the bar of limitations, is not affected by the fact that plaintiff asks to be subrogated to a judgment, which was paid by the money secured by the note, since subrogation is a mere incident to the principal relief.

4. An action to enforce a note for borrowed money against one who receives the proceeds, but whose name is forged to the note, and to be subrogated to a judgment paid by the proceeds, is not for relief on the ground of fraud or mistake; and hence Code Civ. Proc. § 338, subd. 4, providing that limitations shall not commence to run against an action for relief on the ground of fraud or mistake, until the fraud or mistake is discovered, has no application thereto.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Sonoma county; A. G. Burnett, Judge.

Action by J. D. Campbell against George O. Campbell. From a judgment in favor of the defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

C. S. Peery and Wm. Shipsey, for appellant. A. B. Ware, for respondent.

COOPER, C. The court below sustained defendant's demurrer to the amended complaint. Plaintiff declined to further amend, and judgment was entered for defendant. This appeal is from the judgment, for the purpose of determining the question as to the correctness of the order sustaining the demurrer. The amended complaint was filed May 26, 1898, and states, in substance, that on April 1, 1893, a judgment was duly given and made by the superior court of San Luis Obispo county in favor of one Ramage against this defendant for certain personal property, $271, and costs; that on the 24th day of May, 1893, one Stilts, as the agent of defendant, and with his knowledge, borrowed of plaintiff the sum of $280 for the purpose of paying the said judgment, and the same was paid and satisfied with said money; that on said last-named date the said Stilts, in consideration of the said $280, delivered to plaintiff a promissory note of even date for said sum, payable one day after date, and "purporting to have been made and signed by the said Stilts and the said George Campbell," bearing interest from date at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum until paid; that Stilts was at the time of making said note insolvent, and was known to plaintiff to have been so insolvent, and the said money was advanced wholly upon the credit of defendant's signature to said note; that plaintiff is informed and believes that the purported signature of the defendant to said note was forged, and was not the genuine signature of the defendant, and that plaintiff did not discover the forgery until July, 1896; that defendant received and retained the $280, and on January 3, 1898, with full knowledge of all the facts, procured and had an order duly given and made by the superior court of said San Luis Obispo county satisfying the said judgment of record; that plaintiff has demanded of defendant that he pay the amount of said note, with legal interest thereon, but no part thereof has been paid. Judgment is asked that the said sum of $280, with legal interest thereon from May 23, 1893, be repaid to plaintiff, and that plaintiff be subrogated to the rights of said Ramage in said judgment against defendant, and that said judgment be revived in favor of the plaintiff in this action. There is no allegation in the amended complaint that Stilts was insolvent or unable to pay the note at the time of the commencement of the action.

Among other grounds of demurrer to the amended complaint, the defendant demurred upon the ground that the cause of action, as therein stated, is barred by the provisions of section 337, Code Civ. Proc., which provides that an action upon a written instrument is barred unless commenced within four years after the cause of action accrues. A cause of action accrued in favor of plaintiff one day after May 24, 1893. When the amended complaint was filed more than four years had elapsed after the cause of action accrued. The demurrer was therefore properly sustained.

The action was not commenced upon the note until the filing of the amended complaint. The original complaint alleged that on July 30, 1896, the plaintiff commenced an action in the justice court of San Simeon township, in the county of San Luis Obispo, against defendant and said Stilts on said note; that said action was tried in said justice court, and judgment rendered in favor of defendant, and against this plaintiff; that said case was afterwards appealed, and the superior court of San Luis Obispo county, by its judgment, duly given and made, decided and rendered judgment in favor of this defendant and against plaintiff. The original complaint then enumerates certain acts as to the alleged forgery of defendant's name to said note, and that defendant received the $280 with which he paid the Ramage judgment. Judgment is then asked for $600 damages and costs. As the original complaint alleged a final judgment upon the note in favor of defendant, and stated facts showing that plaintiff relied upon the alleged forgery and receipt of the money by defendant as a cause of action for damages, it cannot be held that it was the commencement of an action upon the note. Instead of being an action commenced upon the note, it contained express declarations showing a final judgment in defendant's favor thereon. After a demurrer was sustained to the original complaint, plaintiff evidently concluded to proceed upon a different theory, and, instead of alleging a final judgment in defendant's favor upon the note, set forth the amount, date, execution, and delivery of the note, and asked judgment for such amount. If the name of defendant was in fact forged to the said note, and the other allegations of the amended complaint are true, it by no means follows that the defendant was not liable thereon. If Stilts was defendant's agent in the transaction, acted with full knowledge of defendant, procured the money for defendant, and "defendant retained the benefit with full knowledge of all the facts," and received the money to his own use, could he be heard to deny his liability upon the note? The cause of action, therefore, was upon the note. Plaintiff loaned the money upon the note, and the indebtedness was evidenced thereby.

This action is for the purpose of recovering such indebtedness, and the character of the action is not changed by the fact that the plaintiff asks other relief in the way of subrogation to compel the payment of the indebtedness. The right of subrogation would, in any event, be only incidental to the principal relief sought. Clausen v. Meister, 93 Cal. 555, 29 Pac. 232.

The allegation that plaintiff did not discover the forgery of defendant's name until July, 1896, cannot relieve him. He knew he had the note at that time. He knew the circumstances, and the defendant's connection therewith. He still had, after such alleged discovery, nearly two years in which to bring his action upon the note, and to ask the relief of a court of equity as to any subrogation incident to the indebtedness due thereon.

This is not an action for relief on the ground of fraud or mistake, and therefore subdivision 4 of section 338 has no application. It is really an action to recover upon the promissory note, and plaintiff is in no better position because fraud has been committed upon him, nor the defendant in any worse position than if defendant had in fact signed the note. It follows that the judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; CHIPMAN, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is affirmed.

PAINTER'S EX'RS v. PAINTER et al.

(S. F. 1,971.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 25, 1901.)

PARTNERSHIP—ACCOUNTING—DISSOLUTION —DEATH OF PARTNER—FIRM ASSETS.

1. Where a surviving partner carried on the firm business with the firm assets until it was terminated by the appointment of a receiver, an accounting should be as of the date of the appointment of the receiver, and a personal judgment against the surviving partner, which merely fixed his liabilities as of the date of the deceased partner's death, was erroneous.

2. Where the assets of a partnership dissolved by the death of one of its members were used by a new firm formed by the surviving partner, the old partnership was entitled to a share in the profits of the new firm proportionate to the value of the assets of the old firm used, as compared with the value of the property or services contributed by the new firm; but all the property of the new firm should not be regarded as assets of the old.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by Jerome B. Painter's executors against Theodore P. Painter and another. From a judgment in favor of plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Pringle & Pringle, for appellants. M. B. Kellogg, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. Appeal from a judgment for plaintiffs and from an order denying the defendants a new trial. The case was before this court on appeal from a former judgment and similar order in favor of plaintiffs, and reversed, reported in 36 Pac. 866. The case, stated generally, and so far as identical on the two appeals, or noting divergences, is as follows: The defendants and the plaintiffs' testator, Jerome Painter, were brothers, and at the time of the death of the latter he and Theodore were partners, under the firm name of Painter & Co., in the business of printing and of manufacturing type in the city of San Francisco. Jerome died February 6, 1883, and by his will the plaintiffs and the defendant Theodore were named as executors, and qualified as such; but the latter resigned May 3, 1888. On the death of Jerome the business and assets of the firm came to the hands of Theodore as surviving partner. But shortly afterwards he formed a partnership with the defendant Milton under the firm name of Painter & Co., and thereafter the business of the old firm and that of the new was carried on under the same management, under the name of Painter & Co., up to May 17, 1889, when a receiver was appointed, who took possession of all the properties in the possession of the defendants as partners, whether of the old or of the new firm. Thus far the facts are undisputed. But it was found on both trials that after the defendants took possession the business was managed by them as if it were their own, and under claim to that effect; and in the findings on the last trial, now under review, it is found that this claim of defendants was based on a bequest in the will of Jerome (being the bequest referred to in Painter v. Painter, 113 Cal. 371, 45 Pac. 689); and that, under this claim, they continued, to the commencement of the suit, to hold the assets of the old firm, and to use them for their own benefit, or, more specifically, in "the conduct of the business of the old firm of Painter & Co., claimed by them as aforesaid"; and also that the defendant Theodore failed to keep the books of the concern correctly, or to keep a just or true account of its business, for the reason that the books have been kept by the new firm as accounts of their own; and that "such omission and neglect was not with fraudulent intent, but was willfully and wrongfully careless and negligent." It was further found on the last trial—and, in effect, on the former—that the business continued to be the business of the old firm, and that all the properties in the hands of the defendants when taken from them by the receiver were the properties of the old firm. On the former trial it was found that the irregularities in the books were the result of fraudulent design of the defendants to cheat and defraud the estate; on the latter the findings negative the existence of fraud on the part of defendants. Otherwise, with regard to the facts found, the general case presented on the two appeals is substantially the same. But, with regard to the effect to be given to the facts, the conclusions reached by the court, and the judgments rendered in accordance therewith, are widely divergent; and, as one of the questions to be now determined is as to the effect of the former decision as the law of the case, a brief statement of the effect of the findings and judgments on the former trial will be necessary. On that trial the settlement of the accounts of the partnership was carried up to the date of the commencement of the suit, at which time the business of the old firm, as also that of the new, was terminated by the receiver taking possession of the assets of both; and in the findings there is contained a statement of the account of Theodore as of that date. This is based on a statement of the "resources and liabilities" made out by the plaintiffs' expert, and put in evidence by them, which may, therefore, be regarded as part of the finding. From this it appears that the net capital of the firm (the old and new firm being regarded as one) at the date of accounting ("assuming all resources as collectible," etc.) was the sum of $113,142.31, and the share of each $56,571.15; but that Theodore was to be charged with various amounts, to be deducted from his share, aggregating $67,246.19. These items (with the exception of two, amounting to $15,208.86) were charges against Theodore to correct credits in his favor on the books, found by the court to be unauthorized; and with reference to all of them this court on appeal held the findings not to be justified by the evidence. This (with the exception of the items specified) leaves the account as shown by the books. Another correction is, however, required with reference to a charge of $21,201.50, or more, credited on the books to Jerome as the purchase money of certain school lands, which this court on the former appeal held to have been a private transaction of Jerome's, and therefore to be transferred to his personal account. With these corrections, as the result of the last trial and decision on appeal, we may assume the account thus corrected to be a correct, though not complete, exhibit of the state of the account between the partners.

The judgment entered by the court on the above data is, of course, on the present appeal immaterial. But it may be briefly alluded to as part of the history of the case, and as serving to illustrate the character of the judgment now before us on appeal. The result of the court's calculations on the former trial was to bring Theodore in debt to the firm, after deducting credits on the books, in the sum of $28,675.64. Judgment was accordingly rendered against him personally, and in favor of the plaintiffs, for one-half this amount, $14,337.82; and it was further adjudged that the balance of the net capital, $113,142.31, after deducting the amount of $28,675.64, in which Theodore was found to be indebted to the firm,—being $84,466.37,—should be divided equally between the parties. But among the resources of the firm going to make up the amount thus to be divided between Theodore and the plaintiffs it appears from the statement of resources and liabilities that there was an indebtedness of Jerome to the firm of $32,532.14, of which one-half would, under the judgment, belong to Theodore. The judgment for the division of the net capital was, therefore, in effect, a judgment that Jerome, or, rather, his executors, was indebted to Theodore in the sum of $16,276.57,—an amount exceeding the amount of the judgment against the latter by $1,938.75. On the last trial, now under review, a different mode of settlement was adopted. No account was taken of transactions subsequent to the death of Jerome, nor was there any attempt to settle the accounts of the partners. All that is found is that at the date of the death of Jerome he was not indebted to the firm, and the net value of the firm's assets, over liabilities and exclusive of real estate, was $62,708.50, to which is added the sum of $2,740, in which Theodore is found to be indebted to the firm, thus making "the total net market value of the assets" $66,448.88; and for one-half of this—$33,224.44—judgment is rendered against Theodore personally and as surviving partner, to be satisfied by sale of his share of the assets, real and personal, and, if these be insufficient, a deficiency judgment to be docketed against him. This was obviously erroneous. It is expressly found by the court that the business carried on after Jerome's death, with all its original assets and accessions and profits, was the business of the old firm; and Theodore was, therefore, entitled to an accounting up to the date of its termination by the appointment of the receiver. Until final settlement of the accounts, a personal judgment against a partner or surviving partner is erroneous. 2 Bates, Partn. §§ 919, 971, 974. Argument on this point is unnecessary; but the result of the mode of settlement adopted by the court may be illustrated by comparing it with the settlement made at the former trial. There, though Theodore was improperly charged with items amounting to $52,037.30, yet the result was a judgment against him of $14,337.82 only, less than one-half of the judgment rendered at the last trial on data precisely the same, except that the charges disapproved by this court on the former appeal were, presumably, omitted. For the reasons given, the judgment must be reversed, and the cause remanded for new trial. There are, however, other errors, which, with a view to the future proceedings in the case, must be adverted to.

1. In arriving at the conclusion that the value of the assets of the firm at the date of the death of Jerome was $66,448.88, and that his executors were entitled to one-half thereof, it was necessary for the court to assume that Jerome was not indebted to the firm in any amount when he died; and accordingly it is so found. But this finding is clearly in conflict with the statement of resources and liabilities made by the plaintiff's own experts, put in evidence by them, and accepted by the court on the former trial, wherein, among the resources of the firm, is a debit to Jerome's account of $32,532.14; and, in addition, it was held by this court on the former appeal that he had been improperly credited with large amounts for purchase money of school lands (amounting, according to the testimony of Folger, plaintiff's expert, to the sum of $21,201.50), which should have been charged to his personal account. Assuming these amounts to be correct, the indebtedness of Jerome to the firm at the time of his death was largely in excess of Theodore's, and the interest of the latter in the assets of the firm correspondingly greater than that of the former. What was the precise interest of Jerome in the assets of the firm at the time of his death is to be determined by the lower court; but on the new trial the attention of the court should be directed to the claim of appellants that it in fact amounted to nothing, and to what is said by this court on the former appeal with reference to this claim, and as to the law applicable to the case if the claim should be found to be just. With regard to the judgment in the case of Painter v. Painter, 113 Cal. 371, 45 Pac. 689,—which the court held to estop the defendants to claim that Jerome was in fact indebted to the firm at the time of his death,—it is obvious that the finding cannot be sustained. Leaving out of view the objection that Theodore suffered default, and that there was no judgment against him, and consequently no estoppel, it is otherwise clear that neither he nor Milton was estopped. The indebtedness referred to in that suit was an alleged personal debt of Jerome to the firm, as distinguished from an indebtedness for money withdrawn from the firm, which could be determined only upon a final settlement of the partnership concerns. The findings of the court were carefully confined to indebtedness of the kind alleged. The settlement of the partnership accounts was involved only as incidentally necessary to the relief sought, which was a sale of lands. The court refused to entertain jurisdiction of, or to hear evidence on, that subject; and it was in fact formally admitted by the defendant's attorney that Jerome had withdrawn from the firm more than Theodore, or, in other words, was indebted on that account.

2. On the former trial the court found, in effect, that the appointment of a receiver was necessary to preserve the property, etc., and this court held on appeal that the finding was not supported by the evidence; yet on the present appeal we have the same finding. As the case is reversed on other grounds, we have not thought it necessary to examine the record critically, with a view of determining whether there is new evidence on this point materially affecting the case, though on such examination as we have made we have not been able to discover any. But the court on the former appeal also held that "the receiver should have been discharged," and this injunction has been disregarded by the lower court. On another appeal, a continuance of the receivership, unless the case be materially varied from what it was on the former appeal, may be a ground for reversal.

3. The court finds that all the property held by Painter & Co. (the new firm), including the Directory, belongs to the old firm. This finding, we think, is not sustained by the evidence. The firm of the defendants and the dissolved firm, though having the same name, are entirely distinct entities. The use of the assets of the old firm in the new business entitled it to a share in the profits, but not necessarily to an ownership of the assets acquired by the new firm; nor could it give it more than a part ownership of such assets, proportionate to the value of the assets of the old firm used, as compared with the value of the money or services contributed by the new firm. On this point, also, attention should be directed to what was said by this court on the former appeal.

4. There are other imperfections in the findings that may be briefly adverted to. The finding that the assets of the old firm were "appropriated by the defendants to their own use" is inconsistent with the finding of the court that their claim was based on the bequest in Jerome's will, and with the facts also found that an inventory and account were filed in the matter of his estate. Their claim was evidently in subordination to the title of Jerome's executors. The finding that the amounts collected by Theodore from old accounts and sales of stock of the old firm were expended by the defendants in the attempt to continue the business seems also to be in conflict with the evidence. A part of it—$10,000, and presumably more—seems to have been paid on the debts of the old firm. The judgment and order appealed from are reversed, and the cause remanded for new trial, to be conducted in accordance with the principles stated in this and in the former decision of this court.

ALLEN v. HOME INS. CO. OF NEW YORK.
(S. F. 1,819.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 24, 1901.)

FIRE INSURANCE—POLICY—DWELLING HOUSE —COMPLAINT—JURY—CHARGE—OWNERSHIP—WAIVER.

1. Where, in an action on a fire policy on a building "while occupied as a dwelling house," the complaint fails to allege that the building was so occupied at the time the fire occurred, the complaint does not state a cause of action, since there could be no recovery unless such fact was proved, and the facts necessary to be proved must be alleged.

2. In an action on a fire policy insuring a building "while occupied as a dwelling house," defendant's request to charge that, "if the jury believe from the evidence that at the time of the insurance and at the time of the fire the premises were occupied and used as a roadside bawdy house and saloon," the verdict will be for the defendant, was refused until modified by the court by adding after "saloon," "and that plaintiff knew or had notice thereof." Held error, since the insurer has a right to select the character of risks which it will assume, and contract which it will enter into, and plaintiff cannot commit her property to the care of another, and avoid responsibility on the ground of want of notice.

3. Where defendant, with knowledge that plaintiff's interest in insured property was that of mortgagee, issued a policy to her providing that, if the interest of the insured was other than the entire ownership of the property, the policy should be void unless otherwise provided by agreement indorsed thereon, and at the expiration of the term issued a new policy in renewal thereof, the issuance of the policy was a waiver of such condition, and such waiver extended to the renewal.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by Lalla T. Allen against the Home Insurance Company of New York. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

E. W. McGraw, for appellant. Frank J. Sullivan, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This action was brought to recover on a policy of fire insurance insuring plaintiff in the sum of $2,200 "on one-story, shingle-roof frame building, and its additions adjoining and communicating, while occupied as a dwelling house." The case was tried before a jury, and a verdict rendered for plaintiff. Defendant appeals from the judgment, on the judgment roll and a bill of exceptions. *..

The appellant urges certain errors of law as grounds for reversing the judgment. It is first claimed that the court erred in overruling the demurrer to the amended complaint. The principal contention under this head is that the complaint does not allege that the building at the time of the fire was occupied as a dwelling house. It was in the contract between the insurer and the insured that the premises were insured while occupied as a dwelling house. It was essential for plaintiff to prove that the fire occurred while the premises were occupied as such dwelling house. If it was essential to prove such fact, it was essential to allege it. Each party must allege every fact which he is required to prove, and will be precluded from proving any fact not alleged. Green v. Palmer, 15 Cal. 413, 76 Am. Dec. 492; Spring Valley Waterworks v. City and County of San Francisco, 82 Cal. 323, 22 Pac. 910, 1046. In declaring upon a contract of insurance, so much of it as will show a right to recover must be set out in terms or in substance. 2 May, Ins. (4th Ed.) 589. Accordingly it has been held that, where the policy was upon the stock of a commission merchant while in a certain warehouse, the complaint must allege that the stock was in such warehouse at the time of the fire. Todd v. Insurance Co., 1 Mo. App. 472. Where a policy of insurance confined the insurance to the building while located and occupied by the plaintiff in the town of Newfane, it was held that the case should be reversed because the condition was not alleged in the complaint. Powers v. Insurance Co. (Vt.) 35 Atl. 331. The allegation was not merely a condition precedent, as referred to in Code Civ. Proc. § 457. It went to the very essence of plaintiff's right to recover. Certain conditions subsequent to the right of recovery, matters of defense, the nonperformance of conditions subsequent, and certain negative prohibited acts need not be pleaded by plaintiff; but the rule does not extend to the essence of the cause of action. The facts alleged in this complaint may all be true, and yet the plaintiff not be entitled to recover. She could not recover unless she proves more than the complaint alleges. It was therefore error to overrule the demurrer.

The answer alleges as a special defense that at no time after said policy was issued was said building occupied as a dwelling house, but at all times after said policy was issued it was occupied as a disreputable roadside tavern and bawdy house. There was at least sufficient evidence on this point to entitle defendant to have the question submitted to the jury. If the premises were in fact occupied as a bawdy house and saloon at the time of the fire, this was a good defense. May, Ins. (4th Ed.) § 245, and cases cited. The court so instructed the jury, in the following language: "The insured premises were insured only while occupied as a dwelling house. The burden of proof is on the plaintiff to show that at the time of the fire the premises were occupied as a dwelling house. A bawdy house and saloon is not a dwelling house, within the meaning of that term in this policy of insurance, notwithstanding persons may dwell there." The defendant requested the court to instruct the jury as follows: "If the jury believe from the evidence that at the time of the insurance and at the time of the fire the premises were occupied and used as a roadside bawdy house and saloon, then your verdict will be for the defendant." The court refused to give said instruction as requested, but modified it by adding after the word "saloon," "and that plaintiff knew or had notice thereof." The court also, at the request of plaintiff, instructed the jury as follows: "If you find from the evidence that at the time of the execution of the policy sued on the plaintiff had no notice or knowledge, and no means of knowledge, as to the character of the house and its inmates, and that she made no representations whatever in relation thereto, then I instruct you that her rights cannot be affected thereby." It is thus made plain to the jury that the use of the house for purposes other than a dwelling house would not forfeit the policy unless plaintiff had knowledge of such use. As the plaintiff testified that she had no such knowledge, and her evidence was not contradicted, the instruction, as given, at once destroyed the defense claimed by defendant. The court erred in so instructing the jury. The policy was a contract to pay only in case of loss of the insured premises while occupied as a dwelling house. The liability was limited by the terms of the contract, and such limitations are held valid. It is the business of the insured, and the burden is upon him, to see that the premises are not used in such manner as to make void the policy. The insurer is at liberty to select the character of risk he will assume, and he is not liable except upon proof that the loss occurred within the terms of the policy. The insured cannot commit the control of the insured premises to another, and avoid responsibility on the ground of want of notice. He is presumed to have notice, whether the premises are occupied by himself or tenant. Phil. Ins. § 866; Ostr. Ins. § 331; 1 May, Ins. (4th Ed.) § 227; Insurance Co. v. Gunther, 116 U. S. 113, 6 Sup. Ct. 306, 29 L. Ed. 575; Slinkard v. Assurance Co., 122 Cal. 595, 55 Pac. 417; Mawhinney v. Insurance Co., 98 Cal. 184, 32 Pac. 945, 20 L. R. A. 87; Kohlman v. Selvage (Sup.) 54 N. Y. Supp. 230; Kelly v. Insurance Co., 97 Mass. 286.

It is further contended that the only interest of plaintiff in the insured property was that of a mortgagee, while the policy provided that "if the interest of the assured be or become other than the entire, unconditional, and sole ownership of the property, or if the building insured be on ground not owned by the assured in fee simple, then in every such case this policy shall be void, unless otherwise provided by agreement indorsed hereon." We think the evidence shows that the defendant knew the interest of plaintiff in the premises, and issued the policy with such knowledge. The witness Thompson testified that he attended to plaintiff's insurance business, and in July, 1895, he went to a Mr. Everett, the counter clerk of defendant, and stated all the facts, and that plaintiff was mortgagee and had commenced foreclosure proceedings; that, with full knowledge of such facts, defendant issued a policy for one year; that at the expiration of the year he went again to the defendant, and asked for another policy for a year, when it issued the policy upon which this suit is brought. The present policy is a renewal of the first one-year policy, and, as such renewal, is affected by the knowledge and acts of defendant and its agent in issuing the original policy. Kruger v. Insurance Co., 72 Cal. 94, 13 Pac. 156, and cases cited; May, Ins. (4th Ed.) § 70a. The issue of a policy upon known facts waives all conditions inconsistent therewith. Id. §§ 133a, 294b; Kruger v. Insurance Co., supra. The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to allow the plaintiff a reasonable time to amend her complaint, if so advised.

HERD v. TUOHY. (Sac. 789.)

MORTGAGES — FORECLOSURE — DEFICIENCY JUDGMENT—ENFORCEMENT—JURISDICTION—PLEADING — SUFFICIENCY — TRANSFER OF MORTGAGE—PERSONAL LIABILITY—EX PARTE HEARING—FRAUD—HARMLESS ERROR—JUDGMENT—ESTOPPEL.

1. Const. art. 6, § 5, gives the superior court jurisdiction over all cases in equity. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 392-397, require actions for the recovery of possession of, quieting the title to, or for the enforcement of liens on real estate to be brought in the county where the real estate affected is situated, but provide that, if the action is not commenced in the proper county, the only remedy of the defendant is to demand change of venue. Held, that the provisions of the Code do not affect the jurisdiction of the court, and where a transcript of a judgment foreclosing a mortgage and granting a deficiency judgment was filed in a county other than where rendered, and the mortgagor brought action in such latter county to enjoin enforcement of the judgment, and the mortgagee made no objection, a decree in the injunction proceedings was not invalid for want of jurisdiction.

2. Where the transcript of a judgment foreclosing a mortgage and granting a deficiency judgment was filed in a county other than where rendered, and the mortgagor brought suit in such latter county to enjoin enforcement of the judgment without alleging that he had made any motion in the court where the judgment was rendered to have it set aside, the defect, if any, was cured by the answer setting out the motion with the order denying the same.

3. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 726, providing that, if the sheriff's return of a mortgage foreclosure sale show a balance still due, a judgment can be docketed for such balance against the "defendant or defendants personally liable," a recital preceding the actual judgment foreclosing a mortgage that the interest on said note had been paid to a certain date, that no other part had been paid, and a certain sum was due from defendants, and that "said defendants are personally liable," was not an adjudication of personal liability on which the clerk might docket a judgment for deficiency.

4. Where a mortgagor conveyed the premises to one who assumed the mortgage, which fact was known to the mortgagee, who agreed in writing with such grantee that the time for payment should be extended, it was error to enter deficiency judgment against the mortgagor, since the mortgagor stood in the relation of surety, and was therefore discharged from personal liability.

5. Findings by the court on conflicting evidence will not be disturbed on appeal.

6. Where plaintiff sought to enjoin the enforcement of a deficiency judgment entered by default, alleging that he had been assured by the mortgagee that no deficiency judgment would be taken, a conversation between plaintiff and another was admissible, though the mortgagee was not present, as it explained the plaintiff's failure to appear.

7. Where, on proceedings to enjoin a deficiency judgment entered on mortgage foreclosure, it was found that the provision for deficiency judgment was added by amendment on an ex parte application without the mortgagor's knowledge, it should be set aside as fraudulent.

8. Any error, therefore, in the admission of evidence relating to the mortgagor's failure to appear was harmless.

9. Code Civ. Proc. § 1908, relating to the conclusiveness of judgments and final orders, does not apply to an order denying a motion to set aside a judgment on mortgage foreclosure; and such order was not a bar to a suit to enjoin the enforcement of the deficiency judgment entered therein, it not appearing that the same questions were involved.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county; Joseph H. Buck, Judge.

Bill by John Herd against John Tuohy to enjoin enforcement of a judgment. From a judgment in plaintiff's favor, and from an order denying new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Davis & Allen, Kile & Plummer, and Rigby & Rigby, for appellant. Woods & Levinsky and Dudley & Buck, for respondent.

SMITH, C. A judgment was recovered by the defendant herein against the plaintiff and others in the superior court of Tulare county February 15, 1897, for the foreclosure of a mortgage made by the latter to the former. In the judgment as originally entered there was no adjudication that the plaintiff was personally liable, or provision for a deficiency judgment against him; but afterwards, March 13, 1897, on an ex parte application of the defendant's attorneys, the judgment was amended by adding thereto a paragraph adjudging the plaintiff to be personally liable on the mortgage, and that, on the commissioner's return of the sale, deficiency judgment should be docketed against him; and accordingly such a judgment was docketed against him for the sum of $11,- 738.47. Of this judgment a transcript was recorded in the recorder's office of the county of San Joaquin, and under it an execution levied on lands of the plaintiff in that county. This suit was brought in the superior court of San Joaquin county for relief against the judgment as amended and the deficiency judgment entered thereon, and resulted in a judgment for the plaintiff, adjudging, in effect, that the record of the transcript of the deficiency judgment in the recorder's office, and the lien sought to be made by said deficiency judgment on the lands of the plaintiff in the county, be canceled and extinguished, and the defendant be perpetually enjoined from executing the judgment. The appeal is from this judgment and from an order denying a new trial. The points urged for reversal are: (1) Lack of jurisdiction in the court over the subject-matter of the action; (2) insufficiency of the facts alleged in the complaint to constitute a cause of action; (3) insufficiency of the evidence to support the findings, and errors of law.

1. As to the jurisdiction of the court, there can be no serious question. The superior court is vested by the constitution (article 6, § 5) with jurisdiction over "all cases in equity"; and cases of this kind—that is, for relief against judgments on the ground of fraud in their procurement—constitute a familiar and well-established head of equity jurisdiction. Freem. Judgm. § 484a; Daniell, Ch. Prac. 1584, 1585. Nor—with an exception to be noted presently—is this jurisdiction vested in any particular superior court or courts. Every superior court—with the exception alluded to—has jurisdiction of all equity cases that may be brought in it. The exception referred to is that of "actions for the recovery of the possession of, quieting the title to, or for the enforcements of liens upon real estate," which, under the provision of the constitution cited above must be "commenced in the county in which the real estate * * * affected by such action * * * is situated." With reference to other cases there are statutory provisions determining the proper place of trial (Code Civ. Prac. §§ 392-395); but these do not affect the jurisdiction of the court, and hence, "if the county in which the action is commenced is not the proper place for the trial thereof," the only remedy of the defendant is a demand for change of venue (Id. § 396). Nor, in determining the proper place of trial of a suit of this kind, is the peculiar nature of the case at all material to the question. Such suits, like all others, are governed by the statutory provisions applying to the subject; and, accordingly as they are or are not suits of the kind described in section 392, Id., the proper place of trial for them will be determined by the provisions of that section, or those of section 395. There is no provision or principle of the law requiring such suits to be tried by the court which rendered the judgment complained of; nor, unless the county of that court is the proper place of trial either under section 392 or 395 of the Code, can a case commenced in another county come before it otherwise than at the discretion of the judge in which it is pending, exercised under section 397; nor, indeed, even were the suit brought in the court where the judgment was rendered, could a demand for its removal under section 396 be resisted otherwise than on some of the grounds mentioned in section 397. In this case there was no demand for change of venue, and it is, therefore, immaterial whether or not the suit was brought in the county proper for trial. If it is one of the kind of cases provided for in section 392,—as under the decision in Sloss v. De Toro, 77 Cal. 129, 19 Pac. 233, it seems to be,—it was brought in the proper county. If it does not fall within that class, then the defendant was entitled to demand its transfer to the county of his residence,—if other than San Joaquin; but, having failed to demand the transfer, he has waived the objection.

2. The objections made to the complaint are: (1) That there is no allegation that the plaintiff moved in the Tulare court to set aside the judgment; (2) that the complaint does not purport to set forth all of the original decree, and non constat that it was not sufficient to authorize the entry of a deficiency judgment; and (3) that the facts alleged would not have constituted a defense to the action for foreclosure. With reference to the first objection, it is true that the allegation referred to is lacking in the complaint, and that there is no excuse alleged for failing to move in the Tulare court. But, without holding that the allegation was necessary, it is sufficient to say that the defect, if any, was cured by the answer, which sets out the motion, with the affidavits on which it was made, and the order of the court denying the same, and pleads the last as an estoppel. It is an ancient rule of the law that "a defect in pleading is aided" if "expressly or impliedly supplied" by the pleading of the other party. 1 Chit. Pl. 703; Bliss, Code Pl. § 437, and cases cited; Daggett v. Gray, 110 Cal. 169, 42 Pac. 568. As to the second point, the complaint purports to set out the whole judgment, but in fact, as appears from the findings, does not do so. But the omitted portions contain no provision for a deficiency judgment; nor is there any adjudication that the plaintiff (then defendant) was personally liable, unless, as claimed by the appellant, the following recital may be so construed, viz.: "That the interest on said note to November 30, 1895, has been paid; that no other * * * part of said note, principal or interest, has been paid, and there is now due and owing to the plaintiff from the defendants John Herd, Jr., and R. Linder on said note the sum of $91,101.85," etc., "and that the said defendants John Herd, Jr., and R. Linder are personally liable * * * for said sums so found due from them to plaintiff as aforesaid." But this is merely the recital of a fact preceding the actual judgment, and cannot be regarded as an adjudication of personal liability, which alone could authorize the clerk to docket a judgment for deficiency. Code Civ. Proc. § 726; Scamman v. Bonslett, 118 Cal. 98, 50 Pac. 272; Siehler v. Look, 93 Cal. 610, 29 Pac. 220; Leviston v. Swan, 33 Cal. 483, 484. But in fact, so far as the sufficiency of the complaint is concerned, it is immaterial whether the original judgment was or was not sufficient to authorize a deficiency judgment; for, if it was, it would be open to the same objection as the amended judgment. The complaint is therefore equally good on either hypothesis. With regard to the third ground, the facts, in brief, are that Herd had conveyed the mortgaged premises to Linder, who, in writing, assumed and agreed to pay the amount due on the mortgage; and that Tuohy afterwards, knowing the fact, by written agreement with Linder extended the time of payment. The facts are more fully stated in the decision in Tuohy v. Woods, 122 Cal. 667, 55 Pac. 683, which refers to the same transaction. On these facts there can, we think, be no doubt of the sufficiency of the defense. "Linder was not a mere stranger to the principal obligation. By becoming the grantee of the mortgaged premises, and assuming the mortgage indebtedness, he became a principal and controlling party to the obligation. * * * He became the principal debtor, and Herd, the grantor, the surety. Bank v. Madden, 109 Cal. 312, 41 Pac. 1092; 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. (2d Ed.: 1892) § 1206. And as to the plaintiff, Herd, and Linder, 'the doctrines concerning suretyship must control the dealings between the parties.' Pom. Eq. Jur. supra." Tuohy v. Woods, 122 Cal. 667, 55 Pac. 683. See, also, Jones, Mortg. § 742; 1 Ping. Chat. Mortg. § 1016; Insurance Co. v. Hanford, 143 U. S. 187, 12 Sup. Ct. 437, 38 L. Ed. 118. It follows (assuming the facts to be as stated) that the plaintiff was discharged from personal liability.

3. The objections that remain to be considered are: (1) That the evidence was insufficient to justify the finding of the court as to the assurances of Tuohy to Herd that a deficiency judgment would not be taken, etc., and, in connection with this alleged error in allowing the witness Woods to testify as to a conversation on the subject between him and Herd, in the absence of Tuohy; and (2) the claim of appellants that the order of the judge of the Tulare superior court in denying the motion of the plaintiff (then defendant) to set aside the default and judgments operated as a bar by way of estoppel to this suit. With regard to the first point, we think the case must be regarded as falling under the rule that, where the evidence is conflicting, the findings will not be disturbed. Nor do we think there was any error in the admission of the testimony of Woods. It was admissible in order to explain and justify the failure of Herd to appear. But were it otherwise, we are of the opinion that the findings as to the alleged conduct of Tucky, and its influence on Herd, are not necessary to sustain the judgment. It is found (and no objection is made to the findings) that the amendment to the judgment was made on an ex parte application of the attorneys of the (then) plaintiff, and without the knowledge of Herd. This, if not fraud, was one of those cases that, in the words of a leading authority, "ought to be treated as fraud" (2 Daniell, Ch. Prac. 1584); that is, it is a constructive or quasi fraud, having all the actual consequences and all the legal effects of fraud. Nor are courts, in granting relief against a judgment, confined to cases of fraud, actual or constructive. Black, Judgm. § 380 et seq. A judgment will never be interfered with for mere error of the court; but want of notice to the defendant, and his consequent inability to be heard against the ruling, may be a sufficient ground for equity to interpose, even where "his failure to defend is not chargeable to the plaintiff"; and a fortiori where it is so chargeable. Freem. Judgm. § 495. Here, if the original record disclosed prima facie error, so as to allow of amendment, which is doubtful (Black, Judgm. § 156) yet there was in fact no error to be amended; for the judgment was rendered as agreed, and presumably with intention to observe the good faith required of the plaintiff. Hence there should have been notice to the defendant, who could then have defeated the amendment. Scamman v. Bonslett, 118 Cal. 97 et seq., 50 Pac. 272. As to the estoppel claimed, we know of no principle that would give to an order of this kind effect as a technical estoppel. Section 1908 of the Code of Civil Procedure, cited by appellant's counsel, refers only to judgments and final orders of a similar nature,—such as decrees in probate proceedings, etc. Orders of other kinds are governed by the provisions of section 1909 of the Code. 1 Freem. Judgm. § 325 et seq. Nor is there any principle on which an order of this kind, made on affidavits, and largely addressed to the discretion of the court could be held to preclude a court of equity from granting relief. Id. § 511. Nor does it appear here that the decision of the motion involved the same questions as are involved in this action, and the court was, therefore, justified in finding the contrary. Probably the decision of the motion was based on the fact that the judgments in the case necessarily followed the default; for otherwise the court would not have felt authorized to make the amendment, which could be justified only on the hypothesis that there was error apparent on the face of the original judgment. We may infer, therefore, that the motion was denied because not made within six months of entry of default; or, at least, we cannot, in opposition to the finding of the court, infer the contrary. The judgment and order appealed from should, we think, be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; CHIPMAN, C.

PER OURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

HANSEN v. WAGNER et al. (Sac. 882.)¹

(Supreme Court of California. May 29, 1901.)
MORTGAGE—FORECLOSURE—VALIDITY—JURISDICTION—JUDGMENT—COLLATERAL ATTACK.

1. The plaintiff in a suit to foreclose, as against several defendants, alleged that defendant A. was in wrongful possession of the note and mortgage. All the defendants except A. filed a written appearance, consenting to judgment against them; and A. afterwards filed an answer alleging his ownership of the mortgage, and asking its foreclosure, but his pleadings were not served on the other defendants. Notice of his pendency was filed by plaintiff, but not by A.; and a decree was afterwards rendered in favor of A., and he purchased the property at foreclosure. Held, that A. acquired good title, since his answer did not affect the issue of the liability of the mortgagees, and the question of the ownership of the mortgage did not affect them.

2. The filing of a cross complaint by A., under the order of court, alleging his ownership of the property, was unnecessary.

3. Where the answer of one defendant in a mortgage foreclosure suit, alleging ownership of the mortgage and asking its foreclosure, is defective, in failing to allege the execution of the mortgage, such defect is cured by allegations of its execution in the complaint.

4. Where the court has jurisdiction of the subject-matter and the parties in foreclosure, the validity of the judgment cannot be impeached in ejectment.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Madera county; W. M. Conley, Judge.

Ejectment by Ebbe J. Hansen against J. Wagner and others. From a judgment in favor of defendant John Hansen, the plaintiff and other defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Robert L. Hargrove, for appellants. B. W. Child and W. H. Larew, for respondent.

SMITH, C. Appeal from a judgment for plaintiff in ejectment. The plaintiff and the defendant Joseph Wagner both deraign title from one George Hansen,—the plaintiff, under foreclosure of a mortgage made by him to John Hansen August 6, 1892; the defendant, under a deed subsequently made by the mortgagor to one Eubanks, and a deed of the latter to him of date May 10, 1897. The controversy turns upon the effect of the foreclosure proceedings, which, in brief, were as follows: The complaint for foreclosure was filed by John Hansen, Sr., against George Hansen Eubanks, John Hansen, Jr., and certain fictitious defendants. The complaint contained the usual allegations, except that, in addition, it alleged, in effect, that the plaintiff was the owner of the note and mortgage, which it was alleged were taken for him by John Hansen, Jr., as his agent; that the latter unlawfully retained the note and refused to deliver it; and, under the general allegation, that he, as one of the defendants named, claimed to have some interest in the premises, etc., as "mortgagee" or otherwise. The complaint prayed for foreclosure in favor of the plaintiff, and for judgment against John Hansen, Jr., for the delivery up of the note. The defendants George Hansen and Eubanks filed a written appearance April 10, 1896, consenting that plaintiff might take judgment against them for the relief prayed for. The answer of the defendant John Hansen, Jr., filed April 18, 1896, admits the execution of the note and mortgage set out in the complaint, etc., the nonpayment of principal or interest, his refusal to deliver the note to the plaintiff, etc., but denies that he took the note and mortgage as agent of plaintiff, and alleges his own ownership of the same. It concludes with a prayer for the foreclosure of the mortgage in his favor. The case on the issues thus made was called for trial on the 8th day of May, 1897, and the court, after ordering judgment in favor of John Hansen, Jr., also ordered him to file a cross complaint; and accordingly on May 10, 1897, an amended answer and cross complaint were filed by him. The answer, amended answer, and cross complaint were served on the plaintiff, but not on the defendants George Hansen and Eubanks. Notice of lis pendens was filed by the plaintiff, but not by the defendant. Findings were subsequently filed, and judgment entered May 10, 1897, in favor of defendant John Hansen, Jr., who on a subsequent sale became the purchaser, and in due time received his deed.

The sole point made by the appellant is that the court had no jurisdiction to render the judgment of foreclosure. But this point we think is untenable. The ownership of the note and mortgage was involved in the suit as made by the original complaint; and the appearance and default of the defendants authorized the court to proceed, so far as they were concerned, to dispose of them, and to adjudge the foreclosure accordingly. The answer of John Hansen, Jr., praying for foreclosure in his favor, was sufficient to empower the court to render the judgment, and there was not even error in doing so. Code Civ. Proc. § 437 et seq. Neither the action nor the cause of action set up in the answer was different from that set up in the complaint. The cause of action was the note and mortgage, or, rather, the obligation thereby created. The action was the right of the mortgagee to recover. Frost v. Witter (Cal.) 64 Pac. 705. The sole issue raised by the answer was the ownership of the obligation or action. Civ. Code, §§ 14, 655,—a question in which the defaulting defendants had no concern. If the answer was defective in not repeating the allegations of the complaint as to the execution of the mortgage, etc., it was aided, and the defect cured, by the allegations of the complaint. 1 Chit. Pl. 703; Bliss, Code Pl. § 437, and cases cited; Herd v. Tuohy (Sac. 789), 65 Pac. 139; Johnson v. Polhemus, 99 Cal. 246, 247, 33 Pac. 908, citing Belknap v. Sealey, 2 Duer, 570, and Harden v. Ware, 5 Pac. Coast Law J. 317 (not officially reported). But we do not think it was defective. The cross complaint ordered and subsequently filed was altogether supererogatory. It neither added to nor detracted from the jurisdiction of the court. Still less can the jurisdiction of the court be successfully attacked. The court had jurisdiction of the subject-matter and all the parties were before it. Its judgment, therefore, even if erroneous, could not be collaterally impeached. Hawes, Parties, § 6; Jones, Mortg. § 1369; White v. Patton, 87 Cal. 152, 25 Pac. 270; Civ. Code Proc. § 416. The judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: GRAY, C.; COOPER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is affirmed.

HERBERT KRAFT CO. BANK v. BANK OF ORLAND et al. (Sac. 905.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 28, 1901.)

BANK STOCK—ILLEGAL ASSESSMENTS—SALE FOR DELINQUENCY—COLLATERAL SECURITY—PLEDGE—RIGHT OF ACTION—REMEDY—EQUITY.

1. Where a bank levied assessments on certain shares, and not on others, the shares being sold at public auction for delinquency, and one-fourth of its capital stock had not been subscribed, which is a condition precedent to the power to levy assessments by Civ. Code, § 331, such assessments were void, and an action by a party holding such stock as security, to compel the bank to recognize it as a stockholder, is not barred by, or included within, section 347, providing that no action must be sustained to recover stock sold for delinquent assessments on the ground of irregularity in the assessment, unless the sum for which the stock is sold be first tendered, or within Code Civ. Proc. § 341, subd. 2, providing that an action must be commenced within six months to recover stock sold for a delinquent assessment, as provided in Civ. Code, § 347.

2. Where a party held stock of defendant bank as security, and the bank illegally levied an assessment thereon, and sold it for delinquency at public auction, the holder of the stock was not compelled to resort to a suit for damages for conversion, but could retain its security, and obtain relief in a suit in equity to compel the bank to recognize it as a stockholder, under a prayer for such relief as to the court may seem proper.

3. Certificates of stock, assigned as security for an indebtedness, give the holder, as pledgee of the stock, a right to maintain an action to compel defendant corporation to recognize it as a stockholder, after an illegal levy of assessment on the stock and sale thereof for delinquency.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1, Appeal from superior court, Glenn county; Oval Pirkey, Judge.

Action by the Herbert Kraft Company Bank against the Bank of Orland and others to obtain recognition as a stockholder. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

R. E. Ragland and E. A. Bridgford, for appellant. F. Freeman and Chas. L. Donohoe, for respondents.

COOPER, C. This is an appeal from the judgment for the purpose of reviewing the order sustaining defendants' demurrer to the amended complaint. It is alleged that one W. R. Hall, being indebted to one Kraft in the sum of $3,000, on or about the 26th day of January, 1896, caused to be issued to said Kraft, to secure the said indebtedness, a certificate of 70 shares of the capital stock of defendant bank, and that thereafter, to further secure the said sum, said Hall assigned to said Kraft 30 additional shares of said capital stock. The said stock was of the face value of $100 per share. That, subsequent to the transfer by said Hall to said Kraft of the said shares of stock as security, the said Kraft assigned the indebtedness due him by Hall, and the said stock so held as security, to plaintiff, and "said 100 shares of stock were taken as aforesaid by said plaintiff, and have ever since been, and now are, held by it as a pledge as aforesaid, to secure said indebtedness." That there had been issued by defendant bank 1,000 shares of its capital stock. That defendant bank, on the 18th day of May, 1898, "levied, or pretended to levy, an assessment upon said 1,000 shares of subscribed stock, of $32.637 per share." That notice of said assessment was regularly published, the assessment was not paid, and defendant bank, through its directors, made an order that said 100 shares, and other shares upon which the assessment was delinquent, should be sold at public auction, and accordingly, on the 25th day of July, 1898, the said 100 shares, so held by plaintiff as security, were sold to defendants Nelson and Searce, and a new certificate issued to them. That the capital stock of defendant bank is $500,000, divided into 5,000 shares, of the par value of $100 each, of which only $100,000 has been subscribed, and that one-fourth of the capital stock has not at any time been subscribed. That defendant bank never intended to, and did not, collect the said assessment upon any other stock except that so held by this plaintiff, and that said assessment was not uniform, and was intended as a means of enforcing an indebtedness due by Hall, the original owner of the said 100 shares, to the defendant bank. That the defendants allege and claim that defendants Nelson and Searce are the owners of, and hold the only title to, said 100 shares of stock. That said Nelson and Searce are, and at all times were, directors of defendant bank. That defendant bank refuses to recognize this plaintiff as the holder of said stock, or to permit it to enjoy any of the privileges or benefits of a stockholder of defendant bank. The demurrer was upon several grounds, but we will discuss those only upon which defendants rely. We must presume that all the facts set forth in the amended complaint are true.

1. It is claimed that the action is barred by the provisions of Civ. Code, § 347, which is as follows: "No action must be sustained to recover stock sold for delinquent assessments, upon the ground of irregularity in the assessment, irregularity or defect of the notice of sale, or defect or irregularity in the sale, unless the party seeking to maintain such action first pays or tenders to the corporation, or the party holding the stock sold, the sum for which the same was sold, together with all subsequent assessments which may have been paid thereon, and interest on such sums from the time they were paid; and no such action must be sustained unless the same is commenced by the filing of a complaint and the issuing of a summons thereon within six months after such sale was made;" and by subdivision 2, § 341, Code Civ. Proc., which provides that an action must be commenced within six months "to recover stock sold for a delinquent assessment as provided in section 347 of the Civil Code." It is said that the court below sustained the demurrer upon this ground. We do not think the action was barred under the provisions herein quoted. This is not an action to recover the stock sold. Neither is the action for the purpose of recovering damages for its conversion. Section 347, Civ. Code, applies only where the action is for the recovery upon the ground of irregularity in the assessment, irregularity or defect in the notice of sale, or defect or irregularity in the sale. The assessment in this case was not an irregular assessment merely, but a void one. If one-fourth of the capital stock had not been subscribed, the defendant bank had no power to levy the assessment. Civ. Code, § 331; Investment Co. v. Merrill, 108 Cal. 492, 41 Pac. 487; Railway Co. v. Hartman, 116 Cal. 262, 48 Pac. 65. An assessment upon certain of the shareholders and not others, is invalid. Mor. Priv. Corp. §§ 154, 305; Kohler v. Agassiz, 99 Cal. 15, 33 Pac. 741.

2. It is claimed that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The main argument under this head is that the complaint states a cause of action in equity in the nature of an action to quiet title to personal property. We are not inclined to view the complaint in so strict a technical sense. It may not be a model of pleading, but it states the facts, so that we know the points relied upon by the pleader. The prayer of the complaint asks for such relief as to the court may seem proper. If the facts are proven as alleged, we think the court would have no trouble in determining the relief that is usual and proper in such cases. It is said in Mor. Priv. Corp. § 208: "Upon the same principle, it has been held repeatedly that, if shares in a corporation are transferred upon the books, without the consent of the holder, under a forged assignment or power of attorney, the real owner is not thereby divested of his rights as shareholder, and is entitled to have his shares replaced upon the books, and to recover any dividends which may have accrued upon them. If the corporation refuses to recognize the real owner as a shareholder, or refuses to deliver him a new certificate of shares when entitled thereto, he may obtain specific relief by bill in equity, or may sue the company for the value of the shares." In speaking of the remedy of a stockholder in such case, it is said by Cook, in his work on Stocks, Stockholders, and Corporation Laws (volume 1, § 389): "He may apply to a court of law for a mandamus to the corporation to compel it to open its books and allow the registry, or to pay him damages if registry is impossible; or he may sue the corporation at law for damages, on the ground that by its refusal it has been guilty of a conversion of his stock." In the case of Dewing v. Perdicaries, 96 U. S. 193, 24 L. Ed. 654, it appeared that a part of the stock of the Charleston Gaslight Company was illegally sold pursuant to a statute of the Confederate States during the Civil War, in 1862, on the ground that it belonged to "alien enemies." In the opinion it is said: "The complainant prays that the sale may be vacated; that the certificates still outstanding, issued to the purchasers and their assignees, may be declared invalid, and ordered to be delivered up and canceled. * * * The complainant had a clear right, on account of the cloud cast upon his title, and of the injury otherwise special to himself, of which he complained, to be heard upon his bills. The entire subject and the necessary parties being before the court, and the court having jurisdiction for one purpose, might well take and exercise it as to everything involved in the controversy." There is no doubt of the authority of a court of equity to give a stockholder relief in such case as is here alleged. Telegraph Co. v. Davenport, 97 U. S. 369, 24 L. Ed. 1047; Pratt v. Manufacturing Co., 123 Mass. 110, 25 Am. Rep. 37; Pollock v. Bank, 7 N. Y. 274, 57 Am. Dec. 520; Moses v. Watson, 65 Ga. 198; Baker v. Wasson, 53 Tex. 155. It would be strange if a court of equity in such case could not grant relief. The plaintiff has a right to the stock held by it, and to dividends upon it, if any such are paid. The defendant bank will not be allowed to levy an assessment without authority, and sell the stock under such void assessment to its own directors, and refuse to allow plaintiff in any way to enjoy the privileges of a stockholder. It is true plaintiff could have brought a suit for damages for conversion, but it was not compelled to do so. It has the right to retain the security it holds unimpaired by any wrongful acts of the corporation.

3. The plaintiff has the right to maintain the action as pledgee of the stock. The certificates were assigned to plaintiff. Such certificates are recognized as the evidence of right and ownership, and certainly confer the right upon the holder to protect his special interest therein. Suppose the pledgor of plaintiff has fled from the country, and cannot be served with process; can it be that the plaintiff is unable to enforce its rights or to receive the income from the property it holds as a pledge? We do not think the defendant bank and the purchasers at the void sale can be heard to say that plaintiff has not the capacity to maintain the action. The judgment should be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to overrule the demurrer to the complaint, and allow defendants a reasonable time to answer.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; GRAY, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to overrule the demurrer to the complaint, and allow defendants a reasonable time to answer.

BRIGNOLE v. BRIGNOLE et al. (Sac. 721.)
(Supreme Court of California. May 31, 1901.)
EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS—COMPEN-SATION—ATTORNEY'S FEES—SERVICES.

1. Where an executor who is paid a commission for certain services employs an attorney to do the work instead of doing it himself, the attorney should be paid by the executor, and not out of the estate, since otherwise the estate would be made to pay twice for the same services.

2. Where, on the final account of executors, the court finds the value of the legal services rendered the executors, such finding is conclusive, since, though the court, in the absence of a stipulation, cannot fix an attorney's fee in an estate, it must determine whether a fee charged is a reasonable sum to be charged to the estate on account of legal services rendered for the estate.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court Amador county; R. C. Rust, Judge.

Application to settle the account of Joseph Morizio and others as executors of the will of Bartolomeo Brignole, deceased. From the decree settling the account, Morizio appeals. Affirmed.

R. B. Tappan (Reed & Nusbaumer, of counsel), for appellant. C. P. Vincini, for respondents.

TEMPLE, J. This is an appeal taken by one of three executors from a decree of final settlement and an order fixing the value of legal services. The estate was valued at $94,000. The administration was all fair sailing. There was no dispute or controversy about anything. It was a mere matter of going through the forms and waiting for the lapse of the time required. In the final settlement the court allowed on account of the services rendered two of the executors $750, and the same amount for the appellant, Morizio, for the services of his attorneys. Certainly this was enough, especially for the appellant, whose attorneys apparently rendered very little service. The trouble seems to be that Morizio employed three attorneys, McGee, Tappan, and Simpson. During the administration the executor discharged his attorneys, and employed Tappan alone as his attorney. In the decree settling the final account the court allowed the executor $250 on account of services rendered by McGee, and $500 for services rendered by Tappan and Simpson. The point is made that as Tappan is shown to have rendered some services after his separate employment the court was bound to make an allowance on account of them. But this is not so. It must also find, to justify such allowance, that the executors needed the service of an attorney, and that the services were worth something to the estate. If in this case the court had expressly found that the services of Tappan were of no value to the estate, and had therefore allowed nothing on account of them, there is nothing in the record which in such case would necessitate a reversal. The executor is paid a commission for certain services. If he employs an attorney to do such work instead of doing it himself, the court ought not to make an allowance for it. Such services should be paid for by the executor himself. Otherwise, the estate is made to pay twice for the same services. It is a question whether the affidavit of Mr. Tappan shows the rendition of any service which was needed by the estate, or was of advantage to it.

There is a statement in the bill of exceptions which, as I understand it, is to the effect that at the time the final account was settled the court was not aware that Tappan demanded any pay for services, apart from the claim of McGee and Simpson. This being so, the court must have estimated the value of all the legal service rendered to Morizio at $750, which was allowed. This is conclusive. If because of some unwise bargain Morizio owes Tappan more, he nevertheless cannot collect it from the estate. The court had no power, in the absence of a stipulation, to fix an attorney's fee in an estate, but it can and must determine whether a fee charged is a reasonable sum to be charged to the estate on account of legal services rendered to the estate. The order and decree appealed from are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. SHEARS. (Cr. 664.)

HOMICIDE—JUSTIFIABLE—INVOLUNTARY— EVIDENCE—CHARGE.

1. Where a witness arrived at the place a few minutes after a homicide, and while the body of deceased was still lying where it fell, it was not error to permit such witness to illustrate to the jury, by a diagram, the location of the surrounding objects when he arrived.

2. Where defendant was on trial for murder, it was not error to permit a witness to testify that some hours after the killing defendant said, "I am sorry I got into this trouble, but, as for killing W., I don't care any more for that than I do for killing a jack rabbit."

3. A new trial should not be granted for improper remarks of district attorney, where defendant merely excepted to the statement, since its effect would have been removed if defendant had asked the court to instruct the jury to disregard it.

4. Where the doctrine that the effect of apparent danger is the same as real danger, as regards the right of self-defense, has been fully stated by the court, it is not error to refuse defendant's requests repeating such instructions.

5. On a trial for murder, where defendant had not testified that he saw or apprehended any danger, but only that he knew nothing of what occurred after deceased struck him until the gun was taken from him after the killing, it was proper to refuse an instruction as to a justifiable killing.

6. Defendant requested the court to charge that if the deceased struck the defendant a severe blow on the head with the loaded butt of a whip, at a place where such blow might produce great bodily injury, such striking would be an assault with a deadly instrument, and a felony, and defendant had a right to claim the justification specified in Pen. Code, § 197, which declares homicide is justifiable when committed when resisting an attempt to commit a felony, or to do some great bodily injury on any person. Held, the court properly added to such instruction that "it should appear, however, that defendant was actually resisting an attempt to assault him with a deadly weapon likely to produce great bodily injury or a felony, or to do great bodily injury on his person, and that such danger was imminent."

7. Where the court marked one of defendant's requested instructions, "Not given; given in instruction 37," and drew several lines across the instruction, and afterwards erased what he had written, except the word "Given," and the instruction went to the jury in that condition, after being read to them as a part of the charge, the defendant could not complain.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Riverside county; J. S. Noyes, Judge.

Vernea Shears was convicted of manslaughter, and from the judgment and an order denying a new trial appeals. Affirmed.

Thomas T. Porteous and Gibson & Gill, for appellant. Tiley L. Ford, Atty. Gen., and A. A. Moore, Jr., Dep. Atty. Gen., for the People.

BEATTY, C. J. The defendant was tried on a charge of murder, and convicted of manslaughter. He appeals from the judgment and from an order denying him a new trial. A brief summary of the facts of the homicide will facilitate the discussion of such of the numerous assignments of error as require special notice.

The defendant and one McGaw had gone to the place of the killing for the purpose of getting a load of hay, and had with them on their wagon a loaded rifle. While the defendant was engaged in greasing his wagon he was approached by the deceased, who accused him of having circulated reports injurious to a young girl. Defendant denied the accusation, and the deceased called him a liar, upon which defendant attacked him with the butt of a loaded whip. Deceased backed away, and in his retreat was struck once, and perhaps more than once, with the whip, but the blows do not seem to have caused any serious injury. He then succeeded in wresting the whip from defendant, who in turn retreated towards his wagon. When near his wagon defendant was struck on the side of his head with the butt of the whip, the blow being severe enough to knock him down, and cause a considerable flow of blood from a contused wound. The deceased was continuing to strike defendant with the whip, when McGaw interposed, and endeavored to take the whip from him, but he resisted the effort, and while this struggle was going on defendant crept under his wagon to the opposite side, arose, and, snatching his rifle from the wagon, fired instantly, inflicting upon deceased a mortal wound. This being the substance of the testimony for the prosecution, it established a very clear case of manslaughter, against which the only matter urged in defense was certain evidence to the effect that the defendant was or might have been so dazed by the stunning blow on the head, inflicted by the deceased, that he did not know what he was doing when he fired the fatal shot. The defense, in other words, was that the killing was not volitional, but was caused by the wrongful act of the deceased in striking a blow which for the time deprived the defendant of his senses. This, at least, seems to have been the defense most relied on, though there was also an attempt to combine with it the somewhat inconsistent plea of self-defense.

In support of their appeal, counsel for defendant present more than 30 assignments of error, each of which is separately argued and insisted upon in their printed brief. The first 16 points relate to rulings upon objections to the evidence, with respect to which it ought to be sufficient to say that if any error was committed it was trivial and wholly inconsequential. But counsel have pressed these objections so earnestly and with such evident good faith that we feel obliged to notice a few of them by way of example.

The first of these objections relates to a ruling of the court allowing one of the witnesses for the people to illustrate his testimony by means of a rough diagram of the scene of the homicide. It appeared that he arrived upon the scene a few minutes after the killing, and the objection was that he could not possibly indicate on the diagram the position of certain wagons, because one or more of them might have been moved after the killing and before his arrival. The answer to this is that the witness was not pretending to testify to the position of the wagons at the moment of the shooting, but only as to what he found on his arrival, while the body of the deceased was still lying where he had fallen, and that certainly was of the res gestae. If the object of the evidence was to show the position of the wagons at the time of the shooting, it had at least a tendency to do so, although it could be surmised that they had been moved. The conclusiveness of such evidence is not a test of its admissibility. But, aside from this, it does not appear how the position of the wagons had the slightest bearing on the case. Whether they were four feet apart or twenty feet apart seems to us to have been utterly immaterial, and this observation is also pertinent to several of the other exceptions under this head.

An exception of somewhat different character was taken to a ruling allowing a witness to testify to the following language used by the defendant some hours after the killing: "I am sorry I got into this trouble, but as for killing George Warner I don't care any more for that than I do for killing a jack rabbit." This evidence was competent and relevant to a material fact. The charge was murder, and the expression proved had a tendency to show malice.

The various objections to the evidence as to the condition of the hat of deceased and the bruises on his body relate, like those concerning the wagons, only to its conclusiveness, and not to its relevancy.

A hypothetical question asked by the district attorney assumed that defendant had repeated some hours after the homicide a long conversation which occurred in his hearing immediately after he was knocked down by deceased, the object apparently being to show that he was not stunned or deprived of his senses by the blow. Defendant objected to the question upon the ground that there was no evidence to show that the defendant had any conversation with anybody. There was evidence of a conversation, though a short one. The objection as it was made was properly overruled. Besides, the question was never completed, and the answer was unintelligible. The other questions asked this witness, Dr. Parker, on his cross-examination were entirely unobjectionable.

The district attorney in his address to the jury used this language: "It never occurred to me that the defendant was dazed, and I saw him the next day." This was improper, but its effect would have been removed if the defendant had asked the court to instruct the jury that it was improper, and to disregard it. He did not invoke the action of the court, but contented himself with excepting to the remarks of the district attorney.

The court did not err in refusing to repeat, at defendant's request, instructions to the effect that apparent danger is the same as real danger, as regards the right of self-defense. That doctrine was fully and clearly stated in several of the instructions that were given. Instruction 16 on this subject was properly refused, for the additional reason that it was confusing and misleading.

The court, as a part of its charge to the jury, gave the following: "The defendant is entitled to a verdict of acquittal even if you find he was not in a dazed condition of mind when he shot Warner, but was in full possession of his reason and judgment, if you also find from the evidence that he shot defendant under an honest belief that he was then in danger of great bodily injury from said Warner; and defendant would be entitled also to a verdict of not guilty, if the evidence creates a reasonable doubt in your minds as to whether the defendant did or did not, from the circumstances and the situation in which he then was, really believe that he was then in danger of great bodily injury from said Warner at the time he shot him." This covers the substance of several of the defendant's requests to charge, which were denied by the court on the ground that they had been given elsewhere.

The court, at the request of the defendant, instructed the jury that he had himself testified in the case, and that his testimony should be fairly considered by the jury, but the court in giving this instruction struck out the following clause: "And if it raises a reasonable doubt in the minds of the jurors as to whether the killing was or was not justifiable, he is entitled to an acquittal, even though his testimony is entirely uncorroborated." If the testimony of the defendant had tended in any degree to prove a killing in self-defense, the striking out of this clause of the instruction would have been erroneous, but on examination of his evidence we cannot find that the defendant makes any claim to have been acting in self defense. He does not say that he saw or apprehended any danger at the time of shooting. His testimony is that he recollects nothing from the time he was knocked down until the gun was taken from him after the shooting. This evidence tends to show that the killing was involuntary, not that it was justifiable.

The defendant requested the following instruction: "I also instruct you that it is not necessary that the instrument, in order to be a deadly weapon, should be dangerous in itself, but whether it was or not in contemplation of the law depends upon whether it was a weapon or instrument likely to produce great bodily injury or death, when used to strike a severe blow upon the head of another, at a place where such blow would be likely to produce great bodily injury; and if you find that George Warner did, during the quarrel between himself and the defendant, with no other provocation on the part of defendant than the striking of said Warner a blow or blows upon the legs, not likely to produce great bodily injury, and which did not produce such injury, strike the defendant a severe blow upon the side of the head with the loaded butt of a whip, at a place where such blow would or might be likely to produce great bodily injury to defendant, then, and in such case, I instruct you that such striking by said Warner of defendant would be an assault with a deadly weapon or instrument likely to produce great bodily injury, and a felony, and defendant had a right to claim the justification specified in section 197, Pen. Code, which declares that homicide is also justifiable when committed by any person in either of the following cases: (1) 'When resisting an attempt to murder any person, or to commit a felony, or to do some great bodily injury upon any person.'" This the court gave, with the following addition: "It should appear, however, that defendant was actually resisting an attempt to murder him or an assault on him with a deadly weapon likely to produce great bodily injury or a felony, or to do some great bodily injury upon his person, and that such danger was imminent." It is contended that it was error to make this addition to the instruction. We think the addition made by the court was a proper qualification of the instruction as requested. The court would have been justified in refusing it altogether, but the defendant cannot complain that it was given with a proper qualification. The only plausible objection to the words added by the court is that they seem to require that the danger must be actual and imminent to justify a killing in self-defense. But they do not have this effect, for they only qualify the hypothesis stated in the instruction itself, which is one of actual and imminent danger, as distinguished from apparent danger. The law of apparent danger was clearly given in other instructions, and, even if it had not been given, the omission would have been unimportant in this case; for there was no evidence of an apparent, but unreal, danger.

The defendant requested the court to give the following instruction: "(27) I further instruct you that if you find that at the time the defendant shot George Warner the defendant was in such a dazed and uncertain condition of mind, produced by the blow upon his head, that he was not capable of exercising the judgment of an ordinary intelligent man of his years, or was not conscious of, or in a state of mind to recognize or consider, his acts, or the consequences of his acts, then your verdict should acquit the defendant." The judge first decided to refuse this instruction, and wrote underneath it: "Not given; given in instruction 37. Noyes, Judge." He also drew his pencil through several of the lines which were typewritten, and drew a pen across them vertically several times, and diagonally twice. Subsequently he drew his pencil through all that he had written except the words, "Given. Noyes, Judge," and added these words: "Pen and pencil marks not to be considered by the jury. Noyes, Judge." In this condition the instruction was given to the jury on their retirement, after it had been previously read to them. Defendant contends that the instruction was rendered unintelligible by the marks upon it, and that he was thereby injured. There is a photographic copy of the instruction in the record as handed to the jury. It remains perfectly legible and intelligible, and we think that the manner in which it was first refused and then given—the evidence of which it bears upon its face—was really more calculated to draw the attention of the jury to the proposition it contains than if it had been allowed in the usual manner.

We find no objection to any of the instructions given by the court of its own motion. Those taken from the Hecker Case were proper and pertinent in this view: When the deceased took the whip from defendant, he (defendant) immediately retreated towards his wagon, where deceased knew he had a gun, and the evidence shows that deceased was actually apprehensive that his purpose was to get his gun. This being the case, it was proper to instruct the jury as to the rights of deceased in defending himself against one who had made the first assault. The foregoing exceptions are those which seem the most serious of the many which are discussed in the brief. We find them without substantial merit. The judgment and order of the superior court are affirmed.

SCHUUR v. RODENBACK. (S. F. 2,456.)¹

(Supreme Court of California. May 29, 1901.)

EXECUTION OF DEED—MENTAL CAPACITY OF GRANTOR—EVIDENCE—DELIVERY IN ESCROW.

1. In a suit to have deed of gift executed by decedent to defendant, her brother, a few days before her death, canceled as fraudulent and void, the evidence was conflicting as to whether at the date of the execution of the deed decedent was drunk, and laboring under delusions. There was evidence that decedent first suggested deeding the property to defendant, and that she had, through defendant, obtained a lawyer's advice as to the way to make the gift so as to take effect at her death. Held insufficient to show mental incapacity on decedent's part.

2. Where a deed of gift provided for its delivery to be held in escrow and delivered to the grantee at the moment of the grantor's death, a compliance with the provision constituted a delivery, and operated to convey title to the grantee.

3. Error in striking out an answer to a question which was objectionable as being too general is harmless when witness was afterwards permitted to testify to substantially the same matter that was stricken out.

4. Evidence that witness had received instructions from the grantor, through defendant, to draft a deed of gift of certain property in defendant's favor, as outlined in a previous letter from witness to grantor, while hearsay, was not erroneously allowed to stand, where defendant had testified without contradiction that he received the directions from grantor, and communicated them to witness.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Edward J. Belcher, Judge.

Action by William J. Schuur, administrator, against Gerhard Rodenback. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Fisher Ames, for appellant. Alfred Fuhrman and John Heenan (H. S. Foote, of counsel), for respondent.

GRAY, C. The plaintiff was the son and is the sole heir at law of the above-named deceased. The defendant was the brother of said deceased. The suit is to have surrendered and canceled as fraudulent and void a certain deed of gift executed by said deceased to her brother during her last illness, and some four or five days before her death. The plaintiff appeals from a judgment in defendant's favor and from an order denying a new trial.

1. The case was tried without a jury, and the findings of the court on the issues of fraud, undue influence, incompetency, non-delivery and nonexecution of the deed are adverse to plaintiff; and it is against these findings that he directs his principal attack on this appeal. It is claimed particularly that the finding as to the mental capacity of Mrs. Schuur is contrary to the evidence. It was testified, in substance, by appellant and his wife, that at the date of the execution of the deed Mrs. Schuur was drunk, and laboring under delusions. On the other hand, on behalf of respondent it was testified that at that date, prior thereto, and thereafter Mrs. Schuur appeared perfectly sober and sane. There was also evidence tending to show that the first suggestion that the property be deeded to the respondent had come from Mrs. Schuur, and that she had, through her brother, sought and obtained from a lawyer advice as to how she could give the property to her brother so as to exclude the son from it, and have the gift take effect so as to leave her in control of the property while she lived. The finding as to mental capacity of Mrs. Schuur does not rest for its support alone upon the testimony of respondent and his wife, but it is substantiated by the evidence of apparently disinterested witnesses. The finding that the plaintiff was worthless, and that he beat his mother, was not essential or necessary to a disposition of the material issues involved in the case, and it is, therefore, needless to inquire whether said finding has any competent evidence to support it. The evidence established the execution and delivery of the deed without conflict. It was not necessary that the deed should be witnessed under the law of this state. The deed provided as to its delivery as follows: "This deed is hereby delivered to Alfred Fuhrman, to be held by him in escrow, and be delivered by said Alfred Fuhrman to said grantee only at the moment of my death, and not before." This provision of the deed was complied with, and this constituted a delivery of the deed, and operated to convey the title in the property to the grantee. Rulz v. Dow, 113 Cal. 490, 45 Pac. 867. We see no reason for interfering with the findings of the court.

2. Lizzie Schuur was examined as a witness on behalf of plaintiff, and questions were asked, answers given, and rulings made as follows: "Q. What was the appearance of Mrs. Conradine Schuur at that time with respect to health? A. She appeared very sick. Q. What was her appearance with respect to sobriety? A. She appeared to be intoxicated. She had been drinking gin and wine that day,—a flask of gin, and a bottle of wine almost. Q. What happened after Mr. Rodenback left on that day? Mr. Fuhrman: We object to anything which occurred after Rodenback left. The Court: Objection sustained. Mr. Ames: Plaintiff notes an exception. Q. What was the appearance of Mrs. Conradine Schuur at that time, with respect to being rational or irrational? A. She appeared irrational; talking queer; saying very queer things. Q. What was she saying? A. She was talking about imaginary things. She was saying: 'Listen to that polly talking.' 'Listen to the birds sing.' There was no polly nor any birds there. Mr. Fuhrman: We move to strike out what was said—what was testified to—in the last answer. The Court: Strike it out. Mr. Ames: Plaintiff excepts." The foregoing testimony related to the condition of Mrs. Schuur on the day of the execution of the deed. We think there was no error in sustaining the objection to the question as to what happened after Mr. Rodenback left on that day. This question was too general. From it the court could not say whether an answer to it would be pertinent to the subject under inquiry. The court erred, however, in granting the motion to strike out; but the appellant was permitted to testify without objection to substantially the same matter that was stricken out, and for that reason we must hold that the error was without prejudice. People v. Westlake, 62 Cal. 303; Gillaspie v. Hagans, 90 Cal. 90, 27 Pac. 298. Objection is made to the action of the court in refusing to strike out the testimony of Alfred Fuhrman to the effect that he received directions from Mrs. Schuur, through Rodenback, to draft the deed of gift as outlined in his previous letter to her. Rodenback had already testified fully as to receiving these directions from Mrs. Schuur, and communicating the same to Fuhrman, and there was no error in permitting Fuhrman's evidence to stand as to the fact of his having received the directions. Of course, Fuhrman could not know of his own knowledge that Rodenback received any such instructions from Mrs. Schuur, and his answer, so far as it relates to that matter, is hearsay, no doubt; but that becomes unimportant in view of Rodenback's uncontradicted testimony to facts within his knowledge. Minna Strauss testified that "she [deceased] said everything was to belong to William [the plaintiff]; that her husband wanted it so." This last phrase, "that her husband wanted it so," was struck out on motion of respondent. In this we see no error. The husband's desire in the premises was entirely immaterial. The important part of the answer related to the desire of Mrs. Schuur, and that was not struck out. Appellant asked respondent on cross-examination, "What conversation did you have regarding the money?" From the record before us it is impossible to see what bearing this question, or any answer to it, could have upon the case. We must therefore hold that no error is made to appear in sustaining an objection to the question. The following answer was struck out on the ground that it was not responsive to the question, to wit: "I did not visit her very much before her death because she was always intoxicated." The question to which this was an answer is not in the record, and we must again hold that error is not made to appear. The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; COOPER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

McFARLAND, J. I concur in the judgment of affirmance and in the opinion of the commissioner, but I concur in that part of the opinion which holds that there was a legal delivery of the deed to the grantee after the death of the grantor solely on the authority of Bury v. Young, 98 Cal. 446, 33 Pac. 338. My views on the subject, which I still entertain, were expressed in my dissenting opinion in Bury v. Young; but that case must be taken as establishing the law of this state. See notes to Bury v. Young (Cal.) 35 Am. St. Rep. 186 (s. c. 33 Pac. 338).

BAY ROCK CO. v. BELL et al. (S. F. 2,415.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 31, 1901.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—LOCAL ASSESSMENTS—STREET WORK—RESOLUTIONS OF INTENTION.

A resolution of intention to perform street work, prescribing that a certain avenue "be graded for its full width to the official lines and grade, curbed, guttered, and macadamized," and also prescribing certain cross walks and a gutter, said work to be done "in accordance with the special specifications adopted for said work by said board on the day the resolution was adopted," was not sufficiently definite to authorize a contract for such work, and the contractor, having performed it, had no lien therefor on the property benefited.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; F. B. Ogden, Judge.

Action by the Bay Rock Company against James Evelyn Bell and others. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Reversed.

R. M. F. Soto and Charles Stewart (Noble Hamilton, of counsel), for appellants. Wm. Laird Hill, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, C. Action to foreclose lien for street work in the town of Berkeley. Plaintiff had judgment, from which, and from the order denying their motion for a new trial, defendants appeal.

The resolution of intention described the work to be done as follows: "That San Pablo avenue, in said town, * * * be graded for its full width to the official lines and grade, curbed, guttered, and macadamized, and that cross walks be constructed across said San Pablo avenue" at certain named street crossings, "and that a culvert be constructed on the east side of said San Pablo avenue across Hopkins street." The resolution was adopted on September 14, 1891, and contained the following paragraph: "(e) That said macadamizing shall be done, and said culvert and cross walks shall be constructed, under and in accordance with the special specifications adopted for said work by said board on the 14th day of September, 1891."

Respondent's counsel states with admirable conciseness certain principles of settled law in this class of cases, which, to shorten the discussion, they concede without cavil: (1) The resolution of intention is the jurisdictional foundation of the proceedings, and failure to comply with the requirements of the statute with respect to the contents of the resolution is fatal to a contract founded upon it, and to any assessment to pay the contractor for the work; (2) the statute requires that the resolution of intention shall contain an intelligible description of the proposed work, and without such description a contract founded upon the resolution is void; (3) failure of the resolution of intention to describe the work cannot be obviated by putting a sufficient description into any subsequent part of the proceedings; (4) unless the resolution of intention is published as prescribed by the statute, no valid contract can be made under it.

In declaring that the street should be "graded for its full width to the official lines and grade, and * * * macadamized," the resolution sufficiently described that part of the work. Schwiesau v. Mahon, 128 Cal. 114, 60 Pac. 683. But the resolution also required that the street "be curbed, guttered, * * * and that cross walks be constructed across" certain streets named, "and that a culvert be constructed on the east side of San Pablo avenue, across Hopkins street." The resolution contained the provision already quoted (paragraph "e"), referring to certain special specifications for said work adopted on the same day on which the resolution was adopted, and probably preceded the latter. But it will be observed that this provision does not include the curbs and gutters, so that, if the specifications may be referred to as part of the resolution as to the culverts and macadamizing and cross walks, we find no such direction or authority in the resolution as to the material out of which the curbs and gutters are to be constructed, nor does the resolution direct or authorize the property owner to look to the specifications to learn these facts. It is not required by the statute that specifications shall precede the resolution, or that they shall have been prepared at the same time and be made part of it. The act requires only that the resolution should sufficiently describe the work contemplated to convey an intelligent idea of the improvement and its nature and extent, and plans and specifications are not required, except in the case of sewers, before the work is ordered. Schwiesau v. Mahon, supra.

In preparing specifications to form part of the resolution, the board would be doing something not required by the act, and, if this course may be permissible,—which we do not decide,—the specifications could be made a part of the resolution only by a clear expression of intention so to do, and it is at least doubtful whether anything short of setting forth the specifications in full in the resolution would accomplish such object. However this may be, it is certain that any reference in the resolution to any of the work to be done in accordance with specifications already adopted, to be effective, would have to clearly point out the work to be so done. The most that can be said of the resolution here, in this regard, is that it directs only a part of the work to be done according to specifications then adopted, namely, macadamizing, culverts, and cross walks, and it entirely omits any reference to the curbs and gutters. Turning to the specifications, we find that they provide that "the curbing shall be of sound No. 1 redwood plank, three inches by twelve inches, free from sap, well and truly set to the official line and grade," stating how to be spiked, etc.; and, as to the gutters, that they "shall be not less than three feet or more than five feet wide, as specified in order of work. They shall be of rock classed as No. 1 in ordinance No. 334. The stones shall be at least of six inches in depth, the upper surface smooth, and an area of not more than four blocks to the square foot." No such particularity is required to be stated in the resolution. It would have been sufficient for the resolution had it stated that the curbing should be constructed of redwood, and that the gutters should be constructed of rock. It has been often held that the resolution need not be sufficient in its description of the work to constitute specifications. But where the work is such as will admit of construction by different materials, varying in value, durability, and cost of construction, something more is called for in the resolution than to simply designate the work itself. As has been already said, when we speak of macadamizing a street the mind at once comprehends the nature and character of the work; but this is not true of sewers, culverts, and the like work. With regard to curbs and gutters, the specifications show that they fall within this latter class, for stone, wood, or concrete could have been used for either or both, instead of the material designated in the specifications. The only question then is, does the resolution describe the work by reason of the reference therein made to the specifications? Conceding, but not deciding, that reference in the resolution of intention may be made to the specifications adopted by a separate resolution or ordinance on the same day, we do not think the reference in the present case included the curbs and gutters. In providing specifically that the macadamizing, culverts, and cross walks shall be constructed in accordance with "the special specifications adopted for said work," and omitting any such direction as to the curbs and gutters, we must conclude that the omission was intentional. In any event, the proceedings being in Invitum, we are not permitted to hold to be certain that which is uncertain (Labs v. Cooper, 107 Cal. 656, 40 Pac. 1042); and the resolution is far from being certain in the matter just noticed. The owner of property could not, from an inspection of the resolution, determine that the curbs and gutters were to be constructed according to the specifications. Indeed, seeing other work enumerated so to be done, and not finding the curbs and gutters in the list, he might well conclude that as to them no specifications were made, and, no materials being designated, he might object to the work for this very reason. If he did not object, the omission being fatal to jurisdiction, he may now object. It was held in Fay v. Reed, 128 Cal. 357, 60 Pac. 927, that the requirement that the resolution shall describe the work applies to all and each of its material parts; and a failure of description in any material part of the work vitiates the resolution as a whole, and renders void a bid and contract to do the work proposed by the resolution, inclusive of the defective part, and no street assessment can be enforced under such contract.

It is regrettable that so many of these cases occur where the court is forced to so decide as that work done, often in entire good faith, must go without compensation. But no course is open except to consistently adhere to rules and principles established by a long series of decisions, departure from which would not only lead to uncertainty as to what the law is, but would open the door to abuses not to be tolerated.

Appellants present numerous other objections to the proceeding, and among others challenge the constitutionality of the Vrooman act. It is not necessary to pass upon these matters. The assessment was void for the reasons already stated, and therefore the decree foreclosing plaintiff's lien cannot be sustained. The judgment and order should be reversed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; GRAY, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order are reversed.

(Sac. 901.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 29, 1901.)

ADMISSIONS IN PLEADING—TRIAL—FINDINGS
OUTSIDE THE ISSUES—DISPOSITION ON APPEAL.

1. Where a complaint, in an action for labor and materials furnished under a contract, alleges that a certain sum has been paid the plaintiff under the contract, and the answer avers payment of the sum stated in the complaint, a finding that a larger sum was paid will be disregarded, as the admission in the pleadings is conclusive.

2. Where the record contains no pleading or mention of materials said to have been furnished plaintiff by a certain person, a finding that such materials were furnished and judgment recovered therefor is outside the issues.

3. Where, in an action for labor and materials furnished under a contract, an answer filed by parties who claimed to have furnished plaintiff with materials used in the construction of the building contained no allegation as to furnishing such materials, but merely that they had commenced actions against plaintiff to satisfy their demands for materials furnished plaintiff for the building described in the contract, and there was no request for a money judgment in their favor, a finding that the parties filing the answer had furnished such materials and recovered judgment therefor was outside the issues.

4. Where certain findings are contrary to the admissions in the pleadings, and others are entirely outside the issues made by the pleadings, and the judgment cannot be sustained on the remaining findings, the judgment will be reversed on appeal, with directions to allow all parties to amend their pleadings.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county; Joseph H. Budd, Judge.

Action on a contract by F. C. Gamache against the South school district and others. From a judgment in favor of defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

A. H. Carpenter, for appellant. Nicol & Orr and O. B. Parkinson, for respondents.

COOPER, C. This is an appeal from the judgment. No brief has been filed in behalf of any of the respondents, and the entire labor of examining the points made by plaintiff has thus been cast upon this court. The contention is made that certain findings of the court are contrary to the admissions in the pleadings, others outside the issues, and that the judgment is not the legal conclusion from the facts found. The action was brought upon a written contract, made by appellant with the trustees of the South school district, for the erection of a school house in said district for the agreed sum or

$3,289. It is alleged in the complaint that plaintiff, on the 7th day of October, 1897, commenced furnishing materials and building said school house, and had nearly completed the same according to the agreement, when, on the 29th day of January, 1898, the district, through its trustees, in violation of the agreement, prevented him from completing the same; that plaintiff furnished materials and performed said contract according to its terms, until so prevented by the trustees of said district; that plaintiff was paid one-half the amount of said contract price, to wit, $1,644.50, and no more. Plaintiff, in a separate count, alleged that the defendant school district was indebted to him in the sum of $3,800 for material furnished and work done in the school house, no part of which has been paid except the sum of $1,644.50, leaving a balance due of $2,155.50, for which judgment is prayed. The court found that defendant was and is a school district as alleged, and that the contract was duly made and executed as set forth in the complaint, and further found: "(3) That plaintiff duly performed all the terms and conditions of said contract on his part, until the 31st day of January, 1898, and was ready and willing thereafter to duly perform all the terms and conditions of said contract on his part, but the defendants Seeley, Tole, and Grider, claiming to act for said school district, took possession of the school-house building, mentioned in said contract, and ousted plaintiff therefrom, and prevented him from performing thereafter the terms and conditions of said contract on his part; and they without any authority from plaintiff, and with the materials therefor which he had purchased to complete said building, completed and finished the same on the 28th day of February, 1899, and the same was accepted by said school district on that day. (4) That it was by said contract agreed that out of the moneys payable to the plaintiff by the terms of said contract the school district should first pay the amounts due for materials furnished for said building by any person to said Gamache to complete said contract on his part, and which he had not paid for, and that the residue of said money should be paid to said Gamache. (5) That said Simpson & Gray furnished to said Gamache for said building materials for the construction of said building, and which were used in the construction of said building, and which he did not pay for, of the contract price of, and of the reasonable value of, $419.88, and they recovered judgment in their said action against Gamache, said South school district, and its trustees for said sum of $419.88 and costs of suit. (6) That said Thomas & Buell furnished to said Gamache, which have not been paid for to them or for them, materials for the construction of said building, and which were used in the construction of said building, of the contract price of, and of the reasonable value of, $746.48, and they recovered judgment in their said action against Gamache, said South school district, and its trustees for said sum of $746.48 and costs of suit. (7) That said F. Ruhl furnished to said Gamache for said building materials for the construction of said building, and which were used in the construction of said building, which were not paid for by said Gamache, of the contract price of, and of the reasonable value of, $144.17, and he recovered judgment in his said action against Gamache, said South school district, and its trustees for said sum of $144.17 and costs of suit. (8) That the said school district has paid to and for said Gamache, under and by reason of said contract, the sum of $2,069.11, and no more." "(11) That plaintiff never abandoned the construction of said building under said written agreement. (12) That said Gamache did not fail in any respect, either in furnishing materials or labor or otherwise, to complete the work of construction of said building, as he was required to construct the same by said contract, and the defendant said South school district has not, by any act or omission of said Gamache, suffered any injury or damage whatever. (13) That the unpaid balance of the money which was to be paid by said school district was by the terms of said written contract to be paid, on the completion of said building, to persons furnishing materials to said Gamache for the construction of said building, and which has not been paid for." As conclusions of law, the court found "that the plaintiff should take nothing by this action, and that no party to this action is entitled to judgment for costs in this action." Judgment was accordingly entered.

The eighth finding is contrary to the admissions in the pleadings.

The complaint, which is verified, alleges that $1,644.50, and no more, has been paid to plaintiff. The answer does not deny this, but, on the contrary, alleges "that the sum of $1,644.50 was paid to plaintiff under and by the terms of said contract." The admission in the pleadings as to this matter is conclusive, and the finding must be disregarded. Hendy Mach. Works v. Pacific Cable Const. Co., 99 Cal. 421, 33 Pac. 1084. The answer, after setting up a claim for furnishing materials and finishing the building, further alleges that there remains of the contract price in the hands of said district "the sum of $412.51, and no other or greater sum of money." The court entirely fails to make any disposition as to this sum so admitted to be due by the district.

The seventh finding is entirely outside of any issue made by the pleadings. We find no answer or pleading in the record as to Ruhl. Not only this, but his name nowhere appears except in the finding. A finding outside the issues cannot aid in sustaining a judgment. Green v. Chandler, 54 Cal. 627.

The fifth and sixth findings are also outside the issues. The answer of Simpson & Gray and of Thomas & Buell contained no allegation as to furnishing materials for the construction of the school house. They simply alleged that they had commenced actions against plaintiff, in which they alleged and set forth their right to obtain judgment against him "in satisfaction of their claims and demands for material furnished said Gamache to be used, and which was used, in the construction of the building described in the said contract." They did not ask any money judgment, but that "plaintiff take nothing hereby, and that they be dismissed hence with their costs."

We cannot eliminate the findings herein discussed, and order judgment upon the remaining findings. As the judgment must be reversed, it will subserve the ends of justice to allow the parties to amend their pleadings, if they so desire, so that proper issues may be made. If plaintiff performed all the conditions of the contract on his part in good faith, and was prevented by the wrongful acts of defendant school district from completing it, as the court found, he may have been damaged. If so, the court should find the amount of such damage under appropriate pleadings. If under the contract the district had the right to pay Simpson & Gray, Thomas & Buell, and Ruhl for material furnished in the erection of said building, the court, under proper pleadings, should find the amount due them, respectively, and direct its payment. Some one ought to be entitled to judgment for some amount. If there is a balance on hand, after the trustees of the district have paid in full for completing the building, and for all labor and materials used thereon, and plaintiff has in all respects complied with his contract, then plaintiff should have it. If it would have cost plaintiff the full unpaid balance to have completed the contract, it would not appear that he was damaged by being prevented from completing it, unless by the profit he would have made upon his own labor.

The court has found that plaintiff duly performed all the terms and conditions of the contract on his part, until the defendant district wrongfully entered and prevented him from completing it; that without authority from plaintiff the trustees of the district took and appropriated the materials which plaintiff had purchased to complete said building, and with said materials completed it. It would seem that, under such circumstances, the plaintiff, if damaged, should recover. The findings do not show whether or not the amounts for which Simpson & Gray, Thomas & Buell, and Ruhl recovered judgment in different actions have been paid. If plaintiff has paid them, they would appear to have no further interest in the matter. If this case should be tried anew, it should be upon proper pleadings, and all the issues should be disposed of so as to carry out the provisions of the contract as far as possible. If there is money on hand, and if under the contract material men have rights to it, the court should determine and direct to whom it should be paid. It certainly is not proper that plaintiff take nothing, and that defendants take nothing, and that no one is entitled to costs. The judgment should be reversed, with directions to the court below to allow all parties to amend their pleadings, if so advised.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; GRAY, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is reversed, with directions to the court below to allow all parties to amend their pleadings, if so advised.

PEOPLE v. TERRILL. (Cr. 699.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 29, 1901.)

CRIMINAL LAW—FORGERY—UTTERING FICTITIOUS INSTRUMENT—INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION—JUDGMENT—VENUE—EVIDENCE.

1. Pen. Code, § 476, provides a punishment for uttering a fictitious written instrument, purporting to be an instrument of an individual calling for the payment of money, when there is no such individual in existence. An indictment, under this section, charged defendant with uttering a note of a certain individual, when there was no such person in existence. Held, that the use of the word "person," instead of individual, was not a material variance, since it referred to the antecedent individual named.

2. In a prosecution under Pen. Code, § 476, for uttering a fictitious instrument, the fact that the court adjudged the defendant guilty of "forgery" was not reversible error, since the word "forgery," if properly used, could not injure defendant; the record furnishing a complete protection against another prosecution for the same offense.

3. Evidence that witness' residence was A.; that he gave defendant $400 to be loaned, which defendant afterwards claimed to have done, and that defendant read the papers to witness, the note alleged to have been fictitiously uttered being among them; and that all these facts took place in a certain county,—is sufficient, in a prosecution under Pen. Code, § 476, for uttering a fictitious instrument, to prove the venue to be in that county.

4. In a prosecution under Pen. Code, § 476, for uttering a fictitious instrument, evidence that a person's name did not appear in the directory is competent as tending to show that there was no such person in the county.

5. In a prosecution under Pen. Code, § 476, for uttering a fictitious instrument, the fact that the indictment did not set forth the rate of interest of the note alleged to have been fictitiously uttered, and the provision in regard to attorney's fees, was immaterial.

6. Where defendant procured a judgment, on appeal, that the indictment on which he was tried and convicted is void, he cannot rely on such conviction as a bar to a second prosecution for the same offense, since he was not in jeopardy on a valid indictment.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; W. G. Lorigan, Judge.

Samuel B. Terrill was convicted of uttering a fictitious instrument, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Jackson Hatch, for appellant. Tirey L. Ford, Atty. Gen. (J. H. Campbell, of counsel), for the People.

COOPER, C. Appeal from judgment and order denying motion for a new trial. The indictment is in the following language, to wit: "The said Samuel B. Terrill is accused by the grand jury of the county of Santa Clara, state of California, by this indictment, found this 12th day of June, A. D. one thousand eight hundred and ninety-nine, of the crime of forgery, committed as follows: The said Samuel B. Terrill, on the second day of January, A. D. eighteen hundred and ninety-seven, at the county and state aforesaid, with intent to prejudice, damage, and defraud Richard J. Hawke, uttered, published, and passed to him, as true and genuine, a fictitious note, apparently genuine and of legal efficacy, knowing the note to be fictitious; said note bearing said date, and purporting to be the note of an individual, to wit, Leon McAbee (when in fact there was no such person in existence), whereby said Leon McAbee promised to pay to said Richard J. Hawke three hundred and fifty dollars in gold coin of the United States of America, one year after said date."

1. The defendant claims that his demurrer to the indictment should have been sustained upon the sole ground that the facts stated do not constitute a public offense. The indictment was evidently based upon section 476 of the Penal Code, which reads as follows: "Every person who makes, passes, utters, or publishes, with intention to defraud any other person, or who, with the like intention, attempts to pass, utter, or publish, or who has in his possession, with like intent to utter, pass, or publish, any fictitious bill, note, or check, purporting to be the bill, note, or check or other instrument in writing for the payment of money or property of some bank, corporation, copartnership, or individual, when, in fact, there is no such bank, corporation, copartnership, or individual in existence, knowing the bill, note, check, or instrument in writing to be fictitious, is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison for not less than one nor more than fourteen years." The defendant argues that the note referred to in the indictment purported to be the note of an individual, and that the indictment alleges that there was no such "person" in existence, whereas it should have alleged that there was no such "individual" in existence. It is evident, under the section, that, where the instrument is alleged to be that of an individual, the indictment must show that there is no such individual in existence, but we think the indictment in this case does show such fact. It does not contain the word "individual," but it plainly says, "the note of an individual," to-wit, Leon McAbee (when in fact there was no such person in existence). The word "person," in the connection in which it is used, evidently and plainly refers to the antecedent "Leon McAbee." The words "such person" plainly mean such person as Leon McAbee. They do not, and cannot, by any reasonable construction, be held to refer to a bank corporation or copartnership, because the indictment does not mention any bank corporation or copartnership. We think that a "person" of common understanding would know what is intended by the indictment.

2. It is claimed that the court adjudged the defendant guilty of "forgery," and that this was error. The verdict of the jury was: "We, the jury in the above entitled cause, find the defendant guilty as charged in the indictment." The judgment recites: "The defendant was duly informed by the court of the indictment presented against him, on the 12th of June, 1899; of his arraignment, and plea of 'Not guilty'; of his trial, and the verdict of the jury, on the 9th of November, 1899, 'Guilty of forgery as charged in the information.' The defendant was then asked if he had any legal cause to show why judgment should not be pronounced against him, to which he replied that he had none; and, no sufficient cause appearing to the court, thereupon the court renders its judgment. That, the said Samuel B. Terrill having been duly convicted in this court of the crime of forgery, it is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed," etc. It is evident that the judgment was for the crime charged in the indictment, and that a crime is charged under said section 476. There is no form prescribed in the Penal Code as to what the judgment shall contain. "If no sufficient cause is alleged or appears to the court, why judgment should not be pronounced, it must thereupon be rendered." Pen. Code, § 1202. "When a judgment upon a conviction is rendered the clerk must enter the same in the minutes, stating briefly the offense for which the conviction was had, * * * and must, within five days, annex together and file the following papers which will constitute a record of the action: (1) The indictment or information, and a copy of the minutes of the plea or demurrer. (2) A copy of the minutes of the trial. (3) The charges given or refused and the indorsement thereon. And (4) a copy of the judgment." Pen. Code, § 1207.

In speaking of the record in a criminal case, this court said in Re Ring, 28 Cal. 252: "The several papers specified, when so annexed together and filed, are expressly declared to be the record of the action, and that is the record which would have to be produced in support of a plea of former conviction. That the several papers specified in the four hundred and sixty-second section enter into and become a part of the record must not be lost sight of when we come to determine what it is essential that the judgment itself should contain; for where several papers are thus united in chronological order, and made one in legal intent, it cannot be claimed that the contents of one should be repeated in another. If they all, taken together, furnish facts sufficient to protect the defendant against another prosecution for the same offense, it cannot, with any show of reason, be claimed that the record is defective in any matter of substance. From the mere fact that these several papers are taken into and made a part of the record, it is clear that each one was intended merely to tell its own story, or, rather, to relate its particular branch of the whole history. Thus the indictment states the jurisdictional facts, the nature of the offense, and the facts and circumstances, so far as they are material. The other papers give the history of the trial, including the verdict; and the judgment, which constitutes the last chapter, merely furnishes the account by stating of what offense the defendant was finally convicted, and the penalty imposed by the court. The judgment need not, and it was not intended that it should, repeat anything contained in the papers which precede it; for, in view of the fact that they go into the record and make a part of it, such repetition would be idle, and serve no useful purpose." Applying the rule laid down in the above case, the defendant cannot be again prosecuted for the same offense. The word "forgery," if improperly used in pronouncing judgment, need not in any way have misled or injured defendant. The indictment, verdict, minutes, and judgment, taken together, furnish defendant complete protection against another prosecution for the same offense.

It is provided in the Penal Code (section 1404): "Neither a departure from the form or mode prescribed by this Code in respect to any pleading or proceeding, nor an error or mistake, therein renders it invalid, unless it has actually prejudiced the defendant, or tended to his prejudice in respect to a substantial right." Section 1258 provides, after hearing the appeal, this court must "give judgment without regard to technical errors or defects, or to exceptions which do not affect the substantial rights of the parties." In People v. Eppinger, 109 Cal. 294, 41 Pac. 1037, where a similar objection was made to the arraignment, this court said: "The minutes of the court show that defendant was arraigned upon an information charging him with forgery, whereas, in fact, it was upon an indictment charging him with uttering a fictitious instrument. But these ministerial irregularities do not affect any of the substantial rights of the defendant, who was in fact arraigned upon indictment, a copy of which was given to him, and he was thus fully informed of the nature of the charge against him, and answered it by his plea." Indeed, we are not prepared to say that defendant was not found guilty of "forgery." The acts set forth in the indictment would be forgery at common law. 2 McClain, Cr. Law, § 764, and cases cited; 1 Bish. Cr. Law, § 572; 1 Whart. Cr. Law, §§ 659, 660.

The common law of England, so far as not repugnant to, or inconsistent with, the constitution of the United States, or the constitution or laws of this state, is the rule of decision in all the courts of this state. Pol. Code, § 4468. Under the heading of "Forgery and Counterfeiting" (sections 470-482, c. 4, tit. 13, Pen. Code), we find section 476. Sections 470, 471, and 472 provide that every person who, with intent to defraud another, does certain acts therein enumerated is guilty of forgery. Section 473 provides that forgery is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison for not less than 1, nor more than 14, years. Then, among other sections, follows section 476, which provides that any person who utters or has in his possession any fictitious note, with intent to defraud any other person, is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison for not less than 1 nor more than 14 years. The acts enumerated in section 476 are thus punished the same as forgery. Such acts are made a crime. No name is given to such crime, unless we regard it as a species of forgeries concerning which the chapter treats. Section 470 expressly says that every person who utters, or attempts to pass as true and genuine, any false or forged promissory note, knowing the same to be false or forged, with intent to prejudice or damage another person, is guilty of forgery. The indictment in this case charges defendant with uttering and passing as true and genuine a false note. It also describes the note as fictitious, and thus brings it within the express provisions of section 476. In People v. Elliott, 90 Cal. 586, 27 Pac. 433, it was held that, where there is no such person or firm in existence as that the name of which is signed to the check, then the check is fictitious, and the prosecution should be under section 476, but the court did not say that such act was not forgery. In the opinion it is said: "The law appears to recognize a distinction between forged instruments purporting to have the signature of a person in existence and those where the signature is purely and entirely fictitious. * * * Section 470 of the Penal Code is quite broad in its terms, and, in the absence of said section 476, it might probably be construed broad enough to include fictitious instruments as referred to in said section; but the legislative mind having been directed specially to that class of instruments with reference to the offense of forgery, it would seem the act of making or passing a fictitious check could only be prosecuted when brought within the requirements and conditions of said section." The court did not say such fictitious instrument was not forgery. On the contrary, it speaks of forged instruments when the signature is fictitious. In People v. Eppinger, 105 Cal. 38, 38 Pac. 538, it is said: "A distinction is thus made between the forgery of a check upon an existing person and the making and passing of a fictitious instrument purporting to be the check of a person who has no existence." There the principal point was that the information alleged that the check was signed by "M. Howell & Co.," but did not allege that there was no such partnership or corporation in existence at the time. In People v. Lee, 128 Cal. 331, 60 Pac. 854, it is said: "The defendant, a Chinese, was accused of the crime of forgery, committed by uttering," etc., "a fictitious check."

It thus seems to have been generally regarded as forgery by this court. To decide that the uttering of a fictitious check should be prosecuted under section 476 is not to decide that a fictitious check is not a forged check, and that the uttering of such a check is not forgery. In a late case the supreme court of Oregon appears to have fully considered the matter, and in its opinion says: "The law is well settled that the signing of a fictitious name to an instrument with a fraudulent intent constitutes forgery." Rev. St. Mo. § 3653, provide that the false making or forging of any instrument in writing for the payment of money, purporting to be the act of another, to which shall be affixed any fictitious name, or the name or pretended name of any person not in existence, shall be deemed a forgery. It was held in State v. Minton, 116 Mo. 616, 22 S. W. 808, that although the statute made such act a forgery, yet the indictment, under the statute, must allege that a fictitious name was affixed to the instrument. This is in entire accord with the holding of this court in the cases hereinbefore cited. The indictment or information must allege facts showing that a crime has been committed within the terms of section 476, because the legislature has specially defined the acts making it a crime to utter or forge a fictitious instrument. People v. Eppinger, 114 Cal. 353, 46 Pac. 97, seems to be in conflict with what has been said, and is evidently based upon a misapprehension of People v. Elliott, 90 Cal. 586, 27 Pac. 433. The opinion commences by saying: "That the crime of forgery, as defined in section 470 of the Penal Code, and that of making and passing a fictitious check, with intent to defraud, under section 476 of the same Code, are different offenses, was held in People v. Elliott, 90 Cal. 586, 27 Pac. 433." An examination of People v. Elliott shows that the ruling was not quite so broad as stated. The court simply held that, as the legislature had made special provision as to the forgery of fictitious instruments, the act of making or passing a fictitious check could only be prosecuted when the allegations of the information showed an offense under said section 476. The opinion in People v. Eppinger, 114 Cal. 350, 46 Pac. 97, proceeds upon the theory that in the same case (109 Cal. 294, 41 Pac. 1037) this court had directed the contents of the judgment. In the latter case the judgment was reversed because the jury did not find upon the issue as to prior conviction. What is said as to the contents of the judgment to be thereafter entered was obiter dictum.

3. It is urged that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the verdict, for the reasons that the venue is not proven; that the evidence does disclose the existence of the person claimed to be fictitious; that the note received in evidence differed materially from the note described in the indictment; and finally, that defendant has been already convicted of the same offense charged in the indictment. The witness Hawke testified that his place of residence was Almaden; that he gave defendant $400 to be loaned; that in a conversation defendant said to him that he had loaned the money to Leon McAbee on good security, and that he would send witness the papers; that he received the papers a week or two afterwards, which included the note; that the papers came to witness by mail; and that all these matters took place in Santa Clara county. This was sufficient proof of the venue.

The prosecution offered evidence tending to show that there was no such man as Leon McAbee in Santa Clara county; that his name did not appear in the directory. This evidence was competent. People v. Eppinger, 105 Cal. 41, 38 Pac. 538. The purported Leon McAbee was a male person, as appears from the certificate of acknowledgment to the mortgage given to secure the note, and the statement made by defendant to Hawke. The defendant offered evidence as to the existence of a Leon McAbee in Santa Clara county, but the evidence shows this Leon McAbee was a married woman, and never owned any property in the county; that she came from Watsonville; began proceedings for a divorce in October, 1897; that the suit was still pending at the time of the trial of this case, in November, 1899; and said woman told one Jacobs that she was going to Marysville about 2½ months before this trial. In such case it was not incumbent on the prosecution to prove that the woman Leon McAbee did not authorize her signature to the note. There is no evidence tending to show that the signature purported to be hers. The note received in evidence corresponded with the note described in the indictment. There was no material variance. The fact that the indictment did not set forth the rate of interest and the provision in regard to attorney's fees was immaterial. People v. Terrill (this day filed) 64 Pac. 894.

It is finally claimed that the evidence shows that defendant had already been convicted of the offense charged in this indictment. The evidence shows that the crime of which defendant was convicted, and which it is claimed is a bar to the present action, was the uttering of a certain mortgage dated January 2, 1897, purporting to have been made by Leon McAbee in favor of Richard Hawke upon lands in Santa Clara county to secure the payment of an indebtedness of $350. The first indictment in said case was demurred to in the court below, and the demurrer sustained. The court ordered the case "resubmitted to the present grand jury." The same grand jury, upon the same facts upon which defendant had been charged in the first indictment, returned into court another indictment for the same offense. Defendant was tried upon the last indictment so found, and a verdict of guilty returned against him. He applied for and was granted a writ of prohibition by this court, prohibiting the court below from pronouncing judgment or proceeding further in said matter, for the reason that the second indictment found by the same grand jury was void. The defendant, therefore, having at his own request procured a judgment of this court that the indictment upon which he was tried and convicted is void, cannot be heard to rely upon such conviction as a bar to the present indictment. He has never before been in jeopardy upon a valid indictment for the same offense. Pen. Code, §§ 1021, 1023; People v. Schmidt, 64 Cal. 261, 30 Pac. 814; 1 Bish. New Cr. Law, §§ 1021, 1022. It follows that the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; SMITH, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order are affirmed.

133 Cal. 139

ARQUES et al. v. UNION SAV. BANK OF SAN JOSÉ. (S. F. 2,232.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 29, 1901.)
ACTIONS UNDER BANK COMMISSIONERS' ACT—
INSOLVENT BANKS—PROCESS OF LIQUIDATION—SEQUESTRATION—PLEADING.

1. Under the bank commissioners' act, as amended in 1895, providing a scheme of liquidation for insolvent banks by which the assets are created a trust in the hands of the directors for the benefit of creditors, and the corporation enjoined from the transaction of any business except that of trustee for the purpose of liquidation, an ordinary action for the collection of a debt cannot be maintained against an insolvent bank in process of liquidation under the act.

2. An action may be maintained by a creditor against the directors in their own name or under the corporate name on a claim disallowed by them.

3. In such action allegations of the disallowance and justness of the claim are essential to the sufficiency of the complaint.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; W. G. Lorigan, Judge.

Action by Louis Arques and others against the Union Savings Bank of San José. From a judgment in favor of plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Jackson Hatch and E. M. Rea, for appellant. J. R. Welch, for respondents.

SMITH, C. Appeal from a judgment against the defendant for the sum of $354,- $82.70. The appeal is on the judgment roll. The complaint is in the ordinary form by the assignees of numerous depositors and other creditors of the defendant, simply alleging the various items of indebtedness, and their assignment to the plaintiffs, and praying for judgment for the aggregate amount, with interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from January 1, 1899; and judgment was rendered accordingly. From the answer, and findings it appears that the defendant, when the suit was brought, was in process of liquidation under a judgment of the superior court of Santa Clara county of date March 13, 1899, in an action brought by the attorney general under the provisions of the bank commissioners' act as amended in 1895. The only question involved is whether an ordinary action for the collection of a debt can be maintained against an insolvent corporation in process of liquidation under the act. The contrary, I think, must be held, for the reason that to permit such actions would be inconsistent at once with the terms and with the policy of the act.

1. The proceedings against an insolvent bank are prescribed by section 11 of the act, which, as amended in 1895, establishes a scheme of liquidation materially different from that established by the original act, or the amendment of 1887. St. 1895, p. 175. They are commenced by what is, in effect, a seizure of all the property of the bank by the bank commissioners, followed by a suit by the attorney general against the corporation and its directors "to enjoin and prohibit them from the transaction of further business." The judgment in the suit—if the result be adverse to the bank—is that the "injunction applied for" be issued, and that "the commissioners * * * surrender to the corporation the property thereof in their possession for the purpose of liquidation." The business of liquidation is committed to the directors of the corporation, "under the direction of the bank commissioners"; and these directors, so called, are made subject to removal on the application of the bank commissioners, and in certain contingencies others may be appointed by the court. Thus the directors, while they remain nominally officers of the bank, become, by the provisions of the statute, trustees for the creditors, and, as subordinate agents of the commissioners, officers of the law. Their functions as directors of the bank are left to them, but these are subordinate to those imposed upon them as statutory trustees, and for all the purposes of the act they are to be regarded as acting in their statutory capacity. The case is therefore, in effect, the same as though the act had provided for the appointment of other trustees; that is to say, the directors, to all practical intents and purposes, are to be regarded merely as trustees, and their official relation to the corporation regarded, for all the purposes of the act, as immaterial. The effect of the act is, therefore, to sequester the assets, and, so far as necessary for the purposes of the act, the powers of the corporation, and to place them for the purpose of liquidation in the hands of the directors, acting, under the direction of the bank commissioners, as officers of the law. Nominally, indeed, the assets are said to be restored "to the corporation * * * for the purpose of liquidation," but, as the business of liquidation is committed exclusively to the directors, under the direction of the bank commissioners, it is only in name that the assets can be said to be restored to the corporation. In fact they are committed to the directors, who are the real trustees. The operation of the act is therefore twofold: First. It creates a trust fund for the use of the creditors, and an express trust to administer it, which, like other trusts, is subject to the jurisdiction of the proper court for administration. Of this trust the directors, in their capacity as officers of the law, are the real trustees, and they are subject as such to the direction of the bank commissioners, and ultimately to that of the court. But nominally the corporation is the trustee, and it may be convenient sometimes to speak of it as such, though in thus speaking of it it is to be borne in mind that it is trustee only in name, and that it is thus spoken of solely for convenience of expression. Secondly. The corporation is enjoined "from the transaction of any other business," which means, if we have regard to the real fact, from the transaction of all business, or, if we regard its nominal character as trustee, all business except that of trustee for the purpose of liquidation, which is in fact to be performed by the directors as officers of the law. This prohibition implies ex vi termini either a total suspension of the functions and powers of the corporation, or—what amounts to the same thing—a suspension of all its powers except those to be exercised by the directors in the execution of their trust. The powers of the corporation thus suspended include that of suing and being sued, except as representative of the directors as statutory trustees; and this again implies that it cannot sue or be sued for any cause of action other than one existing, as the case may be, in favor of or against the directors as trustees, who, in all actions for or against the corporation affecting the trust fund, are the real parties, and who alone, either eo nomine or under the corporate name, can, in such actions, be sued. But under the trust created by the act the relation of trustee and cestui que trust is established between the directors and the creditors, and the assets of the corporation are held by them in trust as a fund in which all the creditors are jointly interested; and this is the only legal relation existing between them, or (during the time of the suspension of the powers of the corporation by operation of the act) the only relation—relating to the sequestered assets—between the creditors and the corporation that can be enforced by action. It follows that the corporation can be sued only as trustee, and that no action can arise in favor of a creditor against the directors, or against the corporation, as nominal trustee, representing them, except for some failure of the trustees to perform the duties of their trust; for, so long as they perform their obligations to him as cestui que trust, he has no cause to complain. But, where there is default by the trustees in the performance of any duty, an action may be maintained in equity for the appropriate relief. An action may therefore be maintained by a creditor against the directors in their own names or under the corporate name on a claim disallowed by them, for it is a duty imposed upon them by the very nature of their trust to allow all just claims. But until the claim be disallowed there is no action, and hence the disallowance of the claim is an essential part of the cause of action, and must be alleged in the complaint. In the suit at bar it appears from the complaint that all the claims sued on, except certain drafts amounting to $2,405.55, have been allowed, and that a dividend of 5 per cent. has been paid, or ordered to be paid, on them. With reference, therefore, to the bulk of the amount sued for, the trustees are not in default, and there is no cause of action. With reference to the drafts there are no allegations from which it can be judged whether they are just claims against the corporation or the directors. The suit, therefore, cannot be maintained for lack of essential allegations in the complaint.

2. The conclusion thus reached from a consideration of the intention of the statute, as indicated by its language, is in accord with the obvious policy of the act, with which the contrary view would be manifestly inconsistent. The purpose of the act is to effect an equitable and economical distribution of the assets of the insolvent bank among its creditors, and for this purpose all the assets of the insolvent corporation, and all its powers, so far as necessary to effect the object, are sequestered, and taken into the hand of the law. The end proposed implies that the dividend of each shall be according to the amount of his debt, and that no one shall receive more or less; and also that the liquidation shall be accomplished without unnecessary expense. But to permit suits to be maintained against the corporation, in the absence of any failure on the part of the trustees to perform their duty, would be to add to the claims sued on the expenses of the suit, and also to increase the rate, and add interest on interest,—as in the case at bar, where the interest allowed in the judgment is over $18,000,—thus imposing on the corporation, or rather on the trustees, unnecessary costs and counsel fees. And this would happen not only in isolated cases, but all the creditors would be compelled to sue in order to protect themselves, and the trust fund would be thus largely consumed in unnecessary expenses.

It is manifest, therefore, that the administration of the trust would thus be seriously interfered with, and that the policy of the act would be defeated. The case, therefore, comes within the reason of the decision in People v. Superior Court of City and County of San Francisco, 100 Cal. 105, 34 Pac. 492, where it was held that section 11 of the bank commissioners' act "necessarily superseded the provisions of the insolvent act of 1880, so far as this class of corporations is concerned"; the reason given being that "this section was intended by the legislature to provide for every case involving the winding up of the business of a banking corporation," and that "the enforcement of the insolvent act would defeat the plain purposes contemplated by the * * * act,"—a reason (at least in kind) equally applicable here.

The question has not been heretofore definitely determined by the decisions of this court. In Lanz v. Bank, 125 Cal. 458, 58 Pac. 63, it is said "that, in the absence of the judicial declaration contemplated by the banking act, the right of action against the bank by creditors stands exactly as though its doors had never been closed, and its business was progressing in the usual and ordinary channels," and that, "until such action is taken, the bank's legal status as to its creditors is not changed." There is here some intimation that, after the bank is put in liquidation under the act, the case would be different; but nothing decisive is said on the point. In Long v. Superior Court, 102 Cal. 449, 36 Pac. 807, the powers of the court under section 11 of the act (which has since been amended) were considered, and it was held that the directors could not be ousted, and a receiver appointed; but there is nothing in the decision bearing on the question here involved. In People's Home Sav. Bank v. Superior Court of City and County of San Francisco, 103 Cal. 27, 36 Pac. 1015, the same general question was presented, and the same conclusions arrived at; the court saying that even after the judgment of the court under the act "the corporation continues in existence for the purpose of liquidation." This remains true of the act as amended in 1895, but that amendment contains specific provisions as to liquidation that were previously wanting. The decision in Crane v. Bank, 106 Cal. 64, 39 Pac. 215, 27 L. R. A. 562, bears on this case only as affirming the decision in People v. Superior Court of City and County of San Francisco, 100 Cal. 111, 34 Pac. 492. In Anderson v. Bank, 112 Cal. 598, 44 Pac. 1063, 32 L. R. A. 479, the action was for the recovery of a special deposit, and whether the deposit was of this nature is the only point discussed in the briefs or considered by the court. The proceedings under the act are not referred to. In Murphy v. Bank, 119 Cal. 334, 51 Pac. 317, and Id. (Nov. 28, 1900) 62 Pac. 1059, the action was for money claimed to be due as a dividend, which had been disallowed by the directors. In Bank v. Stone, 121 Cal. 202, 53 Pac. 634, the directors, under the corporate name, were the real plaintiffs; and the counterclaim—which was for professional services due on a special contract—was disallowed because the contract was not authorized by the directors. In Sacramento Bank v. Pacific Bank, 124 Cal. 147, 56 Pac. 787, the action was for a dividend disallowed by the directors. These, I believe, are all the cases bearing on the general subject, and in none of them, it will be observed, was the amendment of 1895 under consideration. I advise that the judgment be reversed, with directions to the lower court to allow the complaint to be amended if the plaintiffs shall be so advised, and otherwise to dismiss the action.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; CHIPMAN, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is reversed, with directions to the lower court to allow the complaint to be amended if the plaintiffs shall be so advised, and otherwise to dismiss the action.

BANAZ v. SMITH et al. (L. A. 792.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—IMPROVEMENT OF STREETS—CONSTRUCTION OF SEWERS—"VROOMAN ACT"—CONSTITUTIONALITY—DELEGATION OF MUNICIPAL FUNCTIONS—ASSESSMENT DISTRICTS—SPECIFICATIONS FOR SEWER—CLAIM OF CONTRACTOR—DEMAND BY ASSIGNEE.

1. Act March 18, 1885, concerning the improvement of city streets, and authorizing the collection of assessments therefor by the contractor doing the work, is not in conflict with Const. art. 11, § 13, providing that the legislature shall not delegate to any individual power to levy taxes or assessments, or perform any municipal functions, since the contractor is merely the city's agent for the collection of the assessment.

2. Act March 18, 1885, being a general law, the provisions of the Los Angeles charter of 1889, relative to the improvement of streets, which are in conflict with it are void, since the constitution at that time authorized the formation of such municipal charters as would be consistent with the laws of the state.

3. Where the provisions of a city charter were in conflict with the general law and void when adopted, the subsequent amendment, in 1896, to section 6, art. 11, of the constitution, which so changed it that the charter provisions would have been harmonious therewith, did not operate to give life to such provisions.

4. The provisions of Act March 18, 1885, relative to the formation of assessment districts, and levying assessment for street improvement according to the frontage of the lots, and not in proportion to the benefits received, are not in conflict with Const. art. 1, § 14, prohibiting the taking of property without just compensation, since there is merely a possibility that an assessment might be unjust.

5. Act March 18, 1885, pt. 2, § 27, provides the manner in which assessment for street improvement shall be made, and hence it is not necessary that a resolution of intention to construct a sewer should state the manner of the assessment.

6. Under Act March 18, 1885, the fact that a resolution of intention to construct a sewer did not state that the work was necessary did not render the resolution invalid.

7. Where specifications for the construction of a sewer described the work to be done so that the street commissioner, though empowered to decide whether the contract had been performed and decide as to minor details, could not require more or accept less than the specifications required, they were not fatally indefinite.

8. Where notice of the award of a contract under Act March 18, 1885, was published on the 8th of the month, and the contract was entered into on the 19th, the contract was not prematurely let, so as to violate the provision that the owners of three-fourths of the frontage may, within 10 days after the first publication of the notice, elect to do the work.

9. Act March 18, 1885, § 7, subd. 12, as amended by St. 1889, p. 165, requiring a diagram to be made of the section benefited by sewer work, does not require such diagram to be made before the contract is let or the work performed, but only in time to enable property owners to suggest corrections.

10. Where the assignee of a contract for the construction of a sewer made demand on a property owner, and his affidavit stated that he made it on behalf of the contractor, such demand was sufficient, since the assignee was the owner of the claim, entitled to payment, and the taxpayer could not be injured by the form of the demand.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Lucian Shaw, Judge.

Action by George Banaz against Edwin Smith, as trustee, and others. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Julius Lyons, for appellants. Lewis O. Preston, for respondent.

TEMPLE, J. Action to foreclose lien for construction of a sewer in the city of Los Angeles, under the so-called "Vrooman Act," passed March 18, 1885, as amended in 1889, 1891, and 1893. The second amended complaint was demurred to for insufficient facts. It was overruled, and the appellant answered. Judgment was for plaintiff, and this appeal is from the judgment, and from an order denying a new trial.

Most, if not all, points urged here arise upon the demurrer. The first is that the authority given the contractor to collect is in violation of section 13, art. 11, of the constitution. That section reads as follows: "The legislature shall not delegate to any special commission, private corporation, company, association, or individual, any power to make, control, appropriate, supervise, or in any way interfere with, any county, city, town, or municipal improvement, money, property, or effects, whether held in trust or otherwise, or to levy taxes or assessments, or perform any municipal functions whatever." Upon a mere reading, it is perfectly obvious that there is here no delegation of a municipal function. The contractor acts only as the agent or servant of the city. He has no discretion, and can create no liability, nor can he impose any duty, or exercise any control or authority, over any one. He makes no assessment, levies no tax, and performs no municipal function. The municipal officers who enforce the ordinances of the city do not perform municipal functions, and in the collection of the street assessment the contractor does no more. This precise point was decided in Davies v. City of Los Angeles, 86 Cal. 37, 24 Pac. 771.

2. The council proceeded under the provisions of the so-called "Vrooman Act," and it is contended that the city charter should have controlled. The freeholders' charter of Los Angeles was adopted in 1889. At that time the Vrooman act was in force, and as was held in Thomason v. Ashworth, 73 Cal. 73, 14 Pac. 615, was a general law. At that time the constitution authorized the formation of such municipal charters as would be consistent with the laws and constitution of the state. The charter contained, so far as affects this case, a complete substitute for the Vrooman act, and the provisions of the charter are in many respects inconsistent with the provisions of that act. In Yarnell v. City of Los Angeles, 87 Cal. 603, 25 Pac. 767, it was said: "The amendment to section 8 of article 11, under which the Los Angeles charter was framed, provides that certain cities may frame charters for their own governments, consistent with, and subject to, the constitution and laws of the state. If, therefore, the provisions above stated of section 44 of the charter (St. 1889, p. 467) in question are inconsistent either with the constitution or any law which is 'general' in the sense in which it is used in the clauses above quoted, then they are invalid and void." If void from the beginning, the amendment to section 6, art. 11, in 1896, did not give life to such provisions. That would give the amendment the effect of enacting laws instead of merely authorizing the legislature to do so, and it would be to enact a law to which no reference was made, and which the people in adopting the amendment could not have had in mind. Such is not the ordinary function of a constitutional provision, and such effect will not be given to it unless it is expressly so provided. The case of Byrne v. Drain, 127 Cal. 663, 60 Pac. 433, treats of a case where the charter provisions when adopted were perfectly valid, and immediately went into operation. Subsequently a general law was passed which was inconsistent with some provisions found in the charter. As to that the constitution provided that all such charters shall be subject to and controlled by general laws. It was in effect held that the mere fact the charter provision was to be subject to, and controlled by, general laws implied a continued existence, and that when the general law was repealed the charter was in force and uncontrolled by the superior law. Here, the charter provisions being void, there was nothing held under control which could be restored to free operation.

3. The next point is that the provision for the formation of an assessment district is in violation of section 14, art. 1, of the state constitution, and of article 5 of the constitution of the United States, because it may result in taking private property for public use without just compensation. The brief was filed before the case of Hadley v. Dague, 130 Cal. 207, 62 Pac. 500, was decided, and all the questions here raised are there disposed of. The suggestion that a board or court, corruptly abusing its powers, may in fact take private property for public use without just compensation, does not raise a constitutional question. Whether the property will be benefited in proportion to the burden is for the legislature. "Unless, therefore, it is made to appear, upon the face of the proceedings, or by some competent showing, there is a gross or substantial variation from this principle, it is the duty of the court, under the rules and authorities cited, to uphold the assessment." Hadley v. Dague. See, also, Lent v. Tillson, 72 Cal. 428, 14 Pac. 71, and Irrigating Dist. v. Bradley, 164 U. S. 176, 17 Sup. Ct. 56, 41 L. Ed. 369.

4. It is contended that the resolution does not declare that it is necessary to construct the sewer, nor the manner in which the costs and expenses shall be assessed, as it is alleged is required by section 27, pt. 2, of the Vrooman act. It is not necessary that the resolution of intention, which is but a notice of contemplated action on the part of the board, shall state that the board finds the contemplated work necessary. The manner in which the assessment is to be made is prescribed by the act itself. The resolution did show that costs and expenses were to be assessed upon the district benefited, and the district was described.

5. The next point is that the specifications were too uncertain, and left much to the discretion of the street superintendent which the board should have determined for itself. There was no delegation of authority to the street superintendent except what is necessarily involved in the power on the part of that officer to determine in the first instance whether the contract has been performed. What is to be done is specifically described, but the requirements to some extent vary according to the nature of the earth in which the sewer is to be constructed. For instance, when the ground is wet the soft earth is to be removed and gravel filled in; but the specifications do not determine the amount of wet, soft ground to be removed, or the quantity of gravel required to fill the excavation. It is not left to the street superintendent to say how much shall be done in any case. The contractor must do the work as required by his contract, and the street superintendent cannot accept less or require more. The board, on appeal, must finally determine. As to the indefiniteness of detail, it may be said that, however minute they may be, some unsettled points might yet be suggested. This matter was considered in the late case of Haughwout v. Hubbard (Cal.) 63 Pac. 1078. Under the rule there laid down, this assessment cannot be set aside upon this ground.

On the appeal from the order denying a new trial it is contended:

1. The contract was prematurely let. The notice of the award was published on the 8th and 9th of November. The contract was entered into on the 19th of November following. The law provides that the notice shall be posted for five days, and published in a newspaper for two days. The owners of three-fourths of the frontage may, "within ten days after the first posting or publication of said notice," etc., elect to do the work. This law does not require the lapse of one day before the ten days shall begin to run, and, excluding the first day, the time allowed was ample.

2. The diagram of the district benefited, required by subdivision 12, § 7, Vrooman Act (St. 1889, p. 165), was not made and approved before the work was let, and in fact performed. It was made in time for the assessment. The district itself was described in the resolution of intention, and from that time owners of property knew whether they were interested in the proceeding. The diagram showing the amount owned by each person was in time to enable property owners to suggest corrections. The statute does not require it to be made sooner.

3. The demand is objected to. The contract had been assigned, and the assignee made the demand in person, but in his affidavit showing demand he states that he made it on behalf of the contractor. It does not appear that he so stated in his demand, but if he did it is immaterial. He was the owner of the claim, and if he notified the lot owner to pay to his agent, or to any other person, or that he demanded payment for another, it did not injure the taxpayer. Under such a demand, payment to the contractor would have been sufficient. The judgment and order are affirmed.

(S. F. 1,795.)¹

(Supreme Court of California. May 29, 1901.)
JUDGMENTS—ACTION TO SET ASIDE—JURISDICTION OF EQUITY—GROUNDS OF ACTION.

1. Where a party defendant procures a dismissal of the action as to himself, and he charges no fraud or collusion between the other parties thereto, he cannot maintain a suit in equity to set aside the judgment.

2. A judgment will not be set aside by an independent suit in equity unless the plaintiff alleges facts showing that the judgment is wrong, or that a different result will be reached on another trial.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by Theodore P. Painter against the J. B. Painter Company and another. From a judgment in favor of defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Pringle & Pringle, for appellant. Francis J. Heney and Edward Mills Adams, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This suit was brought to obtain a new trial of the case of the defendant the J. B. Painter Company against the defendant Colton, as receiver of the late firm of Painter & Co., in which judgment had been entered for the plaintiff therein for the sum of $11,085.73, and also to enjoin the execution of the judgment against property in the hands of the receiver. The suit referred to had been brought on a contract executed, with the approval of the court in which the receivership was pending, by Colton, as receiver, to the J. B. Painter Company. To this suit the plaintiff herein and the firm of Painter & Co. (not the defunct corporation, but a new firm of the same name, composed of this plaintiff and his brother Milton) were originally parties defendant with the receiver. But on the trial, on their motion, the case was dismissed as to them on the ground that a sufficient cause of action against them had not been proved. Thereafter judgment was entered against the receiver as above stated, which is the judgment from which plaintiff in this present action seeks relief. A demurrer to the complaint was sustained, and judgment entered for defendants.

The sole grounds on which plaintiff's claim for a new trial is based are insufficiency of the evidence to justify the finding as to a large part of the amount found to be due, and material errors of law occurring at the trial, and the additional fact that "the court [presumably the court in which the receivership was pending] declined to permit the receiver to * * * appeal," and that the receiver in fact did not appeal. Of course, courts of equity have jurisdiction, in proper cases (which are not very numerous), to set aside judgments rendered in other actions, and to grant new trials thereof; but we do not know of any principle or precedent on which the present action could be maintained. No fraud on the part of the J. B. Painter Company or the receiver, or collusion between them, is charged. The plaintiff herein was a party to that action, and, if he was interested in preventing a judgment against the receiver, he had ample opportunity to defend against such judgment. If he had himself dismissed from the action, and relied upon the receiver making a proper defense, he must abide the result. Moreover, he alleges no facts showing that the judgment was wrong or that the result would be different upon another trial; and, as was said in Davis v. Chalfant, 81 Cal. 630, 22 Pac. 972, "in this class of cases it should be made to appear with reasonable certainty, at least, that a new trial would result more favorable to the party asking it than the judgment sought to be set aside." For these reasons, and many others which could be given, the demurrer was properly sustained. The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

MILLER & LUX v. KERN COUNTY LAND CO. (S. F. 1,766.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 29, 1901.)

VENUE—CHANGE—CORPORATIONS—INJURIES TO REALTY.

Code Civ. Proc. § 392, provides that actions for injuries to real property must be tried in the county in which the subject of the action is situated. Const. art. 12, § 16, provides that a corporation may be sued in the county where the liability arises or the breach occurs, or in the county where it has its principal place of business. Action was brought against a corporation for injuries to real estate in the county where it had its principal place of business, which was other than that in which the land was situated. Held, that the provision of the constitution did not affect the Code provision, and hence refusal to grant defendant's motion for a change of venue to the latter county was error.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from the superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Edward A. Belcher, Judge.

Action by Miller & Lux (a corporation) against the Kern County Land Company (a corporation). From an appeal denying a motion for a change of venue, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Page, McCutchen & Eells, for appellant. Houghton & Houghton and E. B. & Geo. H. Mastick, for respondent.

GRAY, C. It appears from the complaint herein that both the parties to the suit are corporations having their principal places of business in the city and county of San Francisco. The action was brought in said city and county to recover $25,000 on account of injuries to real estate situated in the county of Kern. It is alleged in the complaint that the plaintiff owns certain lands and an interest in the Buena Vista reservoir, which lands and reservoir are situated in said county of Kern; also that said plaintiff owns an interest in a certain ditch leading out of said reservoir and across said lands; and that defendant, with force and arms, and unlawfully and against the will of plaintiff, placed and maintained a dam in said ditch, thereby preventing the use thereof for the purpose of irrigating plaintiff's said land, to the damage of plaintiff in the said sum of $25,000. Defendant made demand and motion for a change of venue to Kern county; on the sole ground that, the action being for damages to real property, the case should be tried in the county where the property was situated. We think this motion should have been granted. Section 392, Code Civ. Proc., provides that "actions for the following causes must be tried in the county in which the subject of the action, or some part thereof, is situated, subject to the power of the court to change the place of trial as provided in this Code: (1) For the recovery of real property, or of an estate or interest therein, or for the determination, in any form, of such right or interest, and for injuries to real property." It will be seen that the section is mandatory by its terms, and unless it is controlled by, or is in conflict with, some provision of the constitution, the action "must be tried" in the county where the property is situated. Section 16, art. 12, of the constitution, provides that "a corporation or association may be sued in the county where the contract is made or is to be performed, or where the obligation or liability arises, or the breach occurs; or in the county where the principal place of business of such corporation is situated, subject to the power of the court to change the place of trial, as in other cases." This provision of the constitution does not affect the Code provision quoted. It relates to a different subject, and is not necessarily inconsistent with said Code provision. The constitutional provision does not in express terms refer to actions for injuries to real estate or to actions concerning real estate. We cannot be permitted to infer that it was meant to include injuries to real estate in its provisions because it uses the phrase, "or where the obligation or liability arises"; for to indulge in such an inference would make it include actions for the enforcement of liens on real estate, to quiet title, etc., and render it inconsistent with section 5, art. 6. It cannot be successfully contended that the two sections of the constitution referred to are not in harmony (Fresno Nat. Bank v. Superior Court of San Joaquin Co., 83 Cal. 491, 24 Pac. 157); and the same rule that would harmonize these provisions of the constitution, and give effect to both, would also harmonize the Code provision with the quoted section of the constitution. In Griffin & Skelly Co. v. Magnolia & Healdsburg Fruit Canning Co., 107 Cal. 378, 40 Pac. 495, the court, in speaking of section 16 of article 12 of the constitution, says: "This provision of the constitution is merely permissive to the plaintiff (Fresno Nat. Bank v. Superior Court of San Joaquin Co., 83 Cal. 491, 24 Pac. 157); and the provision therein that the court may 'change the place of trial, as in other cases,' indicates that it is no more controlling upon the action of the court than if it were a mere statutory enactment. Being a provision of the constitution, the legislature cannot deprive the plaintiff of the privilege which it confers, but he has not thereby received any greater privilege than if the same provision had been made by statute. In either case it is only a rule of procedure, to be acted upon by the court in connection with other rules of procedure."

The very question here involved has been determined in Drinkhouse v. Waterworks, 80 Cal. 308, 22 Pac. 252. As shown by the complaint in that action, the defendant had its principal place of business in the city and county of San Francisco, where the action was begun for injury to real estate situated in San Mateo county. The defendant moved to change the venue to San Mateo county, the motion was granted, and this court affirmed the order. It is true that no provision of the constitution is referred to in the opinion or cited in the briefs; but section 392, Code Civ. Proc., is referred to, and it is directly held that under that section the proper place for the trial of an action for injury to real property is in the county where such real property is situated. We should not presume that the court and counsel overlooked a provision of the constitution, but rather that they had it in mind, and saw no inconsistency between it and the Code provision. Fresno Nat. Bank v. Superior Court of San Joaquin Co., supra. For the foregoing reasons, we advise that the order be reversed.

HICKEY v. COSCHINA et al. (S. F. 1,769.)
(Supreme Court of California. May 29, 1901.)

CONSTABLES — WRONGFUL ATTACHMENT — DAMAGES—EVIDENCE—DEMAND AND AFFIDAVIT—VALUE OF GOODS—DETENTION.

1. Plaintiff testified that he owned a cigar store, and had been in possession of the goods therein for nearly a month, before defendant constable took possession thereof. A witness testified that at the time the goods were sold to plaintiff they were delivered, and had been in plaintiff's possession ever since. Plaintiff's daughter testified that the goods were moved from the apartments of her husband to those of her father, in the same house, on the night of the sale. Plaintiff thereafter employed his son-in-law about the store to sell the goods bought from him. Held sufficient to show an immediate delivery and an actual and continued change of possession as against defendant constable's levy thereon as the goods of the son-in-law.

2. Where plaintiff's demand and affidavit setting out his title and right to goods wrongfully in the possession of defendant constable were set forth in the verified complaint, and not denied in the answer, and the affidavit and demand were thereafter offered in evidence without objection, there was no error.

3. Where plaintiff testified as to the value of goods wrongfully attached by defendant constable, and offered in evidence without objection an invoice taken a short time prior to the attachment, without contradictory evidence as to the value, a verdict for a less amount is supported by the evidence.

4. In an action to recover possession of personal property, plaintiff may recover damages for the detention thereof.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; M. H. Hyland, Judge.

Action by J. H. Hickey against M. Coschina and others. From an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

I. S. Thompson and C. L. Witten, for appellants. Will M. Beggs, for respondent.

COOPER, C. This action was brought to recover of defendant Coschina, as constable, and the other defendants, as sureties on his official bond, a certain stock of cigars, goods, and fixtures in a cigar store at No. 116 West Santa Clara street, in the city of San Jose, or, in case a delivery cannot be had, the value thereof, with damages for the detention. The case was tried with a jury, and a verdict returned for plaintiff fixing the value of the property at $315, and the damages to plaintiff by reason of the taking at $140. Judgment was accordingly entered. Defendants made a motion for a new trial, which was denied, and this appeal is from the order denying said motion.

No objection appears to have been made to the instructions given by the court to the jury. The principal question discussed in the case is as to whether the evidence supports the verdict. There is no question here as to the good faith of plaintiff in purchasing the goods, nor as to the payment of the purchase price. The only question is as to whether the sale was accompanied by an immediate delivery, and followed by an actual and continued change of possession. The evidence upon this question was conflicting, but the jurors were the judges of the question of fact, and by their verdict they have determined that there was such immediate delivery and actual and continued change of possession. The court below had the power to, and no doubt did, carefully weigh and consider the evidence for the purpose of determining whether or not the verdict was the correct conclusion from all the testimony in the case. It had the power to set aside the verdict, even though the evidence was conflicting, if convinced that it was unjust, or not in accord with the weight of the evidence. Here we have no such power. The presumptions are all in favor of the correctness of the verdict. To this presumption is added the sanction of the court below in denying the motion for a new trial. We can, therefore, only look to the evidence, and, if the verdict finds substantial support therein, we cannot disturb it. The plaintiff testified: "I took possession of the goods that evening. Some of them were already in my rooms, and the balance was put in my rooms. * * * I was the owner and conducting a cigar store at No. 116 West Santa Clara street, in the city of San Jose, California, on the 6th of April, 1897. I had been engaged in that business about a month. I commenced fitting up my store on the 1st day of March, 1897, and opened it for business about the 10th day of March, 1897. I continued my business at the same place until the defendant M. Coschina took possession of it on the 6th day of April, 1897." The witness Offield testified: "At the time of the sale the goods were delivered into his possession, and he has had continuous possession of them ever since." Mrs. Offield, the daughter of plaintiff, testified: "The position of the goods was not changed until the evening of the sale. About half were in father's rooms, and half in our rooms, and they were all moved into father's rooms that night." There is other testimony tending to show an immediate delivery and an actual and continued change of possession, but the above is sufficient. It is urged that plaintiff, after the sale, employed Offield, his son-in-law, in and about the cigar store. While this was a suspicious circumstance, and one that should have been carefully weighed by the jury and the court below, yet it was by no means conclusive. It was a circumstance that might be and was explained. The jury had the right to believe the explanation. If the son-in-law, after the sale, had made no delivery, and continued in the sole and exclusive possession, it would amount to a fraud in law. But there is evidence of an actual delivery and a continued change of possession. The employment by plaintiff of the son-in-law who had sold the goods is not prohibited by statute.

It is claimed by appellant that the court erred in admitting in evidence the demand and affidavit of plaintiff setting out his title and right to possession under Code Civ. Proc. § 689. The argument of appellant is that the evidence shows that a copy, and not the original affidavit, was served. It is sufficient to say that no such objection was made when the affidavit was offered in evidence. Further, there was no issue as to the demand and affidavit. The complaint, which is verified, alleged that the demand and affidavit marked "Exhibit A" were served upon defendant Coschina. The answer does not deny the allegation. The verdict fixing the value of the property is supported by the evidence. The plaintiff testified that he took an invoice four days before the goods were attached, and that the stock and fixtures footed up $482. This evidence is not contradicted. Nor has our attention been called to any other evidence as to the value at the time of the taking. The evidence seems to have been admitted without objection, and we cannot say that it was not competent for all parties to allow the invoice as evidence of value.

There was evidence to support the portion of the verdict awarding plaintiff damages. Plaintiff testified that he was damaged in the sum of $450 or $460. No objection appears to have been made to this evidence, nor is it shown in cross-examination or otherwise how this damage was estimated. But we must take the record as we find it, without regard to what the record under other circumstances might show. In an action to recover the possession of personal property the plaintiff may recover damages for the detention. Code Civ. Proc. § 667; Kelly v. McKibben, 54 Cal. 193.

The defendants appear to have allowed a general allegation of damage to go unchallenged in the complaint. They also allowed the plaintiff to make a general statement as to how much he was damaged, without requiring him to state in what manner. The jury seems to have compromised the matter by allowing $115 damages. We cannot disregard the evidence for the first time in this court, and hold that there is no evidence of damages. The order should be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; GRAY, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the order is affirmed.

IN RE GREGORY'S ESTATE. (S. F. 2,528.)
(Supreme Court of California. May 29, 1901.)

WILLS—CONTEST—EVIDENCE—DECLARATION OF DECEASED—HEARSAY.

On application for the probate of an alleged will, which was contested by one named as executor in a former will, on the ground that it was a forgery or procured by undue influence, contestant was permitted to offer testimony and to testify to declarations made by deceased, about the time the alleged will bore date, that the persons charged with procuring such will were hounding her pretty nearly to death, trying to get her to make such a will, and that thereafter and shortly before her death she repeatedly said she had made no will since the one in which contestant was named as executor. Held, the reception of such testimony was error, since testimony of declarations of an alleged testator as to menace or duress or as to the fact of his signature is hearsay, and should not be received.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Application by A. C. Freese, public administrator of San Francisco, for probate of the will of Catherine E. Gregory, to which Robert Ash filed a contest. From an order denying a new trial after judgment denying probate, proponent and legatee appeal. Reversed.

J. D. Sullivan and Adams & Adams, for appellants. Robert Ash and Lloyd & Wood, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, C. A. C. Freese, public administrator of the city and county of San Francisco, filed his petition for letters with the will annexed of Catherine E. Gregory, deceased, praying that it be admitted to probate. In the offered will, Charlotte B. Gregory, adopted daughter of deceased, is named as legatee, and Martha Munson, widow of the late John Munson, as guardian of Charlotte, but no executor was named. It was dated December 10, 1895. Deceased died about August 17, 1898. Robert Ash appeared as contestant, alleging that he is the executor named in the last will of deceased, dated March 22, 1892, and one of the legatees under said will, and guardian of the estate of Charlotte, who is also one of the legatees. As grounds of contest, it is alleged: First. That the will of December 10, 1895, is a forgery, and was written by one W. C. Rippey. Second. That it was not signed by deceased in the presence of any witnesses or acknowledged to have been signed by her. Third. That it "was prepared and procured by one W. C. Rippey, and obtained through the undue influence of the said W. C. Rippey and Martha Munson." The specification alleges that deceased was in ill health, was in the habit of drinking intoxicating liquors to excess periodically, and was of nervous temperament, and susceptible of being easily influenced by persons in her company who would supply her with liquors, a small quantity of which would affect her and render her incompetent to transact or understand important business transactions; that on said 10th day of December, 1895, the said Rippey and Munson were with deceased in her house, and induced her to drink intoxicating liquors, and deceased did drink such liquors, and became under the influence thereof, and while in said intoxicated condition the said Rippey and Munson prepared the alleged will, and induced deceased to sign the same. Fourth. The same specifications are stated in support of the allegation of fraud in the procurement of the will. The allegations of the contest were specifically denied. Certain questions were submitted to a jury, to which they answered, in effect, that the alleged will was not signed by deceased in the presence of the attesting witnesses or at all, nor acknowledged by her to have been signed, nor was it declared by her to be her will. The jury answered that deceased did not sign or acknowledge or declare the will to be her will under undue influence of either Rippey or Munson. The court adjudged that the will offered for probate is not the will of deceased, and denied it probate. The appeal is from the order denying motion for new trial, and is prosecuted by the public administrator and by Charlotte, who appeared by attorney in the action. Mrs. Munson appeared at the hearing by counsel, but she does not appeal.

1. The question of first importance raised by the appellants relates to alleged error in permitting certain declarations of deceased to be given in evidence. Contestant called James Geary as a witness, who testified, against proponent's objection, that he knew Mrs. Munson in 1891; also that he met her three months before her death, at which time she said: "I think I will die very soon. I have got everything in good shape. My will has been made, and I feel contented if I do die." He stated that he had the child Charlotte at his house in 1891, and while there Mrs. Gregory spoke to him about making her will. "Three months later, after the child went home, she (Mrs. Gregory) told me she had made her will. Q. What did she say about it? A. She told me she had made her will, and that Mr. Ash had consented to take care of the child and be guardian of the child, and that she had made it an object in her will for Mr. Ash to do so, and he had consented. This was late in 1892." He testified that he spoke with her concerning her property and the disposition she had made of it in the event of her death, about three months before her death, and that she told him she had not made any other will. Robert Ash testified in his own behalf. He had been Mrs. Gregory's attorney for several years, and attended to much of her business for which he had been paid. Against proponents' objection, he was asked to, and did, identify a certain promissory note given by Rippey to deceased, and also a certain order for promissory notes purporting to be signed by deceased, and delivered by Rippey to Ash. "Q. State what Mrs. Gregory said about the genuineness of her signature as attached to this paper." The question was objected to, and counsel for contestant stated that he offered it—First, to show the influence that Rippey had over her; and, second, to show that Mrs. Gregory had repudiated the signature which counsel for proponent claimed compared with the signature attached to the will in dispute. By her declarations it was thus sought to establish the forgery of the will by showing what she said as to the genuineness of her signature to a certain paper. He was then asked to state what Rippey was seeking to do "with regard to the making of a will by her, and the disposition of her property. A. It was about two weeks before this will in dispute was made. She said Rippey had been hounding her pretty nearly to death, trying to get her to make a will in favor of the old woman, Mrs. Martha Munson,—annoying her all the time; both Mrs. Munson and Rippey. She said: 'I don't know what he may do. He claims that he can prove and show that the child, Charlotte B. Gregory, was the child of young Jim Fair, and I have got to listen to some of his statements when he comes around in that way. I have been supporting him and taking care of him, and I don't know what he may do.' She further said: 'I will go and get the letters to me on the subject of this note.' And she went and got them, and told me to keep all those papers, and said: 'You may need them some time. Look out now. I don't know what he may do.' She also said that Mr. Rippey had been annoying her and trying to appoint Mrs. Munson as guardian of the child, and she said: 'He must think I am crazy, to place an old woman as guardian over that little girl.' That is what she said, and she became indignant. At different times subsequent to December 10, 1895, I had conversations with the deceased regarding the matter of her will, up to the time of her death. The night prior to the day before her death (she was sick in bed) she told me she thought she would never get out of the bed; that she was going to die; and she said: 'I want you to carry out my will, and take care of that little girl.' I said: 'I will do it. Don't worry about it.' She told me three or four times then that she wanted me to carry out her will; that everything was in my hands, and she wanted me to see the little girl was taken care of. She told me positively there was no other will in existence." The will referred to by contestant, under which he claimed, had been previously introduced in evidence against proponents' objection, which is the only other error now urged, and will be noticed later.

There was no evidence which in the slightest degree indicated mental incapacity of deceased by reason of periodical drunkenness or any cause whatever. There was evidence that she became intoxicated at times, but no evidence in any way indicating want of mental capacity from that cause, or connecting her drunkenness with the making of any will; and her alleged incapacity to make a will, by reason of her alleged disposition to become periodically intoxicated, was not even submitted to the jury as an issue of fact. The evidence was all addressed to the issues of forgery and undue influence. It requires no argument to show that the declarations of the deceased were prejudicial, if it was error to admit them. That it was error, we entertain no doubt. Appellants cite in support of their objections to the evidence typical cases from very early times to the present. These cases state the rule and the principles upon which it rests. They are: Strode v. Russel (1708) 2 Vern. 621; Jackson v. Kniffen (1806) 2 Johns. 31, 3 Am. Dec. 390; Provis v. Reed (1829) 5 Bing. 435; Shailier v. Burnstead, 99 Mass. 112; Stevens v. Vancleve, 4 Wash. C. C. 262, Fed. Cas. No. 13,412; Robinson v. Brewster, 140 Ill. 649, 30 N. E. 683, 33 Am. St. Rep. 265; Gibson v. Gibson, 24 Mo. 227; Jones v. Roberts, 37 Mo. App. 163; Waterman v. Whitney, 11 N. Y. 157, 62 Am. Dec. 71; In re Palmateer's Will, 78 Hun. 43, 28 N. Y. Supp. 1062; Bush v. Bush, 87 Mo. 480; Gordon's Case, 50 N. J. Eq. 397, 26 Atl. 268; Kennedy v. Upshaw, 64 Tex. 411; Boylan v. Meeker, 28 N. J. Law, 274. And from our own Reports: In re Calkins' Estate, 112 Cal. 296, 44 Pac. 577; In re Kaufman's Estate, 117 Cal. 288, 49 Pac. 192; In re James' Estate, 124 Cal. 653, 57 Pac. 578, 1008. To which may be added People v. Rodley, 63 Pac. 351. The answer made to these cases is that this "whole line of authorities refers to cases where a deed, bond, or will has been in fact executed, and its execution proved." It is claimed that the paper filed as a will by proponent "was never established even by alleged attesting witnesses, or either of them. It was claimed to be a forgery. Its execution was not established, and the jury pronounced it a forgery." Contestants rely upon Throckmorton v. Holt, 12 App. D. C. 552, and cases there cited; also Johnson v. Brown, 51 Tex. 65; Hoppe v. Byers, 60 Md. 381; Colvin v. Warford, 20 Md. 367; Neel v. Potter, 40 Pa. 483; Boylan v. Meeker, supra; Turner v. Hand, 3 Wall. Jr. 88, Fed. Cas. No. 14,257; and sections 1800, 1850, Code Civ. Proc. Throckmorton v. Holt, on which respondent relies as a leading case, we are informed was reversed by the United States supreme court on appeal. 21 Sup. Ct. 474, 45 L. Ed. —. It is true that in some of the cases cited by appellants the question arose where the fact was that the will had been duly executed and proved by subscribing witnesses, but we cannot say that this fact was regarded as essential to the operation of the rule. We are unable to see why this should be an invariable test by which the rule is to be applied. The danger in admitting declarations would be equally great in both cases. Where the very question under examination is one of execution, how could it be said that the execution had been proved? Such a situation might exist where the proceeding is to revoke a will that had been proved. Code Civ. Proc. § 1327. But where, as in the present case, the initiatory proceedings are to determine the question of execution or no execution, there could be no such thing as an existing duly executed and proved will to overthrow. The very offer to prove the will is arrested by the contest. The Code of Civil Procedure (section 1312) provides that in cases of contested wills "the contestant is plaintiff and the petitioner is defendant." For the purposes of the contest there are no issues before the jury, except such as are presented by the contestant, and evidence on no other issues can be submitted to the jury. "It is necessary, before the court can admit a will to probate, to require proof of all the acts requisite to constitute the execution of a valid will; but the proof of the acts, as to which the contest is not addressed, will be heard and passed upon by the court alone, and is not to be submitted to or passed upon by the jury" (In re Cartery's Estate, 56 Cal. 470); but, so far as contested issues are concerned, the burden of proof is on the contestant. It devolves on him to allege and prove the facts on which he relies to prevent probate of the will. His evidence is first called for and first submitted, and not until he rests is the proponent called upon to submit any evidence. As to matters or acts necessary to a valid will not put in issue by the contest the contestant has no voice. It is with the court to require the proofs from the proponent. In re Gharky's Estate, 57 Cal. 274; In re Dalrymple's Estate, 67 Cal. 444, 7 Pac. 906; In re Burrell's Estate, 77 Cal. 479, 19 Pac. 880. Why should contestant be permitted to attack the will by declarations which would not be admissible in a proceeding to revoke where the will has been proved? We can perceive no good reason. The petition states, among other things, "that said deceased left a will * * * [describing it and offering to produce it] which your petitioner believes, and therefore alleges, to be the last will and testament of said deceased," etc. It cannot be that the door to declarations of the deceased is thrown wide open, and that a contestant is at liberty to appropriate indiscriminately whatever the deceased may have said in her lifetime in support of the contest, simply because the execution of the will has not been proved; that contestant is permitted to prove by declarations what perhaps he could prove in no other way, solely because as yet the will has not been proved; and this, too, where the orderly course of the proceeding prescribed by the statute places proponent in a position where he can submit no proofs until after the contestant has rested. We cannot believe that the rule governing the admissibility of declarations can depend upon or is controlled by the fact that the proposed will has been already proved or admitted to have been executed by the deceased. There may be different and greater reason in the one case than the other, but the principle upon which declarations are excluded as hearsay applies in both cases. The declarations admitted in this case do not go to the question of mental capacity at all. They go directly to the issue of forgery and undue influence and fraud, and to the independent, substantive fact that deceased did not execute the will in question, by showing that she said in her lifetime she made no will except that of March 22, 1892. In short, contestant was permitted to prove declarations of the deceased which went to the principal issues in the contest, and did not go, nor were they intended to go, to mental capacity or the state of her mind in any perceptible degree. It was said in Re Calkins' Estate, supra: "Where a will is contested on the ground of undue influence or other like cause, not drawing into question the mental capacity of the testatrix at the time of its execution, neither her prior nor subsequent declarations are admissible to show either that the influence was exercised or that it affected her actions. To the extent that they purported to be declarations of the acts of others or her own acts, they were but matters of hearsay, merely, whose truth rested in the veracity of the utterer, and upon which there was no opportunity for cross-examination or explanation by the party who uttered them, and were not entitled to any weight by the jury, and cannot be considered for the purpose of sustaining the verdict. The court should not have permitted evidence to go to the jury of any declarations of the testatrix regarding the statements or acts of those by whose influence it is alleged that she was induced to make the will." These remarks apply equally to the issue of forgery. It was said in Re James' Estate, 124 Cal. 653, 57 Pac. 578, 1008, that in cases upon contest of probate of wills, where contestants had claimed that the testator never signed the instrument, or that he signed it under duress or menace, and like cases, "it has always been held that the declarations of the testator as to menace or duress, or as to the fact of his signature, are hearsay, and cannot be received." The declarations with which we are dealing must have influenced the jury in its conclusions as to the issue of forgery, and this would be sufficient to make a reversal necessary, although the jury found in favor of proponents on the issue of undue influence.

2. The objection to the introduction of the Ash will on the ground that no proof was offered that it was executed by Mrs. Gregory or witnessed by anybody need not be considered. We do not think the objection was sufficiently specific. We cannot consider an objection made in general terms, without some specification of the point of incompetency, if the evidence is admissible for any purpose. Thompson v. Thornton, 50 Cal. 142; Brumley v. Flint, 87 Cal. 471, 25 Pac. 683; Crocker v. Carpenter, 98 Cal. 418, 33 Pac. 271. It is not likely the alleged error will be repeated. It is advised that the order be reversed.

LEIBBRANDT v. SORG. (S. F. 2,241.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 29, 1901.)

BREACH OF MARRIAGE PROMISE—EVIDENCE
—ADMISSIBILITY—PREJUDICIAL ERROR—DAMAGES.

1. Code Civ. Proc. § 1845, provides that a witness can testify to those facts only which he knows of his own knowledge. Held that, in an action for breach of marriage promise, the admission of plaintiff's declarations to third parties, who were not invited to attend the wedding, and before any wedding day had been set, that plaintiff and defendant intended to marry, constituted prejudicial error.

2. The fact that there was competent evidence to prove a contract of marriage in an action for breach of promise did not render the admission of declarations of plaintiff to third parties that plaintiff and defendant intended to marry harmless, where the court stated in the presence of the jury that such evidence was competent.

3. Where, in an action for breach of promise, the court charged that, if plaintiff and defendant entered into an agreement to marry, plaintiff was entitled to damages if defendant wrongfully violated the agreement, a further charge that the shock and injury to plaintiff's affections occasioned by defendant "having violated his promise" was a proper element of damages was not misleading.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; W. G. Lorigan, Judge.

Action by Bertha Leibbrandt against Jean Sorg. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Jackson Hatch and E. M. Rosenthal, for appellant. Sargent & Wyatt, for respondent.

COOPER, C. Plaintiff recovered judgment for $4,500 damages for breach of promise of marriage. Defendant made a motion for a new trial, which was denied, and this appeal is from the judgment and order.

Plaintiff testified fully as to all the facts and circumstances connected with the alleged contract of marriage. Her counsel then asked her this question: "Did you ever tell anybody about your contemplated marriage with Sorg?" Defendant objected to the question as immaterial, incompetent, and irrelevant, and the objection was overruled. The judge at the time of the ruling remarked that the question would be allowed, not for the purpose of proving a promise of marriage, but to show humiliation on the part of plaintiff. The witness then answered that she said to Mrs. Barkley: "Mrs. Barkley, I am going to tell you the truth. I am going to get married, and I am going to marry a rich man, and will not have to work so hard any more." The witness further said that she thought she told Mrs. Barkley that the man's name was Sorg. The plaintiff's attorney afterwards called Mrs. Barkley, who testified that she had a conversation with plaintiff in Santa Cruz about the last of August, 1898, in which plaintiff spoke about getting married. Then this question was asked: "Just relate what was said at that time." To this question the defendant objected upon the ground that it was incompetent, and that declarations made by plaintiff are inadmissible to show a contract of marriage on the part of defendant. The court overruled the objection, to which ruling defendant excepted, and the witness said: "No, I cannot tell." The plaintiff's counsel then asked the following question: "Did Mrs. Leibbrandt at that time say to you that she was to marry Mr. Sorg?" This question was again objected to, the objection overruled, and the witness answered: "Yes, sir." The court did not limit the evidence of Mrs. Barkley in any manner. On the contrary, the objection went directly to the point that the declarations of plaintiff are incompetent to show a contract of marriage on the part of the defendant. The testimony was hearsay and incompetent, and the ruling of the court clearly erroneous. It is provided in the Code of Civil Procedure (section 1845): "A witness can testify of those facts only which he knows of his own knowledge; that is which are derived from his own perceptions, except in those few cases in which his opinions or inferences or the declarations of others are admissible." This is not one of those few cases. We might search the text-books and decisions in vain for the purpose of finding any authority for the admission of the declarations of a party to a contract made to third parties in his own favor and in his own interest for the purpose of proving such contract. It is said in 2 Rice, Ev. p. 863, in speaking of evidence as to breach of promise: "The conduct of the defendant may be evidence of a promise by him in favor of a plaintiff, because the conduct or declarations of a party are, upon general principles, competent evidence against him; but the conduct or declarations of a party are not generally evidence in his favor. And there seems to be nothing in the nature of a contract of marriage which should distinguish it from other contracts in this respect."

* * * The acts of the plaintiff, until they are communicated to the defendant, are not binding upon the plaintiff as constituting a contract. Why should they be evidence for the plaintiff of any part of a contract to bind the defendant?" It was said by the supreme court of Michigan in discussing this kind of evidence in McPherson v. Ryan, 59 Mich. 39, 26 N. W. 321: "And every reason that applies to the exclusion of this kind of testimony in other cases forbids its further use in actions of this nature. The plaintiff, as courts and juries must ever be constituted, has certainly advantage enough of the defendant, without giving her the opportunity of fabricating by her acts and declarations, without his consent or knowledge, evidence to make a case against him. It would place almost any man at the mercy of an evil-disposed and designing woman. An adventurer could come into court and swear to a promise of marriage, and then bring others of like ilk, her friends and intimates, to sustain her with testimony of the stories she had told them in furtherance of her plan to secure damages. Where the plaintiff has the equal right with the defendant to place fully before the jury the story of her wrongs, aided, as she will ever be, by the sympathy always accorded to both the weakness and the beauty of her sex,—a sympathy which the most rigid administration of justice cannot entirely prevent,—right and equity demand that she shall no longer have the aid which the law refuses in all other cases." The question of the admissibility of such evidence has been very fully discussed by the supreme court of Oregon in Osmun v. Winters, 25 Or. 260, 35 Pac. 250, and in the opinion it is said: "And there was no reason for allowing her to use her bare declarations, made without the knowledge or consent of the defendant, to support her case. Every reason which exists for the exclusion of such evidence in other cases forbids with equal force its use in a case of this nature." In

Russell v. Cowles, 81 Mass. 582, it was held that such evidence was not admissible, and in the opinion this language is used: "And there seems to be nothing in the nature of the contract of marriage which should distinguish it from other contracts in this respect." To the same effect are Cates v. McKinney, 48 Ind. 563, 17 Am. Rep. 768; Graham v. Martin, 64 Ind. 567; Walmsley v. Robinson, 63 Ill. 41; Dunlap v. Clark, 25 Ill. App. 575; 2 Pars. Cont. (8th Ed.) 62.

Our attention is called to the case of Reed v. Clark, 47 Cal. 199, in which it was held that, for the purpose of enhancing damages, the plaintiff was properly allowed to prove that within a few days after the proposal and acceptance the plaintiff announced her engagement to a few ladies with whom she was intimate, and whom she invited to attend the wedding. No authority is cited in the opinion, and the evidence was evidently held admissible upon the theory, as announced in some cases, that plaintiff, by way of damages, may prove that she made "preparations for the wedding." We are not inclined to extend the authority of that case beyond the facts therein appearing. The trend of modern decisions is that evidence of preparations for the wedding by plaintiff without the knowledge of defendant is not admissible. Osmun v. Winters, supra, and cases cited. The facts of this case do not come within the rule in Reed v. Clark. The witness Mrs. Barkley was not invited to the wedding. No wedding day was set or even talked of. She was permitted to testify to the bald declaration, in answer to a leading question, that the plaintiff told her she was to marry the defendant. The plaintiff was permitted to testify that she told Mrs. Barkley that she was going to marry defendant. Mrs. Barkley had not been invited to any wedding, and the conversation was not in the course of preparations for the wedding. We cannot say how much effect this improper testimony had upon the minds of the jurors. It will not be presumed that the jury disregarded it. In fact, the presumption is that the jurors relied upon it, in view of the fact that the judge, in their presence and hearing, held it to be competent. The fact that there was other competent evidence tending to prove the contract of marriage does not show that error was not prejudicial. Silveira v. Iversen, 128 Cal. 188, 60 Pac. 687. As the record contains the improper testimony, as herein stated, it becomes unnecessary to discuss the question as to the sufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict.

The court did not err in giving the instruction numbered 12 to the jury. The shock and injury to plaintiff's affections therein spoken of as an element of damages by "defendant having violated his promise to marry" could not have misled the jury. The sentence had reference to the preceding part of the instruction, to the effect that if the jury should find from the evidence "that plaintiff and defendant entered into an agreement to marry, one or the other, and that said defendant wrongfully broke and violated said agreement, and the plaintiff is entitled to damages therefor," then in assessing such damages the rule is given. The judgment and order should be reversed.

We concur: GRAY, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order are reversed.

HENSHAW, J. I concur in the foregoing opinion and judgment. Such evidence is never admissible to prove the contract to marry. But, after competent proof of the contract, I think the evidence clearly admissible for the limited purpose of showing damage by reason of the humiliation following the breach of contract. A woman whose engagement is known only to herself and recreant lover will not, it may be assumed, suffer for his faithlessness quite so many and so keen pangs as the woman who has made announcement of her engagement to her circle of friends. Therefore I think the ruling in Reed v. Clark is correct on principle, without supporting authority.

ANDRUS v. SMITH. (S. F. 1,990.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 29, 1901.)

APPEAL — FINDINGS — EVIDENCE — ADVERSE POSSESSION — PLEADING — COMPLAINT — AMENDMENT.

1. A finding supported by substantial evidence will not be disturbed on appeal.

2. Code Civ. Proc. § 323, provides that, for the purpose of constituting adverse possession by any person claiming title founded on a written instrument, land is deemed to have been possessed and occupied where it has been usually cultivated or improved; where it has been protected by a substantial inclosure; where, though not inclosed, it has been used for pasturage, husbandry, or the ordinary use of the occupants. In 1885 a party in possession of certain land deeded the same to plaintiff's testator, the deed being recorded, and the grantee took possession under the deed. Grantee ever since paid the taxes, and there was evidence that he piled lumber on the land, kept up the fence most of the time, but at times it was destroyed by children, but was up at the time of the grantee's death, in 1895; that he planted potatoes and permitted a tenant to pasture a cow on the land during one season. Held, that a finding that such testator ever since 1885, and up to 1895, had been in exclusive, open, and notorious occupancy and possession of the land was not erroneous.

3. In an action by an administratrix to quiet title to land, it was not error for the court to permit plaintiff to amend her complaint after the cause was tried and submitted, but before findings had been filed or judgment given; the submission being set aside, and defendant allowed to answer the amended complaint and to introduce further evidence.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; G. P. Hall, Judge.

Action by Mabel B. Andrus, as administratrix of the estate of Washburne R. Andrus, deceased, against Sarah M. Smith, as administratrix of the estate of Stirling A. Hopkins, deceased. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

C. W. Cross, for appellant. W. J. Robinson and Robinson & Miller, for respondent.

COOPER, C. The action was brought for the purpose of quieting plaintiff's title to the lots described in the complaint, situated in the city of Alameda. The plaintiff relied on title by adverse possession. The court found that plaintiff's testate "ever since the 16th day of April A. D. 1885, and up to the 6th day of June A. D. 1895, * * * has been and was in the exclusive, open, and notorious occupancy and possession of" the lands described in the complaint. Defendant claims that this finding is not supported by the evidence, for the reason that the evidence does not show the possession to have been adverse and continuous for five years. This is the only material point in the case. We think the evidence is sufficient to support the finding. The evidence was, to some extent, conflicting, but the judge of the court below heard it as it fell from the lips of the witnesses. He observed their conduct and manner while testifying, and was therefore much better able to pass upon their credibility and arrive at the truth than we can possibly be from the written record. All presumptions here are in favor of the finding, and we cannot, under the well-settled rule, disturb it, if there is any substantial evidence to support it. The evidence shows that on April 8, 1885, one Rachael Frazier was in the peaceable and undisputed possession of the lots, and had them fenced; that on said date she executed to W. R. Andrus, plaintiff's testate, a deed of said premises, which deed was acknowledged and recorded on April 16, 1885; that the said Andrus went into possession of the lots under the deed. It was a grant, bargain, and sale deed, and described the lots in contest here, and no other property. The title of plaintiff's testate was therefore founded upon a written instrument, and in such case land is deemed to have been possessed and occupied: "(1) Where it has been usually cultivated or improved. (2) Where it has been protected by a substantial inclosure. (3) Where, although not inclosed, it has been used for the supply of fuel, or of fencing timber for the purposes of husbandry, or for pasturage, or for the ordinary use of the occupant." Code Civ. Proc. § 323. The entry, therefore, by Andrus, under a deed purporting to convey the title, made by one in possession of the property, is a significant circumstance tending to show a claim adverse to all the world. As said in Unger v. Moonney, 63 Cal. 593, 49 Am. Rep. 104: "This is strong evidence of an ouster or disseisin. It bears the appearance of a declaration by the grantee that his entry under the deed is for himself exclusively and not for another, that he enters in his own exclusive right."

There is no conflict here as to the deed and entry thereunder. The undisputed evidence shows that continuously after the entry under the deed the grantee paid all the taxes of every kind upon the lots. There was evidence that the plaintiff's testate used the land, piled lumber upon it, kept up the fence surrounding it, built a cesspool thereon, employed a carpenter, to keep the fence in repair; that the fence was kept up the most of the time, but at times was destroyed by the schoolboys pulling off the pickets or breaking the boards, but was up at the time of Andrus' death; that a tenant of Andrus kept a cow on the land while inclosed. In the season of 1886 Andrus had the land plowed and planted in potatoes. He had a cow shed built on the property, for holding feed and for storage. The witness Waltz testified that he had known the property since 1868, and that Mrs. Frazier lived there until Andrus bought the place. The witness further said: "My orders from Mrs. Andrus were to keep the fence in good order, and whenever I saw it out of repair I would go and fix it. During those times that I have testified that the boards were taken off the fence, they did not remain off any considerable length of time. My place was right in the next block. As a matter of fact, this fence remained in substantial repair until Mr. Andrus' death." Andrus died in June, 1895. The fact that Andrus held possession for over 10 years, and paid all the taxes upon the land, is evidence of his claim of right. The fact that the fence was at times torn down and out of repair does not, of itself, show that the possession was not continuous. The land was used for the ordinary purposes of the occupant. It was said by Judge Field in Coryell v. Cain, 16 Cal. 573: "By 'actual possession' is meant a subjection to the will and dominion of the claimant, and is usually evidenced by occupation, by a substantial inclosure, by cultivation, or by appropriate use, according to the particular locality and quality of the property." It has been held that, where the property is in some way subjected to the will and control of the claimant, an inclosure is not always necessary. Hicks v. Coleman, 25 Cal. 132, 85 Am. Dec. 103; McCreery v. Everding, 44 Cal. 252; Sheldon v. Mull, 67 Cal. 300, 7 Pac. 710. In case of grazing land in a grazing country, herding sheep upon it would be "an appropriate use, according to the particular locality and quality of the property." Webber v. Clarke, 74 Cal. 15, 15 Pac. 431. And where a party enters under color of title, and has actual possession of a part of the whole tract, he has constructive possession of the whole. Webber v. Clarke, 74 Cal. 15, 15 Pac. 431, and cases cited.

The court did not err in allowing plaintiff to amend her complaint after the cause was tried and submitted, but before findings had been filed or judgment given. The submission was set aside, and defendant allowed to answer the amended complaint and to introduce further evidence. This was the correct practice, and was in furtherance of justice, and for the purpose of having the case disposed of upon its merits. We advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; GRAY, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order are affirmed.

HAMILTON v. HUBBARD. (Sac. 749.)
(Supreme Court of California. May 29, 1901.)
DEEDS—OPERATION—HUSBAND AND WIFE—SEPARATE PROPERTY.

1. A deed is not merely evidence of a gift or other grant, but is the gift or grant itself, and ipso facto operates to transfer the title of the property described to the grantee.

2. Under Civ. Code, § 162, providing that all property acquired by the wife after marriage by gift, bequest, devise, or descent, with the rents, issues, and profits thereof, is her separate property, where a deed conveying realty to the wife recites that it is made in consideration of one dollar, and exchange for a certain lot, which lot was the separate property of her husband, owned by him before marriage, and it appears that such deed was made with the husband's consent, the wife takes such realty as her separate property, the transaction operating as a gift to her.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county; G. W. Nicol, Judge.

Action by Moses Hamilton, as administrator of the estate of Frances Hamilton, against Maria S. Hubbard, sued with another. From a judgment in favor of defendant Maria S. Hubbard, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

A. H. Carpenter, for appellant. Budd & Thompson, for respondent.

SMITH, C. The plaintiff is the administrator of Frances Hamilton, his deceased wife, to whom he was married May 22, 1867, and who died March 29, 1887. He sues as administrator to quiet the title of her estate to lot No. 3, block 56, etc., in the city of Stockton. Both parties deraign title under a deed from one Weber to Frances Hamilton, the deceased, of date July 6, 1867, purporting to convey to her the lot in question,—the plaintiff as her administrator; the defendant under foreclosure of mortgage made to her August 26, 1892, by the plaintiff, in his personal capacity, and commissioner's deed executed to him in pursuance thereof. The court found that the property in question was the community property of Moses Hamilton and his deceased wife. But this finding rests wholly upon the deed of Weber to the latter, the acknowledged source of title of both parties. Hence the question presented is as to the effect of this deed. If the deceased, Frances, as grantee therein, took the property conveyed as her separate property, the plaintiff, as her administrator, was entitled to recover; otherwise not. Under our law as it stood prior to the amendment of section 164, Civ. Code, March 19, 1889, the presumption was that all property acquired by either spouse during marriage was community property. Meyer v. Kinzer, 12 Cal. 247, 37 Am. Dec. 538; 1 Notes on Cal. Rep. 547, 548; Civ. Code, §§ 162-164. Hence, assuming—without deciding—that the amendment of section 164, March 19, 1889, and the subsequent amendments of March 3, 1893, and of March 4, 1897, did not change the rule with reference to deeds made prior to the first amendment, the presumption, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, would be that Frances, the grantee in the deed in question, took the property for the community. But here there is a recital in the deed that it is made “in consideration of one dollar, and exchange for lot No. 13 in block Q west,” etc.; and it appears from the evidence without contradiction that the lot mentioned, “No. 13,” was the separate property of Moses, the husband, owned by him before the marriage. And from a deed made by him 12 days after the deed to his wife, conveying to Weber lot No. 13, and reciting as the consideration “one dollar and exchange for lot 13 in block 56,” etc., it further appears that the deed of Weber to Frances was made with his consent, and in pursuance of his agreement with the grantor. Thus far the nature of the transaction is apparent, and there is no room for presumption. We have, therefore, only to determine the legal effect of the facts thus established; and this, under well-established and familiar principles of the law (assuming for the present that the result would not be affected by the peculiar laws of this state, affecting the marital relations), is sufficiently obvious. A deed of conveyance is not merely evidence of a gift or other grant. It is the gift or grant itself, and ipso facto operates to transfer or convey the title of the property described to the grantee. Civ. Code, §§ 1053, 1146; Shanahan v. Crampton, 92 Cal. 11, 13, 28 Pac. 50. Nor—unless, under the peculiar rules of equity, to raise a trust—can its terms or legal effect be contradicted. Ordinarily, indeed, where a conveyance is made to one, and the consideration paid by another, a trust is “presumed” in favor of the latter. Civ. Code, § 853. But this presumption arises only in transactions between “strangers to each other” (1 Perry, Trusts, § 126), and is not indulged where the conveyance is to the “wife or child, or other person, for whom [the person paying the consideration] is under some natural, moral, or legal obligation to provide.” In such cases the presumption is “that the purchase and conveyance were intended to be an advancement for the nominal purchaser.” 1 Perry, Trusts, § 143; Hill, Trusts, 97, and note. The transaction was, therefore, a gift to Mrs. Hamilton, and, under the express provisions of the Code, her separate property. Civ. Code, § 162.

Nor are there any provisions of the Code or decisions of this court that affect this result otherwise than as confirming it. Under our law a husband may make a deed—whether of his own or community property—to his wife; and in such case it is well settled that, in the absence of evidence of a contrary intent, the deed will vest in her the land conveyed as her separate property. Civ. Code, § 158; Tillaux v. Tillaux, 115 Cal. 672, 47 Pac. 691; Ions v. Harbison, 112 Cal. 260, 44 Pac. 572; Carter v. McQuade, 83 Cal. 274, 23 Pac. 348; Burkett v. Burkett, 78 Cal. 310, 20 Pac. 715, 3 L. R. A. 781; Taylor v. Opperman, 79 Cal. 468, 21 Pac. 869. In the last-named case the rule is thus stated by the court: “In the absence of any evidence of intention outside of the deed, it must be taken as evidencing the intention which, upon its face, it imports. * * * To deny it that effect would be to render the deed inoperative and void. Story v. Marshal, 24 Tex. 305, 76 Am. Dec. 106. * * * The prima facie presumption arising from a deed of the husband to the wife of community property is that it was intended to change its character from community property to the separate property of the wife,”—citing Platt, Prop. Rights of Married Women, § 34. The contrary was held in an early case in this state (Kohner v. Ashenauer, 17 Cal. 581), and in the Texas cases there cited; but these decisions must be regarded as overruled by the later authorities. The principle of the cases cited applies equally to the case here. There is no essential distinction between a deed direct from husband to wife and a deed from him to her per interpositam personam. Michoud v. Girod, 4 How. 553, 11 L. Ed. 1076; Smith v. Strahan, 16 Tex. 321, 76 Am. Dec. 622; Baldrige v. Scott, 48 Tex. 189. Possibly, with reference to the latter case, it may be claimed that, where the consideration of the deed to the wife is community property, a presumption may arise—or, rather, might have arisen prior to the amendment of section 164—that the conveyance to the wife was for the use of the community; and it is in fact so held in Texas with regard both to deeds from husband to wife and deeds to her from third parties by his direction, though with regard to the former, as we have seen, the doctrine has been repudiated in this state. But the rule has no application, either in terms or intention, to cases where the consideration is the separate property of the husband. Accordingly, in the Texas cases cited supra it is held that in such cases the presumption is in favor of the wife's right, and that she takes to her own use. And the same distinction is made in Kohner v. Ashenauer, 17 Cal. 581, and in the previous case of Meyer v. Kinzer, 12 Cal. 251, 73 Am. Dec. 538. Nor in the numerous decisions in this court in which deeds to the wife by direction of the husband have been held to inure to her use has the contrary ever been ruled. Nor, indeed, is it held in any of those cases that the rule would be otherwise, even in cases where the consideration is community property. In all of them, indeed, some circumstance, in addition to the mere conveyance to the wife by direction of the husband, appeared; as, e. g., declarations of the husband at the time of the deed, or the use in the deed of the expression "as her separate property," or similar expressions. But it cannot be inferred that, in the absence of the particular circumstances shown in these cases, the decisions would have been otherwise. Peck v. Brummagin, 31 Cal. 444, 89 Am. Dec. 195; Higgins v. Higgins, 46 Cal. 263; Swain v. Duane, 48 Cal. 358; Read v. Rahm, 65 Cal. 344, 4 Pac. 111; Jackson v. Torrence, 83 Cal. 529, 23 Pac. 695. Nor, if it could be so inferred, and the rule assumed that in such cases the presumption should be against the wife, would the case here be affected; for the consideration in this case was not community property, but the separate property of the husband, and with reference to such cases the rule, as we have seen, is different. The case is in principle precisely the same as though the consideration had been paid by the father of the wife, and the deed made to her by his direction. I advise that the judgment and order appealed from be reversed.

We concur: COOPER, C.; GRAY, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are reversed.

PEOPLE v. WILLIAMS. (Cr. 688.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 31, 1901.)

CRIMINAL LAW—APPEAL—EVIDENCE—REVIEW —RAPE—CONFESSION—INSTRUCTIONS
—SEPARATE OFFENSES.

1. In a criminal prosecution the supreme court is not authorized to set aside a conviction on the ground of insufficiency of evidence, unless there is a total absence of evidence on an essential point.

2. Where defendant, charged with rape, was induced by the brothers of the prosecutrix to go to the office of the city marshal, where he was confronted with the prosecutrix, who there made her statement in his presence, giving considerable details as to the alleged occurrences, and defendant was urged to make a statement, and threatened that the magistrate would be applied to for a warrant, but made no reply, and one of the brothers had said to defendant that if he would make a statement exonerating his sister he would be allowed to leave the city, statements made by the prosecutrix and by others were not admissible as a confession on the ground that defendant's silence implied an admission thereof, he being under restraint, though not arrested, at the time, and he having been promised immunity from punishment if he spoke, and threatened with prosecution if he defended himself and declared himself innocent.

3. Where, in a prosecution for rape, the prosecutrix testified that she had lived with defendant for four months, and on nearly every day during the time, and sometimes five or six times a day, they had sexual intercourse with each other, an instruction that, if the jury found that defendant had sexual intercourse with the prosecutrix at any time within three years before the finding of the indictment, she being under 16 years of age, they should find him guilty, was erroneous, as it did not limit the prosecution to any particular act.

4. In a prosecution involving sexual intercourse by consent, the state should be compelled to elect at the commencement of the trial on which of several acts it intends to rely for a conviction; and, in the absence of such election, the first evidence which would tend in any degree to prove an offense should be deemed a selection, and, unless that precise offense is proven, defendant is entitled to acquittal.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; B. N. Smith, Judge.

Z. Williams was convicted of rape, and he appeals. Reversed.

J. G. Rossiter and J. W. McKinley, for appellant. Tiley L. Ford, Atty. Gen., and Henry A. Melvin, Dep. Atty. Gen., for the People.

TEMPLE, J. The defendant was convicted upon a charge of rape upon the person of a child aged 13. The appeal is from the judgment and from an order denying a new trial.

As I think the judgment must be reversed, many of the points made will not require consideration. Only those will be noticed, other than the one which necessitates a reversal, which may be necessary for the guidance of the court upon a retrial. The briefs contain a long discussion as to the sufficiency of the evidence. It is not claimed that there was not sufficient evidence if the prosecuting witness was worthy of credence. But her story is said to be improbable, and opposed to testimony more credible. We have so often called the attention of the profession to the fact that the appellate jurisdiction of this court does not extend to matters of fact that we are surprised that learned counsel should spend their time in the presentation of such questions. If there is a total absence of evidence upon some essential matter, and perhaps if the evidence is so slight as not to amount to satisfactory proof within the meaning of section 1835, Code Civ. Proc., a question of law is presented. The credibility of the witnesses is for the jury, or at least for the trial court, which may grant a new trial for insufficiency of the evidence, when we could not interfere. There was an abundance of evidence in the present case, and, if the jury believed the testimony for the prosecution, the verdict was right, so far as this point goes; and on the same condition the court properly refused to grant a new trial. But, even if the court ought to have granted a new trial on that ground, we cannot review its action. I think the testimony of W. S. Lacey and of the brothers of the prosecutrix as to what occurred at the office of Mr. Lacey, who was city marshal, was improperly admitted. The defendant was not then under arrest, but was induced to go with the two brothers to the office of the city marshal, and was there confronted with the prosecutrix. There considerable conversation was had. The child made her statement as to what had occurred, apparently giving considerable detail as to alleged occurrences. The defendant was urged to make a statement, and frequently threatened that the magistrate would be applied to for a warrant. The marshal testified that, after the prosecutrix made her statement, he asked the defendant what he had to say about it. "Don't think he made any reply to what she said at all. He just sat there, and kind of cowed right down." After this testimony he was permitted to recite what the prosecutrix had said. This was admissible, if at all, only upon the theory that the defendant admitted the truth of what was thus said in his presence. So considered, it was clearly a confession, or that is not a confession which simply admits all the facts charged, but stops short of a confession of guilt in the precise words, "I am guilty." The defendant was under restraint. The brothers Tomlinson had told him, as one of them testified, that if he would make a statement exonerating their sister he would be allowed to leave the city; and it appears the magistrate was called in, and, after he had heard the statement, advised him to leave town. What was meant by exonerating their sister, after she had stated what had been done to her, was probably that he should admit the truth of her statement, and perhaps admit that he had used force. Nothing inculpatory was said by the defendant at the time. It made against him only because he was silent. Under such circumstances his silence did not imply an admission; but, granting that it did, the admission was not voluntary. He was under restraint, and had a suggested promise that he could go free if he admitted his guilt, and a threat of prosecution if he defended himself and declared his innocence. The evidence should not have been admitted.

But one other matter requires notice at our hands. That arises from an instruction given by the court to the effect that, if the jury found that defendant had had sexual intercourse with the prosecutrix at any time within three years before the finding of the indictment, she being under 16 years of age, etc., they must find him guilty. The prosecutrix testified that she lived with the defendant for a period of four months, and on nearly every day during that time, and sometimes five or six times a day, they had sexual intercourse with each other. In addition to this sweeping general assertion, many alleged acts were specifically described with circumstances of time, etc. Each of these acts was a separate offense, and the defendant could be tried for either, and separately for each of them. The jury were not even told that they must all agree that some specifically described act had been performed. A verdict of guilty could have been rendered under such an instruction, although no two jurors were convinced beyond a reasonable doubt, or at all, of the truth of the charge as to any one of these separate offenses. Even worse than that was possible. As to every specific offense which there was an attempt to prove, and which could be met by proof, the defendant may have established his defense, and yet upon the general evidence of continuous crime, which, in the nature of things, he could only meet by his personal denial, he may have been convicted. And how could he defend when he was not informed as to what particular offense out of hundreds testified to by the prosecutrix he was to be tried? Such a trial upon a charge so indefinite as to circumstance of time or place, or any particular except by the general designation, would be a judicial farce, if it were not something a great deal worse. That it was wrong was held in the recent case of People v. Castro (Cr. No. 704) 65 Pac. 13. The trouble arises from the fact that upon a charge of crime involving sexual intercourse by consent other like offenses may be shown to prove that the parties are lewdly inclined, and that the barriers of modesty have been broken down with reference to each other; not primarily to prove habitual or continuous criminality or other offenses. In this case, as well as in any other, the prosecution must charge a specific offense; and the conviction, if one is had, must depend upon the proof of that offense alone. Other incidents are important only as tending to prove the one specific offense for the alleged commission of which defendant is on trial. But it is said time is not material further than it must appear that the crime was committed before the indictment was found, and within the period of limitations. The statement is not strictly accurate. The proof of an offense on a different date is a variance, but, in general, not a fatal variance. A defendant on trial upon a criminal indictment has a right to demand that the charge against him shall be stated in ordinary and concise language, that he may know upon what specific charge he is to be tried, so that he may prepare his defense. Practically, that is not done in these few anomalous cases where any number of separate offenses may be proven, although the defendant is being tried for the commission of only one. Two cases upon this point are cited, in each of which a rule is declared, but the rules differ. In People v. Flaherty, 162 N. Y. 541, 57 N. E. 76, it is said: "The indictment alleges acts constituting but one crime, and, while the mistake as to the date will not prevent the prosecution from proving the crime charged in the indictment, the indictment will be deemed to cover the offense attempted to be proved nearest in point of time to the date of the indictment." In State v. Hilberg (Utah) 61 Pac. 215, it was said, after noticing that the prosecution could have proved any one act committed: "When evidence was introduced tending directly to the proof of one act, and for the purpose of securing a conviction upon it, from that moment that particular act became the act charged." This rule is uncertain, and unfair to the defendant, because of the qualifying clause, "for the purpose of securing a conviction upon it." I think the prosecuting officer, when he commences the trial of a case of this class, where he is at liberty to prove one of several different offenses under the indictment, should at least as early as the commencement of the trial inform the defense upon proof of what specific offense he intends to rely; and, if he does not, the first evidence which would tend in any degree to prove an offense shall be deemed a selection, and, unless that precise offense is proven, the defendant is entitled to an acquittal. Even this would leave a defendant in such cases at a disadvantage, but he ought not to be tried under less favorable circumstances. The judgment and order are reversed, and a new trial ordered.

PEOPLE ex rel. RICHARDSON v. COBB.
(S. F. 2,684.)¹

(Supreme Court of California. May 29, 1901.)
JUSTICES OF THE PEACE—DEATH OF INCUMBENT—APPOINTMENT OF SUCCESSOR—TERM—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—REPEAL OF STATUTE.

1. Code Civ. Proc. § 111, providing that, on a vacancy in the office of justice of the peace, an eligible person shall be appointed to hold the office for the remainder of the term, was not repealed by County Government Act 1897, § 25, subd. 19, declaring that, in case of a vacancy in any elective county office, the appointee shall hold office for the unexpired term, or until the next general election.

2. Const. art. 4, § 24, provides that a bill shall contain but one subject, which shall be expressed in its title. Act 1897, entitled "County Government Act" (section 58), provides that city justices of the peace and all county officers shall be elected at the gubernatorial elections. Held, that the act of 1897 was not unconstitutional, in so far as it applied to city justices, because that subject was not expressed in the title, since city justices constitute part of the county government.

3. Act 1897, entitled "County Government Act" (section 58), providing that city justices of the peace shall be elected at a gubernatorial election, repealed Code Civ. Proc. § 110, limiting the term of office of city justices of the peace to two years.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; A. S. Rhodes, Judge.

Action by the people, on the relation of one Richardson, against C. W. Cobb, to oust defendant from the office of justice of the peace. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

C. W. Cobb and E. M. Rea, for appellant. Tiley L. Ford, Atty. Gen., Howell C. Moore, and Owen D. Richardson, for the People.

SMITH, C. The defendant was appointed by the board of supervisors city justice of the city of San Jose, on the death of the incumbent, November 12, 1900, and has since continued in occupation of the office. His predecessor had previously been appointed, on the death of the original incumbent, one Gass; and prior to the appointment of defendant, November 22, 1900, the board had ordered an election to fill the unexpired term to be held November 6th of the same year. At this election the relator was elected to the office, and qualified, but was not permitted to take possession. The suit was brought by the attorney general to oust the defendant from the office, and also to establish the title of the relator. The decision of the court below was against the defendant and in favor of the relator. Judgment was entered accordingly, and the defendant appeals.

It is contended by the appellant that the case is governed by the provisions of section 111 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and not, as held by the lower court, by the provisions of section 25, subd. 19, of the county government act of 1897 (St. 1897, pp. 452, 463), or, if otherwise, that under the latter act there was no vacancy to be filled at the general election of 1900. By the former statute it is expressly provided that, in case of vacancy in "the office of a justice of the peace," an eligible person shall be appointed by the board of supervisors, "to hold office for the remainder of the term"; and this provision has been held to apply to city justices, as well as others. People v. Sands, 102 Cal. 16, 36 Pac. 404. By the latter statute the appointment is "for the unexpired term, or until the next general election." It was held by the lower court that the Code provision was repealed by the provision of the latter act cited, that the term of office of the defendant expired at the next general election following his appointment, and consequently that the election of relator at that election was valid. But precisely the same point was involved in the case of People v. Col (Cal.) 64 Pac. 477, and has been ruled otherwise, and the question must now be regarded as settled. This is admitted by the attorney general, whose position now is that subdivision 19 of section 25 of the act cited has no application to city justices, whose terms, under the provisions of sections 110, 111, and 103 of the Code of Civil Procedure, are expressly limited to two years, and that section 58 of the county government act, providing for the election of "city justices of the peace," along with county and township officers, at the gubernatorial elections, and thus lengthening their terms to four years, is, in so far as it applies to city justices, unconstitutional and void; the ground of the objection being that the subject legislated on (namely the tenure of office and election of city justices of the peace) is not expressed or referred to in the title. Const. art. 4, § 24. It seems, therefore, that both parties now agree that the Code provisions were not repealed by the county government act, and this may be assumed to be the law. Kahn v. Sutro, 114 Cal. 335, 46 Pac. 87. The case must therefore be governed by the provisions of section 111 of the Code of Civil Procedure; and the sole question to be considered is whether, so far as city justices are concerned, the provisions of section 58 of the county government act, in prolonging the term, are unconstitutional.

This question, we think, must be answered in the negative. It may be admitted that city justices of the peace do not come, or at least do not altogether come, within the category of county or township officers; but it is equally clear that they do not come altogether within that of city officers. They cannot, therefore, strictly speaking, be said to be either county officers or city officers, for that would imply that they were exclusively such; but, without much impropriety, they may be said to be either. People v. Sands, 102 Cal. 15, 36 Pac. 404. More accurately speaking, they, as well as county justices, form part of the judicial system of the state; and both come equally within the provisions of section 11, art. 6, of the constitution, which authorizes the legislature to "determine the number of justices of the peace to be elected in townships, incorporated cities and towns or cities and counties," and to fix "by law [their] powers, duties and responsibilities." Kahn v. Sutro, 114 Cal. 331, 46 Pac. 87, et seq. Under this provision the legislature has power to fix the terms of justices of the peace generally. Id.; People v. Sands, 102 Cal. 15, 36 Pac. 404; Rauer v. Williams, 118 Cal. 408, 50 Pac. 691; In re Mitchell, 120 Cal. 390, 52 Pac. 799. It does not follow, however, from the peculiar nature of their offices, that justices of the peace or other judicial officers do not constitute part of county or city governments. The administration of justice is an essential part of every government, whether local or general; and the subject of their appointment, terms of office, and duties is therefore entirely germane to an act to establish such governments. Otherwise, it would be necessary to regard all provisions as to justices of the peace, whether city or county, as beyond the scope of the title of the act. Nor is the case affected by the fact that the duties of city justices are to be performed in cities. Cities, though for certain purposes distinct political entities, still remain part of the counties in which they are situated; and many of the functions of county officers—as, e. g., of sheriffs, recorders, assessors, etc.—are exercised within their limits. Pol. Code, § 3901 et seq.; Kahn v. Sutro, 114 Cal. 323, 46 Pac. 87, et seq. "An act should not be declared unconstitutional and void unless there is a clear repugnance between the act and the constitution." University v. Bernard, 57 Cal. 613. We do not perceive such repugnance in this case, and must therefore hold the provision of the act in question valid. It follows that its effect was to repeal section 110 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and to extend the term to four years, as provided in the act. The judgment should be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to enter judgment for the defendant.

We concur: COOPER, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to enter judgment for the defendant.

FRAZIER v. MURPHY et al. (S. F. 2,280.)
(Supreme Court of California. May 29, 1901.)

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS—CLAIM—PRESENTATION — PARTNERSHIP — DENIAL—ESTOPPEL—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

1. Code Civ. Proc. § 1502, provides that, if an action is pending against the decedent at the time of his death, plaintiff must present his claim against his estate to the executor for allowance or rejection, and that no recovery should be had unless proof be made of such presentation. Defendant died before trial, and his executors were made parties defendant. Held, that defendant's objection to the taking of evidence in support of the action on the ground that no claim had been presented to them should be sustained.

2. Plaintiff dealt with H. as H. & Co., and instituted a suit against H. & Co. H. answered, denying the existence of the partnership, and died before trial. H.'s executors were made parties defendant in the place of "H., sued as H. & Co.," and it was proved without objection that H. & Co. was only another name for H. Held, that the executors were not estopped from denying the partnership relation.

3. Code Civ. Proc. § 1880, subd. 3, provides that a party in whose behalf an action is prosecuted against an executor or administrator on a claim or demand against the estate of a deceased person cannot be a witness to any matter of fact occurring before the death of the deceased. Plaintiff instituted a suit against H. & Co., and H. answered, denying the existence of the partnership, and died before trial. His executors were made parties defendant, and proved without objection that H. & Co. was only another name for H. Held, that the contention that the evidence of plaintiff as to what H. said and did prior to, during, and after plaintiff's engagement to work for H. & Co. was admissible for the purpose of showing that H. was estopped from denying the partnership relation because the claim sued on was against the partnership, and not against the estate, could not be sustained, since the action had been narrowed by the pleadings to one against H.'s executors.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2.
Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; William R. Daingerfield, Judge.

Action by F. O. Frazier against S. G. Murphy and another, as executors of the estate of Charles Hanson, deceased. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

William H. Jordan, for appellants. Isidore B. Deckweiler, Jos. F. Geary, and Dockweiler & Carter, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, C. Plaintiff brought the action by a verified complaint filed September 8, 1896, against Hanson & Co., an alleged co-partnership, for a balance due for labor performed for said co-partnership from June 1, 1890, until October 1, 1894, under a written contract alleged to have been entered into May 13, 1890, with said Hanson & Co. The cause was tried by a jury, and plaintiff had the verdict, and judgment followed. Defendants appeal from the judgment on bill of exceptions.

The third amended complaint was filed August 23, 1897, and an answer was filed October 27, 1897, denying the alleged co-partnership and the alleged contract. The answer was verified by Charles Hanson. A separate defense was alleged, which need not be noticed. Charles Hanson died March 21, 1898. There appears in the transcript an amendment to the answer, marked "Filed in open court September 16, 1898," reciting: "Now comes Charles Hanson, and by leave of court amends his answer on file herein by striking out subdivision 1 of said answer, and in lieu thereof inserting the following: [Subdivision 1 was a denial that there ever existed such co-partnership.] Defendant alleges that the designation Hanson & Co. is the name under which Charles Hanson, during all the times mentioned in plaintiff's complaint, has transacted his business, and that said designation stands for, always has stood for, means, and always has meant, Charles Hanson, and no other person or persons; and the said Charles Hanson, responding to said designation and name, states that he is the person on whom a copy of the complaint and summons in this action was served, and that he makes answer thereto as and for the said Hanson & Co.; and he expressly denies that the said Hanson & Co., herein named as a defendant, is, or ever was, a co-partnership." Plaintiff's counsel filed in open court a written waiver of verification of the proposed amendment and waiver of notice of motion to file said amendment, adding: "But nothing herein contained shall be deemed or construed to be a consent upon the part of the plaintiff that said amendment may be allowed." No objection to this amendment, nor to the petition and order, next to be noticed, appears in the record, except as it may be inferred from the above, which we do not think can be construed to be an objection. On the same day—September 16th—defendants, Samuel G. Murphy and H. C. Cheseborough, executors of the last will of Charles Hanson, deceased, applied to the court to be substituted as defendants in the cause, alleging that Hanson died March 21, 1898, and also alleging their appointment as executors, and on the same day the court made an order that said executors "be, and they are hereby, substituted as defendants in the place and stead of Charles Hanson, sued as Hanson & Co." There is in the record no order allowing the amendment to the answer above stated. But, as it recites that it was filed by leave of court, and is found among the pleadings, and as the substitution of the executors, made by order of court the same day, appears to recognize the fact that the amendment was part of the pleadings, we must assume that it was treated as a pleading in the case, notwithstanding it was filed after Hanson's death. Defendants, Murphy and Cheseborough, asked and obtained leave of court to file a supplemental answer to the amended complaint, in which they allege the death of Hanson, and their appointment as executors. A demurrer to the proposed pleading was sustained. It is of no particular consequence that this supplemental answer cannot be considered, as it elsewhere appears that defendants were substituted on petition showing their appointment as executors and the death of Hanson, and these facts were proved at the trial without objection. In this condition of the pleadings the cause went to trial. To perfectly understand the question involved, it should, perhaps, be stated here that upon the coming in of the verdict, plaintiff, to make it conform to the pleadings, caused it to be put in the following form: "F. O. Frazier v. S. G. Murphy and H. C. Cheseborough, as executors of the last will and testament of Charles Hanson, deceased, substituted herein as parties defendants for and in place of Hanson & Co., defendants. We, the jury in the above-entitled cause, find a verdict in favor of plaintiff and against defendants," etc.; and the court entered judgment on the verdict against the executors, "payable in due course of administration."

1. Defendants objected to further proceedings, and to the taking of evidence in support of the action, on the ground that no claim had been presented to or filed with the executors for the indebtedness sued upon. The court overruled the objection, and defendants excepted. At the close of the trial, defendants objected to the verdict, and moved to set it aside on the ground that "it now appears to be a verdict entered against the executors of the estate of Charles Hanson, deceased, whereas the evidence shows there never has been any claim presented to those executors in the matter sued upon." The motion was denied, and defendants excepted. The complaint did not allege any presentation of the claim to the executors, and it was admitted at the trial that the claim sued upon had not been presented to them. Section 1500, Code Civ. Proc., provides as follows: "No holder of any claim against an estate shall maintain any action thereon, unless the claim is first presented to the executor or administrator, except in the following case: * * *." This case is not within the exception. Section 1502 of the same Code provides as follows: "If an action is pending against the decedent at the time of his death, the plaintiff must in like manner present his claim to the executor or administrator, for allowance or rejection, authenticated as in other cases; and no recovery shall be had in the action unless proof be made of the presentation required." Unless the case is in some way relieved from the operation of the statute, it was error to proceed with the trial after the executors were substituted for the only answering defendant, and it was error to enter a judgment against the executors in the absence of any proof that the claim had been presented to them. It was held in Derby v. Jackman, 89 Cal. 1, 26 Pac. 610, that, "although due presentation of the claim be not denied, still it must be proven." And it was held in Falkner v. Hendy, 107 Cal. 49, 40 Pac. 21, 386, that, while "proof of the presentation of the claim is not a fact essential to the validity of a judgment where no issue has been made upon that question, * * * the failure to make proof is ground for reversal when objection is made in the trial court, and the exception properly preserved." In some respects the Hendy Case is like the one at bar. The trial was in progress when Hendy died. His death was suggested, and it was ordered that the case be continued in the names of the executors; and at the first session after his death defendants objected to further proceeding with the trial or the taking of further testimony in the case, upon the ground that the claim upon which the action was based had not been presented for allowance to the executors of deceased. The evidence was being taken before a referee. The court said: "The referee should not have proceeded at all with the case until letters had been issued, and the representatives brought in. * * * Litigants must know, at their peril, of the death of an adversary. * * * Undoubtedly, respondent had the right to present his claim to the representatives of Hendy at any time within the period allowed by law for the presentation of claims, but he was not entitled to recover a judgment which will bind the estate of Hendy until such presentation had been made."

2. Respondent invokes the doctrine of estoppel, and in support of his contention claims that, as Hanson & Co., as a firm, dealt with plaintiff, neither plaintiff nor Hanson could dispute the firm relationship, and that the personal representatives of Hanson stand in no better position. Citing Wise v. Williams, 72 Cal. 546, 14 Pac. 204; Yancey v. Morton, 94 Cal. 558, 29 Pac. 1111. We cannot see that either the rule, or the reason of the rule, in these cases has any application here. The pleadings on which the parties went to trial showed, and it was proved without objection, that Hanson & Co. was only another name for Charles Hanson; that Hanson & Co. and Charles Hanson were one and the same person. When the court ordered the substitution of the executors "in the place and stead of Charles Hanson, sued as Hanson & Co.," they were not substituted as representatives of any partnership. The court could not make them representatives of a co-partnership, and deal with them as such, for they represented only Charles Hanson, deceased. If the action was to proceed on the theory that a partnership existed, the survivors of the partnership alone could close its affairs, and they should have been brought in as defendants, and the executors not made parties at all. If it was not a partnership, but merely another designation for Charles Hanson, then it was necessary to substitute his executors after his death, and the court very properly—we suppose on this latter assumption—made the order. In this attitude the case narrowed itself to an action against the executors representing Charles Hanson, deceased, and not representing in any sense a partnership. It so resulted, for the verdict was against the executors, and the judgment was against them with direction to pay the same in due course of administration. This was in direct violation of the statute, which required presentation of the claim before any judgment could be entered. Section 1502 "simply means that, when an action is pending against a decedent at the time of his death, the plaintiff therein is not relieved from the duty of presenting for allowance the claim upon which it is based, when the claim is of that character that he would have been required to make such presentation in order to preserve its validity as a claim against the estate if such action had not been brought in the lifetime of the decedent." Society v. Wackenreuder, 99 Cal. 503, 34 Pac. 219. Against the objection of defendants that it was in violation of subdivision 3, § 1880, Code Civ. Proc., plaintiff was permitted to testify to what Charles Hanson said and did prior to, at the time of, and after plaintiff's engagement to work for Hanson & Co., and after his work had ceased, as well as other facts occurring before the death of the deceased. The trial court held that plaintiff could testify to any facts occurring from the beginning of his employment to the close thereof, which would tend to establish an estoppel against the executors, now the defendants; and that, upon the estoppel being shown to the satisfaction of the jury, the jury could then consider the plaintiff's testimony on the merits, regardless of the Code provision, which declares: "The following persons cannot be witnesses: (3) Parties or assignees of parties to an action or proceeding, or persons in whose behalf an action or proceeding is prosecuted against an executor or administrator upon a claim or demand against the estate of a deceased person, as to any matter of fact occurring before the death of such deceased person." Code Civ. Proc. subd. 3, § 1880. The estoppel set up by plaintiff was that plaintiff was induced by Charles Hanson to engage with Hanson & Co., believing the latter to be a co-partnership, and that neither Charles Hanson nor his representatives can now be heard to dispute the fact; that the claim sued upon was not against the estate, but was against the partnership; and hence this was not "an action pending against the decedent at the time of his death," and section 1880, Code Civ. Proc., does not apply. If it was merely a question whether Hanson was a member of Hanson & Co., and plaintiff was seeking to reach the assets of the co-partnership of which Hanson had led plaintiff to believe he was a member, Hanson might be estopped from denying the partnership. But that is not the situation here. Plaintiff is endeavoring to reach the property of Hanson's estate in disregard of a positive statute requiring the presentation of the claim. Hanson may not have been entirely ingenuous when he first answered, and denied the partnership, without disclosing the real truth as to Hanson & Co. But the truth was made manifest when it was answered after his death that he was Hanson & Co., and his executors were substituted "for Charles Hanson, sued as Hanson & Co." Nothing then stood in the way but the presentation of the claim to the executors, as in Falkner v. Hendy was decided to be essential to recovery against the executors. We can see no reason why it was not done, unless it be that plaintiff feared it might create some impediment in the matter of making the proof under the statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 1880); and, if the theory of counsel was to avoid this statute by invoking the doctrine of estoppel, it only furnishes another reason for the view we have expressed, since the theory involved the violation not only of section 1880, but also sections 1500 and 1502. We see no reason for permitting an estoppel to be proved in violation of section 1880, any more than any other fact in the case. We do not believe the doctrine of estoppel can be invoked where, to give it effect, there must be entire disregard of statute law. Sections 1500 and 1502 admit of no exceptions. Wise v. Williams, supra, did not involve these provisions at all. In that case the note and mortgage were presented to the administratrix, and no question of presentation of the claim arose. To prove the estoppel, plaintiff was permitted to show the facts in the very way that the statute (section 1880) says may not be done, and this in order to evade the other statute (sections 1500 and 1502). In other words, one statute was violated in order to create a situation which would render the other statute inapplicable, or which would permit its violation. We do not believe the statute can be thus evaded. Even if plaintiff could show a state of facts constituting an estoppel in pais, as this was, and could thus qualify himself to testify as to the merits, he would still have confronting him the prohibitive provisions of sections 1500 and 1502. In no view of the matter can we see how the judgment can stand. This conclusion renders it unnecessary to determine whether plaintiff succeeded in proving an estoppel, which defendants, with some reason, contend they failed to do; and it is also unnecessary to pass upon the alleged errors in admitting evidence, to establish the estoppel, as to the conduct and acts and declarations of Hanson long after plaintiff had changed his position by engaging in Hanson's service. These and other questions become immaterial. It is advised that the judgment be reversed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; COOPER, C.

SANTA CRUZ ROCK-PAVEMENT CO. v. LYONS et al. (S. F. 2,066.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 29, 1901.)

MECHANICS' LIENS — STATUTE — REPEAL BY IMPLICATION — HUSBAND AND WIFE — HUSBAND'S CONTRACT — RATIFICATION — PROPERTY — OWNERSHIP — STATEMENT — SUFFICIENCY.

1. St. 1885, p. 143, provides that any person who, at the request of the reputed owner of any lot in any incorporated city, grades or otherwise improves the same, or the street or sidewalk in front or adjoining it, shall have a lien on the land for the work done and materials furnished; and was amended in 1887 (Code Civ. Proc. § 1191) by extending the lien in favor of any one who should construct any areas or vaults or cellars or rooms under a sidewalk, or make any improvements in connection therewith, at the request of a reputed owner. Held, that the contention that the amendment of 1887 repealed the law of 1885 by implication, and that, therefore, after the amendment was declared unconstitutional, there no longer existed any law authorizing a lien for paving and curbing a street, could not be sustained, since a repeal by implication cannot result from an unconstitutional provision in a statute.

2. Where a husband contracted for a street improvement in front of his wife's property, as her ostensible agent, and she had knowledge that he signed the contract, and took no steps to repudiate his authority, the evidence was sufficient to support a finding that the contract was made by the husband on behalf of his wife.

3. Code Civ. Proc. § 1187, provides that a notice for mechanic's lien shall contain the name and the nature of the title of the person who caused the improvement to be made. Held that, where there was evidence tending to show that plaintiff was justified in assuming that the property was owned by the husband, the fact that he alleged that the husband was the reputed owner, and that the wife claimed some interest in the property, will not defeat his right to a lien, though the property belonged to the wife.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; C. J. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Action by the Santa Cruz Rock-Pavement Company against Ellen Lyons and another. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

William H. Jordan, for appellants. Alex. G. Eells, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, C. Action to enforce a lien for street work claimed under the mechanic's lien law. Plaintiff had judgment, from which defendants appeal on bill of exceptions. This is the second appeal of the case. In the first appeal the judgment for plaintiff was affirmed in department (43 Pac. 599). On rehearing in bank (48 Pac. 1097, 59 Am. St. Rep. 174), the judgment was reversed, on the ground that section 1191, Code Civ. Proc., is unconstitutional, in so far as it attempts to impose a lien on land by virtue of an agreement on the part of one who is merely reputed to be the owner of such land.

1. Appellants claim that the effect of the decision is to leave no law in force creating a lien for the street work. The argument is that, by the amendment of 1887, the section as it read in 1885 was repealed, and, as the court holds it to be unconstitutional as it now reads, there is no longer any lien provided for or remedy given to enforce any lien. Section 1191, as amended in 1887 and as it now reads, is as follows: "Any person who, at the request of the reputed owner of any lot in any incorporated city or town, grades, fills in, or otherwise improves the same, or the street or sidewalk in front of or adjoining the same, or constructs any areas, or vaults, or cellars, or rooms, under said sidewalk, or makes any improvements in connection therewith, has a lien upon such lot for his work done and materials furnished." As the section stood in 1885 it read as above, omitting the words in italics.

It is unreasonable to suppose that the legislature intended to take the lien from the person who furnished labor or material where he contracts with the owner of a lot, and yet to give him a lien where he contracts with the reputed owner, who is not the real owner of a lot. Before we should hold that the statute was enacted with any such absurd intention some rule of construction must be pointed out that would compel it. It is altogether reasonable to believe that the legislature intended to retain the lien where the owner makes the contract, and to give also a lien where the reputed owner makes the contract. If the legislature failed in the latter object, it does not necessarily follow that the law, as it previously stood, was repealed. Repeals by implication are not favored, and it is a rule that no repeal by implication can result from a provision in a subsequent statute, when that provision is itself devoid of constitutional force. McAllister v. Hamlin, 83 Cal. 361, 23 Pac. 357; Orange Co. v. Harris, 97 Cal. 600, 32 Pac. 594. A still further rule was stated in People v. Sutter St. Ry. Co., 117 Cal. 604, 49 Pac. 736, as follows: "The portions of the amended section, which are copied without change, are not to be considered as repealed, and again re-enacted, but to have been the law all along." Pol. Code, § 325. In a recent case the rules of construction were quite fully stated, and the authorities cited. People v. Pacific Imp. Co. (opinion filed Nov. 8, 1900) 62 Pac. 739. It was said on the former appeal: "The owner of real property may, by his acts or conduct, be estopped from questioning the acts of a reputed owner of such property, and may be bound by the acts of such reputed owner; but, in the absence of the elements of an estoppel, he will not be bound by the unauthorized acts of one who is merely reputed to be the owner." 117 Cal. 212, 48 Pac. 1097, 59 Am. St. Rep. 174.

This could not be so if the section as it stood in 1885 was repealed by the amendment of 1887; for, if there is no law making a lien where the owner contracts for the work, nothing a reputed owner could do with the authorization of the owner would create the lien. The reputed owner could not create the lien if the owner could not. But appellants contend that the portion of the decision last above quoted is obiter, and cannot be taken as authority; and it is urged that what was said in Mack v. Jastro, 126 Cal. 130, 58 Pac. 372, applies here, namely: "It is not so much a repeal by implication as it is that, the legislature having made a new and complete expression of its will upon the subject, this last expression must prevail, and whatever is excluded therefrom must be ignored." We have examined the case of Mack v. Jastro, supra, and the cases cited in the opinion. They are all instances where the rule as to repeals by implication could not by any possibility be applied because the legislative intent was unmistakably shown to be that the later law should supersede the former law, in which case it is true that it is not a question of repeal by implication, but it is a question of enforcing the will of the legislature last expressed on the very same subject. Our mechanic's lien law was first enacted in 1868 (Laws 1867-68, p. 589). Section 9 of that act gave the lien here contended for, and the section was carried into the Code of Civil Procedure upon its adoption in 1872, and became section 1184. It so remained unchanged until 1885 (St. 1885, p. 143), when it became section 1191 of the Code, and was amended by adding the words "or sidewalk" after the word "street." By the act of 1887, four sections of the Code relating to mechanics' liens, including section 1191, were amended, leaving the other sections untouched. There has been no general revision of the mechanic's lien law since the adoption of the Codes, but changes have been made by amendments and modifications of, and additions to, the various sections. The law deals with the owner of the land in most instances, but in some cases it is provided that the owner and any person having an interest in the land shall be bound where the improvement is made with his knowledge, unless he shall within a certain time give the notice required by statute (section 1192); but at no time has the law been that the owner could not make the contract out of which a lien would arise. We cannot believe that the legislature intended to repeal the law as it has stood for a third of a century, and deprive laborers and material men of a lien heretofore given, and in such entire harmony with the general purpose of the law and of the constitution of the state. No such repeal has been made except it be by implication, and we do not think that any such consequence has resulted from the amendment in question.

2. It is contended that the evidence is insufficient to establish the alleged agency of defendant J. M. Lyons in acting for his co-defendant wife, Ellen Lyons. The court found that the lot in question belonged to Mrs. Lyons as her separate property, but that her husband individually was the reputed owner thereof. The court also found "that, while said James M. Lyons was so the reputed owner of said lot of land, he requested said plaintiff to do the work hereinafter named, and he, both in his own individual behalf, and as the ostensible agent of his wife, Ellen, and in her behalf, though in his own name, entered into a written contract with the plaintiff for the performance of the same," etc. Again it is found "that said defendant Ellen Lyons had full knowledge of said contract, and of the performance of said work, and that she did not within three days after having obtained knowledge thereof, nor at all, give notice that she would not be responsible for the same, by posting notice * * * or at all." As the case was presented on the first appeal, and as first decided, the evidence went in on the theory that the lien would hold if the contract was made by the reputed owner. 43 Pac. 599. The question of agency was not then considered. At the last trial much additional evidence was taken, and particularly to show that the husband was acting as the agent, actual or ostensible, of his wife. Upon this point there is a conflict in the evidence. The testimony of both husband and wife is that the husband acted without any direct authority from his wife. The evidence adduced on behalf of plaintiff is largely circumstantial, although there is some evidence quite directly to the point that the husband had authority from his wife, and the husband testified that he told her he had signed the contract for the work not long after the work was started, and it is not pretended that she took any steps to disavow his act or to disclaim personal liability for the work. The court held in the former appeal that the notice required to be given by the owner under section 1192 did not apply to a case arising under section 1191, but was limited to cases arising under section 1183. Still the fact that Mrs. Lyons had notice that the work was going on under a contract made by her husband, and made no objection to it, would bear upon the question of agency and estoppel. There is, we think, sufficient evidence to support the finding that the contract was made on behalf of Mrs. Lyons, and by her husband as her agent, ostensible or actual.

3. It is contended that the evidence fails to support the allegation in the notice of lien as to reputed ownership. The statement was: "The said Ellen Lyons had full knowledge of the signing of said contract, and agreed to the same being done, and claims some rights in the property, but at all the times herein mentioned said James M. Lyons was, and now is, reputed to be owner of said lot of land." There is evidence tending to show that plaintiff was justified in assuming that Mr. Lyons was the reputed owner, and plaintiff states, also, that Mrs. Lyons claimed some rights in the property. If plaintiff made any mistake in thus stating the ownership, it was an honest one, and in no sense was it fraudulently made, or made for the purpose of deceiving any person, and the mistake could not prejudice his right to a lien. There was a substantial compliance with the requirements of section 1187. It has been held here that, if the lienholder in good faith "gives the name of the reputed owner, he shall not lose his lien if he shall afterwards ascertain that some other person was the owner." Corbett v. Chambers, 109 Cal. 178, 41 Pac. 873.

4. Appellants call attention to several alleged errors of law committed by the trial court relating to the admission of evidence offered by plaintiff. We are not informed by the brief of the grounds of objection, further than as they appear in the transcript when the objections were made. We have examined the transcript at the points indicated, and find no ruling that, in our judgment, could have prejudiced defendants' case. The general demurrer to the complaint is urged on the ground principally that there is now no law authorizing the lien. The view already expressed disposes of that question. We advise that the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: GRAY, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is affirmed.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA LUMBER CO. v. JONES et al. (L. A. 813.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 14, 1901.)
MECHANICS' LIENS—PAYMENT OF CONTRACT PRICE—RETENTION OF PORTION—AMOUNT OF CONTRACT—STATUTES.

1. Code Civ. Proc. § 1184, relative to mechanics' liens, and providing that no part of the contract price shall, by the terms of any such contract, be payable before commencement of the work, but shall be paid in installments, and that when a price is not so paid the materials furnished shall be deemed to have been furnished at the special instance of the owner, has no application to a case where the contract price is less than $1,000; and hence where the owner, under such a contract, has paid an amount not yet due to the contractor, he is not liable to material men as on a premature payment.

2. Code Civ. Proc. § 1201, provides that it shall not be competent for the owner and contractor, or either of them, by any terms of their contract or otherwise, to waive, affect, or impair the claims and liens of other persons, whether with or without notice, except by their written consent, and that any term of the contract to such effect shall be null and void. Held, that where there was a verbal contract for the construction of a building for less than $1,000, and the material man gave no notice of his contract with the contractor until after an abandonment of the work by the contractor, when nothing remained in the owner's hands except what was required to complete the building, the statute had no application.

3. That the owner of a building voluntarily paid a hardware bill arising in the course of the construction of a building,—the bill being in excess of the contract price of the building,—did not prejudice a material man furnishing materials to the contractor.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; D. K. Trask, Judge.

Proceedings for the enforcement of a mechanic's lien by the Southern California Lumber Company against E. W. Jones and another. From a judgment foreclosing the lien, defendants appeal. Reversed.

F. W. Burnett, for appellants. Borden & Carhart, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. This appeal is from a judgment against appellants foreclosing a lien for materials furnished for the construction of a building. C. A. Conant, the contractor, and certain fictitious persons were made defendants, but no judgment was taken against them. Mrs. E. S. Jones is the owner of the lot upon which the house was built, and E. W. Jones is her husband, and acted as her agent. On August 1, 1898, appellants entered into a contract with Conant for the erection of the house, by which Conant agreed to furnish the materials and labor and erect it for the sum of $837, and plaintiff agreed with Conant to furnish, and did furnish, lumber therefor of the value of $470.65, of which sum $389.05 remained unpaid. This lumber was furnished between August 6th and September 15, 1898. The contract between appellants and Conant was in writing, and provided that the contract price should be paid in installments, as follows: "When lumber is on the lot and frame is up, ready for the roof, $200; when roof is on and shingled, $200; when outside is finished, $200; when building is completed, $237.00,"—payments to be made on certificate of the architect. On September 16th Conant abandoned the work in an incomplete condition, and work was not resumed for more than 30 days. The court found that prior to September 16th there were paid to Conant three installments, of $200 each, in accordance with the terms of the contract, and that $237 remained unpaid, and that it would cost $89.70 to complete the building. The court also found that on September 27th respondent gave written notice to appellants that it had furnished said lumber, and the value thereof, and, as a conclusion of law, that the amount of the contract price applicable to respondent's lien is $147.30, and gave judgment for that sum, with an attorney's fee of $50, and costs.

It was shown, without controversy, that there was paid to Conant on September 16, 1898,—$150 in addition to the $600 found by the court to have been paid; but the court ruled that said $150 was paid prematurely, as it was not due, under the contract, until the building was completed, and should therefore be treated as money in the owner's hands, and applicable to plaintiff's claim. In this ruling the court erred. If Conant had completed the building, he would have been entitled to $237,—the final payment. It was found that it would require $89.70 to complete the building. This amount, added to the payment of $150 claimed to have been prematurely made, exceeds the contract price by $2.70. In the case of Denison v. Burrell, 119 Cal. 180, 182, 51 Pac. 1, it is said: "The contract price being less than one thousand dollars, the provisions of section 1184 of the Code of Civil Procedure relative to the mode and time of payment, and the withholding of a percentage of the contract price, are not applicable. It was permissible for the parties to contract for the payment of the whole amount to the contractor before the commencement of the work, or, as was done in this case, to contract that payment should not be made until the whole building was completed" (citing Lumber Co. v. Cummings, 86 Cal. 22, 24 Pac. 814); and it was held that the plaintiff's lien could not be for an amount greater than the sum in defendant's hands, due and unpaid to the contractor under the contract at the time of abandonment.

In the case at bar there was nothing due or unpaid to the contractor at the time he abandoned the work. The check for $150 left in the hands of the owner $87 of the contract price, the whole of which was required to complete the building. It is contended, however, that the payment of $150 was prematurely made, and therefore that sum must be deemed to be still in the hands of the owner, and applicable to the payment of the plaintiff's claim. But this contention cannot be sustained. The contract price was less than $1,000, and in such case the requirements of section 1184, Code Civ. Proc., relating to contracts where the amount exceeds $1,000, do not apply. In that case no part of the contract price is permitted to be paid before the commencement of the work, and at least 25 per cent. of it must be retained for a specified time after completion, and the contract must be recorded. These requirements are for the benefit of third parties who furnish labor or materials. But, where the contract price is less than $1,000, the contract may be verbal. If written, it need not be recorded, and the whole of the contract price may be paid in advance of the commencement of the work, or upon completion, or in installments, as the parties may agree. In such case the payment of installments is subject to change by the agreement of the owner and contractor, both as to time and amount, as in the case of private contracts relating to other matters. If it were otherwise,—if the provisions as to the time and amount of payments, and the penalty imposed upon the owner for having anticipated payments, were intended to apply to contracts where the price was less than $1,000,—we may safely assume that the statute would have required them to be in writing and recorded, or, in other words, would have made no distinction based upon the amount of the contract price. Section 1201, Code Civ. Proc., has no application to this case. The contract was not in violation of the statute, and the plaintiff had no lien to be affected. Whether plaintiff would have acquired a lien if it had given notice of its contract with Conant to furnish lumber while any part of the contract price to which the contractor was entitled remained unpaid, need not be considered, as notice was not given until after the abandonment of the work, when nothing remained in the owner's hand, except what was required to complete the building. The payment by the defendant of the hardware bill was voluntary, and, being in excess of the contract price of the building, did not prejudice the plaintiff. The judgment should be reversed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, C.; GRAY, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is reversed.

LOFTUS v. DEHAIL et al. (L. A. 892.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 8, 1901.)

NEGLIGENCE — INJURIES — UNGUARDED CELLAR — PLACE ATTRACTIVE TO CHILDREN — ABILITY TO APPRECIATE DANGER—PROXIMATE CAUSE.

1. Where defendants owned an unfenced city lot, from which a house had been removed, leaving a cellar 2 to 6 feet deep, 30 and 50 feet, respectively, from two adjacent streets, and plaintiff, who was a child of 7, was injured by being pushed into the cellar while playing near, it was not peculiarly attractive to children and necessarily dangerous, so as to render defendants liable for plaintiff's injuries.

2. Where plaintiff, who was a child 7 years old, was injured by being pushed into a cellar, and testified that she knew it would hurt her if she jumped in, a finding that she was of such tender years as not to appreciate the danger was not supported by the evidence.

3. Where plaintiff was injured by being pushed into an unguarded cellar by her 4 year old brother, his act was the proximate cause of the injury, and not the owner's failure to fence, and hence the owner was not liable therefor.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; D. K. Trask, Judge.

Action by Bessie May Loftus, by Mollie Loftus, her guardian ad litem, against Isaac F. Dehail and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Barnwell & Newby and Knight & Jones, for appellants. J. L. Murphy, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. This action was brought to recover damages for injuries sustained by the plaintiff, an infant 7 years of age, from falling into a cellar of defendants situated on a vacant lot in the city of Los Angeles. The cause was tried without a jury, and upon the findings the court gave judgment in favor of plaintiff. Defendants moved for judgment upon the findings. Their motion was denied. So, also, was their motion for a new trial. From the judgment and from these orders of the court defendants appeal.

From the undisputed facts and from the findings it appears that the defendants were the owners of a lot on the corner of Second and San Pedro streets, in a populous and thickly-settled quarter of the city of Los Angeles. Upon the lot had stood a house, which had been removed, leaving upon the premises a cellar, partially filled with bricks, cans, and other debris, varying in depth from 2.3 feet to 6.3 feet, having a length of about 17 feet and a width of about 14 feet. The lot was upon a level with the sidewalk, was open and unfenced on the San Pedro street front, and partially open on the Second street front. The cellar was located at a distance of from 22 to 30 feet from Second street, and about 56 feet from San Pedro street. For about three weeks prior to the accident the premises had remained in this open and unguarded condition. The plaintiff lived in the neighborhood of the lot, and upon the day of the accident was engaged, with other children, in playing around the cellar, and while so engaged was, by her little brother, Teddy Loftus, aged 4 years, pushed into the cellar, falling a distance of about 6 feet, sustaining the injuries complained of. It is further found that at the time of the injury the plaintiff was of such tender years and immature judgment as to be incapable of knowing and comprehending the danger to which she was exposed in playing about the excavation, and that her little brother, who, in a fit of anger, had pushed her into the cellar, was also incapable of knowing and comprehending the danger to which he exposed his sister in so pushing her into the excavation. The parents are found to have been guilty of no contributory negligence in the matter. The defendants are found to have been guilty of negligence in failing properly to guard and inclose the cellar. A judgment of $350 was awarded plaintiff.

It is sought by respondent to bring this cause of action within the rule of the Turntable Cases (Barrett v. Railroad Co., 91 Cal. 296, 27 Pac. 666); but it is to be remembered, in the first place, that the Turntable Cases are themselves exceptions to the general rule. It is true that in the discussion of those cases the attractiveness of the object to children is considered and discussed, but it by no means follows that, because a thing is or may be attractive to children, the owner must guard and protect it against their trespasses upon and unlawful dealings with it. The gist of the decision in the Turntable Cases is pointed out by Chief Justice Beatty in his concurring opinion in Peters v. Bowman, 115 Cal. 345, 47 Pac. 113, 598. It lies not alone in the fact that it was a danger especially created by the act of the owner, but it was a danger which could be removed, without destroying or impairing the usefulness of the machine, by a simple lock. To what was there said it may be added that the turntable might well be considered peculiarly attractive to children,—a movable machine in the nature of a merry-go-round; but at the same time, the children being ignorant of the dangers and injury to which they were exposed in revolving it, the unprotected machine itself became a trap for them; and these cases may therefore be properly classed with those which hold the owner responsible for that reason. Such was the case of Malloy v. Society (Cal.) 21 Pac. 525. That action came before this court upon the demurrer to the sufficiency of the complaint. It is true that damages were there sought for the death of an infant, occasioned by falling into a cesspool; but the complaint would have been sufficient to have warranted a recovery had an adult been killed under the same circumstances; for the complaint showed a veritable trap,—a cesspool open and unguarded, yet with its surface covered with a layer of deceptive earth to a level with the adjacent land. Into such a trap any one, adult or child, might have walked. But it by no means follows, as has been said, that anything or everything which a jury may find or a court may determine to be attractive as a playground or plaything for children casts a responsibility of guard and care upon the owner of that thing. Moving street cars and moving vehicles upon the street are irresistibly attractive to many children, and thousands daily imperil their lives by climbing on and off of them while in motion. Venture-some boys and even girls make playgrounds of unfinished buildings, climb perilous heights, and scamper over insecure boards and rafters. If an owner became responsible merely because children were attracted, it would burden the ownership of property with a most preposterous and unbearable weight. The case at bar, therefore, is not referable to that class of cases, like the Turntable Cases, where the owner is held responsible for negligently exposing dangerous machinery attractive to children. And no more can it be referred to the other class of cases, likewise forming an exception to the general rule, which permit a recovery where a dangerous excavation has been constructed and negligently maintained so near a public highway that one lawfully using the highway has been injured thereby; for here it appears not only that no one in the use of the highway was injured, but that no one in use of the highway could have been injured, since the excavation was some 30 feet from one street, and more than 50 feet from the other.

Nor, finally, is the case referable to the last exception to the general rule, where one upon the premises of another by invitation or license is injured by their neglect and unsafe condition. The children were there neither by license nor by permission. The only evidence at all upon this question is that by I. F. Dehail, one of the defendants, to the effect that he saw children playing upon the lot upon one occasion, and warned them off, because they were breaking his bricks and wheelbarrow. No further elaboration upon this question is necessary. It has recently received the detailed consideration of this court in Peters v. Bowman, 115 Cal. 345, 47 Pac. 113, 598.

But there is still another reason why in this particular case the findings, and consequently the judgment, cannot be upheld. Where such an action as this lies at all, it can be successful only upon a showing that the infant was of such tender years as not to appreciate the danger to which it was exposed. Such was the finding of the court in this case, but the evidence utterly fails to support it. The child herself shows by her testimony an appreciation of the danger, and says that she knew that it would hurt her to jump from a high point into the cellar. In fact, she did not jump at all. She was pushed in, in a fit of temper, by her younger brother. His act was the proximate cause of the injury; and while he, because of his tender years, would not be legally responsible therefor, the situation of the injured child, who shows that she appreciated the danger to which she was exposed, was no different from what would have been the position of an adult who, under similar circumstances, had been thrust over the embankment. In this respect, also, is the case to be distinguished from the Turntable Cases, where several children are engaged in moving the turntable, all being equally ignorant of their danger, and one is injured; for in the present instance it was not in her play, and as part of her play, and in ignorance of the danger of her play, that she was injured. She was injured by the violence of her little brother in a matter apart. For these reasons, the judgment and orders are reversed, and the court is directed to enter judgment for the defendants upon the findings.

PAYMENT—PLEDGE—CORPORATION DEBT—ACCEPTANCE OF PRINCIPAL—DEATH OF SURETY—INTEREST.

1. A stockholder of a corporation, liable to a bank as surety for a corporate debt, died, and the bank filed a claim against his estate, in which no demand was made for interest. Thereafter the executor paid the amount which the bank stated as the principal and interest, and the notes were surrendered. Held, under Civ. Code, § 3290, providing that the acceptance of the whole principal as such waives all claim to interest, that such payment relieved the estate from a further claim for interest.

2. Under Civ. Code, §§ 2986, 2987, 2992, defining a pledge as a deposit of personal property as security, and providing that every contract by which personal property is transferred as security shall be deemed a pledge, and authorizing property to be pledged for a debt of another, an assignment of a mortgage to a bank by a stockholder of a corporation to secure a corporate debt is a pledge, and he occupies the position of surety for the corporation.

3. A guaranty for future advances ceases when the guarantor dies and the guarantee has notice of his death.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. V. Coffey, Judge.

Action by Jennie A. Valentine, as executrix of the last will of T. B. Valentine, deceased, and others, against the Donohue-Kelly Banking Company, to recover a deposit. From a judgment for plaintiffs, and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Philip G. Galpin, for appellant. Lindley & Eickhoff, Lloyd & Wood, and A. Heyneman, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This appeal is by the defendant corporation from the judgment and an order denying its motion for a new trial. The facts are substantially as follows: Prior to January 24, 1896, a certain co-partnership existed under the name and style of Francis & Valentine. T. B. Valentine, plaintiff's tes-tate, was at all times during its existence a member of said firm. The said co-partnership did its banking business with defendant. Prior to March, 1896, the said co-partnership became indebted to defendant upon seven promissory notes aggregating $33,975.85, which notes were executed by the said co-partnership to said T. B. Valentine, and by him indorsed and transferred to defendant. On February 8, 1896, the said Valentine assigned to defendant a certain note and mortgage made to him by the Belvedere Land Company, of the value of $50,000, as security for the payment of all of said promissory notes, of all sums due by said co-partnership to defendant, and of all advances that might thereafter be made by said defendant to said firm. On January 24, 1896, the members of the said co-partnership incorporated under the corporate name of Francis-Valentine Company; the corporation becoming the successor in business of the former co-partnership. The account current of the co-partnership with defendant was closed, and on March 2, 1896, the corporation, Francis-Valentine Company, opened an account with defendant, depositing on said date to its credit $1,220. At the time of so opening said account with the defendant by the corporation, Francis-Valentine Company, the said T. B. Valentine made a new agreement with defendant that the $50,000 note and mortgage should continue to be held by defendant as security for the said seven notes, and also for all indebtedness and loans then existing, and for all future advances that might be made by defendant to said Francis-Valentine Company. The transactions by defendant with the co-partnership may therefore be considered eliminated from the case, and are only stated for the purpose of clearly showing the circumstances leading up to the contract by which the $50,000 mortgage was transferred and delivered to defendant by said Valentine in his lifetime. After March 2, 1896, the said Francis-Valentine Company continued its account current with defendant, in which account the monthly interest on the seven notes was charged to the Francis-Valentine Company. The interest upon the said notes was payable monthly, and during the existence of the co-partnership, and before the incorporation of the Francis-Valentine Company, it had been charged by defendant to the co-partnership. In fact, the same arrangement continued, as to the security, notes, advances, and overdrafts, after the incorporation of the Francis-Valentine Company as before, except the account was kept with the new corporation, instead of the former co-partnership. No change had been made, as to the arrangements herein narrated, up to October 27, 1896, at which time Valentine died. The defendant received knowledge of the death of Valentine on the same day. At the time Valentine died, the Francis-Valentine Company had a credit of $201.07 in its account current with defendant. After the death of Valentine, defendant presented a claim against his estate for the principal of the seven notes, in which claim no interest was included. It is therefore evident that at the time of the death of Valentine the interest upon the notes had been fully paid.

After Valentine died the Francis-Valentine Company continued its account current with defendant, in which account the defendant continued to charge the monthly interest upon the notes as it had done during the lifetime of Valentine. This continued until November 23, 1897, at which time the executors of the Valentine estate sold the note and mortgage for $50,000. The defendant at the time of the said sale agreed with the representatives of Valentine's estate to deliver up the note and mortgage upon condition that the $50,000 should be deposited with defendant in lieu of the mortgage, to be held by defendant as security to the same, and no greater, extent than the mortgage had been held. The money was accordingly deposited with defendant in accordance with the agreement, and a new account opened in the name of the estate of Valentine, to which account the $50,000 was credited. The plaintiffs then informed defendant that they desired to pay the said notes, and asked defendant how much money was required. Defendant gave them a written memorandum as follows:

Principal	$30,835 10
	$30,983 02

The item of interest was for 23 days in November, the interest up to November 1st having been charged to the Francis-Valentine Company in its account with defendant. The plaintiffs then gave defendant a check for said sum of $30,983.02 against the new account, which check was accepted by defendant, and the notes delivered up and canceled. Plaintiffs drew further checks against the $50,000, leaving finally a balance of $7,459.78 to their credit on the deposit account, which is the amount in controversy here, and for which plaintiffs recovered judgment. The defendant, although having charged this amount to the Francis-Valentine Company in its current account, claims that the said amount is the amount of interest that the notes earned after they were sold to defendant, including interest earned after the death of Valentine as well as before. There is no question as to the facts that the interest is charged to and is due defendant by the Francis-Valentine Company, and that the notes were surrendered up and canceled. We are therefore clearly of the opinion that the notes have been fully paid. This was manifestly the intention of all the parties, as shown by their conduct. The fact that the notes were surrendered up and canceled upon payment of what defendant stated to be the balance due for principal and interest is almost a conclusive circumstance, in the absence of fraud or mistake. It is provided in section 3290, Civ. Code, that "accepting payment of the whole principal, as such, waives all claim to interest." This section is broad in its language, and applies to express contracts. City of Los Angeles v. City Bank, 100 Cal. 22, 34 Pac. 510.

The remaining question, then, is as to whether or not the estate of Valentine is responsible for the overdraft of the Francis-Valentine Company that accrued after the death of Valentine. It is claimed by both plaintiff and defendant—and we think correctly—that the $50,000 mortgage which was deposited and assigned to defendant was a pledge. It was a deposit of personal property by way of security, and as such comes within the definition of a pledge as laid down in Civ. Code, §§ 2986, 2987, 2992. By the deposit of the mortgage, Valentine became a surety for the Francis-Valentine Company. A surety is defined to be one "who at the request of another and for the purpose of securing to him a benefit, becomes responsible for the performance by the latter of some act in favor of a third person or hypothecates property as security therefor." When Valentine hypothecated the note and mortgage as security for the notes and for future advances, he became a surety for the Francis-Valentine Company, under the definition given in the above section. Not only this, but the note and mortgage occupied the position of surety for said company to defendant. It is said in Brandt, Sur. (2d Ed.) § 34: "When property of any kind is mortgaged or pledged by the owner to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another person, such property occupies the position of a surety or guarantor; and anything which would discharge an individual surety or guarantor who was personally liable will, under similar circumstances, discharge such property. This rule is applicable to every variety of circumstances." See cases cited in note 4, said section. The guaranty for future advances ceased when Valentine died and defendant had notice of his death. He could at any time during life have terminated the guaranty as to future advances by giving notice. His death, with knowledge thereof, was notice. At his death his property vested in others, subject to all valid liens thereon. In case of a continuing guaranty, each advance made by the guarantee constituted a fresh consideration, and, when made, an irrevocable promise on the part of the living guarantor. A dead guarantor can make no promise. The guarantee, after knowledge of the death of the guarantor, cannot be held to have made the advance at the request of a dead man. Jordan v. Dobbins, 122 Mass. 170, 23 Am. Rep. 305; Hyland v. Habich, 150 Mass. 112, 22 N. E. 765, 6 L. R. A. 383; Gay v. Ward, 67 Conn. 156, 34 Atl. 1025, 32 L. R. A. 818; Brandt, Sur. (2d Ed.) § 134. In this case the note and mortgage were security to defendant for the amount of indebtedness due to it from the Francis-Valentine Company at the time of the death of Valentine, and for all interest that would have accrued upon the notes, according to their terms, after Valentine's death, but the interest was paid by being charged in the running account of the company. It was so regarded by defendant, and we must so regard it. The judgment and order are affirmed.

BANK OF NATIONAL CITY v. JOHNSTON.

INSOLVENT BANKS — DIRECTORS — ASSESSMENTS ON STOCK—RESOLUTIONS—VALIDITY—ADJOURNED MEETINGS.

1. A stock assessment levied, but not collected, and not yet due, when the adjudication of insolvency was made under the bank commissioners' act, was set aside by the adjudication; and the levy cannot be enforced, as a call for the payment of unpaid subscriptions, by the bank commissioners, since the commissioners had no such authority, nor could the directors act as trustees under the statute before such adjudication was made.

2. Where all of the directors of a corporation were present at a meeting, which was adjourned, but there was nothing to show that all the directors were present at the first meeting, when that meeting adjourned, and no other notice of the second meeting was given, and all were not present at the adjourned meeting, a resolution passed at the latter meeting to proceed by action for the collection of an assessment on stock, which was business which could not have been lawfully transacted at the former meeting, was invalid.

McFarland and Van Dyke, JJ., dissenting in part.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county.

Action by the Bank of National City against S. S. Johnston to recover the amount of an assessment on shares of stock in a corporation. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Haynes & Ward, for appellant. G. H. P. Shaw, for respondent.

TEMPLE, J. After the bank commissioners, acting under the authority given them by section 11 of the banking act, as amended in 1895 (St. 1895, p. 175), had seized and taken into possession all of the assets of the bank, and had reported the affair to the attorney general, and he had commenced a suit to enjoin the transaction of further business, but before the court had acted in reference to the matter, the directors adopted a resolution levying an assessment for the purpose of paying the debts of the corporation. The resolution recites that it was done at the request of the bank commissioners. There is a general recital in the complaint that the bank was then insolvent. The resolution was made September 8th, and the assessment would become delinquent October 30th following. Before that time, however, on October 1st, the court, in the suit commenced by the attorney general, entered its judgment declaring the corporation insolvent, and enjoined and restrained the corporation and its directors from the transaction of any further business except for the purposes of liquidation, and ordered the property of the corporation to be surrendered to the directors for the purpose of liquidation under the banking act. Upon the rendition of this judgment, the corporate powers of the bank were suspended. It is conceded by appellant's attorney that this ended all power to collect the assessment by sale of the stock, under the statute. There was in fact no stock to sell. As a going concern, the corporation was ended. The former stockholders could never again have any control of the corporation. A liability rested upon them which made them interested in the proceedings, but they had nothing of value to sell. Nor are the directors to whom the corporate assets had been surrendered any longer competent to perform corporate acts except in liquidation. And in the exercise of these powers they are trustees for the creditors, and for the stockholders, for the purpose of liquidation only. This position is fully explained in the late case of Argus v. Bank (S. F. 2,232; filed May 29, 1901) 65 Pac. 307. It is there said: "Thus the directors, while they remain nominally officers of the bank, become, by the provisions of the statute, trustees for the creditors, and, as subordinate agents of the commissioners, officers of the law. Their functions as directors of the bank are left to them, but these are subordinate to those impressed upon them as statutory trustees, and, for all purposes of the act, they are to be regarded as acting in their statutory capacity. The case is therefore in effect the same as though the act had provided for the appointment of other trustees; that is to say, the directors, who, to all practical intents and purposes, are to be regarded as trustees, and their official relation to the corporation regarded, for all the purposes of the act, as immaterial." The court then proceeded to discuss the effect of the injunction. "The prohibition implies, ex vi termini, either a total suspension of the functions and powers of the corporation, or, what amounts to the same thing, a suspension of all their powers except those to be exercised by the directors in the execution of their trust." It would necessarily follow, I think, that an assessment levied, but not collected, and not yet due when the adjudication of insolvency was made, was set aside by the adjudication. The statute is in the nature of a special insolvency act, and the functions of the directors, acting as liquidators under the act, are quite analogous to those of assignees in insolvency. The business of the corporation, as such, including the powers to levy and collect assessments, is gone.

But it is said the levy was practically made by the bank commissioners, and was really a call for the payment of unpaid subscriptions upon those who had subscribed for stock. The bank commissioners had no such authority, nor could the directors act as trustees under the statute before the judgment of the superior court. The unpaid subscriptions constitute an equitable fund for the security of the creditors of the corporation. I have no doubt but that in some form the liquidators may, in case of necessity, resort to this fund. But this levy of an assessment is not an attempt to do that, and there are reasons, which it is not necessary or proper now to discuss, why this mode, at this stage of the proceedings, cannot be adopted for that purpose.

But, if it be conceded that the mode adopted was a proper mode in which to resort to the unpaid subscriptions, as an equitable fund for securing the creditors of the corporation, and also that the assessment levied at the time and in the mode described was valid, and continued in force, notwithstanding the adjudication in insolvency, and also that the so-called directors, although really only trustees under the statute, could perform the corporate act of directing the assessment to be collected by suit rather than by sale of the stock, still it is clear to my mind that no valid resolution to that effect was passed. In discussing this matter, I shall assume that the meeting of the directors, on the 27th of October, was a valid special meeting, and that, all being there present, they could have considered any matter which could have been considered if it had been a stated meeting provided for in the by-laws. This position is not conceded by the counsel for the respondent, but, for the purpose of the argument, I will assume the law to be so. At the meeting of the 27th the directors could not have passed the resolution directing the collection of the assessment by suit, for the sufficient reason that it was not then delinquent, and under the statute such resolution could not be passed until after the assessment had become delinquent. Although all were present at the meeting which was adjourned, they were not all present at the meeting at which the resolution was passed. As this was business which was not and could not have been before the meeting which was adjourned, it could not, therefore, have been lawfully transacted at the subsequent meeting, at least unless at the final meeting all the directors were present. This proposition, without the special concession made by me, that the proceedings might be sustained if all the directors were present, has been often expressly declared, and is, I think, supported by an unbroken and unvarying line of decisions from the first appearance of corporate law. 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 287; Green's Brice, Ultra Vires (2d Am. Ed.) p. 441; Redf. R. R. (6th Ed.) p. 70; Warner v. Mower, 11 Vt. 385; 1 Beach, Corp. § 294; Granger v. Grubb, 7 Phila. 350; Scadding v. Lorant, 3 H. L. Cas. 418. These authorities are not in form controverted, but it is said: "The adjournment by all of the directors from October 27th to October 31st was an agreement between them to meet on that day, and dispense with the requirement of any further notice." Whitehead v. Rubber Co., 52 N. J. Eq. 84, 27 Atl. 897, is the only authority cited upon this proposition. The assumption that the adjournment was by all the directors on the 27th of October is derived solely and only from the fact that all attended the meeting of the 27th, and that meeting adjourned. An attempt was made at the trial to prove what was said about the adjournment at the time by the directors, but the evidence was ruled out. The adjournment was therefore only an adjournment, and, if the rule be good, the question to which I have just cited authorities would never have had an existence. Every adjournment would imply such agreement, at least when at the meeting adjourning all had attended. And, while all the directors may have attended the meeting of the 27th, it would not follow that all were present at the precise point when that meeting had adjourned, or consented to the adjournment.

The case cited is not an authority. The remark quoted was confessedly obiter, and it plainly appears by the context that the vice chancellor limited the implication that the proceedings of the adjourned meeting, under the circumstances, would be valid as to the particular business which was before the directors when they adjourned. After stating that the meeting under consideration was not an adjourned meeting, the judge proceeds: "This being so, and conceding that when a meeting is properly called for a specific purpose that it may be adjourned from time to time for the further consideration of the matter so presented, this last meeting of the board of directors in this case was without authority, and the argument made cannot be upheld. If all the directors had been present at any meeting, and had agreed to an adjournment for the purpose of consideration of the question now before us, then the result of their deliberations would have been sustained." Here the vice chancellor very plainly states that the question was not before him, for the reason that the meeting then in question was not an adjourned meeting, and also that if it had been, and all the directors had agreed to the adjournment for the consideration of the special matter already before the board, and which it would have transacted at the meeting which was adjourned, it could only have transacted that business which it already had in hand. The judgment and order are affirmed.

We concur: BEATTY, C. J.; GAROUTTE, J.; HENSHAW, J.

McFARLAND and VAN DYKE, JJ. We concur in the judgment of affirmance on the ground first discussed in the opinion of Mr. Justice TEMPLE; that is, on the ground that the directors had no authority to enforce the assessment after the adjudication in insolvency, and the injunction against the transaction of further business, except for the purposes of liquidation. It should be said, however, that this point was very obscurely made by respondent in the court below and in his briefs here, and it is not surprising that it was not discussed in the opinion delivered in department. But we dissent from the view that the resolution in question was not regularly and legally passed, if there had been power in the directors to pass such a resolution at all. On that subject we concur in the opinion delivered in department.

DEEDS—CONSIDERATION—CONDITIONS—CONTRACTS—LIEN—QUIETING TITLE.

Where an interest in a mining claim was conveyed to plaintiff in consideration of an agreement that he should work the mine, and give the grantor one-third of the minerals obtained, plaintiff and the grantee of a part of his interest cannot have their titles quieted as against the grantor and his grantee, since plaintiff and his grantee took and held their interests subject to the contract.

In bank. On rehearing. Modified.

For opinion in department, see 62 Pac. 1055.

TEMPLE, J. This appeal is taken by defendants Rademacher and Osmont from a decree quieting the title of plaintiff to 32-60 and of defendant Middlecoff to 8-60 of a certain mining claim. Rademacher was, on the 11th day of January, 1897, the owner of a certain mine in the Randsburg district, in this state. On that day he conveyed an undivided two-thirds interest in the mine to the plaintiff, and contemporaneously with the execution of the deed, and as the sole consideration for the conveyance, Downing delivered to Rademacher his agreement in writing. It was an agreement inter partes, Downing being party of the first part, and recited the contemporaneous execution of the deed, and also as follows: "Now, for the purpose of working said mine, said parties agree as follows: Said party of the first part shall have the exclusive right to work and mine upon said mining claim and mine thereon in any way he shall see fit. He shall mill and reduce all the mineral ore taken out of the said mine by him, and deliver to said party of the second part one-third of all of the gold or other minerals taken from said ore by said first party, free of cost and expense to the party of the second part." The contract proceeds to specify that Downing shall have certain rights as to water owned by Rademacher, and the privilege of selecting the mill at which ores are to be milled, and of erecting mills upon land claimed by Rademacher. It provides, also, that Downing shall secure Rademacher against the claims of certain named persons, and shall have control for Rademacher of a lawsuit then pending. The suit is an action to quiet title, and a cross complaint was filed by defendants Rademacher and Osmont, charging plaintiff and defendant Middlecoff with fraud. In the cross complaint it was also charged that Downing never intended to mine said property, but procured the deed with intent to acquire two-thirds of the mine without consideration. It is averred that he has failed efficiently to prosecute the work of developing and working the mine, and that work has ceased upon the same. The cross complainants, apparently uncertain as to the remedy to which they may be found entitled, have made a very full statement of alleged facts, and have demanded relief in several forms.

The defendants in the cross action have answered, fully denying the charges of fraud, and generally the alleged equities of the cross complainants. It may be considered that the contract entered into when the deed was made was the sole consideration for the deed. It is also admitted that soon after Downing received his deed he conveyed 8-60 of the mine to Middlecoff, and subsequently conveyed the entire property to one Hyde, by a deed absolute on its face, but which deed was in fact simply a mortgage given to secure an indebtedness. The court so finds, but Hyde was not made a party to the suit, and the adjudication does not, therefore, conclude him.

The court found that the charges of fraud were not sustained, but the facts constituting the transaction are left substantially as stated. The court entered a decree quieting the title of Downing and Middlecoff, and adjudging them to own the interests respectively claimed by them in fee against Rademacher and Osmont, and all persons claiming or to claim under them. The decree deprives Rademacher of all equities in reference to the two-thirds interest conveyed by him to Downing, and determines that Rademacher conveyed away two-thirds of his mine for the personal undertaking of Downing that if he should work the mine he would give Rademacher one-third of all he should get, clear and free of expense to Rademacher.

er; also that Downing may sell his two-thirds, and the grantees can work the mine, and under the rule in McCord v. Mining Co., 64 Cal. 134, 27 Pac. 863, 49 Am. Rep. 686, not be chargeable with waste; and, since Rademacher has by his contract given to Downing the exclusive right to work the mine, he could not offer to work the mine with the grantees of Downing, and therefore could not entitle himself, as against such grantees, to any portion of the proceeds of the mine. They would get the whole mine instead of two-thirds, although Rademacher might possibly have a personal demand for an amount equal to one-third of the proceeds against Downing. But a result less favorable to Rademacher may be worked out. Middlecoff may commence a suit to have the mine partitioned, and would be entitled to his decree. The property, being incapable of division, may be sold, and Rademacher, at the best, would get one-third of the proceeds. In other words, according to the decree, he did not sell, but he gave away two-thirds of his property. He cannot compel Downing to specifically perform his contract, and if, as a matter of law, he could do so, that could, under the terms of the decree, be prevented by the possible action of Middlecoff. In an action for damages, nominal damages only could be recovered. No actual damage could be proven.

There is here no question of innocent purchasers without notice. The deed and the agreement constitute one instrument, and must be read as though each referred to the other and expressly incorporated its terms. And, in legal effect, what do they amount to? As between the parties, at all events, there is no such magic in a conveyance of a title in fee, which can be used to do an owner out of his property. Under this contract and deed all Downing acquired was the right to work the mine in his own way on condition that he deliver to Rademacher one-third of the valuable minerals obtained. The conveyance was, in effect, subject to this condition.

Respondent contends that the deed is not at all subject to the agreement, and that Rademacher had no equitable or other claim upon Downing's two-thirds interest, and to that effect is the judgment of the court. Upon this point counsel rely almost entirely upon the authority of Hartman v. Reed, 50 Cal. 485, and Lawrence v. Gayetty, 78 Cal. 126, 20 Pac. 382, 12 Am. St. Rep. 29. In Hartman v. Reed the remarks quoted were not made with reference to anything there at issue. That the interest passed to Crosby was there admitted by all parties, but it was claimed that Crosby's title was barred by limitation, and Hartman had obtained a deed from Olvera which purported to convey to him the same interest Olvera had previously conveyed to Crosby. The effect of that deed was the only matter litigated in that case. But the remark has been quoted as authority in other cases, and it may be admitted that as a proposition of law it is sound. The analogy of that case to this is very slight. There a deed was made in payment for legal services, which it was claimed had not been rendered. The grantor did not seek to avoid the deed for failure of consideration. It was simply said the contract of Crosby to render service was a sufficient consideration for the deed.

Here the consideration of the deed is not simply the agreement to perform service. The purchaser was given exclusive possession of the mine, and as payment for his interest agreed that he would render to the vendor one-third of the gross proceeds obtained by working the mine. It is like a conveyance made of a farm for one-third of the crops which thereafter should be produced. Suppose such a contract could be made, it would amount to a lease, and would imply that the grantee, or his assignees, should farm the land, and no doubt, if they refused to perform, the land could be recovered. This conveyance was for a share in the proceeds of the mine, and is in every way analogous to the case supposed. The technical ideas in regard to leasehold estates do not attach to this, but the equities are the same, and so are the implied obligations to work the mine, that the consideration agreed upon may be paid. A similar comparison may be made with Lawrence v. Gayetty. And in these cases, also, if an action for damages had been brought, something more than nominal damages could have been proven. Here the consideration for the deed was a proportionate share of the proceeds of the mine, which, of course, could not be determined until the mine had been worked out. This fact alone is sufficient to show that the grant of the mine was conditional. Rademacher had no possible remedy, except upon the theory that Downing's title was conditional. He did not intend to give his property to Downing without consideration, nor did Downing intend to get it for nothing. There is no other possible mode in which the agreed price can be paid. A sale of an interest in the mine, unless the purchaser takes subject to the equities of Rademacher, would be very likely to deprive Rademacher not only of all remedy, but of his property. Upon this ground Rademacher has a clear equity with reference to the portion of the mine conveyed to Downing. This equity binds Downing and all who purchase from him with notice.

Upon this subject the case of Richter v. Richter, 111 Ind. 456, 12 N. E. 698, is directly in point. Richter executed to his son a warranty deed for a farm, for an expressed consideration of $1,000. The real consideration was a contemporaneous agreement in writing, by the terms of which the son agreed to support his father so long as he should live. A few months afterwards the son refused to perform this contract. After a demand for reconveyance, the father brought suit to compel it. The defense there was the same as here, that the consideration for the deed was the agreement, and the only remedy the father had was to sue upon it. The contract purported to be a mortgage, though the court held it could not be enforced as such. It was said: "True, neither the deed nor the mortgage states in express terms that the estate is granted upon condition, but the word 'condition' is not necessary to the creation of an estate upon condition, if it plainly appears from the words used that the intent of the parties was to create an estate of that description. Stillwell v. Knapper, 69 Ind. 558, 35 Am. Rep. 240. In the construction of deeds, as in construing other writings, courts seek to ascertain and give effect to the real intention of the parties, as such intention may be gathered from the language of the whole instrument. The intent is what the law applies itself to in deeds. Watters v. Bredin, 70 Pa. 235. If from the nature of the acts to be performed by the grantee, and the time required for their performance, it is evidently the intention of the parties that the estate shall be held and enjoyed on condition that the grantee perform the acts specified, then the estate is upon condition. This is especially so when the grantor has reserved no other effectual remedy for the enforcement of performance on the part of the grantee." The court cites the case of Leach v. Leach, 4 Ind. 638, 58 Am. Dec. 642. That was a similar case, except that the son agreed to deliver to his father a portion of the crops. It was held that a condition subsequent was created, although the writing did not expressly so provide. After citing the Leach Case, the court proceeds to enlarge upon the proposition that there was no other remedy, and concludes that this fact is persuasive of the conclusion that it was intended as a condition attaching to the estate. To the like effect is Wilson v. Wilson, 86 Ind. 472. A similar question was elaborately considered by the supreme court of Illinois in Manning v. Frazier, 96 Ill. 279. This controversy arose upon a conveyance of all the coal in a certain tract of land, with express license to the grantees to enter and mine for the same, paying a stipulated price per ton for the coal removed. The court held that here was a conveyance of land, and that the vendor had an equitable lien upon the entire interest conveyed for money due under the contract. The principle involved is somewhat analogous to the familiar case where one sells a part of his land, and attempts to restrict the use of the part sold by his vendee for the benefit of the portion retained. This matter was elaborately considered by Judge Bigelow in Witney v. Railway Co., 11 Gray, 359, 71 Am. Dec. 715. The question was how far such restrictions are binding on grantees of the original grantee. It is held that the restriction is binding on those who take with notice. He says: "In like manner, by taking an estate from a grantor with notice of valid agreements made by him with the former owner of the property concerning the mode of occupation and use of the estate granted, the purchaser is bound in equity to fulfill such agreements with the original owner, because it would be unconscientious and inequitable for him to set aside and disregard the legal and valid acts and agreements of his vendor in regard to the estate of which he had notice when he became its purchaser." He further states that the form of the agreement is immaterial. It need not be a covenant running with the land. It is an equity which attaches itself to the land sold for the benefit of the land retained. The matter was considered in fixing the price. It was a part of the contract of sale. The vendee gets the land at a lower price because of the burden, and so do his grantees. They are continually paying for the land. The matter is elaborately discussed in a note to Ladd v. City of Boston (Mass.) 21 Am. St. Rep. 481 (s. c. 24 N. E. 858), where very numerous authorities are cited and considered.

The respondents are not entitled, under the findings, to have their titles quieted as against Rademacher and his grantee, appellants here, but said appellants are entitled, on said findings, to a decree declaring that Downing took, and he and his grantee now hold, their interests in said mining claim subject to the contract entered into by Downing and Rademacher; and it is ordered that the decree be modified accordingly.

CONROY v. WATERS. (L. A. 850.)¹

ACTION ON NOTE—PLEADINGS—ISSUES AND FINDINGS—SUFFICIENCY OF FINDINGS—JUDGMENT—QUANTUM MERUIT.

1. Where an action was brought on a note, in which the court finds that nothing was due on the note, a finding that plaintiff was entitled to recover a certain sum on a quantum meruit for services was not within the issues, and erroneous.

2. On a count in a complaint for services rendered, where plaintiff grouped three items, and alleged a single charge for the value of the services in all, it was not improper for the court to segregate the items, and allow judgment for one of them.

3. A finding showed a conveyance by defendant to plaintiff of an undivided one-third interest in certain realty, and personality. That they afterwards transferred the title to another, reserving certain wool, sheep, and lambs, which were held by the parties jointly, and of which defendant was given the charge and management; and that he disposed of the property by his own admission, receiving a certain sum therefor, which he converted to his own use, though due demand was made by plaintiff for his share of the proceeds. Held sufficient to sustain a recovery by plaintiff for his share of the proceeds.

4. It was not reversible error to permit plaintiff, who was an attorney, to appear with his attorney of record, and assist in the trial of the case.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; D. K. Trask, Judge.

Action by J. F. Conroy against William G. Waters. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Modified and reversed.

William J. Hunsaker, for appellant. Lucien Earle and J. F. Conroy, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Plaintiff's complaint charged in three counts. The first was a simple action upon a promissory note for $750, executed by defendant to plaintiff. The second was for the value of professional services rendered by plaintiff to defendant as his attorney at law, made up of several items, and aggregating the sum of $800. The third charged that defendant had been in the custody, management, and control of certain wool, sheep, and lambs, the joint property of plaintiff and defendant, and that he had sold some of this property of a value unknown to plaintiff. An accounting was demanded, and a recovery for the value of plaintiff's share. Defendant answered by denials, by special defenses, and by a cross complaint. The issues presented by these pleadings will be more specifically adverted to as occasion may require. The court made voluminous findings, and gave judgment for plaintiff in the sum of $793.60, from which judgment defendant appeals.

It is urged against the judgment that the findings are in themselves so conflicting and self-destructive in essential particulars that the judgment thereon cannot be supported. While the findings are undoubtedly open to criticism in this regard, yet we think that sufficient appears from them without conflict to sustain the judgment, if in other respects it is tenable. Upon the first count the court found that, by reason of the nature of the contract of employment between plaintiff and defendant in regard to certain litigation, nothing whatever was due upon the promissory note. However, it proceeded to find that the value of plaintiff's services in the matter of this litigation was $500, and upon a quantum meruit gave judgment accordingly. But plaintiff was entitled to recover only upon the issues made. His action was upon a promissory note. The finding as to the value of the services was entirely without the issues, and cannot stand. Upon the second count—that for $800 value of services rendered—the court allowed judgment for $20 upon a single item. Plaintiff's statement grouped three particulars as follows: "(1) To retainer and services in cause of Pacific Coast Steamship Company; (2) to retainer and services in the cause of Waters v. Superior Court; (3) to retainer and services in cause of Basford v. Waters, $750." The court refused to allow anything for the services in the two last-mentioned cases, upon the ground that they were services rendered under the special contract between the parties, and, eliminating them, found the value of the services in the case of the Pacific Coast Steamship Company to be $20. Appellant objects that, as respondent had grouped the three items, and put a single charge of $750 for the value of the services in all, it was improper to segregate the items, and allow him judgment for any one of them. We think, however, that the course pursued by the court was proper and legal.

As to the third, objection is made to the sufficiency of the findings in that they do not distinctly declare that plaintiff and defendant were joint owners of property; that they do not distinctly declare what the joint property was, or that defendant had sold any of it, or that plaintiff had a third interest in it; but the findings sufficiently show a conveyance by defendant to plaintiff of an undivided one-third interest in his real and personal property on San Miguel Island; that plaintiff and defendant afterwards conveyed to the San Miguel Island Company their title to the island and its personal property, reserving, however, for their use, all sheep and lambs then on the island in excess of 3,000, together with all wool, clipped and unclipped; "that said wool, sheep, and lambs reserved as aforesaid were held, owned, and possessed by plaintiff and defendant jointly; that said defendant was given by plaintiff, and retained charge, care, and management of, the joint property; that defendant claims to have disposed of same, and refuses to give any account thereof to plaintiff; that due demand therefor was made by plaintiff upon defendant; that defendant admits that he has sold some of the joint property, and received as net proceeds of said sales $802.85; that the one-third share of plaintiff in said proceeds is $273.60; that defendant has converted said proceeds to his own use; that defendant is indebted to plaintiff in said sum of $273.60." These findings are certainly sufficient. And so, without unnecessary discussion, we think are the findings against the cross complaint of defendant, which charged concealment and fraud upon the part of the plaintiff, by which defendant was induced to enter into the contract in question.

Appellant further objects that plaintiff, who is an attorney at law, licensed to practice before all the courts of this state, was represented upon the trial by Lucien Earle, his attorney of record, and that, upon motion of Lucien Earle, plaintiff himself was, by order of court, "associated" with said Earle as attorney in the case. It is contended that this was a special privilege conferred upon the plaintiff, whereby he was allowed not only to appear by attorney, but at the same time to appear in person. Whatever irregularity may be detected in this order of court, we think it sufficient to say that it was clearly an irregularity without injury, and that no reversal of the cause should be had for the assigned reason.

It follows, therefore, that the judgment of the court, so far as it is based upon the findings directed to the first count of the complaint, must be reversed. In other words, under the pleadings and findings plaintiff is entitled to a judgment for $20 upon the second count, and for $273.60 upon the third count. The judgment is ordered modified to this extent, and upon the first count a new trial is ordered, with leave to the respective parties to amend their pleadings, if they shall be so advised.

In re MAHONY'S ESTATE. (S. F. 2,257.)¹

INHERITANCE TAX — VALIDITY — STATUTORY CONTRACTS—APPEAL — REVIEW — ESTATE—DISTRIBUTION—TAX—RETENTION BY ADMINISTRATOR.

1. St. 1897, p. 77, providing that all property of an estate, valued at $500 or more, which shall pass by will other than to the use of the testator's father, mother, etc., and nieces and nephews, when a resident of this state, shall be subject to a tax of $5 on every hundred of the market value of such property for the use of the state, is unconstitutional, in so far as it relates to nieces and nephews, as in conflict with Const. U. S. art. 4, § 2, declaring that the citizens of each state shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens of the several states.

2. The contention that in declaring the law unconstitutional, in so far as it related to nieces and nephews residing in the state, the words, "when a resident of this state," should be eliminated, and the words, "nieces and nephews," allowed to remain, so that nonresident nieces and nephews would be relieved from paying the tax, cannot be sustained, since such a construction would establish a law in direct opposition to the apparent legislative intent.

3. An estate consisted entirely of money on deposit with a trust company, and the heirs appealed from an order directing the administrator to retain a certain amount as taxes against the estate. Held that, as the trust company was not a party to the proceedings, the question whether it should have paid the taxes will not be considered.

4. Code Civ. Proc. § 1669, provides that, on the final distribution of an estate, the court shall be satisfied that the taxes against the estate have been paid. Held, that where an estate consisted entirely of money, and there was nothing in the bill of exceptions to show that the taxes against the estate had been paid, a decree of the trial court directing the administrator on final distribution to retain the amount of the taxes in his possession cannot be declared erroneous.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. V. Coffey, Judge.

Final distribution of the estate of Timothy Mahony. From that portion of the decree deducting 5 per cent. from the respective shares of the distributees as a collateral inheritance tax, and directing the administrator to withhold certain sums as taxes, certain heirs appeal. Affirmed.

James Gartland, for appellants. J. D. Sullivan, for respondent.

GRAY, C. The decedent left all his estate by will to his 10 nephews and nieces, all of whom are nonresidents of the state of California, three of them residing in the state of New York, and seven in Ireland. Seven of the said nieces and nephews appeal—First, from that portion of the decree of final distribution herein which deducts 5 per cent. from their respective distributive shares for collateral inheritance tax; and, second, from that portion of said decree which deducts a further sum of $1.90 on each $100 for taxes claimed to be due on said estate.

1. Appellants contend that legacies to nephews and nieces are exempt from the collateral inheritance tax, whether they reside in this state or not. This contention cannot be upheld without a violation of the clearly expressed intention of the legislature. The collateral inheritance tax law of this state, as it originally existed, is to be found in St. 1893, p. 193. It provided that all property of an estate valued at $500 or more, which shall pass by will or by the intestate laws of this state, other than to or for the use of certain relatives of the decedent named in the statute, shall be subject to the said tax. Nephews and nieces are not named among the relatives who are exempt from the tax. The act was amended in 1897, however, so as to exempt "nieces and nephews when a resident of this state" from the said tax. See St. 1897, p. 77. In so far as the statute as thus amended affects the questions involved in this case, it reads as follows: "Section 1. After the passage of this act, all property which shall pass by will * * * other than to the use of his or her father, mother, husband, wife, lawful issue, brother, sister, and nieces or nephews when a resident of this state, * * * shall be and is subject to a tax of five dollars on every one hundred dollars of the market value of such property, * * * for the use of the state: * * * provided, that an estate which may be valued at a less sum than five hundred dollars shall not be subject to such duty or tax." In 1899 the legislature again amended the said act, and left out the clause exempting nieces and nephews from the tax. The present case rests upon the law as it stood prior to this last amendment, and as it was amended in 1897. The language of the statute, as amended in 1897, shows that it was the purpose of the framers of the law that nieces and nephews nonresident of the state should be subject to the tax; and if, as contended for by appellant, we eliminate from the statute the clause, "when a resident of the state," and leave in the words, "and nieces and nephews," we establish a law as to nieces and nephews nonresident of this state in direct opposition to the apparent legislative intent. This we may not do. Where there are two provisions in a statute, the one constitutional and the other one not, the unconstitutional provision may be rejected and the other stand; but here there is but one provision in question, and, being clearly unconstitutional, it should be rejected as a whole, and held invalid. In Sprague v. Thompson, 118 U. S. 90, 6 Sup. Ct. 988, 30 L. Ed. 115, it was held that a section of the Georgia Code which reads as follows: "Any person, master, or commander of a ship or vessel bearing toward any of the ports or harbors of this state, except coasters in this state, and between the ports of this state and those of South Carolina, and between the ports of this state and those of Florida, who refuses to receive a pilot on board, shall be liable, on his arrival in such port in this state, to pay the first pilot who may have offered his services outside the bar, and exhibited his license as a pilot, if demanded by the master, the full rates of pilotage established by law for such vessel,"—conflicts with the constitution of the United States, and is annulled and abrogated by the provision in Rev. St. § 4237, that "no regulations or provisions shall be adopted by any state which shall make any discrimination in the rate of pilotage or half-pilotage between vessels sailing between the ports of one state and vessels sailing between the ports of different states, or any discrimination against vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, or against national vessels of the United States; and all existing regulations or provisions making any such discrimination are annulled and abrogated." We quote from the opinion of the court by Mr. Justice Mathews, as follows: "It was held, however, by the supreme court of Georgia, in the case now before us, that so much of the section as makes these illegal exceptions may be disregarded, so that the rest of the section as thus read may stand, upon the principle that a separable part of a statute, which is unconstitutional, may be rejected, and the remainder preserved and enforced. But the insuperable difficulty with the application of that principle of construction to the present instance is that by rejecting the exceptions intended by the legislature of Georgia the statute is made to enact what confessedly the legislature never meant. It confers upon the statute a positive operation beyond the legislative intent, and beyond what any one can say it would have enacted in view of the illegality of the exceptions. We are therefore constrained to hold that the provisions of section 1512 of the Code of Georgia cannot be separated so as to reject the unconstitutional exceptions merely, and that the whole section must be treated as annulled and abrogated by section 4237 of the Revised Statutes." In People v. Perry, 79 Cal. 105, at page 115, 21 Pac. 426, the court said: "But we know of no precedent for holding that a clause of a statute, which as enacted is unconstitutional, may be changed in meaning in order to give it some operation, when admittedly it cannot operate as the legislature intended. This would, it seems to us, be making a law, and not merely correcting an excess of authority." Again, in Cooley, Const. Lim., at page 211, the author says: "The constitutional and unconstitutional provisions may even be contained in the same section, and yet be perfectly distinct and separable, so that the first may stand, though the last fall. The point is not whether they are contained in the same section, for the distribution into sections is purely artificial, but whether they are essentially and inseparably connected in substance. If, when the unconstitutional portion is stricken out, that which remains is complete in itself, and capable of being executed in accordance with the apparent legislative intent, wholly independent of that which was rejected, it must be sustained. The difficulty is in determining whether the good and bad parts of the statute are capable of being separated, within the meaning of this rule. If a statute attempts to accomplish two or more objects, and is void as to one, it may still be in every respect complete and valid as to the other. But if its purpose is to accomplish a single object only, and some of its provisions are void, the whole must fail unless sufficient remains to effect the object without the aid of the invalid portion."

Authorities might be multiplied, all showing that a statute cannot, because it is in conflict with the constitution, be so limited or altered by the court as to make a law beyond or contrary to the apparent purpose of the legislature. In re Stanford's Estate, as decided in department (54 Pac. 259), is not an authority upon the question here discussed, because a rehearing in that case was had, and a conclusion differing with that of the department, and based on different grounds, was reached by the court in bank. Id., 126 Cal. 112, 54 Pac. 259, 58 Pac. 462. We are of the opinion that the amendment of 1897 of the collateral inheritance statute, so far as it relates to nieces and nephews, is in conflict with the provisions of section 2, art. 4, of the constitution of the United States, providing that the citizens of each state shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens of the several states, as well as with section 1978 of the United States Revised Statutes, providing that all citizens of the United States shall have the same right in every state as is enjoyed by the white citizens thereof to inherit property, and for that reason the amendment in that respect is void, and should be disregarded, thus leaving nieces and nephews subject to the collateral inheritance tax as they were before said attempted amendment.

2. It appears that the estate consisted entirely of money, and that it had been kept on deposit by the executor with the California Safe-Deposit & Trust Company, and it is contended that it was the duty of the assessor to assess the money to said trust company, and it was the duty of said company to pay the tax thereon, and it will be presumed that the assessor performed his official duty. It is not necessary to determine any branch of this contention. The trust company was not a party to the proceedings, and its rights and duties could not, therefore, be determined in the matter. There is no showing in the bill of exceptions that the taxes in question had been paid by anybody, and the last order of the court, made nunc pro tunc, shows that taxes to the amount of $1.90 on each $100 are claimed to be due upon said estate, and it is ordered by the trial court that the administrator retain that amount in his possession. It will not be presumed that the taxes have been paid in the absence of a showing to that effect, and section 3752 of the Political Code, and section 1669 of the Code of Civil Procedure, make it the duty of the court to see to it that the taxes are paid. On the record before us, we can see no error in the action of the court directing the administrator to retain the amount of the taxes claimed. For the foregoing reasons, we advise that the portions of the decree appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: SMITH, C.; COOPER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the portions of the decree appealed from are affirmed.

LAIDLAW v. MARYE. (S. F. 1,791.)¹

(Supreme Court of California. June 1, 1901.)
BUILDING CONTRACT—RECORDING—FAILURE —EFFECT—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY—CON-TRACT—CONSTRUCTION—COMPLIANCE—RE-COVERY—RIGHT.

1. Code Civ. Proc. § 1183, provides that a building contract which is not recorded in the office of the county recorder shall be wholly void. Held that, where an original contractor repaired a building under an unrecorded written contract, he cannot recover the reasonable value of his services and material, without showing a substantial compliance with the terms of the contract.

2. Code Civ. Proc. § 1183, provides that a building contract which is not recorded in the office of the county recorder shall be wholly void. Held that, where an original contractor sued for the reasonable value of his services and materials in repairing a building, a written contract, though unrecorded, was admissible to show that the work had not been performed in substantial compliance with its terms.

3. Civ. Code, § 1654, provides, that if the language of a contract is uncertain, it shall be interpreted most strongly against the party who caused the uncertainty to exist. Held that, where a contract to repair a building was drawn by the contractor, any ambiguity in its terms must be construed most strongly against him.

4. An unrecorded written contract to repair a building stated that a new floor should be laid on the second story, and prior to the execution of the contract the contractor informed the owner that it would be necessary to entirely remove the old floor, and relay it with a new one. The other bidders understood that the floor was to be entirely removed and relaid. Held, that laying a new floor over the old one in one-fourth of the second floor, and an entire new floor on the remainder, did not constitute a compliance with the terms of the contract, and hence the contractor was not entitled to recover the reasonable value of his services and material.

Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Edw. A. Belcher, Judge.

Action by Frank Laidlaw against George T. Marye. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Reinstein & Eisner, for appellant. A. E. Shaw and R. B. McClellan, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Plaintiff's complaint charged in two counts. By the first he sued in quantum meruit et valebat for the reasonable value of materials furnished and labor performed by his assignor, which he alleged to be $2,049. Of this sum there remained unpaid $572.25, for which he demanded judgment. By the second he pleaded an express contract with defendant under which his assignor was to refloor and repair the floor of the second story of the Nevada Stables for the agreed price of $2,049, of which defendant had only paid the sum of $1,536.75. For the remainder, judgment was sought. Defendant denied all the material allegations of the complaint, excepting the execution of the contract for the work. Judgment passed for plaintiff as prayed for, and from the order denying his motion for a new trial the defendant appeals.

The uncontested facts are that defendant was the owner of the building known as the "Nevada Stables." It was occupied by his lessee, and used as a livery stable. The second floor contained stalls for stabling horses. The tenant complained of the dilapidated and leaky condition of this floor, by reason of which the horses' urine dripped upon and injured the carriages and other vehicles kept on the floor beneath. It was represented to defendant that a new, water-proof floor for the second story was a necessity. In conversations with Fletcher, plaintiff's assignor, the need of an entire new floor was frequently discussed. Defendant finally decided to have the work done. Fletcher himself drew the contract, with its specifications. Bids were called for, and Fletcher was the successful bidder. He entered upon the performance of the work, and carried it to completion. The contract was never recorded, and was therefore "wholly void." As work progressed, payments upon account of it were made. When Fletcher announced its completion, payment of the remainder (the amount here in suit) was refused upon the ground that the work had not been done in substantial compliance with the contract. To this point the facts are without conflict. The finding that the contract was void for lack of recordation was followed by an additional finding to the effect that the contract had been substantially fulfilled by Fletcher, and that the reasonable value of his labor and material equaled, and, indeed, exceeded, the amount sued for. The court also found that since the date of completion the defendant had been in the full use and enjoyment of the construction.

Appellant contends that the work was not performed according to the terms of the contract, and that in substantial particulars there was a failure in this regard. Consequently he urges that no recovery should have been allowed. Respondent meets this with the counter declaration that, for failure of recordation, the contract was "wholly void and no recovery shall be had thereon by either party thereto" (Code Civ. Proc. § 1183), and, supporting his position by adjudications upon this language of the Code, asserts with boldness the following: "If, as frequently decided, the void contract is as nothing, with no existence, past or present, how can it be said that the contractor could be guilty of a breach of it? The omission to record a contract does something more than deprive a contractor of his right to a lien. It deprives him of his right to recover the price specified therein, unless it is the reasonable value of the work and materials furnished. It deprives the owner of his right to insist on the work being done in accordance with such contract, or to recover in damages for breach of the contract if it is not; and it deprives him of his right to compel the contractor to accept the contract price in full satisfaction of his claim, if the reasonable value of his work and materials furnished is greater than that price." If this be the logical result of our past interpretation of the law, then must it be said that, if that interpretation is necessary under the law as written, naught remains but to adhere to it, leaving it to the legislature to afford relief. If, however, this interpretation is an erroneous one, then no considerations of adjudicated cases, no rule of stare decisis, should prevent a court from correcting mistaken views which lead to such extraordinarily harsh and unjust consequences.

The first question then to be resolved is, do the decisions support the argument and conclusions of respondent's attorney? It must be admitted that they do. The first of them is Kellogg v. Howes, 81 Cal. 170, 22 Pac. 509, 6 L. R. A. 588. The action was brought by material men, laborers, and subcontractors to enforce their lien for material furnished and labor done. The contract was void for lack of recordation, and it was said that a contract wholly void is void as to everybody whose rights would be affected by it if valid; and it was decided that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover for the reasonable value of their labor and materials, regardless of the contract price, or the amount of the contract price which might still remain in the hands of the owner. Following this was the case of Willamette Steam Mills Lumbering & Mfg. Co. v. Los Angeles College Co., 94 Cal., where it is said at page 236, 29 Pac. 631: "The finding of the court that there had not been filed in the recorder's office a contract * * * was therefore correct, and the effect of such finding, under the provisions of section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure, was to render the contract wholly void for all purposes. It cannot be the basis of a recovery by the contractor against the owner, nor can it be looked to for the purpose of determining the amount for which the owner is liable, or when any payment is to be made." Again, at page 237, 94 Cal., and page 632, 29 Pac., it is said: "If the contract is wholly void, there is neither a contract nor an original contractor." And at page 240, 94 Cal., and page 633, 29 Pac., it is further said: "Inasmuch as, by a failure to file the contract in the recorder's office, it became wholly void, it was not available as a defense for any purpose,—either to determine the amount of the contract price, or to limit the liability of the appellant, or as the foundation of a right to complete the building according to its terms." The Willamette Case, like the case of Kellogg v. Howes, was an action by subcontractors, material men, and laborers against the owner; the contract being void for want of recordation. Following this case was decided the case of Rebman v. Water Co., 95 Cal. 390, 30 Pac. 564, which was an action by an original contractor under a void contract. It is there laid down that the original contractor may maintain his suit in implied assumpsit, and it is said: "The finding that the alleged contract—the only contract relied upon by defendant—never had been recorded, and was therefore wholly void, is equivalent to a finding that there was no written contract. * * *

This conclusion is not affected by the facts that a writing corresponding in form to the alleged contract had been signed and delivered by the parties, and that the labor may have been done and materials furnished in accordance with the terms of that paper." As has been said, these decisions lend support to respondent's position. But it is to be noted that in Kellogg v. Howes and in the Willamette Case the court was dealing solely with the rights of subcontractors, material men, etc., under the void contract, and that the language employed had applicability to the situation of those litigating parties alone. Only in the Rebman Case was this language first drawn from its context, and made applicable to an action by the original contractor under such a void contract. Yet the situation of the parties is essentially different. Section 1183 of the mechanic's lien law affects the rights of three distinct classes of persons: First, the owner; second, the original contractor; and, third, the subcontractors, material men, artisans, and laborers. With the decision as affecting the last class no modification of views is necessary or called for. If, for the remissness of the parties to the contract, it is void, this third class should be, and is, justly entitled, under the law, to the value of their material or labor. They are not parties to the contract. They have no voice in its execution or recordation. They furnish material as directed, and labor as ordered, and that is all. It is but right, therefore, that the measure of their recovery should be the value given by them, unhampered by the conditions of a void contract. But the situation of the owner and original contractor is totally different. They advisedly agree upon a building contract. The nature of the structure, the character of material, the time of completion, the times and amounts of payments, are all the subject of deliberate consideration. Their minds finally meet, and an agreement is reached. The contractor promises to complete such a structure, with prescribed material, for a fixed price. The owner wants just such a structure, with just such material, and none other, and for it he is willing to pay the price fixed. If it were to cost more, he would not build at all, and there would be no contract. But the law imposes a penalty for nonrecordation of a contract before work is commenced. Thus, in a sense, the duty is imposed upon both contractor and owner to see that this is done. Otherwise, says the law, the contract is wholly void, and no recovery thereon shall be had by either party thereto. But the duty so to record is primarily on the contractor, for the very reason that he can always defeat the law and the owner's interest by commencing work before recordation. The owner is helpless in the matter. But to hold that, notwithstanding his failure in this respect, the contractor, because the contract is void, may build what he pleases, of any material he pleases, in any way that suits him, and recover, where the contract has not been performed, not only the contract price, but 40 times the contract price, is not to punish the contractor for his dereliction, but to put a premium upon a failure to comply with the law, and invite dishonesty and trickery in this matter, and in the matter of the contract itself. What matters it to the contractor if he loses his lien? An attachment will serve his purpose. And why should he care at what figure he agrees to build a house, when he may recover any amount he is capable of proving, whether he has performed the work in whole or in part, whether it be in accordance with the contract or not? While the contractor may thus be reaping an untoward advantage from his failure to comply with the law, the owner, on the other hand, will be compelled to accept a barn where he expected a house, and to pay, for a structure which he never wanted or contracted for, more than he agreed to pay for the desired edifice. Indeed, he may be compelled to pay full value for an uncompleted building. Is such a conclusion necessary under the law? We think not, and we think, further, that the error arose in the Rebman

Case by misapplication to original contractors of language directed solely to the case of subcontractors, material men, artisans, and laborers. Heretofore, as will subsequently be pointed out, the court, by the logic of necessity, if from no other consideration, has felt compelled to modify the force of the Rebman decision; but it is certainly preferable that it should at once be overruled, if it be untenable, rather than it should be undermined and eaten away after a long course of vexatious and expensive litigation, filling the books with discriminated cases, all receding further and further from, and growing more and more dissimilar to, the parent case. When the statute declares that the contract shall be wholly void, it means, as the Willamette Case decided, that it is wholly void as to the third class above designated, who thereupon shall be entitled to liens for the full value of their material and service, and shall be deemed to have furnished them to the owner at his special request. By thus allowing full compensation to this class, the owner is sufficiently punished for any remissness on his part, while with like measure the original contractor is penalized by losing his lien. But the law never meant to reward the contractor for his disobedience by conferring upon him for its violation greater rights than would have been his had he obeyed it. Therefore, as between him and the owner, the contract must remain not the basis of his recovery, but the measure and test of his right to recover. He must still show a substantial compliance with its terms, to warrant any recovery at all; and the measure of his recovery, even under implied assumpsit, must be limited as to him by the contract price. Thus only is the law given a just and harmonious operation. In Barker v. Doherty, 97 Cal. 10, 31 Pac. 1117, the cases of Kellogg v. Howes and Willamette Steam Mills Lumbering & Mfg. Co. v. Los Angeles College Co. were the subject of review, and it is said: "Those cases decided that the contract was void as forming the basis of a recovery, and no legal liability could be created by any of its provisions. This would seem to be apparent from a cursory reading of the provision itself. It was never intended to hold in those cases that the writing could not be used as evidence to determine the character of the building to be erected, and thereby to furnish the test by which it could be known when the building was completed. Such is evident from the fact that in those cases the test of completion of the buildings was furnished by an inspection of the very contracts, which were held to be 'wholly void.' Any other interpretation of this provision of the statute would lead to inextricable confusion, and practically nullify the entire section." Marchant v. Hayes, 117 Cal. 669, 49 Pac. 840, was an action brought by an original contractor against the owner to recover in assumpsit. The owner pleaded a contract which had never been performed. Upon the trial it was shown that the contract was void for failure to record. The court further found that the labor bestowed and material furnished by the original contractor were supplied under the terms of the contract, and it awarded the original contractor judgment for the value of such services and material. But in reversing that judgment this court said: "The omission to file the contract in the office of the county recorder deprived the contractor of any lien for the labor and materials (Code Civ. Proc. § 1183), but he did not by such omission acquire any greater right to a recovery for his labor and material than he would have had if he had brought an action therefor irrespective of his right to a lien. Under the finding of the court that Hayes was never employed to construct the building, except by virtue of the contract of June 18th, and that all the labor performed and all the materials furnished by him were performed and furnished under and by virtue of this special contract, he had no right of recovery unless he should show that he had completed the contract on his part, or that its completion had been in some way waived or excused." This declaration of the law we think is eminently just and sound. It is, as was before said, a recession from the earlier views of the court, and a declaration of the true principle. It is applicable to every case where the contract fails for lack of recordation; for in all of them it is still the understanding of the parties that such work, and only such work, as is called for by the terms of the contract shall be performed.

In the case at bar no question arises as to the character of the work done by the contractor. It is not in dispute that the contractor did not wholly refloor the second story. The controversy arises over the interpretation of the contract. If the contract called for the laying of a new floor of 3 by 6, clear kiln-dried pine flooring, put down in deck style, and filled with boiling-hot bitumen, then, unquestionably, the contractor did not comply with his contract; for, admittedly, in the passageways, comprising an area of at least a fourth of the whole floor, he merely nailed a surface flooring upon the old flooring which was there. The provisions of the contract are as follows: "First, the contractor agrees * * * to furnish the necessary labor and materials, including tools, implements, and appliances required, and perform and complete in a workmanlike manner all the work of laying a new floor on the second story of the Nevada Stable." The floor was to be laid in conformity with the specifications. The specifications provided: "The entire stall floor will be laid with 3 by 3 clear kiln-dried pine flooring, put down in deck style, filled with boiling-hot bitumen; floor driven up tight and bored for the spikes, and then filled up with the hot bitumen. The entire stall floors coated with hot bitumen. Then a two-inch surface floor laid over the entire stalls under the horses a space of $\frac{3}{8} \times \frac{5}{8}$ to be laid 2x4-inch surface open joints $\frac{5}{8}$. The 3x6 floor will be laid lengthwise of the building, and furred up, to give the stalls 2½ inch fall in the length of the stalls. Passageway furred up to the level with stall grating." We think no one, in reading this contract, could entertain any doubt that its meaning was that the entire flooring of the second story, designated the "stall floor," should be removed, and a new flooring of 3x6, laid lengthwise of the building, should be put in its place, and made water-proof with bitumen. The contract calls for "all the work of laying a new floor on the second story," not for the laying of a new floor where necessary. In connection with the contract, the opening paragraph of the specifications declares that the entire stall floor shall be so relaid; and in the next paragraph, as noting a recognized distinction between the stall floor and the floors of the stalls, it is provided that the "stall floors," or floors of the stalls, in addition to the 3x6 flooring, shall have this flooring coated with hot bitumen, and an additional two-inch surface floor laid on top. There does not seem in this contract to be enough of ambiguity to call for construction; but, if it be conceded that such ambiguity exists, remembering that the contractor himself drew this contract, and that it is indisputably shown that the owner had discussed with the contractor the necessity for a complete new flooring, and that the contractor had told him that it was necessary, and that the owner certainly understood the contract to mean that the entire second story was to be refloored, the provisions of sections 1649 and 1654 of the Civil Code at once become applicable. By section 1649 it is declared: "If the terms of a promise are in any respect ambiguous or uncertain, it must be interpreted in the sense in which the promisor believed at the time of making it that the promisee understood it." Section 1654 declares: "In case of uncertainty not removed by the preceding rules, the language of a contract should be interpreted most strongly against the party who caused the uncertainty to exist. The promisor is presumed to be such party." In furtherance of this presumption, it is here positively shown that the promisor himself drew the contract. Moreover, it is in evidence that the two contractors who likewise bid upon the work both understood the contract as calling for an entire new floor. The variance between the work called for and the work done was substantial, and plaintiff was not entitled to recover. Perry v. Quackenbush, 105 Cal. 299, 38 Pac. 740; Marchant v. Hayes, supra. The finding of the court in this regard was therefore unsupported, and the order denying a new trial is therefore reversed.

BRADLEY v. CLARKE. (Sac. 823.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 7, 1901.)

PURITY OF ELECTION ACT—VALIDITY—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—OFFICERS—QUALIFICATION—OATH—CONTEST OF RIGHT TO OFFICE—PLEADING—CROSS-EXAMINATION—WITNESSES—PRIVILEGE FROM TESTIFYING—SELF-CRIMINATION—OBJECTION BY WITNESS—SUFFICIENCY—WHO MAY DETERMINE—APPEAL—REVIEW—CONCESSION AS TO LAW.

1. So much of Purity of Election Act, § 4, as requires a successful candidate to swear to the statement of his expenses, etc., as a qualification to taking office, is void, as a violation of Const. art. 20, § 3, prescribing the oath which shall be taken, and providing that no other shall be required.

2. Where, in an action to contest a successful candidate's right to an office for illegal and excessive expenditures, and for his failure to file a true statement thereof, as required by the purity of election act, defendant testified as to his expense account, he could not be cross-examined as to expenditures not referred to in his testimony in chief.

3. As Purity of Election Act, § 32, expressly provides that a person offending against specified sections thereof may testify against other offenders, and thereupon be protected from subsequent prosecution therefor, he cannot claim immunity from testifying as to violations of the sections specified on the ground that his testimony would tend to criminate him.

4. In an action under such act, a witness was asked if he was present between specified dates, when a conversation occurred with defendant with reference to the payment of any money for campaign expenses. Held, that no conceivable reply thereto which the witness might properly give would or could tend to criminate him or degrade his character, and a refusal to answer on that ground should not have been sustained.

5. In an action under such act, involving a charge as to defendant's violation of section 11, in expending more than the maximum amount allowed by law, a recipient of money from defendant could not claim immunity from testifying as to whether he had received money from defendant, or by his direction, for the purpose of aiding or securing his election, on the ground that it would tend to criminate himself, since there is no violation of the law by the recipients of excessive expenditures, no duty being imposed on them to inquire how much a candidate has expended or purposes to expend.

6. It is for the trial court to pass on the sufficiency of a witness' objection to testifying, and not for him to decline to give relevant and pertinent testimony, which may be harmless to himself, on his mere declaration that his answer may tend to criminate or degrade him.

7. A complaint under such act, charging defendant with a promise of patronage to a person named, "with intent to promote his own [defendant's] election," charges an offense within subdivision 3 of section 19, which expressly makes it unlawful to promise any office, place, or employment to any person "in order to induce such person to procure or endeavor to procure the election of any person."

8. The court, on appeal, is not bound by a concession as to the law made by appellant's attorney. It is its duty to declare the law as it is, and not as either party may assume it to be.

Garoutte and McFarland, JJ., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; Matt F. Johnson, Judge.

Action by William H. Bradley against George H. Clarke, contesting defendant's right to an office. From a judgment for defendant, contestant appeals. Reversed.

A. L. Shinn and Wm. Hanley, for appellant. C. T. Jones, Peter J. Shields, and Hiram W. Johnson, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. This is an action instituted by an elector of the city of Sacramento, under the provisions of the purity of election act (St. 1893, p. 12), contesting the right of the defendant, mayor-elect of the city, to his office. After trial judgment passed for the defendant, and from that judgment contestant appeals, the evidence being brought up for review by bill of exceptions.

It is charged by contestant that, in violation of the purity of election act, the defendant was guilty of certain improper practices, in that (1) he did not file a statement of his election expenses, supported by his affidavit, as required by law; (2) that the statement filed was false in fact; (3) that money was illegally expended by him in aid of his election; (4) that he expended a sum of money, to secure his election, in excess of the maximum amount allowed by law; (5) that, to secure his election, he promised to bestow upon an elector of the city of Sacramento one-ninth of the official patronage of the office of mayor of the city, in the event of his election.

Section 3 of the purity of election act provides that "every candidate who is voted for at any public election held within the state shall, within fifteen days after the day of holding such election, file, as hereinafter provided, an itemized statement, showing in detail all moneys paid, loaned," etc. "There shall be attached to such statement an affidavit, subscribed and sworn to by such candidate, which must be substantially in the following form: 'State of California, County of —, ss. I (name), having been a candidate for the office of —, at the election held in the county, city and county, city, or other division, state of California, on the — day of —, 18—, do solemnly swear that I have paid the sum of $— for my expenses at the said election, and no more, and that, except as aforesaid, I have not, nor to the best of my knowledge and belief, has any person, club, society, or association on my behalf, directly or indirectly, made any payment, or given, promised or offered any reward, office, employment, or valuable consideration, or incurred any liability on account of or in respect of the conduct or management of the said election, and except such moneys as may have been paid to or expended by the committee selected as prescribed by the act of the legislature of this state, approved (date of this act). And I further solemnly swear that except as aforesaid, no money, security or equivalent for money, has to my knowledge or belief been paid, advanced, given, or deposited by any one, to or in the hands of myself, or any other person, for the purpose of defraying any expenses incurred on my behalf, or in aid of my election, or on account of or in respect of the conduct or management of the said election. And I further solemnly swear that I will not at any future time make, or be a party to the making or giving of any payment, reward, office, employment, or valuable consideration for the purpose of defraying any such expenses as last mentioned, or provide or be a party to the providing of any money, security, or equivalent for money, for the purpose of defraying any such expenses.'” By section 4 of the act it is provided: “Any candidate for a public office who shall refuse or neglect to file, or who makes a false statement of moneys received or expended, as prescribed by section 3 of this act, shall, in addition to the punishment for such offense prescribed by the laws of this state, forfeit any office to which he may have been elected at the election with reference to which the statement is required to be made. If a candidate elected to a public office refuses or neglects to file the statement prescribed by section 3 of this act, no certificate of election shall be issued to him, neither shall any official bond presented or offered by him be approved, and the incumbent of the office, unless he is himself a defaulting candidate, must not surrender or deliver up said office, but shall continue to discharge the duties and shall receive the emoluments thereof.”

Respondent contends that these provisions, or at least so much of them as requires a successful candidate to support his statement by his oath, as a prerequisite to his right to take office, are violative of the constitution of the state, and therefore void. From this conclusion we think there can be no escape. Article 20, § 3, of our state constitution, declares: “Members of the legislature, and all officers, executive and judicial, except such inferior officers as may be by law exempted, shall, before they enter upon the duties of their respective offices, take and subscribe the following oath, or affirmation: ‘I do solemnly swear (or affirm as the case may be) that I will support the constitution of the United States, and the constitution of the state of California, and that I will faithfully discharge the duties of the office of —, according to the best of my ability,’ and no other oath, declaration or test shall be required as a qualification for any office or public trust.” The constitution itself speaks of this prescribed oath as a “qualification” for an office. Equally is the oath required to be taken by the successful candidate a qualification for office, for the very provision of the act is that for his refusal or neglect in this regard, or for the making of a false statement, he shall be deprived of his office, and shall forfeit any office to which he may have been elected. In State v. Bemenderfer, 96 Ind. 376, it is said: “The term ‘qualify,’ as used in the statute, does not mean possessed of the necessary political, mental, and moral endowments, but means the acts performed after election, as taking the official oath and executing an official bond. * * * ‘Eligible’ means capable of being chosen, while ‘qualify’ means the performance of the acts which the person chosen is required to perform, before he can enter into office. * * * Abbott, in defining the word ‘qualify,’ says it means to take the oath and give the bond required by law from an administrator, executor, public officer, or the like, before he may enter into the discharge of his duties.” Had our constitution merely declared, as some do, that no other “test” than the one prescribed should be exacted of an officer elect, it might then be argued with some force that it had reference to such tests, in their nature religious, as those required by the act of Charles II., directed against Roman Catholics and dissenters, and which remained a blot upon the English statute books until 1828. But the constitution has designedly said, not alone that no other test should be required, but that no other “oath or declaration” should be exacted. This language leaves, as the only matter for determination, the single question whether this act does impose an oath or test substantially differing from that prescribed by the constitution. Cohen v. Wright, 22 Cal. 294. That it does prescribe a substantially different oath in addition to that made exclusive by the language of the constitution the very reading of the section makes manifest. But, in holding that the legislature may not prescribe this additional oath upon a successful candidate, as a prerequisite to his right to take office, and as an additional qualification to those enunciated by the constitution, we do not mean to be understood as saying that the legislature may not with propriety provide that a candidate shall forfeit his office for the doing of any of the inhibited acts, or for the failure to do any of the required acts set forth in the purity of election law. The legislature would have the undoubted power to require an officer elect to file just such a statement as the law now prescribes, and to provide that for a failure so to do he should forfeit his office or his right to office; but, under the strict mandate of the constitution, it has no right to exact this different and additional oath or affirmation before the taking of office, as a prerequisite thereto. So much, therefore, of the act as requires the candidate to support his statement by the above-quoted oath, as a prerequisite to the right to take office, is void.

The findings of the court negative the contention of appellant that the expenditures made for carriages and for banners by Booth, a friend of defendant, were made by him as the agent of Clarke, and consequently chargeable against Clarke under the law. These findings receive substantial support from the evidence, and need not further be considered.

The defendant called upon to testify to an item of $22.65, designated as "incidentals and sundries," stated: "The way that item happened to be put in the statement was that in filling my account I consulted with Mr. M. J. Desmond, the city clerk, and I had at that time vouchers for every dollar I spent during the campaign, and when we got down to amounts less than $5.00 he advised me to put them in under the head of 'sundries,' which I did, and destroyed the vouchers. They were all for sums less than $5.00. I did not pay any money for hacks on election day, and did not pay any money to Mr. Carragher for signs." Upon cross-examination contestant's attorney questioned the witness about other alleged illegal expenditures, for example: "Q. Did you pay to the Sacramento Publishing Company, for publication and printing work that they did for you in the campaign, the sum of $75.00?" Objection was made to these questions upon the ground that they were not cross-examination, and the objection was properly sustained. The testimony in chief was directed merely to the candidate's failure to segregate the item of $22, and to produce vouchers for the different amounts composing it. This, and his declaration that he had paid for no carriages or banners, makes the sum of his evidence. It was not within the scope of cross-examination upon these matters to seek to show what other or different amounts he might have expended. Upon that branch of inquiry the contestant could have called the defendant himself to the stand, when, if the witness was protected in the questions asked by the provisions of the law, he could have been compelled to answer.

Certain rulings upon questions propounded to the witness Cavanaugh, and his claim of privilege thereunder, merit more than passing notice. The complaint charged as follows: "That said purported statement of moneys received and expended, made and filed by defendant, is willfully false in the following particulars: * * * Third. That while defendant was a candidate as aforesaid, and for the purpose of aiding his election to said office of mayor, contestant is informed and believes, and upon such information and belief states the fact to be, that defendant paid to Wm. M. Sims the sum of one thousand nine hundred dollars, and that said Wm. M. Sims, with the knowledge and consent of defendant, and for the purpose of aiding the election of defendant to said office, paid to B. W. Cavanaugh the sum of three hundred dollars of said sum, and to Frank Daroux four hundred dollars of said sum, and to B. W. Cavanaugh, for Frank Farrar, $150, which sum was paid to said Frank Farrar by said B. W. Cavanaugh, and that said Wm. M. Sims paid to divers and sundry persons, unknown to contestants, the balance of said sum of $1,900; that said sums are not set forth in said statement." The complaint also charges "that while defendant was a candidate for election to said office of mayor, of said city of Sacramento, as aforesaid, defendant committed offenses against the elective franchise defined in title 4, pt. 1, of the Penal Code of the state of California, in the following particulars: * * * That the defendant, with intent to promote the election of himself to the office of mayor of said city of Sacramento, as aforesaid, as contestant is informed and believes, and upon such information and belief states the fact to be, did willfully offer a reward to an elector of said city of Sacramento, for the purpose of procuring the election of defendant, in this: That the defendant did, for the purpose of procuring his election as aforesaid, offer to one B. W. Cavanaugh, an elector of said city of Sacramento, one-ninth of the official patronage of said office of mayor of said city,—that is to say, that, in case defendant should be elected to said office, said B. W. Cavanaugh should name the persons who should be appointed by said mayor to fill one-ninth of the appointive offices in said city; that there are many such offices which are filled by appointment by the mayor of said city." The record shows the following proceedings touching the examination of Cavanaugh: "Counsel for contestant then asked the witness the following question: '(1) Were you present at any time between the 2d day of October and the 7th day of November, 1899, when a conversation occurred with the defendant with reference to the payment of any money for campaign expenses?' The witness replied: 'I decline to answer, on my constitutional rights, that I cannot be made a witness against myself, and I decline to criminate myself or degrade my character, and that to answer said question would tend to convict me of a felony.' Mr. Shinn, counsel for contestant, asked the court to make an order requiring the witness to answer the question. Mr. Shinn: 'We expect to show by this witness that at a certain time the defendant gave to one William M. Sims $1,900.00, to be used for his election purposes, and that William M. Sims gave to this witness $300.00 of that money, to be used on behalf of the defendant for his election purposes, and that he gave to another party another sum of money.' The court denied the request, and contestant excepted. Counsel for contestant asked the witness the following question: '(2) Mr. Cavanaugh, between the 2d day of October, 1899, and the 7th day of November, 1899, did you receive any money from defendant, George H. Clarke, or by his direction, for the purpose of aiding or securing his election?' The witness declined to answer, on the ground that his answer would tend to criminate himself, and would have a tendency to subject him to punishment for a felony. Counsel for contestant made an application to the court for an order requiring the witness to answer the question. The application was denied, and contestant excepted. Counsel for contestant asked the witness the following question: '(3) Did the defendant, George H. Clarke, at any time promise you one-ninth or any portion of the official patronage of the office of mayor of the city of Sacramento, in case he was elected,—that is, any time between the 2d day of October and the 7th day of November, 1899?' The witness refused to answer the question on the ground that his answer would tend to criminate him, and that his answer would have a tendency to subject him to punishment for a felony. Counsel for contestant made an application to the court for an order requiring the witness to answer the question. The application was denied, and the contestant excepted. * * * Counsel for contestant, by leave of the court, and for the purpose of making the record clear by pointing his exception to the ruling of the court, stated that he desired to prove by the witnesses the facts set forth in the question asked, and asked the witness the following question: '(4) Did yourself and the defendant, Clarke, Frank Daroux, James L. Gillis, Wm. M. Sims, or any of the parties named, meet in the Oschner Building, on or about the 6th day of November, 1899, and at such meeting did George H. Clarke offer or promise to put up or advance any money for election purposes to any of the parties present, and did he say, in substance, that Mr. Sims would go with him; that Mr. Wm. M. Sims would bring the money back, and make the disposition of it that he had mentioned; and did he and Mr. Sims leave, and subsequently Mr. Sims returned with this money; and did he pay to you the sum of $300.00, or any other sum, and to Frank Daroux the sum of $400.00, or any other sum, and to any other person any sum of money, out of the money that he brought back?' The witness declined to answer the question upon the grounds hereinbefore stated, and that the answer would have a tendency to subject him to punishment for a felony. The court ruled that he was not required to answer, and the counsel for contestant excepted. The counsel for contestant asked the witness the following question: '(5) You claim, Mr. Cavanaugh, that to answer that question would have a tendency to convict you of a felony?' A. 'Yes, sir.'

It is shown that the salary of the mayor of Sacramento is $3,000 per annum. Under the purity of election act, the candidate for this office is permitted to spend 10 per cent. of one year's salary, or $300. The candidate's sworn statement showed an expenditure of $289.15. Section 32 of the act provides: "A person offending against any provision of sections 19, 20, 21, 22, 25, 26, 27, 28, 30, and 31, of this act is a competent witness against another person so offending, and may be compelled to attend and testify upon any trial, hearing, proceeding or lawful investigation or judicial proceeding in the same manner as any other person." Subdivisions 2 and 3 of section 19 are as follows: "Sec.

19. It shall be unlawful for any person directly or indirectly, by himself or through any other person, * * * (2) to give, offer or promise any office, place or employment, or to promise to procure, or endeavor to procure, any office, place or employment to or for any voter, or to or for any other person in order to induce such voter to vote, or refrain from voting at any election, or to induce any voter to vote or refrain from voting at such election for any particular person or persons; (3) to make any gift, loan, promise, offer, procurement or agreement as aforesaid, to, for or with any person in order to induce such person to procure or endeavor to procure the election of any person, or the vote of any voter at any election." Section 30 is as follows: "Sec. 30. Every person who being * * * a candidate for a public office at an election, makes and files any false statement of moneys received and expended on account of or in respect of the conduct and management of the election in reference to which such statement is filed, is guilty of perjury, and is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison for not less than one year nor more than seven years." Section 11 of the act (which section is without the purview and exemption of section 32), is as follows: "Sec. 11. Whenever any candidate for a public office pays, lends, or contributes, or offers or agrees to pay, to lend or contribute any money or other valuable consideration to or for any person, either for: (1) The doing or procuring to be done of any act forbidden to be done by the laws of this state relating to public elections; * * * (7) for any purpose in contravention of the provisions of this act, or (8) for any purpose whatever in excess of the maximum amount which such candidate may lawfully expend under the provisions of this act, * * * such candidate shall in addition to the punishment prescribed by the laws of this state or by this act, forfeit any office to which he may have been elected at the election in reference to which such crime or offense was committed, and, if the candidate so offending is the incumbent of an office of profit or trust under the laws of this state, he shall thereby forfeit this office."

With these provisions of the law before us, was the court justified in sustaining the refusal of the witness Cavanaugh to answer these questions upon the ground that his answer would tend to criminate or degrade him? And in answer to this the legal consideration may be thus stated: If the matter sought to be elicited by the questions was matter embraced within the purview of any of the sections 19, 20, 21, 22, 25, 26, 27, 28, 30, or 31, and if with the defendant as a "person offending" the witness himself was also a "person offending," then by the express provisions of section 32, and by the authority of this court in Ex parte Cohen, 104 Cal. 524, 38 Pac. 364, 26 L. R. A. 423, the witness could not claim immunity, and should have been compelled to testify. But, upon the other hand, if the defendant was a person offending, within the meaning of these sections, and the witness Cavanaugh was an innocent and nonoffending person, within the meaning of these sections, then the witness' claim of privilege was untenable, because his answers could not tend to criminate him or convict him of an offense. The design of section 32 is to compel evidence from an offending person which, but for the protection afforded by the section, he could justifiably refuse to give, but an innocent person, having no need of such protection and exemption, cannot claim such privilege.

Coming now to the questions propounded to the witness, and taking them up seriatim, the question marked "1" is manifestly but a preliminary question, answerable by "Yes" or "No." No conceivable answer which the witness might properly give would or could tend to criminate him or degrade his character. The question marked "2," touching the reception of money from Clarke for the purpose of aiding or securing his election, presents a threefold aspect: First, if it has to do with the illegal giving of money by defendant, received and used by the witness for improper purposes, then the offense is one contemplated by the sections above quoted, and particularly by section 19, subd. 1, and the witness in his answer would be fully protected by the immunity afforded him by section 32; but, second, if it be said that there was nothing illegal in the candidate giving to Cavanaugh money to be used in aid of his election, because the gift, expenditure, and use of such money is recognized by the act, then Cavanaugh, at least, had not offended in accepting the money for the indicated purposes, and therefore had no right to claim his privilege; third, the charge in the complaint is that the defendant expended moneys in excess of the maximum amount which he could lawfully expend. Section 11, subd. 8. A candidate might unlawfully do this, and yet the recipients of the money in no way violate the law. No law imposes upon the recipient of a candidate's gift or money the duty of inquiring how much he (the candidate) has expended or proposes to expend to secure his election. Cavanaugh would have been guiltless of any offense, therefore, in receiving the money, and could not refuse to answer the question as to whether or not he had received it, and the amount that he had so received, because the inquiry was strictly pertinent to the case, and strictly within the charges preferred against the defendant, to wit, that he had expended more than the maximum amount permitted by law. He had filed his statement of the amount that he had expended. If the prosecution was not permitted to bring in witnesses, and show one by one that the candidate had given to them moneys for election purposes, for which he had not accounted in his statement, how could a contestant ever prove such a violation, and such a flagrant violation of the election law?

Question 3 deals with the alleged promise by the defendant to Cavanaugh of office, and the patronage of his office of mayor,—an offense clearly embraced within section 19, subd. 2, of the act. This, however, is made by the act an offense against the promising party, not against the person to whom the promise is made, even though he may act upon it. We have read the act with some care to discover whether one who accepts such a promise, and upon the consideration of it votes, or induces others to vote, is guilty of an offense, but no such provision has come under our observation, and our attention has been directed to none such. But, even if such a provision exists and has been overlooked, it merely makes the promisee an offending person with the promisor, and still the promisee cannot refuse to testify, because he is protected by section 32. If, however, the promisee be not an offending person, while clearly the promisor is, then, as has been before said, the promisee has committed no offense, needs no immunity, and has no privilege upon which to stand in his refusal to answer the question. All that has been said applies with equal force to the fourth question.

But if it be said that respondent's counsel have had no opportunity to show that the answers to the questions would have tended to criminate Cavanaugh, it may be answered—First, that, if they would have tended to criminate him, then, as above set forth, he would have had immunity; and, second, that this showing is not to be made in this court for the first time, but is to be made to the satisfaction of the trial judge in the first instance, before the witness can justify his refusal to testify. As was said by this court in Re Rogers, 129 Cal. 468, 62 Pac. 47: "It is for the court to pass upon the sufficiency of the objection which the witness urges to answering, and not for the witness to decline to give relevant and pertinent testimony which may be harmless to himself, upon his mere declaration that his answer may tend to criminate or degrade him." The trial court accepted the naked declaration of the witness, and, as has been pointed out, if he was a co-offender he was protected, if not, he could not claim immunity, and in either case the ruling was erroneous.

But it is said that the complaint charges a promise of patronage to Cavanaugh, "with the intent to promote his own [Clarke's] election"; and that this is not an offense, within section 19, subd. 2, because there it is stated that the promise must be made for the purpose of inducing a voter to refrain from voting or to vote for some particular person. Upon this it is perhaps enough to say that we are not considering the sufficiency of the allegation of the complaint against a special demurrer, and certainly, when a man makes a promise of patronage to secure his election, it is pretty well understood that the consideration is that the promisee will not only vote himself for the promisor, but induce as many of his friends as possible to do the same; but, aside from this, subdivision 3 of section 19 (which seems to have been overlooked) expressly makes it unlawful to promise any office, place, or employment to any person "in order to induce such person to procure or endeavor to procure the election of any person." Surely this offense is charged in the complaint.

Finally, it is urged that it is conceded by appellant that the defendant's answers would tend to criminate him, and that our inquiry need go no further than this concession; or, in other words, that we are bound to accept as matter of law, and as a rule of evidence, a concession as to the law made by appellant's attorney, no matter how faulty that concession may be. The answer to this, I think, is plain: First, that we are not bound by such concession, our duty being to declare the law as it is, and not as either appellant or respondent may assume it to be; and, second, that, if we are to regard ourselves bound by this so-called concession or admission, we must be bound by all of it,—we have no right to accept a part and reject a part. It is like a stipulation,—either all of its terms are to be given effect, or none of them. The admission of appellant, as will be seen from his brief, is not a general admission that Cavanaugh's answers would tend to criminate him. It was no more than a declaration and argument that the question came within the purview of section 19, and therefore, if his answers tended to criminate him, still he would be protected by the provisions of section 32. But, in fact, the declaration of appellant's attorneys is not a concession or admission at all. What they say upon this point is the following: "The court erred in denying contestant's application for an order requiring witness B. W. Cavanaugh to answer the questions propounded to him. The statement or complaint alleged that defendant had expended and paid to W. M. Sims $1,900 for the purpose of aiding his election, which sum was distributed to B. W. Cavanaugh, Frank Darroux, Frank Farrar, and other persons. The payment was a violation of section 19, subd. 3, Act 1893. The questions which the witness refused to answer pointed directly to the alleged payment of $1,900, and to the offer to give Cavanaugh one-ninth of the official patronage of the office. Section 11, subds. 7, 9, provide that a candidate shall forfeit his office for making any payment in contravention of the provisions of the act. The charge was directed to a violation of section 19, and charged a payment which is prohibited by subdivision 3 of that section. Section 32 of the act provides that a witness may testify against any one offending against any of the provisions of section 19, and that he shall not thereafter be prosecuted for any offense with reference to which his testimony was given." We are unable to perceive in this any concession or admission justifying this court in saying that the determination of this important question is or thus can be eliminated from its consideration. For these reasons, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: BEATTY, C. J.; TEMPLE, J.; VAN DYKE, J.; HARRISON, J.

GAROUTTE and McFARLAND, JJ. (dissenting). We dissent from the judgment of reversal, and think the judgment of the superior court should be affirmed. We concur in the opinion of Mr. Justice HENSHAW, except so far as it deals with the questions asked of the witness Cavanaugh, but we cannot agree to the conclusion reached on that subject.

EJECTMENT — PLEADINGS — DESCRIPTION OF LAND — DISCLAIMER — PARTICIPATION IN TRIAL — REFUSAL — EFFECT — JUDGMENT — CHANGING DESCRIPTION.

1. Defendant having disclaimed any interest in lands sued for, as described in the complaint, his default was entered. Just before trial, on learning that his interest in adjoining land was imperiled, he hired counsel, and asked leave to participate in the trial and to amend his answer, which was denied; and thereafter judgment was rendered describing the land by metes and bounds, so as to include land belonging to defendant. Held that, defendant having used due diligence on learning that his property rights might be affected, it was error to refuse to allow him to defend.

2. A judgment rendered in ejectment, describing other land than that described in the complaint, was erroneous, as not within the issues made.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; J. W. Hughes, Judge.

Action by the Balfour-Guthrie Investment Company against F. R. Sawday and others. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant Sawday appeals. Reversed.

W. T. McNealy and Andrews & O'Farrell, for appellant. G. H. P. Shaw and Mills & Higar, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Plaintiff sued appellant, Sawday, and others, by a complaint containing allegations appropriate both in an action in ejectment and in an action to quiet title. The land was described by government subdivision as "the southwest quarter of the southeast quarter, and the southeast quarter of the southwest quarter," etc. For answer, appellant, Sawday, disclaimed "all right, title, and interest in the lands herein sued for, and as set forth in the plaintiff's complaint." His default was subsequently entered by the clerk. The cause was set for trial upon the 26th day of June, but no notice of the trial was served upon him. Hearing at a late day that the cause was set for trial, and might affect his lands, he hastened to the county seat, employed counsel, and, upon the case coming up for hearing, asked leave to participate, which was denied. He also asked leave to amend his answer, which application was also denied, and he was denied the right to participate in any manner at the trial. Thereafter, upon July 28th, he moved the court to set aside his default, and this was denied. On August 1st, findings of fact and conclusions of law and the judgment were filed. In the complaint the land and premises were described by government subdivisions alone. In the judgment, in addition to such description, the land was described by metes and bounds, natural boundaries and monuments were designated and located, and reference, for the purpose of delimiting the land, was made to a map or diagram which forms part of the judgment roll in another and independent action. Promptly after the entry of this judgment, upon August 11, 1899, the appellant moved the court to vacate it and set it aside, which motion was denied. He then moved to strike out that part of the description in the findings and judgment not contained in the complaint, and to limit the description of the land to the language of the complaint. This also was denied. He further moved to set aside the judgment so far as it affected him, and this motion was denied. From the judgment and from the orders denying his several motions he prosecutes these appeals.

To an understanding of the matter, it is necessary to clothe the foregoing naked statement with other established facts. The defendant Sawday never did, and does not now, make claim to any of the lands in the complaint described, as described in the complaint. His lands are adjoining, contiguous government subdivisions. Therefore, when served with the complaint, and knowing that he had not, and did not claim to have, any right or title or interest to the government subdivisions described in the complaint, he promptly and properly disclaimed. By the findings, and by the judgment entered upon this complaint, the lands are described and located so as to embrace lands held and claimed by Sawday. In short, under the guise of an action in ejectment, or an action to quiet title, describing by government subdivisions lands to which the defendant never made claim, the action is, in effect, converted into an action to demarkate boundaries; and those boundaries, it is contended, shift the location of the land in controversy some half a mile north and the same distance east of the land described in the complaint. Appellant, learning at the eleventh hour that his interests might be involved in this suit, drove through the night to the town of San Diego, arrived there in the morning, promptly employed counsel, appeared at the time set for trial, and by his numerous motions, showing his earnestness and good faith, sought leave to participate in the trial. Had the judgment which was finally rendered in the case conformed to the complaint, it might be said that, as no harm resulted to this appellant from the judgment, the refusal of the court to allow him to participate in the trial was not an abuse of discretion; but, in contemplation of the judgment which was actually rendered, it is clear that it was. It is the policy of the law that every case should be litigated upon its merits, and, however negligent it may be said that Sawday was in the first instance, he certainly showed due diligence when his attention was called to the fact that his property rights might be in jeopardy. Even if his participation in the trial might have occasioned some embarrassment or delay to plaintiff, this could easily have been met by an order of the court allowing him so to participate upon terms.

But, aside from the court's ruling upon the motions, the judgment itself cannot stand. As against a defaulting or disclaiming defendant, the relief must be consistent with the case made upon the complaint and embraced within the issues. Section 580, Code Civ. Proc. The case of Holman v. Vallejo, 19 Cal. 499, is here directly in point, and almost parallel in its facts. The action was to enforce a verbal contract for the sale of lands. Defendant's demurrer to the complaint was overruled, and, defendant failing to answer, plaintiff took judgment by default. Defendant appealed, and urged upon his appeal that the land described in the judgment was other and different from that set forth in the complaint. This court said: "On the latter point the plaintiff insists that the lands are the same, and appeals to the evidence in the case to prove the correctness of his assertion. This evidence was taken ex parte, and we think that upon so important a matter as the establishment of the actual boundaries of the property the defendant has a right to be heard. * * * Upon the return of the cause the plaintiff can either take judgment in accordance with the allegations of the complaint, or amend by inserting a more specific description of the property." See, also, Gregory v. Nelson, 41 Cal. 278, and Ellis v. Rademacher, 125 Cal. 556, 58 Pac. 178. The judgment and orders appealed from are therefore reversed.

APPEAL AND ERROR—FINDING OF FACT—REVIEW—ATTORNEY—SERVICES—VALUE—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY—HARMLESS ERROR—GOOD CHARACTER—PROOF.

1. Where the finding of the jury as to the value of an attorney's services was within the evidence, the verdict will not be disturbed as excessive.

2. Where the fact that plaintiff's assignor was employed as attorney in a certain case was admitted by the pleadings, and there was no claim that he was employed at a fixed compensation, evidence as to how he came to be employed was not admissible to show whether there was an agreement as to the amount of his compensation.

3. Where an excluded question was subsequently received in a different form, and the witness was fully interrogated as to the excluded matter, the exclusion was harmless.

4. Where the attorney who opposed plaintiff's assignor in the trial of a case stated to the jury all the facts on which he based the value of the assignor's legal services, but testified that he could not state their value without looking into his mind, an answer, after consideration, fixing the value, was not objectionable as based on what was in the witness' mind, and not on the evidence.

5. Where an attorney testified to the value of certain legal services, the question what annual income such a valuation would enable a man to make was properly excluded.

6. The striking out of answers to hypothetical questions after they had been received cured error committed in receiving them.

7. Where, in an action for the reasonable value of an attorney's services, the defendant pleaded as a special defense that the value of the services was to be fixed by defendant and a third party, and that the amount had not been determined, it was proper to charge that if defendant, before the commencement of the suit, denied any indebtedness to plaintiff, and if it was not also agreed that no suit should be brought until after the amount due had been fixed by defendant and the third party, then the agreement was not a bar to the action, and plaintiff was entitled to a verdict.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by Albert T. Roche against E. J. Baldwin. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Lloyd & Wood and Byron Waters, for appellant. Theodore J. Roche and Linforth & Whitaker, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. This action was to recover for the value of the services rendered to defendant by plaintiff's assignor, Henry E. Highton, as attorney and counselor at law. The jury returned a verdict for plaintiff for the sum of $8,755.60, and from the judgment which followed, and from the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, he prosecutes this appeal.

It is urged with much earnestness that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict, in that the services of Mr. Highton were of far less value than the jury found. But this is only another form of saying that the value placed upon the services by the jury was excessive. That value, however, was within the evidence, and the finding cannot be disturbed.

The remaining points presented on this appeal go to alleged errors of the court in its ruling upon offered evidence. Upon cross-examination the witness Highton was asked several questions touching his employment in the Ashley case. Objection was interposed to these questions, and the objection sustained. The fact of Mr. Highton's employment in this case was admitted by the pleading. The plaintiff charged for the value under quantum meruit. There was no pretense on behalf of plaintiff that the compensation in this litigation was fixed in any specific sum. The questions, therefore, were irrelevant to any issues made in the case. The employment of Mr. Highton in the Ashley case having been admitted, the court said, "Then what concern is it to the jury how he came to be employed?" Appellant's counsel replied, "It has a relevancy to the question as to whether there was any agreement as to the amount of his compensation." This is the only reason for propounding the question, but, as has been said, there was no claim whatsoever that the amount of his compensation had been fixed. Moreover, the same question was subsequently asked in different form, the witness fully interrogated upon the matter, and his answers received. Mr. Crittenden had been an attorney against Mr. Highton in the trial of the Ashley case.

Asked as to the value which he put upon the services of Mr. Highton in that litigation which came under his (Mr. Crittenden's) observation, and concerning the nature of which he had already testified, the witness answered: "I could not answer that question unless I looked into my mind, and then reviewed the study of matters that came under my observation; otherwise, I cannot answer it. Q. Taking that into consideration, what would you say as to the reasonable value of those services?" The witness then answered, fixing the value at $12,000. The objection to this is that the witness was allowed to fix value by looking into his mind, and testifying in regard to facts not in evidence; but the witness had already presented to the jury the facts upon which he based the valuation, and there was no error in the admission of the evidence. Again, the same witness is asked: "According to your basis, and according to the way practice ordinarily runs, what annual income would that make to a man?" The court properly sustained an objection to this question, saying: "That would depend upon the number of cases. The witness could not possibly answer the question." The hypothetical question asked of the witnesses Paterson, Campbell, and Jordan were answered, and subsequently the court reconsidered its ruling and the answers were stricken out, upon motion of defendant's attorney. If there was error in the reception of this evidence it was cured by striking it out, and nothing was left for the defendant to complain of. People v. Willson, 109 N. Y. 352, 16 N. E. 540; People v. Shaver, 120 Cal. 354, 52 Pac. 661. The court instructed the jury as follows: "If you believe from the evidence that Mr. Highton agreed with Mr. Baldwin and Mr. Unruh, at the time of his employment in the case of Ashley against Baldwin, that Mr. Unruh and Mr. Baldwin should fix the amount of compensation for the services to be by him rendered in that case, and that he was to receive and accept the sum they saw fit to name, yet, if defendant, before the commencement of this suit, denied any liability or indebtedness to Highton, and if it was not also agreed between them that no suit should be brought against Mr. Baldwin to recover the value of the services until after such sum or amount had been by Mr. Baldwin and Mr. Unruh so fixed, then, in that event, I charge you that such an agreement, if any, is not a bar or a defense to this action, and plaintiff is entitled to a verdict at your hands for the reasonable value of the services by him rendered, if any, after deducting therefrom any sum or amount due from Mr. Highton to defendant, if any." It is asserted that this was error, in taking away from the consideration of the jury the special defense pleaded in the answer, to the effect that the value of the services of Mr. Highton rendered in the Ashley case should be determined by defendant and one H. A. Unruh, and that defendant should not be required to pay Mr. Highton for his services in the Ashley case any sum whatever until the amount thereof had been fixed and determined by defendant and Unruh. But, as was said by this court in Remy v. Olds, 88 Cal. 542, 26 Pac. 355: "The law does not require the performance of a useless act, and, when it is made to appear by the defendant's own act that the demand would have been refused, then they cannot be heard to object that no demand was made." Here the defendant had persistently denied that he owed his attorney anything on account of the services in the Ashley case. Moreover, there was no provision in the agreement pleaded in the answer that no action should be brought until after defendant and Unruh had fixed the amount of Mr. Highton's compensation. In Hamilton v. Insurance Co., 137 U. S. 370, 11 Sup. Ct. 133, 34 L. Ed. 708, a like question came under consideration. The action was upon an insurance policy, which contained the following clause: "In case differences shall arise touching any loss or damage, * * * the matter shall, at the written request of either party, be submitted to impartial arbitrators, whose award in writing shall be binding on the parties as to the amount of such loss or damage, but shall not decide the liability of this company under this policy." The supreme court of the United States held that this clause could not be availed of as a plea in bar to the action, in the absence of a further provision, which it did not contain, that no action should be brought until after the award. But, if it be conceded that there was any error in the instruction, it was certainly harmless to appellant, since throughout the case he denied any indebtedness to Mr. Highton upon account of his services in the Ashley litigation. The judgment and order appealed from are therefore affirmed.

CONTRACTS—SALE OF LAND—PERFORMANCE—

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Orange county; J. W. Ballard, Judge.

Action by M. C. Chase against John Cameron and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Reversed.

M. W. Conkling, for appellants. J. H. Ardis and Kendrick & Knott, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. Judgment was entered for the plaintiff upon the findings, and the defendants appeal therefrom, and from an order denying a new trial.

Defendant John Cameron, being the owner of certain real estate, on September 21, 1895, entered into a contract with one G. A. Clark, whereby he agreed to sell the same to Clark for the sum of $3,550; $2,000 to be paid December 1, 1897, and $1,550 to be paid December 1, 1898. As to interest upon the purchase money, the contract provided as follows: "It is hereby agreed that the second party hereto pays to the first parties $240 each and every year as interest upon the aforesaid $2,000.00, and $112 as interest upon the said $1,550.00." The contract was silent as to when the purchaser should have possession, but Clark went into possession, without objection, in January, 1896; and afterwards the plaintiff, M. C. Chase, sunk a well on the land described in the complaint, under a contract with Clark, for the sum of $300, and obtained judgment therefor, and sold the right, title, and interest of Clark in said land under execution, and on June 19, 1897, obtained the sheriff's deed therefor. Chase thereupon presented his deed to Clark and demanded possession, which Clark refused. Chase afterwards obtained a writ of possession, but before it was served Clark surrendered possession to Cameron's agent; and on August 18, 1897, Chase brought this action against Cameron and his wife, and made John Doe and Richard Roe co-defendants. The suit, as originally brought, was in form of an action to quiet title, alleging that the plaintiff was the owner and entitled to the possession; that defendants claimed some interest, but that such claim was without right. The cause came on for trial on June 2, 1899; and on that day, by leave of the court, and against the objection of defendants that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, plaintiff filed an amendment to his complaint as "a further and separate cause of action." This amendment alleged the facts hereinbefore stated, charged that defendant Cameron and Clark fraudulently conspired to defeat plaintiff's writ of possession, and, to that end, that Clark surrendered possession and placed Cameron in possession for a valuable consideration. It also alleged "that at the time this action was commenced" there was nothing due to Cameron upon said agreement; that all of the terms and conditions thereof "due at that time" on the part of Clark had been performed; that plaintiff is the owner of all the right, title, and interest of said Clark; that defendant Cameron had notice of the commencement of his said action against Clark; that Cameron has refused, and "will continue to refuse, to allow plaintiff to exercise the right guarantied to him by the said contract as the successor in interest of said Clark, and will continue to appropriate to his own use the crops from the said ranch, unless restrained by the court from so doing"; that, unless plaintiff's right and interest is established by record, Cameron will sell said property without giving notice to the vendee of plaintiff's rights. A copy of said contract of sale is attached to the complaint. The prayer of the original complaint was, in substance, that defendants be decreed to have no interest or estate in the land or premises, and be forever debarred from asserting any claim adverse to the plaintiff. The amended complaint added to the prayer that said contract "be declared to be a fact; that plaintiff be decreed to be the owner of all the rights and privileges under and pursuant to said agreement," and entitled to the possession of the property. The answers of defendants put in issue all the material allegations of each of the causes of action,—especially the right of plaintiff to possession of the land, the alleged fraudulent conspiracy with Clark, and the allegation that nothing was due to Cameron upon the contract at the time the action was commenced.

The court found: (1) That plaintiff at the time the action was commenced was, and now is, the equitable owner, and as such is entitled to the possession, of the land; that Cameron holds the legal title, and claims an interest adversely to the plaintiff. (2) The making of the contract to convey to Clark; that Clark went into possession under said agreement, and made improvements thereon, with the knowledge and consent of Cameron, of the value of $540. (3) That plaintiff obtained judgment against Clark on October 26, 1896, foreclosing Clark's interest and title; the sale thereunder to plaintiff; the deed of the sheriff, whereby he became the owner of all the right, title, and interest of Clark; and that defendants had notice of the commencement of said action against Clark. (4) That on the — day of June, 1897, plaintiff exhibited his said deed to Clark and demanded possession, which was refused; that a writ of possession was issued to plaintiff; that, before it was served, defendant Cameron and Clark fraudulently conspired to defeat said writ, and to that end Clark surrendered possession to Cameron. (5) That the contract between Cameron and Clark was not recorded, and that, unless plaintiff's right be established of record, Cameron would dispose of the property without notice to the vendee of plaintiff's equitable right,—and, as conclusions of law, that plaintiff is the equitable owner of the land, and is now entitled to the possession of the whole thereof; that Cameron holds the legal title, subject to the rights and interests of the plaintiff; and that plaintiff be put in possession; and judgment was entered accordingly.

The plaintiff succeeded to the rights of Clark under the contract of the latter with Cameron, and acquired no other or different right. The allegations of the complaint and the findings concede that plaintiff has nothing more than an equitable title, and that defendant Cameron holds the legal title. An action to quiet title cannot be maintained by the owner of an equitable interest as against the holder of the legal title. Von Drachenfels v. Doolittle, 77 Cal. 295, 19 Pac. 518; Harrigan v. Mowry, 84 Cal. 467, 22 Pac. 658, 24 Pac. 48; Tuffree v. Polhemus, 108 Cal. 676, 41 Pac. 806; Burris v. Adams, 96 Cal. 667, 31 Pac. 565; McDonald v. McCoy, 121 Cal. 71, 53 Pac. 421. This proposition is elementary. The action, as originally brought, was, beyond question, an action to quiet title. The new cause of action stated in the amendment to the complaint, I think, was nothing more. If, however, it could be considered an action upon the contract to recover possession, it is fatally defective, and defendant's objection to its being filed should have been sustained. To entitle the plaintiff to any relief, it was essential that he should allege and prove that he, or Clark, to whose rights he had succeeded, had performed the contract upon his part. This amendment was filed on June 2, 1899, and the final payment was due December 1, 1898. It was neither alleged nor found that any payment had ever been made upon the contract either by Clark or the plaintiff. It was alleged, however, that at the time the action was commenced there was nothing due to Cameron upon said contract. There was no finding upon that allegation. But the contrary appears from the amendment to the complaint. It set out a copy of the contract, which shows that it was made September 21, 1895; that the principal sum for which the land was sold was divided into two payments, the first due December 1, 1897, and the second December 1, 1898, and as to interest it was provided as follows: "It is hereby agreed that the second party hereto pays to the first parties $240 each and every year as interest upon the aforesaid $2,000.00, and $112 as interest upon said $1,550.00." The purchaser was to have the option of paying the principal at any time in advance of the dates fixed, and upon such payment the interest should cease. Respondent contends that the provision relating to interest, being in the present tense, "he pays each and every year," is ambiguous, and that a condition involving a forfeiture must be strictly interpreted. There is no ambiguity in the clause relating to interest. The purchaser was to pay interest in a specified amount "each and every year," and more than a year had elapsed, and a year's interest, at the least, was due and unpaid when this suit was commenced. It is, however, alleged, and the court found, that Clark had made improvements on the land of the value of $540. The allegation and the finding are wholly immaterial. There was no provision in the contract that Clark should make any improvements. They were made voluntarily for his own benefit. It would be a novel proposition that if he had made in the first year improvements of the value of $3,550, that being the whole of the purchase price, the property would be paid for, and that he could maintain a bill in equity to compel Cameron to convey the legal title. At the time the new cause of action was pleaded, the whole of the purchase money was due and unpaid. The plaintiff stood in no better position than if he had purchased Clark's interest and had taken an assignment of his contract, and has no remedy that he would not have had if he had been such assignee, and none that Clark would not have had if his interest under said contract had not been sold by the sheriff. The plaintiff never complied, nor offered to comply, with the terms of said contract, nor with the offer of Cameron, in his answer, to convey to him upon payment of the principal and interest due upon the contract according to its terms. There is no evidence to support the finding that defendants had notice of the action of Chase against Clark, nor the further finding that Cameron and Clark fraudulently conspired to defeat the writ of possession obtained by the plaintiff. Cameron was entitled to possession under his contract (Clark having defaulted), and was not a party to the action in which the writ was issued; nor do the findings or evidence support the conclusion of law that plaintiff is entitled to possession of the land, nor the judgment awarding him possession. The judgment and order appealed from should be reversed.

We concur: SMITH, C.; CHIPMAN, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are reversed.

HOWARD v. BRYAN et al. (Sac. 634.)
(Supreme Court of California. June 21, 1901.)
GUARDIAN AND WARD—MORTGAGE OF WARD'S PROPERTY—PURPOSE.

1. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1578, providing that the court may authorize a guardian of a minor to mortgage the property of his ward to pay or renew some lien thereon, an order authorizing a mortgage of the ward's property wholly or in part to discharge a lien on the property of the guardian is invalid.

2. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1578, providing that the property of a minor may be mortgaged to pay or renew a lien thereon, where there are several minors owning undivided interests in the same property, each subject to a lien, the interest of each minor cannot be mortgaged to secure the aggregate of all their debts, but each must be bound only for his part thereof.

Garoutte and McFarland, JJ., dissenting.

In bank. On rehearing. Affirmed.
For former opinion, see 62 Pac. 459.

Arthur E. Miller and Albert M. Johnson, for appellant. R. Platnauer and White &
Seymour, for respondents.

BEATTY, C. J. The plaintiff in this action seeks to foreclose two mortgages alleged to have been given as security for the same debt. The first mortgage was executed by the adult owners of certain undivided interests in a tract of land, and as to that there is no controversy. The second mortgage purports to have been executed by the guardian of five minor children, who were owners of the remaining undivided interests in the same tract. By the decree of the superior court the first mortgage was foreclosed, but as to the second the plaintiff was nonsuited upon the ground that the order of court purporting to authorize it was void. From this portion of the decree the plaintiff has appealed, and the principal question to be determined is the correctness of the ruling of the superior court sustaining the objection of the respondents to the admission in evidence of the so-called "guardian's mortgage,"—an objection which was based upon the sole ground that the order of court purporting to authorize said mortgage was void for want of jurisdiction. The law which empowers executors, administrators, and guardians, when duly authorized by order of court, to mortgage the estates of decedents, minors, and incompetents, is embraced in sections 1577, 1578, of the Code of Civil Procedure, as originally enacted in 1887, and as since amended. The proceedings involved in this inquiry, having been commenced subsequent to March 3, 1893, are governed by the law as amended at that date (St. 1893, p. 72), and the question is whether, upon the face of the record, it appears that the substantial requirements of the statute were complied with in procuring the order empowering the guardian to execute this mortgage. The steps to be taken by a guardian to obtain such an order are prescribed by section 1578 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the first of which is that he must file a petition showing: (1) "The particular purpose or purposes for which it is proposed to make the note or notes and mortgage, which shall be either to pay the debts, legacies or charges of administration, or to pay, reduce, extend or renew some lien or mortgage already subsisting in said realty, or some part thereof"; (2) "a statement of the debts, legacies, charges of administration, liens, or mortgages to be paid, reduced, extended or renewed, as the case may be"; (3) "the advantage that may accrue to the estate from raising the required money by note or notes and mortgage, or providing for the payment, reduction, extension, or renewal of the subsisting liens or mortgages, as the case may be"; (4) "the amount to be raised, with a general description of the property proposed to be mortgaged"; and (5) "the names of the legatees and devisees, if any, and of the heirs of the deceased, or of the minor, or of the incompetent person, as the case may be, so far as known to the petitioner." The filing of such petition is to be followed by an order of the court directing all persons interested to appear, and show cause, if any they can, why authority to mortgage should not be granted, and by a hearing at the time designated. If, upon a full hearing, the court is satisfied that it will be for the advantage of the estate, an order empowering and directing the guardian to execute the mortgage is made. From this it appears that the foundation of jurisdiction in cases of this sort is the petition filed by the guardian for leave to mortgage, and therefore the first thing to be considered is the sufficiency of the petition for the order here in question. It was filed April 3, 1893, by the mother of the respondents, and showed that her husband, Isaac Bryan, had died in October, 1885, leaving a will, by which she was appointed executrix, and guardian of the minor children; that she had administered the estate, but had never legally qualified as guardian until March 27, 1893, at which time she became the duly-qualified guardian of the five youngest children (the respondents here); that the estate of her husband, which consisted exclusively of the land described in these mortgages, was community property, and had been distributed, one half to her in fee, as her community share, and the other half, in accordance with the provisions of the will, to her for life, with remainder to the children in equal shares,—that is to say, each of the 10 children took one undivided twentieth of the land, subject to her life estate; that from the death of her husband she continued to reside on the land with her children, and supported and educated the minors. The petition further showed that at the time of his death Isaac Bryan owed $2,500, secured by a mortgage on said tract of land; that the petitioner had been without any means of support for herself or children except the income from the land; that the rents had not exceeded $600 per annum,—a sum wholly insufficient for the support of herself and her minor children; that, to pay off the said debt of $2,500 secured as aforesaid, and to pay debts incurred for the support of herself and children, she had borrowed $4,500 from M. A. Howard (the plaintiff herein), as security for which she had mortgaged her interest in said land; that she had subsequently borrowed from Howard $600 more, which had been advanced without security, and had been used for the support of herself and these minors; that said sums, together with interest, amounting in all to more than $6,000, were due and unpaid; and that her wards were indebted to her in the sum of $5,000, which she had expended between November, 1885, and March, 1893, for their support and education. The petition further alleged that the future expenses of administration, including support of the minors, costs, commissions, and counsel fees, would amount to $4,750. It was further shown that the interest of the petitioner and one of her adult children in the land had been sold under execution, and a sheriff's deed delivered to one Rider; that he was threatening to and would oust her from possession, and claim a partition of the land, if she failed to pay him $2,150, for which sum he had agreed to reconvey; that Howard was also threatening to foreclose; that one Dalton had agreed to lend her $10,000 with which to satisfy Howard's and Rider's claims, provided she obtained authority to mortgage the interest of the minors, in conjunction with a new mortgage to be given by herself and her adult children upon their interest in the land; that, unless this agreement could be carried out, costly and expensive litigation would ensue, disastrous to the interests of the minors and herself. Upon these allegations, and others not requiring particular statement, leave was asked to include the interest of the minors in a new mortgage for $10,000. Upon the filing of this petition, and upon proper orders and notice to all parties concerned, a hearing was had, and, upon a finding that all the allegations of the petition were true, an order was made, empowering the guardian to execute a mortgage of the interest of the minors, in conjunction with a similar mortgage of the interests of the guardian and adult children, for $9,500. Both mortgages were accordingly executed to Dalton, who afterwards assigned them to the plaintiff, Howard.

The judgment of nonsuit as to the guardian's mortgage followed inevitably from the ruling of the superior court sustaining the objection of the respondents to the admission of that mortgage when it was offered in evidence. If it was properly excluded, there was no evidence in the case upon which to base any judgment against the minors, or their interest in the land. The points made by the appellant, to the effect that, irrespective of the validity of the mortgage, the judgment is erroneous, because, first, the respondents were estopped to deny its validity; because, second, it was good as an equitable mortgage; and because, third, plaintiff was, in any event, entitled to a judgment for the money loaned,—have nothing to sustain them in the record. There was neither allegation, nor proof, nor offer of proof of any of the facts constituting the supposed estoppel. It is true that the complaint contains a general averment that Ellen Bryan, as guardian of said minors, borrowed from plaintiff's assignor $9,500 for their benefit, but it is not alleged that she expended any portion of it for their benefit, and the allegation actually made is denied in the answer. The finding of the court that all the allegations of the complaint are true was made after the order of nonsuit had been granted, when the respondents were out of the case, and cannot bind them. At the time the nonsuit was granted, no evidence had been offered which would have sustained a finding of the facts relied upon as an estoppel, or as constituting an equitable mortgage of the minors' interest in the land. As to the contention that the plaintiff was entitled to a judgment for the full amount of his loan, it is only necessary to say that he got such a judgment against the only party upon whom a personal liability rests, viz. Mrs. Baker, formerly Bryan. The full amount due plaintiff is ascertained by the judgment foreclosing the first mortgage, and, if that is not realized by a sale of the interests of the adult mortgagors, he is to have a personal judgment against Mrs. Baker for the deficiency. If there were any grounds upon which he might have claimed a personal judgment against the respondents, there was no proof of such grounds, or offer of proof, except by the guardian's mortgage; and, if that was properly excluded upon the objection of the respondents, there could be no judgment against them any more than there could be a foreclosure of the mortgage.

These questions being disposed of, there remains but one: Was the guardian's mortgage valid? or, more specifically, was there a valid order authorizing the mortgage? This being a collateral attack upon the order, only those facts and matters appearing upon the face of the record are to be considered, and, if they show no excess or defect of jurisdiction, no mere error of the court in the exercise of its jurisdiction or irregularity in the proceeding will invalidate the order. And in examining the record the same presumptions are indulged in favor of the regularity and validity of the proceeding as those which govern the construction of the record in an ordinary action. Burris v. Kennedy, 108 Cal. 338, 41 Pac. 458. Keeping this proposition in view, the first question is, did the petition comply with the substantial requirements of the statute? The essential fact to be found by the court as the basis of its order is that it will be for the advantage of the estate to raise money by a loan, and the statute prescribes the matters which must be set forth in the petition as a basis for the judgment of the court. The first requisite of the petition is that it must disclose the particular purpose for which the money is to be used, and in case of a minor's estate that purpose must be either to pay debts or charges of administration, or to pay, reduce, extend, or renew some lien or mortgage already subsisting on the realty which it is proposed to mortgage. The petition in this case does not show the existence of any lien or mortgage on the interest of either of these minors. It shows that there had at one time existed a lien on the entire property for $2,500, but, of course, a very small proportion of this ever attached to the five-twentieths owned by these minors subject to the life estate of their mother; and, whatever it may have amounted to in the beginning, it had been fully discharged. The voluntary assumption and payment of this debt by their mother put an end to their obligation. The petition did contain an estimate of future charges of administration, but it clearly showed that there was no purpose to apply the money borrowed to the payment of such charges, except as to the surplus that might remain after satisfying the claims of Howard and Rider, amounting to over $8,200. This sum was, at all events, to be laid out, in the first place, for the discharge of obligations in which the minors were in no manner concerned. It is true that an indebtedness of $5,000 from the minors to their mother for expenses incurred by her for their support and education prior to her qualification as legal guardian is alleged in the petition, but, waiving the various objections to this item insisted upon by respondents, it is, after all, more than $3,000 less than the amount to be paid to Rider and Howard. It appears, therefore, conclusively from the petition, and is apparent on the face of the record, that the particular purpose of this proceeding was to enable the guardian to borrow money, not for the exclusive use and benefit of her wards, but largely for her own benefit,—to pay her debts, and to discharge liens resting exclusively upon her estate. All that the petition alleges the order affirms, and what the petition prays the order grants. Whatever infirmity, therefore, appears in the petition attaches to the order, and the question is whether, under this statute, a court may empower a guardian to mortgage his ward's estate to raise money for his own purposes. If the case was plainly and simply of this aspect; if, in other words, the petition had shown in plain terms that the estate of the ward was to be mortgaged to pay a debt of the guardian,—no court could have hesitated to say that the order to mortgage was void. But the case is different. The petition alleges an indebtedness of the minors amounting to $5,000, and, although the amount of the loan was $9,500, it was to be secured by a mortgage not only of the one-fourth interest of the minors in the remainder, but also by a mortgage of the guardian's life estate and of the remaining three-fourths of the fee; the minors, that is to say, who were to have more than one-half of the benefit of the loan, were to furnish less than one-fourth of the security. This, it may justly be claimed, made the transaction perfectly fair, and even generous, to the minors; but we think it was nevertheless an excess of the powers of the court. The law cannot be construed to authorize the mortgage of a minor's estate to pay any debt but his own. It must be such a mortgage as he can discharge by paying what he is individually bound for, and such as will admit of a redemption by the payment of that which is due from him on his own account. In this case the power of the court was exceeded not only in attempting to mortgage the interest of the five minors to secure a sum in excess of their aggregate indebtedness, but also in the attempt to mortgage their separate interests for their aggregate debt. However advantageous it may have seemed in this instance to pursue that course, the proceeding cannot be sustained without establishing a dangerous precedent, from which serious abuses would be certain to flow.

One proposition maintained by appellant remains to be noticed. He contends that no petition whatever was necessary in order to invest the court with jurisdiction to authorize the mortgage,—a contention based upon the following language, found in subdivision 6 of section 1578 of the Code of Civil Procedure: "Jurisdiction of the court to administer the estate of such decedent, minor or incompetent person shall be effectual to vest such court and judge with jurisdiction to make the order for the note or notes and mortgage, and such jurisdiction shall conclusively inure to the benefit of the mortgagees," etc. It is a little difficult, certainly, to give a reasonable construction to this language; but we think it would be most unreasonable to hold that it was intended to dispense with the verified petition which the first clause of the same section says shall be filed. The two provisions must be harmonized, if possible, so that both may have effect; and this may be done by supposing that the clause quoted was inserted out of abundant caution for the purpose of designating the particular superior court to which the petition to mortgage must be addressed, irrespective of situs of the land to be mortgaged. We are satisfied, at all events, that a verified petition in substantial conformity to the statute must be filed in order to give the court jurisdiction to proceed. The omission to file it would be more than an irregularity.

It has been suggested, in support of the view that the court has power to authorize a mortgage without a petition or any of the proceedings prescribed by the statute, that no harm can result to the minor, however unnecessarily or excessively his estate is incumbered, because, it is said, the guardian will be chargeable with the whole sum borrowed, and for any misappropriation will be liable on his bond. We think this would be a very inadequate protection to the minor, even if there were a bond with sureties sufficient to answer his demand. But no bond is required as a condition to the making of the mortgage, and the bond given by a guardian in qualifying as such does not necessarily or usually cover the value of the ward's real property. It would be an accident if, in any case, there was a sufficient bond to indemnify the ward for a misappropriation of money borrowed upon the security of his real property. In this case there is no evidence of the existence of such a bond. The judgment of the superior court is affirmed.

We concur: TEMPLE, J.; VAN DYKE, J.

I dissent: McFARLAND, J.

HENSHAW, J. I concur in the judgment, but I have reached the same conclusion for reasons somewhat different. They are the following: Upon this collateral attack all intendments are to be indulged in favor of jurisdiction and the validity of the court's order. That order authorizes the execution of a mortgage upon the real property of the minors under an express finding that the allegations of the verified petition are true, and that it would be to the advantage of the estates of the minors, and each of them, to mortgage their property in the manner prescribed. Referring to the petition, then, to support this order, there will be found a great mass of recitals and averments touching the necessity and desirability of a mortgage, which are entirely without the purview of the statute. For example, it is shown that there stood a mortgage of $4,500 against the undivided one-half interest of the mother. By the new mortgage affecting the property of the minors it is proposed to pay off this mortgage; or, in other words, a lien is to be imposed upon the property of the minors to pay the debt of the mother. But, indulging all reasonable intendments in favor of the validity of the order, if there still remain in the petition sufficient averments to uphold the order actually made,—in other words, if, with these insufficient and illegal reasons for mortgaging the minors' property, there should be shown other legal and sufficient reasons,—it will be concluded that the order of the court directing the mortgage was to raise funds to be devoted to these legal purposes. In this regard the petition further shows two items,—one of $5,000, for costs and expenses already incurred in caring for, maintaining, supporting, and educating the minors; the other, an item of $4,570, for prospective charges of administration, and for future cost of maintenance. To the legality of these items many objections of weight and consequence are raised. As to the $5,000 item, it is said that it was for the moneys expended for the care and maintenance of the minors by their mother before she obtained letters of guardianship upon their estate. They were expenditures, then, made by their natural guardian, upon whom in law the duty of their support was cast, and therefore they form no proper charge against the estate of the minors. Passing this objection, it is next insisted—and this objection is certainly well taken—that it is the duty of the guardian to keep separate accounts of the disbursements made by her upon account of each of her wards, because the property of each ward is liable only for the amount of such expenses actually incurred in his behalf; and that it is not permissible, therefore, to charge the lump sum of $5,000 against wards A., B., C., and D., when of that sum $100 only may be chargeable against ward A., $200 against ward B., $300 against ward C., and the remainder against ward D. Against the second item of $4,570 for prospective charges of administration it may be said, assuming the legality of each item composing the charge, that it stands in a somewhat different position from the item of $5,000, because it may be assumed that the charges of administration will be equally borne by each of the wards. But, if all these difficulties were removed, and if it could be said that the court was justified under the petition and the showing made upon it in authorizing a mortgage for $9,500, there still remains what is, to my mind, an insuperable objection to the particular mortgage here in question. It will not be doubted, as has been said in the opinion of the Chief Justice, that no court is authorized to impose a mortgage upon the property of a minor, or to expend the moneys of a minor, for any other purpose than to benefit the minor's property or to discharge the minor's obligation. The property of one minor may not be incumbered with a lien in aid of his fellow ward, nor in aid of anybody else. At all times and under all circumstances that property is to be wisely and economically administered for the benefit of the minor alone. The proceedings of a court and of a guardian with a ward's property are not, and can never be, adversary in their nature. There are well-defined constitutional limitations to the power of the court in dealing with the property of the ward. It may change its form by sale; it may impose a lien upon it as by mortgage; it may authorize the expenditure of parts of it when necessary; but, when it acts, it acts only for the benefit of the ward, and not for the benefit of any third person. In this case the mortgage authorized by the court was a blanket mortgage for the full amount of $9,500; in other words, there was, by the mortgage, a lien imposed upon the real property of each minor for the full amount of $9,500, notwithstanding the fact that the amount chargeable against the property of minor A. might have been $100, against minor B. $500, and so on. The legal consequences which follow such a mortgage are material. No minor could release or redeem his own property from the mortgage debt without paying the full amount of it. Each minor's property, therefore, is held, not alone for the undetermined amount of his own obligation, but for the aggregate amount of the obligations of all the others. Such a mortgage, I think, is void. The court, in authorizing a mortgage upon the property of a ward, can only authorize it and impose a lien upon the ward's property for the amount of money to be raised for the benefit of that ward; and, if there be more than one ward, as here, owning undivided interests in a tract of land in common, either separate mortgages must be ordered, or the mortgage must specify the amount of the lien and charge against the interest of each minor, and provide for the discharge of the lien as to each particular ward's property upon the payment of that amount. Under the conviction that for the reasons above set forth the mortgage which the court directed to be made, and which in fact was made, is void, as not authorized by the statute, I hold the ruling of the court in refusing it admission in evidence was justified.

GAROUTTE, J. I dissent both from the views and the conclusion declared by the majority of the court in the above-entitled cause, and adhere to the views and conclusion heretofore declared in the opinion found in 62 Pac. 459. I cannot agree to the construction given by the court to that portion of section 1578 of the Code of Civil Procedure which provides: "Jurisdiction of the court to administer the estate of such decedent, minor or incompetent person shall be effectual to vest such court and judge with jurisdiction to make the order for the note or notes and mortgage, and such jurisdiction shall conclusively inure to the benefit of the mortgagee named in the mortgage, his heirs and assigns." To my mind it is plainly evident that the legislature attempted by this provision of the statute to place the order of the court allowing the borrowing of money and giving of a mortgage beyond collateral attack upon the ground of lack of jurisdiction in the court to make it. I see nothing in the provision which in any way indicates an intention upon the part of the legislature to enact it for the purpose declared in the main opinion of the court. If that were the intention, then certainly the clause of the provision which reads, "such jurisdiction shall conclusively inure to the benefit of the mortgagee named in the mortgage, his heirs and assigns," is mere surplusage, and means nothing. Neither can I agree with that portion of the opinion which holds the order of the court giving the guardian authority to make the mortgage is void, after the concession made therein that $5,000 of the amount for which the mortgage was given was a debt against the minors, and a debt for which the court could have made an order for the mortgaging of their estate. If the court in this proceeding had jurisdiction to make an order for a mortgage of $5,000, I know of no principle of law which would declare an order for a mortgage of $9,500 void in its entirety. I believe, in such a case, according to every principle of law, the mortgage should be held valid to the extent of $5,000. The law is settled in this state that, where a defendant has been convicted, and sentenced to state prison for a period, for example, of 10 years, when the greatest penalty which could be inflicted under the statute for the offense of which he has been convicted was 5 years, that a judgment of that character is not void in its entirety, but simply void for the excess; and this court has repeatedly held that a defendant under those circumstances is not entitled to his discharge until the expiration of the term of imprisonment fixed by the statute. If this be the rule in criminal cases as to the jurisdiction of courts to render judgments, I see no reason why the same principle should not apply to judgments in civil cases.

Aside from the foregoing conclusions, I am firmly convinced that this order granting the right to mortgage the minors' property for $9,500 is valid in its entirety. In the petition for the order it is set forth that "the costs and expenses of caring for, maintaining, supporting, and educating the said children from the 1st day of November, 1885, to the 1st day of April, 1893, is $5,000." Again, under the head of "Charges of Administration" we find items amounting to $4,570. These items include a family allowance for said minors, attorneys' fees, guardian's commissions, and other expenses. Expenses of administration and debts created by the minors are items expressly mentioned in the statute for which an order to mortgage may be given. This proceeding being essentially a collateral attack upon the order of the probate court, it must be assumed that the $5,000 item for the care, support, and education of these minors is a valid item, and that the expenses of administration in the amount of $4,570 is also a valid item. We thus have upon the face of the petition valid items of expenses set forth justifying an order for a mortgage to the full amount covered by the order made in this case. It is apparent, for these reasons, that the court had jurisdiction to make the order here involved. It may be conceded, for present purposes, the court had no power to make an order to mortgage the minors' property for the payment of the security given by Mrs. Bryan to Howard, nor that it had any authority to make the order for the mortgage to secure money to pay the Rider lien. Yet, even after this concession, there are still upon the face of the petition sufficient facts to justify the court in making an order to mortgage the minors' interest for the sum of $9,500. This being so, it will not be presumed upon this collateral attack, in order to defeat and invalidate the mortgage given in this case, that the court made the order for purposes not recognized by the statute. If any presumptions are to be indulged in as to this order, it will be presumed that it was made for valid purposes.

It may be further suggested that no harm can possibly come to minors by reason of the construction here given to orders of the character of the one involved in this proceeding. Upon the other hand, any other construction, and the construction given by the majority of the court, does the gravest injustice to the mortgagee in this case. It will often be a close question whether or not a certain particular item of charge will come within the designation of debts or expenses of administration, and it would be a gross injustice if a mortgagee is required to decide this question at his peril. Indeed, it would seem, if this be so, that few mortgages would ever be given under the section of the Code here involved. As before suggested, there is no hardship upon a minor in a case of this character. He secures the money. The guardian is responsible to him for it. It can only be expended, upon the order of the court, for his benefit. If the guardian appropriates it to any other purpose, he will be liable upon his bond; and here, as an illustration of that principle, if the money secured by this mortgage has not been expended for the benefit of the wards, it still is in the possession of the guardian, or the guardian is liable for its misappropriation. The order allowing the mortgage to be given is in no sense res adjudicata as to what claims are valid claims against the estate of the minors. For the foregoing reasons, the judgment and order should be reversed, and the cause remanded.

KNOWLES v. THOMPSON, County Clerk.

(Supreme Court of California. June 14, 1901.)
NEW TRIAL—TIME OF GRANTING—EFFECT ON APPEAL—MANDAMUS—APPLICATION TO SUPREME COURT.

1. Code Civ. Proc. § 946, providing that an appeal shall stay all proceedings in the lower court on the judgment appealed from, but that the court may proceed on any other matter embraced in the action not affected thereby, does not prohibit the granting of a new trial after an appeal has been taken from the judgment.

2. An order granting a new trial vacates the judgment, and an appeal cannot thereafter be taken or prosecuted therefrom.

3. Code Civ. Proc. § 939, authorizing an appeal from a judgment denying a writ of mandamus, gives an adequate remedy at law which will prevent the renewal of the original application before the supreme court.

In bank. Original application for mandamus by Frank S. Knowles against H. M. Thompson, county clerk, to compel the issuance of an execution. Writ denied.

B. B. Newman, for petitioner. Morrison & Cope and Geo. C. Ross, for respondent.

VAN DYKE, J. Mandamus to compel the respondent, clerk of the county of San Mateo, to issue an execution in a case in which the petitioner is plaintiff, and the Crocker Estate Company, a corporation, and Ernest A. Leigh, are defendants. The petition shows that on the trial of said cause, which was an action of forcible entry and detainer, a verdict was rendered in favor of the plaintiff therein January 5, 1900, and on the 6th day of January judgment was rendered on said verdict in favor of the plaintiff and against said defendants; that thereupon the defendants in said action perfected an appeal from said judgment to this court, February 9, 1900, staying all proceedings upon said judgment so appealed from; that on November 5, 1900, upon motion of the respondent in such appeal, plaintiff in said action, after due notice given, this court dismissed the appeal on the ground that the appellants therein, the defendants in said action, had failed to file a transcript of the record therein. It also appears from said petition that, after the appeal had been taken in said action as stated, to wit, on the 7th day of May, 1900, the superior court in which said action was pending duly made and entered an order granting a new trial therein, which order has not been vacated nor set aside, and no appeal taken therefrom. On March 26, 1901, the remittitur on the dismissal of the appeal from the judgment in said cause having theretofore been filed, and the clerk of said court having refused to issue an execution on said judgment, the petitioner applied to said superior court for a writ of mandamus to compel said clerk, the respondent herein, to issue said execution. But the court below refused to issue said writ on the ground, stated in the petition herein, that a new trial in said action had been granted. Respondent demurs to the petition filed herein, and also answers the same. The main grounds in support of the demurrer are: First, that the judgment in the case on which it is sought to have an execution issued has been vacated and set aside by the order granting a new trial in said action; second, that the petitioner has a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy in due course of law by an appeal from the order of the superior court denying his application for mandamus therein.

1. It is contended by the petitioner that upon perfecting the appeal from the judgment rendered in the lower court by the filing of a supersedeas or stay bond, all further proceedings, including any action on the motion for a new trial, were suspended. This, however, is not so. Only such matters as are embraced within the judgment or order appealed from are stayed. Code Civ. Proc. § 946. Proceedings on motion for a new trial are not in direct line of the judgment, but are independent and collateral thereto. The judgment may be at once entered, and even executed, while a motion for a new trial is pending. The motion may be heard and decided and an appeal taken on its own independent record while the proceedings on and subsequent to the judgment may be still regularly going on, and even an independent appeal taken in that line. Spanagel v. Dellinger, 38 Cal. 284; 1 Hayne, New Trial & App. p. 27. An appeal from the judgment does not depend upon the motion for a new trial. The latter is subsequent to the judgment, and the appeal from the judgment may be taken without waiting for the determination of the motion for a new trial, and such appeal from the judgment may go on after the appeal from the order has been dismissed. Towdy v. Ellis, 22 Cal. 659. And an affirmance of the judgment on a direct appeal therefrom does not prevent the court below from setting aside the verdict or finding and judgment based thereon, and granting a new trial. McDonald v. McConkey, 57 Cal. 326; Naglee v. Spencer, 60 Cal. 10. And the dismissal of an appeal from the judgment is no bar to an appeal by the same party from an order denying his motion for a new trial. Fulton v. Cox, 40 Cal. 105. But an order granting a new trial has the effect of vacating the judgment, and the party cannot thereafter proceed on said judgment by appeal therefrom or otherwise. Kower v. Gluck, 33 Cal. 407; Bronner v. Wetzlar, 55 Cal. 420; Thompson v. Smith, 28 Cal. 534; Rayner v. Jones, 90 Cal. 78, 27 Pac. 24.

2. An appeal lies from the judgment of the superior court denying the writ of mandate. Code Civ. Proc. § 939; Palache v. Hunt, 64 Cal. 474, 2 Pac. 245; People v. Perry, 79 Cal. 109, 21 Pac. 423; Heinlen v. Phillips, 88 Cal. 557, 26 Pac. 366. This furnishes a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy to the petitioner in the ordinary course of law. Santa Cruz Gap Turnpike Joint Co. v. Board of Sup'rs of Santa Clara Co., 62 Cal. 40. The demurrer to the petition must be sustained, and the writ denied, and it is so ordered.

MORTGAGE—FORECLOSURE—ASSIGNMENT—PARTIES—APPEAL—ORDER STRIKING OUT DEMURRER—SUBSTITUTION OF PARTIES—ATTORNEY'S FEES.

1. Where it was urged on appeal that the court erred in striking a demurrer, but the appeal was merely from the judgment, with no bill of exceptions or other record of the affidavit and motion on which the order striking out the demurrer was made, it did not appear that the demurrer was well taken, and hence there was no showing that appellant sustained injury entitling him to reversal.

2. Where a husband and wife were joint owners of a second mortgage, and after the commencement of foreclosure proceedings, to which they were made parties defendant, by the first mortgagee, the husband bought the first mortgage, and continued the proceedings, the wife remaining a party defendant, but claiming the same relief as to the joint mortgage in a cross complaint to which she would have been entitled as a co-complainant with her husband, the fact that the wife, though possibly a proper party plaintiff, claimed relief as a defendant, could not injure defendant mortgagor, and hence was not reversible error.

3. Where, during the pendency of foreclosure proceedings, the mortgage was assigned, and the assignee was substituted as plaintiff by order of court, but the original mortgagee was retained as a party plaintiff, the decree of foreclosure providing that the original mortgagee take nothing, but that amount recovered was due the assignee, the retention of the original mortgagee as a party plaintiff, though erroneous, was harmless, and not cause for reversal.

4. Where, pending foreclosure, the mortgage was purchased by the holder of a second mortgage, which was not yet due, but which became due before the case was tried and the decree entered, the decree was not erroneous because ordering a sale of the premises to satisfy the second mortgage.

5. Where a mortgage provided that attorney's fees should be taxed on foreclosure, such provision need not be pleaded to entitle the mortgagee to a decree for attorney's fees.

6. Where a mortgage provided that attorney's fees should be taxed on foreclosure, but not that such fees should be a lien on the land, a decree allowing attorney's fees should not make them a lien on the land.

It is not shown that the demurrer was well taken, or that it should have been sustained, if it had not been stricken out. The appellants were allowed to answer and present their defense fully upon the merits. There is no bill of exceptions, and the notice, affidavit, and motion upon which the order striking out the demurrer was made are no part of the judgment roll. Code Civ. Proc. § 670; Dimick v. Campbell, 31 Cal. 240; Catazich v. Hayes, 52 Cal. 338. It therefore does not appear that any injury was done to appellants by the order, and we must presume that it was based upon valid reasons, as all presumptions are in favor of the judgment. The demurrer to the answer and cross complaint of defendant Duncan was properly overruled. Conceding that Thomassen A. Duncan, the wife of plaintiff Archibald Duncan, should have been made a plaintiff for the reason that she was a joint owner of the second note and mortgage, no injury appears to have been done to appellants. She claimed the same relief in her cross complaint as to the joint mortgage as was claimed by her husband in the amended complaint. She therefore was claiming all that she could have claimed if a co-plaintiff with her husband. That she claimed the relief as defendant, instead of claiming it as plaintiff, could not have damaged or misled appellants.

2. The plaintiff corporation commenced the action to foreclose its mortgage upon the premises described in the findings and decree. It appears that at the time of the commencement of the action Archibald Duncan and Thomassen Duncan, his wife, held a second mortgage upon the same premises, which was subsequent to and subject to the mortgage of the corporation. The Duncans were, therefore, made defendants in the suit as originally commenced. Subsequent to the commencement of the suit, the corporation sold and assigned its mortgage to plaintiff Archibald Duncan, and after said assignment an order of court was made substituting said Archibald Duncan as plaintiff. He then filed an amended complaint setting up the facts, but retained the name of the corporation as joint plaintiff. It is claimed that it was prejudicial error to allow the corporation to remain plaintiff under the objection of appellant. It is provided in Code Civ. Proc. § 385: "In case of any other transfer of interest, the action or proceeding may be continued in the name of the original party, or the court may allow the person to whom the transfer is made to be substituted in the action or proceeding." After the transfer by the corporation to Archibald Duncan, it was not necessary to retain the name of the corporation as co-plaintiff, and it was improper to do so. But the error was without injury, because the decree and judgment expressly state that the corporation plaintiff take nothing, and that the amount recovered is due and owing to plaintiff Archibald Duncan.

3. At the time the action was commenced by plaintiff corporation, the mortgage then held by Archibald Duncan and Thomassen Duncan for $2,500 was not due, and they were evidently made parties because they held a second and subsequent mortgage upon the same premises. This mortgage was not due when the amended complaint was filed, and it is claimed that it was error to include it in the decree of foreclosure. It was due at the time the case was tried and the decree entered. It was, therefore, correct to have the decree provide for the sale of the premises to satisfy this second mortgage. Code Civ. Proc. § 728; Hawkins v. Hill, 15 Cal. 500, 76 Am. Dec. 499; Bostwick v. McEvoy, 62 Cal. 502.

4. It is finally claimed that the court erred in allowing the attorney's fee of $200, for the reason that there is no allegation in the pleading as to attorney's fees, and that the attorney's fees, if allowed, should have been made a lien upon the lands by the terms of the decree. It was not necessary to allege that the mortgage provided for attorney's fees. White v. Allatt, 87 Cal. 248, 25 Pac. 420. The mortgage provided for reasonable attorney's fees, to be taxed by the court, and included in the bill of costs, but did not provide that such attorney's fees should be a lien upon the lands mortgaged. In such case it would have been error for the court to have decreed the attorney's fees to be a lien upon the mortgaged premises. Russell v. Findley, 122 Cal. 478, 55 Pac. 143.

There are no other points argued worthy of discussion. The judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: GRAY, C.; CHIPMAN, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is affirmed.

BASSETT v. LOS ANGELES TRACTION CO. (L. A. 875.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 26, 1901.)
CARRIERS—INJURY TO PASSENGER—NEGLIGENCE—RES IPSA LOQUITUR—PROXIMATE CAUSE—HARMLESS ERROR.

1. Where it is shown that an injury to a passenger was caused by the act of the carrier in operating the instrumentalities employed in his business, there is a presumption of negligence, which throws on the carrier the burden of showing that the injury was sustained without any negligence on his part; and hence a verdict for plaintiff for injuries against a street railroad will not be reversed because the evidence fails to show that the rate of speed of the car at the time of the accident was excessive, or that the excessive rate of speed or other negligence of defendant was the proximate cause of the injury, since it is sufficient that it fails to show that it was not so.

2. The admission of evidence that defendant's cars had been running slower at the place where the accident occurred since it happened was harmless, if erroneous.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Lucien Shaw, Judge.

Action by Kate Bassett against the Los Angeles Traction Company. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, and an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

E. H. Lamme and E. E. Millikin, for appellant. Byron L. Oliver and John W. Kemp, for respondent.

SMITH, C. The plaintiff recovered damages against the defendant in the sum of $750 for personal injuries suffered by her while a passenger on one of the defendant's street-railway cars. The car in which she was riding ran off the track at a point on Eighth street in the city of Los Angeles, and she was thereby thrown to the floor of the car and suffered the injuries complained of. The derailment, which took place in the daytime, was caused by a small stone or pebble on the outer rail of the track, which at this point was slightly curved. The principal question considered by the court, as appears from the opinion appended to the appellant's brief, was as to the rate of speed at which the car was running at the time of the accident. It appeared from the evidence that the general rate of speed used by the defendant was in excess of the statutory limit (Civ. Code, § 501); being over the whole route, including stoppages, in excess of 10 miles, and over the section (of 9,216 feet) where the accident occurred in excess of 13 miles, per hour; and, on the particular day in question, from the terminus to the place of the accident, it was about or in excess of 12 miles an hour. From these facts, taking in consideration stoppages, and reduction of speed in passing curves, the court arrived at the conclusion that the rate of speed at the time of the accident was largely in excess of the statutory limit, and that this constituted negligence in law, and, irrespective of other evidence on the point, rendered the defendant responsible. There was also evidence of opinion pro and con by witnesses as to the actual speed of the car at the time of the accident. But this evidence, being conflicting, and being in fact of little intrinsic value, may, in view of the finding of the court, be disregarded. The conclusion of the court is contested by the appellant's counsel; and it is argued, in effect, that the evidence was insufficient to show that the rate of speed at the time of the accident was excessive. But whether they are right in this need not be considered. It is sufficient that the evidence fails to show the contrary. The rule as established in this state is that, "when it is shown that the injury to the passenger was caused by the act of the carrier in operating the instrumentalities employed in his business, there is a presumption of negligence, which throws upon the carrier the burden of showing that the injury was sustained without any negligence on his part." McCurrie v. Southern Pac. Co., 122 Cal. 561, 55 Pac. 324, and authorities there cited. These authorities also dispose of the contention of the appellant that the evidence was insufficient to show that the excessive rate of speed or other negligence of defendant was the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injury. It is sufficient that it did not show the contrary.

Another point made by the appellant is that the court erred in admitting the testimony of a witness "to the effect that the defendant's cars had been running slower at the point where the derailment occurred since the accident." This evidence was perhaps inadmissible for the purpose of showing an excessive rate of speed at the time of the accident; but it does not seem to have been introduced for that purpose, but, rather, as a standard of comparison to enable the witness to render more definite her testimony as to the speed of the car at the time of the accident. It failed in its purpose and probably, on motion, would have been stricken out; but in view of the more definite evidence in the case, and the view of it taken by the court, it could not in any way have injured the defendant, and, if erroneous, must be regarded as immaterial. I advise that the judgment and order appealed from be affirmed.

EX PARTE INJUNCTION—TITLE TO REALTY—RIGHT OF POSSESSION UNDER CONTRACT.

Where a complaint in an application for an injunction stated that plaintiff was the owner of a right to pump water from a certain well, and that defendants had prevented, and threatened to continue to prevent, plaintiff from so pumping water, but there was no allegation that plaintiff was, or defendant was not, in possession of the property, plaintiff was not entitled to an ex parte injunction enforcing its alleged right to the property, since it would operate to change the possession of property, which is not the proper function of a preliminary injunction.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; Frank F. Foster, Judge.

Action by San Antonio Water Company against W. J. Bodenhamer and another. From an order denying a motion to dissolve a preliminary injunction, defendants appeal. Reversed.

E. R. Annable, for appellants. Otis & Gregg, for respondent.

SMITH, C. Appeal from an order refusing to dissolve an injunction. The plaintiff is a corporation formed for the purpose of supplying the owners of land on the Ontario Colony tract with water, and in fact supplies with water for domestic use some 2,500 people, and with water for irrigation some 6,000 acres of land, planted in fruit trees and vineyard, and dependent for water on the plaintiff. The defendant Bodenhamer was the predecessor in title and interest of the defendant corporation, and is now a contractor and agent of the latter. These parties, for a period of something over four years, have been operating for the development of water on land north of and above the lands of the plaintiff under the contract and modifications thereof referred to in the answer and affidavits as contracts Nos. 1, 2, 3, and 4,—the first, of date October 19, 1894, between the plaintiff and the defendant Bodenhamer and one Oakley; the others, of date, respectively, May 2, 1895, June 15, 1896, and May 14, 1898, between the plaintiff and the defendant corporation. The business thus carried on is referred to in some of the contracts as the "Bodenhamer development," and it will be convenient to make use of this expression. The general effect of these contracts was that the defendants—that is to say, first, Bodenhamer and Oakley, and afterwards their assignee, the defendant corporation—were to do the work of development, the plaintiff supplying the means, and that the water developed was to be divided between the parties according to the terms agreed upon, which were that the plaintiff was to take all the water, at the valuation agreed on, until reimbursed for its outlay, and the balance to be divided equally between the parties. The property affected by the injunction and described in the complaint was acquired and has been continuously used in connection with the work of development, and may be described as appurtenant, or belonging, to the business. When the suit was brought, it was in the possession of the defendants, who claimed to be using it under and in pursuance of the terms of the contract. The allegations of the complaint material to be considered are "that plaintiff is, and for several years last past has been, the owner of the right to pump water from that certain shaft or well situate upon lot 15 of the Canyon Ridge tract, etc., * * * commonly known as the "Twenty-First Street Well," * * * [and] now has, and for several years last past has had, an engine and machinery adapted for and used in pumping water situate at the mouth of said well or shaft, and upon the lot hereinbefore mentioned"; and that defendants have wrongfully and by force prevented, and threaten to continue to prevent the plaintiff from pumping water from said well, etc. The injunction was issued on the complaint without notice to the defendants. The motion to dissolve was made on the answer, which sets out at length the several contracts, and on affidavits. Counter affidavits were filed by the plaintiff.

There is no allegation in the complaint that the plaintiff is or that the defendants are not in possession of the property in question; nor is there any reference to the contract between the parties, or other allegations explaining the nature of plaintiff's alleged right, or the status of the defendants with reference to the property affected by the suit, or regarding the possession of the property; and it is claimed by the appellants that the actual allegations "are pregnant with admission that defendants are in the actual possession of both under claim of right," and that this was in fact the case. The injunction therefore, it is claimed, operated, in effect, "as a writ of restitution * * * against a defendant in possession," and was improvidently issued. This contention, we think, must be allowed; for, in the absence of all allegations on the subject, the case on the complaint is the same as though it affirmatively appeared that the defendants were in possession; and, "as a general rule, courts of equity will not interfere by preliminary injunctions to change the possession of real property, the title being in dispute," nor is it a proper remedy for recovering possession of personal property. 1 High, Inj. § 355; Williams v. Long, 129 Cal. 229, 61 Pac. 1087; Arnold v. Bright, 41 Mich. 210, 2 N. W. 17; Toledo, A. A. & N. M. Ry. Co. v. Detroit, L. & N. R. Co., 61 Mich. 9, 27 N. W. 715. "The court of chancery," it is said in the former of the Michigan cases cited, "has no more power than any other to condemn a man unheard, and to dispossess him of property prima facie his, and hand over its enjoyment to another on an ex parte claim to it." And in the latter it is said: "It needs no discussion to show that an injunction against a party's holding his own possession is the same thing as turning him out of possession, and is utterly illegal before final decree. * * * A court of equity cannot change the possession of lands in conflict from one party to another until the merits have been finally passed upon." See, also, numerous decisions cited in the latter case, and Toledo, A. A. & N. M. Ry. Co. v. Detroit, L. & N. R. Co., 63 Mich. 647, 30 N. W. 595, and Richter v. Kabat, 114 Mich. 579, 72 N. W. 600, where the rule is affirmed. The order granting an injunction, therefore, had an appeal been taken, would probably have been reversed.

But the appeal now is from the order refusing to dissolve the injunction, and whether this be erroneous or not is to be determined, not from the complaint alone, but from the answer and the affidavits also; and from these it appears that the parties have been carrying on together a common enterprise under a contract specifically determining their mutual rights. To such cases the rule invoked by the appellants does not necessarily apply, for the court may, in proper cases, interfere "by way of interlocutory injunction to restrain the violation of contracts," when necessary for the protection of the legal right and the prevention of irreparable mischief; and this, in some cases, may involve a change of the actual possession. 2 High, Inj. § 1106. It remains, therefore, to inquire whether there is anything in the case as now presented to remove it from the operation of the rule. In considering this question it is to be observed there is no allegation in the complaint as to the ownership or possession of lot 15 of the Canyon Ridge tract, the locus in quo. This lot—though it was otherwise supposed by the court—was in fact the property of the defendant, and the plaintiff had no interest in it except such as he derived under the contracts between him and the defendants to be used in connection with the Bodenhamer development. With regard to the pump and machinery, there is an allegation of ownership; but this, it appears, was purchased under the provisions of the first contract, to be used by the defendant Bodenhamer and his successors in the proposed operations. It is to be regarded, therefore, as belonging to the Bodenhamer development, and as subject to the contract. The right asserted in the complaint—to pump water, etc.—is to be understood, therefore, as derived from and resting upon the contract, and is to be determined exclusively by its provisions. These are very extensively discussed in the briefs, but, under the view we take of the case, it will be unnecessary to enter on so extended an investigation. Under the third contract, of date June 15, 1896, the plaintiff was given the right to prosecute the work; but it was provided that on its failure to avail itself of the privilege, or on its cessation of work for 60 days, the defendant corporation might elect to take up the work, and, after 10 days' notice, proceed therewith; in which case it was to have "the use of all tools, machinery, and appliances already purchased for the prosecution of the work." Under these provisions the plaintiff took up the work, but abandoned it on or about September 1, 1896. The defendant corporation then, after due notice, took up the work, and thereupon—it is alleged in the answer, and not denied—the plaintiff "surrendered to it possession of all the works of said tunnels, wells, shafts, and developments, together with the tools, machinery, appliances of every name and nature which had been purchased for the prosecution of the work of development, and from that time to the commencement of this suit, and until served with the writ of injunction issued by this court herein, it has been by itself, and W. J. Bodenhamer as its contractor, in possession thereof, carrying on the work of such development with all reasonable diligence and dispatch." On these facts we cannot perceive in the case any grounds for an injunction, and we are therefore of the opinion that the case comes within the application of the rule invoked and the authorities cited by the appellant's counsel. What the rights of the parties may be on the completion or other termination of the contract is immaterial to the questions presented on this appeal, which must be determined by the provisions of the existing contract. Nor can we consider the question whether the use of the well and pumping machinery was necessary to the work of development. It is sufficient that the defendant was in possession, under the terms of the contract, for the purpose of the development, and asserting in good faith the right to the possession of them as necessary for that purpose. We advise that the order appealed from be reversed.

(Supreme Court of California. June 15, 1901.)

CITY TREASURER—PAYMENT OF CLAIM—OFFICIAL MISCONDUCT—EFFECT OF JUDGMENT—DEFENSE—EVIDENCE.

1. Where a decree of a court having jurisdiction directed a city treasurer to pay a certain claim against the city, such decree was a complete defense to an action to charge him with official misconduct in having paid the claim.

2. Where judgment had been rendered for plaintiff in an action against a city treasurer and board of trustees to compel payment of a claim against the city, such judgment was sufficient to justify the treasurer in paying the claim, though the trustees refused to approve it, or issue a warrant thereon.

3. Where a city treasurer, acting under a judgment, paid a claim against the city, such judgment was admissible in evidence as justification in an action charging him with official misconduct in having paid the claim.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; J. R. Webb, Judge.

Action by the Fresno Canal & Irrigation Company against W. H. McKenzie and another. From a judgment in favor of defendants, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

*Reversed in banc. See 67 Pac. 960, 135 Cal. 497.

Frank H. Short, for appellant. E. D. Edwards and W. C. Graves, for respondents.

McFARLAND, J. This is an action to recover $1,200 damages for alleged official misconduct by defendant McKenzie, as treasurer of the city of Fresno. The defendant James is sued as a surety on McKenzie's official bond. Judgment went for defendants in the court below, and plaintiff appeals from the judgment and from an order denying a new trial.

The alleged misconduct consists in the refusal by McKenzie to pay a certain warrant for $1,200 drawn on him by the city clerk, and payable out of the sewer fund of said city, and in paying to another person money of said fund, which, as plaintiff claims, should have been paid to plaintiff on said warrant. There is not much difference between the parties as to the facts. Plaintiff's grantor, McMurtry, during the years 1893 and 1894, had a contract with the city of Fresno for furnishing water for flushing the sewers of the city, for which he was to be paid $400 per month out of the sewer fund. He filed with the clerk of the city his demand under this contract for $1,200, alleged to have been due and unpaid for the months of October, November, and December, 1893; and afterwards, and prior to January 22, 1897, he assigned the contract and the said demand to plaintiff. On said January 22, 1897, the board of trustees of the city allowed and approved said demand, and directed the clerk to draw a warrant on McKenzie against the sewer fund in plaintiff's favor for the amount of said demand. Such warrant was drawn on said 22d day of January, and on the same day was presented to the defendant McKenzie, who refused to pay it. However, one McBean had a contract with the city for taking care of its sewage for $4,900 per annum, payable quarterly, which contract also covered the years 1893 and 1894. The city had refused to pay him for the fiscal year 1893-94, upon the ground that the contract was illegal; and on the 25th day of June, 1894, he had commenced an action in the superior court against the city and the present defendant McKenzie to enforce payment of the amount due on the contract. At the commencement of his action he obtained an injunction restraining McKenzie from paying out the money in the sewer fund. McBean was defeated in the lower court, but on appeal to this court the judgment was reversed, and it was declared here that his contract was not illegal, and that he was entitled to recover the amount due thereon. McBean v. City of Fresno, 112 Cal. 159, 44 Pac. 358, 31 L. R. A. 794, 53 Am. St. Rep. 191. After the remittitur went down, and on August 13, 1896, the superior court rendered and entered judgment in favor of McBean against the city for $4,900, and decreed that it should be paid "out of any moneys now in the sewer fund of the city of Fresno for the year ending June 30, 1894"; and that "the treasurer of said defendant city of Fresno pay over to the said plaintiff any money now in his hands or subject to his control as such treasurer, or that may hereafter come into his hands or under his control as such treasurer, belonging to the sewer fund, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, or out of any other money that may come into his hands or under his control of the sewer fund of said year as such treasurer, available therefor, and not otherwise appropriated." McBean, prior to the allowance of plaintiff's demand as hereinbefore stated, presented a certified copy of his judgment to the board of trustees, and demanded that it should be audited and allowed; but the board denied the demand, and afterwards, notwithstanding said judgment, and disregarding the same, allowed plaintiff's demand as aforesaid. At the time of the entry of the judgment there was in the sewer fund for the fiscal year 1893-94 $2,603.75, and no more, and, upon the presentation of the said judgment in favor of McBean, McKenzie paid to him the said sum of money. The judgment was presented to McKenzie prior to the presentation to him of the said warrant in favor of plaintiff.

The judgment appealed from is right. Where there are several holders of claims against a municipal corporation, each claim being payable only out of the municipal revenues of a certain year, and those revenues being insufficient to satisfy all the claims, no doubt, under our law on the subject as it now stands, creditors may be somewhat embarrassed, as was noted in Weaver v. City and County of San Francisco, 111 Cal. 319, 43 Pac. 972; but in the case at bar the question is whether or not McKenzie, as treasurer, was guilty of such official misconduct or malfeasance as made him liable to plaintiff in damages. The general rule undoubtedly is that the mandate of a court having jurisdiction in the premises protects the officer who obeys it, and we see nothing in the case at bar which takes it out of that rule. The force of the judgment is sought to be lessened by the suggestion that it refers only to moneys in the sewer fund "not otherwise appropriated"; but, even if that expression can be construed as qualifying all preceding clauses, and as embracing "any money now in his hands," still there is no ground for contending that the money decreed in the judgment to be paid by the treasurer to McBean had been theretofore "otherwise appropriated." There is nothing in the proposition that, although the trustees and the treasurer had defended the action brought by McBean, and judgment had been rendered in his favor, still such judgment was worthless unless the trustees should afterwards "approve" it, and order a warrant to issue for its payment. All the opposition which the defendants in that action could make to McBean's demand was ended by the judgment, which was a judicial adjudication that the treasurer should pay that demand. The final arbiter was the court, not the trustees. Indeed, the ordinance itself, which provides for the auditing of demands and their payment on warrants, contains the clause, "except as otherwise by law provided." The contention of appellant that the court erred in allowing the introduction in evidence of the judgment roll in the McBean case is, of course, under the above views, not maintainable. It could not have been rightfully excluded on the ground that appellant was not a party to that action. The respondent had the right to introduce the judgment under which he justified his action, and the question is whether he was guilty of official misconduct in obeying it. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

PER CURIAM. A motion by respondent to dismiss the appeal has been submitted. The ground of the motion is that appellant did not file his points and authorities in time. While the excuse given by one of appellant's attorneys under oath is not entirely satisfactory, still we think it sufficient to save his client from the penalty of a refusal to hear his appeal on its merits, particularly as the points were on file at the time of the hearing, and no delay was caused by the delinquency, which was only for a very short period. WILLS—TRUSTS—CHARITABLE BEQUESTS—CAPACITY OF BENEFICIARIES.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Barbara county; W. S. Day, Judge.

Petition by the Natural History Society of Santa Barbara, Cal., for the partial distribution of the estate of Henry K. Winchester, deceased. From a decree in favor of the petitioner, the executor appeals. Affirmed.

Richards & Carrier, for appellant. Wm. G. Griffith, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, C. Henry K. Winchester died testate February 21, 1895. In his will he provided as follows: "I give to the Santa Barbara Natural History Society of Santa Barbara, California, the sum of two thousand dollars." At the time of his death, and until June 28, 1898, this society was an unincorporated organization, on which latter date the members of the society duly incorporated under the laws of this state. The incorporated society petitioned the court for a decree of partial distribution, which was granted by the court, and from this decree the executors appeal on the judgment roll alone.

The court found the following facts: That the petitioner "was organized as a society in the year 1876, and ever since continued to be, up to the time of its incorporation as hereinafter mentioned, a regularly organized, unincorporated society, governed by a constitution and by-laws adopted by the members thereof, having regularly elected officers, and holding regular meetings, and having for its object to advance the study and promote knowledge of the various branches of natural history by holding meetings, providing for lectures, and establishing a museum of natural history specimens, and was known as and called the 'Santa Barbara Natural History Society';" that "on June 28, 1898, the members of said society formed a corporation under the laws of this state, the petitioner herein, and said society has ever since continued to be, and now is, a duly-organized corporation, known as and called the 'Santa Barbara Society of Natural History,'" the purposes were declared to be similar to those for which the original society was formed, although stated in different terms; and, among other things, it was provided that the society "shall hold in possession real estate, and funds contributed as annual dues and by voluntary subscriptions." It was also found that all of the devises and bequests to charitable or benevolent societies, taken collectively, do not exceed one-third of the estate; that distribution to various legatees has heretofore been made, amounting in all to $9.38 per cent. of the amount to which said legatees were entitled, but no part of said legacy of $2,000 has been paid; that petitioner rented a building from the executors at the monthly rental of $12.50, no part of which has been paid; that said legacy is subject to an inheritance tax. As conclusions of law, the court found that the bequest is a valid bequest to charitable uses, binding upon the estate of deceased; that petitioner was, as it existed at the time said will was executed and at the date of the decease of the testator, and has ever since continued to be, and now is, capable of taking said legacy; and it was decreed that the executors pay to petitioner 89.38 per cent. of said legacy of $2,000, after deducting $325, the amount due as inheritance tax and interest. The rental due from petitioner to said executors was decreed to be $325.

Appellants present two questions: First. Can an unincorporated society, other than a mutual benefit association, take a bequest by will in this state? Second. If it cannot, can it, upon incorporating subsequently to the death of the testator, claim the legacy which while unincorporated it could not take?

Appellants concede that the promotion of the knowledge of natural history is a charitable object, and it is also conceded that in the courts of last resort in several states bequests directly to unincorporated societies having charitable objects in view are upheld, but it is contended that the better reason is with the decisions in those states denying the power of such societies to take charitable bequests. Appellants say: "We do not claim that unincorporated societies are incapable of taking because of the indefiniteness of the beneficiaries." "This," as respondent says, "is an essential element of a charity. The public at large was to have been benefited by the promotion of the knowledge of natural history. But the trustee must be such that he can be held accountable." It is also conceded that where no trustee is named the court may appoint one. "But in this case," it is claimed, "the testator has designated a trustee. And this trustee, being an unincorporated society, cannot be held to a performance of the trust. And yet to take the bequest from the trustee named, and to give the fund to others, would be to exercise that prerogative power under the rule of cy pres, * * * which is denied to our courts,"—citing In re Hinckley's Estate, 58 Cal. 497. I have given the position of appellants thus fully, as it narrows the inquiry very much. Appellants err in assuming that the unincorporated society, being named as the grantee, thus becoming in a certain sense the trustee, cannot be held to a performance of the trust. Mr. Perry says: "These bodies or quasi corporations [referring to churches, societies, conferences, yearly meetings of Friends, and families of Shakers, and other organizations] have been considered so far under the control of a court of equity that they would be compelled to execute the duties of the trust imposed upon them, and could be dealt with for a breach." 2 Perry, Trusts, § 730.

Appellants also err in assuming that the case involves the necessity of invoking the rule of cy pres to the full extent as applied in England, in order to uphold the bequest. The legatee at the testator's death, and long prior thereto, was an existing organization, composed of certain known members, governed by a constitution and by-laws, and having officers chosen to conduct the business affairs of the society and to carry out its objects. The society had a name by which it was known, and under which its purposes were effectuated, and the bequest was made to the society by this name. Of the intention of the testator there can be no question. He intended to aid the study of natural history through this particular society, by giving to it the amount of money named in his will. The use being charitable, the purpose and the donee certain and definite, equity will not allow the trust to fail for want of a trustee to enforce it, should such interposition of the court become necessary. In Re Upham's Estate, 127 Cal. 90, 59 Pac. 315, the testator bequeathed the residue of his estate "to the legally qualified and constituted trustees or managers of the Good Templars Orphans' Home of Vallejo, * * * in trust for the use and benefit of the orphan children of said institution." It was contended that, because the home was unincorporated, there were no trustees named capable of taking. The court said: "These trustees seem to be appropriate persons to take charge of this charitable fund, and manage it for the purposes of the trust; but even if it should be held that, in a strict legal sense, they are not capable of taking, yet the charity would not fail for that reason. A court will not allow a charitable trust to fail for want of a legal trustee." Russell v. Allen, 107 U. S. 163, 2 Sup. Ct. 327, 27 L. Ed. 397, and Schmidt v. Hess, 60 Mo. 591, are cited approvingly. In the first of these cases it was said: "If the founder describes the general nature of the charitable trust, he may leave the details of its administration to be settled by trustees under the superintendence of a court of chancery; and an omission to name trustees, or the death or declination of the trustees named, will not defeat the trust, but the court will appoint new trustees in their stead." In the Missouri case the grantor deeded certain land to the Lutheran Church for purposes of a burial ground, and delivered the deed to his son-in-law. The trustees of the Evangelical Lutheran Trinity Church brought the action to have vested in themselves, as such trustees, the title to the property. Evidence was admitted to identify the claimants with the church to which the grantor was attached, and which it was his intention to aid. It was said in the opinion: "Although, in consequence of the nonincorporation of the church for whose benefit the grant was made, there was no one in esse at the time of making the donation capable of being the recipient of the trust, yet, the use being a chartable one, a court of equity, having ascertained the intent of the grantor, will not allow the grant on that account to fail, but will see to its effectuation." Society v. Atwater, 30 Ohio St. 77, 27 Am. Rep. 422, is an instructive case. A bequest in trust for the benefit of the parents of the testator was created. He directed that upon the death of his parents the trust should cease, and that his trustee should distribute certain remaining funds as follows: "To apply the same so that it may be used for the interests of religion, and for the advancement of the Kingdom of Christ in the world, as follows, to wit: He shall pay to the treasurer of the American Tract Society the sum of one thousand dollars." Similar directions were made as to three other societies. The court points out that the testator conceived a scheme for advancing Christ's Kingdom in the world, and carried it out by directing the money to be paid to the various societies, and that as soon as the money arrived at their treasuries the scheme was accomplished and the will fulfilled. The court said: "It is not as though he bequeathed to a trustee for the purpose of advancing the Kingdom of Christ. He bequeaths to these societies, because they are advancing the Kingdom, which is the precise object he wants to accomplish. He first states the object he wishes to effect, and then states how he proposes to effect it. He is willing to pay the money direct to them. To them he trusts that they will forward his cherished idea. As said, the societies themselves are the direct beneficiaries of the trust, although, if they should attempt to use their money for purposes foreign to those for which they exist, doubtless they might be restrained to those purposes,—not by reason of anything in the will, but because they should be restrained to the purposes for which they were created." Again it was said: "The testator has created these societies an agency to carry out his scheme. He has given them power over the application of his bounty, and the exercise of that power relieves the bequest of all objections made on account of vagueness or uncertainty." Again: "Although the testator uses the names of the treasurers, this is only his mode of designating the societies to which he desires his money to go." In Carter v. Balfour's Adm'r, 19 Ala. 814, the will read: "I give one thousand dollars, to be paid at my wife's death, and to be divided in equal proportions betwixt the following benevolent societies, viz.: The Baptist Societies for Foreign Missions and the American and Foreign Bible Societies. And at my sister's death, if the boy Mike, given to her during her lifetime, be alive, he shall be sold to the best advantage, and the proceeds of the sale equally divided between the societies above named." It was insisted that these bequests must fail because the societies were merely voluntary associations, unincorporated and incapable by law of taking bequests, and that there is no trustee to take for them, and, further, that the object was too vague. The opinion proceeds: "I think these descriptions sufficiently specific, and, if societies can be found which were organized and known by those named at the time of the testator's death, they should be considered the societies referred to by the will, and capable of taking the bequests, whether incorporated or not. In making the gifts to the societies by their names, I think it clearly and necessarily inferable that the gifts were intended to be made to them in their aggregate capacity, and for the purposes for which they were organized, and that the testator could not have intended the gifts for the individual members of the societies, or he would have made the bequest to them in their individual names in the ordinary way. It must be presumed that the testator knew for what object the societies were formed, and that he intended to have the funds applied to that object." The opinion then shows that these bequests would be sustained independently of the statute of Elizabeth, and, after an examination of the authorities, concludes: "But I think the weight of American authority is decidedly in favor of such bequests." The learned justice who wrote the opinion reviews the cases pro and con, and devotes especial attention to the leading case holding adversely, namely, Baptist Ass'n v. Hart's Ex'rs, 4 Wheat. 1, 4 L. Ed. 499, and his conclusion was that the same court has partially, if not altogether, overruled the Baptist Ass'n Case. It was expressly held in the Alabama case that there was no occasion for invoking the doctrine of cy pres, and it was said: "The bequests should be paid only to the society specified in the will, or their authorized agents. If the societies, or either of them, did not exist at the time of the testator's death, or cannot now be found, organized and known as above stated, then the bequest to such society or societies should be considered and disposed of as lapsed legacies." We do not deem it necessary to refer further to the cases, of which there are many, holding similar views. See 5 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) p. 918. We are satisfied with the reasoning that has led to the upholding of bequests such as the one before us. Indeed, we think the decision may rest alone on the conclusion reached in Re Upham's estate, supra. The fact that in that case the bequest was to the trustees of the orphans' home, and not directly to the orphans' home, makes no difference. In either case the intention would be the same, and the capacity to take would be the same.

We do not decide, nor is it necessary to so hold, that the subsequent incorporation of the society would add anything to its capacity to take at the death of the testator. The bequest would have been binding on the estate had there been no incorporation. But as the society now has a corporate existence, and the present members are the same as the members of the unincorporated society, and the objects are the same, there can be no objection to its receiving the gift. Society v. Rich, 45 Me. 552. We discover nothing in Grand Grove U. A. O. D. of California v. Garibaldi Grove, No. 71, 130 Cal. 116, 62 Pac. 486, necessarily in conflict with the views herein expressed. We advise that the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: GRAY, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is affirmed.

TRABING v. CALIFORNIA NAV. & IMP.
CO. (Sac. 752.)¹

(Supreme Court of California. June 25, 1901.)

MASTER AND SERVANT—SERVANT'S ACTS—MASTER'S LIABILITY—PASSENGER—EJECT-MENT—EXEMPLARY DAMAGES—EXCESSIVE-NESS.

1. Plaintiff was arrested by the captain of defendant's steamboat, and chained to a post on the lower deck, and ejected before he reached his destination. The court charged that plaintiff could recover only the actual damages suffered by him, unless defendant authorized the acts complained of, or participated therein or ratified them; and that the jury should not allow anything by way of punishing the defendant, unless it authorized the captain's acts or ratified them; and that, unless defendant participated in or authorized the captain's acts or ratified them, the measure of damages would be the amount which would compensate the plaintiff for all detriment proximately caused by the wrongful acts. Held, that the instructions were not erroneous as contradictory and too general.

2. Where the matter included in requested instructions was covered by the charge of the court, it was not error to refuse them.

3. An instruction that plaintiff was entitled to recover only the actual damages proven, as distinguished from mere imaginary or exemplary damages, was properly refused, as tending to mislead the jury as to the character of proof necessary.

4. A charge that plaintiff could not recover for his injured feelings and mental anguish was properly refused.

5. Where plaintiff, a boy of 14, was arrested by the captain of defendant's vessel, and chained to a post, and was ejected at midnight, before reaching his destination, and was obliged to walk 30 miles to reach home, a verdict of $1,500 was not excessive.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county; Edward I. Jones, Judge.

Action by Charles Trabing against the California Navigation & Improvement Company. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Plaintiff, a boy of 14 years, was arrested by the captain of defendant's vessel, and chained to a post on the lower deck, and was ejected from the boat at midnight, before arriving at plaintiff's destination, and 30 miles from his home.

Woods & Levinsky, for appellant. Nicol, Orr & Nutter, for respondent.

SMITH, C. This is an action for damages for maltreatment of the plaintiff on one of the defendant's steamers. The jury returned a verdict for $1,500, and judgment was entered accordingly. The defendant appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying a new trial. The case was before this court on a former appeal, and is reported 121 Cal. 137, 53 Pac. 644, where the facts are more fully stated. The grounds urged for reversal are error of the court in giving or refusing instructions, and excessive damages.

1. On the former trial the court, at the instance of the plaintiff, instructed the jury, if they found certain facts therein enumerated, as follows: "I charge you your verdict will be in favor of plaintiff for such damages as, under all the circumstances of the case disclosed by the evidence, appear to be just, not exceeding the sum of $5,000," the sum demanded in the complaint. Also it refused the following instruction asked by the defendant: "I charge you that in cases of this kind the plaintiff can recover only the actual damages suffered by him, unless the master authorized the commission of the act complained of, or participated therein, or ratified it after its commission." And with reference to these instructions this court on appeal said: "As an abstract proposition of law, the instruction given is correct, but it is too general to properly guide a jury to a correct conclusion under the facts of this case. The instruction would apply to almost any conceivable case, whether the action were against the principal, or against the agent who actually committed the tort, and whether the facts did or did not justify exemplary damages. It left the question of exemplary damages entirely to the jury. The instruction refused should have been given. It would have informed the jury that they could not give exemplary damages. The jury were not restricted to compensatory damages, either by the instruction asked, or any other instruction of similar import."

On the new trial the former of the two instructions commented on was again given, but with the following addition: "But in estimating such damages you must not allow or award anything for the sake of example, or by way of punishing defendant, unless it shall further appear to you from the evidence that the defendant authorized the commission of said acts of the captain, or ratified them after the commission." The court then, of its own motion, gave to the jury the following instruction: "(a) Unless you find from the evidence that the defendant corporation authorized, participated in, or ratified the act or acts of its servant or servants of which complaint is made, the measure of damages, if any you find, is that amount of money which will compensate the plaintiff for all detriment to him proximately caused by such act or acts of the defendant's servant or servants,—his actual damage as distinguished from exemplary or punitive damages,—which amount, under the rule just stated, must be determined, in view of all the evidence, by the sound judgment of the jury." The court refused to give the instruction refused on the first trial, and referred to in the former decision. It also refused to give various instructions that plaintiff could recover "actual damages proven," or "such damages as the plaintiff can actually prove, and has in fact sustained, as contradistinguished from mere imaginary, exemplary, or what is known as 'punitive damages'"; and also the instruction that the jury could not allow the plaintiff "any damages for injured feelings or mental anguish." It is claimed by the appellant that the court erred in the instructions given and in the refusal of those denied.

First. Specifically, the objection to the instructions given is to the part of the instructions given on the former appeal, and referred to in the decision, which it is claimed is erroneous and contradictory to the other instructions. But, as said in the former decision, "as an abstract proposition of law the instruction given is correct," and, though too general of itself to guide the jury, it was fully and satisfactorily explained and qualified in the other instructions.

Second. All of the instructions, in so far as they are correct, were in effect given in other parts of the opinion. The instructions asked as to "actual damages proven" were, in their literal expression, correct, but as used they were calculated to mislead the jury as to the character of the proof necessary. Proof of the damages claimed was necessary, but proof of the amount of detriment, expressed in dollars and cents, was unnecessary. Such proof, in cases of this kind, is in its nature generally impracticable, and hence the amount of damages must be left, in large degree, to the jury. Sedg. Meas. Dam. § 356. The law on the subject was fully explained, and the term "actual damages" correctly defined in other parts of the instructions. The instructions that "damages for injured feelings or mental anguish" could not be allowed was rightly refused. Sloane v. Railway Co., 111 Cal. 668, 44 Pac. 320; 3 Suth. Dam. § 1245.

2. We cannot say that the damages allowed by the jury ($1,500) were excessive. In the former decision, referring to the verdict, which was for $2,500, the court said: "We cannot determine from the amount awarded whether it includes exemplary damages or not. If the jury were properly instructed on that subject, an excess in the amount given should be very clear to justify this court in disturbing their conclusion. The question, therefore, turns on the instructions given and refused." On the whole, I think the case was fairly tried on the principles established by the former decision. The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; GRAY, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

SAN JOSE FRUIT-PACKING CO. v. CUTTING. (S. F. 1,760.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 14, 1901.)

INJUNCTION—ACTION ON BOND—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY—INSTRUCTIONS—MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

1. Where, in action on injunction bond, damages are claimed for injury suffered both because of a written contract and an oral contract, evidence of conversations, which clearly appeared to relate only to the written contract, was improperly admitted to show the oral contract.

2. Plaintiff, in an action on an injunction bond, is only entitled to such proximate damages as he can establish with reasonable certainty.

3. The damages caused by a wrongful injunction, restraining the defendant from using a machine for the manufacture of cans used by defendant, is computed by taking the difference in the cost of the cans manufactured with and without the machine, and multiplying the number of cans actually manufactured without it by such difference.

4. Evidence of the damages caused by an injunction restraining the use of a certain machine in making cans, which is uncertain as to the decrease in number of cans manufactured and the increased cost thereof, is insufficient to support a verdict in an action on the injunction bond, when such facts could have been specifically shown by plaintiff by the introduction of his books.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; George H. Bahrs, Judge.

Action on an injunction bond by the San Jose Fruit-Packing Company against Francis Cutting. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Olney & Olney, for appellant. Chickering, Thomas & Gregory, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The plaintiff, before and after September 19, 1893, was engaged in the business of canning fruit, and of manufacturing metal cans for its own use and for sale, and owned and operated in its business a machine known as the "Wheaton Header," used for putting heads on cans. At the date named, in a suit against plaintiff then pending, an injunction was issued, restraining plaintiff from using this machine, which injunction continued in force until April 17, 1896, when it was dissolved. The defendant here was surety on the injunction bond, and the suit was brought against him for damages suffered by plaintiff by reason of the injunction. The plaintiff recovered a verdict of $15,000, for which amount and costs judgment was entered. The appeal is from the judgment and from an order denying a new trial.

All claims for damages against the defendant were waived by plaintiff's counsel, "except (1) for the increased cost of manufacturing tin cans, caused, as it was claimed, by the issuance of the injunction; and (2) for the loss of profits incurred by the plaintiff in its contract with the Sacramento Packing & Drying Co." The latter item refers apparently to a single contract with the Sacramento Company; but there seems to have been two contracts relied on by plaintiff,—the one in writing, evidenced by the written correspondence between Wright, the plaintiff's manager, and Bentley, the manager of the Sacramento Company; the other resting on the testimony of Wright. The former was for the current season only. The latter, it is claimed, was for an indefinite term of years. The terms of this last alleged contract rest upon certain testimony given by Wright on the witness stand as to conversations between him and Bentley, the manager of the Sacramento Company. The claim of plaintiff is that it was entitled to damages for disability, caused by the injunction, to perform the written contract for the current season (1893), and also for its continued disability in the following year while the injunction was pending. The claim of defendant is that there was no evidence to support either contention, and that the court, with reference to each, erred in its instruction and other rulings.

As to the supposed oral contract, we think the court erred in admitting, and not refusing to strike out, the testimony of Wright with regard thereto. The letters of the Sacramento Company of March 3 and March 7, 1893, show affirmatively that the conversations between Wright and Bentley, and the arrangement resulting, related exclusively to the current season; and without this it is clear that, as stated by Wright, the arrangement was a mere offer, to be accepted or rejected by the other party. But, independently of this, the conversations must be construed with reference to the previous letter of Wright, and regarded as relating only to the current season. The instruction of the court on this point was therefore erroneous. The instruction should have been limited in its application to damages accruing from plaintiff's inability to comply with its written contract.

These errors would necessitate a reversal, but there are others that must be touched on as bearing on the future proceedings of the case:

1. We find no evidence in the record showing, or tending to show, that plaintiff was unable to supply, or that it did not supply, the Sacramento Company with cans for the season of 1893, as required by its contract, and the case, in fact, seems to have been tried on the opposite theory. The season of 1893, as appears from the testimony of Wright, ended with the latter part of September; that is, about the time of the issuance of the injunction. Prior to that time the plaintiff had furnished to the Sacramento Company "nearly two million" cans, or nearly the whole amount used by it. After the injunction was served, "forty or fifty or sixty thousand" cans were furnished which were purchased from others to carry out the contract. With regard, indeed, to the actual number of cans delivered before the injunction was served, the witness corrects his testimony, saying that by reference to the books of the concern he found that something less than 1,000,000 cans had been delivered. But this refers merely to the time of delivery, and is not inconsistent with the fact before stated by him that nearly 2,000,000 cans, presumably of his own manufacture, were delivered either before or after the service of the injunction, before the delivery of the purchased cans. But, giving this statement all the credit claimed for it by the plaintiff, there is no evidence that more cans were required of plaintiff than were actually delivered, or that it had in fact failed of full performance. The contract does not definitely determine the quantity required, and in the later correspondence, or in the testimony, there is no complaint or reference to default. Nor can any inference adverse to the defendant be drawn from Bentley's testimony to the effect that the Sacramento Company used 2,000,000 cans in the year 1893. From the context the most natural construction of his testimony would be that it got these from the plaintiff. But, assuming the contrary, it cannot be inferred from what he says that it demanded that amount from the plaintiff. It may, by preference, have purchased from others.

2. As to whether or not the evidence would have justified a verdict on account of the increased cost of manufacturing tin cans used by the plaintiff itself, and caused by the issuance of the injunction, it is proper to make some observations. The defendant does not make any objection to the validity of the bond, or to his liability thereon, for whatever damages plaintiff can legally show it suffered by reason of the injunction. It is undoubtedly the law that in an action of this character a plaintiff can recover only such direct proximate damages as he can establish with reasonable certainty and accuracy, and the court so instructed the jury. The defendant contends, and we think correctly, that the evidence in the case failed to fulfill the requirements of this instruction. On this point, the sole question was as to the increase in cost of heading occasioned by the disuse of the Wheaton header, and the number of cans actually manufactured which were of the class of $2\frac{1}{2}$ pound cans; for the header was used only in the manufacture of these, and there is no evidence that, if the injunction had not been issued, it would have been used for any others. The data required for this calculation were the cost of making cans with the header, the cost without it, and the number of cans manufactured without it. It appears from the evidence of plaintiff's main witness that all these items could have been shown accurately by an itemized statement from the books of plaintiff. It is not necessary to determine whether or not the failure of plaintiff to introduce its books raised that suspicion against the plaintiff's case which is indicated by subdivisions 5 and 6 of section 1963 of the Code of Civil Procedure; but it may be considered as emphasizing the uncertain, even contradictory, character of the oral testimony given by plaintiff's main witness as to this matter. Thus, for example, the number of $2\frac{1}{2}$ pound cans—of which an exact account could have been given from the books—is given only as being “about three-fourths of the total amount used”; and, with reference to the total, in one place it is said that the number of cans used before the injunction was “from five to seven million” per year, that “in 1894 * * * it dropped about three million cans,”—this making the amount used from two to four millions,—and in another part of his testimony the witness says that “in 1894 we ran off about ten thousand cases less”; and, with reference to the increased cost of manufacture, in one place it is said, in effect, that this was “about a dollar a thousand,” and elsewhere it is said “three dollars per thousand.” This evidence, we think, was entirely too vague and uncertain to justify a verdict under the rule as above stated. The judgment and order appealed from are reversed.

READ v. SAN DIEGO UNION CO. et al.

VENUE — CHANGE — RESIDENCE OF DEFENDANTS — PARTIES PROPERLY PLAINTIFFS.

Where, in an action against three defendants, two of whom are residents of the county, and the third a resident of another county, it appears the residents, if interested, are proper parties plaintiff, and there is no allegation that they refused to join, the nonresident defendant is entitled to a change of venue to the county of its residence.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Lucien Shaw, Judge.

Action by T. J. Read against the San Diego Union Company and others. From an order denying a motion for a change of venue from Los Angeles to San Diego county, defendant San Diego Union Company appeals. Reversed.

Titus & Shaw, for appellant. W. H. Shinn and Byron L. Oliver, for respondents.

HAYNES, C. This action was brought in the county of Los Angeles, in which defendants Bowker and Chandler reside. The defendant the San Diego Union Company, a corporation, has its legal residence and place of business in the county of San Diego, and in due time moved the court for an order changing the place of trial to that county. Said motion was denied, and said corporation appeals from the order denying said motion.

Said corporation, in 1891, and ever since, has been the publisher of a daily newspaper, and in said year entered into a contract with one Whitehouse, whereby it sold the entire city circulation of said newspaper to him upon terms therein specified. In 1892, Whitehouse sold and assigned said contract to defendants Bowker and Chandler, and they afterwards sold and assigned to the plaintiff, T. J. Read, an undivided one-half interest therein. Each of these transfers was formally approved and accepted by the corporation. On July 29, 1899, said corporation served notice upon said Read, Bowker, and Chandler that it rescinded said contract, and would not, after July 31, 1899, furnish them any newspapers for distribution, claiming the right to do so under the terms of said contract, the particulars of which need not be stated, and Read thereupon brought suit against said corporation to recover damages for breach of said contract, and made his co-contractors, Bowker and Chandler, parties defendant with said corporation. Said contract is set out in the complaint, and the various transfers thereof are alleged, clearly showing that Bowker and Chandler are co-contractors with the plaintiff in the contract alleged to have been wrongfully canceled or rescinded by the plaintiff, and, for aught that appears, equally interested with him in the recovery of damages from the corporation for the alleged breach thereof. It is not alleged that they refused to be joined as co-plaintiffs with Read, or that their interests were adverse, nor were any facts alleged showing a right of recovery against them, unless it can be inferred from the general allegation that he, the plaintiff, has been prevented from carrying out his contract by the “defendants herein” in that defendants have “declined and refused to furnish and supply the plaintiff or his agents any newspapers for distribution.” There is no allegation that Bowker and Chandler, his co-contractors, were in any manner interested with said corporation, or were under any obligation to furnish newspapers to the plaintiff for distribution; and the contract set out in the complaint shows conclusively that they were not. The defendants Bowker and Chandler answered, denying that they, or either of them, had at any time refused to permit plaintiff to carry out or perform said contract. The motion of the corporation to change the place of trial was based upon the pleadings and the affidavit of its president, to which were attached certain exhibits, and made part thereof, one of which was a communication signed by Read, Bowker, and Chandler, uniting, as parties to said contract, in a demand upon said corporation to continue to furnish to them and their authorized agents a sufficient number of copies of its paper to supply their subscribers, and notifying it that upon its refusal to do so they would hold the corporation and its stockholders liable for all loss. Affidavits were filed in opposition to the motion, but these were confined to the question of residence, and contained no statement tending to show any reason why Bowker and Chandler were not joined as plaintiffs. We think it clear that Bowker and Chandler were made defendants for the sole purpose of preventing a change of the place of trial to the county of San Diego, in which the corporation had its legal residence. The joinder of resident parties as defendants against whom no cause of action is stated does not deprive the real defendant of his right to have the cause transferred to the county of his residence for trial. Sayward v. Houghton, 82 Cal. 628, 23 Pac. 120; Machine Co. v. Cole, 62 Cal. 318. The order appealed from should be reversed, with directions to the court below to grant appellant's said motion.

We concur: CHIPMAN, C.; GRAY, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the order appealed from is reversed, with directions to the court below to grant appellant's said motion.

NORRIS et al. v. CRANDALL et al.
(L. A. 895.)

FRAUD—EXCHANGE OF PROPERTY—RESCISSION—EVIDENCE—FINDINGS—IMPLEMENTS—VALUE.

1. Where, in an action to rescind an exchange, the court found that defendant represented his property as worth $4,000, and believed it worth that, while it was worth only $2,000, the exchange should not be rescinded when the representation was made and relied on as an opinion, and not as a statement of fact.

2. Where plaintiff sought to rescind an exchange of property on the ground of fraud, and the court finds there was no fraud, a failure to find as to all the facts alleged in the complaint is not error.

3. Where, in an action to rescind an exchange of property, the parties treated the value of the properties exchanged as material, and evidence thereof is admitted over plaintiff's objection, the judgment should not be reversed, since, if immaterial, it could not prejudice plaintiff.

4. Where, on cross-examination, a witness was asked numerous questions as to whether he had not made certain statements to another, but no time, place, or circumstances were specified, it was not error to refuse to permit such others to testify as to such statements for the purpose of impeaching such witness.

5. Where a lawyer engaged for 20 years as an examiner of titles and as attorney for leading loaning companies in a city testifies that he is acquainted with the value of certain lots therein, he should be permitted to testify as to such value.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; J. W. Hughes, Judge.

Action by Adolphus G. Norris and another against Isadore A. Crandall and others. From a judgment for defendants, and from an order denying a new trial, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

L. E. Dadmun and H. A. Jerauld, for appellants. Parrish & Mossholder, for respondents.

CHIPMAN, C. Plaintiffs were the owners of certain land situated in San Diego county, and defendants, or some of them, were owners of certain improved lots in the city of Lincoln, Neb. An exchange, after much negotiation, was finally agreed upon between the parties, and deeds made September 10, 1897. Defendants had formerly resided in Lincoln, but had removed to San Diego in 1895. Plaintiffs resided in San Diego county, and had, up to 1897, never been in Lincoln. Upon the exchange of deeds, plaintiffs and defendants went into the possession of their several lots and tracts of land, plaintiffs removing to Lincoln, where they arrived and went into possession October 5, 1897. The complaint alleged that the San Diego land and improvements were of the value of $3,600, and the personal property included in the trade (being farm implements and other ranch belongings) was of the value of $600, making in all $4,200; that defendants, through defendant G. H. Crandall, acting in their behalf, represented their Lincoln property to be worth $6,000, and that it was incumbered to the extent of $1,100, and no more; "that said property was worth and of the market value of four thousand dollars, at least, over and above said mortgages." Certain alleged false representations as to the improvements on the lots are set forth, and that the property was bringing nine dollars per month rent, and "that said real property was level, and in fine shape, and in a fine and first-class condition." It is alleged that plaintiffs had no personal knowledge of the property, and relied wholly on the representations of defendants, which, it is alleged, were entirely false, and fraudulently made to deceive and cheat plaintiffs, and on this ground the rescission is sought. Among other of the alleged false representations, it is alleged that, instead of a mortgage debt of $4, 100 being on the property, it was incumbered in the further sum of $1,000.

The court made the following findings of fact: (1) That the San Diego property was of the same value, at the time of the exchange, as the Lincoln property, in excess of all mortgages thereon, to wit, of the value of $2,000. (2) That while the negotiations for the trade were progressing defendants gave to plaintiffs the name of a party then residing in San Diego, and pointed out his residence, to wit, J. F. Kinney, Esq., who, defendants informed plaintiffs, once owned a portion of the Lincoln property in question, and could give plaintiffs any information they might desire regarding said Lincoln properties. (3) That defendant G. H. Crandall represented the Lincoln properties to be of the value of $4,000, and that he believed said properties to be worth that amount; that plaintiff A. G. Norris represented and that he believed his San Diego property to be worth $3,500, "but that neither plaintiffs' said property nor defendants' said property was worth but $2,000 over and above all mortgages and incumbrances, of which latter there were none on the Lincoln property except in the amount of $1,100." The finding 3 then states certain specific representations made by defendant G. H. Crandall, and that they were true, and that he did not represent the property "to be in fine shape, level, and in fine and first-class condition," and it is found that the representations made by said Crandall "were not made to deceive or to defraud plaintiffs, or either of them; that plaintiffs believed and relied upon the foregoing statements of said G. H. Crandall." (4) That plaintiffs went upon and took possession of the Lincoln property October 5, 1897, "and took no steps and made no offer to rescind their contract of exchange of said properties," and gave no notice of any dissatisfaction with the trade until in July, 1898. (5) That plaintiffs knew, when the exchange was made, that defendants had not seen the Lincoln property since October, 1895. (6) That the allegations of fraud in plaintiffs' complaint alleged against defendant G. H. Crandall are not sustained by the evidence, (7) That plaintiffs were not induced to exchange their property "by the fraudulent representations or statements of said defendants, or any of them."

1. It is contended that findings 1, 3, and 4 are not supported by the evidence, and that on findings 1 and 3 the judgment should have been for plaintiffs, because the court found that defendants represented their Nebraska property to be worth $4,000, and that plaintiffs believed and relied upon these representations, whereas the court found the property to be worth only $2,000 over and above the mortgage of $1,100, thus making the value $3,100 instead of $4,000. There would be force in the latter of the above contentions if the evidence compelled the conclusion that the exchange of properties was brought about by a false statement of value by defendants made as a substantive fact on which plaintiffs relied as a fact, and not as defendants' opinion as to the fact. We do not, however, think that the evidence would justify any such conclusion. The evidence was that negotiations for the exchange were entered upon in the early part of August, 1897, and continued at intervals until in September, when the deeds passed. Defendant G. H. Crandall testified fully as to the representations made by him (and he is the only defendant charged with having made any). After stating what he told plaintiff Adolphus Norris as to the improvements, the situation of the lots, and also as to the condition of the improvements in 1895, when the defendants last saw the property, the amount of incumbrances on the property, and like matters, as to which the court found with defendants, the witness continued: "I told him in good times the whole property there—the three lots and four houses—ought to be worth $4,000; but I told him it was like property here,—it was at a standstill; property was not moving much; and that, if he had to sell, I did not think that he could get more than half that amount; I said: 'It is just like it is with your property here. You place your property at $3,000, and you know the way property is selling here that you could not get half that for it.' We had several conversations, and they were all materially just about the same. I told him, if he wished to know more about the place, he had better write; that he could find any quantity of real-estate men there that could tell him all about the property. 'If you don't want to go to that trouble, there is a man in the city of the name of Judge Kinney, that platted that addition, who could tell you all about it.' I told him that the property when we left, in 1895, was in good condition, but how it was at the time we made the trade I did not know. * * * I told him there was a draw running through the place, or dry creek, called 'Antelope Creek,' and that this two-story house was built into the bank of the creek or draw, and that the chicken house was built into the same bank; and all those representations were true." It appeared that the property was situated in about the center of the city, taken as a whole; that there were fine residences erected near by; that the location was favorably located with reference to street cars and to the business portion of the city, to school houses, churches, and like conveniences. Some of the conversations between plaintiff Adolphus Norris and defendant G. H. Crandall were in the presence and hearing of the latter's father and sister in the store of G. H. Crandall. They were called as witnesses, and corroborated the statements made to Adolphus Norris by G. H. Crandall, as testified to by the latter. The evidence shows that what was stated as to the value of the Lincoln property was but the opinion of Crandall; and other testimony of other witnesses placed the value at quite as high a figure as Crandall thought the property worth. There was testimony introduced by plaintiffs to the effect that the Nebraska property was not worth the mortgage debt, and defendant's witnesses varied much in their estimate of its value. The same may be said of the value placed by witnesses on the San Diego property, some of whom testified to a value as low as $250. It is evident that the court concluded from the testimony that Crandall did not make his statements with any intention to mislead Norris, or to gain a fraudulent advantage in the transaction, and that Norris did not make the exchange in reliance on Crandall's statement of the value of the Lincoln property as a substantive fact, but merely as his opinion. In this conclusion of the court support is found in the evidence.

2. There were certain facts alleged in the complaint, paragraphs 6 to 13, inclusive, in failing to find on which it is claimed the court erred. The court did find upon such of these paragraphs as alleged the representations made by Crandall, as to their influence on plaintiffs, as to whether they were fraudulently made, and as to the mortgage indebtedness on the Lincoln property. It is true, the evidence shows that there were mortgages for $1,000 in excess of the $1,000 represented by Crandall to be the only liens on the property. But it also appeared that the $1,000 mortgages had in fact been paid, but were not satisfied on the record, although Crandall supposed they had been. They were, however, subsequently satisfied. The other allegations were found upon either specifically, or were covered fully by the finding against the alleged fraudulent intent, or they were allegations of merely probative facts, not necessary to be found upon. The findings support the judgment. The principal ultimate fact in the case on which plaintiffs relied was whether Crandall falsely and fraudulently, and with intent to deceive plaintiffs, made the representation alleged. The finding being against plaintiffs on this fact, no finding in their favor on the omitted facts would justify a different judgment. Windhaus v. Bootz, 92 Cal. 617, 28 Pac. 557.

3. Certain witnesses were allowed, against plaintiffs' objection, to testify to the value of plaintiffs' property, and this is claimed as error, as it appeared that defendants saw the land before they purchased. Plaintiffs alleged that the value of their property at the time of the trade was $3,600 for the land. Defendants denied that the land was of greater value than $1,000. The court found that the value of the real property was $2,000. The parties seem to have treated this as an issue in the case, although, in view of the other issues, we cannot see that it was particularly material. However, the testimony, if immaterial, could have worked no prejudice to plaintiffs.

4. Error is claimed in refusing to allow the witness W. B. Norris to testify to certain conversations with the witness G. H. Crandall, who, when testifying, denied the conversations. The objection was that no sufficient foundation was laid for the impeachment of the witness Crandall; that the place where, the time when, and the persons present were not given in the questions asked on cross-examination. The record reads as follows: "Plaintiffs recalled W. B. Norris [not plaintiff] in rebuttal, and offered to show that G. H. Crandall, in the months of September and October, 1897, at his store in San Diego, California, stated to W. B. Norris during the conversations that there was a fine two-story house on lots 7 and 8, and that the draw in the lots did not amount to anything; that one could take a plow, and run a furrow alongside of the road in front of the lots, which would keep all the water from running through the lots, and would fill up the draw; that the property was worth $5,500; and that the lots were not cut up or washed out any, but were good lots, and laid well." When the witness Crandall, whom it was proposed to impeach, was testifying, he was asked a great many questions as to whether he had not made certain and different statements at different times to the witness Norris, some of which were sufficiently definite as to time and circumstances, while others were not thus definite. In none of them was the store of the witness Crandall named as the place, and in none of them was any person named as present, nor did it appear that the two persons only were present. It will be observed that plaintiffs did not formulate any question for the impeaching witness to answer, but stated generally what they proposed to show; and the offer embraced several different statements of conversations claimed to have occurred in two different months, giving no time in the months, and naming no persons as present, but fixing the place in Crandall's store, a place at no time mentioned to Crandall when on the witness stand. The proper method of impeachment is to formulate the question so as to embrace the very statement, at least in substance, which the witness whom it is desired to impeach has denied making, and to ask the impeaching witness for a categorical answer whether the statement was made, giving "the circumstances of times, places, and persons present." Section 2052, Code Civ. Proc. Both parties cite Plass v. Plass, 122 Cal. 4, 54 Pac. 372. In that case it appeared that no persons were present at the time and place mentioned except the interlocutors. It was held that, where it appeared that no persons were present except the impeaching witness and the witness sought to be impeached, it was not necessary to state in the impeaching question, "No other persons being present." It was also held that, where it appears that only the two were present, it would be superfluous to require a statement that the person spoken to was present, as it must be presumed he was present, or he could not have been spoken to. The case here is not brought within the facts of the Plass Case. We think the court made a correct ruling.

5. It is claimed that the court erred in permitting the witness Brown to testify in defendants' behalf as an expert on the value of real estate, and in refusing to strike out his testimony. It is claimed that mere opportunity offered for observation will not constitute one an expert, or render his opinion admissible; that he must have been educated in the business about which he testifies, or has acquired actual skill and scientific knowledge upon the subject,—citing subdivision 9, § 1870, Code Civ. Proc.; Goldstein v. Black, 50 Cal. 463; Reed v. Drais, 67 Cal. 491, 8 Pac. 20; and other cases. In the present case Brown testified that he was a lawyer, and had been engaged for 20 years as examiner of titles of real estate in Lincoln; that he was acquainted with the value of real estate in that city in the years 1895 and 1897, and was acquainted with the value of the lots in question, and of the real property in that vicinity; that he had acted for 20 years for some one or other of the leading loaning companies doing business in Lincoln, the managers of which kept themselves well informed as to not only the market value, but as to the income value, of improved properties. The witness possessed something more than mere opportunity for observation. His profession, and his particular specialty in that profession, and his employment by those who were loaning money based upon values of real property, gave him the required knowledge, and he testified that he had knowledge of the values of the property in controversy. The witness brought himself within the rule and the reason of the rule as laid down in Reed v. Drais, supra, and the authorities there cited, and the question there was as to the value of real property.

We discover no error in the record, and therefore advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: GRAY, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. McMAHON. (Cr. 736.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 26, 1901.)

EMBEZZLEMENT — EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY — APPEAL—INSTRUCTIONS—PRESUMPTION.

1. On a prosecution for embezzlement, the evidence showed that the prosecuting witness, before retiring for the night, asked accused to count his money, and keep the same for him, and that accused counted it, asking another to notice how much there was. She then put the purse in a pocket of the owner's trousers, and hung them on a chair. The money disappeared, and subsequently most of it was found secreted in the roof of the house where accused lived. Held, that the evidence was sufficient to sustain a conviction, under Pen. Code, § 503, defining embezzlement as the fraudulent appropriation of property by one intrusted therewith.

2. Where, on appeal, the instructions to the jury are not contained in the transcript, it will be presumed they were proper.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; William P. Lawlor, Judge.

Mary McMahon was convicted of embezzlement, and she appeals. Affirmed.

Charles A. Low, for appellant. Tiley L. Ford, Atty. Gen., for the People.

GRAY, C. The defendant appeals from a judgment convicting her of embezzlement and from an order denying her a new trial. The only point urged by appellant is that the evidence does not show that the crime of embezzlement was committed, for the reason (1) that it fails to show that the property was "intrusted" to the defendant; (2) it fails to show that defendant took the money and converted it to her own use.

The facts of the case pertinent to these questions, so far as necessary to state, are as follows: The defendant and the complaining witness were together in the afternoon in a room in a house of ill fame in the city of San Francisco, and the complainant then gave to said defendant seven dollars, as he says, "for services rendered in that room." They met again in the evening of that day, and with other parties they spent most of the night moving about from saloon to saloon, indulging in intoxicating liquors. At about 4 o'clock in the morning the complaining witness, with a man who had worked for him in his business as a barber, returned with the defendant to her said room. The prosecuting witness was not drunk, as he says, but was very sick, when they reached the room, and his barber friend was sent out after some bromo seltzer, which the prosecuting witness drank, and soon thereafter the two men turned into the defendant's bed and went to sleep. Before turning in, however, the prosecuting witness had produced a purse containing $265, and asked the defendant to count it and take care of it for him. The defendant counted it, saying to the other man, "Come here, Joe; I want you to see how much money Harry has got, so that he will have every cent in the morning." She then put the purse back in the pocket of the trousers of the prosecuting witness, and hung the trousers on the back of a chair in the room. The prosecuting witness went to sleep, and thereafter, in the presence of defendant and another woman, called Billings, who came into the room before the prosecuting witness went to sleep, the male companion of the prosecuting witness took the purse from the trousers, poured the money out to see if it was all there, restored it to the purse, returned the purse to the trousers, and left the trousers on the chair. The two women then left the room, the defendant locking the door as she went, but she immediately returned, unlocked the door, secured a cape which she had left, and again went out, locking the door behind her. An hour or two later the occupants of the room were suddenly aroused by defendant, who excitedly announced to the owner of the money that he had been robbed, to which the defendant replied: "You have got the money, and you must give it to me. I gave it to you to take care of it, and you must give me the money." The defendant was soon thereafter arrested, and subsequently most of the money was found by the police, aided by a man who was living with defendant, secreted in the roof of the house where defendant lived. There is other evidence of a circumstantial nature in the case tending to show that the defendant must have either actually removed the money from the room herself, or connived at its removal while the occupants slept.

"Embezzlement is the fraudulent appropriation of property by a person to whom it has been intrusted." Pen. Code, § 503. Being properly instructed as to the law of the matter, as we presume the jury were, it was for them to say, from all the evidence before them, whether the money was "intrusted" to the defendant or not. By their verdict of conviction they found that it was so intrusted. Of course, it is possible in this as it is in most cases to take different views of the evidence, but we think the view taken by the jury was a reasonable one. Certain it is that the owner gave up all control of this money to the defendant until he should arise in the morning, and it also appears that she accepted the trust to safely keep the same, counting the money, and assuring him that it would be there in the morning, and apparently she undertook to carry out the trust by locking the door and carrying away the key. The place where she kept the money was not material. If she was given control of it under an agreement to keep it safely while the owner slept, the property was intrusted to her, within the meaning of the statute; and if she violated this agreement, and abused the confidence reposed in her by stealing it away or conniving at its being stolen, with the purpose of depriving the owner of it, and converting it to her own use, she was guilty of embezzlement. All this the jury found she did, and we see no cause to disturb their verdict. The case of People v. Montaral, 120 Cal. 691, 53 Pac. 355, differs materially in its facts from the case before us, and is not an authority for a reversal of this case. People v. Johnson, 91 Cal. 265, 27 Pac. 663, as to the facts involved, more nearly resembles this case than any we have been able to find; and yet there is a marked distinction between the facts of the two cases. The evidence in this case goes much further than the Johnson Case to show an "intrusting" of the property, and thereby to establish the principal distinguishing element of embezzlement. We quote the language of a concurring opinion in the Johnson Case as peculiarly applicable here: "I think that the jury had the right to find that appellant, with the consent of the prosecuting witness, had full actual possession of the money; and whether it was 'intrusted' to him was, I think, under all the circumstances, a question to be determined by the jury, under proper instructions of the court. And I see no error in the instructions on that point." The instructions are not contained in the transcript in the case before us, but it appears that the jury were instructed, and from this it will be presumed that they were properly instructed. The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; CHIPMAN, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. CALLEGO. (Cr. 733.)

MURDER—CONVICTION—EVIDENCE—CORPUS DELICTI.

Defendant, the father of a newly-born infant, took it from the mother, who was unmarried. He put the child in a grain sack, and hung it in a tree so near the house that its cries were heard at times until the morning of the fourth day, when defendant's wife took it away. The child was not seen thereafter. The mother and her sister and brother lived in the house. Defendant lived a mile and a half from there, and left a few minutes after taking the child, and did not return. Held, that the evidence of these facts did not justify a verdict of murder in the second degree, since it does not appear that the child is dead or was killed, or that defendant killed it.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Luis Obispo county; E. P. Unargst, Judge.

Pedro Callego was convicted of murder in the second degree, and from the judgment and order refusing a new trial he appeals. Reversed.

William Graves and Louis Lamy, for appellant. Tirey L. Ford, Atty. Gen., for the People.

TEMPLE, J. The defendant was convicted of murder in the second degree, and appeals from the judgment and from an order refusing a new trial. The only question of importance is whether there was sufficient evidence to warrant the verdict. It is the old case where it is contended that the corpus delicti was not satisfactorily shown. It is a charge of child murder, and it is contended that there was no proof (1) that the child is dead; (2) if dead, that it was killed; and (3) that, if it was killed, it was not shown that the defendant killed it. I think all these contentions are well grounded, and especially the last. The child was born alive, and soon after was taken by the defendant, who was its father, under circumstances which indicated at least an intention that the mother, who was unmarried, should not have it. It appears that he put the child in a grain sack, and hung it in a tree so near the house that its cries could be heard in the cabin where the mother was, and were heard at times for three days and nights, and was alive on the morning of the fourth day, when it appears the defendant's wife took it away. Since that time it has never been seen. Defendant lived about a mile and one-half from the cabin in which the child was born, and the only proof of death was that the defendant's wife carried it in a closely-tied package attached to her saddle. This is hardly sufficient, but, if it were, the presumption is that the child was alive when she took it. The defendant left the place where the child was born a few minutes after the child was taken by him, and it does not appear that he was on the premises afterwards. He was not living with the mother of the child, but a brother and sister of the mother were there. He may have hung it in a tree with the intent that it should die of starvation, although, if that was his purpose, it was a strange thing to do, since the mother and all in the house could hear its cries. But, however that may be, there is no evidence which tends to prove that it did die of starvation, or without other cause. The judgment is reversed and a new trial ordered.

BUFFALO CYCLE CO. v. TODD & HAWLEY. (L. A. 837.)

PLEADING—ANSWER—OPINION OF PLEADER—
FAILURE TO DENY MATERIAL AVERMENTS—AMENDMENT.

1. Plaintiff sued on an accepted order, which directed defendant to pay to plaintiff any sums that might be due the drawer thereafter from it, and the complaint alleged that defendant had refused to pay, pursuant to the order, sums received by them for the drawer, and had paid him a sum in excess of plaintiff's claim. The answer denied that defendant ever received for the use of the drawer any sum payable on the order, or that defendant had any sum which could have been applied on the order; denied it ever had any money out of which it could have paid any claim of plaintiff against the drawer; and denied it had refused to pay any sum applicable to the payment under the terms thereof, or paid anything to the drawer. Held, that a judgment on the pleadings for plaintiff was proper, inasmuch as the answer was a mere statement of opinion that the money was not applicable on the order, and the denial as to payment to the drawer a denial of an immaterial averment.

2. A proposed amended answer, which failed to deny the drawing and acceptance of the order or the receipt of money belonging to the drawer, and the denials of which, as to matters referred to in the original, were substantially the same, was properly disallowed.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; E. S. Torrance, Judge.

Action by the Buffalo Cycle Company against Todd & Hawley, a corporation. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Hendrick & Wright, for appellant. Withington & Carter, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. On motion of plaintiffs, a judgment on the pleadings was rendered in their favor, and defendant appeals from the judgment.

It is averred in the complaint, in addition to the averments of the partnership of plaintiffs, the incorporation of defendant, and other formal matters, that on and prior to June 1, 1895, defendant and one Percy Easton were partners under the firm name of the San Diego Cycle Company, and engaged in certain described business; that on said day the partnership was dissolved, and defendant took possession of the assets, contracts, accounts, and other property of the partnership, and proceeded to close out the business. It is further averred that said Easton was indebted to plaintiffs on a certain promissory note and on a certain judgment, the amount due on both being $604.55, with interest, etc., and that "in settlement of said demands and of the said claims and indebtedness" Easton made and delivered to plaintiffs the following order: "Messrs. Todd and Hawley, Composing the San Diego Cycle Company: Please pay to Withington & Carter, attorneys of the Buffalo Cycle Company, whatever sums may be due and payable to me thereafter from any contract or contracts or transactions had with you or either of you. [Signed] Percy Easton. July 22, 1895. San Diego, California,"—and that at said last-mentioned date the said defendant accepted the said order, in writing, as follows: "Accepted. Todd & Hawley, G. M. Hawley, Treasurer." It is further averred that Withington & Carter had no interest in said order, that it was always the property of plaintiffs, and that they made a formal written assignment of the same to plaintiffs. It is further averred that thereafter defendant received to and for the use of Easton, from the business, contracts, and transactions mentioned in the order, large sums of money in excess of said $604.55 and interest, and, though often requested to do so, has refused to pay the same, or any part thereof, to plaintiffs. There is also an averment that defendant had paid to Easton a sum of money largely in excess of plaintiffs' claim. Defendant filed an answer, in which there was no denial of the partnership of plaintiffs, or the partnership of defendant and Easton, or the indebtedness of Easton to plaintiffs, or the making of said order, and its acceptance by defendant. The entire answer of the defendant is as follows: "Now comes defendant, and by way of answering plaintiffs' amended complaint herein, denies that at any time or times mentioned in said complaint this defendant ever received to or for the use of the said Percy Easton the sum of $604.55, or any other sum of money which was due and payable on the order and acceptance sued upon; denies that at any time the defendant had said sum of money or any sum of money belonging to said Easton in his possession, which sum could have been applied in the satisfaction of said order and acceptance; denies that it ever had any property or any money out of which it could have paid any claims of the plaintiffs herein against the said Percy Easton. Defendant denies that it has, since the said 22d day of July, 1895, paid to Percy Easton said sum of money as set out in said plaintiffs' amended complaint, or any sums of money, nor has this defendant ever refused or failed to pay the plaintiffs any sum of money or moneys applicable to said payment under the terms thereof."

The judgment of the court below is right. The answer raises no issue. It denies no material averment of the complaint. It contains merely a statement of the pleader's opinion that, as a matter of law, the money alleged by plaintiffs to be in its hands is not applicable to the payment of the plaintiffs' claim, without stating any facts upon which the opinion is based, and it therefore sets up no defense. The denial that the defendant paid any money to Easton is merely the denial of an immaterial averment.

After the motion for judgment had been argued, and before judgment thereon had been rendered, defendant made a general request to amend, and the court postponed the decision for several days, during which time defendant offered a certain proposed amended answer, a copy of which appears in the record, and asked leave to file it. The court refused to allow the proposed answer to be filed, and in this ruling we see no error. The denials in the proposed answer as to the matters referred to in the original answer are substantially like those in the original. There are some denials as to averments in the complaint above noticed, which were admitted in the original answer, all of which, except one, are made on the ground that defendant had "no information or belief sufficient to enable him to answer." The exception is a mere denial that it was ever associated with Easton as a partner "under the name of the San Diego Cycle Company." There is no denial of the drawing and acceptance of the order, or the receipt of money belonging to Easton. There is an averment that it paid out money to other creditors of Easton without authority from the latter to do so; but this constitutes no defense. Under these circumstances we cannot say that the court abused its discretion in refusing to allow the amended answer to be filed.

There is nothing in the point that there are two causes of action in the complaint, which are not separately stated. There is only one cause of action, which is on the accepted order. The judgment is affirmed.

Benj. K. Knight and C. E. Lindsay, for appellant. Charles C. Houck (Joseph H. Skirm, of counsel), for respondents.

GRAY, C. This action was brought, under the provisions of section 8 of the county government act of 1893 (St. 1893, p. 347), to recover $1,035, alleged to have been illegally paid to defendants for county printing. The plaintiff appeals from a judgment following an order sustaining a demurrer to its amended complaint.

The complaint, as amended, so far as necessary to be here stated, alleges, in substance, that the defendants entered into a conspiracy with other printers and publishers of said county of Santa Cruz to defraud the said county; that it was agreed between the conspirators that the said defendants should file with the board of supervisors of said county a false and fictitious proposal in writing to print the delinquent tax list of 1895 for the price of $1.50 per square for the first insertion, and $1 per square for each subsequent insertion; that no proposals should be filed to print said list at or for a lower price, and that the amount received from plaintiff by defendants for the printing of said list should be divided among the parties to said conspiracy; that the said proposal was filed as agreed; that said proposal was not a sealed proposal, within the meaning of section 3766 of the Political Code, then in force; that its contents were before the filing thereof well known to the other persons engaged and participating in said conspiracy, and that by reason thereof, and of said conspiracy, no lower bid or proposal was filed with or presented to said board; that the said board thereafter, without knowledge of said conspiracy, accepted said proposal, and awarded to defendants the contract for the publication of the said delinquent tax list for 1895 at the said price proposed; that thereafter a pretended claim for the amount of $1,381.50 for the printing of the delinquent tax list of said county for the year 1895, duly verified as required by law, was presented to said board for settlement and allowance; that said claim was based on the aforesaid fraudulent proposal, and, without any knowledge of said conspiracy and intent to defraud, the said board allowed said claim to the extent of $1,350, and thereupon the county auditor of said county, as directed by said board, drew a warrant on the treasurer of said county in favor of defendants for said last-mentioned sum, and the same was paid in full to said defendants on the 6th day of July, 1895; that the proper legal charge for the printing of said tax list at all the times mentioned was $315, and no more; that all of said pretended claim in excess of said $315 was not and is not payable or chargeable by or against plaintiff, and was not and is not a county charge; that plaintiff received no consideration for said claim above said $315, and it was the duty of said board to allow said claim for said sum of $315, and for no greater amount; that by reason of the premises the defendants are indebted to plaintiff in the sum of $1,035, no part of which has been paid. Plaintiff prays judgment for said $1,035, together with 20 per cent. damages, as provided by law.

Section 8 of the county government act of 1893 (St. 1893, p. 347) is as follows: "Hereafter, whenever any board of supervisors shall, without authority of law, order any money paid as a salary, fees, or for any other purposes, and such money shall have been actually paid; or whenever any other county officer has drawn any warrant or warrants in his own favor, or in favor of any other person, without being authorized thereto by the board of supervisors, or by the law, and the same shall have been paid, the district attorney of such county is hereby empowered, and it is hereby made his duty, to institute suit, in the name of the county, against such person or persons, to recover the money so paid, and twenty per cent. damages for the use thereof; and no order of the board of supervisors therefor shall be necessary to maintain such suit; and provided further, that when the money has not been paid on such order or warrants, it is hereby made the duty of the district attorney of such county, upon receiving notice thereof, to commence suit, in the name of the county, for restraining the payment of the same; and no order of the board of supervisors shall be necessary in order to maintain such suit." It will be seen that a suit can be maintained under this section only when the order of the board of supervisors or other warrant on which money is to be or has been paid out was made "without authority of law." The action of the board of supervisors in awarding the contract for printing the delinquent tax list, and in subsequently allowing the claim therefor, under the circumstances disclosed by the complaint, is conclusive of the matter, and in the face of such action it cannot be said that the money was paid to defendants "without authority of law." The order of the board duly made constituted the "authority of law." In Lamberson v. Jefferds, 118 Cal. 363, 50 Pac. 403, it is said, "The allowance and settlement of the claim by the board of supervisors is an adjudication, by a tribunal having jurisdiction of the matter, that the services have been rendered, and of the correctness of their value, and is conclusive." See, also, McFarland v. McCowen, 98 Cal. 329, 33 Pac. 113; Colusa Co. v. De Jarnett, 55 Cal. 373; McConoughy v. Jackson, 101 Cal. 265, 35 Pac. 863, 40 Am. St. Rep. 53; McBride v. Newlin, 129 Cal. 36, 61 Pac. 577. Under the authority of these cases, the board of supervisors was the proper tribunal before which to make the objection that the claim for the printing was excessive by reason of a fraudulent conspiracy or for any other reason, and, the board having taken due action in the matter, all defenses that might have been made to the claim before them are precluded. The judgment should be affirmed.

AND COUNTY OF SAN FRAN-CISCO. (S. F. 2,618.)¹

(Supreme Court of California. June 28, 1901.)

CRIMINAL LAW—CONVICTION—NEW TRIAL—REFUSAL—APPEAL—REVERSAL.

1. Where on appeal an order of the police court denying petitioner a new trial was reversed, and a new trial had in the superior court, resulting in a conviction, as to the appeal from the order denying the new trial there was a finality as to petitioner's rights.

2. Defendant, being convicted in police court, appealed to the superior court from an order denying a new trial, which order was reversed, and on new trial in the superior court defendant was convicted. Thereafter the superior court, by mistake, owing to the papers on appeal bearing a different number, rendered a decision reversing the judgment of the police court. On the attention of the court being called thereto, it set aside the order wherein the judgment was reversed. Held, that the judgment rendered on appeal reversing the order denying a new trial, and the conviction of appellant on such new trial in the superior court, was final, and there was, therefore, in fact no appeal in the case pending, in which the second judgment was rendered reversing the judgment below.

In bank. Petition by Herbert E. Wilson for a writ of mandamus against the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco. Denied.

George D. Collins, for petitioner. Lewis F. Byington, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. The petitioner prays for a writ of mandate against the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, asking that an order be made directing that court to try him upon a certain criminal charge therein alleged to be pending against him. The petitioner further asks that, if such relief be not granted, then that the court be ordered to hear and determine an alleged pending appeal taken by him from a judgment rendered against him in the police court.

As to the first branch of relief prayed for, we see no merit in the claims of petitioner, for by the record the facts appear to be that he appealed to the superior court from an order made by the police court denying his motion for a new trial, and upon the hearing of that appeal he was granted a new trial in the superior court. That trial has been had, and his conviction resulted. As far as the appeal of petitioner from the order denying his motion for a new trial is concerned, this would seem to be a finality of his rights.

Laying aside any question as to the appeal above considered, and the substantial legal results following therefrom, if there be any, the court will proceed to consider the remaining branch of the case, involving the appeal from the judgment. An appeal was taken by the petitioner from the judgment of the police court. That appeal was heard and submitted, and thereafter decided by the superior court. By that decision the judgment of the police court was affirmed September 7, 1900. The appeal decided upon said day was the only appeal ever taken from the judgment rendered by the police court against petitioner. Thereafter, upon December 21, 1900, the superior court, by mistake, owing to the papers upon appeal at this time bearing a different number from that entered upon them at the time the appeal was decided upon, September 7th, rendered a decision reversing the judgment given by the police court. Upon December 26th, the attention of the superior court being called to its mistake, it set aside the order of December 21st, wherein the judgment was reversed. As before suggested, there was but one appeal taken by petitioner from the judgment of the police court. That appeal was disposed of by the judgment of the superior court rendered September 7, 1900. At the time the judgment was rendered by the superior court, December 21, 1900, there was no appeal in the case pending before that court, and the whole proceeding relating to the reversal of the judgment at that time was null and void. The mere numbering of the papers with different numbers in no way affects the question before the court. These different numbers upon the papers, in conjunction with the fact that the court in bank at these various times was made up of different departments, undoubtedly led to the complications and mistakes here indicated. That is the only result following therefrom. The court took jurisdiction of the appeal from the judgment when it ordered it submitted upon briefs thereafter to be filed; and by deciding the appeal upon September 7, 1900, it exercised that jurisdiction over it which it had already assumed. We see no sound reason why the judgment rendered at that time may be declared void, even conceding that mandate would run to compel a trial or hearing, when there had already been a hearing which resulted in a void judgment. It follows, from what has been said, that there is no merit in this application. Petitioner is neither entitled to a trial, nor entitled to have the appeal which he took from the judgment of the police court now heard. That appeal has once been heard and determined against him, and his rights thereunder are foreclosed. For the foregoing reasons, the application for the writ is denied.

NEALE v. HEAD. (S. F. 2,172.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 26, 1901.)

In bank.

On petition for rehearing. Denied.

For former opinion, see 65 Pac. 131.

PER CURIAM. Rehearing denied.

BEATTY, C. J. I dissent from the order denying a rehearing of this case. By the act under which the California Mutual Life Insurance Company was incorporated (St. 1865-66, p. 752), it was forbidden to make any insurance until it had a cash capital of at least $100,000, fully paid up, and a guaranty fund of $250,000, composed of the promissory notes of solvent parties, approved by the board of directors and by each other, no note to exceed $5,000. Such notes were required to be payable absolutely and at all events, at the company's option, and to be negotiable, in order that they might be indorsed and transferred or converted into cash or otherwise dealt with by the company, in its discretion, without reference to any contingency of losses, expenses, or otherwise.

And it was provided that such notes, or the proceeds thereof, should remain with the company as a fund for the better security of its dealers, and should be assets of the company liable for its debts, obligations, and indebtedness next after its assets from premiums and other sources, exclusive of capital stock, until the net earnings of the company, over and above its expenses, losses, and liabilities, should have accumulated in cash, or securities in which the net earnings had been invested, to a sum which, with the capital stock, should be equal to the aggregate of the original amounts of the guaranty fund and of the capital stock, which should thereupon become and remain the fixed capital of the company, not subject to division, etc. And it was further provided that until the fixed capital had been so accumulated, and the fact formally proven and published, no guaranty note should be withdrawn from the fund without the substitution of another note unanimously approved by the directors then in office and by all the other note makers. See sections 8-10 of the act. By these and other provisions of similar tendency, the legislature sought to protect the policy holders and other creditors of such insurance companies by exacting the creation of an inviolable fund out of which their claims should be payable, but according to this decision the whole purpose and policy of the law can be frustrated by the unlawful act of the corporation in surrendering or canceling a single one of the guaranty notes without compliance with the conditions prescribed in the statute. Without any fault on the part of the policy holders or other creditors of the corporation, five-sevenths of the fund which the legislature has been at such pains to create for the satisfaction of their demands is swept out of existence by an act of the directors which is expressly forbidden by law. It would seem that there is some fault in the logic which can achieve so startling a result, and the fault, I think, is not far to seek. It consists in assuming as the basis of the argument that the corporation can surrender or cancel one of the guaranty notes without observing the conditions prescribed by the act. I think, on the contrary, that any such attempt would be clearly ultra vires, void, and nugatory. The corporation might cancel and surrender the note, but the act, being forbidden by law, would be of no legal efficacy. The maker of the note would remain liable notwithstanding the attempted release, and notwithstanding the actual surrender of the paper upon which the note was written. In a suit to enforce payment for the benefit of creditors on contribution for the benefit of his co-sureties, no court would listen for a moment to the plea that the note had been canceled or surrendered. The ready answer would be that the corporation had no power to release it or surrender it; that it had never been held by the corporation for its own benefit, but in trust for the security of others; and that the attempt to withdraw it was an attempted fraud. If these views are correct, the whole basis of the department opinion is swept away. No wrong was done to the defendant in this case by the withdrawal of the notes of other guarantors, because their liability remained just the same as before. And, as to the neglect of the corporation to prefer claims against the estates of deceased note makers, it may be answered that the surviving note makers could themselves have made such claims, and it was their duty to do so if they desired that protection. The opinion of the department seems to assume in reference to this point that if one of several sureties dies solvent the survivors are all discharged if the obligee fails to present a claim against the estate of the decedent. No authority is cited to sustain the proposition, and it is clearly in conflict with the principle decided in Sichel v. Carrillo, 42 Cal. 493, and the cases there referred to, and the later cases approving the same doctrine. There is therefore no basis for the conclusion that the failure of the corporation to present claims against the estates of deceased note makers released the survivors, and, unless we are prepared to hold that an act done in defiance of express statutory inhibition is legally effective, there was no release of any surviving note maker by the surrender of their notes.

It is also, in my opinion, a fundamental misconception of the act of 1866 to suppose that the execution of the guaranty notes created the ordinary relation of surety and obligee between the makers and the corporation. They were sureties for the corporation, not to it; and the notes, though payable to the corporation, were held, or if collected the proceeds were held, for the benefit of the policy holders and other creditors. The corporation, as to the notes, was a trustee for the benefit of others, and, even if there had been no express statutory inhibition, the makers of the notes, knowing the fiduciary capacity in which the corporation held them, would have been guilty of a fraud in withdrawing them, and could not thereby have avoided their liability to the beneficiaries.

Another distinction between these guarantors and ordinary sureties is that they were not gratuitous obligors. They were, with respect to the receipts and income of the corporation, far more favored than the ordinary stockholders who contributed the cash capital of a hundred thousand dollars. The stockholders could receive no dividends unless there were profits, but the makers of the guaranty notes, without paying in a dollar, were to have a "commission" of 5 per cent. per annum on the amount of their notes, and if they made any payments on their notes they were to have 12 per cent. on the amounts so paid. Section 10. As the amount of the guaranty fund was $250,000, the commissions paid to the note makers during the time the company was in business must have been $12,500 per annum, or one-eighth of the whole cash capital. It is scarcely a matter of surprise that the company became insolvent, and may be safely assumed that the note makers drew down their commissions as long as it continued to do business. Their liability, therefore, is a meritorious liability,—a liability arising out of a contract under which they were the principal gainers.

As to the right of the plaintiff to maintain the action, there can be no doubt upon that point if the assignee in insolvency could have maintained it. His vendor purchased the note at a sale made by the assignee in pursuance of an order of court, and whatever title and right of action the assignee had passed to the plaintiff. The assignee represented the interest of all creditors of the corporation. It was his right and his duty to collect these notes, or under the order of the court to sell them, and to apply the proceeds to the payment of the company's debts. His vendee stands in his shoes, and in enforcing the obligation is just as much a representative of the creditors as the assignee would have been if instead of selling the note he had sued upon it.

If the foregoing views are correct, the decision in this case is rested upon principles which will constitute a very inconvenient precedent in future controversies, and for that reason it ought to be reconsidered. It may be that upon some of the other grounds urged by counsel for appellant in their briefs a reversal of the judgment and order of the superior court would be necessary, but, as these matters have not been adverted to by the court, it would be idle for me to discuss them.

REESE et al. v. BALD MOUNTAIN CONSOL. GOLD-MIN. CO. et al. (Sac. 747.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 26, 1901.)

MASTER AND SERVANT — MINERS' LIENS — MECHANICS' LIENS—EMPLOYMENT BY AGENT —BURDEN OF PROOF—FINDINGS—EVIDENCE —WITNESSES—CROSS-EXAMINATION.

1. A finding that the person employing plaintiff in a mine was in possession of the mine under a contract with the owners, authorizing such person to take possession and make improvements and prosecute development work, does not show an employment by an agent of the owner, within the meaning of Code Civ. Proc. § 1183, giving a miner's lien for work done at the instance of the agent of the owner, and providing that every contractor, subcontractor, architect, builder, or other person having charge of any mining should be held to be the agent of the owner.

2. The pleadings, in an action to establish a miner's lien, were based on the theory that plaintiff was employed by the agent of the owner, and there was no claim, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1192, authorizing a lien against a landowner who knowingly permits building or improvements to be made without giving notice that he will not be responsible therefor. Held not to authorize a finding that the defendant had knowledge that plaintiff was performing such work.

3. A finding not embraced within the issues will not be considered on appeal.

4. Labor in a mine is not on a building or improvement on land, within the meaning of Code Civ. Proc. § 1192, providing that any building or improvement constructed on land with the knowledge of the owner shall be held to have been constructed at his instance, and will authorize a mechanic's lien thereon, unless he gives notice within three days that he will not be responsible therefor.

5. A miner who knows that his employer is not acting as agent of the mine owner is not entitled to a lien on the mine.

6. The burden of showing that his employer was the agent of the defendant mine owner is on a miner seeking to establish a lien, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1183, authorizing such liens for work done at the instance of an agent of the owner.

7. Where the defendant, in an action to establish a miner's lien, alleges that plaintiff knew that his employer was not the agent of the defendant owner, plaintiff can be cross-examined as to his knowledge of such fact.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Plumas county; Stanley A. Smith, Judge.

Action by William R. Reese and another against the Bald Mountain Consolidated Gold-Mining Company and another to establish a miner's lien. From a judgment in favor of the plaintiffs, the defendants appeal. Reversed.

N. L. Peter, for appellants. Goodwin & Webb, for respondents.

COOPER, C. This action was brought to recover an amount claimed as wages for labor performed in mines in the lands of appellant corporation, and to have the said amount declared to be a lien upon the mining lands described in the complaint. Findings were filed, and judgment ordered for plaintiffs. This appeal is from the judgment upon the judgment roll and a bill of exceptions. The complaint alleges that the labor performed was that of miners in and upon the mines of the corporation, and that the contracts for said labor were made with defendant Pugh. There is no dispute as to the facts that the labor was performed, that the contracts were made with Pugh, that the labor was that of mining in the lands described in the complaint, and that the corporation is the owner in fee of such mines. It is provided in section 1183, Code Civ. Proc., that "any person who performs labor in any mining claim or claims, has a lien upon the same, and the works owned and used by the owners for reducing the ores from such mining claim or claims, for the work or labor done, or materials furnished by each respectively, whether done or furnished at the instance of the owner of the building or other improvement, or his agent, and every contractor, subcontractor, architect, builder, or other person having charge of any mining, or of the construction, alteration, addition to, or repair, either in whole or in part, of any building or other improvement as aforesaid, shall be held to be the agent of the owner, for the purposes of this chapter." It was essential, under the provisions of the above-quoted section, for plaintiffs to allege and prove that the labor was performed at the instance of the agent of appellant, within the definitions therein as to who shall be held to be such agent.

Upon this theory the complaint alleges that during all said time defendant Pugh was the superintendent and managing agent of said corporation in and about its mines. The answer denied the allegation. There is no finding upon said issue. The only finding is the following: "That at said time defendant A. Pugh was in the possession of said premises described in the complaint under a contract theretofore entered into between said A. Pugh and the other defendant, the Bald Mountain Consolidated Gold-Mining Company, under which contract said A. Pugh was authorized and empowered to occupy and hold possession of said premises, and make extensive improvements, and prosecute development work and prospecting thereon and therein." This is not a finding that Pugh was the agent of appellant. Neither is it a finding that he was a contractor, subcontractor, architect, or builder, nor that he was a person having charge of any mining, or the construction, alteration, addition to, or repair of, any building or other improvement. It is simply a finding that Pugh was in possession of the premises under a contract made with appellant, and that the contract authorized Pugh to occupy and hold possession and to make improvement and prosecute development work and prospecting therein. The fact that the contract authorized Pugh to make improvements and to do certain work does not show that Pugh was in any manner the agent of appellant. The contract, for aught that appears in the finding, may have been a conveyance of a life estate to Pugh. It authorized Pugh to improve and develop the premises on his own account and for himself. The agent referred to in the section must be the agent of the owner of the building, mining, or improvement; and where the statute says that certain persons are "deemed to be the agent of the owner" it means the agent of the owner of the building, mining, or other improvement. The failure to find upon this material issue was error. Soto v. Irvine, 60 Cal. 436; Malone v. Bosch, 104 Cal. 681, 38 Pac. 516; Spect v. Spect, 88 Cal. 439, 26 Pac. 203, 13 L. R. A. 137, 22 Am. St. Rep. 314. The above objection is attempted to be obviated by the fact that the court elsewhere found "that at the time said contract between said A. Pugh and said David R. Reese was made, and during the times said work and labor was being performed thereunder, the said defendant the Bald Mountain Consolidated Gold-Mining Company, a corporation, had full notice and knowledge of the said contract, and of all work being done by the said plaintiff David R. Reese thereunder." This finding is entirely outside any issue made by the pleadings.

The complaint contains no allegation that any building or other improvement was constructed upon the lands of appellant with its knowledge. A finding outside the issues must be disregarded. That the finding is outside the issues is readily perceived. The complaint alleges a contract made with appellant through its agent Pugh. The finding quoted is applicable to a case in which there was no contract with the owner in any manner whatever, but in which the owner is held liable as a penalty for not giving notice that he would not be responsible. The statute relied upon to which it is claimed the above finding may be applied is section 1192, Code Civ. Proc., which provides: "Every building or other improvement mentioned in section one thousand one hundred and eighty-three of this Code, constructed upon any lands with the knowledge of the owner, * * * shall be held to have been constructed at the instance of such owner, * * * and the interest owned or claimed shall be subject to any lien filed in accordance with the provisions of this chapter, unless such owner * * * shall, within three days after he shall have obtained knowledge of the construction, alteration, or repair, * * * give notice that he will not be responsible for the same. * * *" The section mentions every "building" or "improvement" constructed "upon" lands with the knowledge of the owner, and it is expressly stated to apply if notice is not given within three days after the owner shall have obtained knowledge of the "construction, alteration, or repair" by posting a notice in some conspicuous place upon the "land, building, or improvement." The section cannot be held applicable to a claim by a miner for labor in a mine. Labor in a mine is not a building or improvement constructed upon lands. The finding is that appellant had full notice of the contract and of all work being done thereunder. Even if the complaint were sufficient, the finding does not show that any building or improvement was constructed upon the lands of appellant with its knowledge. We think the views herein expressed are supported by the cases of Williams v. Association, 66 Cal. 200, 5 Pac. 85, and Jurgenson v. Diller, 114 Cal. 492, 46 Pac. 611. In the latter case it was held that labor performed in "drifting in a tunnel" is not the construction, alteration, or repair of a building or other improvement, under section 1192, Code Civ. Proc. That the doctrine of notice does not apply when the work consists of a subtractive process,—the removal of the very corpus of the property. It was said: "As well require one who sees a trespasser cutting his timber to post notice of his nonliability under penalty of having his land subjected to

3. Where, in an action to foreclose a mortgage, the judgment entered did not comply with the decision, in that it did not direct the sale of stock, the court, without notice, may direct an amended judgment to be entered conforming to the decision.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by the Homeseekers' Loan Association against Annie Gleeson and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

M. C. Hassett (Walter J. Thompson, of counsel), for appellants. Morrison, Foerster & Cope, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is an appeal by defendants from a judgment in favor of plaintiff for the foreclosure of a mortgage. On July 12, 1890, the defendants executed the mortgage in question to the plaintiff to secure their promissory note of even date to plaintiff for $3,600, due in six months, with stated interest, the whole principal and interest to become due, at plaintiff's option, upon default of payment of any interest, and also to secure certain monthly installments on capital stock hereinafter mentioned. At the same time plaintiff issued to defendants certificates for 18 shares of plaintiff's capital stock, which were of the par value of $200 per share, and defendants promised in said mortgage to pay plaintiff each month $1 per share until the shares were fully paid. Simultaneously with the execution of the note and mortgage, defendants pledged and delivered to plaintiff these 18 shares of stock. Defendants did not pay any of the principal of the note, nor any of the interest after June, 1894, and they did not pay any of the monthly installments on the stock after the second Monday of June, 1894. The judgment is for the amount of the principal of the note and the unpaid interest thereon, and for the unpaid installments on the stock.

The main contentions of appellants on the merits are that the amount paid by them as installments on the stock ($792) should have been credited on the mortgage debt, and that the court should not have given judgment for unpaid installments on the stock. The rights of one who occupies the dual relation of stockholder and borrower to a modern building and loan association are somewhat elaborately discussed in briefs, and a number of authorities cited. But the cases from other states relied on by appellants are mostly based on peculiar statutory provisions. We do not deem it necessary to follow the discussions of counsel on these points, because since the briefs were filed this court in bank, in McNamara v. Loan Ass'n, 63 Pac. 670, elaborately reviewed the subject, and arrived at conclusions adverse to these contentions of appellants. We can see no material distinction between the case at bar and the Mc-

Namara Case, where the court said, "The mortgagee is within its rights in asking a foreclosure of the mortgage and a decree for the sale of the shares, and presumably they will bring their cash value, and plaintiff will have his credit therefor."

Appellants contend that finding No. 1, which is as follows: "Paragraphs 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, and 11 of plaintiff's amended complaint are true,"—is insufficient for any purpose as a finding; but the contention is not maintainable. Johnson v. Klein, 70 Cal. 186, 11 Pac. 606; Williams v. Hall, 79 Cal. 606, 21 Pac. 965. There is no material distinction between saying that a certain paragraph of a complaint is true, and saying that the averments of the paragraph are true. We cannot see the conflict contended for by appellants between that part of finding 1 which finds that paragraph 8 of the complaint is true, and the subsequent findings 6 and 15. In paragraph 8 it is averred that no part of the principal of the note had been paid; by finding 6 it is found that appellants had paid $792 on the monthly installments upon the stock, and $900.90 on the interest on the note; and in finding 15 it is found that these payments were made pursuant to covenants and agreements contained in the note and in the mortgage, which is true. These findings, therefore, present no discrepancy whatever.

It appears that after the making and filing of the findings and decision a judgment was entered which did not comply with the decision, in this: that it did not direct a sale of the stock, and that afterwards the court, without notice to appellants, directed that an amended judgment be entered decreeing such sale in accordance with the decision, which amended judgment was entered. Appellants contend that the entry of the amended judgment was erroneous and without jurisdiction, but the contention cannot be maintained. This action of the court merely made the judgment conform to its decision, which a court has always the power to do.

There are no other points made which call for special notice. The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

computed the interest. After execution of the deed, defendants continued in possession of the premises, paying no rent or leasing the premises, and continuing to make improvements. Held, that the deed was a mortgage.

Action by Dolores N. De Carrion against Ygnacio De Aguayo and another. From a judgment in favor of defendants, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

S. O. Houghton, for appellant. John E. Daly, for respondents.

COOPER, C. Judgment was entered in the court below for defendants. Plaintiff made a motion for a new trial, which was denied. This appeal is from the judgment and order denying the motion.

The complaint is for the recovery of the possession of the lands described therein, and contains the usual allegations in ejectment. The answer, in addition to a denial of the allegations of the complaint, alleges affirmatively that defendants are, and were at all the times therein named, the owners and seised in fee of said lands; that on the 15th day of June, 1892, they executed and delivered to one Saturnino Carrion, since deceased, and who was the husband and grantor of plaintiff, what purported to be a grant, bargain, and sale deed of the premises, which deed was recorded; that said deed, although absolute in form, was intended to be, and was in fact, a mortgage to secure the payment of $1,000 to plaintiff's grantor, with legal interest thereon. It was admitted that, unless the said deed was in fact made as a mortgage, the plaintiff would be entitled to judgment. This was the only issue in the case. The court found: "That the said instrument, though in the form of a deed absolute, was executed and delivered to said Saturnino Carrion as, and was intended to be, a mortgage to secure the payment of one thousand dollars, with interest at the rate of seven per cent. per annum from the 17th day of May, 1892." It is claimed that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the above finding, and this is the sole question to be here determined. We have carefully examined the evidence, and, in our opinion, it amply supports the finding. Without giving the evidence in detail, it is sufficient to state that there is evidence of the following facts and circumstances: On the 17th of May, 1892, there were two mortgages existing against the property of defendants described in the complaint; one in favor of one Hilsey for $700, and one in favor of one Frankel for about $180. That on said day the plaintiff's grantor applied to one Jess for a loan of $1,000, stating that defendants owned some property on which there were mortgages, and that, as the mortgagees desired their money, defendants wanted to pay off the two mortgages, and deed him the property. Jess accordingly loaned the plaintiff's grantor $1,000 upon his own promissory note. Defendants appeared at the bank of which Jess was cashier, and the two mortgages were taken up, and assignments of them made to plaintiff's grantor. The balance of the $1,000, after paying the two mortgages, was left in the bank, and afterwards paid out either to Frankel or to plaintiff's grantor. Defendants did not receive any of it. The mortgages so assigned to plaintiff's grantor have never been satisfied of record, nor have the notes been delivered up or canceled. The money was borrowed from plaintiff's grantor. That the deed was intended as a mortgage. That, after the deed was made, the grantor of plaintiff had one Seaver compute the interest on the $1,000 from the 17th of May, 1892, to the 17th day of November, 1896, showing the amount then due to be $1,551.13, which computation was made upon a piece of paper, and handed to one of the defendants. Defendants paid to plaintiff's grantor one dollar, which he told them he had paid Seaver to figure up the interest for him. After the deed was made, defendants continued in possession of the premises as before. They never paid any rent nor leased the premises. They continued to make small improvements as before. Nothing appears as to any agreement of sale having been made or any price being named for the deed. Plaintiff's grantor died February 16, 1897. It does not appear that plaintiff took any greater title than that of her grantor at the time of the conveyance. It is not claimed that she is an innocent purchaser without notice. These facts and circumstances, if true, are sufficient to support the finding.

There was testimony on the part of the plaintiff tending to contradict some of the matters above set forth; but, in case of a substantial conflict in the evidence, the finding of the court below is conclusive here. Not only this, but we think the finding is supported by the great preponderance of the evidence. If Saturnino Carrion took the deed from defendants in June, 1892, as an absolute conveyance of the property, it is strange that nothing was said in the negotiations as to the price thereof. It is a circumstance of much significance that the defendants remained in possession of the property as their own continuously after the deed was made until the death of Carrion. If Carrion had in fact purchased the property, it would seem that in the ordinary course of business he would have entered into possession of it, or, if he allowed defendants to remain in possession, it would have been under a lease of some kind. If he purchased the property, why did he take an assignment of the two mortgages which he paid out of the $1,000? The fact—which is conceded—that in November, 1896, the grantor of plaintiff had the interest computed on the $1,000, and gave the computation to defendants, asking them for the dollar paid to Seaver for making the computation, is wholly inconsistent with the idea that the property was his. It is entirely consistent with the claim of defendants that the deed was made as security only. The judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; CHIPMAN, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order are affirmed.

ROSENBERG v. PIMENTAL et ux.
(Sac. 652.)¹

PLEADING—VARIANCE—IDENTITY OF JUDGMENT—SUFFICIENCY.

In a suit to quiet title, where plaintiff alleged title in himself under an execution sale of the land in controversy in an action wherein plaintiff obtained judgment against defendant, the fact that there was a variance in the complaint in such action and the complaint in the present suit as to the date when the action accrued was immaterial, the date of suit, judgment, and the amount thereof being shown in the judgment roll, that being sufficient to show the identity of the judgment, and that it was the one referred to in the complaint.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Mono county; W. H. Virden, Judge.

Action by Jacob Rosenberg, Mary Rosenberg, executrix, substituted plaintiff, against J. G. Pimental and wife. From a judgment for defendants on an order granting a motion for a nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Wm. O. Parker and Henley & Costello, for appellant. Reddy, Campbell & Metson, for respondents.

GRAY, C. In this case the original plaintiff, Jacob Rosenberg, having died pending the appeal, Mary Rosenberg, executrix of his last will, was duly substituted as plaintiff and appellant herein. The action is brought to quiet title and compel a conveyance to plaintiff from defendants of certain lands situated in Mono county. The defendants had judgment on a nonsuit granted on their motion on the trial of the case. The plaintiff appeals from the judgment and from an order denying him a new trial.

The plaintiff, in his complaint, alleged title in himself under an execution sale of the land in controversy had in an action wherein he obtained judgment against the defendant Pimental for $492.51. In his complaint he alleges that on the 2d day of October, 1894, the defendant Pimental was indebted to him in a certain sum, and then goes on to allege that suit was commenced on this indebtedness, etc. The date of the commencement of the said action, the date and amount of the judgment, the date of the execution and sale, and the date of the sheriff's deed made in pursuance of said sale are all set out in the complaint. At the trial, plaintiff, as one step in the proof of his title, offered a certified copy of the judgment roll in the action under which he claimed to have been the purchaser at the execution sale. In the complaint contained in the offered judgment roll it was alleged that "on the 30th day of October, 1894," plaintiff loaned to the defendant, at his request, $469.85, and it appeared that in the judgment interest was added to that sum, and judgment was rendered for the amount alleged in the complaint in this action. The date of the commencement of the action, the date as well as the amount of the judgment as appeared from the judgment roll, all corresponded with the allegations of the complaint herein. To this judgment roll the defendants objected on the ground that it appeared on its face that the action was brought for money loaned on October 30, 1894, and therefore the judgment roll is contradictory of the allegation in the complaint in this action to the effect that "the indebtedness was on the 2d day of October, 1894," and that the evidence offered is at variance with the allegations of the complaint. In sustaining this objection, we think, the court erred. The allegation of the date of the accruing of the indebtedness was not essential or material in either this or the former suit. The variance as to date in the respect complained of was, therefore, entirely immaterial. The date of the suit and of the judgment, and the amount of the latter as shown in the offered judgment roll, were sufficient to show the identity of the judgment, and that it was the same judgment referred to in the complaint, and upon which the execution sale was made under which plaintiff claimed title. The question was one of identity as to the judgment pleaded, and the case has little to do with the thing adjudicated. Therefore the doctrine of res adjudicata cuts little figure in the solution of the questions involved. The allegation in the complaint herein as to the date of the indebtedness should have been disregarded as a thing immaterial and unnecessary in the pleading. This erroneous ruling of the court made it impossible for the plaintiff to establish his case, and hence was prejudicial, and on account of it the judgment and order appealed from should be reversed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; CHIPMAN, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are reversed.

A. F. SHARPLEIGH HARDWARE CO. v.
KNIPPENBERG et al. (L. A. 936.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 3, 1901.)

PLEADINGS—COMPLAINT—DEMURRER—IN-DEFINITENESS.

1. A complaint on a bond to secure the faithful performance of a contract of plaintiff's agent to account, alleging that the agent received for property sold $4,090 or thereabouts, that his expenses and amount due him for services were $2,195, and that there remained a balance of $1,895 of said $4,090 in his hands, the property of plaintiff, is not demurrable as indefinite as to the amount received by the agent, since it shows the receipt of at least $4,090, of which plaintiff claimed $1,895, and it was immaterial whether the agent received more.

2. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 431, providing that a demurrer may be disregarded unless it distinctly specifies the grounds of objection to the complaint, a demurrer on the ground that it cannot be ascertained from the complaint what the contract is on which the action is based is too indefinite, and should not be sustained.

3. Where a complaint on a bond to secure the faithful performance of a contract of plaintiff's agent to account alleges the aggregate of expenses paid by the agent and his commissions, it is not demurrable because the expenses and commissions are not stated separately, especially as such matters are specially within the knowledge of defendants.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; M. T. Allen, Judge.

Action by the A. F. Sharpleigh Hardware Company against Will Knippenberg and another. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Mulford & Pollard, for appellant. W. T. Craig, for respondents.

HAYNES, C. The action is upon an alleged contract between the plaintiff and defendant Knippenberg, and a bond executed by both defendants to the plaintiff to secure the performance of said contract by Knippenberg. The defendants demurred severally for want of facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and for uncertainty and ambiguity. The demurrer being sustained, the plaintiff declined to further amend its complaint.

It is alleged that in June, 1895, the plaintiff and Knippenberg entered into an agreement whereby the plaintiff appointed Knippenberg its agent at the city of Los Angeles to represent the plaintiff for the purpose of handling its goods which it might from time to time ship to him, "to be sold by the said Knippenberg as the agent of the plaintiff upon such terms and conditions as might from time to time be agreed upon by the said plaintiff and the said Knippenberg"; that Knippenberg should keep a strict account, and make reports "as often as required by the plaintiff of all goods received, and all sales, leases, rentals made, and all moneys which might be received" therefrom, and of all moneys expended in the conduct of the business, and would pay over all moneys properly belonging to the plaintiff. A copy of a bond executed by Knippenberg, as principal, and defendant Kregelo, as surety, is attached to the complaint and made part thereof, which bond is conditioned for the faithful performance by Knippenberg of his said contract, and the payment of all moneys that may become due and payable to the plaintiff. The complaint further alleges: That after the execution and delivery of said bond the plaintiff delivered to Knippenberg, as such agent of the plaintiff, "goods, consisting of bicycles and bicycle sundries, belonging to the plaintiff, aggregating in value the sum of $4,090.37, and the said Will Knippenberg has come into possession of such goods to the value as aforesaid as such agent as aforesaid; and plaintiff is informed and believes, and upon such information and belief avers, that the said Will Knippenberg, while acting as such agent of plaintiff, sold and disposed of all of said goods which were delivered by the plaintiff to said Will Knippenberg under the terms of said contract. And the said Will Knippenberg has collected and received upon the sale of said goods the sum of $4,090.37, or thereabouts, out of which sum the said Will Knippenberg has paid all the expenses connected with the sale of said goods, and the amount due and payable to him, the said Will Knippenberg, for his said services as said agent aforesaid, making in the aggregate the sum of $2,195.02. That there remains a balance of $1,895.35 due of said sum of $4,090.37 in the hands of said Will Knippenberg, the property of plaintiff, which the said Will Knippenberg wrongfully retains and refuses to pay over to the plaintiff; and the said Will Knippenberg is justly and truly indebted to the plaintiff in the said sum of $1,895.35, which said sum the said Will Knippenberg has neglected and refused to pay to the plaintiff, though often requested by the plaintiff to pay the same, and no part thereof has been paid to the plaintiff, or to any one for the plaintiff."

1. The general demurrer is not well taken, and is not insisted upon.

2. It is alleged that the complaint is uncertain: (a) "That it cannot be ascertained therefrom how much money, if any, the said plaintiff claims said defendant Knippenberg collected or received for the plaintiff." It is alleged that Knippenberg "had collected and received upon the sale of said goods the sum of $4,090.37 or thereabouts." But it is further alleged that Knippenberg had paid all the expenses connected with the sale, and the amount due him for his services, amounting in the aggregate to $2,195.02, and "that there remains a balance of $1,895.35 due of said sum of $4,090.35 in the hands of said Knippenberg, the property of the plaintiff," which he retains and refuses to pay. There is no uncertainty in the amount of the agent's expenses and compensation, nor in the amount alleged to be due to the plaintiff, and these amounts show that the receipts were not less than $4,090.37. That the receipts may have been more is immaterial. But all these matters are within the personal knowledge of the agent, and he is not likely to be prejudiced by any uncertainty or ambiguity as to the amount he received from the sale of the goods, so long as he is definitely informed of the amount sought to be recovered. These remarks cover specification "b," which is that it cannot be ascertained from the complaint how much is due plaintiff. (c) "That it cannot be ascertained therefrom what the contract was between plaintiff and defendant Knippenberg upon which said plaintiff's action is based." This specification is quite as uncertain as the demurrer supposes the complaint to be. Section 431 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides: "The demurrer must distinctly specify the grounds upon which any of the objections to the complaint are taken. Unless it do so, it may be disregarded." In the absence of a statutory provision permitting a demurrer upon the ground of uncertainty or ambiguity, such defects were reached only by motion to make the pleading more definite and certain in particulars which were specified in the motion. The object of the motion was to compel the amendment of a pleading, and for that purpose the particular defect was required to be pointed out. Pom. Code Rem. § 548 et seq., and notes. A contract whereby Knippenberg was constituted the agent of plaintiff is alleged, and, if this allegation was in any respect uncertain or ambiguous, defendants should have pointed out the particulars in which it was uncertain or ambiguous. It is true, the complaint does not allege what the agent's commissions were to be, nor what expenses he should be allowed for; but it is alleged that his expenses and services aggregated $2,195.02, and that there remained a specified balance in his hands belonging to the plaintiff. In Blanc v. Klumpke, 29 Cal. 156, it was held that a demurrer to a complaint for ambiguity or uncertainty should point out specially in what the ambiguity or uncertainty consisted, or it would be disregarded. See, also, Yolo Co. v. City of Sacramento, 36 Cal. 193; Kreling v. Kreling, 118 Cal. 413, 420, 50 Pac. 549. We think this demurrer was insufficient, and should not have been sustained. (d) It is specified that it cannot be ascertained from the complaint whether the agent is given credit for all sums expended for plaintiff under the contract. It is expressly alleged that Knippenberg has paid all the expenses connected with the sale of the goods out of the moneys received from the sale of them, and that there is a balance in his hands belonging to the plaintiff. We think it is not material that the expenses of the agent and his compensation for his services are not separately stated. Besides, these are matters peculiarly within the knowledge of the defendants, or at least of Knippenberg. (e)

It is not specifically alleged in the complaint that there has been an accounting between the plaintiff and its agent, but the result of the transaction is stated specifically, showing the balance which the plaintiff alleges it is entitled to recover. It is said in respondents' brief that the bond, a copy of which is attached to the complaint, recites that a large amount of property formerly in the hands of others, had been turned over to Knippenberg prior to the execution of the bond, and it is urged that plaintiff has no right to segregate the expense connected with the goods last above mentioned from those involved in this action. For aught that appears, all former transactions have been adjusted and closed. If not, it will be time enough to consider this objection when another suit is brought to recover thereon. Conceding that the complaint is not a model of good pleading, and might be improved, we think the defendants will not be prejudiced by its defects, and that the demurrer should have been overruled. I advise that the judgment be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to overrule the demurrer.

We concur: SMITH, C.; COOPER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to overrule the demurrer.

WEST COAST SAFETY-FAUCET CO. v.
WULFF et al. (S. F. 2,125.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 3, 1901.)
CORPORATIONS—SALE OF STOCK ON EXECUTION—RIGHTS OF BONA FIDE PURCHASER AGAINST PLEDGEE—POSSESSION OF SHERIFF.

1. One who purchases at execution sale shares of a corporation standing on the books of the corporation in the name of the judgment debtor is entitled to have the certificate of such shares reissued to him as such purchaser, if, at the time of the purchase, he acts in good faith, and without notice that the outstanding certificate has been assigned or pledged to some person other than the judgment debtor.

2. Code Civ. Proc. § 688, provides that shares of stock in a corporation may be levied on on execution in the same manner as on writs of attachment. Section 542, subd. 4, declares that shares of stock may be attached by leaving a copy of the writ, and a notice stating that defendant's stock, or interest therein, is attached in pursuance thereof, with the principal officer of the corporation. Held that, for the purposes of levy under execution and attachment, the debtor's interest in shares is treated as personal property not capable of manual delivery, and hence it was not necessary to the validity of an execution sale of corporate shares that they should be in the hands of the sheriff in order that they might be personally delivered to the purchaser.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Edward A. Belcher, Judge. Action by the West Coast Safety-Faucet Company against N. H. Wulff and Edward H. Lake. From a judgment in favor of defendant N. H. Wulff, defendant Edward H. Lake appeals. Reversed.

F. A. Berlin, for appellant. A. L. Black and Robert Ash, for respondents.

CHIPMAN, C. Plaintiff brought the action to compel defendants to answer, and to cause their respective rights to certain shares of plaintiff company to be determined. The cause was tried on an agreed statement of facts, and defendant Wulff was adjudged to be "the holder and pledgee of certificate No. 61 for 100 shares of the capital stock of the West Coast Safety-Faucet Company, and entitled to have the same transferred on the books of said corporation to his name." Defendant Lake appeals from the judgment and from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

The essential facts were: That one Straut owned the shares in 1896, and the certificate stood in his name then and ever since on the books of the corporation. In October, 1896, he indorsed the certificate to defendant Wulff as collateral security, into whose possession it passed and has since remained. In 1897 defendant Lake brought an action against Straut in the justice's court of the city and county of San Francisco, and caused a writ of attachment to issue therein directed to the sheriff, who duly served the same upon the secretary of said corporation. Lake obtained judgment in January, 1898, and caused execution to issue thereon, and it was duly levied by leaving with the secretary of the corporation a copy of the writ and a notice that the said stock was levied upon in pursuance of the writ. The sheriff duly sold the shares at public auction, pursuant to execution, in March, 1898, and Lake became the purchaser, and he thereupon made demand for a transfer of the shares and issuance of a certificate therefor to him. Wulff had not, up to this time, demanded any reissue of the stock to him, nor had he notified the corporation that he held the certificate as pledgee or otherwise. Lake first knew of the claim of Wulff, and that he held the certificate as pledgee, in January, 1899. It is settled law in this state that one who purchases at execution sale shares of a corporation standing on the books of the corporation in the name of the judgment debtor is entitled to have the certificate of such shares reissued to him, as such purchaser, if at the time of the purchase he acts in good faith, and without notice that the outstanding certificate has been assigned or pledged to some person other than the judgment debtor. In order that an assignee or pledgee of a certificate may protect his rights as against a purchaser at execution sale, he must cause a reissue to him of a certificate, or he must serve notice on the corporation that he holds the certificate as such assignee or pledgee. The decisions of this court on the question will be found in the following cases: Weston v. Mining Co., 5 Cal. 186, 63 Am. Dec. 117; also, second appeal, 6 Cal. 425; Strout v. Mining Co., 9 Cal. 78; Naglee v. Wharf Co., 20 Cal. 530; People v. Elmore, 35 Cal. 653; Parrott v. Byers, 40 Cal. 614; Winter v. Mining Co., 53 Cal. 428; Bank v. Wilson, 58 Cal. 600; Spreckels v. Bank, 113 Cal. 272, 45 Pac. 329, 33 L. R. A. 459, 54 Am. St. Rep. 348. The last of these cases points out what must be done by the pledgee where it is desirable to leave the stock standing in the name of the owner.

2. Respondent Wulff claims that in the suit of Lake against Straut in the justice's court the plaintiff could, under section 542, subd. 4, Code Civ. Proc., attach the interest of defendant, but that after judgment the plaintiff should have proceeded under sections 545, 905, Code Civ. Proc. The first of these sections relates to the citation of the defendant and any person having in his possession personal property belonging to the defendant, for the purpose of examining them respecting such property. Section 905 makes applicable to justices' courts sections 714-721, Code Civ. Proc., inclusive, which latter relate to proceedings supplementary to the execution. Respondent's contention cannot be sustained. Section 688, Code Civ. Proc., expressly provides that shares in any corporation may be attached on execution in like manner as upon writs of attachments. It was not necessary to the sale of Straut's interest in the shares that they should be in the hands of the sheriff, to be personally delivered to the purchaser. The writ of execution is served as is the writ of attachment, which latter is served as directed by subdivision 4, § 542, Code Civ. Proc. This section and section 688 appear to treat the interest of the debtor in shares of corporations as personal property not capable of manual delivery. When the execution is served, the sale proceeds without manual possession of the certificate by the sheriff. He does not require such possession for the levy as in the case of personal property under subdivision 3 of section 542, nor is it necessary that he deliver the certificate to the purchaser at execution sale. The certificate might at the time be in the hands of the owner, but the levy and sale would entitle the purchaser to have a certificate issue to him, and for that purpose the court would, upon appropriate proceedings, compel the surrender of the original certificate, in order that it might be reissued to the purchaser. So, also, if it turned out that the certificate was in the hands of a pledgee, of which fact the purchaser in good faith had no notice, the pledgee could be compelled to surrender the certificate that it might reissue to the purchaser. In some of the cases cited supra the procedure was the same as in the present case, and sale was made without supplementary proceedings. It was so in the Weston Case, first above cited; also in Naglee v. Wharf Co. and in People v. Elmore, and also, we think, in Bank v. Wilson. Of the regularity of the procedure we have no doubt. As the case is here on an agreed statement of facts, there is no necessity for a new trial. The judgment and order should be reversed, with directions to enter judgment in favor of defendant Edward H. Lake.

We concur: COOPER, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order are reversed, with directions to enter judgment in favor of defendant Edward H. Lake.

MOORE v. RUSSELL. (L. A. 1,033.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 3, 1901.)

MORTGAGES—NOTE—DESCRIPTION—IDENTITY—DECEASED MORTGAGOR—CLAIM—PRESENTATION—TIME—PRIOR JUDGMENT—BAR—JUDGMENT AGAINST ADMINISTRATOR—MODIFICATION.

1. A note for $800, and a mortgage to secure it, were executed at the same time, the mortgage reciting that it was given as security for the payment of $800, with interest, according to the terms of a certain promissory note, and accurately described the note, except that the word "administrator" was inserted after the name of the payee, and that the name of the mortgagor's wife was omitted from the end of the copy. Held, that the description of the note was sufficient to establish its identity, and hence the mortgage was valid as a security thereof.

2. Code Civ. Proc. § 1497, provides that, in presenting a mortgage which has been recorded to an administrator for allowance, it shall be sufficient to describe it by referring to the date, volume, and page of its record. Held, that a presentation which stated the date, volume, and page on which the mortgage was recorded, and that the mortgage was on realty situated in R. county, and was given to secure the note described in the presentation, was sufficient.

3. A former action which was dismissed without prejudice to the right of the plaintiff to bring a new action did not constitute a bar to a subsequent action on the same cause.

4. Code Civ. Proc. § 1498, provides that in case of a rejected claim the holder must bring suit within three months after rejection, or within two months from the time it becomes due, or the action will be barred. A mortgage provided that, if any interest should not be paid when due, the whole amount of principal and interest should become immediately due and payable at the option of the mortgagee, to be exercised within 90 days from the default. Within three months after an installment of interest became due, the mortgagee presented a claim to the mortgagor's administrator for the principal and interest to date; and within more than three months after the rejection of the claim, but within two months from the maturity of the note, the mortgagee brought an action to foreclose. Held, that the action was not barred, since the presentation of a claim for the whole amount of principal and interest did not constitute an election that the whole debt was then due.

5. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1504, providing that a judgment against an administrator must be that the administrator pay the amount ascertained to be due in due course of administration, a judgment against an administrator for a deficiency after a sale of the mortgaged premises must be modified by inserting that the amount shall be paid "in due course of administration."

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Riverside county; J. S. Noyes, Judge.

Action by H. P. Moore against Zadock H. Russell, as administrator of the estate of William Russell, deceased, and another. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant Russell appeals. Modified.

W. J. McIntyre and Charles R. Gray, for appellant. Purington & Adair, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. No defense is made on the real merits of the case. That is, it is not pretended that the mortgage was not given to secure a just debt. The attacks on the judgment are based on certain alleged irregularities and failures to comply with statutory provisions; and it may be said that these attacks seem to have been invited by a spirit of carelessness which accompanied most of respondent's acts in the premises, from and including the drafting of the mortgage to the entry of the judgment. We think, however, that none of appellant's positions are really tenable, except as to the form of a certain part of the judgment. On November 18, 1898, the note and mortgage in question were made and executed to plaintiff by William Russell, since deceased, and his wife, Ruth M. Russell. The principal of the note was $800, payable 17 months after date, within interest at 11 per cent. per annum, payable annually. There was a provision in the note that, if any interest should not be paid when due, "the whole amount of principal and interest shall thereafter be due and payable at the option of the holder of said note, to be exercised at any time within ninety days after any such default." William Russell died on the 4th day of July, 1899, and the defendant, Zadock, became his administrator on August 14, 1899. The first interest became due on November 18, 1899, and was not paid, and no principal or interest had been paid when the action was commenced. On January 18, 1900, plaintiff presented his claim on the note and mortgage to the administrator, who rejected the same. The action was commenced on June 12, 1900, —within two months after the note, on its face, matured, but not within three months after the presentation of the claim.

1. The note and mortgage were made at the same time. It is declared on the face of the mortgage that it is given "as security for the payment to said mortgagee of the sum of eight hundred dollars in gold coin of the United States, with interest thereon, according to the terms of a certain promissory note in words and figures following, to wit." Then follows what is an exact copy of the note, except in these two particulars: (1) The word "administrator" is inserted after the name of the payee, Moore; and (2) at the end of the copy the name of Ruth M. Russell is omitted. Appellant contends that these two mistakes in the copy are fatal to the validity of the mortgage as a security for the note sued on, but the point is not maintainable. He speaks in his briefs of the "first" and the "second" note, but there is nothing in the record to warrant a pretense that there were two notes. The question here is as to the identity of the debt and note secured, and it is quite apparent, notwithstanding the two slight mistakes in the copy, that the debt of $800 and the note sued on are the debt and the note referred to in the mortgage.

2. Appellant contends that there was no valid presentation of the mortgage to the administrator, because, as he says, the respondent in the presentation did not "describe" the mortgage. This contention is based on section 1497 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that, in the case of a mortgage or of a lien which has been recorded, "it shall be sufficient to describe the mortgage, or lien, and refer to the date, volume and page of its record." In the case at bar the mortgage was recorded, and the presentation referred to date, volume, and page of its record; but appellant contends that it was not good, because the mortgage was not otherwise described. The presentation, however, shows that the mortgage was on real property situated in Riverside county, Cal., and was given to secure a note, a copy of which is contained in the presentation. This was a sufficient compliance with the section of the Code, even if anything more is required than a reference to the recordation. This contention, therefore, cannot be maintained.

3. It is contended that this action was barred by the judgment in a previous action which was brought by plaintiff against the defendants on the note and mortgage sued on in this present action; but all that appears on this subject is that on motion of the plaintiff therein, and with the consent of one of the defendants therein, Ruth M. Russell, the action was by the judgment of the court dismissed "without prejudice to the right of the plaintiff to bring a new action on the same cause of action." Nothing else appearing, there can be no valid contention that the dismissal of the former action was a bar to the present one.

4. The most plausible contention of appellant is that the action was barred by section 1498 of the Code of Civil Procedure, because it was not brought within three months after the presentation of the claim, but this contention cannot be maintained. That section provides that in the case of a rejected claim the holder must bring suit "within three months after the date of its rejection, if it be then due, or within two months after it becomes due, otherwise the claim shall be forever barred." Appellant contends that the respondent's presentation of the claim on January 18, 1900, within three months after the first annual interest had become due and remained unpaid, was a final and conclusive exercise of his option, under the terms of the note, to consider the whole amount of the principal and interest due, and that therefore he should have brought his suit within three months thereafter. In the first place, we do not think that the presentation of the claim can be considered as the exercise of the option in question. It certainly was not an express declaration to that effect. It was merely a presentation of the facts constituting his claim. The language of the claim was this: "To amount due at this date on a certain promissory note, dated November 18, 1898, made by said William Russell and Ruth M. Russell to H. B. Moore, payable seventeen months after date, with interest at the rate of eleven per cent. per annum, $904.28,"—followed by a copy of the note. The words "amount due at this date" do not necessarily mean more than that the principal of the note was so much, and the interest so much, and that none of it had been paid. It does not mean necessarily that the whole amount was then due, in the sense of being payable and suable, and that respondent intended to bring suit on that theory. But, even if that intent could be attributed to him from the fact of the presentation, he was not bound to pursue that intent. It is firmly established that an option of that character is a mere penalty put on the maker in favor of the holder of the note, which the latter may waive, and that even his express declaration of an election to exercise the option does not put it out of his power to waive it. Society v. Culver, 127 Cal 112, 59 Pac. 292; Mason v. Luce, 116 Cal. 232, 48 Pac. 72; Belloc v. Davis, 38 Cal. 242. In Society v. Culver, supra, where the note was like the one in the case at bar, the plaintiff had exercised his option in the most positive way, by bringing an action which he afterwards dismissed; and it was held that he could waive his option, even after having thus exercised it, and that, as against a subsequent action, the statute of limitations did not commence to run from the time of the said exercise of his option, but ran only from the maturity of the principal of the note. And so, in the case at bar, even if the presentation of the claim could be construed as an assertion of his right under the option, he was not compelled to continue to exercise it by bringing suit before the maturity of the note. His claim was not one "then due," within the meaning of section 1498; and, as this action was brought within two months after the maturity of the note, it was not barred by limitation.

The foregoing views dispose of all the points made by appellant which call for notice, except the contention that the part of the judgment which gives a recovery against the administrator for any deficiency after sale of the mortgaged premises should have provided that it be paid in due course of administration. This contention must be sustained. Section 1504, Code Civ. Proc., expressly provides that in case of a judgment against an executor or administrator "the judgment must be that the executor or administrator pay, in due course of administration, the amount ascertained to be due." The judgment in the case at bar must therefore be modified in this respect. The cause is remanded, with direction to the court below to modify the judgment by adding to the clause of the same immediately preceding the description of the mortgaged premises the words "to be paid in due course of administration," and as thus modified the judgment will stand affirmed.

Bill by Sherman Page against M. L. Vaughn and another. From an order granting defendants' motion to dissolve an injunction, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

C. C. Wright and Roger S. Page, for appellant. Alvin Fay and E. J. Emmons, for respondents.

GRAY, C. This is an appeal from an order dissolving an injunction. The plaintiff alleged in his verified complaint that he and the defendant M. L. Vaughn were each owners of an undivided one-half interest in a certain mining claim situated in Kern county; that investigation had demonstrated that the ores in said mine could not be extracted, shipped, and treated in any mill available for that purpose without great waste and loss, and for that reason on a certain day plaintiff notified defendants that he would not then engage in working said mine nor become a partner with them for that purpose, and at the same time objected to the removal of the ores in which he had an interest; that thereafter defendants, intending and conspiring to cheat and defraud plaintiff, and to deprive and exclude him from his said property, and intending to convert the same and the whole thereof to their own use, entered upon said property with a large force of men, and took exclusive possession of all parts thereof where work could be done or in which there is ore of any present value, and have ever since held such possession to the entire exclusion of plaintiff; that defendants while so in possession have committed, and are still committing, great waste and irreparable injury and damage to plaintiff's interest in said property by carrying away some of the ore, mixing it with worthless waste matter, throwing some of it over a steep incline, and covering it with a large mass of débris, where it cannot be recovered; that defendants have taken out large quantities of high-grade ore without regard to the method or safety of the shaft, and have done their work in a very unminner-like manner; that they have left the shaft untimbered and in a dangerous condition, and have committed numerous other acts specifically set out in the complaint, all of which as is alleged will tend to great waste and destruction of the property, and for all of which plaintiff has no adequate redress or remedy at law. Plaintiff further alleges that he has demanded possession of his interest in the said property, and defendants have refused, and still refuse, to permit him to enter into possession of said interest; that defendants and their employes still hold possession of said property, and are working the same as aforesaid to the exclusion of plaintiff, and INJUNCTION—DISSOLUTION—NOTICE.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 532, providing that, if an injunction be granted without notice, the defendant may apply, upon reasonable no-threaten to continue said work, and to commit further waste and irreparable injury to the said property. Plaintiff demands judgment for the possession of his interest in said property, for damages, and that during the pendency of the action the defendants be restrained by order of the court from interfering in any way with plaintiff's interest in said property, and from taking from said property or treating any of the ores thereof, and from disposing of any of the proceeds derived therefrom.

Upon this complaint, and without notice to the defendants, an injunction was granted by the court as prayed in said complaint. Thereafter the defendants filed a verified answer denying all the material allegations of the complaint, except that the plaintiff and M. L. Vaughn are the owners as co-tenants of the mine, which is admitted, and averring that at no time has plaintiff been denied access to the mine or possession of his interest therein. Upon the said complaint and answer the defendants, without notice to plaintiff, subsequently moved the court to dissolve the injunction, and it is from the order granting said motion that this appeal is taken.

Section 532, Code Civ. Proc., provides: "If an injunction be granted without notice, the defendant at any time before trial, may apply, upon reasonable notice, to the judge who granted the injunction, or to the court in which the action is brought, to dissolve or modify the same. The application may be made upon the complaint and the affidavit on which the injunction was granted, or upon affidavit on the part of the defendant with or without the answer. If the application be made upon affidavits on the part of the defendant, but not otherwise, the plaintiff may oppose the same by affidavits or other evidence in addition to those on which the injunction was granted." The evident purpose of the foregoing statute is to empower the court to dissolve its injunction only after notice to the plaintiff. The meaning of the statute is plain, and to put a construction on it that would dispense with the notice required by it is to construe one provision of the statute out of existence, and thereby thwart the purpose of the legislature in enacting it. If there were ever any doubt as to the language of the statute, its meaning must be taken as settled in the well-considered case of Hefflon v. Bowers, 72 Cal. 270, 13 Pac. 690. On the authority of the statute cited, as construed in that case, we think the court erred in dissolving the injunction without notice to plaintiff. It would add nothing to the law to here repeat the reasoning contained in the case cited. We advise that the order appealed from be reversed.

PEOPLE v. MADDEN et al. (McGAHEY, Intervener. Sac. 811.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 9, 1901.)
ACTION AGAINST COUNTY TREASURER—SATISFACTION—DISMISSAL.

Where a grand jury, which, under Pen. Code, § 929, is empowered to institute suits against county officers for moneys due the county, and the county board of supervisors ratify a suit brought by the district attorney against a county treasurer and his sureties to recover money fraudulently converted, the fact that such suit was instituted without authority of such board or any other official is not ground for dismissal thereof.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Modoc county; J. W. Harrington, Judge.

Action by the people of the state of California against John Madden and others. John McGahey intervened. From a judgment in favor of the latter, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Tirey L. Ford, Atty. Gen., and John E. Raker, Ex Dist. Atty., for the People. G. F. Harris, E. C. Bonner, and J. H. Stewart, for respondent.

SMITH, C. Appeal from a judgment dismissing the action. The suit was brought against the defendant Madden, county treasurer, and his sureties, to recover the sum of $34,825.35, money of the state and county fraudulently converted by him. Judgment was entered by stipulation against the sureties,—excepting one, as to whom the action was dismissed,—and, among others, against McGahey, now intervener. The defendant Madden had not been personally served, and the suit was continued as to him. The complaint in intervention of McGahey was filed January 6, 1899, about six months after the judgment against him and the other sureties. The action was dismissed on the ground that the suit was commenced by the district attorney without authority of the board of supervisors, or other board or official having power to authorize the suit, and without authority of law.

The last proposition is contested by the appellant's counsel, who claim that under the law the district attorney is authorized by virtue of his office to bring suits of this character. The ruling of the court to the contrary was based on the supposed authority of the decision in Ventura Co. v. Clay, 119 Cal. 213, 51 Pac. 189. But it is claimed by the attorney general and his associate counsel that the decision does not apply, and, if it be held otherwise, the court is requested to review the decision, and to re-examine the question as to the authority of the district attorney to bring suits of this kind. This request, coming, as it does, from the highest officer, representing the interests of the state in matters of litigation, we would willingly accede to; but, being of the opinion that the judgment must be reversed on other grounds, it will be unnecessary to consider either the rectitude or the application of the decision.

It appears without controversy that the action of the district attorney in bringing the suit was subsequently ratified and approved by the board of supervisors, and also by the grand jury, which, under section 929 of the Penal Code, had power to authorize the district attorney to institute and maintain the suit, and which in fact expressly directed him to continue the prosecution of this particular proceeding. The right of a defendant to move to dismiss a suit for lack of authority in the plaintiff's attorney to institute or maintain it is based on the ground that otherwise "he might be twice compelled to litigate the same cause of action" (Weeks, Attys. at Law, § 200); but this reason ceases, and with it the rule, if the act of the attorney is subsequently ratified by the plaintiff (Id. p. 439 [at top] §§ 203, 206; Ryan v. Doyle, 31 Iowa, 53). In this respect the case of client and attorney cannot be distinguished from other kinds of agency. We advise that the judgment be reversed, and the same remanded for further proceedings.

We concur: COOPER, C; CHIPMAN, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

AMERICAN TYPE FOUNDERS CO. et al. v. JUSTICE'S COURT OF SAUSALITO TP. et al. (S. F. 1,473.)¹

JUSTICES OF THE PEACE—TRIAL BY COURT—TIME FOR DECISION OF CASE.

Notwithstanding Code Civ. Proc. § 892, relative to justices' courts, provides that, when the trial is by the court, judgment must be entered at the close of the trial, a justice of the peace may take a case under advisement, and a judgment rendered some months after trial is valid.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Marin county; F. M. Angellotti, Judge.

Appeal from a judgment rendered on certiorari by the superior court of Marin county affirming the judgment of a justice of the peace. Affirmed.

Gordon & Young, for appellants. T. J. Crowley, for respondents.

TEMPLE, J. This appeal is from a judgment rendered upon certiorari, by the superior court of Marin county, affirming the judgment of a justice of the peace. A case was tried by the justice, and at the conclusion of the trial was taken under advisement, and the parties were allowed to file briefs. Some months afterwards the justice rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff in that action. The defendant subsequently commenced this proceeding. His contention is that a justice of the peace has no authority to take a case under advisement, and that a failure to decide a case at the conclusion of the trial works a discontinuance of the cause. This contention is based upon section 892, Code Civ. Proc., which reads: "When the trial is by the court, judgment must be entered at the close of the trial." The point was made and expressly decided in Heinlen v. Phillips, 88 Cal. 557, 26 Pac. 366. Counsel for the appellants contend that all that was said upon the subject in that case was obiter, because it was also urged and decided in that case that the justice of the peace had no power to set aside the judgment, it not being a judgment by default. It was held in Winter v. Fitzpatrick, 35 Cal. 269, that a justice could not vacate a judgment entered by him. This question was reconsidered in Weimmer v. Sutherland, 74 Cal. 341, 15 Pac. 849, and it was there said that the justice court could only vacate a judgment in cases where it was expressly authorized by statute, and it was authorized by section 859, Code Civ. Proc., to do so with reference to judgments entered upon a default, but could do so in no other cases. It seems that in Heinlen v. Phillips, notwithstanding these decisions, respondent to the writ again raised the point; but in this court, at least, his main reliance was upon the proposition that the judgment was void, and therefore could have been vacated at any time, and that, at all events, there being no valid judgment in the case, the order setting the case for trial was valid. The point was properly before the court, and necessarily decided. A decision of the other question did not dispose of the case; for, if the judgment which the justice had entered was void, it was properly struck out of the record. We have held that it is always in the power of the court to erase from its records a void judgment. The decision was one, therefore, which the court was bound to make. Without the decision upon this point, the judgment entered would have been an absolute non sequitur, provided it had also appeared that the contention was made that the judgment which the justice had set aside was a void judgment. The judgment is affirmed.

(Supreme Court of California. July 3, 1901.)²
APPEAL FROM PROBATE COURT—RETROACTIVE STATUTES—ENTRY OF JUDGMENT.

The amendment passed February 28, 1901, to the Code of Civil Procedure (section 963, subd. 3), authorizes an appeal from an order or judgment refusing to revoke the probate of a will. Section 1715, relative to probate orders, decrees, and judgments, declares that the appeal must be taken within 60 days after the order, decree, or judgment is entered. Held, that orders refusing to revoke the probate of a will, made before the passage of such amendment, were not appealable, though they were not entered until after its passage.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Appeals from orders refusing to revoke the probate of a will. Dismissed.

Smith & Pringle, for appellants. W. H. Barrows and Maguire & Gallagher, for respondents.

GAROUTTE, J. The appeals in this case are taken from orders or judgments refusing to revoke the probate of a will. A motion is now made by respondent to dismiss those appeals upon the ground that such orders or judgments are not appealable. Prior to 1901 the Code of Civil Procedure (subdivision 3, § 963) did not authorize an appeal from an order or judgment refusing to revoke the probate of a will. That question was squarely met and decided in Re Winslow's Estate, 128 Cal. 311, 60 Pac. 931. While appellants now attack the legal soundness of that decision, this court is satisfied with the conclusion there declared, and will not disturb it. The orders or judgments here appealed from were made during the latter days of January, 1901. Upon February 28, 1901, the aforesaid subdivision of section 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure was amended by giving an appeal from orders or judgments refusing to revoke the probate of a will, and it is upon the efficacy of this amendment to the statute that appellants largely rely for authority to take these appeals. In speaking as to probate orders, decrees, and judgments, section 1715 of the Code of Civil Procedure declares, "the appeal must be taken within sixty days after the order, decree or judgment is entered." In the present case the orders or judgments appealed from were not entered until after February 28, 1901, and, not being entered until after a right of appeal was given by the aforesaid amendment, it is claimed that an appeal exists in this case. By subdivision 3 of said section 963, as amended, appeals are given from judgments and orders revoking or refusing to revoke the probate of a will. There is no intimation, even, that this amendment was intended to apply to judgments and orders already made. There is nothing whatever to indicate that the legislature contemplated that this amendment should have a retroactive effect, even conceding the existence in that body of power to so declare. The general principle of law is unquestioned that in the absence of express direction no legislative act will be construed as having retroactive effect. Indeed, the general principle as to the retroactive effect of legislative enactments is not disputed by appellants, but it is insisted that as the time for appeal only begins to run from the date of the entry of a judgment or order, and the judgments or orders in this case not having been entered until after the amendment went into effect, therefore the law is given no retroactive effect by holding that a right of appeal is granted in the present case. The court does not agree with this contention. It is the judgment or order that the statute says may be appealed from. The entry of that judgment or order only serves the purpose of fixing the time from which the appeal may be taken. And section 1715, already quoted, only fixes the time when, and the number of days in which, a party may take his appeal. Certainly, as to probate orders, decrees, or judgments, their entry in the book prescribed by the statute is no part thereof. They are perfect and complete and have full force and effect before they are entered. The right of appeal is given from the order or judgment, and may be exercised when the order or judgment is entered. It is the duty of the proper officer to make the entry, and he can be compelled to perform his duty. The judgment is the result of judicial action. The entry of the judgment is purely a ministerial matter. Appellants rely upon cases similar to Melde v. Reynolds, 120 Cal. 235, 52 Pac. 491. But it is there only decided that, as the time for appeal begins to run from the entry of the judgment, therefore the statute in effect at the time the judgment is entered governs as to the time in which the appeal may be taken. For the foregoing reasons, the appeals are dismissed.

REYNIER v. ELTON et al. (L. A. 982.)

EJECTMENT—LOCATION OF SECTION CORNER—EVIDENCE.

A section corner located by the court had been recognized as the true corner for a great many years. The section lines in its vicinity had been traced by disinterested surveyors, and the corner fixed at the point established by the court. At this place a monument consisting of a pile of loose stones, in the center of which was a stone 18x12x8 inches, was found. The government field survey called for a stone at the corner in question, 20x12x8 inches, set 15 inches in the ground, and four witness trees marked as such, one being located in each of the four cornering sections; the courses and distances from the corner being given. One witness tree was found with surveyor's marks which corresponded with the description, allowing for the 20 years' growth, and also a stump, and traces of another, corresponding in character, description, and course with two of the witness trees described in the original field notes, with but slight discrepancies as to distance. No trace of the fourth witness tree was found, but the land had been cleared in the vicinity. Held, in ejectment, sufficient to justify the court in establishing the corner at the place in question.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; D. K. Trask, Judge.

Ejectment by Joseph Reynier against Charles Elton and another. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

E. O. Edgerton, Calvin Edgerton, and Ross T. Hickcox, for appellants. A. J. Utley, for respondent.

GRAY, C. This is an action in ejectment. Plaintiff obtained judgment in his favor, and defendants appeal from an order denying them a new trial. The plaintiff owned lands adjoining defendants' lands on the east, their common boundary being a line drawn through the section from north to south parallel with, and 80 rods west of, the east line of section 35 in township 4 N., range 15 W., S. B. M. The lands in controversy are located in Los Angeles county. The parties to the suit agree as to the location of the northeast corner of said section 35, and consequently they are in agreement as to the north end of their dividing line, but as to the south end of said line they are in disagreement to the extent of about 700 feet. It is claimed by the appellants that the southeast corner of said section is 714 feet west of the point claimed by plaintiff and found by the court to be said corner. The only point urged in support of the appeal is that the court fixed the corner in the wrong place; that by the evidence the corner is shown to be 714 feet west of the corner as found by the court.

We think the finding as to the location of the corner in question is supported by the evidence; and, without attempting to quote such evidence in full, we will give the principal features of it tending most strongly to support the action of the court below. In the first place, the corner found by the court had been recognized as the true corner for a great many years by those residing in the immediate neighborhood. It is undisputed that upward of nine years before the trial of this case appellants' predecessor in title recognized the corner found by the court as the true corner, and cut the timber up to a certain line established in accordance therewith. Next it is shown that the section lines in the vicinity of this corner have been traced out by two apparently disinterested surveyors, and, after a comparison of what they find on the ground with the field notes of the government surveys, they give it as their unqualified opinion that the true corner is at the point where the finding of the court fixes it. At this said point they find a monument consisting of a pile of loose stones, in the center of which is a stone 18x12x8 inches, as one witness testifies, and, as another says, 18x10x10 inches. Both of these witnesses agree, however, that this stone had one notch on one corner and five on another, and the evidence tends strongly to show that, so marked, it indicated the common corners of sections 35 and 36 in said township, and sections 1 and 2 in the township adjoining on the south. The field notes called for a stone at the corner in question 20x12x8 inches, set 15 inches in the ground, and four witness trees marked as such, one being located in each of the four cornering sections; the courses and distances from the corner being given. One witness tree was found with surveyor's marks indicating its character as a witness tree of the corner in dispute. This tree is in the course from the stone monument indicated by the field notes, and corresponds therewith in description, allowing for a difference of upward of 20 years' growth since the government survey. The distance of this tree from the corner is given in the notes of the government survey as 250 links, whereas its actual distance from the present location of the monument is 212 links. There is also a stump standing, and traces of another, in the ground, corresponding in character, description, and course from corner with two of the witness trees as described in the original field notes, and with but slight discrepancy as to distances from the corner. No trace of the fourth witness tree was found, but it is not inconsistent with the evidence that all trace of the fourth tree should have been removed by reason of the clearing and cultivation of the land. There seems to be no material controversy as to the location of the township line running between sections 35 and 36 on the north and sections 1 and 2 on the south. The contention of appellant is not that the corner is fixed by the court too far north or too far south, but that it is located by the finding of the court on the township line about 700 feet east of the government corner. The notes of the government survey call for the "top of low ridge, course north and south," 17 chains east of the corner in controversy. In the surveys made by the witnesses for respondent this ridge is located and referred to as strong evidence that the corner is where it is found to be by the court. Again, to the west of the corner as found, and on said township lines, these witnesses locate an old road in a wash about 10 chains from said corner, and at about 16 chains a small wash or creek, and on the western bank thereof an oak stump about 2 feet in diameter. All these objects as so located seem to be in practical agreement with the original government survey notes, and, while they are all consistent with the finding of the court as to the corner, they are each and all inconsistent with the location of the corner at or anywhere near the point contended for by appellant. Without attempting to state the evidence adduced by appellant to show that the corner was at the point claimed by him, we deem it sufficient to say that it was very strong; and, were it not for the testimony already stated, we think it would have been sufficient to establish the corner as so claimed by said appellant. It became necessary for the court to establish the corner somewhere, and, in the conflict of evidence, we think it made no mistake. This is not the case of a lost corner, but each party claims to have found the corner on the ground where it was originally located. Of course, in establishing a disputed corner those objects intended to witness the corner, and referred to in the notes of the original survey as being nearest to the corner, are, when satisfactorily established, stronger evidence than objects more remote can be; and, in this view of the matter, we regard the witness tree and the accompanying stumps claimed to have been found by respondent's witnesses, taken in connection with the other objects referred to, as of controlling importance. The court below was in a better position than this court can be placed in to determine whether the witness tree claimed was genuine or not. It appears that the surveyor's mark on the witness tree was covered by a subsequent growth of several inches in thickness, and was only discovered by cutting in and removing a chip or chips from the tree. The chip showing the surveyor's marks was submitted to the inspection of the trial court, and by this inspection the court was, no doubt, aided in determining the question of the genuineness of the alleged witness tree. This court has only a description of these things before it, and from this we cannot say that the court was wrong in its finding as to the corner; but, so far as we can see, the finding was correctly based on the preponderance of the evidence. The order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: SMITH, C.; COOPER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the order appealed from is affirmed.

2. Under Act March 3, 1897, providing that the expense of destroying insects found on fruit trees shall be a county charge, and that the board of supervisors shall pay the same, which sums shall be a lien on the property, and a notice of such lien shall be filed and recorded within 30 days after the right to the lien accrued, a lien filed within 30 days after the county supervisors paid a claim for destroying insects was valid, though the destruction occurred more than 30 days before, as the lien did not accrue until the county paid the claim.

3. Under Act March 3, 1897, establishing a lien on the land for the killing of insects on fruit trees, and providing that a "notice of such lien shall be filed and recorded," a notice signed by the members of the board of commissioners, describing the premises, the name of the owner, the amount claimed, and that it was for labor performed in killing insects on defendant's orchard, was sufficient.

4. The fact that a notice of a lien for killing insects on defendant's orchard claimed the benefit of the law relative to liens of mechanics and others on real property did not vitiate it, as such claim was mere surplusage.

5. In an action to foreclose a lien on realty for killing insects on the defendant's fruit trees, the fact that the petition contained a prayer for a personal judgment did not vitiate the petition, where a prayer that the amount may be declared a lien was also included.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Riverside county; J. S. Noyes, Judge.

Action by the county of Riverside against Arthur Butcher to foreclose a lien. From a judgment in favor of the defendant, the plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Lyman Evans, for appellant. P. Furguson, for respondent.

COOPER, C. The court below sustained a demurrer to plaintiff's complaint, without leave to amend, and this appeal is from the judgment for the purpose of reviewing the order sustaining the demurrer. The action was brought to foreclose a lien for money paid out by plaintiff for destroying certain scale and other insects found upon the trees in defendant's orchard, the lien being claimed under the provisions of the act of March 31, 1897, entitled "An act to promote the horticultural interests of the state by providing county boards of horticulture," etc. St. 1897, p. 244. It is said by appellant that the court below sustained the demurrer upon the ground that the act was unconstitutional, and, as the court denied the plaintiff leave to amend, it would seem that the contention is correct. The point may be regarded as settled by this court in County of Los Angeles v. Spencer, 126 Cal. 670, 59 Pac. 202, which case was decided a few days after the court made the order sustaining the demurrer in this case. We regard the reasoning of the court in that case as correct, and it is not necessary to further discuss the question. Other objections, however, are made to the complaint which we will notice in the order presented. It is claimed that the complaint fails to show that proper notice was served upon defendant requiring him to eradicate and destroy the scale prior to the expense incurred by plaintiff. The act provides, in speaking of the duties of the county board of horticultural commissioners, "they shall notify the owner or owners, or person or persons in charge or in possession of the said places, or orchards * * * that the same are infested with said insects, or other pests, * * * and they shall require such person or persons to eradicate or destroy the said insects * * * within a certain time to be specified. Said notices may be served upon the person or persons, or either of them, owning, or having charge, or having possession of such infested place * * * by any commissioner, or by any person deputed by the said commissioners for that purpose, or they may be served in the same manner as a summons in a civil action." The complaint alleges that the board "caused a notice to be served upon W. Miller, the person in charge of, and in possession of, said premises and orchard, for the defendant as his agent, requiring said defendant and agent to eradicate or destroy the said scale and insects so found upon said trees within ten days after the service of said notice." A copy of the notice is attached to the complaint as an exhibit, and the copy shows that the notice contained fully all matters required by the statute. We think the allegation as to service of notice sufficient. It shows that the person served was the person in charge of and in possession of the premises. This is all that the statute requires. The allegation shows that the notice was served substantially as required by the statute.

It is further contended that the complaint fails to show that the notice of lien was filed within 30 days after the right of lien accrued. This contention is based upon the fact that the complaint shows that the labor of destroying the scale was done in the latter part of September, 1898, and that the notice of lien was not filed until January, 1899. The statute provides that the expense shall be a county charge, and the board of supervisors shall allow and pay the same out of the general fund of the county. "Any and all sums so paid shall be and become a lien on the property. * * * A notice of such lien shall be filed and recorded in the office of the county recorder of the county in which the said property and premises are situated within thirty days after the right to the lien has accrued."

The right to the lien accrued to the county at the time it paid the amount. It then became a lien upon the property, and not till then. After the lien so accrued the county had 30 days in which to file its notice. It is alleged that the county paid the amount December 9, 1898, and that it filed the lien January 7, 1899. This was within 30 days after the right to the lien accrued.

The notice of lien was sufficient when signed and verified by the members of the board of commissioners, stating that the county claimed a lien for the amount of expense. It contains a description of the premises; the name of the owner; the amount claimed; that it is for labor bestowed and materials furnished in eradicating the insects upon the orchard of defendant. This was all that was required by the statute. In fact the statute is entirely silent as to the form, contents, or requisites of the notice. It simply says a "notice of such lien shall be filed and recorded." The complaint shows that the notice was filed and recorded. The fact that the notice stated that the plaintiff claimed the benefit of the law relative to liens of mechanics and others upon real property did not vitiate it. This part of the notice may be regarded as surplusage. The same may be said of the prayer for a personal judgment. The prayer is no part of the complaint, and, in addition to the prayer for personal judgment, it asks that the amount may be declared a lien, and that the premises be sold to satisfy such lien. We recommend that the judgment be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the lower court to overrule the demurrer, and allow defendant a reasonable time to answer.

We concur: CHIPMAN, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the lower court to overrule the demurrer, and allow defendant a reasonable time to answer.

PEOPLE v. GORDON. (Cr. 737.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 6, 1901.)

EMBEZZLEMENT—BAILEE—INFORMATION—SUFFICIENCY—CONVICTION—EVI-DENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. In a prosecution under Pen. Code, § 507, providing that a bailee who fraudulently converts the property or proceeds to his own use is guilty of embezzlement, an information in the language of the statute is sufficient, without setting forth the facts relied on to constitute the embezzlement.

2. Where, in a prosecution for embezzlement of a ring by a bailee, the owner testified that defendant took the ring from her finger before she knew it, to have it fixed for an engagement ring, which he never brought back, but sold it, a conviction was not contrary to the evidence, or an instruction that if defendant obtained the ring against the owner's will he should be acquitted.

3. Where an embezzlement by a bailee took place in the county where the trial was held, an objection to the owner's testimony as to what took place at the bailment in another county, as being without the jurisdiction of the court, was without merit.

4. In a prosecution for embezzlement by a bailee, an instruction that the mere taking of property by one from another does not constitute larceny, but there must be felonious taking with intent to steal, was not prejudicial to defendant.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county; Edward I. Jones, Judge.

W. F. Gordon was convicted of embezzlement, and appeals. Affirmed.

A. V. Scanlan, for appellant. T. L. Ford, Atty. Gen., for the People.

CHIPMAN, C. Defendant was convicted of embezzlement. He moved in arrest of judgment, which motion being denied, he moved for a new trial. This motion was also denied, and hence this appeal. There was no demurrer to the information. It is not contended that the evidence fails to support the verdict.

1. The motion in arrest of judgment is based upon the ground that the information does not charge a public offense. The information, it is conceded, is in the language of the statute (Pen. Code, § 507); but it is claimed that the information is fatally defective, in that it fails to set forth the facts relied on to constitute the embezzlement charged (citing People v. McKenna, 81 Cal. 158, 22 Pac. 488). This was the case of an information charging fraud, under section 532, Pen. Code. The complaint failed to aver any of the circumstances constituting the alleged fraud, although following closely the language of the statute. It was held bad, and not sufficient to sustain the conviction. There are obvious reasons why an indictment for obtaining money or other property under false pretenses should aver with particularity the facts relied upon to show fraud, and hence it is that it is insufficient to simply follow the language of the statute in such cases. But the rule of pleading is different, as the reason is different, in the case of embezzlement. The essential elements of embezzlement are the fiduciary relation arising where one intrusts property to another, and the fraudulent appropriation of the property by the latter. Id. § 503. The origin or particulars of the relation need not be stated. 2 Bish. Cr. Law, § 323a. Section 507, Pen. Code, reads as follows: "Every person intrusted with any property as bailee, * * * who fraudulently converts the same or the proceeds thereof to his own use * * * with a fraudulent intent to convert to his own use, is guilty of embezzlement," etc. It was alleged in the information that on a certain day the defendant "was, by one Pauline Hankozy, intrusted, as bailee, with certain personal property [describing it, a certain diamond ring, and giving its value], which said ring was then and there the personal property of said Pauline Hankozy, and thereafter [stating time and place] the said W. F. Gordon did willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously embezzle and fraudulently convert to his own use, * * * without the consent of the said Pauline Hankozy, contrary," etc. A similar information, in the case of embezzlement by an alleged agent, was held sufficient in People v. Tomlinson, 66 Cal. 344, 5 Pac. 505; in the case of a public officer, in People v. Mahlman, 82 Cal. 585, 23 Pac. 145, and Same v. Page, 116 Cal. 388, 48 Pac. 326, in which cases there were demurrers. Stating that the property was intrusted to defendant as bailee sufficiently showed a fiduciary relation, and it was not necessary to allege the circumstances of the felonious conversion; especially so in the absence of a demurrer. Nor was it necessary to aver that the owner or bailor had demanded possession of the property, and had been refused, as is claimed by defendant. People v. Wyman, 102 Cal. 552, 36 Pac. 932, and People v. Royce, 106 Cal. 173, 37 Pac. 630, 39 Pac. 524, stated a rule applicable to the evidence, and not to the information.

2. It is contended that the verdict was in violation of the following instruction given by the court: "If you are satisfied that the defendant obtained possession of the ring mentioned in the information against the will of the prosecuting witness, Pauline Hankozy, you should find a verdict of not guilty." The prosecuting witness testified that she first met defendant at Sonora (county not mentioned; there is such a place in Tuolumne county), and that she became engaged to him. She testified that defendant took the ring from her finger before she knew it, and then told her he would take it to San Francisco, and have it fixed for her as an engagement ring, and would put some rubies in it, and would bring it back in nine days. "He never came back," but sold the ring in Stockton. Just what the witness meant by saying that the ring was taken "before she knew it" is not clear, but she seems to have acquiesced at the time. What defendant's intention was in taking the ring, and whether it was against the owner's will, were questions for the jury on the evidence. The jury manifestly construed the evidence adduced, as well they might have done, as showing that defendant took the ring with Miss Hankozy's consent. It was the subsequent felonious conversion by defendant that constituted the embezzlement. The instruction was given at defendant's request, and the verdict was neither contrary thereto nor to the evidence.

3. The property was not received in San Joaquin county, but it appeared that it was converted in that county, and this was sufficient. People v. Murphy, 51 Cal. 379. The evidence was sufficient to warrant the jury in finding that the intent to embezzle the property was conceived in San Joaquin county. This answers defendant's objection to the testimony of Miss Hankozy as to what took place at Sonora, claimed by defendant to be without the jurisdiction of the court, i. e. in another county.

4. The court gave the following instruction: "The mere taking of property by one from another does not constitute larceny. To constitute larceny, such taking must be a felonious taking,—a taking with the intent on the part of the taker then and there to steal the same." It is claimed that the instruction "had no place in a case like the present one." Defendant in the instruction asked by him, already noticed, sought to show that there might be an unlawful taking which would not be embezzlement. In effect, it was to intimate that, while the evidence in the case might show larceny or some other crime, it was not the crime charged. The court had instructed very fully as to what constituted embezzlement, and no doubt, out of abundant caution, added the above instruction, which could not have resulted to defendant's injury. We discover no error in the judgment or order, and advise that they be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C; GRAY, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order are affirmed.

MATTINGLY v. NICHOLS, County Auditor.
(L. A. 1,025.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 8, 1901.)
PRELIMINARY EXAMINATION—REPORTER'S FEES.

Pen. Code, § 871, makes it the duty of a magistrate after preliminary examination to indorse his order of discharge upon depositions taken and certified in the manner prescribed by section 869. Section 883 requires depositions so taken to be filed with the county clerk, whether defendant is discharged or held to answer. On examination of one charged with larceny, the justice appointed plaintiff to report in shorthand the proceedings at the preliminary investigation whereat accused was discharged. Held, that the reporter was not entitled to fees for transcribing the shorthand notes in such case.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; W. F. Fitzgerald, Judge.

Mandamus by Charles H. Mattingly against Thomas E. Nichols, auditor of Los Angeles county. From an order sustaining a demurrer to the complaint, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Charles H. Mattingly, for appellant. James C. Rivers, Dist. Atty., and Curtis D. Wilbur, Dep. Dist. Atty., for respondent.

HAYNES, C. Appellant, upon filing his complaint in the court below, obtained an alternative writ of mandate requiring respondent, as county auditor, to draw a warrant upon the county treasurer in his favor for the sum of $34.50, for services as shorthand reporter in a justice's court upon the examination of a prisoner charged with grand larceny, or show cause why he should not do so. The defendant appeared and demurred to the complaint, the demurrer was sustained, judgment entered thereon for the defendant, and plaintiff appeals.

The complaint alleges that upon the demand of one Brogdon, who was being examined upon a charge of grand larceny, that the testimony should be reduced to writing, the plaintiff was ordered and appointed by the justice of the peace to report in shorthand the depositions, testimony, and proceedings at the preliminary examination of the party charged; that he took said proceedings in shorthand, and, in compliance with the order of the justice, afterwards transcribed the same in longhand; that the prisoner was discharged, and the proceedings so transcribed, and his shorthand notes, were duly filed with the clerk of the superior court. Appellant's demand was for one day's service, $10, and for transcribing the testimony, $24.50. The controversy relates only to the item for transcribing the testimony.

Appellant's contention is that as section 871 of the Penal Code makes it the duty of the magistrate to indorse in writing his order of discharge upon the depositions taken, authenticated, and certified in the manner prescribed by section 869, Id.; and as section 883, Id., requires that the "depositions" so taken should be filed with the county clerk in all cases, whether the defendant is discharged or held to answer, that it necessarily follows that the reporter's shorthand notes should be transcribed, as otherwise the discharge could not be indorsed upon them. This contention is, we think, erroneous. If it were essential that the discharge should be indorsed "upon the depositions," there are other depositions mentioned in the Code upon which it may properly be indorsed. Section 811, Pen. Code, provides that when an information is laid before a magistrate he must examine the informant or prosecutor, and any witnesses he may produce, "and take their depositions in writing"; and section 812, Id., prescribes what "the deposition" so taken must set forth. The term "deposition" is also given to the testimony of witnesses taken upon the examination of the accused, when required to be reduced to writing, whether written by the magistrate or taken in shorthand (Id. § 869); and section 870 speaks of "depositions taken on the information or on the examination." Section 871, Pen. Code, is as follows: "If, after hearing the proofs, it appears either that no public offense has been committed, or that there is not sufficient cause to believe the defendant guilty of a public offense, the magistrate must order the defendant to be discharged, by an endorsement on the depositions and statement, signed by him, to the following effect: There being no sufficient cause to believe the within named A. B. guilty of the offense within mentioned, I order him to be discharged." It is clear that the name "deposition" is used to designate the testimony taken by the magistrate when the complaint is presented to him before the issuance of the warrant, as well as the testimony of witnesses taken upon the examination of the accused after arrest, and that the order of discharge may properly be indorsed upon the former. If so, the necessity for transcribing the reporter's shorthand notes for the purpose of having the discharge indorsed thereon is not apparent. In People v. Wallace, 94 Cal. 499, 29 Pac. 950, it is said: "We are of opinion that an order holding a defendant to answer is in fact and in law made when it is entered upon the docket of the justice, and the failure to indorse such order upon the complaint or the depositions taken in no manner deprives the order of its validity, or affects any substantial right of a defendant;" and in People v. Wilson, 93 Cal. 379, 28 Pac. 1061, it was held that, in so far as the statute provides that the order shall be indorsed upon the deposition, the statute may be regarded as directory. In People v. Dolan, 96 Cal. 315, 31 Pac. 107, the order of commitment referred to the complaint as "the within deposition," and it was held that it was a sufficient compliance with section 872 of the Penal Code.

We think, however, that the Code does not contemplate, much less require, the shorthand notes of the reporter to be transcribed where the accused has been discharged. Subdivision 5 of section 869 of the Penal Code provides: "The reporter shall, within ten days after the close of such examination (if the defendant be held to answer to the charge), transcribe into longhand writing his said shorthand notes, and certify and file the same with the county clerk of the county, or city and county, in which the defendant was examined, and shall in all cases file his original notes with said clerk." If it was the intention of the legislature to require the reporter's notes to be transcribed and filed with the original notes in cases where the accused is discharged, as well as in cases where he is held to answer, it would have been easy to say so. No distinction whatever would have been made. It is not material to inquire whether the transcribed notes could or would have been of any use. The question, as finally stated in the reply brief, is whether appellant is entitled to pay, having performed the service upon the demand of the accused and under the order of the examining magistrate. But neither the state nor the county can be charged with a liability unless it is authorized by law. No discretion is vested in the justice of the peace in the matter. His authority must be found in the statute, if he has it, and we do not find any. The demurrer was rightly sustained, and the judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: SMITH, C.; COOPER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE ex rel. SKELTON v. CITY OF LOS ANGELES. (L. A. 894.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 9, 1901.)

QUO WARRANTO—COMPLAINT—BURDEN OF PROOF—MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—ANNEXATION OF TERRITORY—ELECTION PRECINCTS—MODE OF VOTING—AUSTRALIAN BALLOT SYSTEM.

1. Where the complaint, in quo warranto by the state to oust a city from all corporate franchises and control within or over certain territory, after stating generally the steps taken to effect the annexation of such territory, and charging that defendant has usurped such franchises without any authority, specifies the particulars in which the said proceedings were invalid, the state must stand or fall on the sufficiency of the facts alleged.

2. Under St. 1889, p. 358, providing that a city council receiving a written petition to annex certain territory, containing a description thereof, and signed by not less than one-fifth of the qualified voters of such municipality, must submit the question whether such territory shall be annexed to the electors of such municipality and of the territory proposed to be annexed, an adjudication by such council as to the number of electors signing the petition is conclusive, in the absence of fraud.

3. St. 1889, p. 504, § 200, provides that the council shall specify places within the limits of each ward for the holding of a special election, or may divide any of the wards into two or more precincts. Section 202 declares that all elections shall in other respects be conducted under the provisions for holding general elections. St. 1889, p. 358, provides that the places for voting on the annexation of territory to the city shall be those commonly used as voting places. St. 1899, p. 63, with relation to elections held separate from general state elections, provides for establishing precincts, and that the board may consolidate the precincts of the last preceding general state election to a number not exceeding six for each municipal election precinct. The city council, at an election to determine the question of annexing certain territory, designated each ward of the city as a precinct, each of which, except two, contained more than six of the precincts as they existed at the last preceding general state election. Held that, though the board followed the wrong provision in designating the precincts, the election, in the absence of fraud, was not void, as the provisions are merely directory.

4. St. 1889, p. 358, provides that electors shall be invited to vote on the proposition of annexing territory to a city by placing on the ballots the words "For annexation" or "Against annexation." The ticket used contained the direction, "To vote, stamp a cross (X) in the square opposite the proposition indicating your choice," while below, on separate lines, were the words "For annexation" and "Against annexation." Held a substantial compliance with the statute.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; D. K. Trask, Judge.

Quo warranto proceedings by the people of the state of California, by Tiley L. Ford, attorney general, on the relation of J. W. Skelton, against the city of Los Angeles. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Dunn & Crutcher, Tiley L. Ford, Atty. Gen. (George P. Adams, of counsel), for appellant. Walter F. Haas, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. Quo warranto. In December, 1898, the city council of the city of Los Angeles received a written petition, under the provisions of the act of 1889 (St. 1889, p. 358), praying that certain territory adjacent to said city be annexed thereto and incorporated therewith, pursuant to which certain proceedings were had which respondent claims effected the annexation of said territory. Appellant contends that these proceedings were void, and prays that the city be excluded from all corporate franchises, jurisdiction, and control within or over said territory. A general demurrer to the amended complaint was sustained, and judgment thereon entered for defendant, and plaintiff appeals.

The complaint, after stating generally the steps taken to effect the annexation of said territory, and charging that the defendant has usurped and exercised, without any warrant or authority, the franchises, jurisdiction, and control over said territory, proceeds to specify and allege the particulars in which the said proceedings were invalid and insufficient to accomplish such annexation. The mode of pleading in such cases is now by no means uniform. It is undoubtedly true that the state may charge a corporation with the usurpation of a franchise in general terms, and call upon it to allege and prove the facts showing its right, and thus place the burden upon the defendant. Palmer v. Woodbury, 14 Cal. 43; People v. Reclamation Dist., 121 Cal. 526, 50 Pac. 1068, 53 Pac. 1085. An information on behalf of the state may, however, allege the specific grounds or defects relied upon to show usurpation, instead of charging usurpation in general terms, and this mode of pleading has become quite common. People v. Dashaway Association, 84 Cal. 114, 24 Pac. 277, 12 L. R. A. 117. But, if the facts upon which the alleged usurpation is based are pleaded by the state, the facts so pleaded must be sufficient to sustain the charge of usurpation, if admitted, and, if denied, the burden of proof is upon the plaintiff. In People v. Sutter St. Ry. Co., 117 Cal. 611, 49 Pac. 736, it was said the relief might be had "by a proceeding strictly in form of a quo warranto, but there is no reason why the proceeding may not be by a regular action. In fact there is now so little difference that it is hardly worthy of discussion." The plaintiff, having assumed the burden of allegation and proof, must stand or fall upon the sufficiency of the facts alleged.

1. The act of 1889, under which these proceedings were taken, provides that the boundaries of any incorporated town or city may be changed, or new territory annexed thereto, upon proceedings being taken as therein provided. Touching the petition therefor the statute provides: "The council, board of trustees, or other legislative body of any such municipal corporation, upon receiving a written petition therefor containing a description of the new territory asked to be annexed to such corporation, and signed by not less than one-fifth in number of the qualified electors of such municipal corporation, computed upon the number of votes cast at the last general municipal election held therein, must, without delay, submit to the electors of such municipal corporation, and to the electors residing in the territory proposed by such petition to be annexed to such corporation, the question whether such new territory shall be annexed to, incorporated in, and made part of such municipal corporation." The complaint does not set out a copy of the petition, and the only defect therein alleged in the complaint or urged in argument is that it was not signed by at least one-fifth of the qualified electors of the city, computed upon the number of votes cast at the last general municipal election held therein. The jurisdiction of the city council to order an election depends upon the presentation to it of such petition signed by the requisite number of electors. Whether it was so signed was a question of fact submitted by the statute to the decision of the council, and the question arising upon this branch of the case is whether the adjudication of that question of fact by the city council is conclusive. The act might have provided that that question should be submitted to the decision of a court or jury; but it is obvious that the city council, if so authorized by the statute, is as capable of its correct decision as any tribunal that might have been named, and that such decision is, under the statute, as conclusive as though made by any other tribunal to which the legislature might have submitted it. "An inferior board may determine conclusively its own jurisdiction or power by adjudicating the existence of facts upon the existence of which its jurisdiction or power depends. Where, however, the power depends, not upon the existence or nonexistence of matters in pais, to be established by evidence, but upon allegations in a petition, a portion of the record, the question is not the same." In re Grove St., 61 Cal. 453; Humboldt County v. Dinsmore, 75 Cal. 607, 17 Pac. 710; Farmers' & Merchants' Bank v. Board of Equalization, 97 Cal. 318, 32 Pac. 312. In Wells, Jur. § 61, it is said: "Where the jurisdiction of even an inferior court is dependent on a fact which that court is required to ascertain and settle by its decision, such decision is held conclusive." Freeman, in his work on Judgments, in speaking of tribunals acting judicially (section 531), says: "As a general rule, whenever any person or persons have authority to hear and determine any question, their determination is, in effect, a judgment having all the incidents and properties attached to a similar judgment pronounced in any regularly created court of limited jurisdiction acting within the bounds of its authority. Hence, whenever any board, tribunal, or person is by law vested with authority to decide a question, such decision, when made, is res judicata, and as conclusive of the issues involved in the decision as though the adjudication had been made by a court of general jurisdiction." All such adjudications are conclusive against collateral attack, and as the statute has not, in the case at bar, given any appeal or review by a higher tribunal, it follows that it can be vacated only in the manner and upon the grounds that would justify the vacation of a judgment rendered by a court of record, and a mere error in the adjudication of a question of fact not procured by fraud, extrinsic or collateral to such question, is not a ground upon which it may be vacated, since, if it were, no adjudication of a question of fact would ever become final so long as new evidence could be had, or a different conclusion be reached upon the same evidence. Appellant makes no suggestion that the petition was in any manner defective upon its face. If it had been defective in any material matter required by the statute, the council would not have acquired jurisdiction, and the defect, appearing upon the face of the record, would have been fatal in this proceeding; and in such case appellant's citation from In re Madera Irr. Dist., 92 Cal. 296, 28 Pac. 272, 675, 14 L. R. A. 755, that "no board or tribunal can obtain jurisdiction by its own recital that it has jurisdiction," would have been in point. Appellant also quotes from the case last above cited the following: "Nor should this jurisdiction be held to attach whatever court may have ruled that the petition was signed by a majority, when, in fact, it was signed only by a minority, of the owners designated by the statute." This quotation, unexplained, sustains appellant's contention. But that was an action brought under the act of 1889 (St. 1889, p. 212), for a confirmation of the proceedings for the issuance and sale of bonds of said irrigation district, and which expressly declared that "the court shall have power and jurisdiction to examine and determine the legality and validity of * * * each and all the proceedings for the organization of said district, * * * from and including the petition for the organization of the district." Id. p. 213, § 5. The proceeding was special, and was so declared by the act. See People v. Reclamation Dist., 121 Cal. 525, 50 Pac. 1068, 53 Pac. 1085.

2. Appellant also contends that the council did not properly divide the city into election precincts for the purposes of said election, in that each of the nine wards of the city was designated as a precinct, thus: "First Ward, Precinct A," "Second Ward, Precinct A," etc. That each of said precincts, except two, contained more than six of the general election precincts as the same existed for the holding of the last preceding general state election, at which time the city contained 84 precincts. Appellant refers to the provisions of the city charter, but does not fully state them. The charter provides for special elections in certain specified cases, and adds, "or for other purposes not especially provided for." St. 1889, p.

504, § 197. The charter further provides (section 200) that the council shall by ordinance order the holding of all elections, and shall specify "a place or places within the limits of each ward for the holding of such election," or may "divide any of the wards into two or more precincts"; and, after making many other provisions, declares that "all elections shall, in all other respects, be conducted and held in accordance with the provisions of the laws of the state for the holding of general elections in effect at the time." Section 202. The act of 1889, providing for the annexation of new territory, makes it the duty of the legislative body of the municipality to designate in the notice of election the voting precinct or precincts, and the polling places in the territory proposed to be annexed, "and also in such municipal corporation; and such place or places shall be that or those commonly used as voting places within such municipal corporation, and also that or those commonly used in such new territory, if any such there be." Another statutory provision, and the one apparently relied upon, is an act passed March 4, 1899 (St. 1899, p. 63), entitled "An act in relation to municipal elections where the same are held separate from general state elections, and elections held under the authority of section eight of article eleven of the constitution, to elect boards of freeholders, or to vote upon proposed charters or upon amendments to existing charters," and to repeal the act of March 31, 1897. This act provides that municipalities may be divided into municipal election precincts as often as occasion may require, and "in establishing such municipal election precincts, said board may consolidate the precincts which existed for the holding of the last preceding general state election to a number not exceeding six for each municipal election precinct. * * *" As to which of these conflicting provisions should have been followed even a city council might err. Nor do I think it necessary to decide that question. These provisions have been stated mainly in illustration of the conclusion that as to the formation of voting precincts such provisions are directory merely, so that if it be conceded that the wrong statute was followed, or that neither was strictly followed, the election was not void. Such provisions are directory, not mandatory. It is not declared that a failure to observe the direction of the statute as to the number or size of the precincts shall invalidate the election. "It is only those provisions of the statutes relating to the time and place of holding elections, the qualifications of voters, and such others as are expressly made essential prerequisites to the validity of an election, that are held to be mandatory. All others are directory merely, and a failure to observe them, caused by honest ignorance or mistake, and not resulting in manifest fraud, does not afford ground for rejecting the entire vote of a precinct." Russell v. McDowell, 83 Cal. 77, 23 Pac. 183; Tebbe v. Smith, 108 Cal. 111, 41 Pac. 454, 29 L. R. A. 673. In the recent case of Fragley v. Phelan, 126 Cal. 397, 58 Pac. 923, it was said: "The provision in section 1129, that the precinct shall be sufficient to make the number of votes polled at any one precinct to be not more than two hundred, as nearly as can be ascertained," is not to be regarded as jurisdictional, but is merely directory. * * * It is not claimed that the board acted in bad faith, or that any citizen was deprived of his vote, the only claim being that, by reason of the registered vote within each of said precincts being much greater than two hundred, the board must be presumed to have abused its discretion in consolidating the precincts in the manner it did." Fraud is not charged, nor is it alleged that any one who desired to vote was unable to do so because of the size of the precincts or for any reason.

3. Appellant also contends that the ballots used at said election did not conform either to the Australian ballot system, nor to the provisions of the act of 1889, which provides for the annexation of territory to municipal corporations. Said act provides that electors shall be invited to vote upon such proposition "by placing upon the ballots the words 'For annexation,' or 'Against annexation,' or words equivalent thereto." The form of the ticket used was as follows:

To vote, stamp a cross (X) in the square opposite the proposition indicating your choice.

1.	For Annexation.....
2.	Against Annexation.....

This was a substantial compliance with the act of 1889, which, while specifying certain words in which the desire of the voter might be expressed, waived a technical compliance with the direction by adding, "or words equivalent thereto." This ticket uses the words expressed in the statute, while also adopting the method of the Australian system in designating the voters' choice between the alternative propositions. "It [the ballot] should be read in the light of all the circumstances surrounding the election and the voter, and the object should be to ascertain and to carry into effect the intention of the voter, if it can be determined with reasonable certainty. The ballot should be liberally construed, and the intendments should be in favor of a reading and construction which will render the ballot effective, rather than some conclusion which will, on a technical ground, render it ineffective." Behrensmeyer v. Kreitz, 135 Ill. 495, 26 N. E. 704. "If a ballot expresses the intention of the voter without a reasonable doubt, it is sufficient, though technically inaccurate." Hawes v. Miller, 56 Iowa, 595, 9 N. W. 307. The form of the ballot used could not have led to any doubt or uncertainty as to the intention of the voters, and it is not alleged that it did. The judgment appealed from should be affirmed.

PEOPLE v. STORK. (Cr. 747.)¹

(Supreme Court of California. July 16, 1901.)

FORGERY—EVIDENCE—LAND CONTRACT—INTENT.

1. Accused had procured the owners of land to deposit a deed with him in escrow, on a verbal understanding that they were to have all the time they wanted to examine certain lands which another proposed to convey in exchange. Accused drew up an instrument, to which he signed the names of the grantors in the deed without their knowledge, which stipulated that the contract should be in full effect after one month, provided title and location were not objected to by either party before that time. Thereafter the grantors in the deed of escrow, finding the lands worthless, demanded the escrow deed of accused, who refused to give it up, on the ground that the transaction was closed. Held, that the instrument was a forgery, within the meaning of the law.

2. A contention that the evidence did not show an intent to injure any one nor an actual injury was without merit.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; B. N. Smith, Judge.

Eugene B. Stork was convicted of forgery, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Geo. L. Sanders and D. M. McDonald, for appellant. Tiley L. Ford, Atty. Gen., and A. A. Moore, Jr., Dep. Atty. Gen., for the People.

McFARLAND, J. The defendant was convicted of forgery, and appeals from the judgment and from an order denying a new trial. The writing alleged to have been forged was a certain contract for the exchange of certain land between John A. McCarty, party of the first part, and Edna E. Nave and her husband, A. G. Nave, parties of the second part. There was ample evidence to warrant the jury in finding that neither of the Naves signed the writing in question, or authorized their names, or either of them, to be signed, and that appellant committed the alleged acts of forgery. We see nothing in the contentions that the writing in question, even if false, did not constitute a legal forgery; that there was no intent on the part of appellant to injure any one; that it did not injure the Naves; and that it was not produced by appellant until after the expiration of the time limit expressed on its face. Appellant had procured the Naves to deposit with him in escrow a deed of conveyance of the land mentioned in the contract to be conveyed by them, upon the verbal understanding that they were to have all the time they wanted to examine certain land in the state of Missouri which McCarty was to convey to them; but in the forged instrument, of which the Naves knew nothing whatever, and which was dated February 9, 1898, it was stipulated that the contract should be in full effect after the expiration of one month, "provided title and location is not objected to by either parties prior to the expiration of this agreement." The land in Missouri turned out to be worthless, and when Nave, some time in March, 1898, demanded of appellant a return of the escrow deed, the latter refused to do so, and said that the transaction was closed, and the title had passed out of the Naves. The Naves brought an action against appellant and McCarty to recover the land, and then appellant produced the forged instrument. Under these circumstances, the making of the false instrument was clearly a forgery, within the meaning of the law on the subject.

There is some discussion in appellant's brief of the expert testimony introduced; but no legal objection to any of such testimony is urged, and all there is to be said on the subject is that this testimony was somewhat conflicting. In his brief appellant merely says that there is a variance between the forged instrument set out in the information and the one introduced in evidence, without stating in what the variance consists; leaving us to look into the record ourselves to see what the variance is. An examination of the record shows no variance except of the most trivial kind.

The brief contains a number of objections to rulings of the court in passing on the admissibility of evidence and in instructing the jury; but these are nearly all mere naked statements of objections, without argument or reasons given. We have looked at them, however, and it is sufficient to say that we do not see in these objections any legal reason for reversing the judgment. The court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to grant a new trial on the ground of newly-discovered evidence. The record does not show anything which would warrant a reversal on the ground of the misconduct of the district attorney. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

WILLIAMS v. SAVINGS & LOAN SOC. (S.
F. 2,749.)¹

(Supreme Court of California. July 11, 1901.)

APPEAL—PARTY AGGRIEVED—DISMISSAL.

1. Where the appeal is from the judgment roll, and without a bill of exceptions, and no motion for new trial was made, a finding that plaintiff had no right to bring the suit cannot be questioned, nor can errors of law be considered.

2. A party who has no right to bring the suit, and no interest therein, is not aggrieved by the judgment, and cannot appeal.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Contra Costa county; William S. Wells, Judge.

Action by S. Ella Williams against the Savings & Loan Society. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Dismissed.

TEMPLE, J. This action was brought to effect the redemption of a tract of land from the lien of a mortgage alleged to have been given by the Brentwood Coal Company, a corporation, to one James T. Sanford. It is alleged that defendant is in possession of the land as assignee of said mortgage, and is holding the land as security. It is also averred that the corporation became insolvent, and was disincorporated; plaintiff being at the time a stockholder, owning 3,000 shares of the capital stock of the corporation. As such stockholder she asserts the right to redeem the land from said mortgage. She charges that the defendant had been in possession for many years, and had received a large amount of rents and profits from the land, of which she asks an accounting, to determine the amount which will be required to enable her to redeem. Many other matters are averred in the complaint, which it is not necessary to state.

Issue was taken by defendant upon many allegations in the complaint, and particularly in regard to the ownership of stock on the part of plaintiff in the said corporation. The denial is full and specific, and the court upon that issue found that "the plaintiff herein was not on the 4th of December, 1883, or prior thereto, and was not at any time since said 4th day of December, 1883, or at the time of the commencement of this action, the owner or holder of three thousand shares, or any shares or share, of the capital stock of said Brentwood Coal Company." This was a finding to the effect that plaintiff had no right to bring the suit, and was not interested in the controversy. That being so, she is not a party aggrieved by the judgment, and cannot appeal therefrom. The appeal is upon the judgment roll, and without a bill of exceptions. No motion for a new trial was made, or, if there was, it does not appear from this record. The finding cannot be questioned on the appeal, nor can we consider errors of law committed at the trial, if such there were. We are asked to consider whether the findings and pleadings support the judgment, and whether they do not necessitate a different judgment; but, as the finding must stand that plaintiff has no interest in the matter, she will not be heard upon those questions. Blythe v. Ayres, 102 Cal. 260, 36 Pac. 522, 41 Am. Rep. 188; In re Blythe's Estate, 108 Cal. 126, 41 Pac. 33. The relief which appellant demands here is that the trial court be directed "to enter final judgment in favor of plaintiff upon the findings and admissions in the pleadings." We are not pointed to any admissions in the pleadings in regard to the ownership on the part of plaintiff of any stock in said corporation, or as to her interest in this controversy, and we have found none. The appeal is dismissed.

PEOPLE v. BRADY et al. (Cr. 746.)¹

CRIMINAL LAW — BURGLARY — CLERICAL ERROR IN VERDICT — EVIDENCE — PROPER CROSS-EXAMINATION—INSTRUCTION.

1. Under Pen. Code, § 1151, providing that a general verdict on a plea of not guilty is either "guilty" or "not guilty," which imports a conviction or acquittal of the offense charged in the indictment, the designation of the offense in a general verdict is mere surplusage, and a verdict finding defendant guilty of "burglary" is valid.

2. Defendant leased a house in which there was no furniture. A vacant house on another farm, about nine miles distant, contained household furniture, which was found in defendant's possession at the time of his arrest. One witness testified that the defendant had borrowed a team about the time the furniture was supposed to have been taken, and another witness testified as to seeing such a team going in the direction of the vacant house, and later return towards the defendant's place. Defendant made many contradictory statements as to where he obtained the furniture. Held sufficient to warrant a conviction for burglary.

3. The fact that a person was living with one guilty of burglary at the time the burglary was committed, and that he made untruthful statements as to where the guilty party obtained the property, is not sufficient evidence to warrant the conviction of such person as participating in the crime.

4. Where, on a prosecution for burglary, the defendant's wife had testified as to the purchase by her husband of the alleged stolen articles, it was proper cross-examination to ask her as to statements, inconsistent with her testimony, at the time of her husband's arrest.

5. On a prosecution for burglary, it was not error to instruct that the possession of stolen property soon after the commission of the alleged offense by the person charged was a circumstance tending to prove their guilt, and that the jury should consider the proximity of the place where the property was found to the place of the alleged burglary, the lapse of time since the property was taken, the character and nature of the property taken, and whether the parties denied or admitted the possession, in determining how far the possession of the property by the accused tended to show his guilt.

6. On a prosecution for burglary it was not error to leave it to the jury to formulate their own verdict on blank forms furnished, stating the degree of guilt of the defendants, if either of them were guilty, and that, if the jury needed further instruction as to framing a verdict, it should return to the court room for such instruction.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county; Edward I. Jones, Judge.

Walter Brady and George Helms were convicted of burglary, and they appeal. Affirmed as to Brady, and reversed as to Helms.

A. V. Scanlan, for appellants. T. L. Ford, Atty. Gen., and C. N. Post, Asst. Atty. Gen. for the People.

CHIPMAN, C. Defendants were jointly accused of the crime of burglary, were tried together and convicted, the jury returning the following verdict: "We, the jury in the above-entitled cause, find Walter Brady and George Helms, defendants, guilty in the first degree for burglary." Defendants moved for their discharge, and also for a new trial, and both motions were denied, and they appeal from the judgment and from the order denying their motion for a new trial.

1. The motion for discharge was on the ground that the verdict was no verdict, because there is no such offense known to the law as "burglary"; citing People v. St. Clair, 56 Cal. 406, where the indictment charged an entry into a stable with intent to commit "larcey." It was held that there was no such felony as "larcey" known to the law, and that the maxim idem sonans did not apply. In that case the fatal defect was in the indictment itself, and not in the verdict of the jury. The error here was in the orthography of the word "burglary" as used in the verdict, and was merely a clerical error, which seems to have been overlooked by the court and counsel until the motion for a new trial was made. Where the intention of the jury is unmistakable, mere clerical errors should be disregarded. Jeansch v. Lewis, 1 S. D. 609, 48 N. W. 128. The verdict, being general, and fixing the degree of the crime, would have been complete had the word "burglary" been omitted altogether. Pen. Code, § 1151, which provides: "A general verdict upon a plea of not guilty is either 'guilty' or 'not guilty,' which imports a conviction or acquittal of the offense charged in the indictment." The obnoxious word may be rejected as surplusage, if necessary to sustain the judgment. But, aside from the foregoing considerations, we think the word used by the jury cannot be read as any other word than "burglary."

2. It is urged that the evidence is not sufficient to sustain the verdict, for the reason that there was no evidence in any way tending to establish the charge except the possession of the property claimed to have been stolen. We have carefully examined the testimony, and are satisfied that there is sufficient evidence to support the verdict as to defendant Brady, but not as to defendant Helms. It appeared that on July 5, 1900, defendant Brady leased from one Keagle a place in the country, known as the "Pope Place," situated between Stockton and Lodi, about three miles south of the latter town, and moved into the house on the place with his family, including defendant Helms, and they remained there until July 22, 1900, when defendants were arrested, and that there was no furniture in the house when Brady took possession. This place is about nine miles from the Cy Moreing place, owned by one Solari. On July 7th a vacant house on this place contained the various household articles afterwards found in the house rented by Brady, and the property was fully identified by Solari. He went to his place July 21st, and discovered that the articles were gone, and he testified "that he saw them on the Pope place on July 23, 1900." One Spelti testified that defendants on July 11, 1900, borrowed from the Lewis ranch, where witness was working, a sorrel horse and bay mare with a sorrel colt; that they were returned to the Lewis ranch, July 23d, by Constable Coleman, of Lodi; that defendants came to witness' place in a wagon, and that Brady's wife and some children were in the wagon. Witness Mrs. America Gum testified that on the 8th of July defendant Brady, with his wife and grandson, came to her house in a light two-horse wagon, and borrowed and took away with him a heavy two-horse wagon. This wagon was afterwards found near the Pope place. Witness Dolan testified that on July 13th, "a little after sundown," he saw two wagons passing in the direction of the Cy Moreing place, about two miles south of where the witness was; he was near the wagons, one of which was a large two-horse wagon, drawn by a bay and sorrel; the other was a "small, heavy-sized spring wagon, with a bed about twelve feet long, * * * drawn by a bay and a brown"; the teams were traveling close together, and "a little sorrel colt traveling with one of the teams, and, going down, he was right near the sorrel horse"; that "the same night, about an hour and a half later, he saw the same teams, wagons, and persons pass him, at the same place, going north; that he was about twenty feet from them, and had a lantern with him; that after they passed he put away his lantern, got on a horse, and followed them about two miles, * * * to what is called the 'Goodwin Place,' where he stayed about an hour, listening to the wagons, which continued north for about two miles, and then turned west in the direction of the Pope place." He did not recognize the persons, and did not testify who they were. He testified that he afterwards saw one of the same wagons "at the Tyndal place, two hundred yards south of the Pope place." This was the same wagon that was borrowed from Mrs. Gum. Another witness "saw defendant Brady and another man, whom he did not know, in Lodi on July 20th, with Mrs. Gum's wagon." Other witnesses testified to seeing on the Pope place the wagons and horses and colt similar in description to those testified to by the witness Dolan. There was much evidence tending to show that defendant Brady made contradictory statements as to where he got the property, claiming that he bought the stove in San Francisco, and that he bought some of the property at a secondhand store in Stockton. When asked to go with the arresting officer to the place referred to in Stockton, he went with him, but was unable to find it, and he made contradictory statements as to where the place was. He also claimed that he bought the articles from an expressman in Stockton named Frank A. Jones, but several witnesses who knew all the junk dealers and expressmen in Stockton, as well as the arresting officers, were unable to locate or find any such person in Stockton. Without further statement of the evidence, we think the jury had sufficient facts before them to warrant a verdict of guilty as to defendant Brady.

There is no evidence connecting Helms with the taking or with the possession of the goods, except that he was living in the house with Brady. There was evidence that Helms told a witness that Brady got the articles where Brady had told the witness he got them; that Helms was with Brady when the latter got a team from the Lewis ranch, but not when he got the wagon from Mrs. Gum, which was hired to Brady. So far as appears, defendant Brady had a team and wagon of his own, and it appears that on July 9, 1890, some articles of furniture were delivered to Brady at the Union Transportation Company's wharf at Stockton. Helms was seen with Brady about July 22d, and he testified that he was living with him on July 9th. But there is no evidence that he had possession of the stolen property or made any claim to it whatever or had anything to do with it. If he made statements contrary to the truth as to where Brady got it, that fact would not tend to show that Helms aided in stealing it. He was not asked to explain his possession of the property, and made no explanation, for the obvious reason that he was not in possession of it.

3. Mrs. Brady was a witness for defendants, and on cross-examination the district attorney asked her the following question: "Q. Mrs. Brady, do you remember being in the sheriff's office on the 24th of July, 1900?" Defendants objected as not cross-examination. The question was completed by stating the persons present, after which the witness was interrogated at considerable length as to what was said by her at that time relative to certain of the stolen articles and where her husband got them. She had testified in chief that her husband purchased the property in question in Stockton on July 9th from one Jones, and paid $18 for it, taking Jones' receipt for the money. It was competent on cross-examination to impeach the witness by showing that she had made statements inconsistent with her testimony, relative to the matter about which she had testified in chief, and the cross-examination was to lay the proper foundation. We see no error in the ruling.

4. The following instructions are objected to: "The court instructs the jury that the possession of stolen property recently after the commission of the alleged offense by the persons charged, if you find any such property to have been in their possession, if unexplained, is a circumstance tending to prove their guilt; and if the jury believe from the evidence that the defendants were found with the stolen property in their possession, if you find any was feloniously taken, then, to determine the weight to be attached to that circumstance as tending to prove guilt, the jury should consider all the circumstances attending such possession, proximity of the place where found to the place of the alleged burglary, the lapse of time since the property was taken, the character and nature of the property taken, whether the property was concealed, whether the parties denied or admitted the possession, and the demeanor and character of the accused. All of these circumstances, so far as they have been proved, are proper to be taken into account by the jury in determining how far the possession of the property by the accused, if it has been proved, tends to show his or their guilt." The court also gave the following: "Although you cannot, under the information, find the defendants, or either of them, guilty of any offense other than burglary, it would be somewhat difficult to furnish you with the complete form of every possible verdict at which, according to your view of the evidence, you may arrive. The court will therefore furnish you mere blank forms. Upon one of such forms you will formulate your verdict, and your foreman will sign it. You will be careful to dispose of the whole case, observing that there are two defendants, and if you find either or both of them guilty of burglary you will specify whether in the first or second degree. With proper care, you will probably be able to frame a verdict, but, should you need further instruction, you may request the officer in charge of you to return you to the court room for such instruction." We discover no error in either of these instructions. The judgment and order as to defendant Brady should be affirmed, and as to defendant Helms they should be reversed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; GRAY, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order as to defendant Brady are affirmed, and as to defendant Helms they are reversed.

MANSFIELD v. O'KEEFE. (S. F. 2,711.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 13, 1901.)

CHANGE OF VENUE — APPEAL — NOTICE — UNDERTAKING—FILING IN WRONG COUNTY.

Code Civ. Proc. § 399, provides that, in case of change of venue, the court to which the action is transferred has the like jurisdiction as if the case had been originally commenced therein. Section 940 provides that an appeal is taken by filing with the clerk of the court in which the judgment or order appealed from was entered a notice stating the appeal, which is ineffectual unless, within five days after service thereof, an undertaking be filed with the clerk. Held, that appeal from an order changing the place of trial will be dismissed where the notice of appeal and the bill of exceptions settled by the judge of the court of the county from which the change was made, and the undertaking on appeal, were filed in the county to which the cause was transferred, instead of the county in which the action was begun.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Mateo county; George H. Buck, Judge.

Action by J. H. Mansfield against D. E. O'Keefe. From an order changing the place of trial, defendant appeals. Dismissed.

John E. Richards and Jas. T. O'Keefe, for appellant. H. E. Highton, for respondent.

VAN DYKE, J. Motion to dismiss an appeal. The appeal is taken by defendant, or attempted to be taken, from an order of the superior court of the county of San Mateo changing the place of trial of said cause therefrom to the superior court of the county of Santa Clara. The motion to dismiss the appeal is based upon the ground that the notice of appeal from said order, as well as the bill of exceptions settled by the judge of said county, and the undertaking on appeal, were each and all filed in the superior court of the county of Santa Clara, instead of being filed in the superior court of the county of San Mateo, in which court said order appealed from was entered, and that as matter of law no appeal has been taken from the order transferring the trial of said cause. "An appeal is taken by filing with the clerk of the court in which the judgment or order appealed from is entered, a notice stating the appeal from the same, or some specific part thereof, and serving a similar notice on the adverse party or his attorney." Code Civ. Proc. § 940. The same section declares that "the appeal is ineffectual for any purpose unless within five days after service of the notice of appeal, an undertaking be filed, or a deposit of money be made with the clerk, as hereinafter provided, or the undertaking be waived by the adverse party in writing." The next section provides that the undertaking on appeal must be executed on the part of the appellant, by at least two sureties, in a sum not exceeding three hundred dollars, "or that sum must be deposited with the clerk with whom the judgment or order was entered, to abide the event of the appeal." In support of the motion the respondent has submitted a certificate from the county clerk of Santa Clara county, showing that the notice of appeal from said order, and the bill of exceptions settled by the judge of the superior court of San Mateo county, and the undertaking on appeal, were filed in said Santa Clara county, and a certificate from the county clerk of San Mateo county, in which it is stated that no notice of appeal from said order has been filed in that county.

The appellant, in resisting the motion to dismiss, admits that section 940 is applicable to appeals in general, but contends that an appeal from an order changing a place of trial is exceptional, and that it is controlled by section 399 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that, in case of a change of place of trial, "the court to which an action or proceeding is transferred has and exercises over the same the like jurisdiction as if it had been originally commenced therein." The meaning of that provision, as the language imports, is that the court to which the action is transferred, from that time forward, has a like jurisdiction over the trial of the action, or other proceeding relating thereto, as though the action had been commenced therein, but not over orders or proceedings had prior thereto by a court of another county. The appellant from that order must furnish this court, among other papers, with a copy of the order appealed from. Code Civ. Proc. § 951. The order appealed from in this case must have been entered in the minutes of the court in which it was granted. Code Civ. Proc. § 1003. And the clerk of that court would be the proper one to furnish a copy of said order for the appellant. The alleged error complained of was committed by the superior court of San Mateo county, and the relief is sought as against that court, and the notice of appeal and undertaking must be filed in the court from whose judgment or order the appeal is taken. The only cases cited by the appellant in resisting the motion are Krumdick v. Crump, 98 Cal. 117, 32 Pac. 800, and Brady v. Times-Mirror Co., 106 Cal. 56, 39 Pac. 209. In both of these cases the court below refused to transfer the trial of the cause, and the appeals were taken from such order. They have no bearing on the question involved on this motion to dismiss. The appeal not having been taken in the manner prescribed by law, the motion to dismiss must be granted; and it is so ordered.

PROHIBITION—ARRESTING PROCEEDINGS IN RECEIVERSHIP—ADEQUATE REMEDY.

Since Code Civ. Proc. §§ 939, 943, provide for an appeal from an order appointing a receiver, and for stay of the order by undertaking on appeal, prohibition will not lie to arrest proceedings in a receivership; section 1103 authorizing writ of prohibition only where there is not an adequate remedy at law.

In bank. Petition by Jacobs & Flack for writ of prohibition to arrest certain proceedings in superior court. Dismissed.

Jacobs & Flack, in pro. per. Joseph H. Budd and Campbell, Metson & Campbell, for respondent. S. M. Spurrier, for receiver.

McFARLAND, J. This is an original petition here for a writ of prohibition to arrest all further proceedings upon a certain order of the respondent, the superior court, appointing a receiver. The appointment of the receiver was made in a certain action brought by one Gillis against one Galvan and others to foreclose a mortgage executed by Galvan and wife to Gillis on a certain tract of farming land. The order appointing a receiver authorizes him to take possession of said land, with the crops growing thereon, etc. The receiver took possession in accordance with the order, and ousted petitioners, who claim to have been in possession as lessees of the mortgagor, and to have had growing crops on the land. Petitioners argue strenuously that, under the facts shown, they were owners of the growing crops; that the plaintiff in the action, being merely a mortgagee of the naked land, has no legal right, before foreclosure sale, to interfere, by receivership or otherwise, with their possession and control of said crops; and that for these reasons, and other reasons given, the appointment of the receiver was unwarranted. On the other hand, respondents contend that the asserted lease was without consideration, intended merely to delay creditors, and void. But, without examining into these questions, or determining whether or not the appointment of the receiver was proper, and authorized by law, it is sufficient to say that this petition for prohibition cannot be sustained, because petitioners have "a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy in the ordinary course of law," within the meaning of section 1103 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Agassiz v. Superior Court, 90 Cal. 101, 27 Pac. 49; Mines, etc., Soc. v. Same, 91 Cal. 101, 27 Pac. 532; Murphy v. Same, 84 Cal. 596, 24 Pac. 310; Strouse v. Police Court, 85 Cal. 49, 24 Pac. 747. Formerly—and when Havemeyer v. Superior Court, 84 Cal. 327, 24 Pac. 121, 10 L. R. A. 627, 18 Am. St. Rep. 192, was decided—there was no appeal from an order appointing a receiver, but in 1897 (St. 1897, p. 55) section 939 of the Code of Civil Procedure was amended so as to allow such appeal; and at the same time section 943 was amended so as to provide for the staying of an order appointing a receiver by an undertaking on appeal. These amendments were apparently intended to afford a remedy for prodigal, unwise, and unwarranted appointments of receivers (which seems to be a growing evil); and we think that they do afford an adequate remedy, as contemplated by said section 1103 and the decisions of this court on the subject. The fact that a question of jurisdiction arises does not change the rule as to the adequacy of the remedy by appeal. See Agassiz v. Superior Court, supra. The filing of the undertaking operates as a supersedeas, suspends all authority of the receiver under the order, withdraws from him the right to the control and possession of the property involved, and restores the same to the appealing party from whom it had been taken. Buckley v. George, 71 Miss. 580, 15 South. 46; State v. Johnson, 13 Fla. 33; Bank v. Backus, 63 Minn. 115, 65 N. W. 255; Blondheim v. Moore, 11 Md. 365. In the Minnesota case above cited the court said: "The rights and powers of the receiver being suspended, of which he was duly notified, he should have restored possession of the premises to the appellant; for, his authority to take being inoperative by the suspension, his authority to hold was equally so, both being derived from the same order. The legal effect of the appeal and supersedeas was to withdraw from the receiver the right to the possession of the property, and vest that right in the party from whom it had been taken." In the Florida case, supra, the court said: "No new rights having been created, and the duties of the receiver being superseded, the bond standing in place of the property in his hands, and he having been notified thereof by proper process, it was his duty to restore that which had come to his hands to the parties from whom it had been taken and withheld; for, his authority to take being inoperative by the suspension, his authority to hold was equally so, both being derived from the same order." Therefore the appeal and the undertaking thereon provided by our Code furnish in nearly all cases at least an adequate remedy in the ordinary course of law. The case of Los Angeles City Water Co. v. Los Angeles Co. Sup. Ct., 124 Cal. 385, 57 Pac. 216, appears, at first blush, to be an authority in support of petitioners' contention; but the first part of the syllabus, by inadvertence, gives an inaccurate statement of the decision. It was not there decided that an order improperly appointing a receiver would be annulled on certiorari "notwithstanding the petitioner has appealed therefrom," and given a stay bond, as stated in the syllabus. The short opinion in the case shows that the petition was not to review an order appointing a receiver, but to review subsequent orders which had been made by the superior court "after the petitioner had appealed to this court from an order of said superior court appointing a receiver, etc., and had given an undertaking to stay proceedings in the amount fixed by the judge of said court." The merit of the case had already been decided on the appeal from the order appointing a receiver (see 124 Cal. 368, 57 Pac. 210, 571), and the point was whether the court below, after an appeal from the order appointing a receiver accompanied by a stay bond, had jurisdiction to make certain subsequent orders. See Supreme Court Records, vol. 2047, p. 253. There might, perhaps, be exceptional facts in a case which would call for a writ of prohibition notwithstanding an appeal from an order appointing a receiver; but the general rule is as above stated, and applies to the case at bar. The petition is denied, and the proceeding dismissed.

In re BEGEROW. (Cr. 781.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 11, 1901.)

HABEAS CORPUS—MISTRIAL—DELAY IN RETRIAL—DISCHARGE.

Under Const. art. 1, § 13, guarantying to every person charged with crime a speedy trial, and Pen. Code, § 1382, providing that the court, unless for good cause shown, must dismiss the prosecution when an accused, if the trial has not been postponed on his application, has not been brought to trial within 60 days after indictment, an accused showing a delay, not caused by him, of more than 60 days after a mistrial, without good reason, is entitled to discharge on habeas corpus.

McFarland and Garoutte, JJ., dissenting.

In bank. Habeas corpus by Frederick Begerow for discharge from custody. Granted.

Bertram A. Herrington and George W. Waldorf, for petitioner. James H. Campbell, Dist. Atty., and C. Cooledge, for respondent.

TEMPLE, J. This is an application for a discharge from custody on habeas corpus by the petitioner, who is held under two informations filed in the superior court of Santa Clara county upon two separate charges for murder. The informations were filed August 15, 1900. Since then defendant has been tried three times upon one charge and once upon the other, and each trial resulted in a mistrial because the jury failed to agree. The last jury was discharged March 6, 1901. Since that period neither case has been upon the calendar for trial. Eighty-four days had elapsed since the discharge of the last jury before this petition was filed. The delay was not caused by the defendant or with his consent. No witness for the prosecution has been absent or ill. There are three departments in the superior court of Santa Clara county. During said 84 days one department has been occupied 15 days only in the trial of criminal cases, and the other two have not been engaged in criminal trials at all. On the 20th of May, 1901, and after more than 60 days had elapsed since the discharge of the last jury, the petitioner applied to the superior court, upon notice, for a dismissal of the prosecutions against him, and upon the hearing showed by competent evidence all the facts above set forth. No showing to the contrary was made. No reason was shown at that time or at any time why the cases had not been brought to trial, but the motion was nevertheless denied. The return shows simply that the sheriff held the defendant by virtue of a commitment made by a justice of the peace, dated August 9, 1900. It is conceded that the facts are correctly stated in the petition.

Section 1382, Pen. Code, provides that the court, unless good cause is shown to the contrary, must order the prosecution to be dismissed in the following cases: (1) If an indictment or information has not been filed against him within 30 days after he was committed to answer; (2) when, if the trial has not been postponed upon his application, he is not brought to trial within 60 days after filing the indictment or information. The constitution (article 1, section 13) guaranties to every person charged with crime a speedy public trial. In People v. Morino, 85 Cal. 515, 24 Pac. 892, this court said: "The legislature has provided what shall constitute a reasonable time within which a defendant shall be brought to trial." And then, after setting out section 1382, Pen. Code, it proceeds: "The court below in denying the defendant's motion said: 'The question you raise I have considered before, and, under my construction of the law, it is discretionary, and not mandatory, and I will presume the court was engaged in the trial of other causes.' We think this is not a proper construction of the law. A party charged with crime has the constitutional right to a speedy trial, and the court has no discretionary power to deny him a right so important, or to prolong his imprisonment without such trial beyond the time provided by law. The statute is imperative. The court, unless good cause to the contrary is shown, must order the prosecution to be dismissed. Here no cause for delay was shown. It was enough for the defendant to show that the time fixed by the statute, after information filed, had expired, and that the case had not been postponed on his application. If there was any good cause for holding him for a longer time without a trial, it was for the prosecution to show it. The court could not presume it. Under the facts as shown, the case should have been dismissed, and it was error to deny the motion." That case has never, so far as I know, been called in question, and it decides some important points: First. The statute is a construction of the constitutional provision, so far as to indicate what is a reasonable time within which the case should be brought to trial, in order that the constitutional guaranty may be kept. And it may be fairly interpreted to mean that this guaranty is violated whenever 60 days is allowed to elapse without a trial; there being no good reason for delay, and the defendant not consenting thereto. And, in the second place, it decides that it is sufficient for the defendant, in order to make out his case upon a motion for a dismissal in the trial court, to show that he has been detained without a trial for more than 60 days. Upon such showing the court should dismiss the case, unless good cause for detaining the defendant and for continuing the prosecution is shown on behalf of the people. There is no presumption in such case, at least in the trial court, that the court has acted regularly, or that good cause in fact exists.

It is well to remember that this case involves fundamental rights, and is of universal interest. Around it the English have waged their great battle for liberty. Without the narration of the conflicts to which it has given rise, the history of the English people would be a dull affair. The right of the government with reference to persons accused of crime has been, and is yet, a matter of great consideration. It led to the agitation which wrung from power the great charter, the petition of right, and the habeas corpus act. All the great achievements in favor of individual liberty, of which the English people are so justly proud, may be said to have come through contests over the rights of persons imprisoned for supposed crime. And justly it is deemed a matter of the utmost importance. The government cannot take property from the meanest inhabitant without just compensation paid or tendered in advance, but it takes his liberty, which it has been justly said is to some extent to take his life, upon a mere charge of crime. This is necessary, that society may be protected. But necessity is the only excuse, and to imprison beyond what is absolutely necessary is tyrannous and oppressive. And this is precisely what the state has covenanted with each inhabitant that it will not do. In this one provision of the constitution the state speaks as did the English sovereign in the great charter in 1215. It is an assurance from the sovereign, "Nec super eum ibimus, nec super eum mittimus, nisi per legale iudicium parium suorum, vel per legem terræ." Hallam says, referring to this, "From the era, therefore, of King John's charter, it must have been a clear principle of our constitution that no man can be detained in prison without trial." 2 Hist. Mid. Ages, 342. The state, then, in a criminal case is not only a party litigant, and as such bound to use diligence to prepare for trial, on pain of having its case dismissed, but it holds the defendant in custody upon this express guaranty for a speedy trial, and that it will not continue to hold him save under a legal verdict declaring him guilty; that is, without trial. In the charter, what has been called a "general jail delivery" was required in each county once each year. The act of parliament provided that a session of the court of oyer and terminer should be held twice a year in each county. The court was to inquire into the cause of the confinement of every person confined, and it was expected to try or discharge, at least on bail, all who had not been tried. The habeas corpus act (31 Car. II.) also contained provisions intended to insure speedy trials. It seems that the means of enforcing this charter, or the rights there assured, was from the first enforced through the writ of habeas corpus, which has itself been called the safeguard and the palladium of our liberties. All agree that the use of this writ was frequent after the great charter, but it is not clear whether it was in existence before. It was the refusal of this writ, or delays in its use, which led to the petition of right and to the habeas corpus act. It was soon found useful in many other respects, but it cannot be doubted that its most valued function was to enforce the rights secured by these memorable charters and laws, and, so far as I know, such use was never called in question in England. In this country it has sometimes been denied that a defendant held to answer upon a valid indictment or information can be so discharged. It was so held in this state in Ex parte Strong, 31 Pac. 574. It was there said that the allegations of the petition, if true, showed that it was the duty of the superior court to dismiss the prosecution, "but until the information is dismissed the imprisonment is lawful." In Strong v. Grant, 99 Cal. 100, 33 Pac. 733, it was said, in substance, that in passing upon a motion for a dismissal the court acted judicially, and could not be compelled by mandamus. In a concurring opinion the chief justice said relief could be had in such a case through the writ of habeas corpus, and this was finally so held by the court in Ex parte Vinton, 47 Pac. 1019.

So far, I presume, all will agree; and I have alluded to the sources from which the idea of the constitutional and statutory provisions were derived for the sake of the remaining question, the entire difficulty in regard to which, in my view, comes from certain inconsistent decisions of this court. The constitution only guaranties a speedy, public trial; the Code, in effect, that an accused person must be tried within 60 days after filing the indictment or information. If tried within that period, and a new trial is granted by the superior court, or obtained on appeal, it is contended the statute has no further application to the case. A trial has been had within the period prescribed, and the requirement of the statute has been fully satisfied. So far as the statute is concerned, he could be lawfully held for the balance of his life. And the same result could follow, although no trial was had within 60 days, if good cause were shown why it was not tried within that period, or a continuance was had beyond that time by consent of the defendant. If a material witness could not be procured within that time, or the defendant was too ill to be tried, he would thereby lose all possible benefit of the statute. For, if the letter of the statute is to control, it certainly does not require that the trial shall be had within 60 days where good cause is shown, or the defendant consents to delay. And, if it has no force after 60 days have expired, it could not apply to the cases supposed at all. And the same contention might be indulged in regard to the constitutional guaranty of a speedy trial. If the accused has been tried, although the trial resulted in a mistrial, it might be said with equal plausibility that he has had a speedy trial, and the guaranty of the government for his benefit has been kept. And is this all that is left to us of these great achievements in the direction of securing individual liberty as against the government? It must be remembered that in construing our declaration of rights there is no presumption that the government or its officers will act justly, but the contrary. These sections imply possible oppression, and are designed to enable the victim to assert his rights, even as against the government. The very first section in that chapter of our constitution asserts that the right of all men to enjoy and defend life and liberty is inalienable. Then follow 12 sections, all calculated to secure to individuals this right, as against the government. To the same end, section 13 declares the right to a speedy, public trial. This certainly has no other function than to protect those accused of crime against possible delay, caused either by willful oppression, or the neglect of the state or its officers. For, no doubt, as said by Blackstone (3 Bl. Comm. 138), "persons apprehended upon suspicion have suffered long imprisonment merely because they were forgotten." The declaration of rights differs from the great English charter, in that it is not an assurance to the individual from a sovereign, but it is a command and a limitation of power upon state officials by the people who created the formal government. Either is a recognition of the fact that the state cannot rightfully hold in prison even an accused person longer than is necessary that he may be tried, before trial had and judgment rendered. The imprisonment after the lapse of 60 days is just as oppressive, and, if unnecessary, as much a violation of the rights of the accused person, as within the 60 days. There is no reason why the legislature should be desirous of protecting the rights of an accused person for 60 days, and be indifferent to his fate afterwards. To attribute such ideas to the legislature is to charge them with folly. There is very little meaning or benefit in the statute unless it is construed as it was in People v. Morino, 85 Cal. 515, 24 Pac. 892, and in People v. Buckley, 116 Cal. 146, 47 Pac. 1009. Regarded as a provision to enforce this constitutional guaranty, its effect must be held to be that an unexcused delay of 60 days at any time to try a defendant will entitle him to have the prosecution dismissed. Without this statute, it may be doubted whether the prosecution could be dismissed as a penalty for delay. In some states I find a disposition to minimize the rights of an accused person, and it is sometimes provided simply that, unless tried, he may be discharged from custody. The terms of the constitutional provisions on this subject vary in the different states. In two or three there is no constitutional declaration upon the subject, but all, I think, have statutory provisions providing for the rights of accused persons in this regard. I cannot find that this precise question, under a statute like ours, has been decided. The view here taken was suggested in Re Murphy, 7 Wash. 257, 34 Pac. 834. See, also, State v. Kuhn, 154 Ind. 450, 57 N. E. 106, where People v. Morino, supra, was approved; also in re McMicken, 39 Kan. 406, 18 Pac. 473. This construction was assumed by this court in Ex parte Ross, 32 Cal. 109, 22 Pac. 1086. A mistrial within the period of 60 days was had in that case, and it was there assumed that another trial must be had within 60 days after the mistrial. That the defendant had been brought to trial, and a mistrial had, excused the delay until that time, and it was assumed that there must elapse 60 days during which there was no excuse for delay. And, indeed, a mistrial is not a trial, within the meaning of the constitutional or statutory provision. The fact that there has been an attempted trial may constitute the good cause which the prosecution is required to show to excuse delay; but the speedy trial which is guarantied is for the purpose of determining the guilt or innocence of the accused person, and the guaranty of the constitution and of the habeas corpus act of England are of no substantial advantage if they mean less than this. On this subject it is said (Church, Hab. Corp. § 254): "The fact that a former conviction on an indictment has been reversed, and a new trial ordered, leaves matters to stand as if there had never been any trial on the indictment. In the eye of the law, he has not been tried at all," etc. This is the reason why it is held that by a mistrial he has not been in jeopardy, and cannot avail himself of it as a defense. If he has been tried in the legal sense, he could do so.

It only remains to say that the statute does not authorize the state or its officers to hold an accused person in imprisonment unnecessarily, even for 60 days. As already stated, when the prosecution is begun the state becomes a party litigant, and as such must diligently prosecute its case. No unnecessary delay against the will of the defendant is to be allowed to it. The defendant is discharged from custody.

I dissent: McFARLAND, J.

GAROUTTE, J. (dissenting). In the foregoing opinion much is said about the great charter, the petition of right, and our own fundamental law, as forbidding the unlawful restraint of the liberty of the citizen, yet it must be borne in mind that every violation of a constitutional right of an imprisoned citizen does not form the basis of a petition for a writ of habeas corpus. If a citizen is to be discharged from custody upon writ of habeas corpus because of the denial of his constitutional right to a speedy trial, I see no reason why he should not likewise be discharged from custody if deprived of his constitutional right to a trial by a jury of 12 impartial men. A citizen is no more entitled to a speedy trial by the constitution than he is entitled to a public trial by the constitution, yet a denial of a public trial, of itself, would not justify an invocation by a defendant of a writ of habeas corpus. But these suggestions outline a much more serious question than is presented by the opinion in the case at bar, for upon a careful reading of it we find that the conclusion is built upon the statutory provision of the Penal Code (section 1382) which reads: "The court, unless good cause to the contrary is shown, must order the prosecution to be dismissed in the following cases: * * * (2) If a defendant, whose trial has not been postponed upon his application, is not brought to trial within sixty days after the finding of the indictment, or filing of the information." This statute, to my mind, is but a foundation of sand upon which to rest the conclusion declared by the court. I cannot agree to the construction given this statute. It is declared by the opinion that, when the statute says a defendant "must be brought to trial within sixty days," it means, in effect, that he must have a trial which results in a final judgment; that is, a trial which ends in a verdict of not guilty, or, if the result be a verdict of guilty, then the verdict must be one that stands the test of appeal, if an appeal be taken therefrom. In other words, it is declared that, if the trial result in a disagreement of the jury, or a verdict of guilty, which is afterwards set aside by the trial court, or the appellate court upon appeal, then in those cases the defendant has had no trial, or, more incomprehensible still, it is said he has not been "brought to trial." In reply to the question, what does this law mean when it says, "A defendant must be brought to trial within sixty days"? the answer seems naturally to follow, it means a defendant must be put upon his trial within that period of time. And that the legislature intended this to be the meaning of the law, I have no shadow of doubt. The word "trial" is defined by Webster to mean, "The formal examination of a matter in issue in a cause before a competent tribunal." The Penal Code, in a hundred different places, by titles, chapters, sections, and sentences, uses the word "trial," and in no single place does it, standing alone, have the signification suggested in the opinion of the court. The Penal Code contemplates a procedure where a defendant may be brought to trial, convicted, move for a new trial, his motion be denied, then appeal from the order denying his motion to this court, and the order reversed and the cause remanded for a new trial. Yet, after all this has been done, it surely cannot be said that the defendant in such a case has not been "brought to trial." Instances may be found in the reports of this state where a defendant has been tried and convicted upon a single charge of crime three times, and upon appeal a new trial ordered upon each conviction. I cannot bring myself to believe that such defendant has not been "brought to trial."

I also dissent from the construction given the statute in another important particular. The statute says the defendant must be brought to trial within 60 days "after the finding of the indictment or filing of the information." The opinion declares the statute means, not what it says, but it means, in effect, that the defendant must be brought to trial the first time within 60 days after the finding of the indictment or filing of the information, and thereafter within 60 days from the first trial, if that trial result in a disagreement of the jury, and, if an appeal be taken to the appellate court, then within 60 days after the return of the remittitur. Now, this court is not authorized by judicial construction to so broaden the effect of this statute. The construction here given the statute blots out all meaning to the words "indictment or information." It seems to me the court has now made a statute by construction which it feels the legislature ought to have made. Again, a contrary construction to the one here declared was given this statute 18 years ago, in People v. Giese, 63 Cal. 345,—a construction which has been approved in the very late case of People v. Lundin, 120 Cal. 308, 52 Pac. 807, and probably in still later cases. It seems to me, under these circumstances, that, if the law is not broad enough as judicially construed, it is for the legislative body to broaden it.

Putting behind me all questions as to the construction of this statute, I am still satisfied, upon general principles of law, that the remedy by writ of habeas corpus cannot be invoked in this and similar cases. As before stated, the decision in this case, reduced and condensed, is that this defendant should be discharged from custody upon a writ of habeas corpus because he has not been brought to trial within 60 days from his last trial, no good cause for the delay appearing. In other words, by virtue of this statute it is declared that his imprisonment has become illegal, and he is entitled to be discharged in this proceeding. But how may this be done, when the statute says the trial court must dismiss the prosecution upon motion, when the 60-day period has expired without a trial, and there is no good cause for the delay? That statute vests the trial court alone with power to discharge the prisoner for the reasons stated. It gives this court no added power or authority. Whatever power and authority this court has in the matter is above and beyond that statute. In the case of the petitioner, he asked the trial court, by motion, to dismiss the prosecution in his case, and invoked this statute to support the motion. The trial court denied the motion. It had jurisdiction to make that order, and it was specially enjoined upon it by the statute itself to exercise that jurisdiction. That order was a valid, binding order,—as much so as any decree or judgment made within the jurisdiction of a court of record. It forever settled the question upon which it was made, unless it was successfully assailed by appeal or other direct attack. Indeed, it was not attempted in this proceeding to review the legal soundness of the order made by the trial court; but this court has proceeded upon habeas corpus as if no such order was ever made, and has tried for itself the very question of fact that it was the duty of the trial court to try, and which it tried, and, having full and complete jurisdiction thereof, decided directly to the contrary from what this court has now decided. If the court can now do this, then any superior court in the state having jurisdiction can do the same thing, and thus a novel and interesting judicial spectacle is presented. Upon the hearing of the motion to dismiss the prosecution in the trial court, perchance the evidence was overwhelming, showing good cause for delay in bringing the defendant to trial; and upon the hearing in some other court, upon habeas corpus, the evidence may not be the same, for it is a wholly independent proceeding, and there the evidence may be strong to the effect that there is no good cause for delay, and the discharge of the defendant by that court follows. A case is then presented where a trial court, having perfect jurisdiction of the question at issue, makes an order or decree refusing to discharge the defendant, the order not even being erroneous to the weight of a hair, and then a second court, upon habeas corpus, hearing the identical issue and making a decree directly to the contrary. I am satisfied these results cannot be attained within sound legal principles.

TAYLOR et al. v. ELLENBERGER et al. (S. F. 2,476.)¹

(Supreme Court of California. July 16, 1901.)

MORTGAGES—FORECLOSURE—MODIFICATION OF JUDGMENT ON APPEAL—SALE BY COMMISSIONER—AMENDMENT OF FINDINGS—WRIT OF ASSISTANCE—SERVICE OF DEMAND.

1. Code Civ. Proc. § 957, provides that when a judgment is reversed or modified the appellate court may make restitution of all property lost by the erroneous judgment or order, so far as such restitution is consistent with the protection of a purchaser of property at a sale ordered by the judgment. The supreme court directed a superior court to modify a judgment of foreclosure for the sale of personal and realty by ordering a separate sale of each, which modified decree was entered after the real estate had been sold. Held that, the direction for the restitution of the property being discretionary, such sale would not be set aside, in the absence of any showing that the mortgagors had been injured by the sale, and that the proceeds were insufficient to pay the real-estate mortgage.

2. A contention that an order of sale directed to be executed by the sheriff was void where performed by a commissioner will not be considered on appeal, the question not having been raised in the lower court.

3. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 726, as amended in 1893, providing that a commissioner, when appointed to conduct a foreclosure sale, shall possess the powers and be subject to the duties of sheriffs in like cases, a sale conducted by a commissioner is not vitiated by the fact that the order of sale was directed to the sheriff; the direction to the sheriff being a harmless irregularity.

4. Where the supreme court ordered a judgment modified, a contention that the judgment, as modified, was erroneous, in that the trial court did not amend the findings, is without merit, since the supreme court cannot modify a judgment if it is necessary to amend the findings to support it; the findings not being in the control of such tribunal.

5. Where the commissioner's deed and demand for the premises had been presented to the general guardian of an incompetent, who was the owner of the premises, the demand was sufficient, without being made on the incompetent, and a writ of assistance will not be set aside for improper service.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeals from superior court, Santa Clara county; W. G. Lorigan, Judge.

Action by George G. Taylor and others against Arnold Ellenberger and others. From an order denying defendants' motion to set aside and vacate the sale of the mortgaged premises described in plaintiffs' complaint, from the modified judgment entered in accordance with the directions of the supreme court, and from the order granting plaintiffs' motion for a writ of assistance, the defendants prosecute three appeals. Judgment corrected and affirmed.

John B. Kerwin, for appellants. H. F. Dusing, for respondents.

CHIPMAN, C. There are three appeals in this case: First, from an order denying defendants' motion "to set aside and vacate the sale of the mortgaged premises described in plaintiffs' complaint" (this motion is made on the ground that on a former appeal of the case to this court [128 Cal. 411, 60 Pac. 1034] the judgment of foreclosure was modified by directing a different sale from that provided in the original judgment, namely, a separate sale of the real and personal property); second, from the modified judgment; and, third, from the order granting plaintiffs' motion for a writ of assistance. By stipulation the three appeals are included in, and to be heard upon, one transcript.

The original decree of foreclosure was entered February 27, 1899, and sale thereunder was ordered to be made by a commissioner named in the decree May 24, 1899, and he made the sale on July 1, 1899, in accordance with the order, and on July 3, 1900, he executed and delivered his deed to plaintiffs, as purchasers at the sale. It does not appear at what date the first appeal was taken, but it does appear that no stay bond was given, and hence there was nothing to prevent the sale from taking place. On the 28th day of April, 1900, the decision of this court was filed, directing certain modifications of the amount found to be due on the mortgage debt, and also further modifying the decree by directing the trial court to "ad-judicate separately the amounts due on the real estate described in the first two mortgages and those due on the chattel mortgage, and directing the sale of said real estate and personal property separately, each for the amount due on it. * * * And, as so modified, the judgment should stand affirmed." The modified decree was entered June 20, 1900. The real estate, however, had already been sold, and was purchased by plaintiffs, as above stated, but the personal property was not sold. It is this sale which defendants seek to set aside by their first motion. Defendants have shown no injury resulting to them from the sale. The restitution which the court may make under section 957, Code Civ. Proc., when the judgment or order is reversed or modified, is not mandatory, but rests in the discretion of the court. Yndart v. Den, 125 Cal. 85, 57 Pac. 761. The only showing made by defendants in support of the motion was that this court had modified the original decree; but no facts are set forth in the affidavit, nor does anything elsewhere appear, from which it can be seen that any injury has come to defendants by the sale, or that they would be benefited by setting it aside. Some question is raised as to whether the lower court modified the original decree as directed, but, conceding that in some respects the modified judgment does not conform strictly to the directions given by this court, the fact cannot avail defendants on this motion, without it is made to appear that the judgment, when modified as is claimed by defendants it should be, would entitle them to have the sale set aside. No such showing is made. There is no pretense that the real property which was sold failed to bring its full value, or that there was any unfairness in the sale, or that on resale it would bring more than it sold for at the first sale. Nor does it appear that in selling the real property to pay the entire judgment, including the note secured by the chattel mortgage, the price paid was sufficient to pay the real-estate mortgages in full. Unless the proceeds of this sale were applied in part payment also of the chattel mortgage, we cannot see that defendants suffered injury, even though it was error, as was held here on the first appeal, to sell the real property in order to pay the judgment, which in fact included the chattel-mortgage debt. The facts show that the amount realized from the sale of the real estate was less than the amount due on the real-estate mortgages. Defendants have not brought themselves within the principles laid down in Barnhart v. Edwards, 128 Cal. 572, 61 Pac. 176, and cases there cited, and are not entitled to have the sale set aside. It is further claimed that the order of sale is directed to the sheriff, and as it was not executed by that officer, but by a commissioner, the sale is void and should be set aside. This was not made a ground of defendants' motion to vacate the sale, and is presented here for the first time. But, aside from this fact, the decree directed the sale to be made by a commissioner who was named therein, and the decree was copied in the body of the order of sale and formed part of it, thus plainly showing that the order of the court was intended to be executed by the commissioner, as in fact it was; and his authority to act is found in section 726, Code Civ. Proc., as amended in 1893. The Code provides that the commissioner, when appointed, shall possess the powers and be subject to the duties of sheriffs in like cases. At most, the direction of the order of sale to the sheriff was a harmless irregularity. McDermot v. Barton, 106 Cal. 194, 39 Pac. 538.

2. Concerning the modified judgment, which is claimed to be excessive, we can discover no error, except that in the attorney's fee allowed on the chattel mortgage, which should not exceed 25 per cent. of the amount due at the date of the original judgment, which would be $66.55, instead of $75, as stated in the modified judgment. Defendants make the point that the modified judgment must be reversed because the trial court did not amend the findings, and therefore the modified decree is without support. This court did not direct any amendment of findings. Indeed, if any amendment had been necessary to the modifications, the judgment would have been reversed, and not modified. This court does not direct amendments of judgments where they would conflict with the findings. It can neither make findings nor amend findings.

3. Inasmuch as the sale cannot be set aside, plaintiffs had an undoubted right to a writ of assistance on proper proceedings. No question is raised as to the regularity of the steps taken, except that it is claimed that the commissioner's deed and demand were not served on Arnold Ellenberger, the incompetent, who was the owner of the real property described in the deed. It appeared in the affidavit served with the notice of the application for the writ that one E. Ellenberger was the guardian of the person and estate of Arnold Ellenberger, an incompetent person, and that the said guardian was in possession of the premises, and that George G. Taylor, one of the plaintiffs, presented to the said guardian, both as guardian and individually, the commissioner's deed, and demanded of him possession of the premises. E. Ellenberger appeared and answered in the action as general guardian throughout all the proceedings. It was early determined by this court that a general guardian may appear in an action for his ward without personal service first made on the latter. Redmond v. Peterson, 102 Cal. 595, 36 Pac. 923, 41 Am. Rep. 204, and cases cited. At the hearing of the motion for the writ, counsel "appeared specially for defendants." The motion was heard on the showing made by plaintiffs, and the writ was ordered after argument of counsel on both sides. We think the writ was properly granted. The modified judgment should be corrected in the particular pointed out, and, when so corrected, should, with the orders, be affirmed.

We concur: COOPER, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the trial court is directed to correct the modified judgment by allowing $66.55 attorney's fee on the chattel-mortgage note, instead of $75; and thus corrected it is affirmed, as are also the orders appealed from.

PEOPLE v. SIMPTON. (Cr. 719.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 16, 1901.)

PERJURY—INDICTMENT—SUFFICIENCY.

In a prosecution under Pen. Code, § 118, providing that every person who, having taken an oath that he will testify truly before any competent tribunal, in any of the cases where an oath may by law be administered, willfully states as true any material matter which he knows to be false, is guilty of perjury, an indictment alleging that the defendant, before a certain notary public in and for a certain city and county, duly authorized to administer oaths, did then and there willfully, falsely, and feloniously swear, take oath, and make his affidavit and state matters material in said proceeding as true, which he knew to be false, and did then and there depose and swear in substance as follows, etc., does not charge the offense of perjury, in that it does not show that defendant was sworn to testify truly, or that any party administered an oath to him.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Carroll Cook, Judge.

G. W. Simpton was indicted for perjury. From an order sustaining his demurrer to the indictment, the people appeal. Affirmed.

They L. Ford, Atty. Gen., and Lewis F. Byington, Dist. Atty., for the People. D. J. Murphy and J. H. Budd, for respondent.

COOPER, C. This appeal is by the people from an order sustaining defendant's demurrer to the indictment. The indictment attempted to charge the defendant with the crime of perjury in making a certain affidavit in the estate of James G. Fair, deceased, in a proceeding entitled "Petition of Nettie R. Fair for a Family Allowance." The main contention in support of the ruling of the lower court is that the indictment fails to show that an oath was taken by, or administered to, defendant. The indictment is quite lengthy, and it is necessary to state herein only the portion of it bearing upon the point under discussion, nor is it necessary to discuss other questions raised by counsel, for the reason that the demurrer was properly sustained upon the grounds herein given. The part of the indictment material here is as follows: "And the jurors aforesaid, on their said oaths, do say that on or about the said 12th day of August, 1899, at the said city and county of San Francisco, state of California, the said G. W. Simpton, before one Harry J. Lask, a notary public in and for said city and county of San Francisco, state of California, residing therein, and duly commissioned and sworn, and then and there duly authorized by law to administer oaths, and authorized by law to administer an oath to the said G. W. Simpton, did then and there willfully, corruptly, knowingly, falsely, and feloniously swear, take oath, and make his affidavit and state matters material in said proceeding as true which he knew to be false, and did then and there depose and swear in substance as follows." The Penal Code provides: "Every person who, having taken an oath that he will testify, declare, depose, or certify truly before any competent tribunal, officer, or person, in any of the cases in which such an oath may by law be administered, willfully and contrary to such oath states as true any material matter which he knows to be false, is guilty of perjury." Section 118. It is evident, from the definition of "perjury" contained in said section, that it is of the very essence of the offense that the person alleged to have committed the crime must have been first duly sworn that he would "testify, depose, or certify truly" before a competent tribunal, officer, or person. There is no pretense of a statement that defendant was sworn to "testify truly" in said matter. He must have been first duly sworn to "testify or depose truly" before he could have been guilty of perjury in not testifying truly. The words "swear, take oath, and make his affidavit" are not equivalent to an averment that he was "duly sworn to testify truly." It is not even alleged that any party administered an oath to defendant. If he "took oath" by having it administered by some other notary public or magistrate in the presence of Lask, or if he took it by solemn vow made to himself, it might be true that he took oath before Lask. It is essential that an indictment shall state every fact and circumstance necessary to constitute the offense charged in direct and positive language. If not in the words of the statute, it must be by plain and direct words which are equivalent. It must clearly appear upon the face of the indictment that a crime has been committed. No imagination or presumption can be called in to aid a defective indictment. If the facts stated may be true, and yet may or may not constitute a crime, the presumption is that no crime has been charged. People v. Terrell, 127 Cal. 100, 59 Pac. 836.

Applying the test to this indictment, it will be readily seen that it does not charge an offense. Some other than Lask might have administered the oath, and yet the indictment be true. Defendant might have taken an oath to the effect that he would not testify truly, and the indictment be true because it is not even intimated that he took an oath to testify truly. At common law it was necessary for the indictment to allege that the defendant "was sworn and took his corporal oath before [naming the officer], on the Holy Gospel of God, to speak the truth, the whole truth, and nothing by the truth, of and concerning the matter then depending." 2 Whart. Prec. Indict. pp. 6, 7. St. 1 & 2 Vict. c. 105, changed the rule by providing that the oath might be administered "in form and with such ceremonies as such person may declare to be binding"; but this statute did not dispense with the necessity of administering an oath to the party. Our Code has recognized the modern tendency to regard the conscientious scruples of all persons by providing that "the term oath as used in the last section includes an affirmation and every other mode authorized by law of attesting the truth of that which is stated." Pen. Code, § 119. But, although the term "oath" is defined, there is no provision dispensing with the necessity of being sworn to testify, declare, depose, or certify truly before a competent tribunal, board, or person; and all indictments or informations for perjury in this state, in the cases to which our attention has been called, state that the defendant was duly sworn before some competent tribunal, officer, or person to testify, declare, depose, or certify truly. People v. Ah Bean, 77 Cal. 12, 18 Pac. 815; Same v. De Carlo, 124 Cal. 463, 57 Pac. 383; Same v. Rodley (Cal.) 63 Pac. 351. In People v. Dunlap, 113 Cal. 74, 45 Pac. 183, the indictment charged that the county assessor had authority to administer oaths, and that defendant "did then and there willfully, corruptly, falsely, and feloniously testify, declare, depose, swear, and certify, * * * in a case in which said oath was by law properly administered, * * * after having taken an oath that she would testify truly, she willfully, falsely, and contrary to such oath, corruptly and feloniously swore and testified to said false and material facts as aforesaid." It was held that the indictment did not state facts sufficient to constitute a public offense, and that it was not in fact stated that the assessor or any other person did in fact administer an oath to her. In the opinion it is said: "In an indictment for perjury it must appear that the defendant was sworn, and that the person who administered the oath to him had authority therefor." In U. S. v. McCaughy (D. C.) 33 Fed. 168, the indictment alleged that defendant did "depose and swear," and that "said oath, taken as aforesaid, was then and there duly administered." The court sustained a demurrer to the indictment, and in the opinion said: "In an indictment for perjury it must be directly stated in some form of apt words that the defendant was sworn. It is not sufficient that it appears by inference or argument. * * * One may swear who is not duly sworn. In one case the oath, so to speak, is self-imposed, and the swearer incurs no legal liability thereby, while in the other the oath is administered by a person having authority so to do, and the affiant takes it subject to the pains and penalties for perjury." In the case of State v. Divoll, 44 N. H. 142, the authorities and precedents are fully examined and stated, and it is said: "That the party was sworn must be alleged distinctly and positively. It is not enough to state it argumentatively, or to make such a statement as by inference implies that a party was sworn, however strong this implication may be." It follows that the order should be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; GRAY, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order is affirmed.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; J. W. Hughes, Judge.

Action by Ralph Granger against J. A. Sheriff and others. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Luce & Sloane, for appellants. Frederick W. Stearns, for respondent.

GRAY, C. This is an action to foreclose a mortgage given to secure the payment of a note for the principal sum of $48,500, besides interest and attorney's fees. The plaintiff had judgment, and defendants appeal therefrom, and urge three grounds of reversal, which we will notice in their order:

1. The sufficiency of the summons is challenged, and a motion was made to quash the same on the ground that it did not conform to the requirements of section 407, Code Civ. Proc., in that it did not contain a notice that, unless the defendants appear and answer, "the plaintiff will take judgment for any money or damages demanded in the complaint as arising upon contract, or will apply to the court for any other relief demanded in the complaint." The notice contained in the summons is as follows: "And you are hereby notified that, unless you appear and answer as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the court for the relief demanded in the complaint." Under said section 407, Code Civ. Proc., before its amendment in 1897, there can be no question that a notice in a summons in the above form, in a foreclosure suit, would have been proper and sufficient. We do not think that the amendment to the section had the effect to make a summons in such a suit insufficient merely because the notice in it is not worded in the alternative. This has already been held, in effect, in the recent and well-considered case of Stanquist v. Hebbard, 122 Cal. 268, 54 Pac. 841, wherein it is said: "In deciding that a summons which follows the language of section 407 is not void, we do not intimate that a summons based on a complaint on contract for money or damages, or a summons based upon a complaint asking for equitable relief, would be void if not worded in the alternative. In one case a notice that, unless the defendant appears and answers, the plaintiff will take judgment for any money or damages demanded in the complaint as arising upon contract, and in the other case a notice that, unless the defendant so appears and answers, the plaintiff will apply to the court for the relief demanded in the complaint, would substantially comply with the statute." It is objected by appellant that this is mere dictum, and so, indeed, it seems to be; but it may be observed that it is the dictum of the court in banc, and is supported by the reasoning of the opinion, wherein it is clearly pointed out that, under the statute as amended, the summons leaves the defendant in the dark as to the nature of the cause of

GRANGER v. SHERIFF et al. (L. A. 797.)

SUFFICIENCY OF SUMMONS—INSANITY OF DEFENDANT—APPOINTMENT OF GUARDIAN AD LITEM—SETTING CASE FOR TRIAL.

1. A summons notifying the defendants that, unless they appeared and answered, the plaintiff "will apply to the court for the relief demanded in the complaint," is not void, as not being in the alternative, in compliance with Code Civ. Proc. § 407, providing that the summons shall notify the defendant that the plaintiff will take judgment for any money or damages demanded in the complaint, or will apply to the court for any other relief demanded.

2. Where a defendant, after appearance by attorneys and answering, was adjudged insane pending the trial, the appointment of a guardian ad litem on the hearing was not rendered void by the fact that no notice had been given her or her attorneys of record of the motion for the appointment.

3. Where a guardian ad litem appointed on the day set for the trial, appearing specially, objected to proceeding with the trial, for lack of time to prepare, and the case was adjourned three days by order of the court, without objection, such appearance will be deemed a waiver of the five-day notice of the setting of the case for trial required by Code Civ. Proc. § 594, as amended in 1899.

action, as well as to the relief sought; and the copy of the complaint which is required in all cases as part of the service of process must be looked to for much of the information required by defendant. It seems, then, that the summons, aside from the copy of the complaint, being in the alternative, affords the defendant little or no notice or information, where it follows the statute strictly, as to what will be done in case of a default. The defendant, however, cannot be heard to complain because the summons goes further than the requirement of the statute, and does in fact furnish some definite information as to what the plaintiff will do in case of a failure on the part of defendant to appear and answer. The copy of the complaint is still left him, and he may refer to that, and treat the notice in the summons as supererogatory, if he so desires. We therefore think the "dictum" referred to contains a correct statement of a rule applicable to the case at bar.

2. Pending the litigation, and after she had appeared and answered, but before the trial, and on the 11th day of November, 1898, Eliza Sheriff, one of the defendants, was adjudged to be insane, and ordered committed to the insane asylum. Thereafter the case was set for trial for April 13, 1899; and on that day, on calling the case, the court adjourned the trial to the following day at 10 o'clock a. m., at which time counsel for plaintiff, without previous notice thereof having been given, moved the court for the appointment of a guardian ad litem for said insane defendant. Thereupon Luce and Sloane, attorneys of record for said defendant, appearing specially for that purpose, objected to the hearing of the motion and to the appointment of a guardian on the ground that no notice had been "served on said Eliza Sheriff, or upon her attorneys of record in this case." The objection was overruled, and W. A. Sloane, of the said firm of Luce & Sloane, was appointed, and accepted the position of guardian ad litem, subject to the objections and exceptions taken to the power of the court to make such appointment. There is no requirement of notice prior to the appointment of a guardian ad litem to be found in the statutes, so far as we have been able to ascertain, and it has been intimated in at least one case that no such notice is necessary. In Crawford v. Neal, 56 Cal. 321, it is said that "applications for such an appointment are made ex parte," and section 373, Code Civ. Proc., is cited as confirming this statement. That section shows how a guardian "must be appointed," and, as it does not provide for any notice, we think that no notice is required, and that the appointment was properly made on the application of the plaintiff, and without notice. See, also, section 372, Code Civ. Proc., and

3. On said 14th day of April, and after his appointment as guardian ad litem and his acceptance thereof, W. A. Sloane, as guardian ad litem for said defendant Eliza Sheriff, appearing specially for that purpose, objected to proceeding with the trial on the ground that said defendant was adjudged insane, and was committed to and was still in the insane asylum, "and that said guardian ad litem has not had sufficient time to prepare for the trial, or to investigate and determine his rights and duties as such guardian ad litem," whereupon, by order of the court, further hearing of said action was adjourned to Monday, April 17, 1899, at 10 o'clock a. m. On the last-mentioned day and hour the said guardian again "objects to the trial of this action at this time," and moves the court that the order setting said cause for trial be vacated and set aside on the ground that said action has been set down for trial without five days' notice or any notice thereof to said defendant Eliza Sheriff, or to her guardian ad litem. To this motion the court made reply: "If you want time for preparation for trial, I will give it to you. If you do not, we will proceed with the trial." To which said guardian replied: "This is all the appearance I care to make,—the one I make by motion here,—and I ask that the statutory time of notice be given." The motion was denied, to which the guardian excepted. An affidavit was filed, showing that no notice had been given. We think the appearance of the guardian as such on April 14th, the day to which the trial had been postponed, and his objection to then going into the trial on the grounds then stated by him, constituted a waiver on his part, and on behalf of his ward, of the five-days notice of the setting of the case required by section 594, Code Civ. Proc., as amended in 1899. The objection that he then made was in effect a request or motion to the court to continue the trial of the case, and that the court so understood it is evidenced by the fact that it at once made an order continuing it for three days. To the time fixed in this order no objection was made, and no suggestion of a desire to have the order setting the case for trial vacated came from the guardian at the date of this request. The case, then, is not different from what it would be if it had been set for trial for the 17th of April on the guardian's own motion. It was within the power of the guardian to waive the notice, and we hold that he did waive it. The judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; CHIPMAN, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is affirmed.

PARKS v. MOCKENHAUPT. (L. A. 857.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 24, 1901.)

EXECUTORS—PLEDGES OF PERSONALTY—LOAN AS INDIVIDUAL.

Where an administrator borrowed money in his individual capacity, pledging certificates of stock belonging to the estate, he could maintain replevin therefor in his official capacity, though the money was used in part to pay debts against the estate.

Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; John L. Campbell, Judge.

Replevin by A. Samuel Parks, executor, against Louis Mockenhaupt. From a judgment in plaintiff's favor, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Dockweiler & Carter, for appellant. A. J. Sherer and G. P. Adams, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This action was brought in the nature of replevin to recover certain personal property consisting of a certificate representing 10 shares of water stock. The facts material to the consideration of the case are these: This property came into the possession of Parks as executor of the last will and testament of the aforesaid deceased. Pending administration he borrowed $2,000 of defendant, giving as security therefor certain mortgages upon his interest in several parcels of real estate devised to him by the aforesaid last will and testament. As additional security, he delivered over to the possession of defendant the aforesaid certificate of stock. Plaintiff borrowed this money, as he represented to the defendant, for the purpose of paying debts resting against the estate of deceased, and in fact did apply $700 of it to that purpose. Subsequently, after demand made, he brought the present action to recover from defendant the possession of this certificate of stock. Judgment went against defendant, and the appeal is from that judgment, and also from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

From the standpoint of plaintiff as an individual, this transaction upon its face bears the marks of being unconscionable. But the action is purely one of law. No equities are relied upon in the pleadings, and the appeal is without legal merit. Parks individually had no authority to pledge this certificate of stock to defendant. It was the property of the estate, and he could no more pledge it to defendant than he could have sold it to him. Neither is there any pretense that he borrowed the money in his official capacity, even if the statute allowed him so to do. It is claimed that the money was borrowed in part to pay the debts resting against the estate of deceased, and that, $700 of the amount being applied to that purpose, such amount should be declared a lien upon the stock, and redelivery only be had after the extinguishment of that lien. As before suggested, there is no affirmative defense in the nature of an equitable estoppel or otherwise set out in the answer, and the solution of the question presented by the record is wholly dependent upon the fact as to where the title to this property rests, for here the right of possession follows the title. Even conceding the pleadings in this proceeding justified evidence upon the issue as to this right of lien, still the court is unable to see how a lien could be declared within the law. This certificate of stock being property of the estate, it must remain in the estate as assets thereof, subject to the claims of creditors and fees and expenses of administration. The allegations of the complaint are amply sufficient to support the judgment. For the foregoing reasons, the judgment and order are affirmed.

RAMUS et al. v. HUMPHREYS. (Sac. 779.)
(Supreme Court of California. July 24, 1901.)

MINING CLAIM—QUIETING TITLE—DEFENSES.

Where the plaintiffs in a suit to quiet title to mining claim had been in actual possession for a number of years, a defense that a claim prior to plaintiffs' had never been abandoned cannot be urged, the defendant not claiming title under such prior claimant; Civ. Code, § 1600, providing that occupancy for any period confers title except as to those claiming by prescription, transfer, will, or succession.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1.
Appeal from superior court, Siskiyou county; J. S. Beard, Judge.

Suit by Lawrence Ramus and others against Charles E. Humphreys to quiet title. From a judgment in favor of plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Warren & Taylor, for appellant. J. F. Farraher, J. F. Lodge, and J. D. Fairchild, for respondents.

SMITH, C. The plaintiffs sued to quiet title to the mining claim described in the complaint. From the special verdict, adopted by the court, it appears that the land in controversy, at the date of the act of congress granting to the state the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections, and at the date of the approval of the United States survey, was mineral land, and known to be such; that the plaintiffs or predecessors made a valid location of it May 7, 1893, and have ever since been, and now are, in possession of the land; and that the defendant afterwards—April 19, 1894—made an attempted location of a portion of the land, but the same was invalid. It is further found that one Hicks made a valid location of part of the claim January 3, 1893,—which was prior to plaintiffs' location,—but that before the latter event he abandoned the claim. The defendant, it appears, afterwards obtained a patent from the state purporting to grant certain government subdivisions, which included the land, but it is, in effect, admitted that the patent conveyed no title. Hermocilla v. Hubbell, 89 Cal. 5, 26 Pac. 611. The sole point made in the case is that the finding as to the abandonment of the mining claim by Hicks is not justified by the evidence. This, however, is a point that cannot be successfully urged by the defendant, who does not claim under Hicks. The plaintiffs were in the actual possession of the land when the suit was commenced, and had been for many years; and this, as against the defendant, who had no title, was sufficient to maintain the action. Civ. Code, § 1006. I advise that the judgment and order denying the defendant's motion for new trial be affirmed.

We concur: COOPER, C.; CHIPMAN, C.

PER OURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order denying the defendant's motion for new trial are affirmed.

(Supreme Court of California. July 24, 1901.)

MORTGAGE—EXTENSION OF NOTE—DEFAULT IN INTEREST—FORECLOSURE—TIME.

1. Where a mortgage is executed by both husband and wife, it will prevail over a homestead claim thereafter executed by the wife, and recorded prior to the recording of the mortgage, since Civ. Code, § 1241, subd. 4, providing that the homestead is exempted from forced sale except under mortgages on the premises recorded before the declaration of homestead was filed for record, has no application to such a mortgage.

2. A mortgage note for one year provided for payment of interest monthly, that on default of any payment the payee might declare the whole due and foreclose, and that, if the principal was not paid when due, the note should continue another year, at the option of the payee. Before the second year was ended, but while there was default in the interest for several months, the payee commenced action to foreclose. Held, that the action was not prematurely brought.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; Joseph W. Hughes, Judge.

Action by Mary D. Kleinsorge against Albert F. Kleinsorge and his wife, Mamie S. Kleinsorge. From a judgment for plaintiff, Mamie S. Kleinsorge appeals. Affirmed.

W. A. Gett, for appellant. W. E. Kleinsorge and L. T. Hatfield, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, C. Action to foreclose a mortgage. Defendant Albert F. Kleinsorge made default. Plaintiff had judgment against both defendants, from which, and from the order denying her motion for a new trial, defendant Mamie L. Kleinsorge appeals. The note and mortgage were executed by both defendants, who are husband and wife. The note was dated August 1, 1896, and was drawn payable one year after date, with interest payable monthly. The note contained the provision that, if the interest was not paid as stipulated in the note, "the whole note may, at the option of the holder, without notice to the makers thereof, be treated as due and collectible." It also contained the following provision: "If this note is not paid at maturity, it is hereby renewed from year to year, at the option of the holder, until paid, and during such year the maker shall not have the right to pay the same." The mortgage was not recorded until August 30, 1897, and meantime, to wit, August 28, 1897, defendant Mamie L. Kleinsorge executed and caused to be recorded a homestead on the mortgaged premises. Two questions are presented: (1) Should the mortgage prevail over the homestead claim? (2) Was the action prematurely brought?

1. The first question is answered in the affirmative by the decision in Duncan v. Curry, 124 Cal. 106, 56 Pac. 898, citing to like effect Downing v. Le Du, 82 Cal. 471, 23 Pac. 202. Appellant concedes that Duncan v. Curry is adverse to her contention, but she asks that the question be re-examined in the light of other cases which she seems to think are out of harmony with Duncan v. Curry, and also because that case, in her opinion, was not rightly decided. Attention is drawn to Campan v. Molle, 124 Cal. 415, 57 Pac. 208. In that case plaintiff had loaned defendants the money with which to complete the purchase of certain land, taking their note for the amount; and it was alleged that defendants promised to secure plaintiff by a mortgage upon the land when they should obtain title thereto, and that after so obtaining the title they refused to execute the mortgage. Plaintiff then brought his action on the note and obtained judgment, prior to which, however, a homestead was filed on the premises. The action was to set aside the homestead and subject the land to the payment of the judgment. It was urged on the appeal that plaintiff was entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the vendor of the land. But the opinion shows that the plaintiff failed to state a case for a vendor's lien, and states that the transaction "was merely a loan of money upon their agreement to give him security." What was said as to subdivision 4, § 1241, Civ. Code, had reference to its application on the assumption that the agreement constituted an equitable mortgage. The decision, however, turned on the fact that plaintiff had elected to look to the personal obligation of defendants, instead of the security promised by them, and it was said that, "if the plaintiff held an equitable mortgage upon the premises [which it is not determined in the case that he had], his failure to enforce it in that action [the action on the note] had the effect to deprive him of such security." Nothing in the case is inconsistent with what was held in Duncan v. Curry. Bank v. Oberhaus, 125 Cal. 320, 57 Pac. 1070, was decided mainly on the sufficiency of the acknowledgments of the mortgages. These mortgages were acknowledged and recorded, one in 1892, and the other in 1893, and foreclosure was begun and lis pendens filed October 19, 1895. The mortgagors lived on the premises prior to the mortgages, but they filed no homestead declaration until November 4, 1895. Under this state of facts, subdivision 4, § 1241, was referred to. The question in Duncan v. Curry was not involved. Glas v. Glas, 114 Cal. 566, 46 Pac. 667, was the case of a homestead filed by one of the spouses after the recording of the mortgage, and comes clearly within subdivision 4 of the above section. Trust Co. v. Kauffman, 108 Cal. 214, 41 Pac. 467, was the case of a homestead filed by the husband, whose wife was living, and comes within the category of cases cited in Duncan v. Curry. We have been unable to discover in any of the cases cited by appellant any intimation that the conclusion reached in Duncan v. Curry was ill advised or contrary to a fair construction of section 1241. With the grounds of abstract justice so strongly urged,—i. e. with the wisdom of the law as construed by this court,—we cannot concern ourselves. The only question is, was the section rightly interpreted in Duncan v. Curry? We cannot now see any fault either in the reasoning or in the conclusion. Re-examination of the transcript in Downing v. Le Du, supra, shows that the homestead was declared and filed before the mortgage was given, which, of course, destroys the force of the case as supporting Duncan v. Curry. The latter case, however, rests, not on Downing v. Le Du, but upon its own facts, clearly presented and carefully considered.

2. Was the action prematurely brought? It is conceded by appellant that it was competent for the parties to provide for a renewal of the note by its own terms, citing Bank v. Bandman, 120 Cal. 220, 52 Pac. 583; but it is contended that, if the makers of the note had not the right to pay it within any year for which it was extended, reciprocally they had the right to demand that it be not enforced within that year, or, in other words, that it could not be deemed payable during that year. The note was dated August 1, 1896, payable one year after date. It was by its terms renewed for 1897, 1898, and from August 1, 1899. Interest was payable monthly, and was paid to and including January 1, 1899, but no later; and the note provided that in default of payment of interest "the whole note may, at the option of the holder, without notice to the makers thereof, be treated as due and collectible." A fair construction of the note is that, if renewed, it shall, as to the makers, run for the full year,—i. e. that they shall not have the right to pay it sooner unless consented to by the holder; but the renewal also renewed the promise to pay interest monthly, and also renewed the option to the holder to treat the whole note as due if interest was not so paid. But for this provision of the note the renewal for a year would support appellant's contention. With that provision, the renewed note stood on the same footing as in the first or any subsequent year, and the option to treat it as due and payable on default in payment of interest was available to the holder. The judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: GRAY, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order are affirmed.

In re SCHANDONEY'S ESTATE. (L. A. 1,035.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 23, 1901.)

GUARDIAN AND WARD—INVESTMENT OF FUNDS—ORDER OF COURT—PROTECTION OF GUARDIAN—FINDINGS.

1. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1792, authorizing the court on application to direct the guardian to invest his ward's money, an order of court directing a guardian to loan funds of his ward on terms and security therein stated will absolve the guardian from all liability on account of the loan being made on insufficient security.

2. Where a guardian, after investigation, defers the foreclosure of a mortgage of his ward, believing the chance of collecting the amount due equally as good as to foreclose and take a deficiency judgment wholly uncollectible, his omission to act by immediate foreclosure is not such negligence as warrants charging him with the mortgage debt and interest.

3. In a proceeding for the settlement of a guardian's account it is not necessary that findings be made.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Lucien Shaw, Judge.

Proceeding in the matter of the estate of Mary Schandoney, a minor. From an order settling the final account of William T. Kendrick as guardian, and denying his motion for a new trial, he appeals. Modified.

W. S. Knott and Wm. T. Kendrick, for appellant. Oliver Miles and Charles A. McKelvey, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. The controversy relates to a single item of $1,200 and accrued interest. On April 4, 1895, appellant had in his hands said sum of money, and on that day, upon his petition, an order was made by the superior court directing the guardian to lend said sum to one W. P. McIntosh for the term of three years, to be secured by a mortgage upon 40 acres of land described in the petition, said sum to bear interest at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum, payable quarterly. The loan was made, and the mortgage executed and recorded. The note and mortgage provided that, if the interest should not be paid quarterly, the whole sum of principal and interest should immediately become due at the option of the holder of the note. This loan was credited to the guardian in his first annual account, filed December 14, 1895, and was allowed. The ward became of age May 15, 1900, and in the report accompanying his final account, filed shortly thereafter, the guardian referred to the note and mortgage, saying that: "The note is due, and should be collected. The payor of the note has made the guardian believe, by fair promises from time to time, that he would pay the note, and this has caused the guardian not to foreclose." Exceptions were filed to said account, in which more detailed information was sought as to said note and mortgage, the value of the mortgaged property, the solvency of the debtor, etc., and an additional report was filed, which was also excepted to, and a trial was thereupon had. No findings were made except those incorporated in the order settling the account, to the effect that the account was true except as to said item of $1,200 claimed in the first annual account of the guardian filed December 14, 1895, for said sum loaned to McIntosh; that the value of the land described in the mortgage on which the money was loaned was at the date of the loan $1,200, and no more, and at the present time is not worth more than $400; and that the ward had offered to transfer to the guardian all her interest in said note and mortgage. The court thereupon charged the guardian with the money loaned, $1,200, and interest thereon, $532, but made the payment conditional upon the transfer of the note and mortgage by the ward to the guardian, and, in case she refused to do so, that the guardian should be discharged upon payment of 74 cents, a balance resulting from other items.

1. It is contended by the ward that the order made April 4, 1895, directing the loan to be made, is void, and that, therefore, the guardian is responsible for having improvidently made the loan upon insufficient security. This contention is based upon the assertion that it does not appear that notice was given of the hearing of the petition upon which the order was based. The order recites, however, that, the petition "coming on regularly for hearing before the court, and it appearing to the court by the evidence submitted upon said hearing that it is for the best interests of the estate of said minor that said loan should be made, * * * and the security for the said loan specified is ample, it is ordered," etc. The argument is that the petition and order were filed the same day, and therefore no notice could have been given. Section 1792, Code Civ. Proc., provides: "The court, on the application of the guardian, or any person interested in the estate of the ward, after such notice to persons interested therein as the court shall direct, may authorize," etc. There was no legal obligation or duty resting upon the guardian to give notice to any one unless directed to do so by the court. The statute does not name, or in any manner designate or describe, the "persons interested," or prescribe a notice to be given in a particular manner, and the presumption is that the court discharged its official duty, and acted within the lawful exercise of its jurisdiction. Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subds. 15, 16. "Nothing shall be intended to be out of the jurisdiction of a superior court but that which expressly appears to be so. Hence, though the existence of any jurisdictional fact may not be affirmed upon the record, it will be presumed upon a collateral attack that the court, if of general jurisdiction, acted correctly, and with due authority; and its judgment will be as valid as though every fact necessary to jurisdiction affirmatively appeared." Freem. Judgm. § 124, and cases there cited. See, also, In re Eikerenkotter's Estate, 126 Cal. 54, 58 Pac. 370. In Re Guardianship of Cardwell, 55 Cal. 141, it is said, referring to said section 1792, Code Civ. Proc.: "An order for investment or other management, thus obtained, would protect the guardian, even if misfortune were to follow; but, where he acts upon his own judgment, he is held to a more strict accountability." In Re Carver's Estate, 118 Cal. 73, 50 Pac. 22, it is said: "By securing consent of the court, he could have invested the ward's estate without risk to himself. This he failed to do, but assumed to act upon his own responsibility. Under such circumstances he is held to strict accountability,"—citing In re Guardianship of Cardwell, supra. So far, therefore, as the making of the loan is concerned, the order of the court directing it is a full and complete exoneration of appellant. There could be no purpose in securing such order, nor any reason for the enactment of the statute authorizing it, if it did not afford protection.

2. The ward, in her exceptions to her guardian's report, alleges that it was his duty, upon the nonpayment of the first quarter's interest upon said note, to proceed at once to foreclose said mortgage, and out of the other property of McIntosh to collect such deficiency as might have remained unpaid; that, while she makes no charge of any dishonest or other improper motives on the part of said guardian, she alleges that he imprudently, and without the exercise of ordinary or proper care or vigilance allowed himself to be imposed upon by the empty promises of the debtor; that the debtor is insolvent, and has left the state; that a foreclosure would not realize more than the costs and expenses of foreclosure, the payment of taxes and attorney's fees, and that the said water stock is of no value. The testimony of the guardian as to his efforts to collect the debt is quite full, and to the effect that he called upon the debtor frequently for the payment of the interest; that he was met with repeated promises, based upon "prospects," which failed one after another; that he appeared to have considerable property, which, upon investigation, he found to be incumbered; that about six or eight months after the note was executed he met Mr. Sibley, a real-estate agent, whom he knew to be reliable, and he gave "rather a gloomy prospect for selling any property then at that time"; that he knew the mortgaged property; that he thought if it was just then put up under the hammer it would not pay the debt; that things were looking bad, but thought they would soon improve, and that eventually it would be all right; and from that and other information his judgment was that, if he foreclosed, they would have to take the property, and a deficiency judgment could not be collected; that about the time the note matured he took Mr. Sibley to see the land, when he came to the same conclusion, but he thought that, "if we kept along until the rains should come, I could probably make the money out of it"; that he obtained information from Mr. Scott and others that satisfied him that he could not collect a deficiency judgment; that he would be no better off if he foreclosed, and concluded it was just as well to wait and permit him to raise the money out of his other resources to pay it; that McIntosh explained to him that he was developing water above this property; that there was a shortage of water, and, if he should be successful, he would not only get money out of it, but it would make the mortgaged property more valuable. It was stated by counsel for the ward that the pleadings and his objections "all go to show that Mr. McIntosh had deceived Mr. Kendrick by his confident talk, and he relied upon his talk, and he oughtn't to have done it. We have no question that Mr. McIntosh made these representations. I have no question about the perfect integrity of Mr. Kendrick, the guardian, in this matter. It is not that point at all. I have no doubt he was imposed upon by the talk of Mr. McIntosh. We think he ought not to have done it, and our client ought not to suffer from his misinformation." Mr. Scott, called by the guardian, testified that he had known Mr. McIntosh about 12 years, and had known his financial ability since July 1, 1895; that he was familiar with his business affairs and property, having been his attorney, and had discussed with him his business affairs very frequently; that since July 1, 1895, he has been practically insolvent; that during all that time he had a considerable amount of property in his name, but that it was all, he thought, without any exception, incumbered, and it was taken piece by piece under foreclosure; that, if this mortgage had been foreclosed in the summer of 1895, the holder of the mortgage would not have reached by execution more than the property that is included in the mortgage. Mr. Scott also testified quite fully in regard to the water stock to the effect that at one time there were 125 inches flowing, which would give an inch of water to about 35 acres of land, and the water was worth $800 per inch, making the stock about $20 per share, but the flow from the tunnel had diminished until there is practically no flow; that other works have interfered with the flow, but he supposed that, if we should have good seasons, some water would come back; that the company had its pipe system, and its works, and, he believed, was free from debt; that its works cost a great deal of money, but the stock now had no market value, and he supposed the value of the land depreciated by reason of the failure of the water; that he believed the people who had established orchards would buy the stock, and pay something for it. The evidence does not show when the guardian procured the stock, nor at what date Mr. Scott placed the value of $800 upon it. There is no conflict in the evidence except as to the value of the land and of the water stock, and none as to the fact that the guardian used every reasonable effort to collect the debt, except that he did not foreclose the mortgage. The order of the court directing the loan to be made on the terms and security therein stated, as we have seen, absolves the guardian from all liability on account of the loan having been made on insufficient security, and therefore the only question remaining is whether he should be held liable, at the option of the ward, or at all, for the amount fixed by the court, or for any sum on account of his failure to foreclose the mortgage. Upon this question the testimony of Mr. Scott would seem to be conclusive of the proposition that from the time the first installment of interest became due Mr. McIntosh was insolvent; that, while he had considerable property, it was all heavily incumbered, so that there was no property that could be reached by execution, other than that covered by the mortgage. The guardian consulted Mr. Sibley, who advised him that the land would not then pay the debt, but thought it would "eventually be all right." Whether to foreclose the mortgage under those circumstances, with a certainty of a deficiency judgment wholly uncollectible, and the further certainty of the expense of the foreclosure and sale, and the probability of being compelled to take the property for his ward, and depend upon the future for an increase of value, or to defer foreclosure with an equal chance of improvement in value, and the possibility of the debtor succeeding in his scheme for the development of water, or in some manner paying or reducing the debt, were the questions presented for his determination. His judgment was against foreclosure. Who, at that time, could say that his judgment was wrong, or that he should have foreclosed? His integrity and good faith are not questioned. If he erred, it was an error of judgment. We do not think the evidence justifies a conclusion of negligence. Negligence implies a failure to act when the judgment requires action. If, as the result of investigation and consideration by a reasonable man, acting in good faith, the conclusion reached is that action should be deferred, the consequent omission to act is not negligence; and the fact that the conclusion reached is erroneous does not convert nonaction into negligence. It is simply an error of judgment. In Re Moore's Estate, 96 Cal. 525, 31 Pac. 584, the court below found that "the administrator collected the principal of said note, but did not collect the interest thereon, amounting to $202.50, for the reason that he did not push the collection thereof until after the said Rodrigues became insolvent." This court said: "There is no finding that the balance due upon this note was lost by the negligence of the administrator. The failure to push the collection of the note may have been negligence, but it is not necessarily so. It frequently happens that indulgence to the debtor is a matter of prudence on the part of the creditor, and the court does not find as a fact that the administrator in this instance failed to exercise reasonable judgment in failing to enforce the collection of the note by process of law." And, quoting from Ellig v. Naglee, 9 Cal. 695, it was further said: "Trustees act for the benefit of others, and not for themselves, and the fair exercise of their judgment should be a protection to them. Supine negligence or willful default will render them liable; but, to make them liable for mere errors of judgment, would tend to discourage good and prudent men from taking any trusts." To the like effect, see Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1070. We conclude, therefore, that the guardian should not be charged with the $1,200 loaned, nor with interest thereon.

Appellant insists that, as findings were not waived, it was error not to make them. Upon this subject it was said in a recent case (In re Adams' Estate [Cal.] 63 Pac. 838): "When findings are filed in a contest of this kind, they may be considered for the purpose of determining the issues upon which such finding was made. Miller v. Lux, 100 Cal. 613, 35 Pac. 345, 639. But it is not necessary to have findings in such case. In re Levinson's Estate, 108 Cal. 455, 41 Pac. 483, 42 Pac. 479. When the decree allowing a final account is found to be erroneous as to an item or items, this court may direct the decree to be corrected, and, as corrected, affirm it. In re Parsons' Estate, 65 Cal. 240, 3 Pac. 817." As the only conflict here is as to the conclusions of law to be drawn from the evidence, a new trial is not necessary. The court below should therefore be directed to modify the order appealed from so as to conform to this opinion, and, as so modified, that it be affirmed. Costs of appeal to be taxed to respondent.

We concur: COOPER, C.; GRAY, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, it is ordered that the court below be directed to modify the order appealed from so as to conform to this opinion, and, as so modified, that it be affirmed.

BENNETT v. WILSON et al. (Sac. 785).¹

(Supreme Court of California. July 16, 1901.)

JUDGMENT—COLLATERAL ATTACK—EXECUTION SALE—REDEMPTION—APPEAL —LAW OF CASE.

1. Where a decision on a previous appeal determined only that a judgment was void because obtained by fraudulent collusion with the sheriff, and on a subsequent trial it is found that there was no such collusion, but service and return were made in good faith, the former decision cannot be regarded as the law of the case.

2. A judgment regular on its face cannot be collaterally attacked on the ground of failure to serve process.

3. Where a redemptioner of corporate property on execution sale under a judgment is refused a deed because a subsequent redemptioner, having a judgment regular on its face against the company, has made redemption, that the summons on which the latter judgment was rendered was served on a party who was not the company's managing agent, by a sheriff who believed him to be the managing agent, and the judgment was rendered on the sheriff's return, cannot entitle the prior redemptioner to impeach such judgment; it appearing that it did not affect his rights existing at the time of its rendition.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Plumas county; Stanley A. Smith, Judge.

Action by Stanford Bennett against J. B. Wilson and others. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

L. W. Peter and W. W. Kellogg, for appellants. Goodwin & Webb, for respondent.

SMITH, C. The case was before this court on a former appeal on a judgment for defendant rendered on demurrer to the complaint, which was reversed. The decision is reported in 122 Cal. 510, 55 Pac. 390, where the case is thus stated: "The facts alleged which are necessary to illustrate the main question discussed by counsel may be briefly stated. Defendant company is a foreign corporation, and owned and operated mining property in Plumas county. Defendant Bransford is sheriff of said county. Defendant Wilson is a stockholder in, and the managing agent and in actual control and management of the property of, defendant corporation. In 1895 one Swearingen obtained a judgment lien against the property of defendant corporation, which was sold on execution, and one Cole became the purchaser at sheriff's sale July 18, 1896. The defendant corporation did not redeem. Plaintiff obtained a judgment lien before the time of redemption expired, and with it redeemed from the purchaser, and sixty days thereafter demanded a deed from the sheriff, which was refused for the alleged reason that defendant Wilson was a lawful redemptioner, and had within the sixty days required by law made redemption. Wilson's judgment lien was junior to plaintiff's. It is alleged that Wilson's judgment was obtained by fraudulent collusion between him and said sheriff, whereby the sheriff made a false return of service of summons on defendant corporation; that no service was in fact made, and said corporation had no knowledge or notice of the action commenced by Wilson, and did not appear or answer, and judgment was obtained by default, and said judgment is fraudulent and void. Plaintiff refused to accept the money tendered, and demanded a deed from the sheriff, which was refused." After the case was remanded the plaintiff recovered judgment. The defendants Wilson and Bransford appeal therefrom on the judgment roll and bill of exceptions. The other defendant named in the complaint, the California Gold-Mining & Investment Company, was not served with summons, and did not appear. The following is an abstract of the judgments and proceedings out of which the controversy grows: Swearingen against California Gold-Mining & Investment Co. Judgment for $483.38 rendered June 17, 1895. Execution sale to L. M. Cole January 15, 1897. Bennett against same defendant. Judgment for $642.96 rendered July 13, 1896. Redemption from sale to Cole January 15, 1897. Wilson against same defendant. Judgment July 17, 1896. Redemption from Bennett March, 1897. The summons was served in this case on June 11, 1896, prior to the date of Bennett's judgment. There is no allegation that the judgment was taken by Wilson with intent to defraud the plaintiff, or to interfere with his rights, or with intent to defraud creditors, or that there was any fraud or fraudulent intent, other than such as may be implied in the other facts as above stated. On the trial the court found all the allegations of the complaint to be true, except the alleged fraudulent collusion between Wilson and the sheriff, on which point it found that the sheriff made the service on Fant, "then believing the said Fant to be the managing or business agent of said corporation."

On this state of the record, the appellants claim that, "the findings being positively against the alleged fraud and collusion, this element is entirely eliminated from the case, and it follows that judgment should have gone for the defendant." On the other hand, the respondent claims that the question as to fraud and collusion is immaterial; that the "fraudulent acts charged are presented as the inducement leading to an imposition on the court,—an imposition which procured a judgment against the corporation, which the court had no power to enter, for want of jurisdiction over the person" of the defendant. Hence it is claimed the judgment was void on "principles not only elementary, but [that] have become the law of this case."

With regard to the former decision, we do not think it susceptible of the construction claimed by the respondent. In the statement of the case by the court, the alleged fraudulent collusion between Wilson and the sheriff is given (in the passage italicized) a very prominent place, and in the course of the opinion it is repeatedly referred to in such a manner as to indicate that it was the ground of the decision. Thus, in the opinion the proposition that "said judgment is fraudulent and void" is stated, apparently, as the conclusion from the facts of the alleged collusion and nonservice, thus making it evident that the court understood the position of the plaintiff (then appellant) to be that the judgment was void because thus procured. And accordingly, on page 515, 122 Cal., and page 391, 55 Pac., the decision is based on the proposition that (on the facts alleged) the judgment was void as "obtained by fraud"; and on page 516, 122 Cal., and page 391, 55 Pac., the case is referred to as identical in principle with the case of a "judgment * * * collusive between the debtor and creditor." The decision must therefore be regarded as resting on the principle that a judgment obtained by fraudulent collusion between the plaintiff and the defendant, or between the plaintiff and the officers of the law, may be collaterally attacked by persons, not parties, whose rights are affected. Hence the conclusion of the court that the plaintiff's right of action comes within the principles discussed by Mr. Freeman in his work on Judgments (sections 334-337), and the authorities there given, thus making the sections cited a part of the opinion. Turning to these, we find the question proposed for discussion is to determine: "When judgments not void for want of jurisdiction [i. e. not void on the face of the record. See section 116 ad fin.], nor attacked by any equitable suit or defense may, nevertheless, be wholly or partly avoided" by strangers to the record. Section 334. Three cases are given in which this may be permitted, namely: (1) The case of parties "prejudiced [by the judgment] in regard to some pre-existing right," as in the examples given in section 335; (2) The case of judgments "procured through fraud of either of the parties or by the collusion of both for the purpose of defrauding some third person" (section 336); and (3) that of judgments impeachable for error "such as left the court without jurisdiction, and the judgment absolutely void as between the parties thereto" (section 337). It is not to be supposed from the general citation of these sections that the court intended to affirm that the case at bar came within all of the cases enumerated. The several sections are cited because the general question is discussed in them; and it is left to the reader, by aid of the maxim, "Reddendo singula singulis," to determine, from what is said in the opinion, the particular class treated of to which the case at bar is to be assigned. Of the classes enumerated, the first, it is obvious, must be rejected. Bennett's redemption from Cole was about six months after Wilson's judgment. At the time of the judgment he was merely a judgment creditor, his judgment antedating that of Wilson by four days. He was therefore in no way injured by the Wilson judgment, his own judgment being a prior lien. His right to attack the judgment must therefore rest upon his interest subsequently acquired as redemptioner from Cole, who himself purchased about six months after the judgment. The case, therefore, cannot be regarded as falling within this class, which includes only those whose rights existing at the date of the judgment are prejudiced thereby. Nor can the case be assigned to the second class. There is no allegation that the judgment was obtained "for the purpose of defrauding" Bennett or any one else; and, as to Bennett, the facts of the case exclude the possibility of any such intent. When the judgment was rendered, Wilson was merely a judgment creditor, and when the summons was served (June 11th) he was not even that. Nor is there any allegation that the judgment was obtained by collusion between the parties for the purpose of defrauding creditors. On the contrary, it is expressly alleged that it was rendered without the knowledge of the defendant corporation. There remains, therefore, only the third class, namely, that of judgments apparently valid, but in fact without jurisdiction, and "absolutely void as between the parties thereto." And from the opinion itself it is clear that this was the class of cases referred to; for the judgment is therein uniformly described as void, and the decision is expressly based on the principle, cited by the court, that "a void judgment is in effect no judgment." "By it [it is continued] no rights are divested. From it no rights can be obtained. Being worthless itself, all proceedings founded upon it are equally worthless. It neither bars nor binds any one." Freem. Judgm. § 117. In what is said by the author in this section and in the authorities cited we must therefore find the principles by which the former decision is to be explained and understood. The rule laid down by Mr. Freeman in the section cited (337) is thus expressed: "The parties to an action or proceeding, and all persons who, though not parties thereto, are not prejudiced by the judgment when rendered, will not be permitted to assail or avoid it in any collateral proceeding for error or irregularity, unless it was such as left the court without jurisdiction, and the judgment absolutely void as between the parties thereto." Such judgments, it seems, may be attacked by strangers to the record whose rights, whether existing at the time of the judgment or afterwards acquired, are affected; i. e. by persons who, not being parties to the record, or privies, have no remedy against the judgment by appeal or otherwise in the case itself. But, in general, they cannot be impeached otherwise than by the record itself, or where the lack of jurisdiction appears on the face of the record. Hodgdon v. Railroad Co., 75 Cal. 650, 21 Pac. 372; Hill v. Transfer Co., 79 Cal. 188, 21 Pac. 728. Of this kind are all the cases cited by the author, and also the case of Downs v. Fuller, 2 Metc. (Mass.)

135, and other cases cited in the opinion in connection therewith. There are, however, some exceptions to this rule. Ex vi termini, living parties are essential to jurisdiction. Hence when at the time the judgment was rendered the defendant was dead, as in the case of Warter v. Perry, Cro. Eliz. 199, and in Randal's Case, 2 Mod. 308, cited in the opinion and in Griswold v. Stewart, 4 Cow. 457, the jurisdiction is only apparent, and the fact may be shown by parties whose interests are injuriously affected. And so if a judgment be entered on a forged sheriff's return, or by the clerk without authority; for such judgments are not in fact judgments of the court. And on the same principle collusive judgments may in certain cases be attacked by strangers. Hence judgments of this kind are included in this class by the author, in the section cited; being the same referred to in section 250, where they are more fully explained. To this class only, it is clear, can the opinion be understood as referring. Such cases are generally cases of collusion between the parties to the suit. Pierce v. Jackson, 6 Mass. 242; Fermor's Case, 3 Coke, 77; Meckley's Appeal, 102 Pa. 541; Biddle v. Tomlinson, 115 Pa. 299, 8 Atl. 774; Sponsler's Appeal, 127 Pa. 410, 17 Atl. 1097; Freem. Judgm. § 335. But, though not including in their literal expression the case at bar, they are expressly referred to in the opinion (page 516, 122 Cal., and page 392, 55 Pac.) as identical with it in principle. The decision must therefore be regarded as determining only that the judgment of Wilson against the corporation was, on the allegations of the complaint, void, because obtained by him by fraudulent collusion with the sheriff, and hence that it was not a real or "bona fide existing judgment," or "actual adjudication upon the matter in controversy." Spencer v. Vigneaux, 20 Cal. 449. And as it is now found there was no such collusion, but that the service and return were made by the sheriff in good faith, the decision cannot be regarded as the law of the case as now presented. The case must therefore be considered on general principles; and, in thus considering it, it will be convenient to consider separately the general question as to the effect of a judgment regular on the face of the record, where there has been in fact no service of summons, and the question as to how the case may be affected by the peculiar circumstances presented by it.

1. As to the general question, the law is well settled. No doubt, the court must have jurisdiction of the person of the defendant; but, with exceptions that have been considered, such jurisdiction, in the case of courts of record, is conclusively presumed unless the contrary appears from the record itself. And where, as in this case, it appears from the return of the proper officer that the defendant has been served, the court in fact has jurisdiction over him. Reinhart v. Lugo, 86 Cal. 399, 24 Pac. 1089, 21 Am. St. Rep.

52; Lyons v. Cunningham, 66 Cal. 43, 4 Pac. 938. For jurisdiction is but power to hear and determine the questions arising in the case, and among these is the question whether the summons has in fact been served. Its judgment, therefore, unless on a direct proceeding to set it aside, or in the exceptional cases already considered, must be taken as a conclusive determination of this question. On this point the language used in Downs v. Fuller, 2 Metc. (Mass.) 135, 35 Am. Dec. 393, cited in the former decision, and similar cases, is liable to be misunderstood. Freem. Judgm. § 337, p. 612; Van Fleet, Coll. Attack, § 12, pp. 11, 12. It is there said, "Although the judgment in favor of the plaintiff was not recovered by collusion with his debtor, or with any fraudulent intent, yet we think the defendant has a right to avoid it in the same manner, because he is neither party nor privy to the plaintiff's judgment, and is not entitled by the rules of law to reverse it by writ of error." But this does not mean that a judgment may be attacked by all strangers to the record. It applies only to cases "where a party has a right to impeach a judgment,"—as in the case considered; where the rights of the party existing at the date of the judgment were affected; and where the defeat of jurisdiction appeared from the record itself.

2. In this case there is no charge of collusion between the parties to the suit, and it is found there was no collusion between Wilson and the sheriff; and it affirmatively appears that the judgment did not affect, and, indeed, could not have affected, the rights of the plaintiff existing at the time of its rendition. The findings, therefore, that the service of the summons was a wrong "against the rights of the plaintiff," and that the "judgment was a fraud upon the rights of the plaintiff as a redemptioner of said property," are in conflict with the specific facts found, and must be disregarded. For it appears from the admitted allegations of the complaint that at the time of the service of summons Bennett was not even a judgment creditor, and therefore could not be defrauded by the service of summons, and also that he did not become a redemptioner until six months (lacking two days) after Wilson's judgment, which, therefore, could not be a fraud upon rights not then existing. The material facts found, therefore, are merely that Wilson was, and Fant was not, the managing agent of the company; that, with the knowledge of Wilson, and by direction of his attorney, the summons was served on the latter by the sheriff, believing him to be the managing agent of the corporation; and that the judgment was demanded and entered on sheriff's return. These facts are not sufficient to bring the plaintiff within any class recognized by the authorities as entitled to impeach a judgment regular on its face. It is ingeniously put by the respondent's counsel that the entry of the judgment was "an imposition on the court." But this was not the case. The judgment was entered by default by the clerk, whose legal duty it was to enter it, and who had no discretion in the matter. Nor, had there been such imposition, would it have been any concern of the plaintiff. The relations of Wilson to the corporation, in the absence of explanation, might give rise to a presumption of fraud against it. But fraud against the corporation, even had it been found, would not entitle the plaintiff to impeach the judgment. Meckley's Appeal, 102 Pa. 536; Sponsler's Appeal, 127 Pa. 410, 17 Atl. 1097; Biddle v. Tomlinson, 115 Pa. 299, 8 Atl. 774.

Under the view we have taken of the case it will be unnecessary to examine into the sufficiency of the evidence to support the findings. I advise that the judgment be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to enter judgment for the defendant on the findings.

I concur: GRAY, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to enter judgment for the defendant on the findings.

CITY OF SANTA ANA v. GILDMACHER
et al. (L. A. 899.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 23, 1901.)
MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—CONSTRUCTION OF SEWERS—CONDEMNING PRIVATE PROPERTY
—PLEADING—DIRECTING VERDICT.

1. In a proceeding by a city to condemn private property for the construction of a sewer, an answer outlining a different route for the sewer through the streets of the city, and alleging that such route was better than the proposed one, though such facts could have been shown under a general denial of the necessity to construct the sewer, error in allowing the answer to stand was not prejudicial.

2. In proceedings to condemn private property for a sewer, the proposed sewer ran parallel to and 95 feet from a street. This street was paved with asphalt, and the evidence showed that it would be more convenient and less expensive to the property owners to have the sewer constructed as proposed, rather than in the street, and that the street would be materially damaged in having the pavement torn up. Held, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1242, providing that, where land is taken for public use, such use must be located where most beneficial to the public and least injurious to the citizens, error to direct a verdict for defendant on the question of the necessity for the construction, as being a question of fact for the jury.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Orange county; J. W. Ballard, Judge.

Proceedings by the city of Santa Ana against D. Gildmacher and another. From a judgment in favor of defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

W. P. Heathman, for appellant. Victor Montgomery, for respondents.

CHIPMAN, C. Action to condemn right of way for sewer. Defendant Jacobson was a tenant of defendant Gildmacher, and made default. Defendant Gildmacher answered. At the close of the evidence the jury, on motion of defendant Gildmacher, and by direction of the court, rendered a verdict that there was no necessity for taking the property described in the complaint, and judgment was entered accordingly. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment, and from the order denying its motion for a new trial. The complaint sets forth with sufficient particularity the location, general route, and termini of the proposed line for a sewer of 8 inches in diameter in the city of Santa Ana, from Ross street to Sycamore street. It was proposed to run the sewer from the center of Ross street, commencing at a point 95 feet north of Fourth street, and it was resolved by the city trustees to run the sewer east on a direct line from this point, and parallel with Fourth street, to a manhole in sewer on Sycamore street, three blocks distant, crossing Birch street and West street in its route, and three blocks of lots, in private ownership, in one of which blocks defendant Gildmacher owned certain improved lots situated on the proposed line of sewer. He objected to the construction of the sewer through his property, and hence the action to condemn the right of way in question. Fourth street was at the time paved with asphaltum from Ross street, two blocks to West street, but the street was not paved from West street to Sycamore street. There was a sewer on the south side of Fourth street. The board of trustees passed a resolution declaring "that the public interest and convenience required that a right of way for a sewer over, under, and across the lot of land owned by D. Gildmacher be obtained; that the strip of land necessary for said sewer be ten feet wide and sixty-four feet long, and described as follows." A description of the land proposed to be taken is given, and it was provided that the sewer should be laid not less than 8½ feet deep.

1. Defendant pleaded, as a fourth and separate defense, that plaintiff is the owner of the streets and alleys of the city, upon which a complete system of public sewers can be constructed without interfering with the private property of its citizens, and that there is no necessity for taking any private property for sewer purposes; that defendant's property fronts 64 feet on Fourth street, which is a public highway 80 feet wide, in which there is ample room to construct the proposed sewer; and that all the private property lying to the north of Fourth street and to the east of West street could be as readily drained by a sewer laid along West street to the intersection of Fourth street, and thence along Fourth street in front of defendant's property. It is alleged that the land is level along these streets, with a gradual fall, the same as along the proposed line of sewer through the private property of defendant. Plaintiff interposed a demurrer to the answer on the ground of insufficiency of facts, which was overruled as to the fourth defense. It is contended that the court erred "in allowing defendant to allege and describe a different route for the line of sewer than the one described in the complaint, and that, if the line described was not suitable, he should have confined his efforts and his evidence in pointing out the defects of the proposed line of sewer across defendant's land, but that there is no precedent for allowing defendant to set up in his answer a rival line of sewer, which he claims is better." The city can in this proceeding acquire no right to lay a sewer "except in exact accordance with the specifications contained in the complaint" (City of Pasadena v. Stimson, 91 Cal. 238, 27 Pac. 604); and defendant's suggestion of a better line is not pleaded with the view of having it adopted and adjudged as the line to be used. It was pleaded for the purpose of showing that an equally good line over the streets of the city was available, and that by using the streets the injury to defendant could be avoided. We think he could have shown these facts under the general denial of the necessity to construct the sewer over the proposed line as alleged in the complaint, and hence it was not essential to the defense that the facts be alleged. It was held error in City of Pasadena v. Stimson, supra, to exclude evidence for the defendants to the effect that a much shorter route than that proposed had been surveyed, upon a better grade, through lands not thickly settled. It was certainly material to the issue of necessity to show that the sewer could be located along a street, instead of through the private property bounded by that street, although by no means necessarily conclusive on the point. It may be conceded that this fact, as well as other material probative facts bearing upon the question of necessity, need not be pleaded in the answer; but we can see no prejudicial error in the order of the court allowing the answer to stand, even though it contained averments of fact which might have been shown under the general issue.

2. After the plaintiff had rested and the defendant had put in his evidence, the defendant moved the court to "instruct the jury to render a verdict in favor of the defendant, on the ground that there is no proof in this case to show any necessity to take the property of defendant for the public use." Thereupon the trial judge remarked at considerable length upon the evidence before the jury, discussing in the course of his remarks both the law and the facts, concluding as follows: "So, gentlemen, in the case under discussion, I think it is my duty to instruct you, and I do so instruct you, upon that question of necessity, to find for the defendant; and I have prepared a form for use, if you should find according to my instructions, for your verdict. I will say under these instructions you are not obliged to find for the defendant, but may find to the contrary." The form of verdict called for answer, "Yes," or "No," as to whether it was necessary to take defendant's property described in the complaint. The jury answered "No," as the court in fact instructed them to do, and judgment followed accordingly. Appellant urges the proceeding as error. Section 19, art. 6, of the constitution of 1879 reads: "Judges shall not charge juries with respect to matters of fact, but may state the testimony and declare the law." The provision was the same in the constitution of 1849 (article 6, § 17). It was said in People v. Welch, 49 Cal. 174, that this provision applies alike to civil and criminal cases, and it has been so applied in numerous instances. It was said in the case cited: "In a proper case the court may act on the assumption that there is no evidence in respect to a particular issue, and grant a nonsuit, or advise an acquittal, or frame its charge to the jury, without reference to the existence of facts as to which no evidence has been produced. * * *

The 'matters of fact' as to which the court is not permitted to charge the jury are the facts contested, or in some degree sought to be established by evidence." In Weiderv. Water Co., 65 Cal. 431, 4 Pac. 415, the trial court charged the jury that if they found that defendant's dam did not have sufficient gates to let out the water, so as to prevent any break occurring below the top of the dam from being enlarged by a continual flow of water through it, then said dam is insufficiently and negligently constructed. On appeal this court said that the trial court might instruct as to the degree of care required in the construction of the dam, and that, if defendant neglected to exercise that degree of care and vigilance, it would be liable in damages, but the court could not instruct the jury that the dam was insufficiently and negligently constructed unless it had gates sufficient for a certain purpose, and in doing so it charged upon matters of fact. In the case of Holloway v. Railway Co., 130 Cal. 177, 62 Pac. 478, the trial court directed a verdict for the defendant, where the question was whether plaintiff's injury was caused by defendant's negligence. It was said here: "It was the province of the judge to determine whether or not the evidence offered by plaintiff had any legal tendency to establish negligence, and it was for the jury to say, after weighing and considering all the evidence, whether or not the negligence had been sufficiently proven. If the evidence on the part of the plaintiff was such that the jury would have the right to infer negligence therefrom, the court did not have the right to usurp the function of the jury and take the case from them. * * *

The test is this: Would the evidence on the part of the plaintiff be sufficient to sustain a verdict in his favor if such verdict had been rendered?" In an action to condemn private property for a public use, the question of necessity is one of fact, to be determined by the jury in view of all the evidence in the case. Waterworks v. Drinkhouse, 92 Cal. 528, 28 Pac. 681. The evidence should show that the land is reasonably required for the purpose of effecting the object of its condemnation. Id. Witness Leslie, a civil engineer who was employed as one of the engineers to prepare a general plan for the city sewers, testified: That the board of trustees instructed the engineers to avoid Fourth street, as it was paved, and to put the line through between Fourth and Fifth streets. That it was the intention of the engineers to run a line from Spurgeon street to Ross street. That this gave a straight line from a point 95 feet north of Fourth street to a point in the middle of Sycamore street through to Ross street, the same distance from Fourth street. That in locating sewers the line should be made straight. That this line in question "was located as least objectionable, since it avoided heavy walls and long foundations, and was the most convenient and easy location for construction. For that reason we located it. The line 95 feet north of Fourth street does not strike any foundations that would injure buildings, so far as I know. * * *

The line located upon avoided heavy walls, and was a convenient location to the buildings, and presented the most feasible route for a sewer from Spurgeon to Ross street." He then testified that the line was specially convenient for connections with buildings fronting on Fourth street, the line being in the rear of the buildings; that the buildings on the south side of Fourth are accommodated by a sewer already on that side of the street. Speaking of defendant's frontage on Fourth, he said: "Were the sewer in Fourth street, speaking generally of the line through from Spurgeon to Ross street, and in particular as regards this property of Mr. Gildmacher, would say the pavement is in front of the Gildmacher property, and in case the sewer were in the street the sewer connections with that property along the line of Fourth street would have to go under the buildings and under the pavement and sidewalk, and under the pavement to the sewer line, and would be more expensive. It is simply a matter of expense in connections." On cross-examination he testified that he located the line under instructions of the board, but he said: "Had I not been under such instructions, but left to myself in regard to the matter, as an engineer, I would have placed the sewer, as a matter of convenience, through the building at some point in the rear, since Fourth street is paved, and the connections to the sewer line in Fourth street would have been generally expensive, would have damaged the street materially." He also testified that: "It would necessarily do some private injury to put sewer through a block. No alley way through this particular block." The witness testified that the grade on

Fourth street was substantially the same as on the proposed line of sewer; that the sewer could have been carried through Fourth street, but it would have added extra man-holes and additional angles, besides involving the tearing up of the pavement; that in some cases sewers in streets and alleys were more convenient than through the lots, but in other cases the contrary was true, and he gives instances along the proposed line. Witness Kellogg, chief city engineer, testified at considerable length on the matter. He testified: "I understood the line was to be located at some point at once the most economical and advantageous to property owners of city in general. Had careful survey made of route between Fourth and Fifth streets; exact location of every building taken; character of foundations investigated; all possible factors carefully considered. After having made investigation, selected that line which presented fewest difficulties. * * * Buildings along Fourth street do not front the way the lots do, but front on Fourth street, taking small section of lots. Buildings, as a rule, 80 to 90 feet deep. Plenty of space left between back end of property and buildings for construction of sewer, or necessary connections for convenience. In 95-foot line we saw small difficulty in securing right of way. So that line was located, making a line of sewer going over near people's houses, not injuring buildings, and within property limits in majority of cases; and that was the reason the line was located at that point." He then shows that the cost to the property owners in making connections by that line would be much less than if located in the street. He estimates that the saving in cost to the private owners between Ross and Spurgeon streets would be $10,000. There were several other witnesses called by plaintiff whose testimony was corroborative of the foregoing. Other phases of the matter were brought out, tending more or less to support the plaintiff's contention. Sufficient of the evidence has been given to show conclusively, I think, that the court invaded the functions of the jury in directing a verdict for the defendant. The court took from the jury the principal issue of fact in the case, and in so doing made all other issues immaterial. The court charged the jury in respect of matters of fact in the sense of the constitutional prohibition. If there had been no evidence tending to show a reasonable necessity for taking defendant's property, it would not have been prejudicial error for the court to grant a nonsuit (In re Spencer, 96 Cal. 448, 31 Pac. 453); or, if the evidence had been such as that a verdict for plaintiff would have been contrary to the evidence, the error would be regarded as immaterial (Levitzky v. Canning, 33 Cal. 299); but we think there was evidence of a substantial character bearing directly on the issue of fact, namely, the necessity for taking the property, and, as this issue was for the jury, it ought to have been left for them to decide. Among other remarks made by the learned trial judge is the following: "If we were seeking to save the city, and looking to the convenience and economy of the property owners along that line— Yet all the balance of us have it front on the public streets. We are obliged to go from 100 to 120 and 160 feet to make connections. If they have a right to take this, why not seek private property all over the route of the system, instead of using the public streets." But section 1242, Code Civ. Proc., declares that when land is taken for public use the use "must be located in the manner which will be most compatible with the greatest public good and the least private injury." The question of necessity in a given case involves a consideration of facts which relate to the public, and also to the private citizen whose property may be injured. The greatest good, on the one hand, and the least injury, on the other, are the questions to be determined, and these questions are for the jury, in passing on the question of necessity. The jury may as safely be trusted to rightly solve these questions as the court, and, whether so or not, our system of jurisprudence requires that they shall first be submitted to the jury. We advise that the judgment and order be reversed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; GRAY, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order are reversed.

133 Cal. 437
RICHARDS et al. v. MOREY. (L. A. 854.)
(Supreme Court of California. July 24, 1901.)
REPLEVIN—POSSESSION BY DEFENDANT.

Where defendant is not in possession or control of personal property when an action for the recovery of possession thereof is commenced, plaintiff cannot recover.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; E. S. Torrance, Judge.

Action by Charles B. Richards and others against Charles E. Morey. From that portion of a judgment which denied a portion of plaintiffs' demand, they appeal. Affirmed.

Withington & Carter, for appellants. M. L. Rawson, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. Action to recover possession of personal property. The plaintiffs had judgment for certain pipe, hydrants, tools, etc., of the value of $845.20, but their claim for the recovery of certain buildings was denied, and from that portion of the judgment they appeal upon the judgment roll.

The evidence is not brought up by bill of exceptions or otherwise. The only question is whether the plaintiffs were entitled to judgment upon the facts stated in the sixth finding, which is as follows: "That the house known as the 'engineer's house,' and which is of the value of $200, and building known as the 'storage house,' and which is of the value of $75, and the 'long shed' mentioned in the complaint, which is of the value of $35, were formerly attached to and part of the ranch known as the 'Monte Vista Ranch,' being plat E of the Rancho Jamacha, in said county, and was the property of the plaintiffs. That the defendant, against the will of the plaintiffs, and without their consent, took the same, and removed the same from said ranch, and attached the same to the Eddy tract, so called, being plat F of the Rancho Jamacha, in said county, before the commencement of this action, the said Eddy tract being at the time of said attachment and now the property of one George S. Davis; and the said defendant has incorporated the said engineer's house into a dwelling house, and now occupied by him upon said last-named tract. That all of said buildings were removed with the consent of said Davis; and that the said Davis, previous to said removal, had agreed with the plaintiffs that said buildings should not be removed from said Monte Vista ranch, above referred to." This finding shows that these buildings were removed by the defendant from the Monte Vista ranch, and "attached" to the Eddy tract, which then was, and now is, the property of George S. Davis, who is not a party to the suit. It is not found that defendant, Morey, has any ownership in the Eddy tract, to which these buildings are found to be "attached," or had any interest or ownership therein at any time. The possession of the buildings was, therefore, in Davis at the time the action was commenced. The fact that the dwelling house into which the "engineer's house" was incorporated is "occupied" by the defendant does not affect the ownership and possession of Davis, who is the owner of the ranch, the said buildings having been attached to and thereby made part of his land before this action was commenced.

This is an action to recover possession of personal property, which, it is alleged, the defendant took against the will of the plaintiffs, and now detains from their possession. But the finding shows that the property sought to be recovered was not in the possession of the defendant when the action was commenced, nor within his power to deliver, and therefore said finding would not have sustained a judgment in favor of the plaintiffs for the delivery of the buildings, or for the value of them in case a delivery could not be had. In Kelley v. McKibben, 54 Cal. 195, it is said: "The distinction between this action [to recover possession, or the value in case a delivery cannot be had] and one to recover damages for the wrongful conversion of personal property is just as broad as that between the common-law actions of detinue and trover. One lies for the recovery of the property itself, with damages for the wrongful detention of it; the other for the recovery of damages for the wrongful conversion of it." It is a general proposition that an action will not lie where it is clear that relief under it cannot be obtained. So an action to recover possession of personal property will not lie when it is apparent at the time the action is commenced that the defendant has not the possession, or the power to deliver it in satisfaction of the judgment for its possession. When, however, the defendant has the property in his possession at the time the action is commenced, the code provisions will not permit him by the subsequent transfer or destruction of the property to wholly deprive the plaintiff of relief, and in such case the alternative judgment for the value of the property is granted. In Riciotto v. Clement, 94 Cal. 107, 29 Pac. 414, it is said: "Quite often the plaintiff may choose whether he will content himself with damages for the conversion, or seek to recover the specific property; but the two remedies are quite distinct. In what is called 'trover,' present possession of the property is immaterial, but the relief sought in claim and delivery cannot be had from the defendant unless he is then possessed of the property, which fact must, therefore, constitute an essential element in plaintiff's cause of action." Riciotto v. Clement, supra, is cited and followed in Henderson v. Hart, 122 Cal. 332, 54 Pac. 1110, and Keech v. Beatty, 127 Cal. 183, 59 Pac. 837. Faulkner v. Bank, 130 Cal. 258, 266, 62 Pac. 463, was distinguished by the court from Riciotto v. Clement, in that it was founded on the contract of bailment.

Appellant makes the point that "the only necessary defendant in replevin is he who has possession of the property"; but this assumes that Morey has the possession, and the right to surrender the property to the plaintiffs, and that plaintiffs have the right to receive or take the possession. It may be that the evidence would have justified a different finding from that before us; but it is quite clear that the finding shows no right, power, or authority in the defendant to remove the buildings from Davis' land, and to deliver them to the plaintiffs, or to put them in possession of them while on the land of Davis. Morey may be the occupant of these buildings, but the possession and the power of disposition are not shown to be in him. The presumption is that a building becomes part of the land—the real estate—upon which it is built or placed, and a stranger to the title cannot remove it without special authority to do so. As the finding in question would not justify a judgment thereon in favor of the plaintiffs, the judgment appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: SMITH, C.; GRAY, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

In re DAMKE'S ESTATE. (Sac. 898.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 24, 1901.)
ADMINISTRATORS — RIGHT TO LETTERS — AP-PEAL—NOTICE—COURTS—JURIS-DICTION—EVIDENCE.

1. An appeal from an order appointing an administrator will not be dismissed because of the notice of appeal being entitled as in the superior court of a county other than that wherein the appointment was made, where the parties treated the notice as sufficient throughout the proceedings, and the appellee's attorneys were not misled.

2. Where a public administrator of one county claims the right to administer on an estate, he has the right to appeal from an order of the court of another county appointing another as administrator.

3. A court appointing a special administrator of an estate acquires jurisdiction alone for the special purposes of that character of administration.

4. Where a court of one county appoints a general administrator of an estate after the appointment of a special administrator, but before the appointment of a general administrator by the court of another county, it thereby acquires general jurisdiction of the estate.

5. In proceedings for the appointment of an administrator, a claimant to letters introduced evidence that the deceased had been superintendent of a ranch in a county other than that in which proceedings were had for ten years immediately preceding his death; that he furnished a house for his occupancy on the ranch, doing his own cooking, sleeping there, keeping poultry and cattle about the place, and receiving his mail at a post office on the ranch. Against this evidence a witness testified that prior to the ten-year period deceased stayed at a hotel in the county wherein proceedings were had, claiming that as his residence, and that he voted there; but during the ten years he had been to the hotel but four or five times for two or three days at a time. Held, that the residence of deceased was not in the county wherein proceedings were had.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county; Joseph H. Budd, Judge.

Proceedings for the appointment of an administrator of the estate of Fred W. Damke, deceased. From an order appointing C. C. Franklin, public administrator of San Joaquin, S. B. Smith, public administrator of Sacramento county, appeals. Reversed.

Bruner & Brothers, for appellant. Avery C. White, Buck, Miller & Clark, and Gus. G. Grant, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. The public administrator of the county of Sacramento appeals from an order of the superior court of the county of San Joaquin, appointing C. C. Franklin, public administrator of that county, administrator of the estate of Fred W. Damke, deceased. He had theretofore in said proceeding filed a written opposition to the appointment of Franklin administrator of said estate, claiming that said Damke at the time of his death was a resident of the county of Sacramento. It is asked that this appeal be dismissed because the notice of appeal is entitled "In the superior court of the county of Sacramento," and also by reason of other defects appearing upon its face. These objections are too technical, for the defects are unsubstantial. The notice recites that the appeal is taken from an order and decree made and entered the 2d day of August, 1900, directing letters of administration to issue to C. C. Franklin, public administrator of the county of San Joaquin. This order and decree was the only one made upon that day, or any other day, appointing C. C. Franklin, public administrator of the county of San Joaquin, administrator of the estate of the deceased. It is perfectly evident that respondent's attorneys were not misled by the defects appearing upon the face of the notice, and, in addition to this, subsequent to the service of the notice, a bill of exceptions was prepared and settled, to be used upon appeal from the order appointing Franklin administrator, and no suggestion was ever made that the aforesaid notice was defective in substance. Throughout the proceedings the notice has been treated as sufficient, and acted upon, and it is now too late to make the objections here made for the first time.

It is next claimed in support of the motion to dismiss that the appellant is not a party aggrieved, and hence has no right of appeal. Appellant claims the right to administer upon the estate of Damke, deceased, and under these circumstances is entitled to take this appeal. In re Healy's Estate, 122 Cal. 162, 54 Pac. 736. If Damke was in fact a resident of Sacramento county at the time of his death, it was not only the right, but the duty of the public administrator of Sacramento county to appear in the court of San Joaquin county, and contest Franklin's right to letters of administration. And, if he had the right to contest the issuance of letters of administration to Franklin, he had the right to appeal from the decree entered against him. The fact that he claims the right to administer in Sacramento county, and that these proceedings were inaugurated before the superior court in San Joaquin county is not material. Appellant, by an order of the superior court of Sacramento county, made July 12, 1900, was appointed special administrator of the estate of the aforesaid deceased. Upon July 21, 1900, Franklin filed his petition in the superior court of the county of San Joaquin, asking for general letters of administration upon the estate of said deceased. Upon July 23d appellant filed his petition in the superior court of the county of Sacramento, asking for general letters of administration upon said estate. Upon August 2d general letters of administration were issued to Franklin in the superior court of the county of San Joaquin, appellant's written opposition thereto being overruled, and it is from this order that the present appeal is taken. Thereafter general letters of administration were issued to appellant in the superior court of the county of Sacramento. It is now insisted upon the part of appellant that, the superior court of the county of Sacramento having made an order appointing him special administrator of the estate of Damke, deceased, prior to the filing of Franklin's petition for letters in the superior court of San Joaquin county, therefore that court was deprived of jurisdiction to hear his petition. This court has concluded that appellant's position in that regard is not well taken. By the appointment of a special administrator of an estate, the court making the order may be said to have only a limited jurisdiction over the estate. It has jurisdiction alone for the special purposes of that character of administration. By the proceeding which resulted in the appointment of the special administrator, the court gained no jurisdiction to appoint a general administrator. That appointment could only be made by a separate and independent proceeding, and the prior proceeding had to no degree fed the jurisdiction of the court as to the appointment of a general administrator. If the public administrator of San Joaquin county could not there file in the court a petition to be appointed administrator of the estate of deceased, for the reason that a special administrator had already been appointed in Sacramento county, then the subject-matter of this litigation would be in a most peculiar situation, for non constat the public administrator of Sacramento county would ever file a petition for general letters of administration, and thus most serious complications would necessarily arise; for no general administrator might ever be appointed, and this, too, notwithstanding the right to appoint in the superior court of San Joaquin county might be ever so clear. For these reasons the court concludes upon this branch of the case that, when the petition was filed in the superior court of San Joaquin county to appoint a general administrator in the estate of Damke, deceased, there was no proceeding pending in any other court to appoint a general administrator, and for that reason the superior court of San Joaquin county first took jurisdiction of the matter.

Appellant attacks the finding of the trial court which is to the effect that the deceased, Damke, was a resident of the county of San Joaquin at the time of his death. This court has carefully examined the evidence found in the record bearing upon the question of residence, and has concluded that it points unerringly to the fact that the residence of Damke at the time of his death was in Sacramento county. There is but a small amount of evidence upon the issue. Damke was a German, without relatives in this state. For ten years immediately prior to his death he was acting as superintendent and manager of a large ranch belonging to Williams & Bixler, which was situated in Sacramento county at a point called "Ryde." Here Damke was furnished a house in which he lived alone for these 10 years. He did his own cooking, and slept there. He had his own bed, dishes, and other furniture there. He had chickens, pigs, and a cow about the place. Indeed, he seemed to live here in this house and at this place, if it can ever be said that a person lives in a certain house and at a certain place. If a person may, by his acts, create a residence for himself, then Damke's residence was at Ryde. While it may be said that the residence of a person is to be determined by his intentions, still it may also be said that his intentions are to be determined by his acts. The deceased received his papers and his letters at Ryde post office, situated upon the ranch; and many of his neighbors testified that he lived at this place continually for the past 10 years prior to his death, only being absent a day or two a few times each year. Against this evidence, a witness testified that prior to the aforesaid 10 years, and for 13 years prior thereto, Damke was an ordinary laboring man, working wherever he could obtain work, and when not working he stayed at the hotel of the witness in the city of Stockton, which he claimed to be his residence; that 20 years or more prior to his death he registered in the city of Stockton, and voted there. This witness also testified that he never heard Damke say anything about his residence during the aforesaid 10 years. The witness further stated that during the past 10 years Damke had been in the city of Stockton upon business four or five times, and stayed at his hotel during these visits, which only extended over a day or two. This may be said to be, in substance, all the evidence which was offered upon the issue of residence, and the court sees but one conclusion to be drawn from it. It points with certainty to the fact that Damke, at the time of his death, was a resident of the county of Sacramento. The court concludes that there is no substantial conflict in the evidence upon the issue of residence, and for the foregoing reasons the order and decree is reversed, and the cause remanded.

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS—COURTS—JURISDICTION.

1. A court appointing a special administrator of an estate acquires jurisdiction alone for the special purposes of that character of administration.

2. A court appointing a general administrator of an estate after the appointment of a special administrator pending appointment of a general administrator by the court of another county, thereby acquires jurisdiction of the estate, wherefore proceedings in the latter court should stand in abeyance.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; Joseph H. Budd, Judge.

Proceedings for the appointment of an administrator of the estate of Friedrich W. Damke (sometimes known as "Friedrich Damke," sometimes known as "Fred Damke"), deceased. From an order directing general letters of administration to be issued to S. B. Smith, public administrator of Sacramento county, C. C. Franklin, public administrator of San Joaquin county, appeals. Reversed.

Avery C. White, Buck, Miller & Clark, and Gus G. Grant, for appellant. Bruner & Brothers, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an appeal by C. C. Franklin, administrator of the estate of one Damke, deceased, from an order of the superior court of Sacramento county made and entered on August 4, 1900, directing general letters of administration upon said estate to be issued to S. B. Smith, public administrator of that county. The facts of this cause are closely connected with the facts of cause numbered "Sac. No. 898," entitled "In the Matter of the Estate of Fred W. Damke, Deceased" (65 Pac. 888), which involved an appeal from an order of the superior court of the county of San Joaquin appointing C. C. Franklin administrator of the estate of said deceased; and reference is herewith made to the opinion rendered upon that appeal, and filed this day, for additional facts. At the time appointed for the hearing of the application of the public administrator of Sacramento county for general letters of administration upon the estate of the aforesaid deceased, Franklin, public administrator of San Joaquin county, appeared, and filed an opposition thereto, wherein he set out that the estate was in due course of administration in the superior court of the county of San Joaquin, and that he had, by that court, already been appointed administrator of the estate of said deceased. At the hearing, evidence to this effect was offered by him, but was rejected by the court, and it is the soundness of this ruling that the present appeal has been brought to review. At the hearing it also appeared that prior to the time when the proceedings were inaugurated in the superior court of San Joaquin county, which led up to the appointment of a general administrator of the estate of the deceased, Damke, the superior court of Sacramento county had appointed Smith, the respondent herein, special administrator of the estate of said deceased. Upon this ground it was urged by respondent that jurisdiction over the administration of said estate had been first taken by the superior court of the county of Sacramento, and that, therefore, the cause was pending in that court at the time the proceedings were had in the superior court of the county of San Joaquin. Upon this state of facts the superior court of Sacramento county held that, it having first taken jurisdiction over the administration of the estate, that jurisdiction could not be interfered with by any subsequent procedure taken by the superior court of another county. The principle invoked by the Sacramento court to sustain its jurisdiction cannot be questioned. But it has been held in the opinion filed this day in the cause appealed from the superior court of the county of San Joaquin, and numbered "Sac. No. 898," that the superior court of Sacramento county, in taking jurisdiction over the administration for the purposes of appointing a special administrator, did not thereby secure jurisdiction over the estate of the deceased for the purpose of appointing a general administrator. With that declaration of the law the court is entirely satisfied. It necessarily follows that when the order from which the present appeal was taken was made in this case, the administration of the estate of Damke was progressing in the superior court of an adjoining county, which court had taken jurisdiction of the proceeding prior to the filing of the petition in Sacramento county for the appointment of a general administrator. In view of what has been said, the conclusion necessarily follows that the superior court of Sacramento county, upon the question of jurisdiction, should have given way, and allowed the superior court of San Joaquin county to conduct the further administration of the estate. It is not intended to intimate, under this rather peculiar state of facts, that the proceedings should be dismissed in the superior court of Sacramento county, but rather that they should stand in abeyance until a final judgment has been rendered in the superior court of the county of San Joaquin, holding that said court either has or has not jurisdiction over the administration of said estate. For the foregoing reasons, the order appointing a general administrator is reversed, and the cause remanded.

GUARDIAN AND WARD—GUARDIAN'S ACCOUNT —APPROPRIATION OF TRUST FUNDS—COM-POUND INTEREST—CONCLUSIVENESS OF FINDINGS.

1. Where an account of a guardian, though designated an "annual account," showed on its face that it extended over eight years, and the guardian had resigned, and another had been appointed, and the executrix of the guardian's bondsman appeared and filed a written consent, though the notice stated an annual accounting, the account was properly settled as the final account.

2. Where a guardian loaned money belonging to the trust estate to his bondsman, and received certain stocks and bonds in payment, the failure of the court to require the guardian's final account to show the amount actually invested in the stocks is not prejudicial to the bondsman.

3. Where a guardian invested his ward's money in stocks and bonds, and appropriated them to his own use, it was not error for the court to refuse to credit the guardian with such stock.

4. Trust funds appropriated by a guardian to his own use are chargeable to the guardian, with compound interest.

5. Where, in appeal from proceedings for the settlement of a guardian's final account, the evidence was not brought up, the findings are conclusive.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; John L. Campbell, Judge.

Proceedings for the final settlement of the account of Fred C. Howes, guardian of the estate of Ralph G. Dow, a minor. From a decree affirming the final account, Clara F. Howes, executrix of the will of Felix C. Howes, deceased, who was bondsman for said guardian, appeals. Affirmed.

Flint & Barker and Jones & Weller, for appellant. Albert J. Sherer, for respondent.

VAN DYKE, J. This appeal is taken by Clara F. Howes, executrix of the last will and testament of Felix C. Howes, deceased, from a decree settling the account of Fred C. Howes, as guardian of the estate of said Ralph G. Dow. The said guardian, April 15, 1899, filed his account, in which he states in his affidavit to the same that it "contains a full, true, and particular account of all my receipts and disbursements on account of the said estate from the 23d day of May, 1891, to the 13th day of April, 1899, and of all sums of money belonging to the said estate which have come into my hands as such guardian, or which have been received by any other person, by my order or authority, for my use." By said account a balance is found in his hands, to the credit of his ward, in the sum of $3,576.80. The appellant, as executrix of Felix C. Howes, deceased, filed objections to said account, in which it is stated that said Felix C. Howes, deceased, was one of the sureties on the bond given by the said Fred C. Howes upon qualifying as such guardian, and that he remained as such up to his death, 14th of September, 1898; that Fred C. Howes is insolvent, and is unable to pay the balance, shown by the said account to remain in his hands, due his ward; that said guardian in his account charged himself the sum of $1,628.01, as interest coming into his hands, which interest in fact never did come into his hands, and that said interest is computed with annual rests, whereas, if any interest should be charged against him, it should be no greater than simple interest on the principal sum found to be due; that said guardian had not given himself credit in his account with certain bonds, of the face value of $4,000 or more, coming into his hands as such guardian; and that said guardian invested the funds in said bonds in good faith, for the interest of his ward. After hearing upon the account and the objections thereto, the court found, among other matters, "that the said guardian invested all the money of said ward coming into his hands in bonds of the East Riverside Irrigation district and stock of the North Riverside Land & Water Company; that said investments were made in bad faith, and that the guardian at the time of said investment did not regard said stock or bonds worth the amount of money invested therein, but relied wholly upon the representations of Felix C. Howes, now deceased, from whom such purchases were made, that he would guaranty the repayment to said guardian of all sums of money so invested by him, together with 7 per cent. interest per annum, compounded annually, upon all sums so invested; that without said guaranty, verbally made, the said guardian would not have made said investment; that at the time of the appointment of said guardian, as such, up to and including the date of the death of said Felix C. Howes, to wit, on the 14th day of September, 1898, the said deceased was a man of large means, reputed to be worth about $250,000, and was the cashier of the Los Angeles National Bank, a banking institution of the city of Los Angeles, and was the uncle of said guardian, and that said guardian, during all of said time, was a paying teller of said Los Angeles National Bank, and was subject to the directions of said Felix C. Howes, deceased; that after receiving the moneys of said ward the said guardian loaned the same to Felix C. Howes, upon his own individual note, bearing interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, compounded annually; that said note was afterwards repaid, not in cash, but in the bonds and stock heretofore mentioned; that at all the times after the receipt of said moneys by said guardian he could have loaned the same, upon good security, at a rate of interest exceeding 7 per cent. per annum, compounded annually; that all of the investments made by said guardian were made without any order of court so to do; that said guardian received interest upon said bonds up to the 1st day of January, 1896, and that he commingled said interest with his own funds, and appropriated the same to his own use." It is further found "that on the 28th day of April, 1899, the said Fred C. Howes resigned his trust as said guardian, and thereupon his successor was duly appointed and qualified, and the said Fred C. Howes offered to turn over to said successor said bonds, but that said successor refused to accept the same, and that afterwards the said Fred C. Howes appropriated said bonds to his own use, and disposed of the same."

Appellant assigns the following as errors:

1. That the court erred in settling the account as a final account when it purports to be only an annual account. The Code provision with reference to the accounts of guardians reads: "The guardian must, upon the expiration of a year, from the time of his appointment, and as often thereafter as he may be required, present his account to the court for settlement and allowance." Code Civ. Proc. § 1774. The account in this case is headed: "Annual Account of Fred C. Howes, Guardian. C. C. P. 1623." "To cash received as follows, to wit: Balance on hand, as shown by account rendered May 23, 1891, $2,549.03." Then proceeds to carry forward, to the credit of the ward, annually, the cash balances, deducting expenditures for the use of the ward in clothing and books for schooling, etc., leaving a balance in the hands of the guardian as already stated. From the heading of the account it is evident that it was made up upon a printed blank prepared for executors and administrators as provided in the section of the Code referred to, to wit, Code Civ. Proc. § 1628. It would seem, however, from the heading, that he had rendered an annual account as mentioned in the section with reference to guardians, to wit, Code Civ. Proc. § 1774; and that this, although designated an annual account, was really intended for a final settlement of his guardianship; and the court, in its findings in settling the same, designates it as "the final account of Fred C. Howes, as guardian of said Ralph G. Dow, a minor," and it appears also that prior to the settlement of said account said Howes had resigned his trust as guardian, and another had been appointed in his place. This, therefore, as to him and the sureties on his bond as such guardian, was a final account. The appellant could not have been misled by the account having been called an annual account instead of a final account, nor by the fact that the notice for the settlement used the same term; for she appeared and filed a written contest, and took part in the settlement of said account. Upon its face it shows that it was not the account rendered at the expiration of one year after the appointment, and also that it was an account rendered nearly eight years thereafter; and the settlement in which appellant took part shows that it was the final settlement of the account of said guardian. The liability of the guardian to his ward was fixed by the final settlement of said account. The misnomer or misdescription of the paper filed as an account in this case is quite immaterial. In substance, it was the final account of the guardian, although miscalled "annual account," and the law respects form less than substance. It is the duty of the court to disregard any error or defect which does not affect the substantial rights of the parties. Code Civ. Proc. § 475.

2. The court did not err in not requiring the account to show the amount of money actually invested in the stocks and bonds referred to in the findings. That was not specified as one of the objections in the contest filed by the appellant. The money so paid, whatever the amount may have been, was received by the bondsman of said guardian whose estate is represented by appellant, and it is not apparent how the failure in not showing the amount so invested can prejudice the appellant.

3. It is claimed that the court should have given the guardian credit for the shares of stock and bonds resulting from the investment of the money of the ward. The findings, however, show that such stock and bonds were disposed of by said guardian, and the proceeds appropriated to his own use, together with the interest thereon.

4. It is claimed on the part of appellant that the court erred in charging the guardian compound interest. In Re Stott's Estate, 52 Cal. 403, the executor had mingled the funds of the estate with his own, but there was no evidence of actual profit, and it was held that he was responsible for presumed profits upon the moneys employed, "and that the general rule in such cases was that he should be charged with legal interest, with annual rests." The same rule was held in Re Clark's Estate, 53 Cal. 359; and in Re Cousins' Estate, 111 Cal. 445, 44 Pac. 183, it is said: "The general rule now thoroughly well established in this state, as to the limit of the liability of a trustee for mingling the trust funds with his own, and their use in his own business, where it is not shown that a larger profit was realized therefrom, is the return of the principal, with legal interest thereon, compounded annually. This rule is applicable alike to guardians and executors as to other trust relations."

5. It is finally claimed that the account should not have been settled, for the reason that the findings show that it does not contain a true and correct statement of the moneys of the ward received, invested, and disbursed by the guardian, and does not exhibit a true condition of the estate, but the findings are "that all the items of debits and credits appearing in said guardian's account are true and correct; that said account is entitled to be allowed and settled." And as conclusions of law: "That said account as presented is true and correct, and is entitled to be settled, and allowed as such; that the objections of said objector are not correct, and should not be allowed." And in the decree: "It is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the said account be, and the same hereby is, in all respects as the same was rendered and presented for settlement, approved, allowed, and settled as and for the final account of said guardian." The evidence not having been brought up, the findings are conclusive, and they are ample to support the decree. Decree affirmed.

MORTGAGES—FORECLOSURE SALE—TIME TO REDEEM—CHANGE OF STATUTE
—SALE FOR SURPLUS.

Plaintiff foreclosed a mortgage executed by defendant, and at the sale purchased the property for more than the mortgage debt, with costs and expenses added. At the time the mortgage was executed, the statutory right of redemption was limited to six months. Before the sale it was extended to one year. Held, that the time for redemption was fixed by the statute in force when the mortgage was executed, and was not affected by the change of statute, or fact that the premises sold for more than was due.

Rehearing denied August 14, 1901.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county; Edward I. Jones, Judge.

Action by M. Haynes against George W. Treadway and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Budd & Thompson, for appellants. J. B. Webster and J. T. Summerville, for respondents.

GAROUTTE, J. Plaintiff, as assignee, brings an action of foreclosure of mortgage against defendants, the mortgagors. He became the purchaser of the property at the sale, and six months thereafter, receiving his deed, he made an application for a writ of assistance, which writ was ordered issued. The present appeal is now prosecuted by defendants from the order granting the writ of assistance. At the time the mortgage was executed, the statutory right of redemption was limited to six months after the sale. At the time of the foreclosure sale the statute had been so amended that the right to redeem existed for twelve months. Defendants, in their brief, declare: "The only point involved in the appeal is whether or not the time of redemption for said property sold by the commissioner under foreclosure of said mortgage as against a purchaser at the foreclosure sale expired six months or one year after the time of said sale." We pass to the examination of the question thus presented. It appears by the record in this case that plaintiff became the purchaser at the foreclosure sale; that third parties were bidders at the sale, and bid an amount in excess of the amount of plaintiff's claim, including costs, interest, taxes, etc. It further appears that plaintiff became the purchaser at the sale at a price exceeding in amount his aforesaid claim, costs, expenses, etc., in the sum of about $350. By reason of this state of facts it is asserted by defendants that plaintiff stood in the position of a purchaser at an ordinary execution sale, and the principle of law is then invoked that the rights of a purchaser at an execution sale are determined by the law at the time of the sale. In other words, it is conceded that, if the purchaser had bid in the property at the sale for an amount less than his claim, that he would have been entitled to his deed at the expiration of six months from the sale; but, it is asserted that by reason of the fact that he bought for an amount exceeding his claim, including costs, etc., he was not entitled to his deed until twelve months after the day of sale. It is thus conceded that, if plaintiff had been a purchaser for the less amount, the statute, as amended, allowing the mortgagors twelve months to redeem, would have been as to him unconstitutional, because impairing the obligation of his mortgage contract; but it is asserted that by reason of the fact that the purchaser's price exceeded the amount of his claim in full the obligation of the mortgage contract was in no sense impaired, and therefore the statute as to the purchaser is constitutional. The court is not prepared to say that the constitutionality of an act can be tested in this way. Indeed, we see no difference in principle, when testing the constitutionality of this act, whether or not the purchaser bid in the property for an amount less than his claim or bid a sum in excess of that claim. By the mortgage contract incorporating therein the statute of redemption existing at the time, the agreement of the mortgagor was that the purchaser at the foreclosure sale, in case of default, should be entitled to the possession of the property six months after the sale in case no redemption was had. In another form it may be said that the agreement of the mortgagor was that the purchaser at the sale should have title to the property, subject to a right of possession thereafter in the mortgagor for six months. That was the contract in this case, and the necessary result of giving the amended statute effect here is to give the mortgagor the right to the possession of the property for twelve months after the sale. It is thus patent upon its face that a statute extending the right of possession in the mortgagor to a period of twelve months is a substantial impairment of the obligation of a contract limiting the right of possession to six months.

The mortgagee's security is the interest of the mortgagor in the property, less the equitable interest reserved to the mortgagor by the statute of redemption. The greater the reserved interest in the mortgagor, the less the security. If the interest of the mortgagor in the form of the right of redemption may be extended from a six-months interest to a twelve-months interest, after the contract between the parties has been executed, it may be extended from a six-months interest to a five or ten years' interest, and thus the security of the mortgagee absolutely wiped out. Defendants attempt, by the facts of this particular case, to take it without the general principles thus declared by saying the plaintiff here bought the property for an amount in excess of his claim, expenses, etc. As before suggested, we are unable to give that fact the force and effect which defendants seek to impress upon it. Who can say that the third parties, or the purchaser himself, would have bid the amounts for this property which the record shows they bid, if the mortgage contract had not been that the mortgagors were entitled to but six months within which to redeem? No court can say but that the period of redemption fixed by the mortgage contract was the actuating cause which induced them to bid an amount for the property in excess of the claims of plaintiff. In support of the views declared by the court, we have conclusive authority in a recent case decided by the supreme court of the United States. Barnitz v. Beverly, 163 U. S. 118, 16 Sup. Ct. 1042, 41 L. Ed. 93. The court there said: "Without pursuing the subject further, we hold that a statute which authorizes the redemption of property sold upon foreclosure of a mortgage, where no right of redemption previously existed, or which extends the period of redemption beyond the time formerly allowed, cannot constitutionally apply to a sale under a mortgage executed before its passage." Again, it is said: "An equitable estate in the premises may, in like manner, be conferred upon others; and the right to redeem may be so prolonged as to deprive the mortgagee of the benefit of his security by rendering the property unsalable for anything like its value. This law gives to the mortgagor and to the judgment creditors [meaning creditors other than the mortgagee] an equitable estate in the premises, which neither of them would have been entitled to under the original contract; and these new interests are directly and materially in conflict with those which the mortgagee acquired when the mortgage was made. Any such modification of a contract by subsequent legislation, against the consent of one of the parties, unquestionably impairs its obligations, and is prohibited by the constitution." This case and the case at bar are alike in principle, except that in Barnitz v. Beverly the mortgagee bought the property for less than the amount of her claim. Yet, as already suggested, this difference in the facts does not affect the principle of law involved. The supreme court of the United States tested the constitutionality of the act involved in that case by weighing its provisions. By the face of the act itself, it was tried and condemned, and here the act must stand or fall by the strength or weakness of its provisions. In this case the amended act, fixing the right of redemption at a period of twelve months, was unconstitutional and void as to this mortgage contract when it was enacted, or it was at that time and is now a valid statute affecting that mortgage contract. The mortgage contract said that the mortgagor should have six months in which to redeem. The amended statute declared that the same mortgagor should have twelve months in which to redeem. Thus the obligation of the mortgagee's contract was impaired when the amendatory act was passed, or it was not impaired at all. See, also, Bank v. Barrett, 126 Cal. 413, 58 Pac. 914.

Defendants rely upon the case of Insurance Co. v. Cushman, 108 U. S. 51, 2 Sup. Ct. 236, 27 L. Ed. 648. In speaking as to that case the court said in Barnitz v. Beverly, supra: "The case of Insurance Co. v. Cushman, 108 U. S. 51, 2 Sup. Ct. 236, 27 L. Ed. 648, does not collide with the previous and subsequent cases. There the new statute did not lessen the duty of the mortgagor to pay what he had contracted to pay, nor affect the time of payment, nor affect any remedy which the mortgagee had by existing law for the enforcement of his contract." Possibly, there is language in the Insurance Company Case which collides with Barnitz v. Beverly, but, if so, the collision only results in injury to the earlier case. While in the Insurance Company Case the fact is disclosed that the mortgagee at the sale bought in the property for the full amount of his claim, and while the statement of that fact is reiterated in the opinion of the court, still it does not appear to be the pivotal fact in the case, and the conclusion arrived at, judging by the reasoning of the court, would have been the same in the absence of that particular fact. The order appealed from is affirmed.

SMITH v. BLANDIN. (Sac. 663.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 24, 1901.)

CONTRACTS FOR SALE OF LAND—RESCISSON—CONSIDERATION—FAILURE TO PERFORM—ACTIONS—COMPLAINT—DUPPLICITY—TENDER.

1. Under Civ. Code, §§ 1689, 3406, providing that a party may rescind a contract if, through the fault of the other party, the consideration fails in whole or in part; and section 1691, providing that, on rescission, everything of value received must be restored,—a complaint alleging that the sole consideration for a contract to convey land was one dollar and defendant's agreement to pay the price in installments at specified times, that such times had passed without payment, and the one dollar was returned, states a cause of action.

2. Under Civ. Code, § 1689, providing that a party to a contract may rescind if, through the fault of the other party, the consideration fails in whole or in part, when the contract to sell land is executory the failure of either party to perform his undertaking constitutes a failure of consideration.

3. The complaint in an action to rescind a contract to convey land, on the ground of defendant's failure to make payments as agreed, alleged that defendant had no intention to perform. Held, that the complaint was not demurrable for duplicity, since such allegation was not a statement of a separate cause of action, under Civ. Code, § 1572, providing that actual fraud consists of a promise made without any intention of performing it, to induce another party to enter into the contract.

4. Where plaintiff contracted to convey land to defendant on payments in installments, a certain amount of land, to be selected by defendant, to be conveyed after each payment, plaintiff need not tender a deed before bringing an action to rescind because defendant failed to make any payments.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county; Joseph H. Budd, Judge.

Action by James C. Smith against Charles F. Blandin. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Nowlin & Fassett and Farrall & Carroll, for appellant. Nicol, Orr & Nutter, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, C. Action to rescind a certain agreement between plaintiff and defendant for the sale of land. Defendant demurred to the complaint on several grounds. His demurrer was overruled, and, defendant declining to answer, the court gave judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals from the judgment by bill of exceptions.

Plaintiff alleged ownership and possession of the land. That on June 30, 1898, plaintiff and defendant entered into the contract in question, which is set out in the complaint. By the terms of the contract plaintiff agreed to sell the land to defendant by bargain and sale deed, free from all incumbrances, "upon his demand and payment therefor as herein provided." The tract consisted of 2,231.42 acres, and the entire purchase price was $400,000. The consideration mentioned was $1, receipt of which was acknowledged, "and of the further payment of $100,000 on or before October 30, 1899, in installments of $10,000 each, beginning on the 30th day of October, 1898, and continuing on the 30th day of each and every month, until said $100,000 was fully paid; and the further payment of $75,000 on or before October 30, 1900, and $75,000 on or before October 30, 1901, and $75,000 October 30, 1902, and $75,000 October 30, 1903,—making in all $400,000. Interest was to be paid annually thereon at 6½ per cent. There were stipulations in the contract that as payments were made plaintiff was to convey a part of the land. Upon the first payment being made as agreed, plaintiff was to convey land at the rate of $250 per acre, in a certain part of the tract "as may be elected or selected by" defendant, and so as to other payments; certain parts of the tract being designated out of which defendant was to make his selection. It was alleged "that the only consideration for the said contract received by this plaintiff was the promise and agreement on the part of defendant, Charles F. Blandin, to pay to this plaintiff the sums of money mentioned and specified in said contract at the times and in the amounts in said agreement specified"; that the first installment became payable October 30, 1898, but was not paid and has not been paid, "nor has he, said Blandin, at any time offered to pay said sum or any part thereof; that, through the fault of him, said Blandin, the consideration for said contract has failed." It is further alleged that the promises of defendant "were the considerations for the said agreement, and this plaintiff, in consideration of such promises and agreements; and not otherwise, made and executed said contract; that plaintiff believed and relied upon said promises and agreements made by said Blandin, and thereby he was induced to and did make and deliver said contract to him, said Blandin; and the plaintiff, on information and belief, alleges that said Blandin, at the time of making said agreements, had no intention to perform the same; that plaintiff has faithfully kept and performed said contract, and has at all times since the making thereof been ready, able, and willing to do and perform each and every act and thing therein and thereby required to be done and performed by him; that on the 1st day of November, 1898, plaintiff notified said Charles F. Blandin that he rescinded the said contract and the whole thereof, and at the same time he restored to him, said Blandin, everything of value which he received from him under said contract, viz. the sum of one dollar in silver coin of the government of the United States; that notwithstanding the said failure of consideration and rescission said Blandin continues, without right, to assert and claim some interest in said premises under said contract." The complaint prays judgment decreeing "that by said rescission the said contract is extinguished and is of no force or effect"; that defendant has "no interest in or claim to the said described premises, or any part thereof, under, by virtue, or because of said contract," and for costs of action, "and for such other or further relief as to this honorable court may seem proper in the premises."

The demurrer on the ground of ambiguity will not be considered, as defendant does not insist upon it in his brief. A demurrer was interposed on the ground of misjoinder of causes of action; also a general demurrer on the grounds (1) that the complaint fails to show tender of a deed or offer to convey before the action was commenced; (2) it fails to show that plaintiff offered to permit defendant to select any lands which by the agreement he was to select on payment of $10,000, or that plaintiff offered to join defendant in such selection; (3) it fails to show that plaintiff is able to perform.

Defendant's brief is directed mainly to his general demurrer, and his points may be summarized as follows: (1) That there is a failure to state a cause of action on the ground of fraud, under section 1572, Civ. Code, for the reason that there is no statement that plaintiff was induced to enter into the contract under promises of defendant made with intent to deceive plaintiff; (2) the contract cannot be rescinded for failure of consideration, because time is not of its essence, and also because there was no tender of a deed to defendant.

The misjoinder of actions relied on was that a cause of action to rescind upon the ground of actual fraud is united with a cause of action to rescind upon the ground of failure of consideration, and not separately stated. Plaintiff is proceeding under section 1689, Civ. Code, and not under section 1572, as claimed. Section 3406, Civ. Code, provides that "the rescission of a written contract may be adjudged, on the application of a party aggrieved, (1) in any of the cases mentioned in section 1689"; and this latter section provides that "a party to a contract may rescind the same in the following cases only: * * * (2) If, through the fault of the party as to whom he rescinds the consideration for his obligation fails, in whole or in part; (3) if such consideration becomes entirely void for any cause; (4) if such consideration, before it is rendered to him, fails in any material respect, from any cause." Section 1691, Id., prescribes the conditions upon which rescission can be accomplished, and they are: (1) That he must rescind promptly; and (2) he must restore to the other party everything of value which he has received from him under the contract.

It is not necessary to inquire whether the complaint states facts sufficient to constitute a good ground for rescission for fraud. The contract is executory. As was said in Richter v. Stock Co., 129 Cal. 367, 62 Pac. 39: "In all executory contracts, the several obligations of the parties constitute to each, reciprocally, the consideration of the contract; and a failure to perform constitutes a failure of consideration, either partial or total, as the case may be, within the meaning of section 1689 of the Civil Code." The complaint states that plaintiff promised to convey upon payment being made by defendant at the time agreed, and that the consideration which induced plaintiff to enter into the contract was such payment by defendant. The failure of defendant to make the payment as agreed constituted a failure of consideration, and plaintiff could at once rescind, as he alleges he did, having first returned to defendant everything of value received by plaintiff. If there existed any equitable considerations which would entitle defendant to performance, they cannot be determined on the demurrer, but should have been pleaded by answer. The contention that the complaint lacks in the vital particular that it does not show time to have been of the essence of the contract cannot be maintained. The complaint could not so state, for the contract contained no such provision. Nevertheless the breach on defendant's part was complete when he failed to pay as he agreed. What the respective rights of the parties would be had the contract contained the clause as to time being of its essence need not be considered. But if it had contained such a provision defendant would be required to perform before he could avail himself of it. He could not refuse to make any payment, and at the same time hold plaintiff to performance. Where the contract does not contain a provision that time is to be of its essence, defendant's rights are defined in section 1492 of the Civil Code. See, for a full consideration of meaning of the clause referred to, and as to the rights of the purchaser, Glock v. Colony Co., 123 Cal. 1, 55 Pac. 713, 43 L. R. A. 199.

Plaintiff was not called upon to deliver, or offer to deliver, a deed before rescinding. Defendant put himself in default by failure to make the payment he had agreed to make. The contract left with defendant the selection of the land to be deeded upon any payment made. Plaintiff could not know in advance what land defendant would select, and he could not, without such knowledge, make tender of a deed. It was only after payment and selection made by defendant that plaintiff was to convey.

Nor can we discover any misjoinder of causes of action. Plaintiff is not rescinding on the ground of fraud, in its legal sense. The ground for rescission is the failure of consideration caused by defendant's breach of the contract.

The facts alleged state but one cause of action. The complaint, when reduced to concrete form, simply alleges plaintiff's right as growing out of his agreement to sell and defendant's agreement to purchase, and alleges defendant's wrong in refusing to perform his part of the contract, out of which arises the cause of action alleged.

There was a motion to strike out certain portions of the complaint, and the bill of exceptions brings up for review the order denying the motion. The alleged error is not now urged. It is advised that the judgment be affirmed.

GERMAIN FRUIT CO. v. CALIFORNIA S.
R. CO. (L. A. 834.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 24, 1901.)

CARRIERS—RAILROADS—CONTRACTS—CON-STRUCTION.

Plaintiff delivered a shipment of oranges to the defendant to be transported to C., a place beyond the terminus of defendant's road. The bill of lading provided that the goods were to be transported over defendant's road to the company's freight station, "as designated below," and the only place mentioned in the bill was C, though this was in connection with a guaranty of the freight rate. The contract also limited the liability of the defendant to its own road. Held, that the defendant contracted to transport the goods to C., and was liable for delivering them to the wrong parties at such station.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; M. T. Allen, Judge.

Action by the Germain Fruit Company against the California Southern Railroad Company. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

C. N. Sterry and Henry J. Stevens, for appellant. J. S. Chapman, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This action is brought against defendant, a common carrier, to recover as damages the value of 300 boxes of oranges consigned by plaintiff at Los Angeles to itself at Chicago. Upon the arrival of this fruit at Chicago, a mistake in the delivery thereof was made, and negligence in this regard is charged against defendant. The case is here upon an agreed statement of facts, and the construction of the contract entered into between the parties is the real question before the court. The aforesaid contract is evidenced by a writing, and the material part thereof is as follows: "California Southern Railroad Co. Bill of Lading. * * * Los Angeles, Cal., May 6, 1887. Received from Germain Fruit Co. the following described packages in apparent good order, * * * consigned as marked and numbered in the margin, to be transported over the line of this road to the company's freight station, as designated below, and delivered in like good order to the consignee or owner, or to the order of said consignee or owner, at said station, or to such company or carriers (if the same are destined to a point beyond said station) whose line may be considered a part of the route, to the place of destination of said goods or packages, it being distinctly understood that the responsibility of this company as a common carrier shall cease at the station where delivered to such person or carrier, the company being liable as warehousemen only; but it guaranties, upon the conditions expressed herein, * * * that the rate of freight for the transportation of said packages from the place of shipment to Chicago shall not exceed $1.15 per cwt. and charges advanced by this company." The important question presented from a construction of the foregoing writing is, did the defendant agree to transport this fruit to Chicago? It is contended upon the part of defendant that it only agreed to transport it to Barstow, the terminus of its road. It needs but a glance at the entire writing to justify the declaration that it is somewhat vague and indefinite; and, as pointed out by this court in the case of Colfax Mountain Fruit Co. v. Southern Pac. Co., 118 Cal. 649, 50 Pac. 775, 40 L. R. A. 78, the indefiniteness and ambiguities in this character of contract arise largely from the fact that railroad companies use the same form of shipping contract for the transportation of freight upon their own lines alone as they do for the transportation of freight upon their own lines in conjunction with connecting lines. Litigation of the character here involved would be to a great degree avoided if different forms of shipping contracts were used for these different classes of transportation. It will also be borne in mind that in the consideration of the question before us it is a material element that this form of contract was prepared by defendant. A railroad company, as a common carrier, may contract to carry freight beyond the terminus of its own line of road, thereby making connecting lines its agents for that purpose (Colfax Mountain Fruit Co. v. Southern Pacific Co., supra); and we have concluded that such was the character of the contract made in this case. As already suggested, by reason of a single printed form being used in all of its contracts for the carriage of freight, apparent inconsistencies show themselves in the context of this instrument; yet that it was the intention of both parties defendant should transport this fruit to Chicago is made plain. It is recited in the agreed statement of facts "that the California Southern Railroad Company, the California Central Railway Company, and the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company are all parts of a general system of the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railroad Company," and it was upon the respective lines of this general system that this fruit was transported to Chicago. The fruit was consigned to plaintiff at Chicago. Freight was paid upon it to Chicago. It was carried to Chicago without change of cars; and the defendant agreed to transport the fruit "over the line of this road to the company's freight station, as designated below." Upon examination of this contract "below," we find the following: "But it guaranties * * * that the rate of freight for the transportation of said packages from the place of shipment to Chicago shall not exceed," etc. Thus it appears that Chicago is the station designated. It is not only the station designated "below," but it is the only station designated in any portion of the instrument. If the word "Chicago" had been used in the body of the writing in lieu of the words "designated below," then there could be no question whatever as to the proper construction to be given the language. Yet, if these words "designated below" mean anything, they must be held to refer to the word "Chicago." If this be not so, then there was no express contract to carry the fruit to any designated place or station, for no other place or station is suggested. Barstow, a station claimed by appellant to be the terminal point of its road, is not mentioned anywhere in the instrument.

Appellant attaches importance to the clause in the agreement limiting its liability as a common carrier to its own line of road. It is only necessary to say that if appellant agreed to deliver this fruit to a named consignee in Chicago, and delivered it to some one else there, then a breach of its contract was committed, and a clear legal liability established. The court is satisfied that the complaint is sufficiently broad to justify a recovery upon that theory.

For the foregoing reasons it is ordered that the judgment and order appealed from be affirmed.

O'LEARY v. CASTLE et al. (L. A. 818.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 2, 1901.)

APPEAL—MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL—INSUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—SPECIFICATIONS.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 659, providing that, when the notice of motion for new trial designates as the ground of the motion the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the decision, the statement shall specify the particulars in which such evidence is alleged to be insufficient, the question of want of evidence to support the findings cannot be considered on appeal where there are no such specifications.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Kern county; J. W. Mahon, Judge.

Action by Timothy O'Leary against Zerah Castle and another. From a judgment for plaintiff and from an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

W. A. Harris and L. R. Garrett, for appellants. Charles L. Batcheller, for respondent.

COOPER, C. This action was brought to recover $2,000, balance claimed to be due plaintiff upon a written contract for services in the development of certain mines, upon a contingent contract providing for such payment in case of the said mines being sold. Findings were filed, upon which judgment was entered for plaintiff. Appellants made a motion for a new trial, which was denied, and this appeal is from the judgment and order, upon the judgment roll and a statement on motion for new trial. It is claimed that certain findings are not supported by the evidence, but we cannot examine this question on the record here presented. The Code provides that, when the notice of motion for new trial designates as the ground of the motion the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the decision, "the statement shall specify the particulars in which such evidence is alleged to be insufficient." Code Civ. Proc. § 659. In this case the statement contains no specification whatever. It was settled June 3, 1899. There is printed in the record what appears to be a copy of certain specifications as to the alleged insufficiency, but it is no part of the statement, is wholly without authentication, and is signed by appellants' attorneys only. It is marked "Filed June 12, 1899." This paper is no part of the statement or record.

It is also argued that the appellants were improperly joined with the other defendants in the action. The court found that there was no misjoinder, and we must presume that the finding is supported by the evidence, in the absence of any specification of insufficiency. The judgment is the legal conclusion from the facts found. The court found that the said $2,000 is wholly unpaid, and that appellants are indebted to plaintiff for said amount. The judgment and order should be affirmed.

ANDERSON v. SOUTHERN PAC. R. CO. (L. A. 866.)

APPEAL—FINDING OF FACT.

In an action to recover purchase money paid on contracts for the sale of lands claimed by defendant under grants from the United States, which contracts provided that the money was to be returned in case "it shall finally be determined" that patents shall not issue to the defendant, a finding that neither the supreme court of the United States nor any court had determined that patents should not issue to the defendants for the land in question was a finding of fact, and not a conclusion of law; the complaint alleging that a contrary finding had been made by the United States supreme court, which allegation was denied.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Lucien Shaw, Judge.

Action by C. V. Anderson against the Southern Pacific Railroad Company. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Anderson & Anderson, for appellant. Wm. Singer, Jr., and H. V. Reardan, for respondent.

VAN DYKE, J. This action is brought to recover purchase money paid on several contracts given by the defendant to two certain parties, and by them assigned to plaintiff, for the sale of lands claimed by defendant under grants from the United States. Among other things, each of said contracts contains the following clause, to wit: "It is further agreed between the parties hereto that the party of the first part claims all the tracts hereinbefore described as part of a grant of lands to it by the congress of the United States; that patent has not yet issued to it for said tracts; that it will use ordinary diligence to procure patents for them; that as, in consequence of circumstances beyond its control, it sometimes fails to obtain patent for lands that seem to be a portion of its said grant, therefore, nothing in this instrument shall be considered a guaranty or assurance that patent or title will be procured; that in case it be finally determined that patent shall not issue to said party of the first part for all or any of the tracts herein described, it will, upon demand, repay, without interest, to the party of the second part, all moneys that may have been paid to it by him on account of any such tracts as it shall fail to procure patent for." The court found "that it has not been finally determined by the supreme court of the United States, or by any court or tribunal, that patents should not issue to the defendant for the lands described in each of the several counts of the plaintiff's complaint herein, or for any part or parcel thereof." Appellant contends this is not a finding of facts, but a conclusion of law. In this he is clearly mistaken. It is alleged in the complaint "that it has been finally determined by the supreme court of the United States that patents for said tracts of land shall not issue to the defendant company," and without such an averment in the complaint it would have failed to state a cause of action. The answer denies specifically this allegation of the complaint, thus presenting an issue of fact, and a vital one at that. Under this state of the pleadings, the burden was upon the plaintiff to establish by evidence, documentary or otherwise, the affirmative of that issue, and the court by its findings says he did not do so. On an appeal like this from the judgment, upon the judgment roll alone, without a bill of exceptions or statement, this court can only examine the findings upon which the judgment is based; "all between that and the pleadings drop out of the case." Harper v. Minor, 27 Cal. 109. This rule is thoroughly well settled. Tomlinson v. Ayres, 117 Cal. 568, 49 Pac. 717; Hayne, New Trials, § 229, and cases there cited. In the absence of the evidence, the opinions of courts cited by appellant's counsel are of no avail, for it cannot be said that the facts proved here are identical with the facts proved in such cited cases. Judgment affirmed.

"DUE"—"OWING."

1. Where a claim against the estate of a decedent consists of a note not then due, a copy of the note, followed by the statutory affidavit, is sufficient, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1494, which requires that "if the claim be not due when presented, or be contingent, the particulars of such claim must be stated."

2. Where a note is payable on or before the completion of a specified contract, the promise to pay is absolute; the completion of the contract merely fixing the time of payment.

3. An affidavit to a claim against the estate of a decedent, which is actually owing, but not then payable, is not false in stating that such claim is "due," since the word is there used in its primary sense of "owing."

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; Joseph W. Hughes, Judge.

Action by the Crocker-Woolworth National Bank of San Francisco against Malissa S. Carle, executrix of the will of Silas Carle, deceased. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Chas. M. Beckwith, for appellant. Holl & Dunn, for respondent.

SMITH, C. The plaintiff sued as assignee to recover the amount due on a promissory note of date August 5, 1897, made by Silas Carle, the defendant's testator, to the "Rae Building & Contracting Co." for the sum of $1,000; "said amount to be paid on or before the completion of a certain contract entered into the month of September, 1896, by and between [the maker] and the board of regents of the University of California," etc., and assigned to the plaintiff. The complaint, besides the other necessary allegations, alleges the death of the maker on or about September 20, 1897, the presentation of the claim to the executrix May 13, 1898, and its rejection; but it is further alleged that the contract referred to in the note was completed on or about September 8, 1898, i. e. subsequent to the presentation of the claim. Judgment was rendered for the defendant on demurrer.

The principal objection made to the complaint is that the note was not due when presented, and that the claim does not conform to the provisions of section 1494, Code Civ. Proc., which requires that "if the claim be not due when presented, or be contingent, the particulars of such claim must be stated." The claim—of which a copy is attached to the complaint—is in the usual form, containing a copy of the note, followed by the affidavit required by the provisions of the section cited. This, we think, was a substantial compliance with the law, and that "the particulars of the claim are sufficiently stated." Landis v. Woodman, 126 Cal. 454, 58 Pac. 857. As said in the case cited: "A promissory note past due requires no statement of particulars other than that found upon its face; yet there is no good reason why the law should make any different rules in the two cases,"—i. e. in the cases of notes before and after maturity. It is, however, claimed by the counsel for respondent that the case at bar is to be distinguished from the case cited in the following particulars: (1) The promise to pay, it is claimed, is in this case contingent on the completion of the contract referred to in the note; or (2) if not contingent, the date of payment is uncertain; and (3) the affidavit that the claim was due was false. But we do not think that any of these objections can be sustained. The promise to pay was not contingent, but was absolute. The completion of the contract was referred to merely as fixing the time. 1 Daniel, Neg. Inst. §§ 44, 88; Cota v. Buck, 7 Metc. (Mass.) 588, 41 Am. Dec. 464. The note involved in Chandler v. Carey, 64 Mich. 237, 31 N. W. 309, cited by respondent's counsel, was altogether different. The other cases cited have no application, except Cota v. Buck, supra. It is immaterial that the time of payment was not a fixed date. It was a matter more peculiarly within the knowledge of the executrix than of the plaintiff. Finally, the affidavit was not false in saying the claim was "due." The word was evidently used in its primary and proper sense, as meaning simply "owing." Cent. Dig., word "Due," par. 6; Bouv. Law Dict., same word. The word is also sometimes used in the sense of "payable," but this is a secondary sense. In section 1494, Code Civ. Proc., it is used in both senses, viz. in the clause "if the claim be not due when presented," etc., and in the clause "every claim which is due," etc., where the term is used in the sense of "payable," and in the clause "justly due," required in the affidavit, where it is used in the sense of "owing." Otherwise, no affidavit would be required in the case of claims presented before maturity.

An objection is also made to the complaint that it is not alleged that the payee of the note was a corporation, or a co-partnership, or a mere nonentity. Such an allegation was quite unnecessary; but were it otherwise, the note, which is attached to the complaint as part of it, was written on a bill head of the payee, where the concern named in the note is expressly referred to as "incorporated." Evidence of the fact is therefore furnished by the writing itself, signed by the maker. I advise that the judgment be reversed.

CHIPMAN, C. Action to quiet title. The cause was dismissed as to all the defendants except Dorn. James H. Blackburn died testate, and in his will he provided as follows: "I give, devise, and bequeath to Frank Blackburn, Harry Blackburn, Daniel Blackburn, and Frederick Blackburn, children of Daniel and Cecelia Blackburn, my dairy ranches, part of the Rancho San Jeronimo, in San Luis Obispo, state of California, together with all the personal property thereon; and for the better preservation of said property, I hereby appoint their mother, Mrs. Cecilia Blackburn, trustee for said children and property, to have and to hold said property, and the whole thereof, and to manage the same, until the youngest of said children shall have attained his majority, at which event said property shall vest absolutely in the four children in this devise mentioned, and not before." On August 17, 1888, the property in question was distributed, in accordance with the terms of the will, to the said Cecilia Blackburn, "as such trustee, to have and to hold said property, and the whole thereof, and to manage the same, until the youngest of said children shall have attained his majority, at which event said property shall vest absolutely in said four children." No appeal was taken from the decree. The trust was accepted, the trustee went into possession under the decree, and ever since has been in possession, "and every year during her said possession she has collected and received the rents, issues, and profits of said real property." All the devisees are adults except Frederick Blackburn, who is a minor. On December 20, 1895, Harry Blackburn, one of said devisees, conveyed to defendant Dorn, by deed of grant, bargain, and sale, for a valuable consideration, an undivided one-sixteenth of all the said real property, "together with all and singular the tenements * * * rents, issues, and profits thereof," and said Dorn is still "the owner of the property, estate, and interest, rents, issues, and profits so conveyed to him," being an undivided one-fourth of the aforesaid interest of said Harry Blackburn. Defendant Dorn, ever since the delivery to him of said deed, has claimed, and now claims, to be entitled to the rents, issues, and profits accruing since the date of his deed, and is entitled to have the same paid to him, from time to time, as they accrue. From the foregoing facts, taken from the findings, the court found as conclusions of law that plaintiff, as trustee of the devisees of the will and their successors in interest, "owns an estate in the above-described land, with its tenements, * * * during the minority of said Frederick Blackburn; that she has a right to hold, possess, and manage the whole of said property during said minority, for the purposes of the trust; that she has no other or greater estate * * * in or to said property; * * * and that she has a right to have her afore-said estate and title quieted, in accordance with this conclusion." As to defendant Dorn the court found, in accordance with the foregoing facts, that, "upon the termination of said estate during minority, he or his successor in interest will be entitled to the possession of said real property, as tenant in common with whoever may then own the other undivided interest or interests in said property"; and it was adjudged in the judgment that he would be entitled to his proportion of the rents, issues, and profits "which will accrue after the termination of said estate during minority." The appeal is from the judgment on the judgment roll.

The sole question is, may defendant Dorn compel the payment to him of a proportionate shares of the rents, issues, and profits of the land from December 20, 1895, and during the minority of Frederick Blackburn? We must look to the decree of distribution to discover the interest in the property owned by appellant's grantor at the date of his deed. Williams v. Marx, 124 Cal. 22, 56 Pac. 603, and cases there cited. By the creation of the trust the whole estate vested in the trustee, "subject only to the execution of the trust. The beneficiaries take no estate or interest in the property, but may enforce the performance of the trust." Civ. Code, § 863; In re Walkerly's Estate, 108 Cal. 627, 41 Pac. 772, 49 Am. St. Rep. 97. No present interest in the land passed to the children, but a future estate vested (Id. §§ 680, 690, 694), and could be transferred (Id. § 699). It is also true that under section 867 of the same Code, as it now reads, the beneficiary of a trust for the receipt of the rents and profits of real property may transfer his right thereto (Fatjo v. Swasey, 111 Cal. 628, 44 Pac. 225), notwithstanding the provisions of section 863, supra. But unless such a trust was here created, the section would not apply.

Appellant contends that the only right given by the decree of distribution to the trustee is to "have and hold" and "manage" the land, that there is no authority given the trustee to receive the rents, certainly none to accumulate them, and that it follows that the beneficiaries are entitled to the rents as fast as they accrue; citing Coburn v. Anderson, 131 Mass. 513. This case does not support appellant. The testator made the following provision in his will: "I give and devise to my said executor eight hundred dollars in money, to have and to hold the same to the use of my sister S., as follows: I desire, in case my sister S. should at any time need assistance or come to want, that my executor should expend such part of said eight hundred dollars as will make her comfortable and keep her so during her lifetime. The remainder, if any, * * * at the time of the decease of said S., I give and devise to my brother, said P., and his heirs." It was held that the testator intended to create a trust in the money given for the use of S., and that he also intended that the income of the fund should be paid to her during life, and so much of the principal as might be necessary for her comfortable support, if she should come to want. We find no intention in the devise before us, nor can the decree be construed to mean, that the incomes were to be paid to the devisees as they accrued. The decree conveys the land to Mrs. Blackburn as "trustee, to have and to hold said property, and the whole thereof, and to manage the same, until the youngest of said children shall have attained his majority, at which event said property shall vest absolutely in" said four children. It was competent for the testator to create a trust to receive the rents and profits, and to accumulate the same, within the limits prescribed by title 2, pt. 1, of the Civil Code; section 857, subd. 4, Id. The testator, however, did not specifically provide for the disposition of the accruing incomes, nor did the decree do so, for it followed the language of the will. We are left to determine the question from the language used in the decree. By it the legal title to the land vested in the trustee, and, in the absence of any provision as to incomes, carried with it the right to the rents and profits, for she was to have and to hold and manage the property during the continuance of the trust, and it was not to vest in the beneficiaries until the happening of the future event named. What right the beneficiaries may have at the termination of the trust to the accumulated incomes, should there be any, is a question not now necessarily before us, and need not be decided.

No question is raised as to the right of plaintiff to the relief prayed for. The judgment quiets plaintiff's title as against the present right of Dorn to demand and receive any part of the rents and profits of the property, and in our opinion the judgment should be affirmed, and we so advise.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; GRAY, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is affirmed

JOHNSON-LOCKE MERCANTILE CO. v.
HOWARD. (Sac. 778.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 25, 1901.)

CONTRACTS—SALES—TENDER—QUALITY.

1. Defendant, in writing, authorized plaintiff to sell all his crop of raisins at specified prices and terms. Shortly after, plaintiff notified him by letter that sale had been so made, repeating the prices and terms, and asking confirmation. Defendant answered that he wished to confirm sale to plaintiff of his entire crop at the prices and terms specified. Plaintiff answered, accepting the modification, making it the purchaser, and inquiring when the raisins would be ready for inspection and shipment. At the time defendant said the crop would be ready, plaintiff sent its agent, who inspected and accepted all except a few boxes, which he claimed were marked a grade too high; but said he would accept them at the grade they actually inspected. Afterwards defendant refused to deliver any of the raisins. Held, that there was a contract binding on defendant to sell all his crop to plaintiff at the prices and terms specified.

2. Where, on a contract for the purchase of raisins, plaintiff tendered its check for the proper amount in payment, and no objection was made to the amount or form of the tender, defendant cannot afterwards object that the tender was not in money.

3. Where defendant contracted to sell his entire crop of raisins to be Fresno grade, he could not invalidate the contract by marking boxes of a higher quality than the raisins would grade, but plaintiff was entitled to the crop at the actual grades by the standard agreed on in the contract.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Yolo county; E. E. Gaddis, Judge.

Action by the Johnson-Locke Mercantile Company against H. C. Howard. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

E. R. Bush (R. Clark, of counsel), for appellant. Hudson Grant, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Action on contract for the sale and purchase of certain raisins. Plaintiff had judgment, from which, and from the order denying his motion for a new trial, defendant appeals.

The court found the following facts: (1) That on or about July 30, 1898, the plaintiff agreed to buy from defendant, and defendant agreed to sell to plaintiff, the entire crop of muscat raisins of defendant, produced in the year 1898, estimated to be eight car loads, at the following prices, to wit: For 2-crown raisins, $2\frac{1}{2}$ cents per pound; for 3-crown raisins, 3 cents per pound; for 4-crown raisins, 4 cents per pound; for seedless raisins, $2\frac{1}{2}$ cents per pound,—less 5 per cent. of the gross amount computed at the above rates. Whole crop to be boxed in 50-pound boxes, and to be shipped in October, 1898. Fresno grading. Terms cash on delivery f. o. b. Woodland, Cal. (2) That the crop fell far short of the estimate, there being only 2,192 boxes, as follows: 1,158 boxes of 2-crown raisins, 734 boxes of 3-crown, 88 boxes of 4-crown, and 212 boxes of seedless raisins, of the aggregate value of \$2,840.02. (3) That on October 31, 1898, plaintiff offered to accept the above-mentioned quantities in fulfillment of defendant's agreement, and tendered him therefor the sum of \$2,860.21 (being \$20.19 in excess of the amount due), and demanded delivery, but defendant refused to deliver the raisins, or any part thereof, to plaintiff's damage in the sum of \$814.72. (4) That the tender made by plaintiff was a draft on plaintiff, payable to defendant's order, for \$2,860.21, "which the defendant refused to accept, and refused to deliver the raisins, or any part thereof; but at the time of the tender of the check aforesaid, the defendant made no objection to the said check, or to the amount thereof, or to the form or manner of the plaintiff's tender." Defendant alleged in his answer, in effect, that negotiations were entered upon in July, 1898, for the purchase by plaintiff and sale by defendant of the raisins in question, and that the negotiations continued until about October 30, 1898, "but at no time was any final and conclusive agreement made or entered into by and between the parties in respect of said crop of raisins, or in respect to all the terms and conditions of such purchase and sale thereof, and said negotiations were never finally consummated or brought to a close until on or about said 30th day of October, 1898"; that about said date plaintiff sent its duly-authorized agent, one C. C. Kinsey, from San Francisco, to examine said crop of raisins, with a view of finally consummating said negotiations; that said agent made examination of the raisins, and thereupon refused to comply with the terms mentioned during the negotiations, and thereupon defendant "broke off all further negotiations with said plaintiff relative to such purchase and sale of said crop of raisins, and put an end to the same, and refused to have any further dealings with said plaintiff with regard thereto, and then and there so notified said plaintiff; that afterwards, to wit, on or about October 31st, and at the time mentioned in plaintiff's complaint, the said Kinsey, acting as the agent of said plaintiff, made the offer, tender, and demand hereinbefore set out in this answer." As to these allegations the court found: (5) That they "are not true as therein made, but in relation thereto the court finds that on or about the 30th day of July, 1898, the plaintiff and defendant entered into negotiations which resulted in the agreement on the part of plaintiff to buy, and on the part of the defendant to sell, all of his crop of muscat raisins of the year 1898, as alleged in plaintiff's amended complaint," and as above stated in findings 1, 2, and 3; "that it is true that on or about the 30th day of October, 1898, the plaintiff sent its authorized agent, C. C. Kinsey, from San Francisco to the farm of defendant, to examine said crop and accepted the same." It was further found that the said Kinsey did not refuse to comply with the terms mentioned during said negotiations, nor did he repudiate the offers made by plaintiff during said negotiations; but that it is true that "defendant then and there broke off all further negotiations with plaintiff relative to said purchase and sale of said crop of raisins, and refused to have any further dealings with plaintiff in regard thereto, and so notified said Kinsey"; and that on October 31, 1898, the said Kinsey made the tender and demand as already shown.

Appellant's points are: (1) That the evidence does not sustain the findings that an agreement was made on or about July 30, 1898; (2) that the finding that such agreement was made is irreconcilable with finding 5; (3) that the evidence does not support finding 5 that there was an acceptance October 30th; (4) that no tender was made.

The transaction must be judged by what the parties did and said in the course of their dealings. Defendant argues the case on the assumption that the agreement found by the court rested entirely on the letters written by the respective parties, one to the other. The contract, as we view the matter, was the result in part of a written memorandum signed by defendant July 18, 1898, in part of letters subsequently passing between plaintiff and defendant, in part of what occurred between the parties when plaintiff examined the fruit, accepted it, and made tender of payment. If the agreement rested wholly on the letters, it would become a matter of law whether they constituted a contract, and we would probably be called upon to state the correspondence in extenso. Not being such a case, there would seem to be no necessity for setting forth all the letters in full, and all the evidence bearing upon the question whether there was a contract as found by the court. The witness Kinsey, who was the agent of plaintiff, and conducted the negotiations on the part of plaintiff, testified that defendant came to plaintiff's office in San Francisco, and stated that he would have certain raisins on his farms near Woodland and Blacks, and desired to make sale of them. Defendant stated the price he wanted. Kinsey wrote in plaintiff's book used for such purposes, July 18, 1898, the following memorandum, which defendant then and there signed: "Henry Howard authorizes us to quote and sell entire crop of raisins within fifteen days, shipment October, 1898, at 2½ cents for 2-crowns, 3 cents for 3-crowns, 4 cents for 4-crowns, seedless 2½ cents; in 50-pound boxes; less 5 per cent. Estimated 8 car loads. Estimate to consist of one-sixth 4-crowns, one-sixth seedless, one-sixth 2-crowns, one-half 3-crowns. Fresno grading." On July 29th plaintiff wrote defendant that a sale had been made in accordance with the authority given in the memorandum of July 18th, repeating the gradings and prices in the memorandum, and closing, "Please confirm, and oblige." To this letter asking confirmation defendant wrote plaintiff on July 30th as follows: "I wish to confirm sale to you of my entire crop of muscat raisins at the following prices: 4-crown, 4 cents; 3-crown, 3 cents; 2-crown, 2½ cents; seedless muscat, 2½ cents; less 5 per cent. commission to you. Terms cash. Delivery f. o. b. Woodland." It will be observed that this confirmation by defendant treated the memorandum as a sale to plaintiff, rather than as confirming an authority to sell. In other respects it confirmed the memorandum. Plaintiff again wrote to defendant August 1st, acknowledging his letter of July 30th, in which reference is made to defendant's letter as confirming the sale to plaintiff, apparently accepting the change from an authority to sell to an absolute sale to plaintiff, stating, "This is all in order," but, to avoid any misunderstanding, plaintiff restates the terms of the memorandum with some amplifications, but making no material changes as to prices or other conditions in the memorandum. The shipping point was stated "Woodland or common shipping point," whereas defendant had stated it as Woodland. Hearing nothing in reply, plaintiff again wrote defendant August 16th, asking confirmation, "so that we [plaintiff] may pass contract with our New York people." Defendant replied, August 18th, that, if his confirmation of July 30th was not sufficient, "we had better call the whole thing off," to which plaintiff replied that this was impossible, as the goods had been sold by plaintiff in accordance with the original memorandum. Plaintiff added: "However, let the matter stand just as it is for the present, and we will examine the raisins before shipment, and pay you cash for them against bill of lading as originally agreed. Please let us know by return mail what is the earliest possible date you think you can commence shipping these raisins, as, the earlier they are shipped, the better." Defendant replied August 27th: "In reply will say you wanted so many confirmations on raisin deal that I thought possibly you wished to call it off. I will be ready on my part to deliver the raisins just as fast as I can get them ready. Can't say how soon, but will try and get at least one car off in September." No further correspondence took place until, September 22d, plaintiff wrote inquiring how defendant was getting along with his drying, and making some other inquiries, and also suggested that the separate grades should be shipped in separate cars. Defendant replied September 24th that to ship each grade separately would delay shipment, and be a great inconvenience to defendant; and he closes, "I shall expect to deliver in car lots as fast as ready, irrespective of grades, as originally agreed upon." Plaintiff replied October 4th, regretting that each grade could not be shipped separately, but said the matter could be arranged so that there would be no additional expense to defendant, and adding: "We will have to suit your convenience. Let us know when you will have the raisins ready for examination, and we will do the needful at once." Towards the end of the month (October) plaintiff again wrote, inquiring how soon some raisins would be ready to ship, and on October 22d defendant replied: "The raisins are not quite all dry yet. Will have most of them ready by the 29th." An effort was made by plaintiff to get defendant to the telephone, which failing, plaintiff on October 25th wrote him, acknowledging receipt of his letter of the 22d, and asking how many raisins defendant would have ready by the 29th. This closed the correspondence, and about October 28th Kinsey went to Woodland on a request by telephone from defendant. The two went to defendant's packing house at Blacks. There is evidence tending to show that Kinsey examined the raisins, and accepted all of them except 88 boxes marked 4-crowns, which were in fact only 3-crowns. These he was willing to receive as 3-crowns, but would not receive them as 4-crowns. He also offered to take them, and ship them, and allow defendant what they brought. Defendant made no statement one way or the other at that time as to these 4-crown raisins, but both parties proceeded to get ready to ship the raisins; defendant saying that he could put on four teams, and could deliver in time to make the shipment in October. They then went to Woodland, where defendant had some more raisins in a packing house. Defendant gave Kinsey a list of the boxes there. Kinsey examined them, and found them satisfactory, and accepted them. Kinsey met defendant later; had some further talk about shipping; told defendant he must telephone his house the quantities defendant had reported, so that the New York customer could be notified at once. This Kinsey did, and on returning from the telephone office met defendant, who then told him he would not deliver the fruit, and, on demand being made, positively refused. Kinsey, on the next day, again demanded the fruit, and on refusal tendered his check, drawn on plaintiff, for the full amount, as found by the court. This tender included the 4-crown raisins at 4-crown prices, and covered the entire lot at the agreed prices and as graded by defendant. There was evidence that the 88 boxes of raisins marked 4-crowns were in fact only 3-crowns.

Defendant relies on Wristen v. Bowles, 82 Cal. 84, 22 Pac. 1136, and cases where the same principle there decided was involved. The contract there related to the sale of land, which plaintiff sought to prove by a series of letters written by the parties. The court held that the correspondence failed to show a meeting of the minds of the parties, and that oral testimony could not be received, as plaintiff had failed to prove an agreement in writing, there being no pretense of part performance. The rules of law laid down in that case need not be disputed. Before the court can determine that letters which have passed between parties constitute an agreement, they must show an unqualified acceptance of the actual thing proposed. There must be a proposal squarely assented to. It was so held, and that is undoubtedly the law. But here we may look to the entire transaction from its inception to its close. Not only may we look to the memorandum, and what took place at the time it was signed, and to the subsequent correspondence, but we may look to the acts and words of the parties after the correspondence ceased, and while they were giving a practical construction to their correspondence by their acts and words. Looking to all these facts and circumstances, they show entire agreement on all essential elements of the contract. There was no misunderstanding, even as to the right of plaintiff to examine the raisins, and to insist that they should come up to the grade agreed upon. Defendant cites Benj. Sales (6th Am. Ed.) 488, to the point that the fact the goods must be examined and paid for later would make no difference as to the binding effect of the agreement. Plaintiff did not agree to receive, and defendant did not expect to deliver, raisins other than according to Fresno grade, and the evidence was that the 88 boxes of 4-crowns did not come up to Fresno grading, and were properly rejected as such. But this rejection did not affect the validity of the contract. The evidence was that they were 3-crowns, and plaintiff was willing to accept them as such. Plaintiff also offered to receive them and allow for 4-crowns if they could be made to pass as such; and finally plaintiff concluded to accept them as 4-crowns, and made tender for them as such. We think that the agreement found by the court clearly resulted from the evidence, and that the evidence sustains the finding.

2. It is doubtful whether any tender was necessary after defendant refused absolutely to deliver the goods. But it is certain that he cannot now be heard to object that the tender was insufficient because made by a check, and not in money. The court found and the evidence was that "at the time of the tender of the check aforesaid the defendant made no objection to said check, or to the amount thereof, or to the form or manner of the plaintiff's tender." Defendant testified, "The reason I refused to deliver the fruit and accept the money was because Kinsey refused to take my 4-crown raisins at 4-crown prices;" and he testified that he "did not object to the kind of money offered." All objections to the character of the tender must be considered as having been waived. Civ. Code, § 1501; Code Civ. Proc. § 2076.

3. We discover no irreconcilability between finding 1 and finding 5. Defendant's agreement was to sell his entire crop; but the raisins were to be Fresno grade, and plaintiff had the right to insist upon delivery according to this grade. Defendant could not invalidate the contract by boxing 3-crowns and marking them 4-crowns. He sold subject to Fresno grading, and, if he put 3-crown raisins in boxes marked 4-crowns, plaintiff had a clear right to insist that they should be paid for as 3-crowns. As plaintiff had the right to these 88 boxes as 3-crown raisins, which the evidence showed they were in fact, defendant cannot complain that plaintiff was unwilling to pay for them as 4-crowns. The judgment and order are affirmed.

RAWLINS v. FERGUSON et al. (S. F. 1,516.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 27, 1901.)

PLEADING—INSUFFICIENT ALLEGATIONS—WAIVER—MORTGAGE—DEED AB-SOLUTE—EVIDENCE.

1. Where an affirmative defense was so insufficiently pleaded that it would have been held bad on demurrer, but was sufficient to enable plaintiff to understand the issue defendants endeavored to make, plaintiff, after going to trial without objection by demurrer or otherwise, should not be heard to say that there was no such issue to try.

2. Plaintiff's agent loaned her money to defendant, taking his note, with sureties thereon. The day before limitations ran against the note, and after she had had trouble with the agent, she sued on the note. Defendant pleaded in abatement that the note was secured by a mortgage. The mortgage claimed consisted of two deeds absolute in form from defendant to the agent's wife, executed after the note was due, and of which plaintiff had no knowledge. Held, insufficient to sustain claim that note was secured by mortgage, so that only suit to foreclose could be maintained.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; E. W. Risley, Judge.

Action by Rebecca A. Rawlins against J. W. Ferguson and others. From a judgment for plaintiff and order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

H. H. Welsh and Stanton L. Carter, for appellants. George E. Church, for respondent.

TEMPLE, J. This is an action upon a promissory note, brought the day before it would have been barred by the statute of limitations. The defense attempted is in the nature of a plea in abatement; that the note was secured by a mortgage, and only a suit to foreclose such mortgage can be maintained. The pleadings are verified, and the amended answer makes no denial sufficient to throw the burden of proof upon the plaintiff, except as to the allegation that $200 is a reasonable fee for plaintiff's attorney. In regard to that no question is made here. The objection is made here that the affirmative defense is also insufficiently pleaded, and would have been held bad on demurrer. The objection is well founded as matter of law, but cannot avail respondent. There was an attempt to plead such defense, and the pleading was sufficient to enable plaintiff to understand the issue which defendants were endeavoring to make. Upon this, plaintiff went to trial, without having objected by demurrer or otherwise. She will not now be heard to say that there was no such issue to try. The court found very fully, upon this matter, in favor of plaintiff, that the debt was not, and never had been, secured in any mode. This finding is attacked, and it is contended that the affirmative of the issue was established without conflict. This is the only question of importance in the case.

The loan was made by plaintiff through her agent, Jackson, who was also her attorney. The money was derived from an insurance upon her husband's life, and after her husband's death was collected from the insurance company by Jackson as her attorney. She authorized him to lend it for her, directing him to consult her about proposed loans, and to take security on first mortgages. December 9, 1891, he made this loan for her to defendant Ferguson, of $2,000, taking his note payable to plaintiff, and signed by all the defendants. The note, by its terms, was due four months after date. It was not secured by mortgage or otherwise, except that the three defendants other than Ferguson were, in fact, sureties. This suit was brought April 8, 1896, by Jackson, as attorney for plaintiff. Jackson also verified the complaint, and at the same time sued out a writ of attachment, to obtain which he in person made the statutory affidavit, which contained this language referring to the note sued upon: "And that such contract was made and is payable in this state, and that the payment of the same has not been secured by any mortgage or lien upon real or personal property." Soon after this suit was brought, differences arose between plaintiff and her said attorney. She not only dismissed him as her attorney, but caused a criminal prosecution to be commenced against him. After this an amended answer was filed in this case, and upon some incidental proceeding afterwards the said attorney made an affidavit, to be used against plaintiff, in which he swore that he made the loan to Ferguson as agent of the plaintiff, and that "subsequently, at my express instance and request, as such agent, the said defendant J. W. Ferguson, as further security for said loan, executed to said Sarah F. Jackson, my wife, deeds," etc. At the trial the deeds were in evidence. One was dated November 11, 1892, and the other November 28, 1892. The deeds were absolute conveyances, running to Sarah F. Jackson as grantee.

Mr. Jackson was the principal witness for the defense. Part of his testimony was as follows: "I accepted the note, and some time after the note was due, I knew at the time Mr. Ferguson came and said he wanted to further secure the note,—wanted to deed me some two other properties,—and he executed a deed to my wife." "There was no definite extension of time of payment, as far as I remember, when the deeds were made. Mr. Ferguson came, and stated his desire to further secure the payment of that note by the transfer of certain properties. That was done. I don't know that it was because he couldn't pay it. I don't think any demand had been made upon him for the payment at all. The note was just due. I don't think any default had been made in the payment of interest." "I think it was Ferguson who made the proposition to convey the property to my wife. She was not consulted, nor did she know anything about it, at that time. Subsequently I told her about it. Don't remember exactly when." He further stated that he was sure he told Mrs. Jackson about the deeds when Mrs. Rawlins brought suit against himself and Mrs. Jackson to obtain an injunction. "But I told her prior to that time, I do not remember just when." He further testified that he first learned that Mr. Ferguson had the property at the time the deeds were made. Mrs. Jackson testified, and made confused and contradictory statements upon the subject as to when she first knew of the deeds. Finally, after her attention had been called to her testimony in another case, she said: "I remember testifying to that. I don't know whether it was at the time the deeds were made to me Mr. Jackson explained them to me, or at the time the suit was commenced against me. I don't know anything about it except what Mr. Jackson has told me, and I don't know when it was or what it was, and I don't know whether I have ever claimed the property as my own or claimed that Mr. Jackson bought it with my money." I think upon this evidence the court was abundantly justified in holding, as impliedly it did, that Mrs. Jackson did not understand until after this suit was commenced that she held the property to secure the loan to Mrs. Rawlins.

Mr. Ferguson testified also for the defense. His testimony was, in many important particulars, in sharp conflict with the testimony of Mr. Jackson. He, however, insisted that the deeds were made to secure the note in question. He only talked with Mr. Jackson about the matter, and did not testify that either Mrs. Jackson or the plaintiff were aware that the deeds had been given. He said also that an agreement had been made for a sale of the property, and the understanding was that, if the sale was consummated, Mrs. Jackson would convey to the purchaser, Mr. Jackson would retain a sufficient amount from the proceeds to pay the debt, and the residue should go to him (Ferguson). Mrs. Rawlins testified that she never heard that the note was secured in any way until after Mr. Jackson ceased to be her attorney. She had conversed with him about the debt, and disapproved of the loan; but he did not inform her that it was secured. To maintain the proposition that there is no evidence in support of the finding specified, appellant contends that the deeds only raise a presumption, which can have no force against evidence; that they only furnish a rule of decision where there is no evidence. To this point Society v. Burnett, 106 Cal. 514, 39 Pac. 922, is cited. The presumption there under consideration was that in a special instance the usual course of business had been followed, and that an instrument delivered to the obligee implied that the obligation evidenced by it had been performed. It was said that such presumptions or inferences were evidence of the weakest character, and simply controlled the decision in the absence of proof. It merely shifted the burden of proof. There is no more propriety in denominating the probative force of these deeds a mere presumption than there would be applying the term to the most positive and satisfactory testimony. It is evidence of a very high order, tending to show that the intention was to convey a full title. In Henley v. Hotaling, 41 Cal. 22, it is said that, to authorize a court "by evidence to establish an equity outside of the deed, and thus to convert the deed into a mortgage, the evidence ought to be so clear as to leave no doubt that the real intention of the parties was to execute a mortgage; otherwise, the intention appearing on the face of the deed ought to prevail." This language has been, in substance, often repeated since. A deed is evidence of such a controlling nature that it is now only permitted to question its expressed effect where expressly authorized by statute, which instances are exceptions to the rule. These exceptions are that a deed may be shown, contrary to its terms, to be a mortgage; and in certain cases a resulting trust may be established by parol. No proposition is more familiar than that a deed affords a very high degree of proof. And many circumstances militate against the theory of the defense. The owner of the alleged mortgage had never heard of it, although she had expressed to her agent her disapproval of the loan. The agent, when called upon to make an affidavit for an attachment, forgot it, although the only important matter in respect to the affidavit was to show that the debt was or was not secured by a mortgage. The grantee named in the deed did not know that she held the title as security, and, of course, had never agreed to so hold it, or that she would permit it to be so applied. The deeds were executed eleven months after the loan had been made and seven months after the note became due, and, according to the main witness, were tendered by the debtor, although no demand had been made upon him for payment or for security. The debtor testified that he suggested at the time that the property had been sold, and expected Mrs. Jackson to convey to the purchaser the property, and that he (Jackson) would retain sufficient of the proceeds to pay the debt due Mrs. Rawlins. We do not think it necessary to determine whether, if the facts were as the witnesses for the defense testified, the transaction would amount to a mortgage. The practical conclusion of the court that the idea that the deeds were given to secure the payment of the note was gotten up after Jackson was discharged by Mrs. Rawlins as her attorney has sufficient evidence in its support to prevent our interference. There was at least a substantial conflict. The judgment and order are affirmed.

CHAPMAN v. BENT. (L. A. 987.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 24, 1901.)

PLEADING—COMPLAINT—BILL OF PARTICULARS—CONFLICTING EVIDENCE—FINDINGS—APPEAL—WORK AND LABOR—ACTION—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

1. A bill of particulars, served by plaintiff in response to a demand therefor, becomes a part of the complaint.

2. In order that findings and judgment on conflicting evidence may stand on appeal, such conflict must be one that is material.

3. Plaintiff hauled certain pipe for a third party, who was under contract with defendant, at so much per ton, upon the terms of that contract, up to a certain date, when he claimed to have commenced working for defendant. Plaintiff testified that he sent defendant word that he would not work unless defendant paid him; that such third party was going away; and on cross-examination he said defendant agreed to pay him for what he had done if he could get an order from such third party, which order was obtained. He testified that nothing was said whether he was to be paid by the day or the ton in making his alleged contract with defendant. A witness testified that plaintiff told him, after he commenced working for defendant, that he was hauling by the ton. Defendant testified that he made no agreement with plaintiff, and that the latter asked him to guaranty the payment for the work done for such third party. Plaintiff submitted a bill of particulars, specifying the number of teams used, and number of days at work, having, at the conclusion of his work, submitted a statement of the number of tons hauled. Held, that a finding that plaintiff performed work and labor for defendant was not justified by the evidence.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; B. N. Smith, Judge.

Action by D. D. Chapman against A. S. Bent. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Jas. Burdett, for appellant. Halsey W. Allen, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. Action for work, labor, and services. The plaintiff had findings and judgment, and defendant appeals from the judgment and from an order denying a new trial.

In April, 1899, the defendant entered into a contract with the South Mountain Water Company to construct for it a pipe line near Redlands. On June 1st he entered into a contract with one George Nolan, in writing, to haul the pipe and cement necessary to construct it from the railroad, and distribute it along the line, for the first part of the line, to a specified point, at the price of $1.15 per ton, and for the remainder—the longer haul—at $1.50 per ton; Nolan “to stand all breakages in handling and hauling” the pipe. The plaintiff, D. D. Chapman, was consulted by Nolan in determining the terms upon which the contract should be taken, but, so far as known to Bent, had no interest in it, except that when Nolan commenced work under his contract, about June 9th, Chapman put on several teams, and did hauling thereon for Nolan upon the terms specified in the contract between Nolan and defendant. The contract between defendant and the water company required the pipe line to be completed on or before August 1st. Nolan, as well as Chapman, put on several teams, but about the last of June defendant became convinced that, unless more teams were put on, the pipe would not be hauled in time to complete the line within the time limited therefor. Defendant thereupon notified Nolan to put on more teams, and was told that he could not find them, and Nolan thereupon authorized defendant to procure them, and to pay for them at the rate of six dollars per day, the teams so procured to be first paid for out of the money that would be due to him under his contract. Defendant thereupon advertised for teams, and procured sufficient, in conjunction with the teams of Nolan and the plaintiff, to complete the hauling on July 31st. The plaintiff claims that about the last of June or first day of July he quit working for Nolan, and thereafter worked for Mr. Bent; and this action is prosecuted to recover therefor. The action is upon a quantum meruit for work, labor, and services in furnishing teams for the defendant for hauling water pipes, alleged to be of the value of $750. The court found the value to be $456, and gave judgment therefor.

When suit was commenced, the defendant demanded a bill of particulars of plaintiff's claim, and it was furnished, showing the number of teams furnished by plaintiff each day from July 1st to July 26th, both days included. The plaintiff testified, in substance, that he was working for Nolan up to the 1st of July, and after that he worked for Mr. Bent; that he sent word to Mr. Bent by two of his teamsters, Reynolds and Dutch, that, if he wanted him to team, he would have to pay for it himself; that next morning, June 29th, he thought, he saw Mr. Bent, and told him he would have nothing more to do with Nolan, and, if he did any more hauling, he must pay for it himself, and that Bent said he would if he (plaintiff) did the work; that plaintiff continued to work, and put on three more teams, and kept on working until the job was finished. Upon cross-examination he testified that he did not suppose that he could compel Bent to pay for the work he had already done, but that he asked him if he could not see that he got his pay for that, and that Bent agreed to pay him for what he had already done if Nolan would give an order, and that Bent said he would get an order, and that he commenced work for Bent on the 1st of July; that he had been hauling for Nolan by the ton, but he had no understanding with Bent as to whether he should be paid by the day or the ton, but supposed he was to work by the day, and did not know whether he worked by the day or the ton; that he changed his mind about working for Nolan because Nolan was going to Mexico with his outfit, and Bent was hiring other teams at six dollars per day, and that he knew Bent had obtained an order from Nolan. Reynolds testified that plaintiff sent him to Bent with a message "that, unless Bent would pay him for hauling, that he would not haul any more"; and Bent said he would pay him; that he did not want him to quit hauling. This witness was cross-examined at considerable length, and his attention was called to his deposition taken in the case, and, among other things, the following: "Q. State what message you delivered. A. Mr. Chapman told me to tell Mr. Bent that, unless he would secure his pay for hauling, he wouldn't haul any more, but would take his teams off." Daniel Leibee, called for the defendant, testified that on or about July 16th he was trying to see Bent to get a job of hauling, but did not find him; that Chapman told him he could go on with his team at $6 per day, and said, "My teams are hauling by the ton." The defendant, testifying in his own behalf, testified: That at the time he made his contract with Nolan, Nolan said that Chapman was trying to back out of the whole thing now. That Chapman undertook to explain, but Bent said that it did not concern him, as his bid was from Nolan. That Nolan then said, "Of course, Chapman and I are working together on it." That he (Bent) could not state the exact words, but that he was given to understand that they expected to put on an equal number of teams; and that Chapman, as Mr. Nolan expected to go away to Mexico, would have a general supervision of the work. That the work commenced June 9th, but it soon began to drag, and he sent Mr. French to Chapman repeatedly to tell him "that he must put on the teams that he led us to believe he would, or else tell us he would not." That he came near forfeiting half of his contract on account of the delay in hauling. That he then arranged with Nolan to get teams by the day; to pay six dollars for four-horse teams, and to pay them first of all out of moneys due to Nolan. That on July 5th or 6th he met two of Chapman's teams as he was driving along the road in his buggy, and the teamsters told him that Chapman wanted to see him, and he asked, What about? and they said, "He wants to know where his pay is coming from;" and that he replied he would see him. That he did not say that he would pay him, or be responsible for his pay. That he drove over to see Chapman the next day, and he said he wanted to make some arrangement by which he (Bent) would guaranty his pay. That he (Bent) said: "What is the matter with Nolan?" That Chapman replied: "Nolan is all right, but he is going to Mexico, and I don't want to chase him for a year or two to get my money to come through him. I want you to secure it. I want you to guaranty it." That witness replied: "I can't do that, Mr. Chapman. I have no contract with you. My deal is with Mr. Nolan." That Chapman then said: "Then I will have to take off my teams, because I won't run any risk." That witness replied: "I don't want you to do that. Why don't you get an order from him?" He replied: "I can't get an order from him." That witness said: "I will. Perhaps I can help you get an order;" and Chapman replied: "If you can get an order, so that I am safe, I will go on and haul." That witness telephoned for an order, and received it on the 8th or 9th. It was dated July 7th. That two or three days after that he passed Chapman on the road, and told him that he got the order, and Chapman replied, "All right," and both drove on, neither stopping the horses. That about 10 days afterwards Chapman asked whether the order covered the board of his teamsters and his blacksmith, and Mr. Bent replied that he did not know; that he had to pay him out of the money due Nolan when he and Nolan have agreed upon the amount; and that Chapman replied: "All right. Of course, that is all that I could expect." When the work was completed, defendant settled with the teamsters he had procured for Nolan, Nolan being present, and approving the payment to each, and the amount was charged to Nolan. Chapman's account was sent for, and he sent a pencil memorandum of the number of tons hauled, and the amount of the board and blacksmith bills which he had charged to Nolan; but this memorandum did not distinguish between the long and the short hauls. Afterwards, on August 8th, a typewritten bill was presented by Chapman, giving the number of pieces of each size of pipe, with the weight of each in tons, the number of tons of cement, and distinguishing between the long and the short haul, and also the amount of the board and blacksmith bills, and the amount of the hauling at the contract price per ton, without deducting breakages, to be $609.50. It was found, however, that, after paying for the extra teams, there was nothing due Nolan, and defendant had paid out therefor $560 in excess of the contract price. The defendant was strongly corroborated in reference to the order on Nolan, to the effect that Chapman did not want his money to come through Nolan, and that he would put the teams on if he could get an order from Nolan to Bent for his pay, as well as in other matters not so important. Plaintiff was called in rebuttal, and testified that in a certain interview at the Windsor Hotel he did not say that he was not under obligations to Bent, and was not working for him, and explained that by the use of the word "we," in a certain letter, he did not mean that he and Nolan were partners; that they were not partners; and further testified that he got a dollar and a half for all he hauled. No other evidence was given in rebuttal.

When this action was commenced the defendant demanded a bill of particulars, and it was served. It stated the number of his teams used in hauling each day from July 1st to July 26th, inclusive, aggregating 90 days for one team. It contained no statement of the number of tons hauled. The testimony showed that Nolan was to pay him the same compensation for hauling that Nolan was to receive under his contract, and that compensation was a given price per ton. Plaintiff testified, "There was nothing said between Mr. Bent and me whether by the day or by the ton." At the conclusion of the work, however, he furnished a statement giving the total number of tons hauled, but no dates at which any part of the hauling was done, and charged the same price per ton that Nolan was to receive under his contract. Plaintiff's bill of particulars, served in response to a demand therefor, became a part of his complaint, and, if he can recover in this action, he must recover upon the cause of action shown thereby. But plaintiff's statement to defendant and Nolan, made at the conclusion of the work in the settlement between Nolan and defendant, showed conclusively: First, that he performed no services by the day, as alleged by his complaint and bill of particulars; and, second, that, defendant having obtained an order from Nolan, as desired by plaintiff, he continued to work for Nolan to the end. If, after the 1st of July, he worked for defendant, and not for Nolan, he would either have charged for his teams by the day, specifying the number of days, and the amount or the number of tons hauled before the date of his alleged agreement with Bent, and the number of tons hauled after that date. The plaintiff knew of the order given by Nolan. He said Nolan was all right, but he was going to Mexico, and he did not want "to chase him for a year or two to get his money," and asked Bent to guaranty his pay; not that he wanted a new contract. On the 8th of August plaintiff presented his typewritten bill, before referred to, in which was charged the whole number of tons hauled by him, but giving no dates at which the hauling, or any part of it, was done. He was then informed by defendant that there was no money due Nolan. Defendant testified: "He said: 'Why, what about that order? Didn't you expect to pay me when you got that order?' I said, 'I certainly did.' He says, 'You know I told you I would take off my teams unless I was sure of my pay.' I said: 'Yes, you did. But,' I said, 'I supposed, and we all supposed, there would be money not only for you, but a balance for Nolan. Nolan had this contract all through. That was a loss to himself. There is not a dollar coming to him, and you are in the same boat.' He expressed his disappointment, and wanted to know what he was going to do. I said: 'Either you are a partner, or you are working for somebody. You certainly were not working for me.' He replied: 'No, I wasn't working for you. You got that order, and I considered you were going to pay me.'" Defendant further testified that he and the plaintiff went over the figures together; that in none of the conversations was anything said about working by the day, or that plaintiff was working for him. Mr. French, who was present at the foregoing interview, fully corroborated Mr. Bent, and though the plaintiff testified in rebuttal, he denied no part of the conversation on the 8th of August except the statement that he was under no obligations to Bent, and was not working for him.

Respondent contends that there is a conflict in the evidence, and that, therefore, the findings and judgment must stand. But the conflict must be a material one. There cannot be a doubt that the plaintiff continued to haul upon the faith of the order given by Nolan upon defendant. The plaintiff not only testified that Nolan was all right, but that he did not want to follow him for a year or two, and wanted his money to come through defendant; but he also testified that he did not suppose that he could compel Bent to pay him for work already done, nor has he attempted to do so. True, he testified that he went to work for Bent at that time. This was before the order was obtained. That he did go on, relying upon the order, is clear. He did not keep a separate account of his work after that date, and his account was for all the work done, stating only the entire number of tons of each size of pipe in a single item, with no possibility of ascertaining therefrom how much he hauled after his alleged arrangement to work for the defendant, and doubtless for that reason he brought his action charging the defendant by the day for his teams. It is not necessary to discuss the question whether Chapman was Nolan's partner or was a subcontractor or employé. Bent's contract was with Nolan. Mr. French, a witness called by defendant, was cross-examined by the court, and this question was put: "So these extra teams absolutely ate up the whole profit on the $1.50 for the upper and $1.15 for the lower hauling? A. Yes." The suggestion made by this question should be noticed. The plaintiff sought to recover upon a quantum meruit for the use of his teams, and gave evidence that $6 per day for each team was the reasonable value thereof. It is shown that that was the price paid for the extra teams that were employed by defendant for Nolan. The plaintiff, therefore, proved that not more than the reasonable value of the services of those teams was paid, and therefore he was not injured. Besides, the plaintiff testified that nothing was said between him and Bent as to whether he was to haul by the day or by the ton, and added, "Well, it did not make any difference, but amounted to about the same thing."

But it is immaterial whether it cost more or not, since it would not affect plaintiff's right to recover from Nolan according to whatever agreement he had with him under which he did the hauling. That defendant, by completing his contract on time, earned and received a bonus of $500 from the water company is wholly immaterial. He was not bound to share it with any one. The finding that plaintiff performed work, labor, and services for the defendant is not justified by the evidence. I advise that the judgment and order appealed from be reversed, and the cause remanded.

We concur: GRAY, C.; CHIPMAN, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are reversed, and the cause remanded.

CARTER v. LOTHIAN. (L. A. 835.)¹
(Supreme Court of California. July 25, 1901.)
PLEADING—AMENDMENT—DISCRETION OF COURT—NEW TRIAL—TRANSFER OF MOTION.

1. The trial court does not abuse its discretion in allowing plaintiff to amend his pleading after the close of the testimony, so as to have it correspond with the evidence introduced.

2. Under Const. art. 6, §§ 6, 7, authorizing the holding of as many sessions of the superior court as there are judges thereof, and directing that judgment, orders, etc., of any session held by one or more of the judges shall be equally effectual as if all the judges presided at the session, a motion for new trial in one department of the superior court may be transferred for hearing to another department of the court over the objection of the moving party.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; John L. Campbell, Judge.

Action by F. A. Carter against I. A. Lothian. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

Walter Bardwell and W. B. Mathews, for appellant. Barclay & Camp, for respondent.

VAN DYKE, J. The action is in equity to perpetually enjoin the enforcement of a judgment for $446.50 rendered by the superior court of Los Angeles county in a case entitled "I. A. Lothian vs. Richardson-Kimball Co. et al." in favor of plaintiff therein (appellant here) and against respondent here, one of the defendants in said action. The appeal is taken from the judgment in favor of plaintiff and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial.

On the trial, after the testimony had closed, at the suggestion of the court, the plaintiff asked and obtained leave to file an amended complaint, so as to have it correspond with the evidence introduced. Appellant contends that under the circumstances, the testimony having closed, it was an abuse of discretion on the part of the court to allow the plaintiff to amend the complaint. This court has frequently reversed for refusing to allow amendments to pleadings, but not for granting amendments. In Marr v. Rhodes (Cal.) 63 Pac. 364, it developed on the trial in the court below that the defendant had a set-off. The court held, under the pleadings as they stood, that such set-off could not be allowed, whereupon the defendant moved for leave to amend his answer by pleading the set-off in his favor against the plaintiff so that it would correspond with the evidence introduced, which motion the court denied. In passing on the appeal, it is said in the opinion: "We think the court should have allowed the defendant to amend his answer to enable him to prove facts which would have constituted an offset or defense to plaintiff's demand, as proposed; and if, by reason of such amendment, the plaintiff would have been taken by surprise, and required further time to prepare to meet the defense, the case could have been continued, or such terms imposed as might seem just under the circumstances." In Guidery v. Green, 95 Cal. 630, 30 Pac. 786, it is said: "It can very rarely happen that a court will be justified in refusing a party leave to amend his pleading so that he may properly present his case, and obviate any objection that the facts which constitute his cause of action or his defense are not embraced within the issues, or properly presented by his pleading." Many other cases to the same effect might be cited, but it is altogether unnecessary to do so. It is the policy of the law for courts to be liberal in allowing amendments to pleadings and proceedings, where the same can be done without prejudice to the rights of other parties. If the defendant had asked for time to plead to the amended complaint, or for a continuance of the cause, to allow him to introduce further testimony in reference to the new issue raised by the amended pleading, no doubt the request would have been granted; but he failed to do either. See Jackson v. Jackson, 94 Cal. 446, 29 Pac. 957; Firebaugh v. Burbank, 121 Cal. 186, 53 Pac. 560.

Appellant claims that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings. The plaintiff was made defendant in the case entitled "I. A. Lothian vs. Richardson-Kimball Co. et al." on the supposition that he was a subscriber to stock in said company, and indebted for such subscription in whole or in part. The evidence shows, however, that prior to the commencement of said action the defendant in said action, the plaintiff here, was not indebted to said company, but, on the contrary, said company was indebted to him in a sum aggregating more than $800, for which he then had judgment against said company; and that the fact of such indebtedness from said company to the plaintiff was known to the defendant. Plaintiff testified that he met defendant's attorney some time after that suit was commenced in Los Angeles, and said: "I asked him what he meant by suing me, and he said: 'Well, I thought you were a stockholder, or possibly had subscribed for a lot of that Richardson-Kimball Company's stock, and, like Richardson and Kimball, you had never paid for it, and that—' He told me I would have been liable if I had, but said he had since discovered that I had not subscribed for any, and he promised me never to hurt me; that I would not be hurt in that suit; that I need not give it any attention at all. As a result of what he said to me with reference to my defending the suit brought by Lothian, I gave the thing no further attention, and just supposed the matter ended there. I was back East, and gave the thing no further attention. Q. Did you believe that he would do as he said, and not take any steps against you? A. Why, yes. He told me that he had discovered that I had subscribed for no stock at all, and that he had brought this suit in a kind of sweeping way against all the men that he had heard had subscribed for any of the stock, with the hope of finding some that had not paid theirs; and that they were liable if they had subscribed, and had not paid for the stock; and he found out that Richardson and Kimball had done that, and he didn't know but what I had when he brought the suit and served me; but he had afterwards found out I didn't subscribe for any, and that I need not give the thing no consideration or further thought at all; that he would promise me I wouldn't get hurt. That was—the thing ended right there." The judgment roll in Carter against the Richardson-Kimball Company was introduced, showing a deficiency judgment in favor of the plaintiff, and a garnishment against the Los Angeles National Bank thereunder for all moneys, credits, etc., belonging to the Richardson-Kimball Company; and also the judgment roll in the case of Carter against the Los Angeles National Bank to enforce said garnishment, which latter case shows that the defendant, Lothian, was a party to that action. Said bank filed a cross complaint in said action, asking that all parties making claims against said fund belonging to the Richardson-Kimball Company in its hands be required to interplead, which they did; and said defendant, Lothian, in his answer to said cross complaint, made no claim against said Carter, nor did he ask a preference as against him to the fund in litigation. Defendant's attorney, in his testimony, stated that he discovered that Carter was a stockholder in the Richardson-Kimball Company just about the time he commenced the suit. "I got my information from George Granger, and understood from him that Mr. Carter was owing something on his stock in the Richardson-Kimball Company. I did not understand how much. Q. What evidence did you have or produce that he was owing the Richardson-Kimball Company? A. Well, I never had any further evidence than that. Q. You never produced any evidence in the court did you that he was owing? A. Not to my recollection. By the Court: You did know that he had begun an action against the company for fourteen or fifteen hundred dollars? A. Oh, yes. Q. By Plaintiff's Attorney: In the conversation you have referred to with me, did you ever state to me that you had taken any default or judgment against Carter? A. No. I never mentioned it in the world to you." Without going into the testimony further in detail, it is sufficient to say that there is enough to support the findings, both as to the merits and upon the plea of the statute of limitations.

The motion for new trial coming on to be heard in department 5 of the Los Angeles superior court, Judge Shaw, presiding, before whom the cause had been tried, transferred the hearing of said motion for a new trial to department 2 of the same court. Appellant contends that this transfer of the cause from one department to another, against his objection, is error. There is nothing in this contention. Under the present constitution, whatever the population or amount of business, there is but one court of general jurisdiction in each county, to wit, the superior court. This court may be and is provided with such number of judges as required to transact the judicial business before said court. The so-called "departments" are unknown to the constitution, but have been adopted for convenience by the judges in apportioning the business before said court, which they are authorized to do by the constitution. There may be held "as many sessions of said court at the same time as there are judges thereof," and "the judgments, orders, and proceedings of any session of the superior court held by any one or more of the judges of said courts, respectively, shall be equally effectual as if all the judges of said respective courts presided at such session." Const. art. 6, §§ 6, 7. By this scheme, where there is more than one judge provided for the court, such judges may interchange among themselves in holding court, and, in case one be sick, absent, or engaged in the trial of other causes, another judge of such court can step in and fill his place, and thus prevent the interruption of judicial business. Any judge, therefore, of the superior court of Los Angeles county, had jurisdiction to hear and determine the motion for new trial in this case. The motion for a new trial, under our system of procedure, is an independent collateral proceeding. An affirmance of the judgment on direct appeal therefrom does not prevent the court below from setting aside the verdict, or finding and judgment based thereon, and granting a new trial.

Spanagel v. Dellinger, 42 Cal. 148; 1 Hayne, New Trials & App. p. 27; McDonald v. McConkey, 57 Cal. 325; Naglee v. Spencer, 60 Cal. 10; Knowles v. Thompson (Cal.; in bank; filed June 14, 1901) 65 Pac. 468. There is no showing in this case why the judge of department 2 could not hear the motion for a new trial as well as the judge of department 5 of that county, and the cause may have been transferred for the reason that the judge of department 5 at the time was engaged in the trial of other causes. Nothing appearing to the contrary, the presumption will be in favor of the regularity of the proceeding.

The other points presented by appellant are not of sufficient importance to receive special consideration. Judgment and order affirmed.

BANNING v. MARLEAU. (L. A. 864.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 30, 1901.)
 REPLEVIN—FINDINGS—RIGHT OF POSSESSION—OWNERSHIP—AFFIDAVITS OF ATTACHMENT—ENTRY ON JUSTICE'S DOCKET—EVIDENCE—FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCE—SUBSEQUENT CREDITORS—STATEMENTS OF VENDOR—APPEAL AND ERROR.

1. Where plaintiff claimed title and right to possession of personalty under a bill of sale in an action to recover the property from an officer who attached it as the property of the former owner, a finding that plaintiff acquired no title, and that it belonged to and was in the possession of the defendant in the writ, is sufficient to support a judgment against plaintiff, without an express finding that plaintiff was not entitled to possession.

2. Where affidavits on which an attachment was issued were lost, and the contents proved by parol, and the judgment received in evidence without objection, an objection on appeal that the evidence does not support a finding that an attachment issued, because the docket does not show that affidavits were filed, should be overruled, since Code Civ. Proc. § 911, does not require the entry in the justice's minutes of this fact.

3. Where the bill of exceptions contains a statement that writs of attachment and their returns were received in evidence, an objection that the record does not show a formal attachment of the goods in controversy should be overruled.

4. Where plaintiff, who claimed property under a bill of sale, testified that she was aware that the vendor was insolvent, and he testified that his object in giving the bill of sale was to keep the property on the ranch; that it was not a drop in the bucket towards paying his debts,—the evidence is sufficient to support a finding that the bill of sale was fraudulent as to his creditors.

5. Where actual fraud in a sale of property is established, the sale is void as to subsequent creditors of the vendor, as well as to prior creditors.

6. Where there has been a colorable transfer of personal property, with no visible change of possession, and there is satisfactory proof of a conspiracy to defraud the creditors of the vendor, his declarations, both antecedent and subsequent to the transfer, are competent to establish the fraud.

7. Where, before a cause is submitted for decision, the court orders all of certain evidence stricken from the case, error, if any, in its reception of such evidence, should not be considered.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; D. K. Trask, Judge.

Action by Mary H. Banning against W. F. Marleau. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. S. Wright and J. L. Murphy, for appellant. Dunnigan & Dunnigan and J. R. Dupuy, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. The facts concerning this action and the law of the case will be found in the opinions of this court upon former appeals, reported in 101 Cal. 238, 35 Pac. 772, and 121 Cal. 240, 53 Pac. 692. This trial was without a jury. The value of the property was stipulated. The court found against the plaintiff, and gave judgment for defendant for the return of the property, or its value, $600. Plaintiff appeals.

The property had been seized under writs of attachment issued by the justice's court in an action in which one Dr. Hannon was defendant. It was taken from the possession of Dr. Hannon while upon a ranch which was the property of the plaintiff. The plaintiff claimed title to the property under a bill of sale from Dr. Hannon. Dr. Hannon's testimony, which was accepted by the court, showed the sale was colorable merely, was not intended by the parties to be a transfer of the title, but was designed as a fraud against the creditors of Dr. Hannon, to save the property from attachments and execution levies which he feared. Hannon was at the time, according to his own testimony, overwhelmingly in debt. The findings are supported by the evidence.

The numerous technical points urged by appellant have been given due consideration, but for the most part they do not merit discussion. It is contended, for example, that the judgment is not supported by the findings, because of the absence of a finding as to the right of possession at the time of the commencement of the action; and the cases of Cooke v. Aguirre, 86 Cal. 479, 25 Pac. 5, and Fredericks v. Tracy, 98 Cal. 658, 33 Pac. 750, are relied on. In those cases the plaintiff had recovery. The basis of plaintiff's right of recovery was his right of possession at the time of the commencement of the action, and the cases were properly reversed because of the absence of a finding as to the value of the property, and an absence of a finding as to the amount of plaintiff's damage. What application they can have to this case, where the value is stipulated, where the findings of the court are wholly against the ownership of the plaintiff, and declare that at the time of the attachments levied by the constable Hannon was the owner and in possession of the property, we fail to perceive, and upon it we are not enlightened. Again, the affidavits upon which the attachments had been issued from the justice's court were lost, and it thereby became necessary by secondary evidence to prove these papers and their contents. This was done, and the judgments in the cases admitted in evidence, without objection; but the objection is here made to the sufficiency of the evidence supporting the findings that the docket of the justice does not show that affidavits upon attachment were filed. The law does not require the entry in the justice's minutes of this fact. Code Civ. Proc. § 911. Again, it is said that there is no evidence in the record to show any formal attachment or any return by the officer. The writs and their returns were offered and admitted in evidence, and the bill of exceptions contains a statement of this fact. Again, it is said that there is no evidence to show that Hannon was indebted to any person at the time he gave the bill of sale. The plaintiff herself testifies that she had become aware of the fact that Dr. Hannon had become insolvent, and unable to pay his proportion of the debt of the ranch. Hannon testified to the same effect, and, explaining how he gave the fraudulent bill of sale, says that the object was to keep the property on the ranch. "I did not want it attached for my debts, and thought it might be. It was not a drop in the bucket towards paying them." Again, it is said that the attaching creditor was a creditor subsequent to the giving of the bill of sale, and that the sale was valid, therefore, as to him. There is no evidence in the record to this effect, saving the evidence that the promissory notes, which were the foundation of the action in the justice's court, were dated subsequent to the date of the bill of sale. But the testimony is that the notes were given by Hannon on account of a long-existing debt; and even in the case of subsequent creditors, where actual fraud is established, the sale is void as to them as well as to prior creditors. Bump, Fraud. Conv. § 295; Brown v. O'Neal, 95 Cal. 262, 30 Pac. 538, 29 Am. St. Rep. 111.

Appellant further complains of the rulings of the court in permitting evidence as to the statement of Dr. Hannon concerning the ownership of the property after he had made the bill of sale. The answer to this is twofold: (1) Where there has been a colorable transfer of personal property, with no visible change of possession or control, and where there has been satisfactory proof of conspiracy to defraud, hinder, or delay the creditors of the vendor, his declarations, both antecedent and subsequent to the transfer, are competent to establish the fraud. "They are admissible, not because any peculiar credit is due to the party in possession, but because they qualify and characterize the very fact to be investigated." Bump, Fraud. Conv. §§ 598-600. (2) Before the submission of the cause for decision, the court ordered all the declarations of Dr. Hannon made by him after the sale stricken from the case.

No other of appellant's points seem to call for discussion, and for the foregoing reasons the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

We concur: McFARLAND, J.; TEMPLE, J.

In re COURSEN'S ESTATE. (S. F. 2,004.)
(Supreme Court of California. July 27, 1901.)

ESTATES—DISTRIBUTION—PETITION—JURISDICTION—FINAL DECREE—APPEAL—LEGATEE—INTEREST—EXECUTOR'S ACCOUNT—ALLOWANCE—COMPENSATION—SERVICES AS ATTORNEY—TAXES.

1. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1665, providing that on the final settlement of the accounts of the executor, or at any subsequent time, the court may proceed to distribute the residue of the estate, the court has not jurisdiction to decree distribution of the estate on a petition filed after the final account was filed, but before it was settled; nor is such decree authorized by section 1663, which relates only to partial distribution.

2. Where testatrix devised to her son all her interest in the estate owned by his father, her first husband, and the remainder of her property to her second husband and his children, a final decree distributing certain specific property to the latter "and any other property not now known or discovered which may belong to said estate, or in which it may be interested," is erroneous, since such provision might carry any after-discovered property belonging to her first husband.

3. A legatee is not prejudiced because property in which he has no interest is improperly distributed by the final decree.

4. An executor cannot appeal from a final decree on the ground that the property is improperly distributed.

5. Where an executor, in his final account, stated that all the money of deceased went into the hands of his co-executor, and was used in settlement of the estate, and all the legatees interested stipulate that the account of the latter is correct, it is not error to allow the latter's account without vouchers.

6. Where the evidence warrants a finding that an executor did not pay certain taxes charged in his account, and for which he produced receipts, the order disallowing such charges should not be reversed.

7. Where, during the settlement of an estate, the property was occupied by the family, including the executor, he should not be allowed extra compensation for his services in excess of his commissions.

8. In fixing the commissions of an executor, the inventory value of the property is not conclusive, but the actual market value may be shown, and used as the basis.

9. Where a small sum of money left by testatrix was received and used by appellant's co-executor for the benefit of the estate, it was not error to exclude such sum from the computation in fixing appellant's commissions.

10. Where an executor acts also as attorney for the estate, such services do not necessarily entitle him to extra compensation.

11. Pol. Code, § 3752, providing that decree of distribution of an estate shall not be made until the taxes are paid, is to protect the revenues of the state, and has no application where the tax has in fact been paid, though the one who made the payment has a tax title to the property therefor.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. V. Coffey, Judge.

Appeal by William P. Stout from a decree allowing the account of G. A. Coursen as an executor of the will of Jeanie A. Coursen, deceased, and disallowing the account of appellant as co-executor, and from a decree of distribution of her estate. Decree settling accounts affirmed, and decree distributing the estate reversed.

G. Gunzendorfer, for appellant. Martin Stevens, for respondents.

CHIPMAN, C. Jeanie A. Coursen died testate in 1877, naming William P. Stout and G. A. Coursen as executors, and her will was shortly after duly probated, and letters issued to the executors. An inventory was filed, and notice to creditors published. No claims have been presented against the estate. The property consisted of $180 in money and certain real property on Fulton street, in San Francisco, which was occupied by the family of deceased. Respondent Coursen was the second husband of deceased, and appellant, Stout, was her son by her first husband. She left seven children of the second marriage, all of whom had reached majority before the final accounts and the petition for distribution were filed. It appeared by executor Coursen's final account that he received all the money, and he testified that he disbursed it in expenses of administration; but he filed no vouchers. By the will of deceased, appellant was left all the interest she had in the estate of her deceased first husband, Jacob W. Stout, father of appellant. To her children by the second marriage, of whom there were seven, the testatrix devised her real estate, being her separate property, share and share alike. There was a provision of the will that the land should remain a residence for her sons and daughters until the youngest of them should become of age, and "until that time should not be sold, incumbered, mortgaged, or otherwise disposed of"; and when that period arrived the land was to be divided among the children equally, or sold, and the proceeds thus divided, "as the majority of my said sons and daughters may then elect." It was also provided that, if any of her sons or daughters should die without lawful issue, his or her portion should go to such of her children as may survive. She requested that the real property described in the will should remain as a home and place of residence for her husband until the time for its disposition should arrive. Two of the seven children died in the city of San Francisco after attaining their majority, and pending administration, namely, Grant, a son, and Geraldine, a daughter; and there was evidence that they were never married. On October 29, 1898, the five surviving children and the co-executor, Coursen, filed their petition asking that the administration be brought to a close, and for distribution of the estate remaining in the hands of the executors to the five surviving children. Executor Coursen filed his first and final account and accompanying report September 28, 1898, and executor Stout filed his first and final account and report on October 7, 1898. On October 19, 1898, executor Coursen and the five children filed their objections to the account of executor Stout, and on November 15, 1898, the latter filed objections to the allowance of his co-executor's account. Thereafter, and on November 15, 1898, the separate final accounts came on to be heard, the hearing was continued to November 18th, and, after being partly heard, the hearing was again continued to December 1, 1898, when executor Stout filed a demurrer to the petition for distribution on the ground that it did not state sufficient facts, and at the same time he filed objections and exceptions by way of answer to the petition for distribution on various grounds. One ground was that there had been no administration of the estates of the two deceased children, and that the court cannot now determine the proportions of the assets of the estate to be distributed to the heirs thereof. Another ground was that his co-executor, Coursen, had suffered a tax title to become a lien on the premises. Most of the allegations of the petition were specifically denied. The hearing of the accounts was had on December 1, 1898, testimony taken, and evidence, documentary and other, heard, and "the matter of said accounts was submitted to the court for consideration and decision; and thereafter, on the 30th day of December, 1898, the said court rendered and made its decision and decree approving and settling the account of said G. A. Coursen, and disapproving and disallowing the account of said William P. Stout, to which said William P. Stout duly excepted; and thereafter, on December 31, 1898, the said decision and decree of said court was filed." It appears from the record that on the 30th of December, 1898, the court overruled the demurrer to the petition for distribution, and "also denied and overruled and disregarded the answer of said Stout to said petition for distribution, to all of which said Wm. P. Stout duly excepted; and thereupon said court made its judgment and decree distributing the estate of said Jeanie A. Coursen, deceased, which said judgment and decree was filed * * * on the 31st day of December, 1898." The decree makes distribution of all the estate,—two-sevenths to co-executor Coursen, husband of testatrix, and one-seventh each to the five surviving children of the second marriage. No distribution was made of the interest of deceased in the estate of her first husband, father of executor Stout, to whom this interest was bequeathed. The appeal is by executor Stout from the decree allowing the account of executor Coursen, and disallowing the accounts of executor Stout, and from the decree of distribution.

1. In the specifications of errors of law appellant makes the objection that the court was without jurisdiction to make distribution for the reason that the petition for final distribution was not filed with the final account, but was filed afterwards, and before the final account was settled. The point was before the court in Re Sheid's Estate, 122 Cal. 528, 55 Pac. 328, and directly decided, and it was held that the court in such case did not acquire jurisdiction. The statutory provisions were fully pointed out in the opinion, and the question clearly elucidated, and the decision must rule this case. Respondents reply that the petition need not be considered under section 1665, Code Civ. Proc., but may be regarded as filed under section 1663 of that Code. The latter section relates wholly to partial distribution, and contains provisions with which there was no pretense of complying in the present matter. The petition here was brought under the provisions relating to final distribution, and the decree was for final distribution. Apparently it was just such a case as in re Sheid's Estate. The decree was without authority, and must be reversed.

There are some other questions connected with the decree of distribution which should be noticed. In the will of the testatrix she devises to her son William P. Stout all her right and interest in and to the estate owned by his father, her first husband, at his death. The decree distributes the residue of said estate "hereinafter particularly described" to the second husband of the testatrix and to her surviving children by him, describing the property, "and any other property not now known or discovered, which may belong to the said estate, or in which the said estate may have any interest." There is at least a question whether this provision would not carry any after-discovered property belonging to the testatrix's first husband at his death, and would bind her legatee, Stout, as he is a party to the proceeding. And this doubt is strengthened by the fact that the decree makes no mention of his right to any such property. We think the decree should have made some disposition of this asset of the estate.

It is objected by appellant that under the terms of the will the court could not decree any of the property to the testatrix's surviving husband. This question might have importance if legatee Stout claimed any interest in the property; but, as he makes no claim to any property except that specifically devised to him, and as the other devisees could consent to distribution to their father, as they seem to have done, the decree in this respect was not prejudicial to appellant.

Appellant makes the objection that there could be no distribution of the interest of the deceased children, Grant and Geraldine, in the estate, until after separate administration of their several estates. We see no objection to the decree in this regard. Moreover, appellant, as executor, cannot be heard as to the distribution made. Bates v. Ryberg, 40 Cal. 463. See, also, In re Welch's Estate, 106 Cal. 427, 39 Pac. 805, where certain limitations of the rule are pointed out, within which appellant does not bring himself. As legatee he is not aggrieved, because he makes no claim to any share of the deceased children's property.

2. All the legatees, except appellant, filed written consent to the approval of the account as rendered by executor Coursen. In appellant's account, which is verified, he states that the only money left by deceased, to wit, $180, was taken possession of by his co-executor, "and by him used in paying necessary expenses incurred during the administration of the affairs and business of said estate." All parties agreeing that the money was properly expended, and executor Stout not being interested as a legatee of and making no claim on the money, there was no error prejudicial to appellant in allowing the account without vouchers. Appellant was secured for any commissions to be allowed him and for attorney's fees by the real property to be distributed, and petitioners offered in their petition to pay all commissions and charges.

3. Appellant's account consisted of sundry charges for moneys alleged to have been paid out by him for taxes on the real property of the estate and for improving the street in front of the property, aggregating $956.32. He produced certain tax receipts, showing that the taxes had been paid to and received by the tax collector; but they do not show on their face who paid the money. Appellant testified that he paid a considerable portion of it. There is evidence contradictory of his testimony, however, and on the question of payment by him the evidence is conflicting. From the testimony in the case the court was warranted in disallowing appellant's claim for the disbursements alleged in his account.

4. The court allowed one-half the commissions to appellant on the basis of $20,000 as the value of the estate accounted for by executor Stout, being one-half of $920, and the court also allowed to executor Stout $50 as attorney's fees. It is claimed by appellant that he should have been allowed extra compensation for services as executor, and also should have been allowed a larger attorney's fee. We can discover no grounds for any greater allowance. The real property was in the possession of the family all the time, and during much of which appellant was an inmate of the family, and occupied a room in the dwelling. Appellant claims that the estate was of greater value than $20,000. The inventory returned the value of the estate at $35,180. But a recent reappraisal placed the value of the real property at $18,187.50. There was evidence that the largest offer made for the property was $20,000, and a witness familiar with real-estate values in San Francisco placed the value at $20,000. As to the $180, no part of this money ever came into the hands of appellant, or under his control, as co-executor, nor was it disbursed by him. His co-executor had it in his possession at the death of Mrs. Coursen, and paid it out for the benefit of the estate. We cannot see that the court erred in excluding it from the amount on which appellant was allowed commissions. Hope v. Jones, 24 Cal. 90. The inventory value of the property is not conclusive in fixing the compensation to the executors. In re Simon's Estate, 43 Cal. 543; In re Fernandez's Estate, 119 Cal. 579, 51 Pac. 851.

5. During the early years of the administration, appellant acted as attorney and co-executor, but this did not necessarily entitle him to extra compensation. We have examined the evidence bearing on the extra services claimed to have been performed by appellant, and are of the opinion that the court rightly refused additional compensation.

6. Appellant's attorney appeared for appellant in 1898, and the only service performed by him, as shown by the evidence, was in the preparation of appellant's account and attending at its hearing, and in opposing the co-executor's account and the petition for distribution. Under the circumstances described, we cannot say the court erred in fixing the attorney's fee at $50.

7. Objection was made to the decree on the alleged ground that the taxes on the property were not paid. It appeared that the executors had procured the taxes to be paid by other persons, who hold tax deeds on some portion of the property, confessedly for the benefit of the owners. The object of the statute (Pol. Code, § 3752) in requiring all taxes to be paid before distribution can be made is to protect the revenues of the state. As the tax was in fact paid, it was no objection to distribution that there was an outstanding tax title in the person who paid the taxes. It is advised that the decree settling and allowing the final account of co-executor Coursen and disallowing the account of co-executor Stout be affirmed, and that the decree of distribution be reversed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; GRAY, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the decree settling and allowing the final account of co-executor Coursen and disallowing the account of co-executor Stout is affirmed, and the decree of distribution is reversed.

HOLZHEIER v. HAYES et al. (L. A. 863.)
(Supreme Court of California. July 25, 1901.)

DEEDS—INCUMBRANCES—IMPLIED COVENANTS—ACTION FOR BREACH.

1. Where a verbal agreement for the modification of a contract is rendered impossible of performance by the parties dismissing an action to the continuance of which the agreement relates, it must be regarded as abandoned.

2. Under Civ. Code, § 1113, providing that conveyances of realty, unless otherwise restrained, shall be subject to an implied covenant that it is free from incumbrances, which may be sued on as if expressed in the deed, a suit for breach of such implied covenant may be maintained against a mortgagee joining in the conveyance with the owner, since his obligation arises from the personal covenants implied in the deed.

3. In an action for breach of implied covenant against incumbrances, that plaintiff failed to perform his agreement as to the satisfaction of a deficiency judgment against one of the defendants is immaterial, where no damage was suffered thereby.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; J. W. Hughes, Judge.

Action by F. A. Holzheier against I. C. Hayes and another. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Eugene Daney, for appellants. Withington & Carter, for respondent.

SMITH, C. The defendants, by a grant deed of date November 17, 1890, conveyed to the plaintiff lots 11 and 12 of block 49 of Myers & McComber's addition to Ocean-side, and another lot. The suit was brought for breach of the covenant against prior incumbrances implied in the deed, whereby lots 11 and 12 were lost to the plaintiff. Civ. Code, § 1113. The case was submitted on an agreed statement of the facts, and judgment given for the plaintiff (now respondent) for $500, the agreed value of the lots, with interest and costs. It is admitted, as alleged in the complaint, that at and before the date of the deed the defendant Hicks was the owner of the lots conveyed, and had mortgaged them to the defendant Hayes; who, a few days before the deed to plaintiff, had assigned the mortgage to Klauber & Levi; and that the latter foreclosed the mortgage, and became the owners of the lots in question by purchase at the foreclosure sale, and evicted the plaintiff therefrom. The defense is based upon a written agreement between Hayes and the plaintiff, of date November 14, 1890, and a concurrent oral agreement or understanding, by which, it is claimed, the agreement was modified. In the written agreement the pendency of certain actions affecting the parties is recited, namely, an action of Holzheier (the plaintiff) against Hayes in the superior court of San Diego county, an action of Hayes against Holzheier in a justice's court, a judgment in favor of the people against Holzheier for misdemeanor, and a deficiency judgment of Holzheier against the defendant Hicks; and, referring to these, Holzheier agrees, for the considerations named in the deed, to dismiss his suit against Hayes, and to satisfy of record his deficiency judgment against the defendant Hicks, the consideration recited being the payment of $60 by Hayes, the dismissal of his suit against Holzheier, the payment of the fine and costs due from Holzheier on the judgment against him for misdemeanor, "and the conveyance to the said * * * Holzheier, free of incumbrance, by a good and sufficient grant deed, of lots 11 and 12," and another lot, etc. But (it is stipulated) when the contract was executed "Hayes informed the plaintiff that the lots in Myers & McComber's addition were mortgaged to Klauber & Levi, and agreed to lift the mortgage, and said to him, in case he did not lift the mortgage, he would have the sixty dollars paid, and could go ahead with his case in the superior court." It was known to Holzheier at the time that Hayes was not the owner of the lots mentioned, but simply had held a mortgage thereon. In pursuance of the agreement, the case of Holzheier against Hayes was dismissed by stipulation of the attorneys for both parties, and on the 14th day of November, 1890, Holzheier executed an acknowledgment of satisfaction of the deficiency judgment against Hicks "but did not file the same, he not being requested to do so until after the commencement of this action." Afterwards two motions were made by Holzheier to reinstate his action against Hayes, which were resisted by the latter, and denied, because made more than six months after the dismissal. Hayes also dismissed his action against Holzheier, and paid him the sum of $60, and also paid his fine and costs. The points made by the appellants are: (1) That under the contract, as modified by the oral understanding, the plaintiff took his conveyance subject to the mortgage held by Klauber & Levi; (2) that Hayes having no title to the land, and the fact being known to the plaintiff, his case does not come within the provisions of section 1113 of the Civil Code; and (3), with regard to Hicks, that plaintiff failed to perform his covenant to satisfy the deficiency judgment against him.

1. What was said by Hayes to the plaintiff when the contract was executed cannot be regarded as a modification of the contract, but rather as a proposition for its modification, to take effect upon a future contingency. Whether the silence of the plaintiff is to be taken as equivalent to an acceptance of the proposition is an immaterial question. The contract, as written, was carried into effect by the parties, and the action of Holzheier against Hayes dismissed on the written stipulation of their attorneys; and the motions of the plaintiff to set aside the dismissal were successfully resisted by the defendants. If, therefore, there was a valid agreement for the modification of the contract, it was rendered impossible of performance by the joint act of the parties in dismissing the action, and must, therefore, be regarded as abandoned.

2. The case—both with regard to the defendant Hayes and the defendant Hicks—comes clearly within the provisions of section 1113 of the Civil Code. It makes no difference that the former defendant had no interest in the land. His obligation arises from the personal covenant implied in the deed, which is joint and several. (Civ. Code, §§ 1431, 1659), and refers expressly to the land conveyed by the deed. It is therefore immaterial from which of the grantors the title in fact passed. Pratt v. Eaton, 65 Mo. 165; Foote v. Clark, 102 Mo. 405, 14 S. W. 981; Palmer v. Wall, 128 Mass. 475. The incumbrance on the land was suffered, and in fact made, by Hayes. Had he still held it at the time he executed the deed, it could not have been enforced against his agreement with the plaintiff, or against his covenant in the deed. It became, therefore, an actual incumbrance only upon and by his assignment to Klauber & Levi. Nor, were it otherwise, would his liability be affected. He would still be liable, under his covenant, for the incumbrance made by Hicks.

3. With regard to the defendant Hicks, the fact that the satisfaction of the plaintiff's deficiency judgment against him was not entered of record until after it had become barred by the statute of limitations is immaterial. The defendants suffered no damage from the delay, which was probably inadvertent. I advise that the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; GRAY, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is affirmed.

LUCHETTI et al. v. FROST et al. (Sac. 765.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 27, 1901.)

CONTRACTS—VENDOR AND PURCHASER—TENDER—FINDINGS—APPEAL AND ERROR
—CONFLICTING EVIDENCE.

1. A contract to sell land free of incumbrance, which the vendor has previously contracted to sell to another, is not in violation of Pen. Code, § 533, providing a penalty for selling land which has been bargained to another with intent to defraud previous or subsequent purchasers, where the previous contract is recognized as an incumbrance which the vendor agrees to settle.

2. Defendant contracted to convey land to plaintiff free of incumbrance on payment of the purchase price on or before a certain day. Plaintiff had the money, and offered to pay the price before the day named, and demanded a conveyance; but defendant had not removed the incumbrances, and on the day after the date named conveyed to another. Held, that an actual tender by plaintiff was not necessary to enable him to maintain an action for specific performance, since defendant was then unable to perform.

3. Where there is evidence supporting a finding of fact by the trial court, the finding should not be disturbed because there is also conflicting evidence.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county; Edward I. Jones, Judge.

Action by Luigi Luchetti and another against W. R. Frost and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs, and from an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Ansel Smith, Gus R. Grant, and A. H. Carpenter, for appellants. Nicol, Orr & Nutter, for respondents.

SMITH, C. Appeal from a judgment for the plaintiffs and from an order denying the defendants' motion for a new trial. The suit was for the specific performance of a contract to the plaintiffs by the defendant Frost for the sale of land. The facts, as alleged in the complaint and found by the court, are as follows: By the terms of the contract, which was executed May 26, 1898, the defendant Frost agreed to sell and the plaintiffs to buy the land in question for the sum of $3,500, to be paid $5 at the time of the contract, which was paid accordingly, and the balance, $3,495, on or before June 2, 1898; Frost agreeing, on payment, to convey free of incumbrances. Time was made of the essence of the agreement. At the time of the contract the land was subject to two mortgages, the principals aggregating $3,170; and to a written option to purchase, given by Frost to one Rhodes, which was to expire June 13, 1898. On the 31st of May, 1898, the plaintiffs offered to pay the amount due upon receiving a deed conveying to them the property free of incumbrances, as provided in the contract; but it is found the defendant then and there neglected and refused to execute such conveyance, and has ever since neglected and refused to do so. Afterwards, on the 2d day of June, 1898, the contract was recorded by the plaintiffs. The following day (June 3, 1898) Frost made a conveyance of the land to the defendant Noble, the agent of the defendant Solari, to whom on the same day the land was conveyed, and by whom the land was mortgaged to the defendant Harvey, June 7, 1898, for the sum of $4,000. It is also found (though the fact may be regarded as immaterial) that on the 3d day of June (the day of the deed to Noble) Frost had recorded a written cancellation, or attempted cancellation, of the contract with plaintiffs. The judgment was for a conveyance of the land in question by Solari to the plaintiffs on the payment of the balance of the purchase money, $3,495, free of incumbrances suffered by him or the defendant Frost (the latter, presumably, having been paid), and for the cancellation of the mortgage to Harvey upon the payment thereon of the said sum.

Numerous points are urged for reversal, but they may be reduced, in effect, to the following, viz.: That the contract was in violation of section 533 of the Penal Code, that there was no tender of the purchase money by the plaintiffs, and that the findings of the plaintiff's offer to perform and the defendants' refusal were not justified by the evidence. The first point hardly requires consideration. The agreement was for the sale of the land free of incumbrances, among which the option held by Rhodes was recognized as one. It was understood that this was to be settled by Frost, and on the sale to Noble it was in fact settled for $100. With regard to tender, none was necessary until Frost was in condition to convey as provided in the contract. The plaintiffs' offer, accompanied by the ability and will to perform, and the demand on the defendant Frost for performance on his part, was all that could be done by them at the existing stage of the transaction, and was sufficient. With regard to the sufficiency of the evidence to justify this finding, the most that can be said in favor of appellants' view is that it was conflicting. But even this can hardly be claimed. The plaintiffs and their witnesses all declare that the offer to perform was made at the interview of May 31, 1898, and that it was accompanied with no conditions, except that incumbrances should be removed. Two of the witnesses for defendants testified that the plaintiffs required the performance of another agreement, relating to certain land that it was thought desirable to have; but the date to which this testimony relates is not fixed, nor can it be inferred that it related to the particular occasion spoken of by plaintiffs' witnesses. I advise that the judgment and order appealed from be affirmed.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

GIBBS v. TALLY et al. (L. A. 746.)¹

MECHANIC'S LIEN — CONTRACTOR'S AGREEMENT—SECURITY BY OWNER—BOND—STATUTES—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

1. Code Civ. Proc. § 1203, directing that every contract required to be filed by the mechanic's lien law shall be accompanied with a bond, and providing that laborers or material men shall have an action thereon for the value of labor and materials, not exceeding the amount of the bond, but such action shall not affect their lien, and that a failure to file such bond renders the owner liable in damages to all entitled to liens on the property, is an attempt to compel the owner to furnish security in a matter to which he is not a party, and is invalid, as depriving the owner of his property by interfering with its use.

2. Such statute is invalid as an unnecessary and unreasonable restriction on the power to contract.

3. It is in contravention of the state constitution (article 1, § 1) and the fourteenth amendment of the federal constitution.

In bank. Reversed.

For opinion in department, see 63 Pac. 168.

TEMPLE, J. This is an action for damages against Mrs. Tally, by the assignee of certain persons who had performed labor or furnished materials in the construction of a building, for failing to cause a bond to be filed with the building contract, as required by section 1203, Code Civ. Proc. A bond was in fact filed, and apparently in good faith designed to comply with the statute, but it was found defective, because it was not, "by its terms, made to inure to the benefit of any and all persons who perform labor or furnish materials to the contractor, or any person acting for him or by his authority," "in an amount equal to at least twenty-five per cent. of the contract price." The statute directs that every contract required to be filed by the provisions of the chapter relating to liens of mechanics and others shall be accompanied by a good and sufficient bond, and that any laborer or material man shall have an action to recover upon the bond for the value of labor and materials, not exceeding the amount of the bond; and such action shall not affect his lien. A failure to comply with the provisions of the section rendered "the owner and contractor jointly and severally liable in damages to any and all material men, laborers, and subcontractors entitled to liens upon property affected by said contract." The statute does not say who shall cause this bond to be executed, nor to whom it shall in form be made payable. It does not undertake that the contractor shall faithfully perform his contract. In short, there is in it nothing which can be of advantage to the owner in any possible event. On the other hand, no possible loss will accrue to the contractor by a failure to provide the bond. The declaration that he shall be severally and jointly liable with the owner is useless verbiage. The contractor is already liable for all labor or materials furnished to him or by his authority. The only person, therefore, upon whom a penalty is put for the failure is the owner. He, therefore, and he only, is required to furnish the bond; and, in effect, the bond is conditioned only that the contractor will pay "such" persons the value of labor and materials so furnished to him; and the action by a lienor does not affect his lien, or an action commenced for the foreclosure of it. The section assumes a valid contract, under which, if the contract is performed, the lienors can have the entire contract price distributed to them. But after that has been done, or even before it, a suit can be brought upon the bond, or, if it has not been filed, against the owner, to recover an additional 25 per cent. upon the contract price, and that is this precise case. The material men and laborers could have demanded security from the contractor before furnishing materials or labor. The statute attempts to compel the owner to furnish security for them in a matter to which he is not a party, and in which he is not concerned. The cost may exceed the contract price, because material men combine to charge exorbitant prices, or through bad management of the contractor, or because prices have increased since the contract was let, or from other causes. If this can be required from the owner it lessens materially the value of his contract. In fact, so far as price is concerned, it deprives him of it. He has no assurance that his house will be built for the stipulated price. There is no more reason for requiring the owner to give this security than there would be in requiring it from any other person in the community. That the owner may be required to pay more than the contract price is not the only injustice which may result from this most unreasonable statute. The owner, or the sureties he is required to furnish, would be responsible in case the contractor failed to perform his contract. Suppose the structure failed to comply with the contract,—was in fact so defective as to be useless,—and the owner should refuse to pay for it? The very fact that he was injured by the failure of the contractor would create the liability on his part or upon his sureties. Whether the owner is not the principal on the bond, or the party for whom the sureties undertake, I will not discuss. The undertaking, in effect, certainly is that the contractor will pay certain debts if he incurs them; but he is not specially required to furnish the bond, and, as I have stated, incurs no penalty for not doing so, while the owner does.

It is perfectly manifest that this section, if valid, places an unreasonable restraint upon the owner of property in regard to the use thereof. It compels him to become responsible for liabilities he has not incurred, and which were not created for his benefit. It practically forbids him from improving his property by letting a contract unless he becomes liable, or furnishes sureties who will be so liable, for 25 per cent. above the contract price, and for the same amount in case the contractor so far fails in keeping his contract that the labor and materials are without value to him, and the contractor has no valid claim against him on account thereof. To impose this burden upon an owner is to some extent to deprive him of his property, for the value of property consists in the right to use it. Blackstone, in stating the fundamental rights of Englishmen, says: "The third absolute right inherent in every Englishman is that of property, which consists in the free use, enjoyment, and disposal of all his acquisitions without any control or diminution save only by the law of the land." 1 Bl. Comm. 138. And Justice Miller said in Pumpelly v. Canal Co., 13 Wall. 166, 20 L. Ed. 557: "There may be such serious interruptions to the common and necessary use of property as will be equivalent to a taking within the meaning of the constitution." It was said by Judge Comstock, in Wynehamer v. People, 13 N. Y. 378: "When a law annihilates the value of property, and strips it of its attributes by which alone it is distinguished as property, the owner is deprived of it according to the plainest interpretation, and certainly within the constitutional provision, intended expressly to shield personal rights from the exercise of arbitrary power." It is also an unreasonable and unnecessary restriction upon the power to make contracts. See, upon this point, Butchers' Union Co. v. Crescent City Live-Stock Co., 111 U. S. 746, 28 L. Ed. 585; Bertholf v. O'Reilly, 74 N. Y. 509, 30 Am. Rep. 323; Ex parte Jentzsch, 112 Cal. 469, 44 Pac. 803; Cooley, Const. Lim. 48; In re Tie Loy, 11 Sawy. 472, 26 Fed. 611. It clearly contravenes the provisions of section 1, art. 1, of the constitution of the state, and the fourteenth amendment to the constitution of the United States. It is not—and clearly it could not be—contended that this law is a regulation which comes within what is called the "police power." It is not calculated, nor was it intended, to conserve the safety, health, or general welfare of the community. The section does not provide for a lien, but it is contended that there is not greater interference with property rights than is found in some of the provisions in regard to liens of laborers and material men, which have been upheld, and particularly in the provision making the contract void in case it is not filed, allowing liens of laborers, material men, and subcontractors to the full value of services rendered and materials furnished, although that may exceed the contract price. The constitution directs the legislature to provide for liens of those persons upon the property to the improvement of which they have contributed. It has been held that this extends only to the contract price, which cannot be exceeded. If the contract is not filed as directed, it is void; and, there being no contract, it would follow, even though the statute had not said so, that the owner is building himself. In that case the so-called contractor is (as to other lienors) but the agent of the owner. This would be the natural result, and is not a forced conclusion made by the statute. Kellogg v. Howes, 81 Cal. 170, 22 Pac. 509, 6 L. R. A. 588, opinion of Justice Fox. Where there is a valid contract under which the work was done, and which is performed by the owner, all that the statute attempts to do, and in fact all that can be done, is to enable the laborers, material men, and subcontractors to cause the contract price to be applied to the payment of their demands. All that has been held upon this point is that it is not an unreasonable interference with the rights of the owner that whatever contract he makes shall be so executed and published that the constitutional policy may be carried out. No constitutional policy is back of the provision questioned here, and, it is safe to say, would not justify it if there were.

Our attention is called to the cases of Mangrum v. Truesdale, 128 Cal. 145, 60 Pac. 775, and Carpenter v. Furrey, 128 Cal. 665, 61 Pac. 369. In the first no question as to the validity of the statute was raised, and the only question discussed was whether a bond executed after the contract had been filed, and delivered to a loan association from whom a loan had been negotiated, and not filed with the contract, was a compliance with the law. The liability of the owner in case the bond was not furnished seems to have been admitted. In Carpenter v. Furrey the bond had been given, and the suit was against the sureties. They attacked the validity of the law (Laws 1893, p. 202) upon the grounds, only: (1) That the subject was not expressed in the title of the act; and (2) that it was a special law. These points are not raised in this case. In this case, I repeat, there was a valid contract, which was performed on both sides. Mrs. Tally has paid out to the lienors, or at least strictly under the provisions of the law, the entire contract price. There has been no technical or other obstruction which has prevented the lienors, or any of them, from getting out of this contract price all to which they were entitled. Having got from Mrs. Tally the entire contract price, they are endeavoring in this suit to compel her to pay 25 per cent. more because of a mistake made by her or her attorneys in writing the bond. It cannot be done, and the legislature has not the power to require it of her. The judgment is reversed.

GUERIAN v. JOYCE. (L. A. 906.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 24, 1901.)
ESTATES—CLAIMS—VERIFICATION—PLEADING —EVIDENCE—OBJECTIONS.

1. A verification to a claim against an estate, stating that the sum is justly due to claimant, and that no payments have been made thereon which are not credited, and that there are no offsets except some small items, the exact amount of which is not known to affiant, but which she is willing to have credited upon same, is sufficient, since the exception is as definite as claimant can truthfully make it.

2. Where a complaint alleged a cause of action for services commencing more than two years prior to the death of defendant's intestate, tate, and continuing until his death, a demurrer on the ground that the complaint did not state a cause of action because part of the claim was barred by limitations should be overruled.

3. Where no objection to the verification of a claim presented against the estate of a decedent is raised in a suit to recover thereon by demurrer or answer, the court should not allow defendant to make such objection at the trial.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Waldo M. York, Judge.

Action by Jane Guerian against Thomas F. Joyce, administrator of estate of Jane Joyce, deceased. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

J. L. Murphy, for appellant. Louis Gottschalk, for respondent.

COOPER, C. When this case was called for trial, the defendant objected to all evidence offered by plaintiff, upon the ground that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The court sustained the objection, and, upon defendant's motion, judgment of nonsuit was entered. This appeal is from the judgment.

The defendant contended, and the court held, that the claim upon which the action was brought was not properly verified. The verification contains all the statute requires. It states that the sum is justly due the claimant, and "that no payments have been made thereon which are not credited, and that there are no offsets to the same, to the knowledge of the claimant or affiant, except some small items, the exact amount of which is not known to affiant, but which she is willing to have credited upon same when same is shown by administrator herein." The defendant contends that the exception vitiates the verification; that it shows that there are certain offsets to the amount stated in the claim. We do not think the ends of justice require us to take such an extremely technical view of the verification. It substantially complies with the statute. It contains all that the statute requires, but, in addition, shows that there are some small items of set-off. As an excuse for not stating the amount, the claimant states that the amount of these items is not known to her, but that she is willing to have the same credited when shown by the administrator. If she knew there were offsets, she could not swear that there were none. If she did not know the amount, she could not state it. She did state that there were offsets, and that she did not know the amount, but that she was willing to credit the account with such offsets. She could not well have done more. It is said that she could have said the amount did not exceed a certain sum. It might have been better for her to have done so, but it may be answered that the administrator could have allowed the account, or offered to allow it, after crediting the offsets.

He did not do so, but rejected it absolutely. His action was equivalent to saying that it was not a just claim, and that there were offsets to the entire amount. A substantial compliance with the statute is sufficient. In re Swain's Estate, 67 Cal. 641, 8 Pac. 497; Griffith v. Lewin, 129 Cal. 598, 62 Pac. 172; and cases cited. But, aside from what has been said, we think the defendant waived any technical objection to the verification.

The complaint alleges that the first publication of notice to creditors was made on the 18th day of February, 1899. Plaintiff had at least four months after such publication in which to verify and present her claim. The complaint alleges:—"That on the 15th day of April, 1899, at the city of Los Angeles, the claim hereinbefore set forth, verified by the oath of the claimant, and upon which this action is founded, was duly presented in writing by the plaintiff to the defendant, as such administrator, for allowance, and that the same was by him, as such administrator, rejected on the 18th day of April, 1899."

The defendant demurred to the complaint upon the sole ground "that part of the alleged claim is barred by the statute of limitations, in this: that it is alleged that the services were rendered from October, 1895, and judgment is sought for all services rendered for more than two years prior to the presentation of the plaintiff's claim to the administrator, contrary to section 1499, Code Civ. Proc.," and "that said complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action against defendant as to a large part of the claim." It is thus readily seen that the demurrer went only to the part of the claim for services which had been rendered more than two years. The defendant did not then have in mind that the complaint entirely failed to state a cause of action, or, if he did, he carefully concealed it, because the demurrer really admits that the complaint is good as to the part of it that is not barred by the statute. The court properly overruled the demurrer. The complaint was verified. Defendant, in his answer, admitted that some labor and services were performed by plaintiff, but denies that they were reasonably worth the amount claimed, or any greater sum than $30 per month, and alleges that she has been fully paid.

Defendant also pleads that all of the claim of plaintiff, except that which accrued within two years prior to the presentation thereof, is barred by the statute. There is no attempt to deny the allegation herein quoted as to the due presentation of the claim and its rejection by the administrator. While the allegation contains conclusions, yet it states enough, in the absence of special demurrer, to show that the claim was properly presented. There was therefore no issue made by the pleadings as to the proper presentation of the claim in writing, verified by the oath of plaintiff. It was not necessary for plaintiff to offer in evidence the rejected claim. When offered, the defendant made objections to it that he had not raised by demurrer or answer. The court sustained the objection in regard to evidence not material under the pleadings, and granted a nonsuit. It would have saved time, delay, and expense to all parties if the court had compelled them to try the case upon the issues as they had made them. The defendant had pleaded payment and the bar of the statute. The court should have heard the evidence, and determined these matters. The estate should have been protected, and no part of the claim allowed which had been paid, or which had become barred. We desire to call the attention of the lower courts and the members of the bar to the fact that much time is wasted and expense incurred on questions that seem to be raised for the purpose of avoiding the trial of cases upon their merits. The time would be better spent in trying the cases upon vital issues. After a case is at issue, and either party has been silent as to objections that could have been raised in proper time, and the objection is raised when it is too late to amend or remedy the defect, we will not look with favor upon it. In this case, if the claim was not properly presented, the fact would not have been a bar to the right of plaintiff, unless the time for presenting the claim had expired, but would have been matter in abatement. Hench v. Porter, 10 Cal. 557. In the case of Chase v. Evoy, 58 Cal. 352, it was urged here that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, because "it fails to show due presentation of the claim to the administratrix" of the estate of the deceased. The allegation as to the verification was that it "was duly verified by the oath of plaintiff in the form prescribed by law." This court held the objection untenable, and in the opinion said: "We think that the most serious objection that could be raised to the averment is that it is not sufficiently definite and certain, and that defect, if it be one, could not be taken advantage of by general demurrer, and, a fortiori, would not be fatal to a judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiff in the absence of any demurrer to the complaint or averment in the answer that the claim was not supported by a proper affidavit." The case at bar shows a much better allegation as to the verification and presentation of the claim than did the complaint in Chase v. Evoy. No question was raised as to the verification by demurrer or answer. The court, in furtherance of the ends of justice, should not have allowed defendant to raise it at the trial. The judgment should be reversed.

FOSTER v. VEHMEYER. (Sac. 764.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 26, 1901.)

SUMMONS—SERVICE BY PUBLICATION—TIME—DEFAULT JUDGMENT—MOTION TO SET ASIDE—AFFIDAVIT OF MERITS.

1. An order for publication of summons against a nonresident of the state required that publication be made at least once a week for two months. Code Civ. Proc. § 413, provides that publication against a defendant residing out of the state must not be less than two months. The first publication was made June 14th, the last August 9th, and default taken September 11th. Held, the default was premature, since the service of the summons was not complete until August 13th, and the 30 days for answering had not expired when the default judgment was entered.

2. On the day a default judgment was prematurely taken against defendant, but after the default was entered, he appeared, and filed a demurrer to the complaint. Held, that under such circumstances no affidavit of merits was required to support a motion to set the judgment aside.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; Joseph W. Hughes, Judge.

Action by John B. Foster against C. F. Vehmeyer. From an order setting aside a default judgment, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

L. T. Hatfield, for appellant. Bruner & Bros., for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This appeal is taken from an order setting aside a default judgment. The question presented is, was the default prematurely taken? Defendant was served with summons by publication. The order for publication provided: "It is ordered that service of the summons in this action be made upon the defendant * * * in the Pacific Bee, a newspaper published in said county of Sacramento; that such publication be made at least once a week for two months." The first publication was made June 14th, and the last publication August 9th. The default was taken September 11th. The default in this case could not be taken until 30 days after the completion of service of the summons. The question is then presented, when was the service completed? Section 413 of the Code of Civil Procedure, among other matters, provides: "The order must direct the publication to be made in a newspaper, to be designated, as most likely to give notice to the person to be served, and for such length of time as may be deemed reasonable, at least once a week; but publication against a defendant residing out of the state, or absent therefrom, must not be less than two months." In the present case the defendant resided out of the state. There appears to be but one rational construction to be given this statute, and that is, the defendant is entitled to the publication of the summons for a period extending over two full calendar months. It is not at all necessary that two full calendar months should intervene between the first and last publication, but it is necessary that the summons be published once each week for those two months; and it is also necessary that from the day of the first publication two calendar months should intervene before the service of the summons is complete. In other words, the first publication in this case having taken place upon June 14th, the period of two months expired upon August 13th, and the thirty days must elapse after that time before a judgment by default may be taken. In this case the two months expired upon August 13th, and, the default being taken upon September 11th, it is evident that it was prematurely taken. The aforesaid section of the Code of Civil Procedure also provides: "When publication is ordered, personal service of a copy of the summons and complaint out of the state is equivalent to publication and deposit in the post office, and in either case the service of the summons is complete at the expiration of the time prescribed by the order for publication." Here the time prescribed by the order of publication was two months, and therefore the service of summons was not complete until the expiration of that period of time. This is the construction given to this statute by this court in the past. Society v. Thompson, 32 Cal. 347. In that case, by the order of publication, a three-months publication was required, and, the first publication being made upon January 10th, it was held that the service was completed upon April 9th, inclusive. While the last publication was made upon April 9th, the court still said: "We think that the summons had been published for three calendar months at the close of the 9th day of April, and that the first day of the forty within which the defendant was required to answer was on the 10th of April. But, even if the three months for publication did not expire till the 10th day of April, there was no necessity for another publication. The 10th was in the same week with the 9th, and the summons had been published in that week. It had been published once in every one of the weeks that could, by any possibility, in whole or in part, be brought into the three calendar months." It is unnecessary to review the many cases cited by appellant from other states, for each state has its own statute bearing upon the procedure to be followed, and it is upon the construction of these various and different statutes that the contrariety of decision has arisen. Defendant appeared in the cause and filed his demurrer upon September 11th, the day the default was entered against him, but subsequent thereto. Under these circumstances, the default judgment being absolutely void, no affidavit of merits was required in order to support his motion to set it aside. For the foregoing reasons, the order is affirmed.

GREEN et ux. v. GRIDER et al. (L. A. 856.)
(Supreme Court of California. July 24, 1901.)

CONTRACT TO SELL LAND—PRINCIPAL AND AGENT.

Plaintiffs contracted to sell certain land to two of defendants, payment to be made at a specified time, and, if not so made, the contract to be void, at plaintiffs' option. It was also agreed that certain tracts should be conveyed on payment of the agreed price therefor, and that, if the vendees sold any of the land, they might retain one-fourth of the purchase price, and securities for the remainder should be deposited in bank to secure the performance of their contract with plaintiffs. The appellants purchased certain tracts of the vendees, paying them in part therefor, and tendered the balance to plaintiffs. Held, that plaintiffs were not bound by any payments made to their vendees, since such contract did not make them agents, or authorize them to receive any money for plaintiffs.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; John L. Campbell, Judge.

Action by R. Henry Green and wife against L. M. Grider and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs, and from an order denying a new trial, defendants Wallace F. Haas and others appeal. Affirmed.

Walter F. Haas, Chas. Cassat Davis, Cole & Cole, and S. O. Houghton, for appellants. J. L. Murphy, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. The plaintiffs are the vendors in a contract for the sale of land to defendants Grider and Dow. The suit is against the latter, and purchasers from them, to foreclose their interests under the contract. Judgment went against the vendees and some other defendants by default,—and as to the former by stipulation also,—and against the other defendants after answer and trial. The last-named defendants appeal from the judgment and from an order denying them a new trial.

The appellants, it appears, prior to the commencement of the suit, made payments, respectively, to the vendees, on account of the purchase money, for which they claim credits; and in each case tendered the balance to the plaintiffs, who refused to accept less than the whole of the purchase price. The contention of the appellants is that by the terms of the contract the vendees were authorized to sell the lands, and that the moneys paid were received by them as agents for the plaintiffs. But this contention is obviously untenable. The contract, in its terms, is an agreement of the vendors to sell and of the vendees to buy the land described in it for the sum of $35,000,—$5 in cash, and the balance "to be paid within one year, or as * * * provided" in the following provisions of the contract. These refer to modes of payment, and to the extension of the time in a certain contingency, and, on the happening of certain conditions, for forfeiture of the contract "at the option of" the vendors; but they leave the vendees —in the absence of plaintiffs' election to declare a forfeiture—still bound to pay the purchase money, or the balance of the purchase money agreed upon, with the interest, as specified, after the expiration of the year. By other provisions the plaintiffs were bound to convey subdivisions of the land on the payment to them of amounts specified as the price of each, but only on such payments. The contract—which was duly recorded—is too clear to be misunderstood on these points, or to require discussion. Nor would it be profitable to review in extenso the arguments of appellants' counsel. Could it be assumed, as claimed by them, that Grider and Dow were agents for the plaintiffs to sell their lands, it would not follow that they were authorized to receive the purchase money stipulated to be paid to the plaintiffs. That would depend on the terms of the writing conferring the authority, which expressly negative any such notion. The provision that the vendees might retain one-fourth of the purchase money, etc., on sale of subdivisions, had no reference to the amounts to be paid to the plaintiffs as conditions of conveyance. The price of the land in each case was wholly an affair of the vendees, and they could have retained it all, but for the provision requiring the securities for the balance to be placed in escrow in the bank, as collateral to secure their debt to the vendors. There was, in fact, no privity between the plaintiffs and appellants, except in the agreement that the former would convey to the latter severally the subdivisions of land purchased by them upon the payment to the plaintiffs of the stipulated prices. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

APPEAL—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—SERVICE—EXTENSION OF TIME—DEPOSITIONS—READING A PART—CONTRACT—STATUTE OF FRAUDS.

1. Where the time for serving a bill of exceptions has been extended by order of the court, an objection that it was not served within the statutory time should be overruled.

2. Where a bill of exceptions is allowed and signed by the judge, an objection that it does not appear from the bill that it was served within the time fixed by the court for that purpose should be overruled, since the certificate of the judge carries with it the presumption of regularity.

3. An order extending the time for serving a bill of exceptions may properly be entered before judgment.

4. Under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 2028, 2032, 2034, providing that depositions may be taken and used, it is error to permit a party to read a portion of a deposition taken in his behalf when he has stated that he should not read it all.

5. A contract to pay the value of services which might be, and in fact were, performed within a year, is not void, under Civ. Code, § 1624, subd. 1, because not in writing.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Glenn county; Orval Perkey, Judge.

Action by the Bank of Orland against John Finnell. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

For former opinion, see 56 Pac. 607.

F. E. Johnston and Bush Finnell, for appellant. Frank Freeman and Charles L. Donohoe, for respondent.

SMITH, C. The suit is to recover money alleged to be due on a parol contract, the terms of which are set out in the complaint. The defense is a denial of the material allegations of the complaint, and, as an affirmative defense, in effect, that by a subsequent agreement the contract was satisfied and discharged. The cause was tried by a jury, who returned a verdict for the plaintiff, and judgment was entered accordingly. The appeal is from the judgment.

The preliminary point is made by the respondent's attorneys that the bill of exceptions was not served and presented for settlement in time, and must, therefore, be disregarded. Upon the rendition of the verdict, and before the entry of judgment, an order was made by the court granting to the defendant 30 days in addition to the time required by law within which to serve and file bill of exceptions. The judgment was entered September 27, 1899. On the day fixed for the settlement of the bill, plaintiff's counsel objected to the settlement on the ground that the copy of the bill had not been served on them "within ten days after the entry of judgment." But, as the defendant's time had been extended, the objection was obviously untenable, and was rightly overruled. It is urged, however, that "it does not appear from the bill of exceptions" that it was served on the plaintiff's attorneys within the additional 30 days allowed by the order, and that the order itself was void, because made before judgment. But the making of the order in advance of the judgment was entirely unobjectionable and regular; and, with reference to the other objection, it is sufficient that the contrary does not appear. The certificate of the judge carries with it the presumption of regularity. Sullivan v. Wallace, 73 Cal. 307, 14 Pac. 789. The decision in Connor v. Motor-Road Co., 101 Cal. 429, 35 Pac. 990, cited by the counsel, does not conflict with this familiar and well-established principle. It is, indeed, asserted by the respondent's counsel that the bill in fact was not served on them within the extended time. But the appellant's counsel (in language more vigorous than appropriate to this court) denies the fact, and this leaves the question to be decided by the certificate of the judge, and the presumption in favor of the regularity of his proceedings.

The errors complained of refer to rulings of the court in giving or refusing instructions and in admitting or excluding evidence. Of the latter, one error specified is the ruling of the court in permitting portions of the deposition of one Mecum, a witness of the plaintiff, to be read in evidence, and in refusing to strike out the same. The reading of the deposition was prefaced with the statement of the plaintiff's attorney that he did not intend to offer the entire deposition, but part of it only; to which objection was made and overruled, and exception taken. On the completion of the reading, the defendant's attorney moved to strike out what had been read on the ground that only part of the deposition had been read; but the court overruled the motion, the defendant excepting. It is set forth in the statement that the defendant did not offer any portion of the deposition, and that no objection was made to his doing so; and portions of the evidence omitted are also inserted. But these matters we deem immaterial. The simple question involved is whether it is permissible for a party to introduce in evidence selected portions of the deposition of his own witness, omitting the rest; and clearly this question must be answered in the negative. Kilbourne v. Jennings, 40 Iowa, 473; Grant v. Pendery, 15 Kan. 236; Hill v. Sturgeon, 28 Mo. 323; State v. Rayburn, 31 Mo. App. 385; Lanahan v. Lawton, 50 N. J. Eq. 276, 23 Atl. 476; Thomas v. Miller, 151 Pa. 482, 25 Atl. 127. In this state the only authority for the use of depositions is in the provisions of the Code, which provide that "the deposition" may be used (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 2028, 2032, 2034); but it is not said that portions of them can be used, nor can it be inferred that such was the intention. It is, indeed, said in the American and British Encyclopædia of Law, in a passage cited by respondent's counsel (volume 9, p. 365), that "the party offering a deposition in evidence is not, as a rule, bound to offer or read the whole of it"; but (with one exception) we find no support for the proposition in the authorities cited. Of these some have apparently no bearing on the proposition. Edgar v. McArn, 22 Ala. 796; Smith v. Crocker, 3 App. Div. 471, 38 N. Y. Supp. 268; Gellatly v. Lowery, 6 Bosw. 113; Williams v. Kelsey, 6 Ga. 365; McArdle v. Bullock, 45 Ga. 89,—the court in the case last cited saying: "If the practice of the court permits the party bringing them in [referring to the interrogatories] to read * * * only the direct answers, it is a new practice to us." Other cases hold that parts of a deposition may be used, in certain cases, as declarations of the party testifying (Code Civ. Proc. § 1870, subd. 1; Van Horn v. Smith, 59 Iowa, 142, 12 N. W. 789, distinguishing Kilbourne v. Jennings, 40 Iowa, 473. And see, also, Bank v. Rhutasel, 67 Iowa, 319, 25 N. W. 261, or as declarations of a witness to contradict him (Webster v. Caiden, 55 Me. 165; Whitman v. Morey, 63 N. H. 448, 2 Atl. 899); and others that a party may read the whole or part of a deposition taken on behalf of his adversary (Con- verse v. Meyer, 14 Neb. 190, 15 N. W. 340; Hammat v. Emerson, 27 Me. 308, 46 Am. Dec. 598; Byers v. Orensstein, 42 Minn. 386, 44 N. W. 129; Watson v. Race, 46 Mo. App. 552), the decision being based, apparently, on the principle laid down in Van Horn v. Smith, 59 Iowa, 142, 12 N. W. 789. The excepted case referred to is Bunzel v. Maas, 116 Ala. 79, 22 South. 568, where the plaintiff was allowed to offer in evidence the examination in chief of a witness examined by deposition in his behalf; the court citing in support of the ruling the following cases: Van Horn v. Smith, 59 Iowa, 142, 12 N. W. 789; Converse v. Meyer, 14 Neb. 190, 15 N. W. 340; Gellatly v. Lowery, 6 Bosw. 113; Bank v. Rhutasel, 67 Iowa, 316, 25 N. W. 261; Herring v. Skaggs, 73 Ala. 446. But none of these decisions seem to support the position of the court. In the case last cited the deposition from which the plaintiff was permitted to read was the deposition of the defendant, and in Bank v. Rhutasel the deposition of a witness taken by the opposite party. The other cases are among those already commented on. It will be observed that the exceptional case does not go so far as to hold that the plaintiff could dispense with any part of the direct examination, as was held in this case.

Objection was made to the instruction given to the jury that the contract alleged in the complaint did not need to be in writing to give it validity. The contract sued on was the promise to pay the plaintiff the reasonable value of the summer-fallowing to be done by the Deveneys. This might be, and in fact was, done within the year. Civ. Code, § 1624, subd. 1. The agreement of the plaintiff with the Deveneys to furnish them the money needed for this purpose and in farming the land leased—which was in part the consideration of the defendant's performance—was in fact performed, and it is immaterial whether or not it should have been in writing.

The other points made by the appellant relate to the evidence, and may not be presented on a new trial. It will therefore serve no useful purpose to determine them. I advise that the judgment be reversed.

We concur: GRAY, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER OURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is reversed.

ALLEN v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO. (S. F. 2,793.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 31, 1901.)
DIVORCE—SUIT MONEY—ALIMONY—INABILITY TO PAY—STAY OF PROCEEDINGS—MANDAMUS—COSTS.

1. In an action by petitioner against his wife to annul their marriage on the ground of fraud, petitioner was ordered to pay her certain suit money and alimony. In proceedings against him for contempt for not making the payments, it was shown that he was unable to pay, and the proceedings were dismissed, but the court ordered all proceedings in the suit stayed until such payments were made. Held that, while the wife was absolutely entitled to the suit money, and petitioner should not be permitted to proceed with the suit until that was paid, the court erred in refusing him a hearing until he paid the alimony.

2. Where petitioner applied for mandamus requiring the superior court to grant him a trial in an action to annul his marriage, proceedings therein having been stayed until he complied with an order to pay suit money and alimony, he being unable to pay the alimony, and not having paid or offered to pay the suit money, the proceedings for mandamus should be dismissed, without costs.

In bank. Petition for mandamus by J. W. F. Allen against the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco. Dismissed.

Alfred P. Black, for relator. Benjamin Healey, for respondent.

BEATTY, C. J. This is a petition for a writ of mandate to the superior court to proceed to trial of an action by the petitioner against his wife to annul the marriage upon the ground of fraud. The facts of the case are that the defendant in the action referred to, after appearing therein, applied to the court for an order allowing her alimony and suit money, and the court made an order requiring the plaintiff (petitioner herein) to pay her the sum of $50 as counsel fees, and $20 per month for her support. The plaintiff failed to pay any part of the sums ordered to be paid, and was cited to show cause why he should not be punished for contempt for failing to obey the order of the court. After a hearing upon the citation for contempt, the court found that the failure to pay was due to inability on the part of the plaintiff to comply with the order, and the proceeding was dismissed. At the same time the court made an order staying all proceedings in the action to annul the marriage, and has ever since refused to grant the petitioner a hearing upon the merits of his case, unless he complies with the order to pay both counsel fees and alimony. We think the court is in error in refusing the petitioner a hearing until he pays the alimony. It is conceded that he is unable to pay anything, and, such being the case, he should not be debarred from a trial until he has provided for his wife's support. It is enough to stay the proceeding until he provides the defendant with the money actually necessary for her defense, independent of support,—suit money as distinguished from alimony. As to suit money, the right of the wife cannot be denied. Until her alleged fraud is established, she remains the lawful wife of the petitioner, and has the same right to defend the action to annul the marriage that he has to prosecute it; and, until she is provided with the means actually necessary to make her defense, she ought not to be forced into a trial. This conclusion is sustained by all the opinions, concurring and dissenting, in the case of Hite v. Hite, 124 Cal. 389, 57 Pac. 227, 45 L. R. A. 793. It is not clear what ought to be the judgment in a case where a court has imposed conditions too exacting upon a party demanding the trial of a cause, and where the party has not offered to comply with the conditions which the court might properly have imposed. Under the circumstances of this case, we think it will be proper to dismiss the proceeding, without costs. It is so ordered.

TP. et al. (S. F. 1,473.)

In bank. On motion for reargument. Denied.

For opinion in department, see 65 Pac. 742.

PER CURIAM. Rehearing denied.

BEATTY, C. J. I dissent from the order denying a rehearing. While it is true that the department could not have decided otherwise than it did without disregarding the decision of the whole court in the case of Heinlen v. Phillips, 88 Cal. 557, 26 Pac. 366,—a decision in which I concurred,—I think the court in bank should not hesitate to set aside its former ruling if satisfied that it was erroneous. I am satisfied by the argument and the authorities cited by appellant that Heinlen v. Phillips was incorrectly decided, and this case is an illustration of the abuses that are possible under the practice there sanctioned. A justice of the peace may hold a case under advisement for an indefinite time (it was nearly 15 months in this instance), and, unless the losing party has kept constant watch upon the proceeding, a judgment may have passed beyond the reach of review before he has any notice of its entry. There is no requirement of notice of a justice's judgment, but the law commanding him to enter judgment at the close of the trial, if held mandatory, as it is in terms, would serve all the purposes of notice. As notice is essential for the security of the losing party, I think the law cannot too soon be relieved of a construction which destroys its efficacy.

WILSON v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CITY
AND COUNTY OF SAN FRAN-CISCO. (S. F. 2,618.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 27, 1901.)
APPEAL AND ERROR—ORDER FOR SUBMIS-SION—INADVERTENT DECISION—VALID-ITY—MOTION—MANDATE.

1. Where an appeal from a judgment of the police court to the superior court had been taken, and papers filed in the superior court many months, the fact that the court decided the appeal without having first made an order submitting it to decision does not render the judgment void.

2. Where the superior court inadvertently rendered judgment on an appeal from the police court, without first making an order submitting the appeal for decision, the judgment may be set aside on motion, but cannot be treated as void, and a second review and decision of the same question be compelled by mandate.

On petition for rehearing. Denied.
For former opinion, see 65 Pac. 575.

GAROUTTE, J. By reason of the complicated facts disclosed by the record in this proceeding, possibly some erroneous statements have crept into the opinion heretofore rendered; but, as to any of those statements, they do not appear to materially affect the soundness of the conclusion to which the court arrived. In answer to the petition for a rehearing it may be further suggested that it appears, first, by the affidavit of the judge of the court, in his answer to the petition for the writ, that he decided the appeal from the judgment upon September 7th. It next appears by the entry made in the record at that time that he decided the appeal from the judgment. It next appears by the order made by the court upon December 26th that he decided the appeal from the judgment upon September 7th; for at the hearing upon December 26th the very question at issue was whether or not the order made upon December 21st was within the jurisdiction of the court, and at the hearing upon the 26th it was held that the order of the 21st was void by reason of the fact that the court had theretofore, upon September 7th, decided the question involved in the hearing of December 21st. It may, then, be said that it conclusively appears that the court upon September 7th decided the appeal from the judgment. The remaining question is then presented, was that decision absolutely void? for, if it was not absolutely void, certainly mandate will not run against the court to compel it to again decide the same question. It is insisted that such judgment was absolutely void, because at the time it was rendered there had been no order made submitting that appeal to the court. It, however, does appear by the record that the appeal from the judgment had been taken many months prior to September 7th, and that the papers on appeal from the judgment had been filed in the superior court months prior to September 7th. Under these circumstances, the mere fact that the court decided the appeal without having first made an order submitting it for decision, we think to no extent renders the judgment void. It may be said that the very fact of the court assuming jurisdiction of the question and deciding it was, in effect, an order of submission. If these be the facts, then probably it may be said that the judgment was inadvertently rendered, but the inadvertent rendition of a judgment does not necessarily render that judgment void. A judgment inadvertently rendered may be set aside upon motion, but we know of no case where it has ever been held that such a judgment may be treated as absolutely void, and mandate run against a court to compel a second review and decision of the same question. For these reasons, I think the petition for rehearing should be denied.

WEBB v. WINTER et al. (Sac. 815.)*

(Supreme Court of California. July 29, 1901.)

WILLS—COMMUNITY PROPERTY—LIFE ESTATE—MORTGAGE—FORECLOSURE—INTEREST CONVEYED—POWER TO SELL—ADVERSE POSSESSION—TENANT IN COMMON—EJECTMENT—DEMAND.

1. A husband owning community property died, and by his will left all his property to his wife for life, remainder to his children. She borrowed money, and mortgaged the premises as if owner in fee. Held, that on foreclosure the purchaser acquired the widow's undivided one half and her life estate in the other half.

2. Where property is sold on foreclosure of a mortgage executed by a widow, who owned one half thereof as community property and the other half for life under her husband's will, of which she was executrix, the remainder being devised to their children, the purchaser at such sale cannot acquire title to the interest of the children by adverse possession, pending administration of their father's estate, or without giving notice that he claimed absolute title to the whole property.

3. In an action to foreclose a mortgage given by the owner of an undivided half of the premises and life estate in the other half, the owners of the remainder after expiration of the life estate were made parties defendant and defaulted. Held, that the foreclosure sale conveyed only the interest of the mortgagor, and did not affect the title of the other parties.

4. Where a will authorizes the executor to sell the property, if necessary for support of the widow and children, such authority does not include power to mortgage.

5. A demand is not necessary before bringing suit to recover land, where defendants deny plaintiff's title, and set up title in themselves.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Tehama county; Edward Sweeny, Judge.

Action by Earl H. Webb, administrator with the will annexed of the estate of John E. Church, deceased, against Mary Winter and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

H. P. Andrews (Grove L. Johnson, of counsel), for appellants. Webb & Espey, for respondent.

COOPER, C. This action was brought by plaintiff, as administrator with the will annexed, to recover from defendants possession of lot 22, block 12, in the town of Red Bluff. The case was tried before the court, findings filed, and judgment entered for plaintiff. Defendants made a motion for a new trial, which was denied, and this appeal is from the judgment and order denying the motion. There is practically no controversy about the facts, which are substantially as follows: John E. Church, during his lifetime, was the owner of the premises described in the complaint, the same being community property. On January 13, 1886, said Church died, leaving a will, by the terms of which he appointed his wife, Elizabeth, executrix without bonds. He left surviving him, besides his widow, two children,—Flora C. Pryor, a daughter, and E. C. Church, a son. By the terms of the will the deceased left all his property to his surviving wife during her life, and at her death to be equally divided between his children. The will authorized the executrix, if necessary for the support of herself and children, to grant, bargain, sell, and dispose of all of said estate at private sale, without any order of court therefor. Elizabeth Church qualified as executrix, letters were issued to her, and she continued executrix until her death, September 22, 1898. On February 21, 1890, the said Elizabeth Church borrowed $2,500 from defendant Mary Winter, and also $2,500 from George G. Winter, her husband. To secure the said loans, she, without any order of court, and in her individual capacity, executed mortgages to said defendant Mary Winter, and to her husband, George G. Winter, upon said premises, which were described in said mortgages as though said Elizabeth Church were the owner in fee thereof. George G. Winter subsequently died, and defendant Mary Winter succeeded to his title, thus becoming the owner of both mortgages. The indebtedness not having been paid, nor the interest, the defendant Mary Winter, in 1893, commenced proceedings to foreclose the said mortgages, making Elizabeth Church in her individual capacity defendant. The two surviving children, Flora C. Pryor and E. C. Church, who were then each of lawful age, were also made defendants; the complaint alleging that they had, or claimed to have, some interest in or to said premises, which interest was alleged to be subsequent to and subject to plaintiff's lien. The defendants in said foreclosure proceedings each made default, and on June 26, 1893, a decree of foreclosure was duly entered in favor of plaintiff therein and against said Elizabeth Church, E. C. Church, and Flora C. Pryor. On August 30, 1893, the premises were sold to defendant Mary Winter by virtue of the said decree and order of sale, and a certificate of sale issued and delivered to her, and she thereupon entered into, and ever since has remained in, possession by herself and her tenant, Sobel, who is made a co-defendant herein. On March 2, 1894, a deed was issued to defendant Mary Winter by the commissioner who made the sale under the foreclosure proceedings. Since her purchase on August 30, 1893, defendant Mary Winter has paid the taxes levied and assessed upon the premises, except the second installment of taxes for the year 1898, which were paid in November, 1898, by the plaintiff herein. On September 22, 1898, the said Elizabeth Church died, leaving the estate in process of settlement. At the time of her death there had been no distribution, and no final account filed or settled. On November 19, 1898, the plaintiff was appointed administrator with the will annexed of the said estate, letters were issued to him, and he ever since has been such administrator. This action was commenced July 31, 1899.

It is provided in section 1452, Code Civ.

Proc.: "The executor or administrator is entitled to the possession of all the real and personal estate of the decedent, and to receive the rents and profits of the real estate until the estate is settled, or until delivered over by order of the court to the heirs or devisees; and must keep in good tenable repair all houses, buildings, and fixtures thereon which are under his control. The heirs or devisees may themselves, or jointly with the executor or administrator, maintain an action for the possession of the real estate, or for the purpose of quieting title to the same, against any one except the executor or administrator; but this section shall not be so construed as requiring them so to do." And in section 1531: "The executor or administrator must take into his possession all the estate of the decedent, real and personal, and collect all debts due to the decedent or to the estate. For the purpose of bringing suits to quiet title, or for partition of such estate, the possession of the executors or administrators is the possession of the heirs or devisees; such possession by the heirs or devisees is subject, however, to the possession of the executor or administrator, for the purposes of administration, as provided in this title." The property belongs to the estate of John E. Church, deceased. The estate has not been settled, nor has the property been delivered over to the heirs or devisees. The said Elizabeth Church was the owner, subject to administration, of an undivided one-half of said property as community property, and of the whole of it during her lifetime. The mortgage was a conveyance, by way of security, of all her title, subject to the ordinary purposes of administration, to the claims of creditors, and the expenses of administration. The sale under the foreclosure of the mortgage related back to, and conveyed the title of, Elizabeth Church, as devisee and heir of her deceased husband, which she had at the time she executed the mortgage. The mortgage was of the title and right of the mortgagor; no more, no less. She could mortgage her own interest in the property. She could not mortgage the interest or title of others, except by order of court, which she did not have. The defendant Mary Winter, by purchasing at the foreclosure sale, succeeded to all the title of Elizabeth Church in and to the property, but not to the title of Flora C. Pryor or E. C. Church. They did not mortgage their interest, and Elizabeth Church did not, because she possessed no such power. Great stress is placed upon the claim that defendant Mary Winter has acquired title by adverse possession. We think the claim cannot be maintained in this action. Elizabeth Church was not the sole owner of the property, but only a tenant in common with the children, the whole thereof being subject to administration. Defendant Mary Winter, by the foreclosure, has only succeeded to the rights of her mortgagor as one of the heirs.

The law charges her with notice of the fact that her mortgagor was not the sole owner of the property, but only a tenant in common with her children. In such case as successor in interest of all of the heirs, she cannot acquire title by adverse possession pending administration. In re Grider, 81 Cal. 571, 22 Pac. 908; Dunn v. Schell, 122 Cal. 627, 55 Pac. 595. Elizabeth Church held the property in trust for the purposes of administration and for the children named in the will. Although holding the property as trustee, she also held an interest in it in her own right. By the loss of this interest, through mortgage and foreclosure, she did not destroy the interest she held as trustee. She never repudiated the trust, or gave notice of repudiation. Defendant Mary Winter took the title of Mrs. Church subject to the trust created by the will. She never gave any notice to the representative of the estate in her official character, nor to the children named in the will, of any claim to the property as absolute owner. By the foreclosure proceedings she could not affect any title of the children paramount to the mortgage. As she did not, in such foreclosure proceedings, make the executrix of the estate of Church in her official capacity defendant, we must presume she was not claiming as against the representative of the estate. The foreclosure of the mortgage, given by the executrix as an individual, is perfectly consistent with the property still retaining its trust character as to the estate and the other heirs.

It is urged that the children are estopped by the foreclosure decree, as they were of age, and made default. But this position cannot be maintained. The children did not appear and put in issue their title. It is well settled that a sale under foreclosure proceedings transfers the title as it existed at the date of the mortgage, and that any paramount title existing at the date of the mortgage in third parties is not affected by the decree of foreclosure. It only forecloses the title of the mortgagor and any rights that have accrued subsequent to the making of the mortgage. McComb v. Spangler, 71 Cal. 422, 12 Pac. 347; Ord v. Bartlett, 83 Cal. 429, 23 Pac. 705; Sichler v. Look, 93 Cal. 602, 29 Pac. 220.

The claim that the clause in the will authorizing the executrix to sell the property was sufficient authority to authorize the execution of the mortgage cannot be upheld. The deceased, while willing that the property might be sold, if necessary, for the support of his children and his widow, might not have been willing that it should have been mortgaged. A sale is supposed to be a transfer for full value. A mortgage is a conveyance by way of security, and may result in the loss of the property for only a small part of its value. It is said by Woerner, in his work on the American Law of Administration (2d Ed.) vol. 2, pp. 731, 732, § 345: "It may be stated, as a general proposition, that neither executors, unless specially thereto authorized by will, nor administrators, have the power to bind the estate of the deceased by borrowing money. * * * The power to sell real estate, given in a will, does not necessarily include the power to mortgage it. Such a power must be exercised to the extent and in the manner specified. It must accomplish the purposes had in view by the testator." To the same effect are the following authorities: 2 Perry, Trusts, § 768, and cases cited in note 4; Hoyt v. Jaques, 129 Mass. 286; Golinsky v. Allison, 114 Cal. 460, 46 Pac. 295; Hawxhurst v. Rathgeb, 119 Cal. 532, 51 Pac. 846.

The eighth finding is supported by the evidence, except that the court finds that the mortgages were made to defendant Mary Winter. One of them was made to her husband; but, as she afterwards became the owner of it, the finding is wholly immaterial. The result would be the same if the fact had been found precisely as it was.

Finally, it is claimed that finding 13, to the effect that plaintiff made demand upon defendants for possession of the property November 19, 1898, is not supported by the evidence. Counsel say in their brief, "Demand was only made before the beginning of the suit, and no date is given in the evidence." The date is wholly immaterial. If demand was necessary, it could be made any time before beginning suit. In this case, as the defendants deny plaintiff's title, and affirmatively set up title in themselves, no demand was necessary. The judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: SMITH, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order are affirmed.

PERKINS v. MAIER & ZOBELIN BREWERY. (L. A. 823.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 31, 1901.)

INSOLVENCY—CHATTEL MORTGAGE—ASSIGNEE—ACTION TO RECOVER PROPERTY.

1. A mortgage of the fixtures in a saloon, though such property is not included in the list of property which may be mortgaged under Civ. Code, § 2955, is good as between the parties, and as to all other persons except creditors of the mortgagor and subsequent purchasers in good faith and for value.

2. Under Insolvent Act, § 55, providing that, if a debtor in contemplation of insolvency, within one month of filing a petition by or against him, makes any mortgage to evade the provisions of the act, his assignee may recover the property, an assignee cannot recover property mortgaged in good faith three months before insolvency proceedings were commenced, though the mortgagee took possession less than one month before such proceedings.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; D. K. Trask, Judge.

Action by Gregory Perkins, Jr., assignee of Charles Bauer, insolvent, against the Maier & Zobelein Brewery. From a judgment for defendant, and from an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

E. T. Dunning, for appellant. Louis Gottschalk, for respondent.

COOPER, C. This action was brought by plaintiff, as assignee of the insolvent estate of Charles Bauer, who was adjudged insolvent under the insolvent act of March 26, 1895, for the purpose of recovering damages for the alleged wrongful conversion by defendant of certain counters, mirrors, desk, electric fixtures, kitchen utensils, and other articles of personal property, which had been used by, and formerly were the property of, the insolvent, Bauer. Bauer had the property in a certain saloon and restaurant known as "The Anheuser," on Spring street, in the city of Los Angeles. While he was the owner and in possession of the property, and before any question was raised as to his solvency, on the 13th day of October, 1897, he borrowed $4,500 of defendant, and executed a chattel mortgage upon all the property described in the complaint to secure the said loan. This mortgage was properly verified, and recorded on the day of its execution. It was given to secure a note of $500, due 30 days after date (October 13, 1897), and four notes of $1,000 each, due in 6, 12, 18, and 24 months, respectively. The mortgage contained an express provision that, "if the mortgagor shall fail to make any payment as in the said promissory notes provided, the mortgagee may take possession of the said property, using all necessary force so to do, and may immediately proceed to sell the same in the manner provided by law, and from the proceeds pay the whole amount in said notes specified." On December 31, 1897, the first note not having been paid, and no interest having been paid, defendant, to secure itself, and to collect the money due it, took possession of said property under the terms of said mortgage, and had it sold under foreclosure proceedings. Defendant became the purchaser at the foreclosure sale. On January 6, 1898, the creditors of Bauer filed a petition to have him adjudged insolvent, and, after due notice given, an order was made adjudging him insolvent, and appointing plaintiff assignee. It is claimed by the plaintiff that the property was transferred to defendant on the 31st day of December, 1897, at the time it took possession, and that said transfer was fraudulently made with a view to give a preference to defendant, and to prevent the property from coming into the hands of the assignee in insolvency, and to prevent the same from being ratably distributed among the creditors of said insolvent. It is said that the portion of the property described in defendant's mortgage, and sought to be recovered, is not of the class of personal property enumerated in section 2955, Civ. Code, and that for this reason the mortgage was and is void, and created no lien against plaintiff, as assignee of the insolvent. This is the main point in the case. Conceding that the mortgage was of personal property not enumerated in the section of the Code cited, it was good as between the parties, and as to all other persons except creditors of the mortgagee and subsequent purchasers in good faith and for value. Bank v. Moore, 106 Cal. 680, 39 Pac. 1071; Bank v. Gibson, 109 Cal. 198, 41 Pac. 1008; Tomlinson v. Ayres, 117 Cal. 572, 49 Pac. 717; McLeod v. Barnum (Cal.; Feb. 18, 1901) 63 Pac. 924. The plaintiff only represents the creditors of the insolvent. He is not a subsequent purchaser or mortgagee in good faith, and for value. Bank v. Purdy, 130 Cal. 458, 62 Pac. 738. As the representative of the creditors, he derives his power to maintain actions to set aside conveyances from the statute alone.

Section 55 of the insolvent act of 1880, under which plaintiff was appointed, provides that if any debtor, in contemplation of insolvency, within one month before filing a petition by or against him, with a view to giving a preference, makes any "pledge, mortgage, assignment, transfer, sale or conveyance * * * with a view to prevent his property from coming to his assignee in insolvency, * * * or to evade any of the provisions of this act, * * * such pledge, mortgage, transfer, sale, assignment, or conveyance is void, and the assignee or the receiver may recover the property or the value thereof, as assets of such insolvent debtor." In this case the mortgage was made more than one month before the petition was filed. It was made in good faith, and for value. There is no evidence in the record that it was made with any view to give a preference, or to prevent the property from coming into the hands of the assignee. There is therefore no authority in the statute authorizing the assignee to maintain this action. The plaintiff was evidently of this view when he drew his complaint, because he alleges the transfer to have been made on December 31, 1897, the date the defendant took possession of the property. He claims that the fact that defendant took possession on the last-named date shows a transfer on said date, but we do not think so. The defendant had the right to take possession of the mortgaged property any time after condition broken. Such possession, when taken, is a full protection to the mortgagee, and relates back to the date of the mortgage, if no intervening rights have accrued. Jones, Chat. Mortg. § 243; Cobbey, Chat. Mortg. §§ 794, 795; Sawyer v. Turpin, 91 U. S. 120, 23 L. Ed. 235; Broughton v. Vasquez, 73 Cal. 325, 11 Pac. 806, 14 Pac. 885. If the views above expressed are correct, it is not necessary to discuss the question as to whether or not the defendant had reasonable cause to believe Bauer insolvent on the 31st day of December, 1897, when it took possession of the said property. If its mortgage was valid, and authorized it to take possession, it had the right to do so, for the purpose of preventing creditors from taking or attaching the property. It follows that the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: SMITH, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order are affirmed.

OLSEN v. BIRCH et al. (S. F. 1,801.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 30, 1901.)
MARITIME CONTRACT—JURISDICTION—CONFLICT OF LAWS—VESSELS—PERSONAL ACTION—ACTIONS IN REM—COMPLAINT—AMBIGUITY—DEMURRER—APPEAL AND ERROR.

1. Code Civ. Proc. § 813 et seq., providing that all vessels are liable for certain services; that actions therefor must be brought against the owners by name, if known, and the plaintiff may have the vessel attached as security, —is not, as applied to contracts not maritime, in conflict with Const. U. S. art. 3, § 2, declaring that the jurisdiction of the federal courts shall extend to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, or Rev. St. U. S. § 711, providing that "the jurisdiction of the federal courts in cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction is exclusive, saving to suitors in all cases the rights of a common-law remedy where the common law is competent to give it."

2. Where an action is brought against the owner of a vessel by name to recover for services rendered on such vessel, and summons served on such owner, and a personal judgment demanded against him, the action is in personam, and not in rem, though the vessel may be attached to secure the claim.

3. Contracts for services rendered in the construction of a vessel and thereon before it has ever been engaged in navigation are not maritime contracts.

4. Where an ambiguity in the complaint could easily have been remedied by amendment, the judgment should not be reversed because a special demurrer on that ground was improperly overruled.

5. Allegations in a complaint that the services sued for were rendered on board a vessel, and as members of her crew, do not necessarily imply that the vessel was engaged in commerce, and that the contracts were maritime, since they may refer to a force put on board a vessel to care for it, before the vessel has been enrolled or in commission.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by C. S. Olsen against W. H. Birch & Co. and the Yukon & Northwestern Dredging & Transportation Company. From a judgment for plaintiff and other defendants, the defendant corporation appeals. Affirmed.

E. L. Campbell, J. S. Spilman, and Reddy, Campbell & Metson, for appellant. H. W. Hutton, for respondent.

TEMPLE, J. This action was brought to foreclose liens upon the steamship City of Dawson, which was constructed at San Francisco in 1898, by the appellant, as owner. The complaint contains three causes of action. The first is for $200, due plaintiff for services in the construction of the ship. The other two are upon assigned claims. One is a claim of Frank Green for services as chief engineer, rendered on board said steamship, and "as a member of her crew." The third is the claim of A. R. F. Brandes, a freight clerk, rendered on board said steamship as a member of her crew. It was found that the services of plaintiff were rendered in building a house on the steamship, and the services of Green were rendered while the steamship was "not engaged in active operation, and was not in commission." It was found that Brandes performed services as freight clerk for the Yukon & Northwestern Dredging Company, but the service was not performed on said steamship, nor as a member of her crew, or for her. The other defendant was found to have a claim against the ship for constructing the same, but no judgment was rendered in favor of said defendant.

The first two points raised by the appellant may be considered together, and practically they are that the law is invalid, as in conflict with section 2, art. 3, of the constitution of the United States, which declares that the jurisdiction of the federal courts shall extend to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction; and, second, that jurisdiction of the state courts is forbidden by section 711, Rev. St. U. S. This statute declares that "the jurisdiction of the federal courts of cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction is exclusive, saving to suitors in all cases the rights of a common-law remedy where the common law is competent to give it." The statutes here called in question are certain sections of the Code of Civil Procedure (section 813 et seq.). The matter is the more interesting because (as is well known to the writer of this opinion) these sections were carefully revised by the late Stephen J. Field after, and in view of, the decisions in The Moses Taylor, 4 Wall. 431, 18 L. Ed. 397, and the Hine v. Trevor, 4 Wall. 571, 18 L. Ed. 451; and in the report of the so-called "Code Revisors," which was written by Judge Field, the claim was made that for the first time these sections had been made valid. But I think we need not enter very fully into this discussion. The code provisions are certainly not invalid, although a suit might be brought under them of which the courts of the state would have no jurisdiction. If the claim sued upon was one arising from a maritime contract, and the owners were unknown, or if the owner could not be found, and the summons was only served upon the master, mate, or other person in charge of the vessel, a serious question would be presented. But here the owner has appeared and answered, and the action is against him by name, and the claim asserted did not arise upon a maritime contract; and it may be added the suit is not a proceeding in rem. And, of course, the statute giving the right to a lien would be perfectly valid, although no action could be brought under it in the state courts. The claim did not arise from a maritime contract. The vessel had never been in commission, or in active use in navigation. Maritime contracts have reference to navigation upon the sea, and in some way to vessels actually being used in commerce, or at least in navigation. Counsel agree that liens to secure claims of those who have contributed to the construction of vessels are nonmaritime, but appellants seem to contend that, because the findings state that the labor of plaintiff was performed in the construction of a house upon the City of Dawson, and the assignors of the other claims rendered their services as members of the crew on board the vessel, the vessel was complete before the services were rendered, and therefore the liens are for securing maritime contracts. It is found that the vessel had not been used in navigation. It seems true that, if the vessel was employed in navigation, it would still have been at least doubtful whether the contract for the construction of the house was a maritime contract; but, the vessel not being at the time employed in navigation, and never having been so engaged, the contract was not maritime. This is completely settled by the case of Williams v. The Sirius (D. C.) 65 Fed. 226, and by the authorities quoted by the learned judge in that case. The libellant there claimed a lien, under these provisions of our Code for services rendered as watchman or ship-keeper. The vessel had been engaged in commerce, but was sold in San Francisco under a venditioni exponas issued from the district court. It was a British ship, but had not been enrolled as an American vessel after the sale, and was not in commission. After reviewing the authorities, the court was unable to hold that the services were of a maritime character, and therefore there was no lien under our state law cognizable in a court of admiralty. The Sirius had been engaged in navigation, but was laid up in her home port, and was unregistered, and out of commission. The point of the decision seems to be that the services, though rendered on the vessel, were not in furtherance of navigation, but were to preserve the vessel. A few authorities apparently holding a contrary doctrine are cited by appellants. The Eliza Ladd, 5 Sawy. 519, Fed. Cas. No. 4,364; Revenue Cutter No. 2, 3 Sawy. 143, Fed. Cas. No. 11,714; The Manhattan (D. C.) 46 Fed. 797. The reasoning in the cases is similar, but The Manhattan is the more elaborate, and apparently most relied upon. In that case the hull was first built under contract, and then floated to a different point, where the ship was completed under a new contract. Proceedings in rem were instituted to recover upon this contract, and the jurisdiction of the district court was challenged on the ground that the contract was not of a maritime character. Judge Hanford referred to the fact that contracts for building ships are not maritime, while contracts for repairing and rebuilding ships are; and he said (correctly, I think) that it could make no difference whether the same work was done upon a new hull or an old hulk, and then added: "After a new ship has been launched, and embraced by the element upon which she is intended to float, and been christened, and become an entity fully capable of being identified, she is as much a subject of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction as she can be at any later period of her history; and contracts then entered into relating to her completion, equipment, or employment are maritime, and cognizable in admiralty." Evidently there is here a misapprehension as to the basis of admiralty jurisdiction. It does not extend to ships merely because they are ships, but to commerce and navigation, and to ships only because they are, and while they are, used in commerce and navigation. A ship, while building, is not an instrument of commerce; nor is she while out of commission, and being cared for to preserve her for possible future use. A ship injured by use, and only temporarily laid up for repairs, or being refitted that she may resume her voyage, is considered still engaged in commerce.

But this suit is not a proceeding in rem. Had the contract been maritime, a proceeding in rem could have been had in the district court. Nevertheless, if a common-law remedy could have been made available, such remedy could have been afforded by the state court. Here the action is against the owner, and such owner has appeared and answered. The vessel was not seized, and there was actual service of summons. The main difference between an action in rem and an action in personam is indicated by the two phrases. One is against the thing as the defendant, and the judgment is that the thing is indebted. And, furthermore, the res is taken possession of and held by the court, and its jurisdiction depends upon such possession and holding. Here the judgment is against the owner, and the sale of the property, if one is had, will be like an ordinary sale under execution. Such proceedings are said to be quasi in rem, which phrase has become quite common since Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714, 24 L. Ed. 565. It is there said that such proceedings are not strictly in rem, because they are not against the thing as debtor. The subject is discussed by Wap. Proc. Rem. c. 56. And the right to maintain such suits in the state courts has been upheld by the supreme court of the United States. Leon v. Galceran, 11 Wall. 185, 20 L. Ed. 74; Johnson v. Elevator Co., 119 U. S. 388, 7 Sup. Ct. 254, 30 L. Ed. 447; The Glide, 167 U. S. 606, 17 Sup. Ct. 930, 42 L. Ed. 296. In the last case the jurisdiction of courts of admiralty was sustained, but the law required the suit to be against the vessel, and provided for a seizure of the ship through attachment. The court says of the proceeding in rem: "While the proceeding differs thus from a common-law remedy, it is also essentially different from what are in the West called 'suits by attachment,' and in some of the older states 'foreign attachments.' In these cases there is a suit against a personal defendant by name, and because of inability to serve process on him on account of non-residence, or for some other reason mentioned in the various statutes allowing attachments to issue, the suit is commenced by a writ directing the proper officer to attach sufficient property of the defendant to answer any judgment which may be rendered against him. This proceeding may be had against an owner or part owner of a vessel, and his interest thus subjected to a sale in a common-law court of the state." The foreign attachment suits here referred to are the proceedings quasi in rem, elsewhere alluded to. In such case, when the defendant is personally served, or appears in the case, the suit is really an ordinary action in personam. The act of congress did not have the effect of denying to state courts jurisdiction except to enforce the action in rem, as that action was known to courts of admiralty. An action to foreclose a lien against the defendant personally, unaccompanied by seizure or constructive service of process, was not the action in rem in use in courts of admiralty. The objection special to the judgment upon the assigned claims is that the allegation is that such services were rendered on board the vessel, and as members of her crew, which, it is said, is an allegation that the vessel was engaged in commerce. That may be admitted to be the most obvious and ordinary meaning of the language. But the words may be also applied—as the findings show they were here—to a force put on board a vessel to care for it, before the ship has been enrolled or in commission, merely for the preservation of the ship. Perhaps there was an ambiguity which was reached by special demurrer, but the complaint could easily have been amended. And if the court improperly refused to sustain such demurrer, and the complaint was therefore not amended, it is perfectly obvious, in this case, that the defendants were not, and could not have been, injured. Judgment affirmed.

In re RICHARDS' ESTATE. (Sac. 848.)
(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 3, 1901.)
ESTATES—ASSIGNMENT TO WIDOW—MARRIAGE —PROOF—LAWS OF ANOTHER STATE —PRESUMPTION.

1. Under Civ. Code, § 55, defining marriage; section 71, declaring that no particular form is required, but the parties must declare in the presence of the person solemnizing the marriage that they take each other as husband and wife; and section 57, that consent to and subsequent consummation of marriage may be manifested in any form, and may be proved under the same general rules of evidence as facts in other cases,—testimony by one claiming to be a widow that a marriage was performed between deceased and her, and that they went before a justice of the peace, and each answered "I do," to his question, "Do you take one another to be your lawfully wedded husband and wife?" and that thereafter they lived together as husband and wife for several years, and had one child, justifies a finding that they were lawfully married.

2. Where, on an issue of marriage, it is claimed to have taken place in another state, but the laws of such state are not shown, such laws will be presumed to be the same as in the state where the action is tried, and proof of facts sufficient to establish a marriage in the latter state will support a finding that the marriage was valid.

3. Under Civ. Code, § 61, providing that a marriage contract during the life of a former spouse is void unless the former spouse is absent and not known to be living for five years, where a husband deserted his wife in Missouri, and remarried in California 12 years thereafter, while the first wife was alive, the latter marriage is void.

4. The fact that there is a controversy as to the ownership of a lot, the legal title to which was in deceased, does not affect the jurisdiction of the probate court to enter an order assigning the whole estate, amounting to less than $1,500, to the widow, as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 1469, since such order cannot affect an outstanding title.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Siskiyou county; J. S. Beard, Judge.

Petitions of Lydia Richards and Elizabeth Richards, each claiming to be widow of D. E. Richards, deceased, for an order assigning the estate to her as widow. From an order in favor of Lydia, Elizabeth appeals. Affirmed.

J. H. Magoffey, for appellant. L. F. Coburn and J. W. Parker, for respondent.

COOPER, C. Appeal from order setting aside the whole of the estate to the widow of deceased. There is no question as to the value of the estate being less than $1,500, and that it was the duty of the court to set it aside to the widow. The principal question to be determined is as to which of the contending parties is the widow. A petition was filed by one Lydia, claiming to be Lydia Richards, the surviving widow. An opposition to this petition was filed, and also a petition by one Elizabeth, claiming to be Elizabeth Richards, the surviving widow. Upon the issue thus made, the court heard evidence and filed findings, of which finding 1 is as follows: "The court finds that the petitioner Lydia Richards on the 17th day of September, 1880, in the state of Missouri, intermarried with said deceased, and from that time down to the time of his death she and the deceased were husband and wife, and that she is now the surviving widow of said deceased." And finding 4 is as follows: "The court finds that the petitioner Eliza-both Richards never at any time or place intermarried with said deceased, the said deceased being at the time of the alleged marriage to said Elizabeth Richards the husband of said Lydia Richards, as before found, and the said Elizabeth Richards is not the surviving widow of said deceased, although the court finds that she believed in good faith that she was legally married to and was the lawful wife of said deceased, as alleged in her said petition." These findings are challenged, as being without support in the evidence, and upon this the case must be determined.

In support of the first finding the contradicted testimony of Lydia Richards is as follows: "There was a solemnization of marriage performed between me and deceased on the 17th day of September, 1880, in the state of Missouri, by a justice of the peace. The justice of the peace said, 'Do you take one another to be your lawfully wedded husband and wife?' and we answered, 'I do,' in each case. I was standing at the side of Mr. Richards at that time. That was in the justice's office in the town of Butler, Bates county, Missouri. It was the county seat. Immediately after that we went home to Rich Hill, and lived together from that time on for four years, until he came away and left me. * * * During that four years Mr. Richards provided for me the necessities of life, and I kept house for him and lived with him, and slept in the same bed with him, and went among his and my friends as husband and wife. * * * I continually cohabited with him. I had one child by him. It is dead." This evidence supports the finding. The record fails to show that any proof was made as to the laws of the state of Missouri relative to the solemnization of marriage on the 17th day of September, 1880, or at any other time. The question as to whether or not the evidence shows a valid marriage will therefore have to be determined according to the laws of our own state, as, without proof to the contrary, the law in the state of Missouri is presumed to be the same as in this state. Marsters v. Lash, 61 Cal. 624; Shumway v. Leakey, 67 Cal. 460, 8 Pac. 12. The Civil Code of this state, which went into effect on the 1st day of January, 1873, provided in section 55: "Marriage is a personal relation arising out of a civil contract, to which the consent of parties capable of making it is necessary. Consent alone will not constitute marriage; it must be followed by a solemnization or by a mutual assumption of marital rights, duties, or obligations." And in section 71: "No particular form for the ceremony of marriage is required, but the parties must declare in the presence of the person solemnizing the marriage that they take each other as husband and wife." And in section 57: "Consent to and subsequent consummation of marriage may be manifested in any form and may be proved under the same general rules of evidence as facts in other cases." These sections, as herein quoted, continued to be the law of this state until May, 1895, when amendments to said sections 55 and 57 went into effect. They were in force as originally enacted on September 17, 1880, when the marriage of deceased to Lydia took place. They contained, while in force, provisions similar to the laws in many other states. That a marriage may be inferred from cohabitation seems to be the settled law in most countries. The cohabitation as husband and wife is a manifestation of the parties having consented to contract such marriage inter se. It has been held by this court in numerous cases that under the sections quoted no particular form of ceremony was required, and that mutual consent followed by consummation was sufficient to constitute marriage: In re McCausland's Estate, 52 Cal. 569; Sharon v. Sharon, 75 Cal. 9, 16 Pac. 345; White v. White, 82 Cal. 427, 23 Pac. 276, 7 L. R. A. 799. Sections 55 and 68, as amended in March, 1895, have no application. They are not retroactive. Civ. Code, § 3; Railroad Co. v. Shackelford, 63 Cal. 261; Sharp v. Blankenship, 59 Cal. 288. Finding 1 being supported by the evidence, it follows that finding 4 is correct. The deceased while the lawful husband of Lydia could not intermarry with Elizabeth, and therefore, as he left Lydia as his widow, he could not leave two widows.

The court did not err in admitting in evidence the testimony of Lydia Richards as to her residence and cohabitation with deceased, and the solemnization of the marriage. It was competent to prove the facts and circumstances tending to show a contract of marriage. It is claimed that the marriage of deceased with Elizabeth in March, 1896, was valid, under Civ. Code, § 61. That section expressly provides that a subsequent marriage contracted by any person during the life of a former husband or wife of such person, with any person, other than such former husband or wife, is illegal and void from the beginning, unless: "(1) The former marriage has been annulled or dissolved. * * * (2) Unless such former husband or wife was absent, and not known to such person to be living for the space of five successive years immediately preceding such subsequent marriage or was generally reputed or believed by such person to be dead at the time such subsequent marriage was contracted; in either of which cases the subsequent marriage is valid until its nullity is adjudged by a competent tribunal." It is not claimed that the marriage of deceased with Lydia was ever annulled or dissolved. It is therefore self-evident that the first subdivision has no application. It is, however, urged that the second subdivision of the section applies, and that the former wife of deceased was absent and not known by deceased to have been living for the space of five years immediately preceding the subsequent marriage to Elizabeth. There is no evidence in the record to support this contention. It cannot be said that the former wife of deceased was absent, when the record shows that deceased left her in the state of Missouri, and came to California. Deceased was the absent one, and was absent of his own volition. We cannot indulge in the presumption that deceased believed his former wife to be dead. On the other hand, the presumption is that, having married her and left her in the state of Missouri, he did not believe her to be dead. There is no evidence as to any belief or repute in any manner concerning the death of the former wife. As she was not dead, it would be folly for the court to presume a belief on the part of deceased as to a fact that did not exist, and that was never reputed to exist.

Finally, it is claimed that the court had no power to make the order for the reason that a suit was pending by appellant, Elizabeth, against the administrator to recover lot 25 of block 26, in the town of Sisson, being part of the premises described in the order. It is sufficient to say that the order was made subject to the pending suit. In any event, it is the duty of the court, under section 1469 of the Code of Civil Procedure, to set apart the estate, where the whole thereof does not exceed the value of $1,500. The order only sets apart the title and interest of deceased. It can do no more. It is not the purpose of the statute to have the court examine the title, and set apart such property on condition that the title is perfect. It is evident that the order cannot affect an outstanding title in the hands of a third person. It follows that the order should be affirmed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, C.; GRAY, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the order is affirmed.

EMERSON et al. v. McWHIRTER et al.
(Sac. 754.)¹

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 2, 1901.)
MINES AND MINING—CLAIM—FORFEITURE—RELOCATION—RESUMPTION OF WORK—EVIDENCE.

1. Where a local regulation required a notice of a mining claim to be posted at each end thereof, and notice was posted at only one end, all other regulations being complied with, the failure to post at both ends did not work a forfeiture, in the absence of a rule so providing.

2. Under Rev. St. U. S. § 2324, providing that, on the failure of a claimant to perform the requisite amount of work on a mine, it shall be open to relocation, unless the original locators have resumed work on the claim before such relocation, where plaintiff in good faith resumed work on a mine previously located by him the day before defendant's location thereof, plaintiff has the superior right thereto.

3. Plaintiff's employé testified that he went on the mining claim December 30th, and commenced work thereon on the 31st. The merchant of whom he purchased supplies testified that they were delivered on the claim to such employé on the 30th. Defendant and another testified that they went on the claim and around its boundaries on the 31st, and saw no one working there, but did not go where the employé said he was at work. Held, that the testimony of the employé that he worked there on the 31st was uncontradicted.

4. Where a valid location of a mining claim has been made, and work done thereon in good faith, possession maintained, and no intention to abandon is shown, the law should be construed liberally, to prevent a forfeiture.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Tuolumne county; G. W. Nicol, Judge.

Action by E. L. Emerson and others against R. S. McWhirter and others. From a judgment for defendant McWhirter, and from an order denying a new trial, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

For former opinion, see 60 Pac. 774.

Crittenden Hampton and J. P. O'Brien, for appellants. F. W. Street and W. C. Kennedy, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, C. Action to quiet title to a mining claim in Tuolumne county, called the "Slapjack Mine." The court found the following facts: That one Coyle on January 1, 1896, made a location of the claim in question, posted notice of his claim at one end of the claim, marked out the boundaries, and placed monuments at each of the four corners and at each end of the lode, and caused his notice to be recorded. By mesne conveyances plaintiffs and certain defendants, other than McWhirter, became the owners of Coyle's interest. A regulation of the mining district in which the claim in question is situated required two notices to be posted on the claim, "one of which shall be posted in a conspicuous place at each end of the claim." The court further found that plaintiffs did not do $100 worth of labor or improvements on the claim for the year 1898; that on January 1, 1899, the claim was public mineral land and open to location; and that defendant McWhirter on that day located the same as the "Jim Blaine Quartz Mine." Judgment passed for defendant McWhirter, and the appeal is from this judgment, and from an order denying plaintiffs' motion for a new trial.

1. Defendant contends that Coyle's location was forfeited because he posted but one notice on the claim, whereas the local regulation required two to be posted. We waive the question whether defendant in this case can be heard to dispute the validity of Coyle's location. This court at an early day said: "The failure to comply with any one of the mining rules and regulations of the camp is not a forfeiture of title. It would be enough to hold the forfeiture as the result of a noncompliance with such of them as make noncompliance a cause of forfeiture." McGarrity v. Byington, 12 Cal. 426, approved in Bell v. Mining Co., 36 Cal. 214, where it was stated: "The failure of a party to comply with a mining rule or regulation cannot work a forfeiture unless the rule so provides." Approved by the Arizona supreme court in Rush v. French, 1 Ariz. 99, 25 Pac. 816; Johnson v. McLaughlin, 4 Pac. 130; also by Judge Sawyer in Jupiter Min. Co. v. Bodie Consol. Min. Co., 7 Sawy. 96, 11 Fed. 666. See, also, Flaherty v. Gwinn, 1 Dak. Appnd. 509. The Montana court declined to follow the California cases. King v. Edwards, 1 Mont. 235. We think, however, as was said by the Arizona court, that the cases cited announce "a safe and conservative rule of decision, tending to the permanency and security of mining titles," and we see no reason for deviating from the decisions heretofore rendered on the point.

2. The remaining questions relate to the amount of the work done by plaintiffs during the year 1898, and to their resuming work in 1899. More than the requisite work was done for the period ending December 31, 1897, and it was found by the court that Coyle made a valid location. It appears from the evidence that one of the plaintiffs (E. L. Emerson) went to the mine in March, 1898, with five men, for the purpose of taking the water out of the principal shaft. This shaft was 65 feet deep, near the bottom of which was a drift or tunnel running off west from the shaft. The mine was unwatered down to the drift. Witness Emerson states in detail what he paid for the labor of the men, etc., amounting in all, including his own labor at $30, to $111.93. On cross-examination he stated: "I went there to take that water out. An expert was coming to examine the mine. Therefore I took out the water. To clean it up so he could see it." It took three days and nights to get the water out, and the balance of the time was spent in keeping it out. He testified that he took the water out "solely that the expert could see the mine, and if he reported it favorably the mine was sold." Whether the expert came does not appear. The witness did not see him if he came. It does not appear that any work was done in the shaft or drifts, except to pump the water out. In June following, plaintiff Britton, one of the owners, visited the mine, but did no work at that time. About October 11, 1898, he went to the mine with his partner, Emerson, and remained nearly one month, and lived in a house on the mine. One Elwell and his family were living in part of the same house. Witness and Emerson worked about three days in a shaft that had been previously started, not the one formerly unwatered. Witness testified that they "sunk probably about three feet. It was picking ground, but hard, so we stopped it." This work was on the ledge, and, with the exception of looking up the corners and cutting some brush, it was all the work that was done at that time. When they left they posted a notice on the house, and left one copy with Mrs. Elwell. On December 27, 1898, they filed with the county recorder an affidavit that they had done at least $100 worth of work on the mine, stating, among other things: "Said labor consisted of taking water out of the shaft, and work upon shaft and upon ledge. Said labor was performed during the year ending December 31st, 1898." Witness Boynton testified that he went to the mine December 30, 1898, under employment by the plaintiffs, and "worked there continuously, excepting Sundays," until January 25th, on which day he came away. He testified positively that he worked Saturday, December 31st. He bought his tools and supplies at Groveland, from a merchant named Cornwell, who testified that on Friday, December 30th, he sent them to the mine, which was 2½ miles distant. He was certain of the date, from circumstances which he related. January 1, 1899, fell upon Sunday, and Boynton testified that he did not work on that day, but resumed work on Monday morning, January 2d, and worked that day. He testified: "Excepting one stormy part of day, I worked. I worked the following days of the week. * * * Mr. Britton, here, worked with me twelve days. No one else. I was paid $3 per day. I used an ax and shovel cutting brush; and in drift, pick and shovel." His wages amounted to $63, of which $40 was paid, and $23 was still due. Most of his work was in clearing away brush. Britton testified that he came on the 10th or 11th of January, 1899, and worked from that time on with Boynton; that Boynton was instructed to clear away the brush, the purpose being to fix the ground for a mill site; they worked together 12½ days. He testified: "When he worked with me the character of the work was an open cut made over the ledge, near the shaft, and another open cut on the east end." He further testified that he examined the corners of the claim closely in January before they quit work. On January 26, 1899, Britton made and filed with the county recorder an affidavit of labor performed, "consisting of excavating two open cuts, and draining tunnel, and clearing off brush. One cut about average width of about five feet, by fifty feet long on vein and seven feet deep; also an open cut on vein about six feet wide by two feet in depth by twenty feet long * * * for the year ending December 31st, 1898. Such expenditure was made by or at the expense of F. F. Britton and E. L. Emerson, for the owners of said claim, for the purpose of holding said claim." Appellant's evidence consisted of his own testimony, that of one Paul, and the man Elwell, who lived on the mine. Defendant testified that he and Paul went to the mine on December 31, 1898, about 2 o'clock p. m., and that he "did not see any one at work. Did not see any evidence of work being done." They went around the boundaries, to the corners, and also to shaft Nos. 1 and 2, but saw no one working. He testified: "I was over a great portion of the location. There was a portion of that I would not want to go over. Mr. Paul told me this ground was open for location." Paul testified: "We went to corners, shafts, and all over it; went round boundary lines; examined monuments and posts; was there about one and one-half hours. * * * I did not see anybody at work on the Slapjack mine during December 31st. If there had been any one there, we would have seen them." They returned between 11 and 12 o'clock that night, and sat around until a few minutes after 12, when McWhirter posted his notice. Paul testified: "We waited for an hour or more, bid each other good-by, and each went our way." Elwell testified that he first saw Boynton at the mine "the night of December 31st." Again: "Mr. Boynton came there December 31st. I don't know at what time he came. I don't know if he did any work. I wasn't there. I got home about seven o'clock on the evening of the 31st." Again he testified that he (witness) was not there on the 30th; that he was there only at nights, and not days, and usually came home about 6 or 7 o'clock. Elwell's testimony cannot be received as in any degree contradicting Boynton on the point that the latter was at work on the mine December 31st. Nor do we think that the testimony of McWhirter and Paul necessarily raises a substantial conflict with Boynton's testimony on this point. Neither of them testified to having been at the place where Boynton said he was cutting out the brush, and where Britton said Boynton was clearing away for a mill site. This point was at a part of the mine not visited by McWhirter or Paul, and it is quite reasonable to suppose that Boynton worked as he testified positively he did, and yet not be seen by these men. They testified that they were there about an hour and a half, and that they hunted out all the corners and monuments of the claim, and ran around the boundaries, which must have occupied most of this time. The negative fact that they did not see Boynton at work is not sufficient to raise a conflict in his positive testimony that he went there on December 30th, and worked cutting out brush on the 31st, corroborated as he is by the testimony of the merchant who sold and delivered supplies to him on the mine on December 30th. The evidence is undisputed that Boynton worked on Monday, January 2d, and thenceforward until Britton came, and thereafter the two worked together. The two worked in all 33½ days, which, at $3 per day (the wages paid Boynton), would make over $100. Respondent contends that the work done in unwatering the mine for the sole purpose of its examination with a view of sale was in no sense the annual assessment work contemplated by the statute.

It is unnecessary to decide whether respondent is correct in this view of the law. The case may be disposed of on other points. See, on the question, 2 Lindl. Mines, § 629, and cases cited.

3. Appellants contend that, if it be held that their work in unwatering the mine cannot avail, they resumed work in good faith, and thus prevented forfeiture. The act provides that, upon a failure to comply with the conditions as to doing the requisite work, the mine "shall be open to relocation in the same manner as if no location of the same had ever been made; provided the original locators, their heirs, assigns, or legal representatives, have not resumed work upon the claim after failure and before such location." Rev. St. U. S. § 2324. Plaintiffs Emerson and Britton worked for three days each in October, 1898, remaining at the mine nearly a month. Boynton went to the mine on December 30th, under instructions to resume work and continue it, and worked there on the 31st for plaintiffs. He rested the next day (Sunday), worked on Monday, January 2d, and thenceforward until joined by Britton, and they two worked together, completing the requisite $100 worth of labor. The evidence shows entire good faith on plaintiffs' part in working the mine in 1898, and in resuming labor in 1899. Defendant McWhirter made his location on Sunday morning at about 12:15 of the clock. Plaintiffs were then in possession. They were in possession on Sunday, but rested from labor, as they had a right to do. They worked on Monday, and continuously thereafter, until their labor amounted in value to over $100. We think these facts show resumption of work, within the meaning of the statute, and prevented forfeiture. Where a valid location of a mining claim has been made, and work done thereon in good faith, possession maintained, and no evidence appears from which an intention to abandon may be inferred, the courts should construe the law liberally, to prevent forfeiture. Indeed, this is the rule generally as to forfeitures. The courts are reluctant to enforce a forfeiture, deeming this class of penalties odious in law; and it is well settled by decisions that forfeiture cannot be established except upon clear and convincing proof of the failure of the former owner to have performed the labor to the amount required by law, the burden of proving which rests with the party asserting it. 2 Lindl. Mines, § 643 et seq. It is advised that the judgment and order be reversed.

GREENLEAF v. JACKS et al. (L. A. 863.)

VENUE—CIVIL ACTIONS—RESIDENCE OF PARTIES—MOTIONS—SUFFICIENCY.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 395, providing for the trial of actions in the county in which the defendants or some of them reside at the commencement of a suit, a defendant in an action against him jointly with others is not entitled to a change of venue to the place of its residence without showing that none of the defendants reside in the county where the action is commenced.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Luis Obispo county; E. P. Unangst, Judge.

Action by T. E. Greenleaf against Nellie Jacks and others. From an order denying defendant Goldtree Bros. Company's motion for change of venue, it appeals. Affirmed.

Lester H. Jacobs, for appellant. William Shipsey, W. H. Spencer, and Max Blum, for respondent.

GRAY, C. This action is brought in San Luis Obispo county, and is based upon several certificates of deposit issued by the County Bank of San Luis Obispo County. This bank is alleged to have been located, as to its principal place of business, in the county of San Luis Obispo; and the certificates of deposit are dated at San Luis Obispo, Cal., and provide for the repayment to plaintiff of the several amounts deposited by her, with interest thereon at "five per cent. per annum until due." It is further alleged in the complaint that the said several amounts were "loaned to and deposited with said bank at said city of San Luis Obispo." It is also alleged that on a certain date the said bank closed its doors and ceased doing business. The plaintiff brings this action against the defendants jointly on account of their liability as stockholders in said bank. The Goldtree Bros. Company appeared by demurrer, and at the same time filed an affidavit and demand for a change of venue to San Francisco on the ground that their residence and principal place of business was there, and they had incurred no liability in San Luis Obispo. The motion based on said demand and affidavit was denied by the court, and said Goldtree Bros. Company appeal from the order.

There is nothing either in the affidavit for a change of venue or elsewhere in the record to show in what county the defendants other than appellant reside. Under the provisions of Civ. Code, § 322, the defendants were properly joined in one action. Section 395, Code Civ. Proc., provides, "In all other cases the action must be tried in the county in which the defendants, or some of them, reside at the commencement of the action." An examination of the three sections immediately preceding this in the same Code shows us that this action comes under the section from which we quote. The appellant being the moving party, the burden was upon it to show that it was entitled to a change of venue; and to show this, under said section 395, it must be made to appear that none of the defendants resided in San Luis Obispo county. Hearne v. De Young, 111 Cal. 373, 43 Pac. 1108. Having failed to establish this essential fact, its motion was properly denied. Appellant cites several cases to show that, notwithstanding the several defendants might be and were properly joined in the action, still this appellant is entitled to a change of venue to the place of its residence, notwithstanding the other defendants may happen to reside in the county where the action was brought; but we do not think the cases go to the extent claimed for them by appellant. The first case on the subject is Sayward v. Houghton, 82 Cal. 628, 23 Pac. 120, and in that case there were two parties defendant, and it is expressly stated therein, "If the complaint states no cause of action against the corporation defendant, the right of Houghton to have the place of trial changed is not affected by making said corporation a defendant in the action;" and further: "There is nothing in the complaint showing or tending to show that the corporation defendant is in any sense interested in this action." It plainly appears in the case that the corporation defendant was not only an unnecessary party to the action, but that the plaintiff might obtain all the relief he demanded without making it a party. This case is not analogous to the case now before us, for here all the defendants are not only proper parties defendant, and properly joined as such under the statute cited, but they are all necessary parties defendant if the plaintiff would obtain the entire relief which he seeks in the action. The other cases cited by appellant upon the point are entirely inapplicable. We advise that the order appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the order appealed from is affirmed.

In re HUGHSTON'S ESTATE. (S. F. 2,720.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 2, 1901.)

In bank. Dissenting opinion. For majority opinion, see 65 Pac. 742.

BEATTY, C. J. I dissent. A statute giving the right of appeal from a judgment or order which has not become final and irrevocable impairs no vested rights, and is not retroactive. From the opinion of this court in Re Scott's Estate, 124 Cal. 676, 57 Pac. 656, I quote the following statement of the law as to the finality of judgments: "The action of the superior court does not become definite and certain until it is entered at length in its records. Prior to that time it is in the breast of the judge, and until it shall be so entered his decision may be changed from time to time according to his views. It is only when his decision has become the judgment of the court, and thus passed beyond his recall, that the appellate jurisdiction of this court may be invoked." In this case, when the orders appealed from were entered—when they first became final and irrevocable—there was a statute in force giving the right of appeal, and I can see no reason why this appellant should be deprived of its benefits.

SPITLER v. KAEDING et al. (L. A. 853.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 31, 1901.)

PARENT AND CHILD—GIFT—MORTGAGE—APPEAL AND ERROR—EVIDENCE—REPETITION—CROSS-EXAMINATION.

1. On substantial conflict in the evidence, the judgment of the trial court will not be disturbed.

2. The act of a father in loaning his money and taking a note and mortgage therefor in the name of his daughter is prima facie evidence of a gift to the daughter, even though the father retains possession of the note and mortgage.

3. Where a witness has answered a question, it is not error to refuse to require him to answer a substantial repetition thereof.

4. Where a father, in a suit with his daughter involving the issue whether a mortgage and note taken in the name of the latter for money loaned by the former belongs to the father or daughter, introduces evidence of the execution of deeds to another daughter and granddaughter, it is not error to permit the first daughter to introduce such deeds in connection with the cross-examination of the witnesses testifying to the execution thereof.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Barbara county; B. T. Williams, Judge.

Suit to foreclose a mortgage by William Spitler against Otto Kaeding and Kate S. Williams and J. W. Casebeer. From the decree, and from an order denying a motion for new trial, the defendant J. W. Casebeer appeals. Affirmed.

B. F. Thomas, for appellant. J. W. Taggart, for respondent Spitler. W. J. Hunsaker, for respondent Williams. H. C. Booth and J. J. Boyce, for other respondents.

VAN DYKE, J. This action was brought to foreclose a mortgage, dated January 30, 1897, made by the defendant Kaeding to the plaintiff Spitler and defendant Kate S. Williams, to secure the payment of a promissory note of even date for the sum of $2,500. The note was made payable to said Spitler and Kate S. Williams, and the mortgage to secure the same recites that "the interest of said Kate S. Williams in the aforesaid note and mortgage is $1,500, and the interest of said William Spitler is $1,000." The $1,500 belonged to appellant, J. W. Casebeer, and the $1,000 belonged to plaintiff Spitler, and they two united in loaning said money, to secure which the note and mortgage were given; and it was by direction of appellant, Casebeer, that the note and mortgage, as to the amount loaned by him, were made payable to said Kate S. Williams, who is his daughter. In his answer appellant, Casebeer, states that he did not give the said $1,500 to Kate S. Williams, nor his interest in the said note and mortgage; that the only purpose of having said note and mortgage made in the name of said Kate S. Williams was to apparently invest her with the ownership of the three-fifths interest therein, in order to give her some financial standing; and that said Kate S. Williams at the time promised and agreed that, whenever he should desire, she would assign to him the said three-fifths interest in said note and mortgage. On the other hand, the respondent Kate S. Williams, in her answer and cross complaint, alleges that the note and mortgage, as to the three-fifths interest, were made and executed to her by the direction of appellant, her father, for the purpose of making the said $1,500 as a gift to her, and the same was then and there given to her by the said appellant, and she denies that she ever promised to assign the said note and mortgage when requested. The court finds "that said J. W. Casebeer did give said sum of $1,500 to said Kate S. Williams, and did give her said note and mortgage; that it was not the only purpose, nor any purpose, of having said promissory note and mortgage in the name of said Kate S. Williams to apparently invest her with the ownership of the three-fifths interest in said note and mortgage, in order to give her some or any financial standing; that said note and mortgage were not made in her name for the purpose of apparently, or otherwise, giving her some financial or any financial standing; that she did not immediately before the execution of said note and mortgage, or any time or at all, promise and agree, or promise or agree, with the said J. W. Casebeer, that she would, whenever he should desire, or at all, assign said three-fifths interest in said note and mortgage, or in said note or in said mortgage, to him." The appeal is taken from an order denying defendant Casebeer's motion for a new trial.

The main contention on the part of appellant is that the evidence does not support the findings. The testimony of the witnesses to the effect that it was intended as a gift by appellant, Casebeer, to his daughter, if credited, is sufficient to overcome the testimony in behalf of appellant on that point. The judge of the trial court, before whom the witnesses testify, has the opportunity of noting their manner and appearance while under examination, and therefore is in a better position to judge of their credibility than the appellate court. Hence the rule that wherever there is a substantial conflict in the testimony the finding of the trial court will not be disturbed. Aside from the parol testimony, the fact of the taking of the note and mortgage in the name of his daughter is prima facie evidence that the appellant intended to make a gift of it, as no implication of a trust arises upon a purchase of property by a parent in the name of a child. Prima facie such a purchase is to be regarded as a gift or advancement. Russ v. Mebius, 16 Cal. 355; 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1041; Bennet v. Bennet, 10 Ch. Div. 474-476. In this last case it is said: "The doctrine of equity, as regards presumptions of gifts, is this: that where one person stands in such a relation to another that there is an obligation on that person to make a provision for the other, and we find either a purchase or investment in the name of the other, * * * of an amount which would constitute a provision for the other, the presumption arises of an intention on the part of the person to discharge the obligation to the other; and, therefore, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that purchase or investment is held to be in itself evidence of a gift. In other words, the presumption of gift arises from the moral obligation to give." The appellant lays great stress upon the fact that he retained the actual custody of the note and mortgage until produced in court at the trial. This might be explained from the fact that, as there was but one note made payable to Spitler and Mrs. Williams, and one mortgage to secure the same, naming Spitler and Mrs. Williams as mortgagees, the instruments could not be in the possession of both interested parties at the same time, to wit, Spitler and Mrs. Williams; and it seems quite natural that Mr. Casebeer, acting for his daughter in the premises, should retain possession of the same for her. Besides, it appears at that time the father and daughter were upon the most friendly terms, although subsequently they had a falling out, resulting in litigation between them. The loaning of the money to Kaeding and taking of the note and mortgage in the name of Mrs. Williams perfected the gift, if intended as such at the time, and the court finds that such was the intention. That being so, the mere retention of the manual custody of the note and mortgage could make no difference. The title and right to control the same had become vested in Mrs. Williams. Calkins v. Association (Cal.) 59 Pac. 30; Hart v. Ketchum, 121 Cal. 426-429, 53 Pac. 931.

The court sustained an objection made on behalf of Mrs. Williams, to a question put to Mr. Kaeding, in reference to the length of time Williams was employed by him; and the appellant contends that this was error inasmuch as it was material in explanation of appellant's statement that the note was made in the name of his daughter for the purpose of securing employment for her husband, Williams. But the witness had just answered a direct question by appellant's counsel, as follows: "How long did you keep Mr. Williams there?" So that the question to which the court sustained an objection was a mere repetition of the one which had already been asked and answered.

Appellant also contends that the court erred in admitting, over his objections, a deed from him to his daughter Isabel Tucker, and granddaughter Adrienne Dowell, to certain property, and a letter in relation thereto. Appellant's witness Bowton on direct examination testified that he drew the papers, to wit, the note and mortgage in suit, at the dictation of Mr. Casebeer, and had before that drawn up for him some deeds to his daughter and granddaughter; and respondent's attorney offered in evidence, in connection with the cross-examination of this witness, the deeds which he had referred to and identified, so that the matter objected to was really in cross-examination of what the witness testified to in chief. The other rulings of the court alleged to be erroneous by appellant are either harmless or quite immaterial, and require no special consideration. The order appealed from is affirmed.

In re CUDWORTH'S ESTATE. (S. F. 2,578, 2,579.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 27, 1901.)

ESTATES—EXECUTORS—FEES—DISTRIBUTION—COMMUNITY PROPERTY—GIFT FROM WIFE—COMMINGLING OF FUNDS.

1. Where the court found that the property of an estate could not be distributed in kind, and had required from the administrator labor beyond the mere custody and distribution thereof, he should be allowed full fees on the amount over $20,000, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1618, fixing executors' fees.

2. Where during coverture decedent was engaged in no business except looking after his property acquired before marriage, and left no real estate not owned by him before marriage or derived from investments of his personal estate, and his personal property was greatly decreased, and nearly all of it was directly traced to that possessed before marriage, his widow had no interest therein as community property.

3. Where during coverture decedent's income from his property possessed before marriage averaged $570 per month, and his wife gave him from the income of her property sums amounting to an average of $15 per month, and at his decease his property had greatly decreased, the fact that he had commingled the small amount secured from his wife with his other property did not convert it all into community property.

4. Where during coverture a wife gave small sums derived from the income of her separate property to her husband, "to do what he pleased with" the money, the gift made it his separate property, and not community property.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. V. Coffey, Judge.

From an order settling the final account of the executor of the will of James W. Cudworth, deceased, and the decree of final distribution of his estate, Royal Wallace Cud-worth appeals. Order affirmed, and decree reversed.

Knight & Heggerty, for appellant. A. N. Drown, Drown, Leicester & Drown, and Henley & Costello, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. The two appeals taken to this court in the matter of the estate of Cudworth, deceased, may be considered together. Both are prosecuted by the son, a devisee under the will. The one is from that part of the decree settling the final account of the executor, wherein he is allowed full commissions upon the amount of the estate accounted for by him. The other is from that part of the decree of final distribution which adjudges certain property left by the deceased to be community property instead of separate property, and distributes it accordingly.

1. The estate of deceased consisted of real property valued at $79,000; stocks, bonds, notes, and mortgages valued at $38,567. The executor accounted for $145,579; the increase being made up of rents, interest, and dividends collected by him. It is contended that the property of the estate was distributed in kind, involved no labor beyond the custody and distribution of it, and that, therefore, under section 1618 of the Code of Civil Procedure, commissions should have been computed upon all of the estate above the value of $20,000 at one-half of the ordinary rate fixed by law. But the court in probate found "that all of the property belonging to said decedent at the time of his death, and then forming part of his estate, and which has not since been disposed of by said executor, is not now in the same form or condition in which the same was in at the time of the death of said decedent, or at the time when it first came to the possession of said executor, and that all of the same cannot now be, and is not, distributed in kind; that the property of the estate of said decedent, and the care, management, and administration thereof by said executor, has necessarily involved, and the said executor has properly bestowed and expended thereon, labor beyond the mere custody and distribution of the same." This finding derives sufficient support from the evidence. The only witness upon the question was the executor himself, and no effort was made to impeach or impugn his testimony. He testified that he took personal charge and possession of all the property described in the inventory, and protected, managed, and cared for the same during administration; that it became necessary for him to surrender certain stock and bonds in exchange for new issues; that before doing so it became incumbent upon him to make, and he did make, a thorough and careful investigation of the affairs of the corporations; that he collected and realized on many of the promissory notes belonging to the estate, made diligent efforts to collect debts due, gave much personal time and attention to the condition and protection of 20 or more tenements belonging to the estate, bestowed labor upon their repairs and in efforts to rent and keep them rented, and protected the estate against suit to quiet title brought against him in his official capacity. The administration lasted for more than two years, during which time large sums of money were collected and disbursed in the preservation, protection, and care of the property of the estate; in the collection of rents; in the making of repairs, pursuit of tenants, and in the following up of debtors; in the examination and settlement of street assessments, payment of taxes and insurance premiums and water rates; in the making of contracts with laborers, carpenters, plumbers, and painters, and the necessary repairs for tenants; in the prosecution of a foreclosure suit. Besides all this, owing to the peculiar nature of the properties of the estate, it was necessary to keep an elaborate system of accounts with the tenants and other debtors of the estate, executing satisfactions of mortgages, indorsing upon numerous notes the many small payments made thereon; and finally, a contest of the will having been instituted, it became the duty of the executor to take due precautions to protect the will and make preparations for the contest, which in fact he did, though the contest was finally dismissed. Under this showing, the court was justified in its allowance of full commissions.

2. Upon the second appeal—that from a part of the decree for final distribution—the facts are that after the filing by the executor of his final account, with his petition for distribution, the appellant, a son of deceased, filed his answer, alleging that all the property in the estate, of which his father died seised and possessed was separate property, and prayed that it be distributed to him and his brother Emery under the will. The widow, Johanna Cudworth, in due time filed her answer and petition, alleging her marriage to the deceased, and praying distribution under the law of the land and the proofs to be adduced. Upon the hearing the following facts were shown: At the time of Cudworth's marriage he owned real and personal property as follows: Cash in bank, $5,029; stock of the savings and loan society of the value of $22,500; and 62 parcels of real estate. Of this real estate 45 pieces were sold after marriage for $91,292.54, and 17 were still owned at the time of his death, and appraised at $74,850. The total value of the real and personal property thus owned by Cudworth at the time of his marriage was $193,671. After his marriage and before his death rents were collected to the aggregate amount of $29,453, and dividends on this identical stock to the amount of $7,109. When he died his estate was in the following condition: There were 18 parcels of real estate,—17 owned at the time of his marriage, and 1 acquired after marriage by foreclosure of a mortgage given to secure moneys loaned.

The total value of the real estate thus owned at the time of his death was $79,850. The personal property consisted of stocks, promissory notes, and bonds, and was of the value of $58,467. The total value of the separate property of Cudworth then, at the time of his marriage, was $193,671, whereas the total value of his estate at the time of his death, notwithstanding the large sum of over $36,000 derived from rents and dividends after his marriage, was only $138,317. From the time of his marriage until the time of his death the deceased had no trade, occupation, or employment whatsoever, excepting that during that period he employed his time in attending to looking after and caring for his separate property, in collecting the rents therefrom, in making sales thereof, and collecting interest on his mortgages, notes, and bonds, and dividends on his stock, and in making repairs and improvements upon his properties. The only property that he received or earned from any other source during all this time was the sum of $2,080, which he earned as an appraiser for the savings and loan society in the two years between September, 1876, and September, 1878. The widow testified that she had an income from her own separate property at the time she married the deceased. For the first six years after the marriage that income amounted to $68 per month. After that, until 1888, it was $90.58 per month, from 1888 until 1892 it was $48 per month, and from 1892 until October, 1893, it was $70.50 per month, and after that, until Mr. Cudworth's death, in May, 1898, it was $32.50 per month. "All the money that I received as income from my property was turned over by me to my husband, to be used for household purposes and as he wanted to." After her marriage she expended $1,500 to put a building upon the property that she owned. She also bought a lot, and paid for it $1,500, and another for which she paid $1,000. She paid taxes and insurance and repairs on her own property; paid for the maintenance, education, clothing, and music for her two daughters from her marriage until Cudworth's death; traveled with her daughters to Europe and South America, paying all expenses of both. Cudworth gave her $500 for expenses. She had in the German Savings & Loan Society, over and above all of these payments, in January, 1898, some $3,500. Her income she "gave Cudworth to pay the household expenses of their family of six persons, and to spend as he wanted to"; that she kept no account, and could not tell how much went into the common fund or was turned over. Cudworth gave her $40 a month until 1892, and $60 a month from that on until his death. It was shown that certain notes and mortgages, the property of the estate, were notes and mortgages given by the purchasers of parcels of Cudworth's land, owned by him at the time of his marriage, and thereafter sold. These notes and mortgages, with substantially all the rest of the personal property of the estate, were by the court decreed to be the community property of the decedent, and Johanna, his widow, and the one-half of it was distributed to her accordingly.

These facts then establish that Cudworth was engaged in no employment, other than the care and preservation of his own property; that he received no property except from rents and incomes of that which he owned at the time of his marriage, and from the sales of it, except the trifling sum of $2,000, which he received in the course of two years as an appraiser for the loan society. At the time of his death his estate is worth $55,000 less than at the time of his marriage, and more than $90,000 less than the value of his estate at the time of his marriage, together with the rents and dividends which he received from his separate property during his marriage. When the computation is made as to the difference between the amounts which the wife gave to Cudworth monthly, as the income of her property, and the amount which monthly he gave back to her in the form of an allowance, it will be seen that she gave him a total of $15,847, and received back $11,880, leaving the net amount which she gave him $3,967, or the equivalent of a monthly gift to him of $15 for the period of 21 years. Upon the other hand, during that same time the actual cash which Cudworth received from his separate property, derived from income and sales, was $150,000, or an average of $570 per month. Notwithstanding this, the court decrees, in effect, that all of the personal property left by Cudworth at the time of his death was community property, and distributes it accordingly. Yet when Cudworth died his personal property was of the value of only $58,000, or nearly two-thirds less than the amount of actual cash that he had received from his separate estate during coverture. In support of this decree respondent relies upon the principle thus enunciated by Ballinger in his work on Community Property: "When the separate property or funds of either spouse is intermixed or commingled with community property, so that the separate property has lost its identity and cannot be clearly traced or segregated, the community, being the paramount estate, draws the whole mass to it, and it becomes community property. The general rule laid down by the courts is that such confusion works a forfeiture of the separate character of the property so commingled." This principle, it may be said, is well supported by authority; but there is a modification of it equally important, and peculiarly apposite to this case, and the same learned author thus expresses it: "But, where the community interest is inconsiderable in the property with which it has been intermingled, the community will not draw to it the separate estate." It does not appear that there was here any commingling of community funds with the separate estate of the deceased; nor yet does it appear that there was any commingling of funds of the separate property of the wife with the separate property of the husband, such as could justify a decree that all must be considered community property. As to community funds, it is shown that there were none, saving the trifling amount of $2,000, earned by Cudworth as an appraiser. Where a husband, charged with the support of a family, has some income derived from his separate property, and some from his earnings which are community property, there is no presumption that he has supported the family out of the separate property and preserve intact the community funds. He is at perfect liberty to devote all that is necessary of the community earnings to the family support, and to preserve his separate property intact. But if it be conceded, though it is not shown, that there was any commingling of the separate funds of the wife with the separate funds of the husband, it was commingling of such a trifling sum with such a large amount as to make it to the last degree inequitable to hold that the husband's property thereby lost its separate character and became community. Clearly, under every principle of law and justice, where the separate property of the husband can be traced, as here it distinctly can, when it passes into his estate the original capital and its transmutations are still separate property, equal with the rents, income, and profits derived therefrom,—those profits, that is to say, which have arisen naturally and without the active engagement by the husband of his capital in some business or employment. In this case all of the income of the property was derived from rents, interest, and dividends, and was as wholly and purely separate property as was the real estate, the stocks, bonds, and notes from which it flowed. But, applying this principle, there were not only no profits from the transactions of Cudworth during his lifetime which could be accounted community property, but the actual value of his personal property had shrunken greatly. Finally, Mrs. Cudworth testifies that she gave the money to her husband to pay household expenses, or do what he pleased with. There was nothing unnatural in her thus contributing from her separate funds this small proportionate amount towards family maintenance, and if, as she states, she did give this money to him to do as he pleased with, the gift itself made the property his separate property as much as any gift of property by him to her would have effectuated the same result. But if it should still be said that the property remained the property of the wife, and was given over merely to the custody of the husband, the utmost of her right would be a claim and demand upon his estate for this sum of $3,000. The order and decree settling the final account of the executor is therefore affirmed, while upon the appeal from that part of the decree of distribution judging the personal property of the deceased to be community property, and distributing it according to law, the decree is reversed, with directions to the trial court, upon the evidence adduced and the facts found, to adjudge and decree that the personal property in the estate of said decedent is separate property.

I concur: TEMPLE, J.

McFARLAND, J. I concur in the judgment; but I do so most reluctantly, and only because I see no legal way to escape the harsh treatment of respondent which our law on the subject of husband and wife allows. In nearly all other civilized countries marriage immediately vests in the wife some estate in the property owned by the husband at the time of the marriage; but such is not the law here, and if he chooses, as in the case at bar, to afterwards do nothing except to collect his rents and profits, he may after a long period of faithful wifehood leave her penniless. Her only chance to acquire by marriage any interest in property is to marry a man who has nothing, with the hope that he may afterwards earn something in which she will have a community right. The case at bar is one of peculiar hardship; for here the wife, having a slender income from a little separate property which she owned, allowed the husband to take that income and gets nothing back from it. The monthly allowance which he let her have—and whether for personal or domestic purposes does not appear—was very small for a man of his means. But the conclusion reached in the opinion cannot, under the law, be avoided.

MORE et al. v. MORE et al. (L. A. 836.)¹
DEED—RESCISSION FOR FRAUD—TRUSTS—RETURN OF CONSIDERATION—RATIFICATION—HEIRSHIP—DECREE—RES JUDICATA.

1. Where the grantee in a deed procured it by fraud and undue influence from his brother, the grantor, while he was, by reason of weak mind and intoxication, incompetent to transact any business, such grantee became a trustee for the grantor, under Civ. Code, § 2224, providing that one who gains a thing by fraud or undue influence is an involuntary trustee of the thing gained, and section 2219, providing that any one who voluntarily assumes a relation of personal confidence with another is deemed a trustee to the person over whose affairs he thereby obtains any control.

2. Where a deed is procured by fraud from a grantor who is incompetent and a spendthrift, some money being paid as consideration, the court should not refuse to decree a rescission until such money is repaid, since the inability of such grantor to pay back the money is the natural result of defendant's act in advancing money to one so irresponsible.

3. Defendant by fraud and undue influence procured a deed from his brother, who was then incompetent to transact business, giving a note as part consideration, and afterwards, without payment, had possession of the note. The brother assigned the note to his wife, who obtained a judgment for recovery thereof. Her husband also executed a deed to her of the land covered by the deed to defendant, and she sued to recover the land from defendant, Held, that she was not estopped by the judgment in her action to recover the note, since she was entitled to possession of the note until she received the relief due to her, and her recovery of the note was not a ratification of the deed.

4. When, in proceedings, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1664, to determine the persons entitled to distributive shares in an estate, a decree is entered on a written stipulation obtained by fraud from the grantor in a deed procured by the same fraud, such decree does not determine any question relating to such fraud, as the judgment is conclusive only as to the matter actually litigated.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Barbara county; W. S. Day, Judge.

Action by Louisa J. More and husband, Wallace H. More, against Thomas R. More and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

C. A. Stork, for appellants. C. F. Carrier, Richards & Carrier, Boyce, Taggart & Kellogg, and Thos. McNulty, for respondents.

SMITH, C. The plaintiff Wallace More is one of the heirs of A. P. More, deceased; his interest in the estate being $\frac{1}{27}$ of the whole, and of the value of \$10,000. The plaintiff Louisa is his wife, and by virtue of a deed made to her by him January 5, 1895, has succeeded to whatever interest he had in the estate at that date. The defendant Thomas More is the grantee in three several deeds executed to him by Wallace More, purporting to convey to him the whole interest of the grantor in the estate,—one of date October 21, 1893, one of date October 30th (in fact executed November 4, 1893), and the other of date April 27, 1894. The defendant Den is grantee in a deed from Thomas More of date November 17, 1893, purporting to convey to him one-half of the interest of Wallace in the estate. The other defendants, Money and Finger, are bona fide mortgagees under mortgages made by Thomas More to secure to the former a note for \$1,000, now owned by Finger, and to the latter a note for \$3,400, and their interests are not involved in this appeal. The suit was brought to annul the above deeds from Wallace to Thomas More. The plaintiffs recovered judgment, from which the defendants More and Den appeal on the judgment roll.

The case presented by the findings, briefly stated, is as follows: The plaintiff Wallace, it is found, was at the time of the death of A. P. More addicted to the use of intoxicating drinks to such an extent as to seriously interfere with his mental capacity to transact business, and at times to deprive him of reason and judgment, rendering him unable to properly manage his business and to take care of his property. He was otherwise a man of weak and pliable character, shrewd in procuring funds for present needs, but reckless as to future results; and his condition, habits, character, and susceptibility were well known to the defendant Thomas More, his elder brother, who for a long period has exercised great influence over him. Under these circumstances the defendants Den and More conspired together "to fraudulently acquire the interest of Wallace" in the estate of the deceased, and presumably the deeds in question were procured by Thomas More in pursuance of this conspiracy. At the time of the execution of the deed of October 21, 1893, and of the deed of October 30th, "the plaintiff Wallace [it is found] * * * was not competent to transact business." The former of these deeds, which was executed on the day of the death of the deceased, and duly recorded, purports to be "in trust * * * to collect any interest or bequest coming to [the grantor] from the estate, etc., and then to pay to [the grantor] a sum not to exceed $20 per month * * * until the same, with necessary costs and disbursements in caring for his estate so recovered, consume the whole amount." The deed of October 30, 1893, executed November 4th, which purports to be "in consideration of one dollar and other considerations," is absolute on its face, but was accompanied by an instrument in writing, signed by the grantee, Thomas More, in which, after reciting the conveyance, and that it was made in order that the grantor, Wallace, might "have a steady and determined income and have the means to provide for his immediate wants," the grantee Thomas agrees to pay Wallace, "during his natural life, the sum of fifty dollars, payable on the first of each and every month," etc., with proviso for the termination of the obligation at any time by the payment of $5,000 and back payments, and further agrees within 30 days to pay Wallace "the further sum of $1,000, to the end that said Wallace * * * may have some immediate money with which to relieve his immediate wants, and to provide him with the necessary means to take the Gatten or Keeley cure." The deed of April 27, 1894, is also an absolute conveyance, with release of all trusts, obligations, etc., and purports to be in consideration of $9,358.75 in hand paid, etc. The actual consideration consisted of a note of defendant More for $3,500, a note of defendant Den for $3,500, a draft of $490, with $10 cash, and payments previously made by Thomas to Wallace under former deeds, amounting to $2,358.75; the total aggregating $9,858.75, being $500 in excess of the consideration named in the deed. There was also paid at the same time $500 on the note of Thomas More. The deed was accompanied by a written order signed by Wallace, addressed to Hon. J. V. Coffee, judge, etc., and John F. More, administrator of the estate of A. P. More, deceased, notifying them of the conveyance, and authorizing and directing them to distribute his interest in the estate at the proper time to Thomas More, the grantee. And accordingly, in a proceeding in the matter of said estate to determine the rights of parties therein, under section 1664, Code Civ. Proc., a judgment was entered September 5, 1895, declaring the estate to be owned by the parties and in the proportions named in the judgment, and (among other allotments) an undivided twenty-seventh interest by Thomas More "as assignee of Wallace H. More." There are some other facts found, on which points are made by the appellants, which will be briefly stated. The $1,000 referred to in the deed of October 30, 1893, presumably advanced by Den, was paid to Wallace More, who then went to the Gärten cure at Ontario, and was temporarily cured of the liquor habit. In November, 1893, after he was discharged, "he received and receipted for to Thomas More on account of the agreement * * * the further sum of $1,208.75, a sum in excess of the agreement," etc. Of the notes given as consideration of the deed of April 27, 1894, Den's note was afterwards sold to him by Wallace, when in a state of intoxication, for $2,000, which was received by Wallace and not returned. The note of Thomas More seems in some way to have come into his own possession; and January 25, 1895, the plaintiff Louisa, to whom it had been assigned, recovered a judgment against him for its return or value. There was no attempt on the part of the plaintiffs, prior to the filing of the complaint, to rescind the deeds in question; nor did they restore or offer to restore, otherwise than in the complaint, the consideration received. But the judgment requires the surrender of the notes from Thomas More and from Den, and the payment to the latter of the sum of $3,000, as conditions of their conveyance to the plaintiff Louisa, and also affirms the validity of the mortgages of Finger, amounting to $4,400 and interest.

On the facts found, there can be no doubt that the deed of April 27, 1894, from Wallace to Thomas More, as was the case with the previous deeds, was procured by fraud and undue influence, or that there arose upon its execution a constructive trust in favor of the former. Civ. Code, §§ 2219, 2224, and cases cited in note in annotated edition, section 2228 et seq.; Olivas v. Olivas, 61 Cal. 382; Alaniz v. Casenave, 91 Cal. 41, 27 Pac. 521. This is not disputed by the appellants' counsel, but it is contended, in effect, (1) that plaintiffs, having received the consideration, and having failed to rescind or to offer to rescind, have lost their right; (2) that the judgment recovered by the plaintiff Louisa against Thomas More for the recovery of his note was a ratification of the deed, and thus operates as an estoppel in pais; and (3) that the plaintiffs are estopped by the judgment rendered in the matter of the estate of A. P. More, deceased, under section 1664, Code Civ. Proc. None of these points can be sustained.

1. With regard to the first, rescission is only one of the remedies in cases of fraud.

Field v. Austin (Cal.) 63 Pac. 693, and cases cited. And, in cases where real or personal property is thus obtained, the most common and familiar relief granted by a court of equity is to convert the party guilty of the fraud into a trustee. 1 Perry, Trusts, § 166 et seq., and authorities cited supra. The relief granted by the court, namely, reconveyance on the terms imposed by the judgment, was appropriate to the case, and was justified by the facts alleged in the complaint, and by the prayer for general relief. Code Civ. Proc. § 580. The rigid rules appealed to by the counsel apply only to rescission to be effected by the acts of the parties. The power of a court of equity to cancel a contract is of much wider scope, and its exercise is governed by other principles. The court may refuse to exercise the power, in certain cases, for failure of the injured party to avail himself of his right to rescind, but not in a case like this, where the injured party was unable to pay back the money, and his inability was the natural, and, as such, to be anticipated, result of the act of the defendants in advancing money to a person so irresponsible; where, also, the same influences that made it practicable to defraud him would deter him from seeking relief from the fraud; and where, at the time the plaintiff Louisa became interested, the property had been incumbered by Thomas More by valid mortgages to an amount in excess of the money that had been received by Wallace, and there was therefore nothing to be returned.

2. The suit and judgment of the plaintiff Louisa against Thomas More for the recovery of the note, which must have been, if not fraudulently, at least wrongly, obtained by him, cannot be regarded as a ratification of the deed. At that time the property had been heavily incumbered by the Finger mortgages, and she was entitled, for her security, to the possession of the note until she had received the relief due to her.

3. Nor can the judgment in the superior court in the matter of the estate of A. P. More, under section 1664, Code Civ. Proc., operate as an estoppel. It is not clear that the court could have entertained jurisdiction of the equitable rights of Wallace arising out of the deed. In such proceedings, the court has jurisdiction of the claims of assignees of the heir, but it has not been held that its jurisdiction extends to claims of an equitable nature against the legal owner, or, in other words, to trusts. In re Burton, 93 Cal. 461, 462, 29 Pac. 36. It cannot, indeed, be said that the court in matters of probate has no equity jurisdiction; but it does not follow that it has general equity jurisdiction, or any equitable jurisdiction beyond what is involved in the exercise of its peculiar functions, which are to administer and distribute the estate. Where a trust has been created by will, the validity of the trust is necessarily involved in the question of distribution; for, if invalid, the bequest fails. Estate of Walkerly, 108 Cal. 660, 41 Pac. 772. Hence, as necessary to distribution, "it is within the province of the probate court to define the rights of all who have legally or equitably any interest in the property of the estate derived from the will." Estate of Hinckley, 58 Cal. 518; Siddall v. Harrison, 73 Cal. 563, 564, 15 Pac. 130; Crew v. Pratt, 119 Cal. 139, 51 Pac. 38; Goad v. Montgomery, 119 Cal. 552, 51 Pac. 681. But prior to the enactment of sections 1699-1703, Code Civ. Proc., "conferring a limited jurisdiction over testamentary trustees on the probate side of the superior court," the court after distribution to the trustee had no further control over the trust. Morffew v. Railroad Co., 107 Cal. 594, 595, 40 Pac. 810. By parity of reasoning, it would seem, it would have no jurisdiction over trusts not derived from the will; and this view is confirmed by considering the purpose of the proceeding under section 1664, Code Civ. Proc., which is to determine the parties to whom the estate is to be distributed. It is therefore subsidiary to the proceeding for distribution, and the jurisdiction of the court in the two cases is co-extensive. Hence, if in the matter of distribution its jurisdiction does not extend to the determination or administration of trusts, other than those above specified, neither does it in the proceeding under section 1664. In either case, therefore, it would seem, its jurisdiction is merely to determine "the persons entitled under the will or by succession, or their grantees." In re Crooks' Estate, 125 Cal. 461, 58 Pac. 89; Estate of Burdick, 112 Cal. 392, 393, 44 Pac. 734. And in neither case are the equitable claims of parties against the heirs or assignees of heirs a proper subject for its consideration. And this is in accord with the language of the act in declaring the effect of the judgment in the latter proceeding, which is that it "shall be final and conclusive in the distribution of said estate, and in regard to the title to all property of the estate," or, in other words, it "is conclusive only as to the succession or testamentary rights." Estate of Burdick, 112 Cal. 392, 393, 44 Pac. 734. It is, however, not necessary to determine finally this question. Assuming the court to have jurisdiction, its judgment would be conclusive only as to the matter actually litigated. Olivas v. Olivas, 61 Cal. 387; Chever v. Ching Hong Poy, 82 Cal. 71, 22 Pac. 1081; Estate of Vaughn, 92 Cal. 193, 28 Pac. 221; William Hill Co. v. Lawler, 116 Cal. 363, 48 Pac. 323; In re Crooks' Estate, 125 Cal. 462, 58 Pac. 89; Code Civ. Proc. § 1908. In the case at bar the matter now involved was not before the court. The judgment was entered on the written order or stipulation of Wallace More, obtained along with the deed of April 27, 1894, and tainted with the same fraud. It added nothing to the force of that document and the accompanying deed. Hence it is immaterial whether the court had or had not jurisdiction to determine the questions now under consideration. It is sufficient that those questions were not submitted to it. I advise that the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: GRAY, C.; CHIPMAN, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is affirmed.

BORCHARD v. EASTWOOD. (L. A. 869.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 24, 1901.)

DEEDS—DESCRIPTION—MISTAKES—ADVERSE POSSESSION—BURDEN OF PROOF.

1. Where, in a deed, land is described as commencing at the corner of certain sections "in the Chapman tract in the Rancho Santiago de Santa Ana in the county of Orange," the description is sufficient, though the township and range are not stated.

2. Where, in a deed, the land is fully and correctly described, except the number of the township is given as "45" instead of "4," and the land can be identified by the rest of the description, such mistake will not vitiate the conveyance.

3. Where the description in a deed is all "the lands owned by the grantor" in a certain county, with certain exceptions, it is sufficient to convey all his lands in such county not included within the exceptions.

4. Statements of a former owner of land, and his acts in putting in stakes on an alleged boundary line, are unavailing to establish the boundary, where the adjoining owner was not present, nor had any knowledge of such acts.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Orange county; J. W. Ballard, Judge.

Action by Carl A. Borchard against John Eastwood. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

McKelvey & Bowers, for appellant. Williams & Jackson, for respondent.

COOPER, C. Action to quiet title. Plaintiff recovered judgment, and defendant appeals therefrom, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The premises are described in the complaint as "lying and being in the Rancho Santiago de Santa Ana, county of Orange, state of California, bounded and particularly described as follows, to wit: Beginning at a point 15.825 chains east from the corner of sections 28, 29, 32, and 33, township 4 S., R. 9 W., S. B. M.; thence north 16.93 chains; thence east 5.905 chains; thence south 16.93 chains; thence west 5.905 chains, to point of beginning,—containing ten acres. The same being a portion of lots 13 and 14, block F, of the A. B. Chapman tract, as per map made by Frank Lecouvereur in December, 1870." At the close of plaintiff's evidence the defendant made a motion for a nonsuit, which was denied, and it is claimed that the court erred in denying the motion. The argument is that the description contained in certain deeds offered in evidence by the plaintiff, marked Exhibits A, B, C, D, and E, does not identify the land described in the complaint. The land is described in Exhibit A as "commencing at a stake 9.92 chains east from the corner of sections 28, 29, 32, and 33, which is the southwest corner of the east one-half of lot No. 13, block F, on the Chapman tract of the Rancho Santiago de Santa Ana, and running thence north 16.93 chains to a redwood post; thence east 16.81 chains to a redwood post; thence south 16.93 chains to iron pin 18 inches long; thence west 11.81 chains to the southwest corner, the place of beginning." The same description is contained in Exhibits C and D. It is admitted that the description in the three deeds is the same, if the lands are in the same township and range as the land described in the complaint; but it is said that, as the deeds mention no township or range, they do not describe the same land. The description in the deeds was sufficient to identify the land without mentioning the township and range. We will not presume that there is another similar description of a tract of land in a different township and range commencing at the common corner to sections 28, 29, 32, and 33 in the Chapman tract in the Rancho Santiago de Santa Ana in the county of Orange. The description was sufficient to identify and locate the land. It has been held that, even if the deed describes the land as being in the southeast quarter, instead of the southwest quarter, of a named quarter section, the description is good if the land can be identified by monuments actually fixed upon the grounds. Helm v. Wilson, 76 Cal. 476, 18 Pac. 604. So it was held that, where a deed did not name the state, county, or city in which the land was situated, the description was not void, because without it the property could still be located and identified. McCullough v. Olds, 108 Cal. 532, 41 Pac. 420. The land was identified by Findley, a surveyor. He said he knew the stake at the common corner to sections 28, 29, 32, and 33, and that the land in question is a part of the Chapman tract. The description in Exhibit E describes the land as "beginning at a point 15.825 chains east from the corner of sections 28, 29, 32, and 33, township 45, range 9 west, S. B. M." Then follows a correct description of the 10 acres as in the complaint. It is said that this deed is void because the township is described as "45" instead of "4." This was evidently a mistake. The description identifies the land without the number of the township. It describes the land as being a "portion of lots 13 and 14, block F, of the A. B. Chapman tract, as made by Frank Lecouvereur in December, 1870." The number of the township in this deed may, therefore, be regarded as surplusage. Exhibit B conveyed all the land owned by the grantor in Los Angeles county on the 14th day of March, 1881, with certain exceptions. It is not claimed that the land described in the complaint here comes within the exceptions, and the description was therefore sufficient. Pettigrew v. Dobbelaar, 63 Cal. 396. It was not error to admit the said deeds in evidence, and the nonsuit was properly denied.

The answer, among other defenses, alleges that the defendant, Eastwood, and his predecessors in interest, have been in possession of the lands described in the complaint for more than five years before the commencement of this action, and that the division line between the lands of plaintiff and defendant has been established by consent of the parties for more than five years before the commencement of the action. The court found against defendant upon this allegation, and found the allegation "to be untrue, and without any foundation or basis whatever except as to the boundary line on the east side of the strip of land described in the plaintiff's complaint." The finding is challenged as being contrary to the evidence. We have examined the evidence, and find that it not only supports the finding, but that no other proper finding could have been made therefrom. When either party comes into court, claiming to be the owner of land, the paper title of which is in his adversary, and claims to be such owner by a parol agreement, or by conduct which estops the other party from claiming the true line, the burden is upon him to prove clearly such agreement or acquiescence as will comply with the rules of law as herein stated. The evidence shows that one Edward F. Wright owned the land in dispute from 1882 up to December, 1898, the date of the conveyance to plaintiff. His brother, Charles L. Wright, owned the land on the east until about 1892 or 1893, when he sold to one Bancroft. After the sale to Bancroft, he leased the property for several years, and occupied it and farmed it as a tenant of Bancroft. During these years the brothers farmed the two places together, cultivating them and plowing from east to west across the division line. There is no evidence that any boundary line was agreed upon while Charles L. Wright was the owner on the east. There is no evidence that after Bancroft became the owner there was any agreement as to the boundary line, or any claim by Bancroft that he owned any more than the land called for in his deed. In the fall of 1896 the defendant purchased the land on the east from Bancroft, taking only the property described in Bancroft's deed, which did not include the land in dispute. Defendant testified that after he bought from Bancroft about the 1st of January, 1897, Charles L. Wright put in stakes "where he [Wright] said the line was between the two places; that they had always called that the line." At this time Charles L. Wright was not the owner of the land on either side of the disputed line, and hence his statement and acts in putting in stakes can bind no one, as neither plaintiff nor his grantor was present, nor had either of them any knowledge of it. Defendant testified, "When I bought the place, I was given to understand that the line was where it was staked out by Charley Wright." He does not say who gave him such understanding, except what was said by Charley Wright. Certainly it cannot be said what Bancroft, or any one else, stated to him, in the presence of plaintiff or his grantor, as to the location of the boundary line. Charles L. Wright testified that when he set the stakes he never told defendant that the line he marked off was an acquiesced line or an agreed line, but that he distinctly told defendant that there would have to be a survey made before the true line could be determined. Plaintiff's grantor testified that he never was present when any line was staked out, and never at any time agreed or acquiesced in the line claimed by defendant. Defendant at the time, or about the time, Edward F. Wright was going to sell to plaintiff, said to Charles L. and Edward F. Wright that he would be satisfied with the county surveyor's survey, and would abide by it. He did not then claim any boundary line, or at least he did not say anything about it in his conversation. When plaintiff was about to buy, he asked defendant about the boundary line, and defendant replied that he did not know where it was; and, when plaintiff told him that he would not buy without a survey, defendant replied: "Very well, have a survey made, and I will stand by it; and if it comes my way it will be all right, and if it should go yours, why, I will get more land." In the conversations with plaintiff defendant never mentioned such a thing as an agreed boundary line. Defendant, in his answer, claimed title by adverse possession, but, as the evidence fails to support the claim, it seems to be abandoned, as it is not argued in the appellant's brief. We advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: SMITH, C.; HAYNES, C.

(L. A. 831.)¹

APPEAL—JUDGMENT—REVERSAL—IRREGULARITY IN PROCEEDINGS—MUNICIPAL CORPORATION—CONDEMNATION PROCEEDINGS—DISQUALIFICATION OF JUDGE—TAXPAYER—DEPOSIT OF MONEY IN COURT.

1. Where, in condemnation proceedings, affidavits in opposition to a motion for final judgment which were on file could not affect the merits of the controversy, a refusal to permit the reading thereof is a mere irregularity of proceeding, for which the judgment, which is right, will not be reversed.

2. The fact that a judge owned real property within a city did not disqualify him to hear and determine condemnation proceedings of land for municipal purposes by the city.

3. In condemnation proceedings by a city the money awarded to the property owners was actually deposited with the clerk of the court within the proper time, but the clerk, because of their refusal to take it, deposited it with the county treasurer, in accordance with the provisions of Code Civ. Proc. § 2104, providing that, whenever moneys are paid into or deposited in court, they shall be delivered to the clerk in person, which he must, unless otherwise directed by the law, deposit with the county treasurer, subject to the order of the court. It appeared that the money was in the county treasury, but that the property owners would not receive it. Held, that the final judgment of condemnation will not be reversed on the technical point that the money was not actually carried from the treasurer's room to the court room.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Lucien Shaw, Judge.

Condemnation proceedings by the city of Los Angeles against A. E. Pomeroy and J. D. Hooker. From a final judgment of condemnation, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

See 64 Pac. 477.

J. S. Chapman, R. H. F. Variel, and John G. North, for appellants. Walter F. Haas, City Atty., and Lee & Scott, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is an appeal by defendants from a final judgment of condemnation. The action was commenced in June, 1893; and after a full hearing of the merits of the case, and a verdict of a jury establishing the compensation to be paid defendants, and findings of the court, an interlocutory judgment was rendered and entered on June 2, 1898, which determined all the issues in the case, and provided for a final decree of condemnation upon the deposit by plaintiff in court of the amount of the verdict, $25,000, and certain costs and disbursements, within 30 days after the entry of the interlocutory judgment. The said amount of money was so deposited in court by plaintiff within the 30 days. The defendants appealed to this court from the interlocutory judgment, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial; and the judgment and order were here affirmed on June 3, 1899. See City of Los Angeles v. Pomeroy, 124 Cal. 597, 57 Pac. 585. Upon the going down of the remittitur the plaintiff gave notice of the motion for the entry of a final judgment of condemnation. Defendants presented a written objection and opposition to the motion, in which reference was made to two affidavits which they had filed with the clerk,—one made by J. D. Hooker, and the other by R. H. F. Variel. In the affidavit of Hooker the only facts stated were that the judge of the superior court before whom the case had been tried was at the time of the trial, and still is, the owner of certain real property of the value of more than $5,000 within the city of Los Angeles, plaintiff in the case, and was a water-rate payer within said city; and it was declared in the affidavit that for the reason of the existence of these facts the said judge was disqualified to sit in that case, and that the interlocutory judgment was void, and no further proceeding should be had in the cause. In the affidavit of said Variel these facts were stated, viz.: That on April 29, 1896, which was within 30 days after the date of the interlocutory judgment, plaintiff deposited with the clerk the amount of money above stated; that the court made a minute order reciting such deposit; that afterwards, on August 27, 1896, the clerk deposited said money with the county treasurer, and that the money was deposited "subject, as such treasurer has stated to affiant, and as affiant is informed and believes, to the order of the superior court, and not subject to the order of said defendants." The only other facts stated in this affidavit are the dates of the notices of appeal from the interlocutory judgment and from the order denying a new trial. No other evidence was offered by defendants at the hearing of the motion for final judgment of condemnation.

It appears from the bill of exceptions that at the hearing counsel for defendants started to read the said affidavit of Hooker, when the court refused to hear the reading of the same, or the said affidavit of Variel. We do not see that the case occupies any different position from that which it would have occupied if counsel had been allowed to read the affidavits, which were on file. The question is whether or not the affidavits show any valid objection to the entry of the final judgment, and the judgment, if right, will not be reversed on account of any question as to mere irregularity of proceeding which does not change the merits of the controversy.

The appeal presents the question whether or not the judge was disqualified to try the case on account of interest; and the only fact upon which the disqualification is asserted is undisputed, viz. that he owned some real property within the city limits. This fact did not disqualify him. The mere contingency of a possible future increase or decrease of taxation within a municipality is too remote and indistinct to disqualify a judge from trying a case to which the municipality is a party upon the sole ground that he owns taxable property within its limits, and this is the sole ground of the alleged disqualification in the case at bar. The legal aspect of the question is not changed by the suggestions of counsel that the value of the property sought to be condemned was alleged by defendants to be over a million and a half dollars (found by the jury to be only $25,000), and that, if the alleged value had been established, then municipal bonds to provide for the amount would have been necessary, unless the city should abandon the proceedings, etc. The suggestions are themselves only of remote contingencies. The case at bar is within the rule declared in City of Oakland v. Oakland Water-Front Co., 118 Cal. 249, 50 Pac. 268, and Higgins v. City of San Diego, 126 Cal. 303, 58 Pac. 700, 59 Pac. 209, and not within Meyer v. City of San Diego, 121 Cal. 102, 53 Pac. 434, 41 L. R. A. 762, where the interest of the judge was direct, immediate, and precise; it being a case, as stated in the opinion therein rendered, "where the judge, in a case directly involving the validity of a tax imposed and to be imposed on his land, does by his ipse dixit declare whether the burden shall remain or be removed."

Appellants contend here, although it is not clear that they so contended in the court below, that the final judgment of condemnation was erroneous because the money was not deposited in court in accordance with the provision of the Code on the subject. It is not disputed that the money was actually deposited with the clerk within the proper time, but it is contended that the deposit was not kept good, because some months afterwards, the appellants having refused to take it, the clerk deposited it with the county treasurer. This seems to have been done under section 2104, Code Civ. Proc., which provides that: "Whenever moneys are paid into or deposited in court, the same shall be delivered to the clerk in person, or to such of his deputies as shall be specially authorized by his appointment in writing to receive the same. He must, unless otherwise directed by law, deposit it with the county treasurer, to be held by him subject to the order of the court." This seems to be a general provision applicable in all cases, and it is not inconsistent with section 1254, which provides that where, in a condemnation suit, the plaintiff may be authorized to take possession of the premises involved before trial, upon the payment into court of a sum of money to be fixed by the judge, the court "may" order that money to be deposited in the state treasury. In the case at bar the court in the final judgment ordered that the county treasurer forthwith pay the money to the defendants, and "that this be his warrant therefor." There is no pretense that the money was not in the county treasury, or that appellants could not have immediately taken it. It is apparent that appellants would not have received the money under any circumstances, and, these being the facts, we do not think that the judgment should be reversed on the technical point that the money—quite a large sum—was not actually carried from the treasurer's room to the court room. The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

We concur: GAROUTTE, J.; VAN DYKE, J.; HARRISON, J.; HENSHAW, J.; TEMPLE, J.

BEATTY, C. J. I concur in the judgment, and only desire to add a brief statement of the ground upon which I distinguish the case of Meyer v. City of San Diego, 121 Cal. 102, 53 Pac. 434, 41 L. R. A. 762, from this and all similar cases. Meyer v. City of San Diego was an action which could be maintained by any taxpayer, and it was only in that capacity that the plaintiff sued. The judge was also a taxpayer. He could have instituted the action himself, or made himself a party by intervention, and to hold that he could try the case would have been to hold that one who has interest enough in a cause of action to maintain it as plaintiff has not enough interest in it to disqualify him from deciding it as judge,—a proposition to which I should think any court would hesitate to subscribe. In this case and in the cases cited by appellants, although the judge was a taxpayer of the corporation (plaintiff or defendant), he could not as such have brought the action or defended it; and, his interest being too remote and contingent for that purpose, it may be held, without any impeachment of Meyer v. City of San Diego, that it was too remote and contingent to disqualify him as judge.

MCGRAW v. FRIEND & TERRY LUMBER CO. (Sac. 788.)

APPEAL AND ERROR—NONSUIT—RETRIAL—LAW OF THE CASE—DANGEROUS PREMISES—EVIDENCE—WITNESSES—CONTRADICTION—DEPOSITION—INTRODUCTION—CROSS-EXAMINATION.

1. Where a judgment in favor of plaintiff was reversed on an appeal from the judgment and from an order denying a new trial, on an assignment that the court erred in refusing defendant's motion for a nonsuit made at the conclusion of plaintiff's evidence, and on a retrial of the case a like motion was made and granted, and a second appeal taken from the nonsuit, the error, if any, in the court's granting such nonsuit, was an error of law, and not of fact; and if there was nothing in the evidence produced on the second trial to strengthen plaintiff's case, or to require a different conclusion, the decision on the first appeal that it was error to deny the nonsuit became the law of the case, and was decisive of the propriety of granting such nonsuit on the second trial.

2. In an action for injuries caused by dangerous premises along a city sidewalk, a question asked of plaintiff on cross-examination, if he had not testified by deposition that he was in the habit of going to a hotel situated in the vicinity of the accident nearly every day, etc., was not irrelevant, as it tended to show that plaintiff was familiar with the place of the accident.

3. Where the witness' answer showed that he was not misled as to the time to which the question related, his answer being limited to the time prior to the accident, the question was not objectionable on the ground that it was uncertain as to time.

4. Where defendant, on cross-examination of the plaintiff for the purpose of laying the foundation for contradicting him, asks if he did not testify to certain things by deposition, reading from the deposition the questions and answers, it is not incumbent on the defendant to introduce the deposition or the questions and answers referred to in evidence; it being proper for plaintiff to re-examine the witness as to any portions of the deposition material to the matters called out on the cross-examination, and thus correct any possible misapprehension.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; Matt F. Johnson, Judge.

Action by Peter McGraw against the Friend & Terry Lumber Company. From a judgment in favor of defendant entered on a motion for nonsuit at the close of plaintiff's case, he appeals. Affirmed.

A. L. Hart, for appellant. Hall & Dunn, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. Action to recover damages for personal injuries. At the conclusion of plaintiff's evidence the defendant moved for a nonsuit, its motion was granted, and from the judgment entered thereon the plaintiff has taken his appeal. Upon a former trial the plaintiff had a verdict and judgment, but that judgment was reversed, upon defendant's appeal, upon the ground that the court erred in denying defendant's motion for a nonsuit made then, as now, at the conclusion of plaintiff's evidence in chief. The injury complained of was sustained November 18, 1894, and the first trial was had in December, 1895. The trial, from the result of which the present appeal is taken was had in March, 1899. For a statement of the case, see the opinion upon the former appeal, reported in 120 Cal. 574, 52 Pac. 1004. As to the attending circumstances under which the accident occurred, the case now, as then, depends wholly upon the testimony of the plaintiff; and upon the former appeal it was said by this court: "Conceding that the defendant was negligent in not erecting some barrier to prevent accidents, the plaintiff was so clearly guilty of contributory negligence as to prevent a recovery." No facts or circumstances appear in his evidence upon the second trial that were not disclosed by his evidence upon the former trial, though there were certain minor discrepancies between the evidence given on the second, but none that would require or justify a different conclusion from that announced upon the former appeal.

It is, however, urged by appellant "that a decision of this court upon appeal as to a question of fact does not become the law of the case"; citing Mattingly v. Pennie, 105 Cal. 514, 39 Pac. 200. In that case the appeal was from an order denying a new trial. Upon the first trial of that case in the superior court the defendant had judgment, and the plaintiff appealed from an order denying his motion for a new trial, upon the ground that the evidence was not sufficient to justify the verdict, and this court reversed the judgment. Upon a second trial the verdict was for the plaintiff, and upon appeal by the defendant it was contended that the evidence was substantially the same as upon the former trial, and that the decision upon the first appeal upon the question of the sufficiency of the evidence became the law of the case. Here, however, the appeal is from a nonsuit granted by the trial court, and, if the court erred in granting it, it is an error of law. Warner v. Darrow, 91 Cal. 309, 27 Pac. 737. The fact that a jury has been impaneled and has heard the evidence does not prevent the defendant from making the motion, nor the court from deciding it, though in deciding it the court necessarily considers the evidence and every inference of fact that may be properly drawn from it. The former appeal in the case at bar was from the judgment and from an order denying a new trial, and among the errors of law it was specified that the court erred in not granting the defendant's motion for a nonsuit, made, as here, at the conclusion of plaintiff's evidence, and that error was the one principally considered; and it was held that the court erred in not granting it, and that, as there was nothing in the subsequent evidence which in any manner strengthened the plaintiff's case, the subsequent decision of the jury did not cure the error. The decision upon the former appeal therefore became the law of the case, unless the evidence upon the second trial was so far different as to require a different conclusion. The court below thought it did not, and in that we agree.

Some exceptions to rulings upon the cross-examination of the plaintiff were taken, which remain to be noticed: Prior to the first trial of the case the deposition of the plaintiff was taken, and what was said by counsel for defendant to be such deposition was used upon the last trial upon cross-examination of the plaintiff, but the alleged deposition was not put in evidence. The plaintiff, however, admitted the signature to be his, and that he recollected "appearing before a notary public and giving his testimony." No objection was made upon the ground that the paper was not, or was not shown to be, the deposition of the witness. The examination consisted of reading from the deposition certain questions and answers, and asking whether he so testified, and whether such answers were true; whether his recollection of the matters testified to in the deposition was better at that time than at the present. To some of these questions the objection was made that the time to which the questions were directed was uncertain, and to one the additional objection that it was irrelevant and immaterial. The general purpose of the examination here referred to was to show that plaintiff was familiar with the condition of the sidewalk in question at and prior to the accident. The American Eagle Hotel was situated in the vicinity of the place of the accident, and (reading from the deposition) he was asked: "Were you in the habit of going to the American Eagle Hotel frequently? Answer. Every day, nearly,—frequently every day." And after reading said question and answer he was asked, "Was that true?" and thereupon said objection was made. It was clearly relevant to show that plaintiff was familiar with the place where the accident occurred, and knew of any danger that might exist which was open to observation, as the danger in question undoubtedly was. As to the supposed uncertainty as to the time to which the question related, his answer shows that he was not misled. It was as follows: "I do not recollect going there after the accident. I was not able to go out around. After the accident occurred I took my meals down at my room,"—thus showing clearly that his answer, as read from the deposition, that he went to the hotel frequently,—every day, nearly,—related to the time before the accident; nor do we find any answer of the witness that indicates that he was misled, or misunderstood the time to which the question related. It is also called to our attention by counsel that the deposition was not introduced in evidence. It was not incumbent upon the defendant to introduce it in evidence. It was competent for the plaintiff to re-examine the witness as to any portions of the deposition material to the matters called out by the cross-examination, and thus to correct any possible misapprehension of the witness. We find no error requiring a reversal of the judgment, and advise that it be affirmed.

We concur: GRAY, C.; CHIPMAN, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is affirmed.

SANCHEZ v. FORSTER et al. (L. A. 872.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 10, 1901.)

ADMINISTRATORS—DEBT TO ESTATE—LIABILITY ON BOND—TENDER.

1. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1615, providing that no administrator is accountable for any debt due the decedent which remains uncollected without his fault, the sureties on an administrator's bond are liable for only so much of a debt which he owed deceased as could have been collected from him, since section 1447, requiring an executor to inventory and account for any debt which he owed deceased as for so much money in his hands, applies only to executors.

2. Where an administrator, who is also an heir, owes the estate more than the value of his distributive share, he should account for such share as a payment on the debt, and, if he fails to do so, the amount may be collected of his bondsmen.

3. An administrator, who was also an heir, owed the deceased more than the value of his distributive share of the estate. Without paying his debt, he conveyed his share to his bondsmen, and also failed to account for money which he had received. At the trial of the action on his bond, the sureties offered to convey to his successor the property so conveyed to them in full settlement of their liability. Held, that the offer was properly refused, since it did not include an offer to pay the sum received by their principal, for which he had failed to account.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Orange county; J. W. Bullard, Judge.

Action by Francisco Sanchez, administrator of the estate of Thomas A. Yorba, deceased, against M. A. Forster and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Scarborough, Matthews & Forgy and F. O. Daniel, for appellants. Geo. D. Blake, Victor Montgomery, and Mr. Brousseau, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. Defendants, who are appellants, prosecute this appeal from the judgment and order denying their motion for a new trial. The plaintiff, as administrator of the estate of Thomas A. Yorba, deceased, brings this action against appellants, who are sureties upon the bond of Felipe Yorba, the former administrator of said estate, to recover money alleged to be due the estate from said former administrator. These appellants were sureties upon his bond in the sum of $2,000, and judgment has been rendered against them in that sum. At the time of the appointment of Felipe Yorba as administrator he was indebted to the estate of Thomas Yorba, deceased, in the sum of $6,000. It is also conceded that he failed to account to the present administrator in the sum of $685.95 coming to his hands as administrator. No part of these debts has ever been paid. The court is well satisfied that the sureties upon an administrator's bond are in no sense guarantors of a debt owed by the administrator to the deceased in his lifetime. In view of the provisions of section 1447 of the Code of Civil Procedure, taken in connection with principles of equitable estoppel presented by the facts of that particular case, a contrary rule was held as to executors in Treweek v. Howard, 105 Cal. 434, 39 Pac. 20. But neither the aforesaid section of the Code nor any other section applies the same restrictions to administrators. This court is not called upon to declare what the common-law rule is in such a case, for section 1615 of the Code of Civil Procedure declares: "No executor or administrator is accountable for any debts due to the decedent, if it appears that they remain uncollected without his fault." This rule of law applies to the debt of an administrator equally with that of any other person, and, as before suggested, the special restrictions upon executors, as declared in said section 1447, are not made applicable to administrators. The true rule governing the liability of sureties of administrators in such cases is declared in Lyon v. Osgood, 58 Vt. 707, 7 Atl. 5; and that decision has been approved by this court in the late case of In re Walker's Estate, 125 Cal. 242, 57 Pac. 991.

The liability of these appellants for the debt of the administrator depends upon the fact as to whether or not the debt was uncollected through his fault. Or, bringing the question directly to the door of the administrator, it may be said his sureties are liable if, during his administration of the estate, he had the financial ability to pay the debt and failed to do so. As to his financial ability to pay the debt, the trial court found as a fact that his interest in the estate, of which he was administrator, was of the value of $2,000. In support of the judgment rendered it must be assumed that his net interest in the estate of deceased was of the value of $2,000. As we have seen, these sureties, aside from the financial ability of the administrator, were liable for about $700, for unaccounted money coming into his hands. Thus, as to them, this interest of the administrator in the estate was only required to satisfy about $1,300 of his debt; and, this being so, it will be held that, through the medium of his interest in the estate, he should have paid at least $1,300 of the debt, and, having failed to do so, his sureties are responsible for his failure. In view of the findings of the court as to the net value of his interest in the estate, no importance is attached to the fact that his assets consisted of an undistributed share thereof. The case stands the same as though he owned in entirety the fee to a tract of land of the same value.

Previous to the trial in the superior court the former administrator by conveyance transferred his interest in the estate to these appellants; and the point is now made that, during the progress of the trial, they offered to deed the interest acquired by them from their principal to plaintiff in consideration of a full release of their liability upon the bond. As to this offer it is only necessary to say that appellants, beyond this question of the administrator's interest in the estate, admit a liability of about $700, and this of itself justified plaintiff in declining the offer. For the foregoing reasons, the judgment and order are affirmed.

PEOPLE ex rel. ATTORNEY GENERAL v.
STOCKTON SAVINGS & LOAN
SOC. (Sac. 768.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 10, 1901.)
CORPORATIONS—REAL ESTATE—HOLDING FIVE YEARS—ESCHEAT.

Under Const. art. 12, § 9, providing that no corporation shall hold for a longer period than five years any real estate not necessary for carrying on its business, and Civ. Code, § 574, that savings and loan associations may purchase real estate at sales under mortgages made for their benefit, but must sell such real estate within five years, real estate so purchased does not escheat to the state at the expiration of five years, if not then sold.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county; Edward I. Jones, Judge.

Action by the people of the state of California, on the information of the attorney general, against the Stockton Savings & Loan Society. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Tirey L. Ford, Atty. Gen., and J. F. Ramage, for appellant. Nicol, Orr & Nutter, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. The object of this action is to escheat to the state certain lands in San Joaquin county, alleged to be held by defendant, a corporation. The complaint alleges that the defendant acquired at trustee's sale, made pursuant to the provisions of a certain deed of trust, these lands; that more than five years have elapsed since defendant acquired title thereto, and said lands have not been sold. The sufficiency of the complaint is the only question before the court.

The action is based upon section 9, art. 12, of the constitution of the state, which provides: "No corporation shall engage in any business other than that expressly authorized in its charter, or the law under which it may have been or may hereafter be organized; nor shall it hold for a longer period than five years any real estate, except such as may be necessary for carrying on its business." It is asserted by appellant that, this provision of the constitution being mandatory and prohibitory, it follows therefrom that defendant's title to these lands was cut off instantaneously upon the expiration of the five-year period, and, as a necessary result therefrom, the land escheated to the state. The court fails to see how the declaration of the constitution, to the effect that this provision is mandatory and prohibitory, accomplishes an escheat under the facts of this case. The provision of the instrument says nothing whatever about escheats. Escheats and forfeitures are not favored by the law, and why some penalty other than an escheat should not be declared to follow a violation of this provision of the constitution is not made plain. The provision itself wholly fails to declare what results follow if it be violated, and for this reason it would seem that the legislature has the power to prescribe penalties for its violation. There appears nothing in the provision so self-executing as to deny that power. A provision of the Pennsylvania constitution, similar in principle to that here involved, was before the appellate court of that state in Com. v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co., 132 Pa. 605, 19 Atl. 291, and the court there said: "It will be noticed that this clause in the constitution affixes no penalty for its violation. It is conceded that for a violation of the organic law a Pennsylvania corporation, or a foreign corporation having or exercising corporate franchises within this commonwealth, would forfeit such franchises. This, however, would not involve an escheat or confiscation of its property. For present purposes we must regard this constitutional provision as out of the case. The question here is whether the real estate in controversy is liable to escheat. This is not a proceeding to forfeit the company's franchises, but to escheat its lands."

As to savings and loan societies, this provision of the constitution is given a legislative construction by section 574 of the Civil Code, wherein it is provided: "Savings and loan corporations may purchase, hold and convey real and personal property as follows: * * * (4) No such corporation must purchase, hold or convey real estate in any other case or for any other purpose; and all real estate described in subdivision 3 of this section must be sold by the corporation within five years after the title thereto is vested in it by purchase or otherwise." Subdivision 3 relates to real estate purchased by the corporation under pledges, mortgages, or deeds of trust made for its benefit. It is here provided that the lands must be sold within five years after title has vested; and the court feels satisfied that such is the purpose and tenor of the constitutional provision, when it declares that a corporation shall not hold certain classes of real estate for a longer period than five years. In other words, the constitutional provision declares that this character of real estate shall be sold within the five-year period. If the corporation does not sell, as commanded by the constitution, penalties may be provided by the legislature for its failure so to do, or possibly some judicial procedure might be invoked, compelling a sale of the land, or a forfeiture of its franchise might possibly be judicially declared. For the foregoing reasons the judgment is affirmed.

HUNTER v. MILAM. (L. A. 742.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 8, 1901.)

APPEAL—QUESTIONS CONSIDERED—FINDINGS —EVIDENCE—IMMATERIAL ERROR.

1. On an appeal from an order denying a new trial, the court cannot inquire whether the findings support the judgment, but can consider only attacks made on the findings as not supported by the evidence and alleged errors of law occurring during the trial to which exceptions were taken.

2. A finding that on a certain day a marriage was solemnized between the parties and a certificate of marriage recorded is not in conflict with evidence that defendant was then the wife of another man.

3. A finding that for more than ten years after plaintiff had deeded land to defendant he suffered the legal title and exclusive possession to remain in her is not objectionable, as not supported by the evidence, because, as another finding shows, for the first five years they occupied the land together, since a consideration of both findings shows that the ten years of exclusive possession referred to were after such five years.

4. Where judgment is rendered against plaintiff on the ground of his laches and limitations, a new trial should not be granted for error in the admission of evidence which does not affect such grounds.

5. Where, both before and after the court erroneously sustained an objection to a question as to plaintiff's intention in executing a deed, he fully explained his reasons for executing it, the error was cured, and a new trial should not be granted on that ground.

Department 2. Appeal from the superior court. Los Angeles county; M. T. Allen, Judge.

Action by Jesse Hunter against Jane Elizabeth Milam. Judgment in favor of defendant. From an order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

Knight & Harpham and Works & Lee, for appellant. Goodrich & McCutchen, Ben Goodrich, and S. A. Carver, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an action to have set aside and declared void two deeds executed by plaintiff to defendant conveying to the latter a certain lot of land, and to quiet plaintiff's title thereto. Judgment went for defendant, and plaintiff appeals from an order denying his motion for a new trial. He also attempted to appeal from the judgment, but such attempted appeal was taken too late and cannot be considered. The first deed was executed and delivered to respondent on December 28, 1878, and was on that day recorded, and by it the land was conveyed to respondent in fee simple. The second deed was executed and delivered April 4, 1884, and conveyed the same land to respondent during her natural life, "and, in case she survives said party of the first part, then to her and her heirs and assigns, forever," and was also on the day of its execution duly recorded. This action was commenced on February 14, 1896, which was nearly 18 years after the execution and recordation of the first deed, and over 12 years after the execution and recordation of the second deed. The decision of the court below was based, among other things, on the laches of plaintiff and the bar of the statute of limitations under subdivision 4 of section 338, Code Civ. Proc. A marriage was solemnized between plaintiff and respondent on July 3, 1862, and they lived together as husband and wife from that time until the year 1883, when they separated. It may be briefly stated, for a general understanding of the case, that appellant contends that the marriage was not valid for the alleged reason that some 4 or 5 years before its solemnization respondent had been married to one Joseph Milam, who was then still alive, and she had not been divorced from him; that appellant did not know these facts, and supposed that his marriage to respondent was valid, until some time in the year 1883; that he made the first deed supposing that respondent was his legal wife, and would not otherwise have made it; and that he made the second deed with the understanding that respondent would destroy the first deed. All these alleged facts respondent denied.

A great deal of appellant's argument is directed to the point that the judgment is erroneous as a matter of law; but, as there is no appeal from the judgment, we can only consider attacks made upon the findings as not supported by the evidence, and alleged errors of law occurring during the trial to which exceptions were taken. We cannot inquire whether or not the findings support the judgment. There are only two attempted specifications of the particulars in which the findings are not sustained by the evidence. It is specified, first, as follows: "The evidence is insufficient to justify the first finding, because the evidence shows that on the 3d day of July, 1862, the defendant was the wife of one Joseph Milam and was incompetent to enter into a marriage with plaintiff." Assuming that this is a sufficient specification, the said first finding is merely to the effect that on July 3, 1862, a marriage was solemnized between the parties and the certificate of marriage recorded, which facts were proven and not disputed. The second specification is that "the evidence is insufficient to justify the tenth finding, because the evidence shows," etc. The only part of the tenth finding which is vulnerable to this attack is that in which it is found that plaintiff "for more than 10 years thereafter suffered the legal title and exclusive possession to remain in defendant"; and this part of it is certainly supported by the evidence, with the exception, perhaps, of the expression "and exclusive possession." It is not quite clear as to which 10 years are referred to; but it is clear that the court did not mean that during the 10 years immediately following the date of the first deed defendant was in the exclusive possession, in the sense that plaintiff did not live with her on the premises, for in the fifth finding the court finds that "soon after the execution of this deed [the first one] plaintiff and defendant moved upon the premises described in the complaint as their home, and continued to occupy the same as a family residence until 1883." It is therefore immaterial how the said expression used in the tenth finding should be construed. The two findings taken together show the real facts.

As to errors of law occurring at the trial, the main one is the alleged error in admitting in evidence the judgment roll in a former case of the present plaintiff against the present defendant, described as "Jane Elizabeth Milam, sometimes known as Jane Elizabeth Hunter." That action was brought in August, 1892, to have annulled the marriage between plaintiff and defendant. The case was tried in the superior court, and judgment was rendered for defendant,—the court holding that the marriage was valid; and upon appeal to this court the judgment was affirmed. See 111 Cal. 261, 43 Pac. 756, 31 L. R. A. 411. The objection urged is that the judgment in that case does not estop appellant from again asserting the invalidity of the marriage; but, if that be admitted, it does not follow that the judgment roll was not admissible for any purpose. But, even if erroneously admitted, it would not affect the ground of laches and statute of limitations on which the judgment was based; neither, in this view, is it of consequence that the court found as a matter of law that the judgment was an estoppel as to the validity of the marriage. The only other exception to the rulings upon admissibility of evidence is to the sustaining of an objection of respondent to a question asked appellant on the witness stand as to his intention in executing the second deed. This ruling could have done no harm, for appellant, both before and after this question, fully explained what his reasons were for making the second deed. The foregoing are all the matters of any consequence which are presented on the appeal from the order denying a new trial. It may be noticed, however, that the finding "that by said deed of December 28, 1878, defendant became vested with an absolute title in fee simple to said premises" is clearly one of the conclusions of law among which it properly appears in the record. No doubt a finding of title is in some connections a finding of fact, but not so in the case at bar, where it is a mere conclusion from the facts already found. Society v. Burnett, 106 Cal. 514, 39 Pac. 922.

The appeal from the judgment is dismissed, and the order denying a new trial is affirmed.

APPEAL—FILING TRANSCRIPT—MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL—EXECUTOR'S ACCOUNT
—PROBATE ORDER.

1. Where, on appeal from an order of the superior court sitting in probate, settling the annual account of an executor, no transcript is filed in 40 days, the appeal should be dismissed, though appellant moved for a new trial, and filed a statement on such motion, which was not settled during the 40 days, since the provisions of Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1713, 1714, 1716, 1717, relating to new trials, apply only where issues are formed, and to cases not otherwise provided for; and no issue is formed by objections to an account.

2. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 950, providing that a statement on motion for new trial may be used on appeal from a final judgment, such statement cannot be used on appeal from an order settling an account of an executor, since such order is not a final judgment.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Santa Barbara county; B. T. Williams, Judge.

Appeal from an order settling an annual account of the executor of the will of William A. Franklin, deceased. Dismissed.

Canfield & Starbuck, for appellants. B. F. Thomas, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This case is before us on a motion of respondent to dismiss the appeal taken by appellants from an order of the superior court sitting in probate, settling the first annual account of the executrix. The motion is on the ground that no transcript on appeal has been filed within the 40 days allowed by the rule of this court.

It is admitted by appellants that the transcript has not been filed within the 40 days; but they set up as their answer to the motion that, after the order settling the account had been made, they moved for a new trial, and filed a statement on their motion for a new trial; that the statement has not yet been settled; and that, therefore, their time has not expired under the rule. We think that the proceeding of a motion for a new trial does not apply to a probate order settling the annual account of an executrix. It was so declared in Re Sanderson's Estate, 74 Cal. 199, 15 Pac. 753, and it has never since been directly held otherwise. That case was an appeal from an order settling the accounts of the executor; and Mr. Justice McKinstry, in delivering the opinion of the court, after reviewing the subject quite fully, with reference to sections 1716 and 1717 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and alluding to In re Moore's Estate, 72 Cal. 335, 13 Pac. 880, and to remarks made in re Herteman's Estate, 73 Cal. 545, 15 Pac. 121, says: "By sections 1713 and 1714, the provisions of part 2 of the Code (relating to proceedings in ordinary actions) do not constitute the rules of practice in probate proceedings when 'it is otherwise provided'; and the provisions of part 2 (relating to new trials and appeals) are not applicable when 'inconsistent' with the provisions of the title in which the sections are found. A mode and manner of settling accounts of executors and administrators is specially provided, which, if followed, is inconsistent with the provisions relating to new trials." And, again, he says: "Are sections 1716 and 1717 to be read as commanding the proceedings set forth in section 1312, Code Civ. Proc., and those which immediately follow it, to be resorted to whenever an account is settled? In Re Moore's Estate, supra, the question was fully considered and discussed by Justice Temple, and the question above stated was answered in the negative." The case of In re Moore, supra, was substantially to the same effect; for, while the decision there went directly only to the point that there is no right to a jury trial in the matter of settling an administrator's account, yet the reasoning clearly included motions for a new trial. The court called attention to the opportunity which an opposite construction would give a litigious person to indefinitely postpone the settlement of an estate, and concluded that the operation of sections 1716 and 1717 should be confined "to those cases in which the Code has expressly authorized issues of fact to be framed"; and, of course, necessarily held that settling the account of an executor or administrator was not one of those cases. In Re Sanderson's Estate, supra, the court said that under sections 1716 and 1717 "exceptions to an account do not create 'issues of fact joined,' such as must be submitted to a jury"; and, if not, then such exceptions do not, under said sections, give the right to a motion for a new trial. The point here in question was not involved in either In re Bauquier's Estate, 88 Cal. 302, 26 Pac. 178, 532, or Leach v. Pierce, 93 Cal. 624, 29 Pac. 233. In the Bauquier Case the only question involved was whether a motion for a new trial was proper in a proceeding inaugurated by the written petition of appellant therein for the probate of a certain will, and her appointment as executrix thereunder, and written opposition to her appointment on the ground of incompetency; and it was held that, as the action of the court was invoked as to matters of fact which were "presented to it for determination in the form of pleadings" a motion for a new trial was the proper proceeding. But it was said in that case, "It would be impossible to enumerate the cases in which a motion for a new trial is appropriate in probate proceedings." In Leach v. Pierce it was held that a motion for a new trial was proper where the contest was over a petition for the sale of real property of an estate, because under the provisions of the Code on that subject, as in the Bauquier Case, there were issues of fact presented in the form of pleadings. But in another appeal in the same case, reported in the same volume (93 Cal.) at page 614, 29 Pac. 235, the decision being subsequent to that in the Bauquier Case, it was held that a motion for new trial was not allowable on a contest for family allowance. The court there said that "it was evidently the intention of those who framed and adopted the provisions of the Code relative to probate proceedings to curtail dilatory proceedings in the settlement of estates." The court further said: "It is not necessary, however, in this case to lay down a rule of universal application, and all we decide is that in the matter before us proceedings for a new trial were not authorized. It is better, perhaps, to follow the suggestion of Mr. Justice Miller in Davidson v. City of New Orleans, 96 U. S. 104, 24 L. Ed. 616, to ascertain the intent and proper application of the provisions bearing upon the subject 'by the gradual process of judicial inclusion and exclusion, as the cases presented for decision shall require.'" Reference is made in the opinion to In re Moore's Estate, supra, and In re Herteman's Estate, 73 Cal. 545, 15 Pac. 121. In the Herteman Case the appeal was from an order settling an administrator's account, and the court below had refused to settle the statement on motion for a new trial on the ground that such a proceeding was not allowable; but it was held that such action of the lower court could not be reviewed here on a general appeal of the case, but could be reached only on mandamus; and thus the question of the right to move for a new trial was not directly determined. But the court said: "It may be remarked, however, that it is doubtful if the true construction of that part of the Code of Civil Procedure relating to probate matters is that every contested motion in probate proceedings assumes the character of a civil action, with all the attendants of a right to a jury trial, motion for new trial, etc. Such a construction would greatly confuse and prolong the settlement of estates,—a matter already sufficiently complicated. The subject is discussed to some extent in the opinion of Mr. Justice Temple in the case of In re Moore's Estate, 72 Cal. 335, 13 Pac. 880, and there are reasons for holding that the suggestions there made should be adopted as expressive of the true meaning of the Code." And so, while the right to move for a new trial on an order settling an account has never been directly passed upon since the decisions in Re Moore's Estate and in Re Sanderson's Estate, the tendency has been to prevent that unnecessary delay in the administration of estates which would be caused by allowing all the machinery of a civil action to be used in ordinary probate proceedings. Of course, the Code expressly provides for a jury trial, and motion for new trial, in contests of wills; but, in addition to that, the right to move for a new trial has been extended in probate matters to only two cases, to wit, a contest over a petition for letters testamentary in the Bauquier Case, and a petition for the sale of land in Leach v. Pierce. While it is not necessary to inquire here whether there is any other probate proceeding in which a motion for a new trial would be allowable, it is sufficient to say that we do not think it applicable to an order settling an account. As was pointed out in the Sanderson and Moore Cases, above cited, it is the duty of the court of its own motion to carefully scrutinize all accounts, and to reject all claims of the executor which are illegal or unjust. In the Sanderson Case it was said: "The court might possibly overlook particular objections which were not called to its attention, and the exceptions are permitted in aid of the court when performing its duty of making the account correct." The mere fact that parties may file such exception does not bring the right here claimed within the cases of Bauquier and Leach v. Pierce.

2. Moreover, a statement on motion for a new trial can be used on another appeal only when such appeal is "from a final judgment" (Code Civ. Proc. § 950); and an order settling a final account is not a final judgment, within the meaning of section 963, which prescribes the judgments and orders from which appeals may be taken. That section has three subdivisions. The first provides that an appeal may be taken "from a final judgment entered in an action or special proceeding commenced in a superior court, or brought into a superior court from another court"; the second provides for appeals from various orders and interlocutory judgments rendered in ordinary civil actions; and the third, from judgments and orders in probate proceedings, including an appeal from an order "settling an account of an executor." And the general rule is well established that appeals can only be taken from such judgments or orders in probate matters as are mentioned in this subdivision. In re Walkerly's Estate, 94 Cal. 352, 29 Pac. 719, and cases there cited. The "appeal from a final judgment" mentioned in section 950 clearly means only the appeal "from a final judgment" mentioned in subdivision 1 of section 963, and does not include appeals in probate matters, which are provided for in a different category by subdivision 3. In Re Callaghan's Estate, 60 Cal. 232, an appeal had been taken from a probate order, which was not appealable under subdivision 3, and it was sought to maintain the appeal as one taken from a "special order made after final judgment," under subdivision 2; but the court said: "We think that the final judgment there referred to is the one mentioned in subdivision 1, to wit, 'a final judgment in an action or special proceeding commenced in a superior court, or brought into a superior court from another court.'" The motion is granted, and the appeal is dismissed.

SPENCER v. TROUTT, Judge. (S. F. 2,795.)
(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 8, 1901.)

JUDGMENT—PREMATURE APPEAL—SECOND APPEAL—MANDAMUS.

Petitioner was one of defendants in an action in which judgment was entered for plaintiff, from which all defendants appealed. After affirmance of the judgment and remittitur, it was discovered that petitioner's name was accidentally omitted from the judgment, and on motion the judgment was amended nunc pro tunc by inserting his name. On refusal of the judge to fix the amount of a stay bond on appeal from the judgment as so amended, he applied for mandamus to compel such action. Held, that the writ should issue, since, the judgment being incomplete as to petitioner when the first appeal was taken, such proceedings were void as to him, and did not affect his right to appeal when the judgment was finally completed.

McFarland, J., dissenting.

In bank. Proceedings for mandamus by David J. Spencer against James M. Troutt, judge of the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco. Writ issued.

T. M. Osmont, for petitioner. Naphtaly, Freidenrich & Ackerman and W. B. Kollmeyer, for respondent.

TEMPLE, J. This is a proceeding for a writ of mandate to require the respondent to determine the amount of a stay bond on an appeal from a judgment for the possession of land rendered against the petitioner. The judgment was rendered in an action brought by Julius Baum, now deceased, against petitioner and Edward Roper and Kate Roper, wife of said Edward Roper. Respondent's answer, which was admitted to be in all respects true, shows that on the 6th day of February, 1897, a decision was rendered in said cause as follows: "That plaintiff is entitled to a judgment that plaintiff do have and recover of and from the defendants, Edward Roper, John W. Roberts, as administrator of Kate Roper, deceased, and David Spencer, the possession of all the lands described in the amended and supplemental complaint," etc. At the same time findings were filed, and judgment therein was entered in the judgment book February 10, 1897. Subsequently the defendants, including the petitioner, prepared, had settled, and engrossed, a statement on motion for a new trial, and took all the proceedings required to enable them to submit the motion for decision. The motion was so submitted, and was denied. Thereupon petitioner, with his co-defendants, appealed from the order to this court. In the same mode he took an appeal from the judgment, and bonds were given by petitioner and the other defendants on each appeal. The appeals were duly presented to the court by the appellants, and, having been decided adversely to petitioner, he asked for a rehearing in bank. The rehearing was denied. After filing the remittitur in the court below, it was discovered that in the judgment as entered the name of petitioner was omitted. Application was then made to amend the entry by inserting the name of petitioner. This was done by what is called a "nunc pro tunc order," giving the amended record the date of the former record. Petitioner then took steps for a new appeal from the judgment, claiming that the former appeal was, as to him, void, as prematurely taken. In that view he applied to respondent to fix the amount of a stay bond on appeal from the judgment, which application was denied, and hence this proceeding.

It may be taken for granted that, if petitioner then had a right to appeal, it was the duty of respondent to grant the application. Several points are made here in justification of the refusal to determine the amount of the stay bond.

1. If the judgment was properly entered at the time of the first imperfect record, the time allowed by statute for taking an appeal had expired. It is contended that the amendment was the correction of a clerical misprision, and did not extend the time to appeal. But, if the petitioner could not have taken an appeal from the judgment as first entered, the amendment was quite material. It would hardly be contended that the judgment could be so entered, and the record amended after the time for appeal had expired, and thereby a party be deprived of the right to appeal altogether. The time allowed for an appeal commences to run from the time of the actual entry of the judgment. The order amending the record shows that judgment was not actually entered against the petitioner until May 29, 1901. It hardly requires argument or authority to establish the proposition that a court cannot, by antedating an order, or the entry of it, cut off the right of a party to move for a new trial, to move to set the judgment aside, or to appeal. These rights given by the Code of Civil Procedure cannot be lost to a party by such action, whether the effect was designed or not. The test as to whether the period in which the party must act in order to get relief from an order or judgment against him must be whether he could have obtained the desired relief (on a proper showing) before the nunc pro tunc order was made. Could he have made his application, as the judgment, order, or record was?

2. And this brings us to the next point, that petitioner has had his appeal. He has been heard as fully as he could have been had the judgment been entered against him in the first instance, as evidently he assumed it had been; and, having had all the advantages of an appeal, and the time and attention of the trial and appellate courts in the consideration of his alleged grievances, it is contended he is estopped thereby. If it were a new question, this contention would deserve very serious consideration. The judgment had been rendered, and, unless stayed, might have been enforced. The cause was within the appellate jurisdiction of this court, but the steps prescribed by statute for bringing it to the cognizance of the court had not been taken. It might well have been said that an objection to an appeal before the judgment was actually entered was in the nature of a plea in abatement, an objection which could be waived, and which would be conclusively held to have been waived unless promptly raised. In such case the proceedings on appeal and the judgment rendered by this court could not be questioned. But a different view has been taken in several cases, and it has been held that an appeal taken before the entry of the judgment is a nullity, and the judgment entered here on such appeal is void. This conclusion seems to have been based largely upon the necessity of a rule by which it can be determined whether the trial court still retains jurisdiction of the case. In the case of Brady v. Burke, 90 Cal. 1, 27 Pac. 52, an appeal was in form taken from a decree foreclosing a street assessment lien. The appeal was taken after a decree had been signed and filed, but before it had been entered. After the attempted appeal, and while, conceding the validity of the appeal, it was pending in the supreme court, the lower court made and caused to be entered a new decree essentially different from the first. A sale was had under the last decree, and the purchaser brought suit to quiet his title. Objection was made that the decree under which the sale was made was void, because an appeal had been taken, and was pending when the last decree was made and entered, and therefore the lower court had lost jurisdiction. This would have been the case had the appeal been valid. But it was held that "the appeal was futile, and the case remained in the lower court undisturbed." In Re Devincenzi's Estate (Cal.) 63 Pac. 723, an appeal was taken from an order refusing to confirm an administrator's sale, and declaring it to be null and void. The supreme court reversed the order, and directed the probate court to enter an order confirming the sale, which the probate court did. An appeal was also taken from this order or judgment, and it was contended that the first appeal was ineffectual for any purpose, because taken before the order vacating the sale had been entered. Therefore the first order of the probate court vacating the sale still stood in full force, and the court had no jurisdiction to enter the order confirming the sale, even though expressly ordered to do so by this court by its judgment entered on the attempted appeal. The contention was sustained here, this court saying that, the appeal being unauthorized, "the order was not vacated by such direction, but remained in as full force as if no appeal therefrom had ever been attempted." According to these decisions, the want of jurisdiction in this court over a premature appeal is absolute, and, as consent cannot confer jurisdiction, the defect cannot be waived. It is argued, however, that this case may be differentiated from those cases, because here a judgment was entered, and the only question which could have been presented would have been that petitioner was not an aggrieved party, and that could be waived. That seems to be a case of petitio principii. If the record on appeal showed that the appellant was not entitled to appeal, the judgment here would have no validity. But the test is, I believe, as stated under the first point, could petitioner, against objection, have maintained an appeal from the judgment as first entered? Certainly, I think, he could not. No judgment against him had been entered. I fail to see how the fact that it was entered against his co-defendants is of importance. Such fact would not have prevented a dismissal of his appeal on motion of respondent. He was not aggrieved by the judgment against his co-defendants. The cases of Society v. Horton, 63 Cal. 310, and Fallon v. Brittan, 84 Cal. 511, 24 Pac. 381, do not help respondent. In neither case was there a jurisdictional question, and in both a judgment had been entered from which an appeal could have been taken, and the modifications made by the nunc pro tunc orders were immaterial so far as the appeals were concerned. The case of Marshall v. Taylor, 97 Cal. 422, 32 Pac. 515, does not touch this question. There was no appeal from the judgment, and the record was not, as counsel suppose, corrected after an appeal taken. The appeal was from the nunc pro tunc order. Let the writ issue as prayed.

We concur: BEATTY, C. J.; GAROUTTE, J.; VAN DYKE, J.; HENSHAW, J.

McFARLAND, J. I dissent. Of course, after petitioner has had the advantage of one appeal, in which all the merits of his case were fully presented, there is no justice in allowing him another appeal of the identical same kind, and I think that the law does not imperatively demand a ruling which allows him such double appeal. I think that the case at bar is distinguishable from Brady v. Burke, 90 Cal. 1, 27 Pac. 52, and In re Devincenzi's Estate (Cal.) 63 Pac. 723. They present the naked case of a notice of appeal before any pretense of the entry of the judgment or order attempted to be appealed from.

In the case at bar the judgment appealed from had been entered before the appeal was taken. The findings and decision of the court show what the judgment should be, and direct it to be so entered. The clerk entered the judgment in accordance with the decision in all respects except this one; when writing the names of the defendants against whom the judgment was ordered he omitted, by a clerical mistake, the name of the defendant who is now here petitioner. The record, on its face, clearly shows the mistake, and it could have been amended at any time so as to express the decision and direction of the court. This the petitioner is presumed to have known; and, with this knowledge, he, with the other defendants, appealed from the judgment, and on the appeal presented and argued the entire merits of the case as if the clerk had already entered the judgment as he should have entered it, and as he could at any moment have been compelled to enter it. Petitioner assumed that to have been done which should have been done. The record showed that the judgment was substantially a judgment against him; for it was always, on its face, subject to the amendment which would make the judgment express the decision. The judgment, therefore, even as it stood, was a menace to petitioner, and he was a party aggrieved thereby, with the right of appeal; and, having appealed once, he had no right to the same appeal the second time. I think that the petition for the writ should be denied.

2. Plaintiffs owned certain land and certain shares in an irrigating company, entitling them to water at specified times. They mortgaged the land and pledged the shares to defendant, and the shares appeared on the company's books as owned by defendant. Plaintiffs failed to pay interest, and refused to pay the water rates on the ground that the shares belonged to defendant. Defendant directed his agent, if the disclaimer of ownership and refusal to pay was persisted in, to notify the company to turn off the water, which was done. The court charged that, in turning off the water under defendant's direction, the company was his agent, and if plaintiffs, before the water was turned off, notified the company that they claimed ownership of the shares, the knowledge so received by such agent of their retraction of the disclaimer of ownership was notice to defendant, and that such a notice would put defendant on inquiry. Held, that such charge was erroneous, since the company was not the agent of defendant.

3. In an action to recover for wrongfully diverting water from plaintiff's land, defendant requested a charge that if, prior to the diversion of the water, plaintiff knew there were assessments due and unpaid, and refused to pay them, and disclaimed ownership of the stock, and that defendant in good faith, acting on such disclaimer of ownership, directed the irrigating company to divert the water, then plaintiff cannot recover. Held erroneously refused.

4. Where, in an action to recover for wrongfully diverting water from plaintiff's land, the complaint asked for punitive damages, and several instructions given at plaintiff's request contain intimations looking towards punitive damages, but the case did not justify such allowance, it was error to refuse to charge expressly that such damages could not be allowed, and the error was not cured by a charge that only compensatory damages should be awarded.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; John L. Campbell, Judge.

Action by J. J. Mabb and wife against Lyman Stewart and another. From a judgment for plaintiffs against defendant Stewart, and from an order denying a new trial, he appeals. Reversed.

Otis & Gregg and E. H. Jolliffe, for appellant. J. L. Murphy, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. Plaintiffs, husband and wife, allege that they were the owners of ten acres of land in the Ontario colony, and the owners of ten shares of water stock of the San Antonio Water Company; that by virtue of their ownership of this water stock they were entitled for use upon their land, to a certain amount of water, supplied by the San Antonio Water Company. This water was divided among the shareholders of the San Antonio Water Company in proportion to the number of their shares, and to the amount of water which from time to time the company had available for the purposes of distribution. They allege that they had complied with all the rules and regulations of the company, and were not in default with the company in any particular. In August, when the orchard of fruit-bearing trees upon their land was greatly in need of water, and upon a day in August when plaintiffs were of right entitled to use water, the defendants, without right, for the purpose of injuring plaintiffs and of destroying their orchard, shut off the water and prevented it from flowing upon their lands, and diverted it and used it upon other lands below. Plaintiffs, though making diligent inquiry, were unable to procure any other supply of water until some time afterwards; but before they were able so to do, by reason of the unlawful acts of defendants, their orchard, trees, and premises were injured to the amount of $5,000. The second count charges upon the same facts, but avers additionally that plaintiffs were also obliged to borrow water for domestic use; that defendants well knew that this would be the result of their acts, and at the time intended and expected that plaintiffs would suffer inconvenience, loss, and humiliation thereby, which in fact they did suffer; and that the acts of the defendants so committed without right were done willfully and maliciously and with intent to injure. Judgment was prayed for in the sum of $5,215. The case was tried before a jury. A nonsuit was granted in favor of the San Antonio Water Company, defendant, and verdict by the jury in favor of plaintiffs against the defendant Lyman Stewart was rendered in the sum of $2,500. From the judgment which followed, and from the order of the court denying defendant Stewart's motion for a new trial, he appeals.

His first contention here is upon the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the judgment. Upon this proposition it is argued that plaintiffs were not damaged at all, or, if damaged at all, damaged to a trifling amount, and that whatever damage might have resulted to them was not occasioned by any wrongful act of defendant. The San Antonio Water Company, as has been said, issued its stock to owners of land, who thereby became entitled to the use of a certain amount of water, depending upon their number of shares and the amount of the water supply. With the plaintiffs' land went ten shares of this water stock, one share per acre. Plaintiffs had mortgaged their land and this water stock to defendant Stewart. Upon the books of the corporation Stewart appeared as the owner of the stock. Differences arose between Stewart and his mortgagors over payments of interest upon the mortgage and assessments of water stock, which differences involved the question of the ownership of the water stock itself. These differences resulted in Stewart giving instructions to the water company to cut off the supply of water from plaintiffs' land. Plaintiffs had been accustomed to receive about the 7th day of each month, for a space of 12 hours, a head of water amounting to about 20 inches measured under a 4-inch pressure. Upon the 7th day of August the water was turned upon their land, and flowed thereon for the period of 4 hours and 45 minutes, when the supply was shut off. Plaintiffs were unable to procure any water until the 18th day of August, when they purchased the right of one of the lower users for 6 hours. They could not procure any more water until the 18th day of September, when their turn to use water came around again, and they were permitted to enjoy the usual flow. Upon the proposition that plaintiffs suffered no damage, it is contended that, if they had received the full supply to which they plead they were entitled, it is shown that this supply would have been wholly inadequate to protect the orchard during the exceptionally hot and dry month of August. Moreover, that upon the 7th day of August defendant deprived them of only 7 hours and 15 minutes of their flow, and that upon the 18th day of August they obtained a 6-hour flow, at a cost of $15. The fact that the orchard suffered, notwithstanding this later flow, shows that the supply was inadequate, even if it had not been interfered with. It is further contended that the evidence showed that there was water available to plaintiffs for irrigating purposes, that they did not display diligence in seeking to acquire water to avert the threatened damage, and that their recovery, therefore, must be limited to the amount they would have been called upon to expend in procuring the needed supply. But, as against this, there is still sufficient evidence in the case to show that the plaintiffs' trees and premises were injured to the amount found by the jury; that if the usual flow of August had been permitted there was reasonable prospect and probability of a good crop; that plaintiffs did display diligence in seeking to purchase other water, but were unable to do so; and, finally, that the 4 hours' flow permitted upon the 7th day of August, and the 6 hours' flow obtained upon the 18th day of August, were of little or no value to the land, because the first few hours' run thus turned in went practically to waste in saturating the ditches and runways, and it was only the flow of the later hours which would have been valuable for irrigating and preserving the trees. This evidence, therefore, is sufficient to support the verdict of the jury upon the question of damage.

The more important question yet remaining is that of defendant's responsibility for the damage and the instructions of the court bearing thereon. The matters in controversy between the parties, which led to the order given by Stewart to the water company to shut off the water from plaintiffs' lands, are in evidence without substantial conflict. The plaintiffs, as has been said, were in arrears upon their mortgage interest, and were owing Stewart for assessments upon their hypothecated water stock which assessments he had paid. Of course he was within his right in making these payments to protect his security. In July, 1898, the amount of the assessments upon the stock, so paid by Stewart, was $70. In the February preceding Mr. Murphy, attorney for the plaintiffs, received from J. S. Torrance, on behalf of defendant Stewart, a letter, in answer to one from him of February 11th, inclosing a check for $82.73. In his letter to Torrance, Murphy stated that this was the sum "which Mrs. Mabb claims is the amount due upon the note." Replying, Torrance returned the check, explaining by dates and figures that there was due for interest upon the mortgage a sum considerably in excess of $100, and stating further: "I am advised by Mr. Stewart that Mrs. Mabb has not paid the mortgage taxes, nor the water taxes, either this year or last. He writes me that the mortgage, for some reason, this year was assessed to H. H. Merriman, and that he personally paid the taxes. I neglected to mention that these securities were held by Mr. McCulloch as collateral to secure a loan, but the duty has fallen upon the estate of Mr. McCulloch to collect this matter. * * * When you advise me that you have the proper sum of money to pay, although it is putting me to unnecessary trouble, I will show you the note and make the proper indorsement." The contents of this letter were communicated by Mr. Murphy to the Mabbs, and shortly following it, upon February 18th, the plaintiff Mrs. Mabb, who was the owner of the property, wrote to Mr. Murphy to the effect that Mr. Torrance made contradictory statements regarding assessments and taxes, both of which she made bold to state were false. She sets forth the payments of interest which she says that she had made, and proceeds: "I know nothing whatever about the mortgage tax which Mr. Torrance states I had assessed. * * * The water-tax assessments he has nothing whatever to do with. At the time of the exchange Mr. Merriman told Mr. Mabb that, as Mr. Lyman Stewart still owned the water stock, he (Mr. Stewart) would have to pay all assessments, and he has never demanded a cent from me; neither do I expect he will, as it is customary here in the colony for party owning stock to pay the same, and can cite to others who can testify to the same." Here it may be said that Mrs. Mabb's statement to the effect that Mr. Merriman told Mr. Mabb that Mr. Stewart would have to pay all assessments upon the water stock is denied, and it is further shown by Merriman's testimony, and by that of others, that Merriman himself always paid the assessments upon the water stock. Merriman, it should be added, was the grantor of the Mabbs to the land which they owned, and while he owned it had mortgaged it to Stewart, upon precisely the same mortgage, affecting the water stock as well as the land, as that which the Mabbs gave when they acquired title. On February 24th, Murphy, after receipt of Mrs. Mabb's letter, writes again to Torrance, setting forth the contents of his client's letter, and saying: "The water-tax assessments she has nothing to do with, and she stated that at the time of the exchange Mr. Merriman told Mr. Mabb, as Mr. Stewart still owned the water stock, he (Stewart) would pay all assessments, and that he has never demanded a cent from her, and that it is customary in the colony for parties owning stock to pay the same, and that she can cite to others who can testify to the same." This letter was forwarded by Torrance to defendant Stewart. In reply to it he wrote to Torrance as follows: "As to the water assessments, it is the invariable rule that the party owning the water stock pays the assessments on it, whether pledged or unpledged. If Mrs. Mabb refuses to pay the assessments, she should be refused the use of water, and the secretary of the San Antonio Water Company should be notified that Mrs. Mabb, through her attorney, had disclaimed ownership of the stock, and refuses to pay the assessments, and hence should not be allowed to use the water. This stock being held by the estate for which you are acting, I would suggest that you act in the matter in such a way as to fully protect its interests." Stewart's letter was written on February 28, 1898. Thus in February of that year the Mabbs were informed that there were assessments upon the water stock which they had not paid, and which Stewart had paid. They disclaimed ownership of the stock. This disclaimer was made known to their attorney, and, though in argument he seems to think that it was a preposterous idea that the Mabbs should thus disclaim ownership of valuable property, which was merely pledged at that time, he manifestly sees nothing in their declaration to excite his surprise; for he formally notifies Torrance that his clients refuse to pay the water assessments, because they are not the owners of the stock. On July 6th Stewart wrote Mr. Shepherd, the secretary of the water company, to divert the water represented by the ten shares of water stock, under which plaintiffs' land had been supplied, to other lands until the assessments upon the stock had been paid. Repeatedly, in July and in August, after the receipt of this letter, the secretary notified the Mabbs that the water would be turned off if the water assessments were not paid. He further testifies that, as secretary of the company, he would have received the assessment money, but that the Mabbs never offered to pay him. Under these circumstances it was that the water was turned off from plaintiffs' land. Later Mr. Murphy, attorney for plaintiffs, told Mr. Stewart that his clients would pay the water assessments, and upon this statement Stewart immediately gave directions to the secretary of the water company to permit the usual flow, and this they received the following month. Upon the trial of the case Mrs. Mabb gives evidence radically at variance with the contents of her letter. While her letter contains the flat refusal to pay water assessments and an absolute disclaimer of ownership in the stock, in her testimony she says that she did not understand that the water assessments were to be paid by her till the mortgage was due, and that she did not know it was claimed that she should pay the water-tax assessments. It is certainly not easy to harmonize these statements with the declarations in her letter. Against all this evidence the claim is made that Stewart never made any formal demand upon the Mabbs for the water-stock assessments; that, as appears by Mrs. Mabb's testimony, she had never given up her right to the ten shares of stock; that her letter to her attorney related solely to the payment of interest upon the mortgage note; that she did not know what right Torrance had to ask her about water assessments; that he did not ask her to pay them, nor did she understand by the letter that he claimed that she should pay them; that she expected to pay everything, taxes and all assessments, when the mortgage became due; and much ridicule is here cast upon the testimony of Stewart when he says, "The real controversy between us was their disclaiming ownership," and that he wanted to settle the question before it was too late. But, considering the disclaimer of ownership communicated by plaintiffs' attorney, we see small occasion for ridiculing or belittling this testimony, and where the conduct of defendant shows "malice, recklessness, oppression, and utter disregard of the plaintiffs' rights in the premises," as plaintiffs' counsel repeatedly assert, we are utterly at a loss to perceive.

But, passing this point, we proceed to a consideration of the instructions. The court instructed the jury as follows: "The jury are instructed that in law a person can act by others, and the act of the agent in carrying out the orders of the principal, is the act of the principal, and notice or knowledge conveyed to an agent in the matter which is being or about to be undertaken by the agent for the principal is notice and knowledge of the principal; and if you find from the evidence that the defendant Lyman Stewart requested the defendant San Antonio Water Company, or any of its officers, to shut off the water to which the plaintiff J. W. Mabb was entitled, if you find that she was so entitled, and you find from the evidence that prior to the time of the shutting off of the water, and some time either in the month of July or August, 1898, the plaintiff notified the San Antonio Water Company and the defendant B. C. Shepherd that she claimed the right to the use of the water in question, because of her ownership of the said ten shares of stock, and notified the agents of the defendant Stewart that she had not given up or abandoned her rights to the said stock to said Stewart, or any other person, and that she then protested against said water being shut off when her turn to use the same should come on the 7th day of August, 1898, or thereabouts, then as a matter of law the notice and knowledge of the agent or agents of the said defendant in the said matter was also notice and knowledge to him; and if you find from the evidence that, notwithstanding such notice and protest, said agents of said defendant shut off the water, then in such shutting off of said water said defendant acted at his peril, and assumed all the consequences which would naturally or reasonably flow from his act in shutting off the water; and, if you so find, then the defendant is responsible to the plaintiff for all damages which she sustained by reason of having been deprived of said water, and which was the proximate result of said act." As to this instruction it is sufficient to say that by the records of the corporation Stewart appeared as the owner of ten shares of stock. It was the corporation's duty to obey the directions of Stewart, therefore, as to the use of the water represented by that stock. But to distort out of this an agency of the water company, or of the secretary of the water company, with Stewart as principal, so as to bind Stewart by such notification as the Mabb might give the company, is wholly unpermissible, and could have served but to lead the jury into the belief that there was some evidence establishing an agency for the indicated purpose, whereas in fact there was none at all.

If the vice of this instruction needs be made more apparent, it will be seen in considering an instruction proposed by the defendant and refused by the court, and the reasons assigned by the plaintiffs' attorney in justification of that refusal. The instruction is addressed wholly to the evidence within the case, and is unimpeachable in its declaration of the law. It is as follows: "If you find that, prior to the diversion of the water from plaintiffs' land, plaintiffs knew that there were assessments due and unpaid on the water stock in controversy, and refused to pay said assessments, and through their attorney, or otherwise, disclaimed ownership of said stock, and that the defendant Stewart in good faith acted on such disclaimer of ownership in directing the San Antonio Water Company to divert the water, then the plaintiffs cannot recover in this action." Defendant's attorney declares that he experienced difficulty in understanding why this instruction was refused. In justification it is said merely: "This instruction could not be given in this case because it was undisputed that Mrs. Mabb and her husband, before the water was turned off, notified the agent of Stewart, who is presumed to have notified him (Stewart), there being no evidence to the contrary, that she did claim to own the stock and the right to use it. Therefore there could be no good faith on the part of Stewart, and there was no disclaimer of the ownership of the stock in any manner." The inaccuracies of this statement are too apparent to require even an enunciation of them.

Of the instructions generally it may be said that they are strongly argumentative in favor of plaintiffs. For example, in the eleventh instruction it is said: "The jury are further instructed that if you find from the evidence that the plaintiff was entitled to the use of the water complained of at the time in question, and further find that the defendant seeks to excuse himself in the premises on the ground that the plaintiff abandoned or gave up her right to the use of the water in question, then the burden is upon the defendant to show such abandonment." It might be said by plaintiffs' attorney, and indeed is said, that Stewart is seeking to excuse himself; but it is scarcely a phrase proper for an instruction by a court to a jury, under a defense of disclaimer of ownership, made out by the written declarations of plaintiffs, accompanied by the written declaration of plaintiffs' attorney. Still further in the same instruction it is said: "If you find from the evidence that the defendant, or any of those acting for him, had been notified by said plaintiff that she had not abandoned her right or claim to use said water, just prior to the cutting off of the said water by said defendant, such notice would put the defendant upon inquiry," etc. Here the defendant is charged with the knowledge of anybody "acting for him," without regard to the capacity in which they were acting or the limitation of their agency. The water company was "acting for him,"—that is to say, was obeying his direction, as it was their duty to do in the matter of turning off the water; but it does not follow therefrom they were instituted his agents for the purpose of receiving a notification, or that Stewart became any more chargeable, because of the claim which they may have served upon the water company, than he would have been chargeable with knowledge of their claim if they had asserted it to his cook. We need not discuss the argumentative nature of these instructions further. It is sufficient to refer to the cases of Morris v. Lachman, 68 Cal. 111, 8 Pac. 799, People v. McNamara, 94 Cal. 513, 29 Pac. 953, and People v. Vereneseneckockockhoff (Cal.) 58 Pac. 157.

The court further refused the following instruction: "The jury are further instructed that this is not a case for punitive or exemplary damages, and that the plaintiffs can in no event recover more than such damages as were actually suffered by them in the taking of the water from their land." Why this instruction was not given we are not enlightened in respondents' brief, further than that it is said that it should not have been given, "because there was evidence of both malice and oppression on the part of Stewart toward the Mabbs." This was not a case for punitive damages, as the trial court concluded. Yet the complaint sought damages upon that theory, and the instructions proposed by plaintiffs and given by the court contain many intimations looking towards punitive damages; and, finally, the refusal to give instruction is here upheld by plaintiffs' attorney upon the ground that it was a case for punitive damages. The refusal to give an instruction when requested, and when it is pertinent to the case, is undoubted error; and it is not cured by an instruction that the jury should award compensatory damages only. The defendant has the right to a positive instruction that they must not award punitive damages. Sloane v. Railway Co., 111 Cal. 687, 44 Pac. 320, 32 L. R. A. 193; 2 Thomp. Neg. § 1264; 11 Enc. Pl. & Prac. p. 213. In Railway Co. v. Scurr, 42 Am. Rep. 377, it is said: "We are prepared to go a step further and say that in any and all actions for damages, where the proof fails to show anything that will warrant an imputation of willfulness, recklessness, or rudeness, it is the duty of the court to inform the jury, when requested so to do, that they cannot inflict punitive damages. Not to do so in a case free from doubt would be an abdication of judicial authority, and a permission to the jury to violate the settled principles of law."

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

CAVE et al. v. TYLER et al. (L. A. 740.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 7, 1901.)

WATERS—IRRIGATION—DIVERTING STREAM—PRESCRIPTIVE RIGHT—STATUTORY RIGHT.

1. 14 Stat. 253, § 9, recognizing and confirming possessory rights to the diversion of waters, and 16 Stat. 218, § 17, amendatory thereof, apply only to diversion made on the public domain of the United States; and one claiming the right to divert water under such acts must show that his rights vested while the land on which the diversion occurs was a part of such domain.

2. Plaintiff for 40 years claimed and exercised the right to divert all the waters of a certain stream from a certain point thereon for irrigation, but did not own any land on the stream. Defendant diverted a reasonable amount of water to irrigate her land from tributaries of such stream on government land five miles above the point where plaintiff diverted the stream. Held, that plaintiff had no prescriptive or other right to have all the waters entering the stream or its tributaries flow to the point where he diverted them, and had no right to interfere with such use of water by defendant.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; John L. Campbell, Judge.

Action by Ben W. Cave and others against George W. Tyler and others. Judgment for plaintiffs. From an order denying a new trial, defendant Hannah S. Skinner appeals. Reversed.

H. V. Reardan and T. R. Archer, for appellant. Otis & Gregg, for respondents.

McFARLAND, J. This is an action to quiet plaintiffs' title to the right to the use, and a diversion through a ditch called the "Mill Creek Zanje," of all the water of a natural stream called "Mill Creek" and its tributaries. Judgment went for plaintiffs, and defendant Hannah S. Skinner appeals from an order denying her motion for a new trial. Under our views of the case it is not necessary to examine all of the questions presented, and the facts essential to the point of the decision may be briefly stated. Mountain Home creek is a tributary of Mill creek, and Snow creek is a tributary of Mountain Home creek. Appellant owns land through which the two latter streams run and which is riparian to the same. She acquired her right to this land in 1871 from the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, who acquired it in the same year from the United States government. Since 1888 she has used about 15 inches of water from Mountain Home creek and about 2 inches from Snow creek for the necessary irrigation of her land, upon which she grows trees, vines, and vegetables, and for domestic purposes; and this was not an unreasonable amount of water, as the court finds, for such purposes. At this point the land through which these streams run was part of the public domain of the United States. On Mill creek, about five miles below appellant's land, the respondents and their predecessors have by means of said Mill Creek Zanje continuously since about the year 1853 diverted all the water flowing in said Mill creek for irrigation and other purposes; and their diversion of the water has been open, notorious, and under a claim of right. They claim that by reason of such diversion they have the right to prevent appellant from using any of the water of the tributaries for her purposes as above stated, and the court so decreed.

Respondents do not claim any rights as riparian proprietors. It is not found that they own any land whatever on Mill creek. They claim solely as appropriators. Of course, under the general law, they acquired no rights by prescription as against appellant or her predecessors, who were upper riparian proprietors; for a diversion of the water after it had passed her land, which did not in any way interfere with its natural flow over her land, was not an invasion of her right which she was called upon to notice. Hargrave v. Cook, 108 Cal. 72, 41 Pac. 18; Bathgate v. Irvine, 126 Cal. 135, 58 Pac. 442. It is contended, however, that the right of respondents to continue to divert all of the water, and to prevent appellant from using any of it as a riparian owner, is guaranteed to them by section 9 of the act of congress of July 26, 1866 (14 Stat. 253), and section 17 of the act amendatory thereof passed July 9, 1870 (16 Stat. 218). We do not think that this contention can be maintained. There is no finding that the diversion was made on the public domain of the United States. There are some things in the record which seem to indicate that the diversion was on private land acquired under a Mexican grant in which the government never had any estate or interest; but there is no finding on the subject. The burden of showing that the diversion was made on the public domain was upon respondents, if that fact was essential to respondents' asserted right under said laws of congress, as we think it was. In City of Santa Cruz v. Enright, 95 Cal. 105, 30 Pac. 197, the defendant claimed as an appropriator of water, and the court said: "It is claimed that the court erred in instructing the jury that the defendant could not acquire any right in the waters of the creek by mere appropriation. This contention cannot be sustained. Water Co. v. Hancock, 85 Cal. 222, 24 Pac. 645, 20 Am. St. Rep. 217. It does not appear whether the lands through which the stream ran at the time defendant claims to have acquired his right of appropriation were private or public property. If they were public lands of the United States at that time, we think it devolved upon the defendant to show that fact." In the case at bar, therefore, the respondents are not in the position of one who has invaded the public domain and attempted to acquire any possessory rights thereon.

The ninth section of the act of 1866 merely provides "that whenever, by priority of possession, rights to the use of water for mining, agricultural, manufacturing, or other useful purposes, have vested and accrued, and the same are recognized and acknowledged by the local customs, laws, and decisions of the courts, the possessors and owners of such vested rights shall be maintained and protected in the same" (14 Stat. 253); and the seventeenth section of the act of 1870 merely provides that "all patents granted, or pre-emptions or homesteads allowed, shall be subject to any vested and accrued water rights * * * as may have been acquired under or recognized by the ninth section of the act of which this act is amendatory." It is clear that these provisions refer only to the interest of those who have gone upon the public domain and done acts of ownership there which the government, as proprietor, could have prevented, but in which it acquiesced. For a long period the general government stood silently by and allowed its citizens to occupy a great part of its public domain in California, and to locate and hold mining claims, water rights, etc., according to such rules as could be made applicable to the peculiar situation; and, when there were contests between hostile claimants, the courts were compelled to decide them without reference to the ownership of the government, as it was not urged or presented. In this way, from 1849 to 1866, a system had grown up under which the rights of locators on the public domain, as between themselves, were determined, which left out of view the paramount title of the government. The acts of 1866 and 1870 were intended merely to expressly recognize and ratify this system. Where they speak of "vested and accrued" rights, they mean, of course, vested and accrued as between the locators; for mere general locators have no vested right as against the government. The government could have ousted these locators by legal proceedings, or, perhaps, by the direct exercise of sovereign force. But it did not do so. It acquiesced in their possession. And by the congressional acts above noted the government merely said that whenever it had acquiesced in asserted possessory rights on the public domain which were upheld by local customs and laws and decisions of the courts, as between the possessors themselves, it would treat those possessors as though they had acquired prescriptive rights against the government, and would recognize such rights whenever afterwards granting patents to any part of its land. When a person went upon the public domain and there diverted the water of a stream running thereon, he invaded the rights of the government to its own land; and the government could either resist the invasion or acquiesce in it. If it adopted the latter course, then the kind of vested and accrued right grew up which the government by the said acts of congress promised to protect. But when a party on private land to which the government had no title diverts water from a stream, what vested right does he acquire in the water in the upper part of the stream where it flows through the government land? Such diversion does not interfere in any way with the flow of the stream in the land of the upper proprietor. It does him no injury. It is no invasion of his right. It gives him no cause of action. It leaves no field for the play of consent or acquiescence. It never ripens into title by prescription. Under what local custom or law, under what "decisions of the courts," was there "a vested and accrued" right of respondents to all the water of the stream up through the public domain to its source, thus draining a large section of country above of its source of fertility? We know of none. In all the cases to which we have been referred the diversion was upon the public domain. It may be well to say, although the case is not referred to in the briefs, that there is nothing in Healy v. Woodruff, 97 Cal. 464, 32 Pac. 528, at all conflicting with the views above expressed. It was merely held there that the plaintiff was not prevented from enlarging his ditch by the fact that since its original construction he had obtained title from the government to "a piece of land through a small portion of which the said Cedar creek [the stream diverted] runs." There was no contention that the diversion and the ditch were not on the public domain.

Under the above view it is not necessary to notice other points made by appellant. What the rights of the respondents would have been, if it had been shown that the diversion had been made on the public domain and acquiesced in by the government, need not here be considered. The order appealed from is reversed and a new trial ordered.

Shortridge & Beatty, for appellant. White & Seymour and Lardner & Burns, for respondent.

SMITH, C. The suit was brought to recover the sum of $1,170.36, alleged to be due to the plaintiff for goods sold to the defendants by the plaintiff's assignees, Knight & Co. The defendants answered separately, each denying the allegations of the complaint. The court found that the goods were sold to the defendant Trumbo, and rendered judgment accordingly. The appeal is from the judgment by the defendant named.

The sole point made is that there are no findings on the issues made by the answer of the defendant Purington. But the complaint counts on a joint contract of the defendants with plaintiff's assignees, and the denials of the several answers of the defendants relate to this contract and to this contract only. Hence, if the finding on this issue is sufficient as to one defendant, it must be so as to the other. The question, then, is whether the finding that plaintiff's assignees sold goods to the defendant Trumbo is in effect a finding that he did not sell goods to the two defendants jointly. We hardly think it is. But, if so, it is a finding against the plaintiff on the only issue raised by the pleadings, and the appellant has no reason to complain of it.

But either there is no finding on the issue as to the joint contract alleged, or the finding is against it, and in either case there is nothing to support the judgment against the defendant Trumbo. The finding as to his separate liability is altogether outside of the issues, and on the pleadings as they stand the judgment against him cannot be sustained. 1 Chit. Pl. 51, 52, and cases collected in notes; Bliss, Code Pl. § 92. The complaint might have been amended on the trial to make it conform to the evidence (Code Civ. Proc. § 469); and on the case being remanded such amendments may be allowed as the court may deem just, but the issues cannot be changed in this court. I advise that the judgment be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

We concur: CHIPMAN, C.; GRAY, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

YREKA MIN. & MILL. CO. v. KNIGHT.
(Sac. 804.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 6, 1901.)

MINES AND MINING—LOCATION OF CLAIM—BOUNDARIES—EVIDENCE—ABANDONMENT—POSSESSION—PROTECTION—GROUP OF CLAIMS—WORK ON A PART.

1. Where, on relocating a well-known mine, notices of claim containing explicit descriptions of monuments and boundaries are posted and filed, and six years afterwards a sufficient number of the monuments are found, so that by following the descriptions in the notices the boundaries are traced, a finding that the claims had been marked so that the boundaries could be readily traced is justified.

2. Where plaintiff is in possession of a mine as successor in interest of the locator, prima facie evidence of the location is sufficient to justify a verdict against one who, knowing of such location, relocated the mine on the claim that the mine had been abandoned and no work done thereon during the preceding year.

3. Where plaintiff produced deeds for mining claims from the persons who located the mines more than six years before the trial, and showed its actual possession for the last two years, a verdict that it and its predecessors had been in possession for six years was justified as against a defendant claiming the mines as abandoned.

4. Where plaintiff, owning three contiguous mining claims, did no work on one claim, but did sufficient on the other two to have protected all, the question whether the work so done was for the benefit of the group of claims and tended to develop the one not worked on was for the jury.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Siskiyou county; J. S. Beard, Judge.

Action by the Yreka Mining & Milling Company against Luke Knight. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Warren E. Taylor, for appellant. O'Neil & Butler, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, C. Injunction. Plaintiff alleges in its complaint that it is, and for six years last past has been, the owner, in possession and entitled to the possession of certain three quartz-mining claims situated in Siskiyou county, to wit, the Ada, Flora Blanche, and Ohio; that the mines are contiguous, extending in the same direction, forming one continuous mining claim 4,500 feet in length and 600 feet in width, all containing valuable quartz rock bearing gold; that, on January 2, 1899, defendant wrongfully entered upon a part of the Ada and a part of the Flora Blanche claims, and made excavations, and carried away and converted to his own use a large amount of valuable ore, and that he threatens to continue to remove ores from said mines. Defendant denies the averments of the complaint and alleges that he entered upon the lands January 2, 1899, "with the intention to take up and locate a portion thereof as a mine, and did stake out and mark said land," and "ever since said 2d day of January, 1899, has been the owner and entitled to the possession of said mining land, * * * known as the 'Mary Ann Quartz Mine.'" A jury was called, and certain 25 specific questions were submitted to and passed upon by them, and all were answered in favor of plaintiff. Thereupon the court made its conclusions of law: (1) That plaintiff is the owner and entitled to the possession, subject to the paramount title of the United States, of all lands embraced within the boundaries of the claims set forth in plaintiff's complaint; (2) that defendant's location is invalid and void "for the reason that the same was not subject to location"; (3) that plaintiff is entitled to a decree enjoining defendant from entering upon the land embraced within the boundaries of plaintiff's said claims. Judgment was accordingly entered, from which and from the order denying his motion for a new trial defendant appeals.

It appeared that on January 29, 1892, written notices of location of the three claims in question, to wit, the Ada, Flora Blanche, and Ohio, were filed in the recorder's office, in the order named, by W. P. Sheffield, John Travers, and Harvey Ax, respectively, and said claims at that time had thereon a vein of gold-bearing quartz in place; that these locations as a whole constituted a relocation of what had theretofore been known as the "Klamath Quartz Mine," and were contiguous, as alleged in the complaint; that a local custom, which had been in force over seven years, required that in making locations "a notice be posted on the location, and also a copy recorded in the office of the county recorder"; that plaintiff deraigned title from these locators, and expended in 1898 on the Ohio $400 and on the Flora Blanche $150 in work and improvements; that "on January 1, 1899, and prior to the time at which defendant claims to have located the Mary Ann quartz mine, plaintiff had resumed work, and continued the same thereafter uninterruptedly, and until the full amount of $300 had been expended as assessment work for the year 1898." The foregoing facts, mainly found by the jury, are not challenged and stand as admitted. The jury found that John Travers distinctly marked upon the ground his location of the Flora Blanche "in such manner as that its boundaries could be readily traced." The jury were asked, if they found as above, then to find whether the markings "were made according to the calls in his notice of location, which has been introduced in evidence, in whole or in part, and, if in part only, then what part." The jury answered: "(1) Yes. (2) In part. (3) On the southwest end center line and S. W. corner, and N. W. corner." Similarly the jury found as to the Ada that Sheffield's location was by him distinctly marked, and "in such manner as that its boundaries could be readily traced," and that such markings were in part according to the calls of the written location, namely, "On the N. E. end center line and S. W. corner." Likewise it was found that the Ohio was distinctly traced on the ground by Harvey Ax, and that his location was marked according to the written location in part by "N. E. end center line and N. W. corner."

1. These findings are challenged as unsupported by any evidence. The witness Ball, superintendent of the property, testified that the claims joined end to end, the Ohio being on the southwest and the highest of the three up on the mountain; that the croppings on all three mark about the center of each, the croppings running from end to end of the group in a N. E. and S. W. direction; that these mines were formerly called the "Klamath Mines," of which plaintiff's claims are relocations; that the dividing line between the Ohio and Flora is marked by a red fir tree six or eight inches in diameter at the center of this dividing line; that a chip was cut out in witness' presence showing the marking "T1" or "T2," he could not remember which, grown over, indicating about seven years' growth, and at the point called for in the notices of location; that there was a wagon road along the claims close to the center line about on the cropping of the vein; that there are tunnels all along the road, and the road was built to haul timber for the mines, which showed that there had been workings on the ground at an earlier date and showed the course of the vein. The witness Neal lived on the Ohio claim and helped to do the assessment work on the group. He was present when the chip was cut out of the fir tree in the center end tree of the Ohio and Flora, and he testified that the appearance showed that the original marking had grown over, and when the chip was removed was plainly marked "T1," as though it had been cut by some instrument. This was on the side of the tree next the Travers or Flora claim, and on the other side was a blaze and markings which he did not cut into. He also found the cedar stump referred to in the location of Travers on the northwestern line at the corner common to the Ohio and Flora, "marked 'T2' on one side, and 'H,' or something, on the other side." He also found a fir tree 1,500 feet from the cedar stump, marked "'A' on one side, 'T' on the other. I didn't chip it to see what it was." This was the corner common to the Ada and Flora on the northwestern boundary line. He testified: "The ledge on which we worked is easily traced on the surface by croppings and old works." He was asked whether much work had been done along the ledge of the Flora and Ada especially, and answered: "You can easily see that much work has been done there. * * * There are piles of debris and waste thrown out there,—very large dumps. I have seen them two miles away. * * * The road runs along near the works all the way. It crosses the ledge in several places. From the road you can see the old works and croppings in most places." The work alluded to cost many thousands of dollars. The witness Reed also found the monuments referred to by the witness Neal. He also testified that he knew where the northwestern corner of the Ada claim is, and that the marks are plain to be seen; but on cross-examination he testified that he had never seen this corner. He found the northwestern corner of the Ohio, which is the southwestern corner of the Flora, and he also saw the northeastern corner of the Flora, being also the southwestern corner of the Ada. Defendant testified on cross-examination that he owned the Rhode Island claim adjoining the Ada on the southwest; that he knew that plaintiff had a claim where the Ada is claimed to be situated, but he did not know its name; that no work was done on it in 1898, and he supposed the ground was abandoned and was open for location, and that he would not have located the ground if plaintiff had done any work on it; that there was some work done there in 1897 by plaintiff's grantor, the Gold Ball Mining Company; and that he knew in 1897 that this company or whoever succeeded to it was claiming the ground. Witness Boyle testified for defendant that he made a plat of the three mines in question and that defendant pointed out the ground to him in March. This map was used at the trial, but is not before us.

It would seem altogether reasonable to assume that, if defendant could find the boundaries in March, he could have found them, had he wished to do so, in January before making his location. We think there was sufficient evidence to support the verdict. The locations were made in 1892, and the notices, copies of which were introduced in evidence, contained such specific calls and references to monuments that a surveyor would have no difficulty in locating the boundaries with knowledge of the location of these monuments testified to by the witnesses. It is true the witnesses, with the location notices in their hands, were at the time unable to find all of the particular monuments referred to in the notices; but it does not follow from that fact that the monuments were never placed there, or that the boundaries of the locations could not be ascertained. These notices were filed in 1892, and in six years many changes might take place along the boundary lines, which would account for the witnesses not being able to discover all the particular monuments referred to. It is true, as claimed by appellant, that it would be insufficient marking of boundaries of a mining claim to place thereon only such monuments as were found by the witnesses and make no other markings of boundaries. The question here is not dependent alone on the evidence as to particular monuments which were found. Notices were filed as early as 1892, claiming ground therefore well known as the "Klamath Mines." These notices were accessible, and presumably were known to defendant, and with them, as we have said, the boundaries could be traced, for they were so specific in their directions that, with the monuments testified to being found, the boundaries could be defined. The jury found that the claims had been marked out by the locators, so that the boundaries could be readily traced, and it is urged that there was no evidence to support such finding. There was no evidence of this fact, except the location notices and the discovery of the monuments already referred to. The locators were not called as witnesses, nor was any person called who assisted in making the locations. The jury must have reached the conclusion that the locators in fact did what the evidence showed they might have done; i. e. they found that the notices of location definitely described the boundaries and that sufficient monuments were found, corresponding with those mentioned in the notices, to enable these boundaries to be traced at this time, and hence concluded that the locators originally marked the boundaries so as that they might be readily traced. Plaintiff was in possession under title deraigned from these locators. As against a relocation by a person having knowledge of the former locations and of plaintiff's possession as successor in interest, there was evidence sufficient prima facie to support the verdict. Defendant went into possession and made his relocation, not because there had never been a valid location, but, as he himself testified, because he thought the claims had been abandoned and were open to location and because no work had been done on the claims for the year 1898.

2. The jury found that plaintiff at the commencement of the suit, February 13, 1899, was in possession, and for six years prior thereto it and its predecessors had been in possession. Plaintiff's right to possession was evidenced by deeds from the original locators and their grantees to plaintiff, and there was evidence of actual possession in 1897 and in 1898. This was sufficient as against defendant.

3. The remaining question relates to the finding that there was "$400 worth of work done on the Ohio claim and $150 on the Flora Blanche, being $550 in all for the benefit of all three claims" for the year 1898. There was no work done on the Ada that year. Plaintiff claims that the work done on the Ohio and Flora Blanche was for the benefit of the group. It was held in De Noon v. Morrison, 83 Cal. 163, 23 Pac. 374, following Smelting Co. v. Kemp, 104 U. S. 654, 26 L. Ed. 875, that "as a matter of law the plaintiff had the right to do the work necessary for the protection of both claims or one of them, both being held by her in common." It was further held that it is for the jury to determine as a question of fact whether work done on one of two contiguous claims owned by the same person is for the benefit of both claims. See, also, Altoona Quicksilver Min. Co. v. Integral Quicksilver Min. Co., 114 Cal. 100, 45 Pac. 1047. There was evidence tending to show that the work consisted of running a tunnel, stoping from it on both sides, building ore chutes, tracks, blacksmith shop, and a house, and getting out timbers amounting in value to nearly $1,000, and that the amount of work done was about equal on these two claims. The tunnel was run partly on the Ohio and partly on the Flora Blanche, at a point near the dividing line of the two claims and about the center, or along the ledge. The superintendent testified that the work was intended to develop the whole group of mines, and he gave his reasons for believing that the work tended to develop the Ada. There was some evidence corroborative of this testimony. Defendant introduced witnesses who testified in effect that the work done could not, in their opinion, be of the slightest benefit to the Ada claim, nor in any way tend to develop it. The jury might well have taken this view of the evidence; but we cannot say that the evidence was insufficient to warrant the conclusion to which the jury came. The evidence on the point was in conflict, and under the well-settled rule we cannot interfere with the verdict. It is advised that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: GRAY, C.; SMITH, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order are affirmed.

YULE v. BISHOP et al. (S. F. 1,364.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 7, 1901.)
CORPORATIONS—STOCKHOLDERS—LIABILITY—
NOTE PAID BY SURETY—APPEAL—COSTS.

1. Where a note given by a corporation is paid by a surety thereon, such surety may recover the amount paid from the stockholders at the time the payment was made, but not from the stockholders at the time the note was given who had parted with their stock, since the debt is not on the note, but for money paid for the corporation's benefit.

2. Where, on an appeal from an order granting a new trial, the order is at first reversed, but finally affirmed on a ground first suggested on the rehearing, costs of the appeal should be allowed to appellant.

Beatty, C. J., and Harrison and Van Dyke, JJ., dissenting in part.

In bank. On rehearing. Opinion in department (62 Pac. 68) reversed, and judgment of superior court affirmed.

HENSHAW, J. Upon the rehearing of this cause the court has been urged to reconsider the views above expressed. Under our system of pleading, where all the facts of the transaction are set out, it can make little difference in the generality of cases whether it be said that an accommodation maker or indorser who has been compelled to meet the obligation of his principal is entitled to sue upon the note, with a recovery limited to the amount which he has expended, with legal interest, or whether it be said that his action is in assumpsit for money laid out on behalf of his principal, and that his recovery is measured by the amount he has so expended, with legal interest. But in this case the question becomes of consequence for the following reason: Plaintiff is seeking to enforce the stockholders' liability for the debt of the corporation against those who were stockholders at the time when the note in question was executed. If it be held that only these stockholders are liable, the next case to come before us may be one in which the statute of limitations has run against such stockholders, and where the surety will urge with unanswerable force that when, and only when, he paid the debt of the corporation, did a liability upon the part of the corporation to him arise, and insist upon his right of action against those who were stockholders at the time when the corporation became indebted to him. We think, therefore, that the law and the logic of the case can lead but to one conclusion,—that the surety's right of action is in strictness not upon the note, but is in implied assumpsit for moneys paid out and expended, and that, as to the stockholders, the surety's right of action is against those who were stockholders at the time when the corporation's liability to the surety was incurred.

Upon the rehearing for the first time it was pressed upon the court's notice that all the facts were set up in the complaint, and that as to the stockholders it was pleaded, not only that they were stockholders at the time the corporation gave its note to the bank, but that they continued to be such afterwards, and that in the absence of a special demurrer here is a sufficient averment by implication that they were stockholders at the time when Mrs. Blair paid the corporation's debt (Williams v. Ashe, 111 Cal. 180, 43 Pac. 595; Holly v. Heiskell, 112 Cal. 174, 44 Pac. 466; Truman v. Young, 121 Cal. 490, 53 Pac. 1073), and, consequently, that the court's action in granting a new trial should be sustained under this view. This we incline to think is a tenable construction; but, upon the other hand, as it is a consideration newly injected into the case, it seems but just that the order of the trial court should be affirmed, with costs to appellant upon their appeal. It is therefore ordered that the order appealed from be affirmed, with leave to the respective parties to amend their pleadings, if they shall be so advised; the appellants to have their costs upon this appeal.

We concur: TEMPLE, J.; McFARLAND, J.; GAROUTTE, J.

BEATTY, C. J. I concur in the judgment, except as to the costs.

HARRISON, J. I concur in the judgment, and in much of the opinion of Mr. Justice HENSHAW. I do not, however, assent to that portion of the opinion in which it is held that upon the payment of the note to the bank by Mrs. Blair the obligation of the maker of the note was extinguished, nor to the construction given to section 1473, Civ. Code. That section is as follows: "Full performance of an obligation, by the party whose duty it is to perform it, or by any other person on his behalf, and with his assent, if accepted by the creditor, extinguishes it." In order that an obligation may be extinguished, under the provisions of this section, there must be a full performance of it by the party "whose duty it is to perform it," or such performance, if by any other person, must be "on his behalf and with his assent," and the obligation which is thus extinguished is that of the person whose duty it was to perform it. In the present case it is not shown or claimed that the payment of the note to the bank by Mrs. Blair was either at the request or with the assent of the corporation; and it is equally manifest, from the terms of the note and the character of the transaction, that the "duty" of paying the note rested upon the corporation, and not upon Mrs. Blair. The note was by its terms the obligation of the corporation, and the entire consideration therefor was received by it. As an indorser of the note, Mrs. Blair became liable to the bank for its payment, in case the corporation should fail to pay it and she should be properly and legally charged therefor. This conditional obligation was the only one which it was the duty of Mrs. Blair to perform, and upon her payment to the bank the only obligation which was extinguished was this conditional obligation. As payment of the note has never been made by the corporation, or by any one on its behalf, or with its assent, its obligation created by the note has never been extinguished. The obligation of the corporation was not extinguished by the payment to the bank by Mrs. Blair, but she thereby became subrogated to all the rights for the enforcement against the corporation of its obligation that had existed in favor of the bank, or, as was said in Waldrup v. Black, 74 Cal. 409, 16 Pac. 226, "she became the equitable assignee of the note, and entitled to enforce its payment, according to its tenor and effect, as holder thereof." In Redington v. Cornwell, 90 Cal. 49, 27 Pac. 40, it was held that the payment of the corporation's note by one of its stockholders did not have the effect to extinguish the indebtedness of the corporation so paid by him, but that such indebtedness could be enforced against the stockholders. The ground upon which it was held, in James v. Yaeger, 86 Cal. 184, 24 Pac. 1005, that the obligation of the note had been extinguished, was that the payment thereof had been made by one of its makers. Whether an accommodation indorser, upon being compelled to pay the note, becomes entitled to the note, and may maintain an action thereon against the maker, according to its tenor, or an action merely in assumpsit for the amount paid by him, has been the subject of much controversy. That he may maintain an action in assumpsit has never been controverted; the principal dispute being whether, in an action upon the note, he can recover the full amount thereof, as was held in Fowler v. Strickland, 107 Mass. 552, or only the amount paid by him, as is perhaps the rule under the weight of authority. In either case the statute of limitations would begin to run from the time of such payment by the indorser. In Burton v. Slaughter, 26 Grat. 914, the rule is stated to be well settled "that the holder, when the note has been paid or taken up by an indorser, is not compelled to sue in assumpsit, but may sue directly on the note as holder, taking care to confine his recovery to the actual value paid by him for the note." See, also, Fenn v. Dugdale, 40 Mo. 63; Pinney v. Gregory, 102 Mass. 186; Ellsworth v. Lockwood, 42 N. Y. 89; Wadsworth v. Lyon, 93 N. Y. 214, 45 Am. Rep. 190. The question is not material in the present case, as the right of action against the stockholders is in no case upon the note (Bank of San Luis Obispo v. Pacific Coast S. S. Co., 103 Cal. 594, 37 Pac. 499; Wagon Co. v. Bull, 108 Cal. 1, 40 Pac. 1077), but is for their proportion of the corporate liability; and it is incumbent upon the plaintiff to establish the fact that at the time the liability was incurred by the corporation to Mrs. Blair the defendants were stockholders (Herman v. Hecht, 116 Cal. 553, 48 Pac. 611). The liability of the corporation in behalf of Mrs. Blair did not arise until she took up the note; and, as her payment of the money at that time may be regarded as if it had then been received from her by the corporation upon the note previously executed by it, only those persons who were stockholders at that time would be liable for the corporate indebtedness. Whether the action be regarded as for the indebtedness then created by virtue of the note, or in assumpsit for money then advanced for the benefit of the corporation, the statute would begin to run from that time.

(Sac. 746.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 5, 1901.)

STATE LANDS—PURCHASERS—CONTEST—DEMAND FOR REFERENCE—FEE
—MANDAMUS.

Pending the issuance of patents to purchasers of state lands, plaintiff applied to purchase a portion of the land, and filed a protest and a demand that the contest be referred to the proper court. After six months his application and protest were canceled and patents issued to the first applicants. Six months thereafter he tendered a fee to the surveyor general and brought mandamus to compel him to certify the contest. Held, under Pol. Code, § 501, requiring the register to collect a fee of $3 on certifying a contest; Id., § 3414, requiring him on demand to make an order referring a contest; and Id. § 3498, providing that all unapproved applications on file over six months, wherein the contest has not been referred or demand made for an order of reference, shall be void,—that the defendant was not required to enter the order of reference until the fee was paid, and plaintiff's demand after six months was invalid, and the tender of the fee was of no effect.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; Matt F. Johnson, Judge.

Action by L. S. Sherman against M. J. Wright, surveyor general. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Tirey L. Ford, Atty. Gen., W. E. F. Deal, and Deal, Tauszky & Wells, for appellant. Leon Samuels, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an appeal by defendant from a judgment of the superior court of Sacramento county awarding plaintiff a writ of mandate, and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial. Applications to purchase state lands were made to the register of the state land office, respectively, by Mrs. Wrinkle and Samuel Levy. These applications were approved, and some two years thereafter, and pending the issuance of patents, this plaintiff filed an application to purchase certain portions of the lands covered by the previous applications. Accompanying his application was a protest directed against the issuance of patents to the first applicants, and a demand that the trial of the contest thus raised be referred to the proper court. Nothing further was done in the premises by plaintiff, and six months thereafter his application and protest were canceled, and patents issued to Wrinkle and Levy. About six months subsequent to this time plaintiff tendered a $3 fee to defendant, and thereupon brought this proceeding for a writ of mandate, asking that the defendant be compelled to certify the contest created by the cross applications and protest to the superior court of Inyo county.

Various questions are raised by defendant upon this appeal; but the court will devote its attention to one of them alone, as the conclusion arrived at upon its consideration is decisive of the case, and that conclusion is: No valid demand was made upon defendant by plaintiff that the contest be referred to the superior court for trial, and the weakness in the demand is found in the fact that no offer or tender of the fee of three dollars provided for by the statute was made to defendant when plaintiff's demand for reference was made. For reasons hereafter stated, the court attaches no importance to the fact that the fee was tendered about the time this proceeding was inaugurated. Under the facts of this case, at least, that tender came too late and availed nothing. The case stands exactly as though no tender of the fee had ever been made.

Fees collected for services performed by the register of the state land office are moneys belonging to the state, and section 501 of the Political Code provides: "The register must charge and collect fees as follows: For each certificate of purchase, duplicate, or patent, three dollars; for certifying a contested case to district court, three dollars." Section 3414 of the same Code provides: "When a contest arises concerning the approval of a survey or location before the surveyor general, or concerning a certificate of purchase or other evidence of title before the register, the officer before whom the contest is made may, * * * or when either party demands a trial in the courts of the state he must, make an order referring the contest to the district court of the county in which the land is situated, and must enter such order in a record book in his office." The words here quoted found in section 501, "for certifying a contested case to the district court," mean the same as the following words found in section 3414: "He must make an order referring the contest to the district court of the county in which the land is situated, and must enter such order in a record book in his office." When this order is made and entered, the superior court of the proper county has jurisdiction for trial purposes. It is said in Lane v. Pferdner, 56 Cal. 122: "The jurisdiction of the district court under the late constitution to try and determine a contest arising in the surveyor general's office was special, and depended upon the fact that the surveyor general had made an order 'referring the contest.' It was necessary, therefore, when an action was brought to try the rights of the contestants to purchase the lands, for the plaintiffs to allege and prove (by the production of the certified copy of the entry) that the surveyor general made the order of reference. * * * The district court passed upon the fact which gave it jurisdiction, which fact could be proved by the certified copy. The complaint need not, however, aver that the certified copy or the order referring the contest had been filed in the district court before the action was commenced. It was sufficient to allege that the order had been made."

Section 3415 of the Political Code provides: "After such order is made either party may bring an action in the superior court of the county in which the land in question is situated to determine the conflict, and the production of a certified copy of the entry, made by either the surveyor general or the register, gives the court full and complete jurisdiction to hear and determine the action." This section simply provides a rule of evidence. Plaintiff claims that the making by defendant of the certified copy of the entry of the order is in effect "certifying a contested case to the district court," and therefore the fee of three dollars provided by the statute is to be charged for that service. But not so; for, as we have seen, the contest is referred to the court,—that is, certified to the court,—when the order of the register is made and entered in the record book. When that is done the parties may file their pleadings and prepare for trial. The case cited declares that the pleading is perfect when it alleges that an order has been made referring the contest. The certified copy of the entry of the order may not be made until the very moment when the trial is progressing; for that paper, as suggested, is simply a piece of evidence, nothing more. Surely the contest has been certified to the court for trial before it is actually there upon trial. Hence it is plain that the order of reference and the entry thereof constitute the certifying of the contest to the district court.

There can be no question but that, when the contestant demands a reference of the contest to the courts, it is then his duty to pay the fee of three dollars for the service demanded. Neither is there any question but that it is his duty to pay the fee before the service is rendered. It may be said that in every case where fees are fixed by the statute for the performance of service by a public officer—certainly so where those fees are moneys belonging to the state, county, or municipality—it is the duty of the party demanding the service to tender the lawful fee in advance; and this is true, even though the statute does not so declare in terms. Plaintiff here demanded the performance of an official duty. The state was entitled to a fee of three dollars from plaintiff for the performance of that duty by defendant. Defendant was not called upon by the law to perform that duty until the fee was paid. The fee was not paid, and hence plaintiff cannot assert a failure of performance upon the part of defendant. Aside from the question of tender of the fee at a subsequent date, to which reference has been made, it may be said that, if plaintiff is entitled to the writ now, he was entitled to it the day after the demand for the reference was made. Yet a complete answer to the issuance of the writ at that time may be found in the fact that the fee had not been paid. Indeed, the very fact that plaintiff tendered the fee before bringing this proceeding shows that he considered its payment a condition precedent to the order of reference, and therefore necessary prior to the issuance of the writ; and it might be further suggested that, if there had been no tender of the fee in this case at all, that fact of itself would have been fatal to the issuance of the writ.

Plaintiff insists that defendant waived his right to charge the fee in advance when he filed the protest and demand without demanding the fee of three dollars. He declares that thereafter it was too late to raise the question; but this cannot be so. If defendant had made the order of reference and entered it in the record book without the payment of the fee, then clearly, in the absence of fraud, any question of the validity of the order of reference would be foreclosed. But here the service for which the fee is to be paid has not been performed. Necessarily there is no waiver of the payment of the fee in advance. There can be no implied waiver of the payment of the fee in advance until the act has been done for which the fee is to be paid.

Section 3498 of the Political Code, among other matters, provides: "All applications, under whatsoever act, filed in the office of the surveyor general, must be retained ninety days before approval, * * * and all unapproved applications, which have been on file over six months, wherein the approval has not been demanded, and wherein the contest has not been referred to court, or a demand made for an order of reference, as provided in section 3414 of the Political Code, shall be null and void." Under the authority of this section defendant, six months after the filing of plaintiff's application, protest, and demand, canceled the same and issued patents to the first applicants. By virtue of this section plaintiff's application and protest were null and void at the time patents were issued, unless there had been a previous valid demand for a reference. If plaintiff had tendered a fee at any time previous to the expiration of the six-months period, his demand would have ripened into a valid demand; but this he failed to do. A necessary element to the validity of the demand was a payment of the statutory fee. Before that was done the demand was inchoate and substantially incomplete. As already stated, mandate at any time prior to the issuance of the patents would not have run to compel a reference of the contest. If a demand made prior to that time was too weak to support a writ of mandate commanding defendant to order a reference of the contest, it was too weak to act as a bar to the issuance of the patents. When the statute (section 3498) speaks of "a demand made for an order of reference," it means a demand which the register should obey. It follows that the patents were properly issued, and necessarily a tender of the fee made thereafter came too late. For the foregoing reasons this proceeding must fail, and the judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded.

LIEBRANDT v. SORG. (S. F. 2,241.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 7, 1901.)
MARRIAGE CONTRACT—ACTION FOR BREACH —EVIDENCE—CREDIBILITY—QUESTION FOR JURY—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. Where, in an action for breach of a contract of marriage, plaintiff and another witness testify positively to the contract, and they are corroborated by other unimpeached witnesses, the court should not reject their testimony, unless so improbable as not to be entitled to belief, but should leave its weight to the jury.

2. After prima facie evidence of the contract is received, evidence that plaintiff told others of the contract is admissible, not as proof of the agreement to marry, but to show humiliation and damage to plaintiff.

3. Where evidence that plaintiff had told of her agreement to marry defendant was received in an action for breach of such contract, the verdict should not be set aside because the court failed, in the charge, to limit the effect of such evidence to the question of damages, unless defendant requested such limitation.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; W. G. Lorigan, Judge.

Action by Bertha Liebrandt against Jean Sorg. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order refusing a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Jackson Hatch and E. M. Rosenthal, for appellant. Sargent & Wyatt, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. Plaintiff recovered judgment in the sum of $4,500 damages for a breach of a contract of marriage, and defendant has appealed from both the judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial. It is first contended that the evidence tending to show an agreement to marry is insufficient to support the verdict. The statement of the plaintiff was directly to the point that such a contract was agreed upon. The evidence of the witness Mrs. Wenks was also to the same effect, and there was other evidence corroborating strongly the statements of the aforesaid witnesses. The veracity of these witnesses is attacked, not by other evidence, but by the briefs of counsel alone. It is urged that their testimony is improbable, and therefore should be rejected. While cases might arise where this court would declare the evidence of a witness so improbable as not entitled to belief, yet a case of that character would be most exceptional, and it is not presented by this record. Under the evidence here disclosed, it was essentially for the jury to decide the fact as to the existence or non-existence of an agreement to marry.

Plaintiff, under objection by defendant, answered affirmatively the following question: "Did you ever tell anybody about your contemplated marriage with Sorg?" A second witness, under objection by defendant, answered affirmatively the following question: "Did Mrs. Liebrandt at that time say to you that she was to marry Mr. Sorg?" It is elementary law that evidence of this character is inadmissible as tending to prove the agreement to marry. But this character of evidence is admissible as tending to increase plaintiff's damages occasioned by a breach of the contract, and it was upon this theory that it was offered and admitted before the jury. This is apparent from the declaration made by the court in overruling the first objection, wherein the judge said: "It is not admitted for the purpose of proving a promise of marriage on the part of the defendant, but it is admissible to show the humiliation on the part of plaintiff." This character of evidence is always admitted after a prima facie showing of the existence of the agreement to marry and a breach thereof. It is admitted as tending to establish an element of damage, to wit, humiliation to plaintiff's feelings. Reed v. Clark, 47 Cal. 194. This principle of law is recognized and approved by all text writers. In Abb. Tr. Ev. p. 678, it is said: "In enhancement of damages, the pecuniary circumstances of the defendant, the announcement of the engagement, the advanced preparation for the wedding at the time of the breach, are competent." Some point is made that these people to whom plaintiff communicated the fact of her intended marriage were not intimate acquaintances or friends. This objection goes to the weight of the evidence rather than to its admissibility.

The evidence under consideration being admissible for certain particular purposes, the rulings of the court in admitting it were correct, and no exception taken to those rulings can avail defendant here. It is insisted that the court should have limited the effect of the evidence before the jury. This is true, but it was the duty of defendant, if he desired the limitation to be placed upon the evidence, to have asked the court for an instruction to that effect. This he failed to do, and it is too late now to make complaint for the first time. San Luis Obispo Co. v. White, 91 Cal. 438, 24 Pac. 864, 27 Pac. 756. The question addressed to plaintiff, as tending to show her efforts to sell her furniture, etc., is of the same general character as those the court has just considered, and it was a proper question. The court has carefully examined the instructions given to the jury and finds no substantial merit in any of the objections made to them. Neither is the court prepared to say that the verdict is excessive. For the foregoing reasons, the judgment and order are affirmed.

CUSSEN v. SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA SAV. BANK. (L. A. 859, 860.)¹

(Supreme Court of California, Aug. 5, 1901.)

SAFE DEPOSIT—CONSTRUCTION OF CONTRACT—NEGLIGENCE—BURDEN OF PROOF.

1. Plaintiff rented a safe in defendant's safe-deposit vaults, and money placed therein was abstracted. The contract provided that the lessor should use diligence that no unauthorized person should be admitted to any rented safe, and beyond this the lessor should not be responsible for the contents of any safe rented from it. Held, that such contract relates to the degree of care required of defendant in the identification of parties claiming to be its customers, and does not relieve it of its duty, as a bailee for hire, to guard the property placed in its charge.

2. Where plaintiff, on renting a safe in defendant's vaults, received only one of the two keys, and money was abstracted from the safe while the vault was in charge of boys who were paid small salaries, and as to whose honesty defendant was ignorant, a finding that defendant was negligent in guarding the money was justified.

3. Where plaintiff proved that money was abstracted from a safe in defendant's deposit vaults, which he had rented, the burden was on defendant to show that it had exercised proper care.

4. Civ. Code, § 1840, providing that the liability of a depository for negligence cannot exceed the amount which he is informed by the depositor, or has reason to suppose, the thing deposited to be worth, has no application to the loss of money from a safe rented of defendant in its deposit vaults.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; B. N. Smith, Judge.

Action by James Cussen against the Southern California Savings Bank. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

A. B. McCutcheon and Goodrich & McCutcheon (John S. Chapman, of counsel), for appellant. W. A. Anderson, Anderson & Anderson, and Joseph Scott, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. Defendant carried on a safe-deposit business. Plaintiff rented a safe in the deposit vaults for the period of one year, and deposited therein a sum of money. Upon a subsequent visit to the vaults he discovered that $560 of his money had been abstracted. He has recovered judgment against defendant for that amount, and this appeal is taken from that judgment.

The relation between these parties was that of bailor and bailee. The defendant was a depository for hire. Roberts v. Safe-Deposit Co., 123 N. Y. 57, 25 N. E. 294, 20 Am. St. Rep. 718, 9 L. R. A. 438; Lockwood v. Storage Co. (Sup.) 50 N. Y. Supp. 974. The relationship of bailment for hire existing, it devolved upon defendant to use even more than ordinary care in the safeguarding of plaintiff's property. The law demands the exercise of that degree of care by defendant in the preservation of this property, unless by some special agreement it has been waived. We find nothing in this contract pointing in that direction.

It is insisted that subdivision 7 of the agreement entered into between these parties amounted to a waiver of liability. That provision declares: "The lessor shall use diligence that no unauthorized person shall be admitted to any rented safe, and beyond this the lessor shall not be responsible for the contents of any safe rented from it." In considering this clause of the contract, appellant declares its construction to be: "The word 'admitted,' therefore, defined by the facts and circumstances attendant upon the making of this contract, and in connection with the contract itself, refers to such persons as might be admitted to the safe-deposit vaults in the usual course of the business, and under the rules and regulations of the bank; and the admission of any 'unauthorized' person, therefore, refers to a person gaining access to the box in the usual course of business, when in fact he had no right to do so. And the diligence to be exercised by the bank was to guard against false impersonation and forgery by a person claiming to be a renter or a deputy." Adopting this construction of the contract as the correct one, then the court is assured that the balance of the clause, "and beyond this the lessor shall not be responsible for the contents of any safe rented from it," only refers to its liability as to those persons "admitted" to the safe, as the word "persons" is defined by appellant's construction of this clause. Under the construction of this clause as contended for by defendant, it could open wide the doors of its vaults, leave the building without any protection whatever, and thereafter, by invoking this provision of the contract, relieve itself of liability for the property of depositors stolen therefrom by thieves. This position is not maintainable in law, and the aforesaid clause was only intended to fix the degree of care required to be exercised by defendant, not in guarding the property placed in its charge, but in the identification of parties claiming to be its customers. It follows, therefore, in this case, that the defendant was called upon by the law to use that degree of care in the safe-keeping of this property which is demanded from a bailee for hire in the keeping of valuable property. He was required to use that degree of care in the protection of this property from thieves without and thieves within, and he was required to use that same degree of care in the selection of his employes, and the supervision of their conduct after they were employed. It is said in Preston v. Prather, 137 U. S. 604, 11 Sup. Ct. 162, 34 L. Ed. 788: "Persons, therefore, depositing valuable articles with them, expect that such measures will be taken as will ordinarily secure the property from burglars outside and from thieves within, * * * and also that they will employ fit men, both in ability and integrity, for the discharge of their duties, and remove those employed whenever found wanting in either of these particulars. An omission of such measures would in most cases be deemed culpable negligence so gross as to amount to a breach of good faith, and constitute a fraud upon the depositor." See, also, Gray v. Merriam, 148 Ill. 190, 35 N. E. 810, 32 L. R. A. 769, 39 Am. St. Rep. 172. In this case it was established by plaintiff's evidence that his money was abstracted from the vaults of defendant while on deposit. Under these circumstances the burden was cast upon defendant of showing that it used proper care in the safe-keeping of the plaintiff's property. In the Storage Company Case, supra, it is said: "The ordinary rule established by numerous authorities is that, when plaintiff had proved the deposit of his goods, and a failure of the defendant to produce the same on demand, he has established a prima facie case, and the defendant must excuse his failure to produce, by bringing himself within one of the recognized exceptions." See, also, Clafin v. Meyer, 75 N. Y. 262, 31 Am. Rep. 467. If plaintiff made a prima facie case by showing a deposit of the money and its subsequent loss, then, as to the facts, the only question remaining is, was the jury justified in declaring that defendant failed to use the care demanded by the law in the protection of plaintiff's property? Clearly, as matter of law, this court cannot say that defendant used that degree of care. And the finding of fact by the jury as to want of care cannot be set aside by this court as being without support in the evidence. The jury was fully justified in declaring defendant wanting in the exercise of proper care when it failed to deliver to plaintiff both of the keys which unlocked his box, thus leaving outstanding in the hands of some one of its employes a key to the box. In addition to this fact, the evidence discloses that these safety-deposit vaults for a long period of time were left in charge of one Burdwald, a lad about 17 years of age, whose salary was $30 per month. It was developed that he had been in the employ of defendant but three months, when he was placed in charge of the deposit vaults. It was further shown that he left the employment of defendant before plaintiff's loss was discovered, and that no inquiry was ever made by defendant prior to or during his employment as to his honesty or integrity. The jury might well say that proper care was not exercised in the selection and retention of this employe. A second lad, who was working for a salary of $25 per month, also had charge of these vaults a portion of the time, and substantially all that has been said as to Burdwald may be said of this second employe. Upon this character of evidence we are satisfied with the verdict of the jury as to the facts involved in the case.

Section 1840 of the Civil Code declares: "The liability of a depositary for negligence cannot exceed the amount which he is informed by the depositor, or has reason to suppose, the thing deposited to be worth." Defendant relies upon this section of the Code, but in its provisions we see no relief for him. Here plaintiff did not inform defendant as to the value of the deposit. Neither does defendant claim that it had reason to suppose the thing deposited was of less value than it was in fact. Indeed, the very manner of conducting this somewhat peculiar line of business contemplates that the bailee shall not know the value of the thing deposited. In substance, he closes his eye to the value and character of the deposit; and this fact seems to be one of the controlling features in the transaction of this character of business. Under the circumstances it is apparent that section 1840 of the Civil Code can have no application to the facts of this case.

In view of what has been said upon the various questions discussed, it follows that the action of the trial court, of which complaint is here made, in the giving and refusing certain instructions, was correct. For the foregoing reasons, the judgment and order are affirmed.

judgment in favor of plaintiff, and from an order refusing a new trial defendant appeals. Reversed.

Foshay Walker (Mastick, Van Fleet & Mastick, of counsel), for appellant. Rodgers, Paterson & Slack (George A. Hurlbut, of counsel), for respondent.

TEMPLE, J. This is an action for damages for personal injuries alleged to have been received in a collision between two trains. Plaintiff recovered a verdict of $14,000, and the appeal is by defendant from a refusal of a new trial. The collision was on the Coast Division, a little west of San Ardo station, between a pay train and a freight train. The latter was going north, or, in railroad vernacular, west, meaning towards San Francisco. The pay train was, of course, going east, or from San Francisco. The collision, according to plaintiff's evidence, was about 2,150 feet west of the station; according to defendant's evidence, 2,519 feet, and a little over 200 feet west of the west switch at the station. The freight train was scheduled to arrive at San Ardo at 7:24 a. m., and to leave that station at 7:35, and was forbidden by the rules of the company to arrive or leave sooner than at said times. On that morning the freight train did arrive at 7:05, and pulled out towards San Francisco at 7:23, 12 minutes earlier than it should have done. The pay train, being a special, had no time limit, but was bound to keep out of the way of the regulars, and to that end was required to be at the station and side-tracked five minutes before the time of departure of the regular train. It follows that, had the freight train waited its time, the pay train had ample time to comply with this rule before the freight, by the rules, was allowed to proceed. There was evidence tending to show, however, that the pay train was moving at an unwarranted speed, and was not "under control," as the rules required it should be, on entering the station yard, the limits of which extend from whistling post to whistling post on either side. The train had not yet reached the whistling post, and it is contended that the post was at least a quarter of a mile nearer the station than it ought to have been, and, as the morning was quite foggy, the engineer was misled by the unusual position of the post, and, therefore, not knowing that he was near the station, did not slow up. It is contended that, had he been properly informed by a proper location of the post, he would have put the train under control, and the accident would have been avoided. Weight is added to this point by the claim that the engineer was unacquainted with the road, and had to rely solely upon the signal posts along the line, especially on such an obscure morning. It is made an independent point here that, the engineer being strange to the road, no pilot was sent with him, as the rules expressly require in such cases. The engineer was injured in the accident, and died before the trial. The witnesses for the plaintiff, who were train hands, only remembered seeing him once before on the line, and on this point the defense produced no evidence. The plaintiff also complains that the engine was defective, in that it had no driving-wheel brakes and the air pressure was insufficient; also that there were certain misleading marks upon certain culverts near the station. As the evidence appears in the transcript, I do not think these last points can help the plaintiff. That the premature departure of the freight train from the station was misconduct which contributed proximately to the injury of plaintiff may be considered as established beyond question. It is contended by the plaintiff that, admitting such to be the case, the reckless speed of the pay train, which he contends was caused by the neglect of the defendant, mainly in misplacing the whistling post, and in failing to provide a pilot for the engineer, contributed also proximately to the injury, and in such case the defendant is liable, even though gross negligence on the part of a fellow servant also contributed proximately. In its opening brief appellant contended that the engineers on both trains were at fault, and plaintiff cannot recover for the negligence of his fellow servants. The reply brief charges the fault upon the managers of the freight train alone. As to the absence of a whistling post, and the employment of an engineer who was unacquainted with the road, without a pilot, it is said, it is only the case of furnishing imperfect appliances. Whistling posts were not designed to serve any such purpose, and, if they were, yet the injury came directly from want of care on the part of the engineer of the freight train; and in such case the employer is not responsible, even though the accident might not have resulted if better appliances had been furnished. But I think the jury could have found on this evidence that the accident would not have occurred if either train had been run as required by the rules, and also that the reason why the pay train was not under control, as it ought to have been, was because of the misplacement of the whistling post, or that an engineer new to the road was in charge. The evidence is by no means as clear against the pay train as it is against the freight train, but the verdict is for plaintiff, and we must assume the facts to be as found, so far as possible. If this were so, there was no negligence on the part of the engineer of the pay train. His failure was caused entirely by the failure to furnish proper appliances. And, on the same supposition, the negligence of the defendant did contribute proximately to the injury. If the position of the appellant upon the above proposition were sustained, it would probably end the case. It has, therefore, been considered, but upon other points it is clear that the judgment must be reversed.

The witness Oakes was allowed, over the objection and exception of appellant, to testify that soon after the accident he had a conversation with Keyer, the engineer of the pay train. The witness, as conductor, was looking about to ascertain the facts, as he was required to report to the company. Keyer was badly injured, and had been removed from the engine, and was lying near the track. Witness asked him the cause of the accident and the engineer replied that he did not know he was coming into the station. He was lost. Did not see a whistling post. Did not know where he was. At this point Mr. Haydock, the division superintendent, came along, and a conversation between Haydock and the engineer was had to the same effect, in which Mr. Haydock remarked that there ought to have been a whistling post. The ruling admitting these declarations was clearly erroneous. It is contended that they were part of the res gestæ. This phrase seems clear enough in itself, and it is strange that it has been so diversely understood by the courts. The circumstances or parts of an event which is under proof may be shown. Statements are like other circumstances when they are part of it, and, if the whole affair cannot be rightly understood without them, they are competent. Expressions of persons who are actors, made during the occurrence, may generally, but not always, be proved. If spontaneous and caused by the event, they may nearly always be shown. But if afterwards, no matter how shortly afterwards, there is an attempt to explain what has happened, or to account for it, or to defend one's self, or the like, it is incompetent and inadmissible as res gestæ. A narrative, even if given during the occurrence, is inadmissible. Heckle v. Southern Pac. Co., 123 Cal. 441, 56 Pac. 56. There the declaration attempted to be shown was made by the injured person while under the car wheels. This court remarked that the occurrence had not been ended, and yet, if it should appear that the remark was a narration of what had occurred, rather than a spontaneous expression, an outgrowth of the occurrence, it was not competent. See, also, Lissak v. Estate Co., 119 Cal. 442, 51 Pac. 688; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 113. It is suggested that Haydock represented the principal, and therefore the statement to him was competent. Had there been a personal principal present, a remark made to him under the circumstances would not have been competent. It is contended that the evidence was not injurious, but clearly it was upon a vital point, to wit, whether the engineer was misled by the lack of a whistling post, since he was a new man on the road,—whether he was “lost.” It was calculated to aid the case of the plaintiff upon the most doubtful question for him in the case.

I do not think it of advantage to review the many instructions excepted to, or other alleged erroneous rulings. The questions as to the instructions do not involve the right of plaintiff to maintain the action, but minor matters as to the degree of care required, and points of like character. Counsel agree upon what the instructions should have been, but differ in their understanding of what was given. Probably upon another trial such supposed defects will be obviated. The order is reversed, and a new trial ordered.

REIS v. STATE. (Sac. 525.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 2, 1901.)

STATES—INDIAN WAR BONDS—STATE'S LIABILITY—CONDITION—FEDERAL APPROPRIATION—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—STATUTES—STATE DEBT.

1. Act May 3, 1852 (St. 1852, p. 59), authorized the issuance of bonds to pay the expenses of military expeditions against the Indians; such bonds to be payable from funds to be appropriated by congress for that purpose, with the condition that if such appropriation was insufficient the bonds should be a valid claim against the state. By Act 1854 (10 Stat. 576) congress appropriated an unapportioned amount for the purpose of paying the military expenses of the state of California incurred under the act of May 3, 1852, not exceeding $924,259.65; but by such act no interest accruing after January 1, 1854, was payable out of such fund, nor did congress ever appropriate any money to pay such interest. At the time suit was brought against the state on coupons detached from bonds issued under the act, there remained from the fund appropriated by congress for the payment of the bonds, and not applied, about $10,000, and the amount of the coupons sued on aggregated $33,900. Held, that such facts showed that the condition on which the state's liability on the bonds was to accrue had happened, and that plaintiff was entitled to recover.

2. The fact that it was through no fault of the state or its officers that congress had not appropriated sufficient money to pay the bonds or the interest accruing after January 1, 1854, was no defense to the state's liability to fulfill its contract with the bondholders.

3. Const. 1849, art. 8, provides that the legislature shall not create any debt exceeding the sum of $300,000, “except in case of war, to repel invasions or suppress insurrections.” Act May 3, 1852 (St. 1852, p. 59), known as the “Indian War Bond Act,” was entitled “An act authorizing the treasurer of the state to issue bonds for the payment of the expenses of” certain expeditions against the Indians, and authorized the issuance of bonds to a sum not exceeding $600,000, payable in 10 years. Held that, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 1903, declaring that the recitals in a public statute are conclusive evidence of the facts recited for the purpose of carrying it into effect, the state, in an action on the coupons attached to such bonds, was estopped from urging as a defense that the statute was violative of the constitutional provision limiting the indebtedness of the state; the recitals of the act clearly showing it to be within the exception provided by the constitution.

In bank. On rehearing. Judgment in department (59 Pac. 298) reversed. Judgment of superior court affirmed.

HENSHAW, J. This action was prosecuted to recover against the state a judgment for the amount of certain coupons detached from bonds issued under the act of May 3, 1852

(St. 1852, p. 59), and known as the "Indian War Bonds." The act is entitled "An act authorizing the treasurer of the state to issue bonds for the payment of the expenses of the Mariposa, Second El Dorado, Utah, Los Angeles, Clear Lake, Klamath and Trinity, and Monterey expeditions against the Indians." By the first section it is provided: "A sum not exceeding six hundred thousand dollars is hereby appropriated and set apart as an additional war fund, payable in ten years, out of any moneys which may be appropriated by congress to defray the expenses incurred by the state of California, and interest thereon at the rate of seven per cent. per annum, in the suppression of Indian hostilities, or out of the proceeds of the sale of any public lands which may be donated or set aside by congress for that purpose; and should no such appropriation or donation be made, or if an amount sufficient should not be appropriated or donated within the said ten years, then the bonds authorized to be issued by this act shall be good and valid claims against the state, and shall be paid out of any moneys in the treasury, not otherwise appropriated, to pay the expenses of the expeditions mentioned in this act." The findings of the court set forth with clearness the history of the matter, and are here quoted at length:

"That pursuant to the act of the legislature of the state of California approved May 3, 1852, this state did issue its bonds for the sum of six hundred thousand dollars, as therein provided, which bonds were in liquidation of the indebtedness owing by this state for expenses it had necessarily incurred in certain expeditions undertaken by it against the Indians, which expeditions were named in said act. That all of the bonds and coupons described in plaintiff's complaint are part of the bonds issued as aforesaid. That on August 5, 1854, the congress of the United States passed an act, which was approved on that day, wherein and whereby the secretary of war was authorized and directed to examine into and ascertain the amount of expenses incurred and now actually paid by the state of California in the suppression of Indian hostilities within said state prior to January 1, 1854, and that amount, when so ascertained, should be paid into the treasury of the state of California, provided said sum should not exceed nine hundred and twenty-four thousand two hundred and fifty-nine and $\frac{65}{100}$ dollars. That the secretary of war refused to accept the state records of this state, showing the bonds issued by it in liquidation of claims growing out of Indian hostilities, as sufficient evidence of the demands, and refused to pay into the state treasury of this state said sum of nine hundred and twenty-four thousand two hundred and fifty-nine $\frac{65}{100}$ dollars, or any part thereof, until he had received, examined, and approved the original vouchers and demands for which the bonds were issued. That the amount of bonds issued by the state of California in liquidation of valid claims existing against it for expenses it had incurred in the suppression of Indian hostilities within this state is and was as follows:

Bonds issued under act of February 15, 1851	$200,000
Bonds issued under act of May 3, 1852	600,000
Bonds issued under act of April 16, 1853	23,000
Bonds issued under act of April 16, 1853	2,500
Bonds issued under act of May 18, 1853	23,000

"These bonds bore interest as follows: The two hundred thousand dollars of bonds issued under the act of 1851, aforesaid, bore interest at the rate of twelve per cent. per annum from September 1, 1851. All the other bonds bore interest from January 1, 1852, at the rate of seven per cent. per annum. The amount owing and unpaid by this state on January 1, 1854, on account of its Indian war debts aforesaid, with interest to said date, was the sum of nine hundred and ninety-five thousand two hundred and ninety dollars. The amount of the same debt owing and unpaid on August 5, 1854, with interest to that date, was the sum of one million thirty-six thousand six hundred and thirty-four and $\frac{13}{100}$ dollars. The amount of the same debt owing and unpaid on September 1, 1856, with interest to that date, was the sum of one million one hundred and eighty thousand two hundred and forty-three and $\frac{82}{100}$ dollars. That on August 18, 1856, the congress of the United States passed an act, approved on that date, wherein and whereby the secretary of war was authorized and directed to pay to the holders of the war bonds of the state of California the amount of the congressional appropriation of August 5, 1854, as such bonded indebtedness existed on January 1, 1854, and to return to the bondholders such overdue coupons as were not paid by the United States. That said payments were to be made subject to certain provisions in said act provided, and all of said provisions were complied with. That pursuant to said act of congress there was on or about September 1, 1856, presented to the secretary of war, and paid by him, state bonds dated prior to January 1, 1854, all issued on account of Indian war indebtedness of this state, under the acts of its legislature hereinbefore mentioned, to the amount of nine hundred and fourteen thousand seventy-six and $\frac{2}{100}$ dollars, and said payment left in the treasury of the United States an unexpected balance of said appropriation of ten thousand one hundred and eighty-three and $\frac{63}{100}$ dollars. That thereafter congress passed the following acts, re-appropriating in whole or in part the unexpended balance of said appropriation: Act approved June 23, 1860; act approved July 25, 1862. That no part of the congressional appropriation aforesaid was made for, nor applicable to, the payment of any coupons set forth in plaintiff's complaint herein. That congress never made any appropriation for the payment of the indebtedness incurred by this state in the suppression of Indian hostilities in this state, other than the appropriation of nine hundred and twenty-four thousand two hundred and fifty-nine and $\frac{65}{100}$ dollars made by the act of congress of August 5, 1854, except that it at various times, as set forth in defendant's answer, reappropriated lapsed portions of said original appropriations. That the amount of said congressional appropriation was not sufficient, when made, nor at any subsequent time, to pay the bonds created by the state act of May 3, 1852, and the prior act of February 15, 1851, with the interest accruing on the same."

The amount of coupons sued upon in this action aggregates some $33,900. Plaintiff was awarded judgment in the sum of $33,552, from which judgment, and from the order denying its motion for a new trial, the state appealed. As to the foregoing findings, it is sufficient to say that they derive full support from the evidence.

The principal reliance of defendant in support of its appeal is upon the case of Sawyer v. Colgan, 102 Cal. 283, 36 Pac. 580, or rather upon the application which it seeks to make of the decision in that case to the facts in the case at bar. Sawyer v. Colgan was a petition for a writ of mandate to compel the controller of the state to issue his warrant for the amount claimed to be due upon certain coupons, detached, as were these in the case at bar, from Indian war bonds. The coupons there, like those in the present case, were for interest subsequent to January 1, 1854. In the Colgan Case it was shown that there was about \$10,000 of the appropriation made by the United States government still remaining in the fund. The amount of the coupons in suit in the Colgan Case was very considerably less than this sum of \$10,000, and in denying to the petitioner the extraordinary remedy of mandate this court said: "It is not sufficient answer to say that this balance was insufficient to pay all the outstanding bonds and coupons. It is enough to know that petitioner's bonds and coupons would have been paid if they had been presented at the proper time." The conclusion was reached and expressed, therefore, that the state of California never became liable to pay on any of the coupons in suit. This conclusion is predicated upon the reasoning that it was shown that there was money appropriated by the United States available for the purpose of the payment of the coupons in suit, and sufficient for that purpose, and that therefore the condition upon which the liability of the state to pay these debts became fixed had never arisen. In the case at bar it is shown that the United States never appropriated an amount sufficient to pay the whole of the debt of the state evidenced by these bonds, and that the amount in suit is threefold greater than the unexpended sum that at one time remained in the treasury of the United States. Accepting, then, to its fullest extent, the determination of the Colgan Case as to when and under what circumstances the state became liable for the payment of these debts, the fact is established in this case that the contingency had arisen. The facts of the matter are simply these: The state's contract with its bondholders was to pay them the face of their bonds and the face of the interest coupons within or at the expiration of 10 years, if during that period the United States did not itself discharge the state from its liability by making full payment in its behalf. The bondholders' contract was with the state, not with the United States, and the state was to be exonerated from its liability to them only in the event that the United States made full payment. The contract of the state with its bondholders was not that it would pay interest upon these bonds until 1854 or until 1855 or until 1856, but that it would pay them interest (not exceeding 10 years) up to the time when the bonds themselves were extinguished by payment. When the United States came to lift the burden of the state, it did not undertake to do so in accordance with the terms of the state's contract with its bondholders. The United States said, as it had a perfect right to say: "We will pay, not the whole debt of the state of California, but we will pay a sum not to exceed nine hundred and twenty-four thousand two hundred and fifty-nine and $\frac{65}{100}$ dollars towards the extinguishment of this debt. Moreover, we will not turn this money into the treasury of the state of California, and make the state our disbursing agent. We shall investigate the claims against the state, and pay such as we consider just, and, notwithstanding the fact that no dollar of this money which we have thus appropriated is available for the payment of these debts until the year 1856, we will decline to allow or to pay any interest upon the debts of the state accruing after January 1, 1854." This, as I have said, was what the United States government determined to do and did do. It had a perfect right so to decree, precisely as it had the right to refuse to pay anything at all, or to pay as much or as little as suited its view. But, if the United States had in fact refused to appropriate any money, or had only appropriated a grossly inadequate sum, no one, I take it, would question that the liability of the state to make full payment, in accordance with the terms of its contract with its bondholders, had become absolute. And so here, if the United States did not by payment extinguish the liability of the state to its bondholders, in accordance with the state's contract with them, by every consideration of equity, as well as of strict law, the state is bound so to do. The fact that the United States said that it would pay no interest after 1854 did not and could not operate to effect, modify, vary, or change in the slightest the contract of the state with its bondholders, and by that contract the state obligated itself to pay principal and interest upon these bonds unless the United States did so in its place. The facts found in the Colgan Case, to the effect that there was a surplus in the treasury of the United States available for the payment of the coupons there in suit, justified the court in refusing the extraordinary remedy of mandate upon this showing, that moneys from another source, for the extinguishment of petitioner's claim, were first to be made use of; but appellant would here seek to extend that declaration, and apply it as the defense to any and every bond and coupon now due, owing, and unpaid. In other words, defendant's proposition is this: "There were ten thousand dollars not drawn from the funds appropriated by the United States. It makes no difference that the United States would have refused payment upon any of these bonds or coupons out of that fund, because they were issued or accrued after January 1, 1854. It makes no difference, therefore, whether the state's creditor could have obtained a dollar of this money. It makes no difference that the aggregate liability of the state was several hundred thousand dollars, and there was at the most but ten thousand dollars with which to pay it. The fact is, and this court should so declare it, that, because each one of these coupons and each one of these bonds was for a sum vastly less than ten thousand dollars, any one of these individual holders of them might have been paid, and therefore the state is exonerated." This amounts to saying that some two or three hundred thousand dollars of indebtedness could legally be extinguished by a treasury fund of ten thousand dollars, and this without the expenditure of a dollar of that fund. This certainly is a most startling new way to pay old debts. But, to the contrary, we hold, upon every principle of strict law, as well as of justice, that the state is bound by its own contract with its own bondholders, according to the terms and tenor of its contract, and that upon a showing, such as here made, that the United States did not appropriate enough money to pay the state's bondholders, in accordance with the terms of their contract with the state, the state's liability has become absolute. It is urged that it was through no fault on the part of the state or its officers that the federal appropriation was tied up for more than two years, and that therefore the state should not be held for the interest accruing after January 1, 1854. To this it may be answered, if answer is needed, that it would have been no fault of the state or its officers if the United States had never appropriated a dollar. Yet would any one contend under such circumstances that the state was to go free? It was surely no fault of the bondholders. They, no more than the state, could control the machinery of the United States government, and they have the right to demand that the state shall fulfill its contract with them, whether in the matter of the federal appropriation the state be in fault or not.

It is further urged against this judgment that the act of May, 1852, under which these bonds were issued, was itself unconstitutional, in attempting to create an indebtedness against the state in excess of $300,000. In this, reliance is had upon article 8 of the constitution of 1849. By that article the legislature is forbidden to create any debt exceeding the sum of $300,000, "except in case of war, to repel invasion, or suppress insurrection," but the very act in its recitals declared in effect that a state of war or insurrection existed when the expeditions against the Indians were sent out, and the state is estopped from urging this defense, by its solemn declaration in the act itself. Section 1903 of the Code of Civil Procedure declares that "the recitals in a public statute are conclusive evidence of the facts recited, for the purpose of carrying it into effect."

Some of the rulings are complained of, in the improper admission of evidence. It is unnecessary to consider them, for the admitted evidence merely made against the defense which the state advanced, and which we have declared to be untenable, viz. that the $10,000 surplus extinguished the state's liability for the whole debt. The admission of this evidence, therefore, could not have injured appellant. The judgment and order appealed from are therefore affirmed.

WOODMEN OF THE WORLD v. RUT-LEDGE et al. (L. A. 912.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 12, 1901.)

APPEAL — ATTORNEY OF RECORD — LIFE INSURANCE — BENEFIT SOCIETY — CERTIFICATE — FIANCÉE — INTERPLEADER — DESERTED WIFE — FRAUD — WAIVER BY SOCIETY.

1. Where appellant's attorney is one of the firm who were his attorneys of record in the trial court, a motion to dismiss the appeal on the ground that such attorney is not the attorney of record should be denied.

2. Where a plaintiff brings an action against conflicting claimants of a fund in its hands, to determine such claims, as provided in Code Civ. Proc. § 386, and, without demurring, such claimants interplead and try the issues raised, they cannot afterwards object that it is not a case for interpleader.

3. A member of a fraternal society took a certificate of life insurance payable to B., "as his fiancée." On his death the fund was claimed by B. and also by his deserted wife. The society deposited the fund in court, and claimants interpleaded. Held that, the society having waived all question of fraud and claim to the money, the wife cannot object that B. was not entitled to it because deceased was incapable of contracting marriage at the time of engagement to B.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Waldo M. York, Judge.

Action of interpleader by the Woodmen of the World against Laura Rutledge and others. From a judgment for defendant Mary E. Buzzard, defendant Laura Rutledge appeals. Affirmed.

John H. Foley, for appellant. Will D. Gould, for respondents.

VAN DYKE, J. By stipulation of the parties a motion to dismiss the appeal and the hearing on the merits of the appeal have been submitted together. The motion to dismiss the appeal is based upon the ground that the appellant's attorney is not the attorney of record in the case, but a member of the firm of attorneys who appeared in the court below as attorneys of record. There is nothing in the motion, and no authority has been cited in support of this contention.

The action was brought to compel the defendants to come into court and interplead and litigate their several conflicting claims to a benefit fund of $2,000 paid into court by the plaintiff at the time of bringing the suit. The plaintiff is a corporation existing as a fraternal organization, and for life insurance purposes and benefit of its members and their beneficiaries. It appears that one William Rutledge in October, 1896, joined and became a member of Victor Camp, Woodmen of the World, located at Victor, Colo., and through such membership obtained a certificate of life insurance for the sum of $2,000, payable on his death to the defendants Fred, Harry, and Jessie May Rutledge, his minor children; that thereafter, in April, 1899, said William Rutledge, by appropriate proceedings, secured a transfer from said Victor Camp, and on the 20th of the same month deposited said transfer card with the Los Angeles Camp of the Pacific Jurisdiction of the Woodmen of the World, located at Los Angeles, and through his membership with said Los Angeles Camp said William Rutledge canceled and surrendered his said certificate obtained from Victor Camp, and thereupon, May 15, 1899, there was issued to him a new benefit certificate for the sum of $2,000, made payable to the defendant "Mary E. Buzzard, as his fiancée." The said William E. Rutledge died in Los Angeles in June, 1899. An answer to the complaint was filed on behalf of defendants Laura Rutledge and the minors, Fred, Harry, and Jessie May Rutledge, in which it was asked that it may be ordered by the court that said sum so deposited in court be paid over to them. An answer and cross complaint was also filed by the defendant Mary E. Buzzard, setting forth the facts already stated, and claiming said benefit fund under the provisions of the benefit certificate last issued to said William Rutledge. The court found that on July 4, 1895, the said William Rutledge and defendant Laura Rutledge intermarried, and remained husband and wife up to the time of the death of said William Rutledge, but that for several years prior to his death they lived separate and apart, she residing in Colorado, and he in Montana and California; that defendants Fred Rutledge, Harry Rutledge, and Jessie Mamie Rutledge, or Jessie May Rutledge, were the children of said William Rutledge by a former wife; that defendant Mary E. Buzzard was, at the date that said benefit certificate was issued to William Rutledge by the Los Angeles Camp, under engagement of marriage with said Rutledge in good faith, and that she had no knowledge or information whatever that said Rutledge was at that time or at any time a married man; and that she remained so engaged to be married to him up to the time of his death, and in such engagement she was wholly an innocent party. Judgment was accordingly rendered in favor of said defendant Mary E. Buzzard for the amount of said benefit certificate so deposited in court.

The appeal is by defendant Laura Rutledge alone, and comes up on the judgment roll. The appellant contends that this is not a case for interpleader. The Code provision in reference to the right to bring such action is very broad: "Whenever conflicting claims are or may be made upon a person for or relating to personal property, or the performance of an obligation or any portion thereof, such person may bring an action against the conflicting claimants to compel them to interplead and litigate their several claims among themselves." Code Civ. Proc. § 386. This seems to have been the case here, as appears by the pleadings. Besides, the appellant failed to demur to the complaint, or raise any other objection in the court below to the nature of the proceeding. Union v. Long, 123 Cal. 107, 55 Pac. 708, was a case similar to this. That was an action of interpleader to compel the defendants to litigate their conflicting claims to the fund held by the plaintiff, and in reply to a like objection in that case to the action the court says: "But when, as here, all parties come in, and without objection make up their pleadings and litigate their claims, we feel warranted in holding that all consent to the remedy sought, and to the payment into court, and consequent dismissal as to plaintiff." In this case the plaintiff, having paid the money into court, and the parties having come in and interpleaded among themselves, had no further interest in the case, and is not a party to the appeal. See, also, Fox v. Sutton, 127 Cal. 515, 59 Pac. 939, where the right of the plaintiff, a mere stakeholder, to compel conflicting claimants to come in and litigate their several claims, was upheld.

It is contended on the part of the appellant that, Rutledge being at the time a married man, the said Mary E. Buzzard could not become engaged to marry him, and therefore was not a fiancée; that such a relationship would be against good morals, and therefore illegal. But the court also finds that the cancellation of the first certificate of life insurance, and the issuance of the said second certificate of life insurance, payable to the said Mary E. Buzzard, was formally made in accordance with the constitution of the plaintiff corporation, and the same was in full force and effect at the time of the death of said William Rutledge; thereupon the same became due and payable to said Mary E. Buzzard, and is now due and payable to her, in the said sum of $2,000, and that the said $2,000 deposited and paid into court by the plaintiff corporation in the action is the money described in said certificate of life insurance; that the plaintiff has disclaimed all right, title, and interest in and to said money. These findings are conclusive, as the evidence is not brought up. If any fraud or deception had been used in procuring the issuance of said certificate in reference to the designation of Mary E. Buzzard as fiancée or otherwise, such certificate might have been declared void, and the sum specified therein forfeited, at the instance of the plaintiff company; but, as found by the court, and as appears by the record, the company makes no complaint, and disclaims any right to the fund. The term employed may be considered as merely descriptio personæ. "It may be stated that, where a policy of life insurance expressly designates a person as entitled to receive the insurance money, such designation is conclusive, in the absence of some question as to the rights of the creditors. The receipt of the person designated will discharge the insurer, and he may sue and recover the amount due at the maturity of the policy. In such cases the legal representative of the insured has no claim upon the money, and cannot maintain an action therefor. It forms no part of the assets of the estate of the insured." Winterhalter v. Association, 75 Cal. 248, 17 Pac. 1. And in that case it was suggested that the policy might lapse for want of a beneficiary, and the court replies: "Such a contingency cannot arise in any event here, for the defendant admits its liability, has paid the money into court, and only asks that the question as to the right of the two claimants may be determined so as to absolve it from liability." It has also been held: "Where a person makes an insurance on his life, he may make any one he pleases the beneficiary, and the latter is not obliged to show an interest in his life in order to recover." 5 Lawson, Rights, Rem. & Prac. p. 3636.

Pending the appeal in this court, the respondent Mary E. Buzzard died, and Will D. Gould, executor of her last will and testament, upon suggestion of her death and upon motion, has been substituted in the place and stead of Mary E. Buzzard as defendant and respondent herein. Judgment affirmed.

We concur: HARRISON, J.; GAROUTTE, J.; McFARLAND, J.

HENSHAW, J. I concur in the judgment. If it were shown that the by-laws of the association limited the beneficiaries to those having an insurable interest in the life of the member, a different question would be presented. But no such showing is made, and the finding of the court is to the effect that the certificate was duly issued in accordance with the constitution and by-laws. The provision limiting the beneficiaries of a policy to those having an interest in the life of the insured is primarily designed to protect the insurance company, and may therefore be waived by it, as was done in this case, by its payment of the money into court.

TUOHY v. MOORE. (Sac. 806.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 3, 1901.)

CONTRACT—RESCISSION—EQUITY.

Plaintiff, purchaser at foreclosure, 41 days before the time of redemption expired contracted with defendant, whereby defendant leased the land, with the privilege of purchasing part thereof on specified terms, from time to time, and agreed to immediately plant 100 acres to orange trees and make other improvements; and, if the land was redeemed, he was to be reimbursed by plaintiff for the expenses. Defendant purchased the trees and machinery required, and went on the land, when he was ordered off by the receiver in the foreclosure suit. Plaintiff, without making any effort to obtain the equity of redemption, or consent of the receiver to the improvements, sued, 7 days before the time to redeem expired, to rescind the contract, on the ground that, because of the receiver's refusal to permit it, it was impossible to perform the contract. Held, that rescission should be refused, since plaintiff had not tried to perform, and defendant was not at fault, but had incurred great expense in attempting to perform.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Tulare county; W. B. Wallace, Judge.

Action by John Tuohy against A. D. Moore. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Hannah & Miller and Van Ness & Redman, for appellant. G. W. Zartman, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, C. Action to rescind an agreement for the sale of land. Plaintiff had judgment, from which, and from the order denying his motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. The land in question was part of a much larger tract belonging to one Vaughan, who had mortgaged it to plaintiff. Foreclosure suit was begun September 8, 1896, and the land was sold under decree on March 20, 1897, plaintiff becoming the purchaser, a certificate of sale was issued to plaintiff, reciting, among other things, that if no redemption was made he would be entitled to a deed in twelve months from date of sale, and a deed was made to plaintiff on March 20, 1898. The Vaughan mortgage was made prior to the amendment to section 702, Code Civ. Proc., extending the period of redemption from six months to one year, and, as matter of law Tuohy, plaintiff, was entitled to a deed September 20, 1897. Bank v. Barrett, 126 Cal. 413, 58 Pac. 914; Benson v. Bunting, 127 Cal. 532, 59 Pac. 991; Haynes v. Treadway (Cal.) 65 Pac. 892; Barnitz v. Beverly, 163 U. S. 118, 16 Sup. Ct. 1042, 41 L. Ed. 93. This present action was commenced September 13, 1897, seven days before plaintiff's right to a deed accrued. The contract sought to be rescinded was dated August 12, 1897, one month before the action was commenced. At this time Vaughan's right of redemption had only a month and seven days to run. On August 30, 1896, a week before complaint on foreclosure was filed, and in anticipation of foreclosure, Vaughan executed to plaintiff Tuohy, an agreement in writing authorizing Tuohy, mortgagee, to take possession of the mortgaged premises, "and during the proceedings about to be commenced by said John Tuohy to foreclose the mortgage held by him on said property, and during the period of redemption from the sale of the property from such foreclosure sale, * * * to farm said lands, * * * to rent the same to others as he may deem best, * * * to collect and receive all rents * * * during the period from the commencement of said suit until the said period of redemption shall have expired, and to pay said rents * * * to the person * * * purchasing said property at foreclosure sale." Notwithstanding plaintiff had this privilege, he asked for the appointment of a receiver, on filing his complaint in foreclosure, with power to do what by the mortgagor's agreement he was himself empowered to do; and a receiver was appointed to take control of said mortgaged property, and "to rent the said lands, and collect and receive the rents, issues, and profits thereof." The receiver was plaintiff's nephew, and plaintiff was one of his bondsmen. Pursuant to the order of his appointment, the receiver took control of the lands, and the court found that at the time the agreement in question was executed he had leased all the farming lands mentioned in the agreement "to be farmed to grain for the next ensuing cropping season." There was no evidence that defendant had actual knowledge that these leases had been made, and there was no evidence that he had actual knowledge of the appointment of a receiver when the agreement was executed, or that he would interfere in any way with the parties in carrying it out; but there was evidence offered that the parties talked the matter over after the agreement was executed, which latter evidence the court apparently disregarded as irrelevant and inadmissible. The court found, however, as was alleged in the complaint, "that at the time of making the aforesaid agreement said John Tuohy believed that said receiver would make no opposition to the carrying out of the terms and conditions of said agreement by either party thereto, and believed that, as the purchaser of said property at the foreclosure sale thereof, he had the right to contract to convey said lands, and to lease the same according to the terms of said agreement." The agreement showed that both parties had in mind the foreclosure sale, for it was provided, inasmuch as plaintiff had purchased the land at foreclosure sale, and the right of redemption had not elapsed, that in case of redemption defendant should be paid by plaintiff for his improvements made under the agreement. Adjoining the land in question were other lands sold to plaintiff, on which was a basin excavated to contain water for irrigation, and a cut or trench had been opened on this adjoining land to develop water; and in the agreement defendant had undertaken within 30 days, to begin an extension of the trench, and run it 1,500 feet by August 1, 1898, to the land embraced in his contract. He had the right also to dig certain wells on these latter lands near said trench for the purpose of developing water. The agreement is very lengthy, and sets forth with considerable minuteness of detail the mutual covenants of the parties, a large part of which may be omitted from consideration as not bearing upon the issues presented. It recited, however, that defendant believed that parts of the land described were suitable for citrus culture, and, on the conditions named, plaintiff agreed to sell to defendant "during and for six years to come, * * * whenever and from time to time he is requested by him to do so, any of said lands heretofore described in T. 20 S., R. 27 E., lying below the line of the flume or ditch which said Moore proposes to construct from said basin to said land, * * *" and, "when said Moore asks it, said Tuohy will put him in the immediate possession of any land thus required by him, and said Moore shall have the option to pay for such land," etc., stating terms; and the agreement also contained a plan of rental to defendant instead of sale. It was recited that, although the water already developed was insufficient for the purpose, defendant was to at once locate and take on the rental plan, and plant to orange trees, the greater part of 100 acres, and "proceed at once, as before stated to extend said cut, and within the time fixed to sink at least one well."

The contract recited a consideration of one dollar as paid and received, but the evidence was that it was not in fact paid or received, and the complaint alleged that plaintiff has never received any consideration. The complaint alleges what has heretofore been stated as to plaintiff's belief that the receiver would not make opposition; alleges the agreement to take on the rental plan 100 acres, and at once plant the greater part to orange trees; alleges the refusal of the receiver "to permit either plaintiff or defendant to enter upon said land to carry out the conditions of said agreement; that plaintiff cannot give defendant any title to said lands that will be free from reasonable doubt, until the time to redeem said lands shall have expired; nor can it be ascertained, until a deed shall issue to said lands, whether plaintiff will ever have the legal right to any of said lands"; alleges that, as soon as plaintiff discovered "that said receiver would not permit said agreement to be carried out, * * * he immediately communicated such fact to defendant, and requested of him that said contract be rescinded." The findings are that plaintiff's allegations are true. The court found, in its third finding, that the receiver was appointed to take charge of the property, rent it, etc., "during the pendency of the action, and until a deed should issue to said lands, and until the same had been redeemed as required by law." This finding is challenged as unsupported by the evidence. The order of appointment contains no such provision, and no tenure of the receiver's office is stated in it. The fact is, perhaps, not important, as the receiver holds subject to removal at any time by the court on cause shown.

It is claimed by appellant also that the fourth finding, as to plaintiff's belief that the receiver would not oppose the carrying out of the terms of the agreement, is not supported by the evidence. Under the view we take of the case, as will presently appear, this finding furnished no ground for rescission, and its consideration may for the moment be deferred. The fifth finding is that defendant "has not located or taken on the rental plan, or any other plan, any portion of said lands, or planted the same to orange trees, or proceeded to extend said cut, or to perform any of the other conditions of said agreement." This finding is challenged as unsupported, and will also be noticed later. The sixth finding is that the receiver refused to permit either plaintiff or defendant to enter on the lands to carry out their agreement, and that plaintiff could not give defendant any title free from doubt until redemption had expired, and, until a deed should issue, plaintiff could not know he had any title. This finding is also challenged as unsupported. Finding 7 is that plaintiff communicated the receiver's refusal to permit the agreement to be performed immediately on learning the fact, and at once requested rescission, and this finding is challenged for like reasons. There was a general demurrer to the complaint, which was overruled, and defendant answered; and there was a motion for nonsuit at the close of plaintiff's evidence, which was denied. We will dispose of the case, however, on its merits, as disclosed by the evidence.

There seems to me an utter want of equity in the case made by the record. The uncontradicted evidence was that, immediately following the execution of the agreement, defendant made preparations to carry out its provisions on his part. He contracted for 12,000 orange trees, which he had to pay for, he made a contract for teams to do the ditch work; he made arrangements for an engine to pump water, he engaged a surveyor and helper to locate the cut which he had agreed to make, and he went with them to the land to assist in the survey. He testified: "Mr. Tuohy [the receiver] approached on a horse and said: 'What are you doing here?' I said: 'Laying out a ditch, and we are going over there to open a cut.' 'Well,' said he, 'you can't do that. You must leave this ranch. I don't wish you to do any work of any kind here.' I said: 'This is Mr. Tuohy's contract that we have.' He says: 'It don't make any difference. You must not do any work here,'—or words to that effect. I could scarcely believe it, and I said: 'Do you mean it?' He said: 'Yes.'" Defendant then left with his men. He further testified: "I have been at all times since this contract was entered into ready and willing and able to carry out all the covenants on my part contained therein. I wrote to Mr. Tuohy, the plaintiff. I tried to get to see him, and couldn't. I sent twice to his house. I sent a special messenger with a letter, and nobody would receive it. I wrote him a letter, and mailed it to him. Because I was in a terrible position, with twelve thousand orange trees on hand." It appears that plaintiff wrote a letter to defendant informing the latter that the contract "cannot be carried out, on account of the refusal of the receiver in charge of said property to permit entry on said lands prior to the time a deed to said lands will issue, which he is advised will be one year from the time of the issuance of the certificate of sale"; adding, "As it will be impossible for either of us to carry out the terms of said agreement, I ask that you consent that said contract be rescinded, and hereby offer to rescind the same." This letter was dated August 19, 1897, 16 days after the contract was signed, but the letter was not posted until August 26th, as the postmark on the envelope showed. Defendant replied to it September 4, 1897, refusing to rescind, calling attention to the steps he had taken to comply with the contract, and stating his readiness, ability, and willingness to comply with the contract, and insisting on compliance by plaintiff. This letter was properly directed to plaintiff and posted, and postage prepaid, but he testified that he did not receive it. There is no evidence that plaintiff made any effort to induce the receiver to permit the defendant to do the work contemplated by the parties. Plaintiff took no steps to obtain instructions, or authority of the court for the receiver to permit the work to be done. There is no evidence that the contemplated work would have interfered with any leases made by the receiver. Foreclosure was commenced in September, 1896. The leases for that cropping year ran until the latter part of the year 1897. There was no evidence that plaintiff sought to have the leases so made in renewal as not to interfere with his own or defendant's performance. He had it in his power to do this, and is himself at fault for not having done it. Nor is the evidence clear that the leased lands embraced all the lands which might have been planted to orange trees. There is no evidence that plaintiff made any effort to purchase Vaughan's equity of redemption. In short, there is no evidence that plaintiff made the slightest effort to remove the impediments to performance of the contract, and, with the exception of the refusal of the receiver to allow the work to be done by defendant, there is no ground for rescission shown. Whether the refusal of the receiver to allow defendant to proceed under his contract, of which plaintiff had instant if not previous knowledge, operated as a release of defendant, need not be decided, for he is not asking to be released. It did not release plaintiff, and he should not be permitted to rescind, since he failed to show that it was impossible for him to perform. The rule is that "the impossibility of performance must be shown to attach to the thing to be done, and not to him alone who has contracted to do it. It must be an impossibilitas rei, as distinguished from an impossibilitas facti." Fresno Milling Co. v. Fresno Canal & Irrigation Co., 126 Cal. 640, 59 Pac. 140, citing Klauber v. Car Co., 95 Cal. 353, 30 Pac. 555, where the rule is quite fully discussed. Plaintiff not only made no effort to render performance possible, but he made haste to notify defendant of rescission, not even going to him personally to see what could be done to enable each to perform. The ground alleged in the complaint for relief is that the receiver "refused to permit either plaintiff or defendant to enter upon said land to carry out the conditions of said agreement." When plaintiff learned this fact he should have gone at once to the receiver and made an effort to remove his opposition, failing in which he should have gone to the court and had the receiver removed, or instructed to permit the work to go forward, which was manifestly for the benefit of the land. There was in fact no occasion for a receiver, and, had the defendant in the foreclosure suit objected on the ground that he had given plaintiff authority to go into possession and do the very things the receiver was appointed to do, the court would probably not have appointed a receiver. Furthermore, there were but a few days remaining in which redemption could be made, and plaintiff would be entitled to a deed. Plaintiff should have made some effort to acquire this equity, or arrange with the holder of it; and, if unsuccessful, he should have waited these few days, taken his deed, which would have discharged the receiver and there would have been no further obstruction to his performing. It would be inequitable to allow plaintiff to rescind under the facts of this case, all of which point to his own delinquency, rather than that of defendant; and especially should he not be permitted to rescind as defendant suffered considerable damage, which plaintiff made no offer to compensate. It is advised that the judgment and order be reversed.

We concur: SMITH, C.; GRAY, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order are reversed.

MEYER v. WEBER et al. (Sac. 872.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 13, 1901.)

MORTGAGES—FORECLOSURE — TIME — NOTES
—NEGOTIABILITY—ASSIGNMENT—EFFECT.

1. Under Civ. Code, § 1642, providing that several contracts relating to the same matter, between the same parties, and as parts of substantially one transaction, are to be taken together, a note and a mortgage given to secure the same, delivered at the same time, must be taken and considered together.

2. Where the mortgage given to secure a note provided that on default in interest the principal and interest should be due, at the payee's option, and that the mortgagee might immediately bring suit, though the principal were not yet due, a suit to foreclose the mortgage commenced after default in interest, but before the principal was due, is not prematurely brought.

3. Under Civ. Code, § 3088, providing that a negotiable instrument must be made payable in money only, and without any condition not certain of fulfillment, and section 3093, declaring that a negotiable instrument must not contain any other contract than such as is specified in such article, a provision in a mortgage given to secure a note for attorney's fees in case of foreclosure renders the note nonnegotiable.

4. Under Civ. Code, § 1459, providing that the indorsement of a nonnegotiable written contract shall transfer all the rights of the assignor to the assignee, subject to all equities and defenses existing in favor of the maker at the time of indorsement, the assignment of a nonnegotiable note and mortgage is without prejudice to any set-off or other defense existing in favor of the maker.

Beatty, C. J., and McFarland and Henshaw, JJ., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county; Joseph H. Budd, Judge.

Action by Margaretha Meyer against C. M. Weber and others. From a judgment in favor of defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Nicol, Orr & Nutter, for appellant. J. R. Hall, for respondents.

VAN DYKE, J. The Woodbridge Canal & Irrigation Company, a corporation, being indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of \$3,280, on July 28, 1894, executed to the plaintiff its promissory note for that amount, and, to secure the same, at the same time executed its mortgage upon a tract of land in San Joaquin county, and also at the same time, as further security, indorsed and assigned to the plaintiff the note and mortgage in suit. The note reads as follows: "\$1,963.66. Woodbridge, Cal., May 28, 1894. Ten years after date we promise to pay to the Woodbridge Canal and Irrigation Company, or order, the sum of nineteen hundred sixty-three $\frac{66}{100}$ dollars, payable only in gold coin of the government of the United States, for value received, with interest thereon in like gold coin at the rate of six per cent. per annum from date until paid. Interest payable annually on the first day of September of each year, and in default of payment at said times the same to be then added to the principal and form a part thereof, bearing interest at the same rate. This note is secured by mortgage of even date herewith. Helen Weber. C. M. Weber. Julia H. Weber." Although the note is dated May 28th, it was not delivered until June 15th, at which time the mortgage to secure the same, and referred to in the note, was executed and delivered to the said corporation, the Woodbridge Canal & Irrigation Company. The plaintiff subsequently brought an action to foreclose the mortgage executed to her by the Woodbridge Canal & Irrigation Company, and such proceedings were therein had that a decree of foreclosure and sale was rendered, and thereupon the property mortgaged sold and applied on the judgment, leaving a deficiency of \$2,639.49. Thereupon plaintiff brought the present action to foreclose the mortgage assigned to her. The defense is that the consideration for the note and mortgage was an agreement in writing entered into between the makers and the payee, the Woodbridge Canal & Irrigation Company, that said company should construct a ditch from the main canal or branch thereof to the line of the land of the Webers, being the same described in the mortgage, of sufficient size and elevation to allow the irrigation of said land, and flow the water to said land for the purposes of irrigation, and that said company never at any time constructed a ditch or branch canal to the land for which the water was to have been furnished, and that no water has at any time been brought to the said land; that said Woodbridge Canal & Irrigation Company became insolvent on or about October 5, 1895, and was thereafter deprived of the possession of all of its works, canals, and property, by reason whereof the said company was, and ever since has been, rendered incapable of performing its contract with said defendants Weber; and that in consequence the consideration of said note and mortgage has totally failed. The court finds the facts as set up in the answer of defendants Weber,—that the note and mortgage in suit were made and delivered to said company in pursuance of the terms and conditions of said agreement; that the company never at any time constructed a ditch or branch of any size to the land in question, and no water has at any time since the making of said agreement been brought to said land by said company; and that the consideration of said note and mortgage has failed. Upon the findings of fact the court entered judgment in favor of said defendants.

The appeal is on the judgment roll, and the only question presented is whether the instrument in suit is a negotiable promissory note, within the meaning of the Civil Code. The appellant contends that it is, and that it must be considered separate from and independent of the mortgage given to secure the same; that the clause, "this note is secured by mortgage of even date herewith," may be disregarded, as forming no part of the obligation to pay as specified in the note. But the mortgage was delivered at the same time as the note, relates to the same subject-matter, and they form substantially one transaction. They must therefore be taken and considered together. Civ. Code, § 1642. The plaintiff recognizes this to be so, from the very fact of bringing the action. By the note on its face it had 10 years to run, and the only consequence of the failure to pay the interest annually was that it should be "added to the principal, and form a part thereof, bearing interest at the same rate." But by the mortgage given to secure the note it is provided, in case default be made in the payment of "any installment of interest as provided in said note, then the whole sum of principal and interest shall be due, at the option of the said party of the second part, its successors or assigns; and suit may be immediately brought, * * * although the time for payment of said principal sum may not have expired"; and it is provided that costs and charges may be included in the decree of foreclosure, "including reasonable counsel fees." Counting upon the terms of the mortgage, and not of the note, as distinguished therefrom, the plaintiff alleges a failure to pay the interest, and an election to consider the whole amount due, and further alleges the employment of an attorney to secure its foreclosure, and asks for a reasonable sum to be fixed as his fee. In Phelps v. Mayers, 126 Cal. 549, 58 Pac. 1048, the defense was that the suit was prematurely brought, on the ground that the note in suit did not provide that the principal debt should be due on default in payment of interest, and that hence a foreclosure for both principal and interest was unwarranted. That contention is answered as follows by this court: "The note and mortgage, however, must be construed together. Interest on the note is payable semiannually, and the mortgage is clear that upon default in the payment of the interest, equally with default in the payment of the principal, the mortgagee may cause the premises to be sold, and retain from the proceeds 'the said principal and interest.' There is scarcely room for interpretation in these provisions." See, also, Nagle v. Macy, 9 Cal. 426; Hyde v. Mangan, 88 Cal. 320, 26 Pac. 180. An independent action on a promissory note secured by mortgage is prohibited in this state. "There can be but one action for the recovery of any debt, or the enforcement of any right secured by mortgage upon real estate or personal property, which action must be in accordance with the provisions of this chapter" (Code Civ. Proc. § 726); that is, by a suit to foreclose and a sale of the mortgaged premises, and ascertainment of the deficiency, if there be any. Toby v. Railroad Co., 98 Cal. 494, 33 Pac. 550; Society v. Thornton, 123 Cal. 62, 55 Pac. 702. Whatever the form of the debt, the mortgagor can be legally compelled to pay no part of it until the decree is entered for the sale of the premises mortgaged, and the liability which shall then accrue to him is a liability to pay only a deficiency which shall appear on the sheriff's return. The liability is therefore contingent and dependent upon the fact whether upon the sale of the mortgaged premises there shall be a deficiency. The plaintiff in this case, in bringing the suit, recognized the fact that the mortgage was inseparably connected with the note. As already stated, according to the terms of the note, independent of the mortgage, the action would have been prematurely brought; and at the time it was brought it could only be sustained by reference to the clause in the mortgage giving an option to the owner, in case of default in the payment of interest at the time specified, to consider the whole debt due. Being inseparably connected with the mortgage, and affected by the conditions contained therein, the note is not negotiable, within the law merchant or Civil Code. Kent, under the head of "The Essential Qualities of Negotiable Paper," says that, to constitute a negotiable note or bill, "it is essential that it carry with it a personal credit given to the drawer or indorser, and that it be not confined to credit upon any future or contingent event." 3 Kent, Comm. "A negotiable instrument must be made payable in money only, and without any condition not certain of fulfillment." Civ. Code, § 3088. "A negotiable instrument must not contain any other contract than such as is specified in this article." Civ. Code, § 3093. In Adams v. Seaman, 82 Cal. 636, 23 Pac. 53, 7 L. R. A. 224, in commenting upon these provisions of the Civil Code, it is said, "An instrument is not negotiable if it have 'any condition not certain of fulfillment.'" And it was held that a provision for the payment of an attorney's fee in case of foreclosure was a contingency rendering the note non-negotiable. The assignment and transfer of the note and mortgage in question, therefore, was without prejudice to any set-off or other defense existing in favor of the defendants Weber, the same as though there had been no assignment, and the action had been brought by the company to whom they were given. Civ. Code, § 1459; Code Civ. Proc. § 368. As the findings of the court show an utter failure of consideration as between the original parties, judgment properly followed in favor of the defendants. Judgment affirmed.

MEMORANDUM DECISIONS.

BALFOUR-GUTHRIE INVESTMENT CO. v. GRAVES et al. (L. A. 822.)¹ (Supreme Court of California. June 12, 1901.) Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; J. W. Hughes, Judge. Action by the Balfour-Guthrie Investment Company against Mariah Graves and others. From an order, on motion of defendant F. R. Sawday, setting aside the default of the defendant, and vacating the findings and judgment against defendant, and permitting defendant to file his answer in the action, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed. W. T. McNealy and Andrews & O'Farrell, for appellant. G. H. P. Shaw and Mills & Higar, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. This is an appeal by the plaintiff from the order of the court, made on motion of defendant F. R. Sawday, setting aside the default of the defendant, vacating the findings and judgment against defendant, and permitting defendant to file his answer in the action. The cause is identical in all respects with that of Investment Co. v. Sawday (L. A. 852; this day filed) 65 Pac. 400, saving, however, that here the judge of the trial court granted defendant's motion. For the reasons given in L. A. 852, the order of the court is affirmed.

We concur: McFARLAND, J.; TEMPLE, J.

DURHAM v. UNION SAV. BANK OF SAN JOSE. (S. F. 2482.) (Supreme Court of California. May 31, 1901.) Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; M. H. Hyland, Judge. Action by J. Durham against the Union Savings Bank of San José. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed. Jackson Hatch, for appellant. O. O. Felkner, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The case is substantially similar to that of Arques v. Same Defendant, 65 Pac. 307, and is submitted on the briefs on file on that appeal. On the authority of that case the judgment should be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to dismiss the complaint; and it is so ordered.

FARMING & FRUIT LAND CO. v. SOUTHERN PAC. R. CO. (L. A. 867.) (Supreme Court of California. July 25, 1901.) Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Lucien Shaw, Judge. Action by the Farming & Fruit Land Company against the Southern Pacific Railroad Company. From a judgment in favor of the defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed. Anderson & Anderson, for appellant. Wm. Singer, Jr., and H. V. Reardan, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This case is similar to Anderson v. Railroad Co. (L. A. 866; decision this day filed) 65 Pac. 950, and upon the authority of that case the judgment is affirmed.

GREEN et ux. v. GRIDER et al. (L. A. 870.) (Supreme Court of California. July 24, 1901.) Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; John L. Campbell, Judge. Action by R. Henry Green and wife against L. M. Grider and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant Enola Myers, executrix of the will of John Myers, deceased, appeals. Affirmed. Walter F. Haas, Chas. Cassat Davis, Cole & Cole, and S. O. Houghton, for appellant. J. L. Murphy, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This appeal is from the same judgment as that involved in the case of the same title (L. A. 856) in 65 Pac. 975, and the questions involved are the same. On the authority of that case, therefore, the judgment must be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

PEOPLE ex rel. ATTORNEY GENERAL v. STOCKTON ELECTRIC R. CO. (Sac. 769.) (Supreme Court of California. Aug. 10, 1901.) Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county; Joseph H. Budd, Judge. Action by the people of the state of California, on information of the attorney general, against the Stockton Electric Railroad Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed. Tirey L. Ford, Atty. Gen., and J. F. Ramage, for appellant. Woods & Levinsky, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. As disclosed by the record, the questions presented upon this appeal are identical with those considered and decided this day in the cause entitled People ex rel. Attorney General v. Stockton Savings & Loan Soc. (No. 768) 65 Pac. 1078. Upon the authority of that case the judgment is affirmed.

READ v. SAN DIEGO UNION CO. et al. (L. A. 885.) (Supreme Court of California. June 26, 1901.) Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Lucien Shaw, Judge. Action by T. J. Read against the San Diego Union Company and others. From an order denying a motion for a change of venue from Los Angeles to San Diego county, defendant San Diego Union Company appeals. Reversed. Titus & Shaw, for appellant. W. H. Shinn and Byron L. Oliver, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This is a companion case to L. A. No. 884 (this day decided) 65 Pac. 567, and like it involves a motion for a change of the place of trial from Los Angeles county to San Diego, the place of residence of the defendant San Diego Union Company, a corporation. The motion in the former case was made after the answer of defendants Bowker and Chandler was filed, but afterwards said defendants filed a cross complaint therein, and this motion was made for the purpose of including said cross complaint in the order for a change of the place of trial. No facts appear, in the cross complaint or otherwise, affecting the conclusion reached in No. 884, and for the reasons stated in the opinion in that case it is ordered that the order appealed from herein be reversed, with a like direction.

SOUTHERN PAC. CO. et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT et al. (S. F. 2,408.) (Supreme Court of California. May 23, 1901.) In bank. Petition by the Southern Pacific Company, a corporation, and others, for a writ of prohibition against the superior court and George H. Bahrs, judge thereof, to restrain certain proceedings. Dismissed. J. E. Foulds (John Garber, of counsel), for petitioners. Tirey L. Ford, Atty. Gen., for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This is a petition for a writ of prohibition to restrain certain proceedings pending the appeal in this court in the case of Edson v. Southern Pac. Co. (S. F. 2,433; this day decided) 65 Pac. 15. A temporary restraining order was issued, and afterwards, on request of the parties, the Edson Case was advanced, and it was agreed by counsel that this petition should be submitted at the same time as the main case. As the Edson Case has been decided, this proceeding is of no further consequence, and it is dismissed, without costs to either party.

SOUTHERN PAC. R. CO. v. LAMB. (L. A. 907.) (Supreme Court of California. Aug. 1, 1901.) Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Orange county; J. W. Ballard, Judge. Action by the Southern Pacific Railroad Company against Anson D. Lamb. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed. Wm. Singer, Jr., and H. V. Reardan, for appellant. F. O. Daniel, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. A demurrer to the complaint was sustained in this action, and, the plaintiff failing to amend its complaint, the defendant had judgment, from which the plaintiff appeals. In appellant's brief herein it is conceded that "the action is precisely similar in all respects to the action of Railroad Co. v. Bell (S. F. 1,720) 125 Cal. xix., 58 Pac. 1116, recently decided by this court, on the authority of Same v. Wood, 124 Cal. 475, 57 Pac. 388, against the appellant here." It appears from an examination and comparison of the several cases referred to that the above concession is in strict accordance with the facts, and for that reason it will be unnecessary to do more than affirm the judgment appealed from herein, basing our action upon the authority of the cases supra. The respondent makes several points not discussed in the opinion of the principal case of Railroad Co. v. Wood, supra, but for the reasons there stated they need not be considered here. The judgment is affirmed.

VAN EVERY v. SOUTHERN PAC. R. CO. (L. A. 865.) (Supreme Court of California. July 25, 1901.) Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Lucien Shaw, Judge. Action by C. B. Van Every against the Southern Pacific Railroad Company. From a judgment in favor of the defendant, the plaintiff appeals. Affirmed. Anderson & Anderson, for appellant. Wm. Singer, Jr., and H. V. Reardan, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is a companion case to Anderson v. Railroad Co. (L. A. 863; decision this day filed) 65 Pac. 950, and upon the authority of that case the judgment here is affirmed.
